

NOTICE
 IF THE FILM IMAGE IS LESS CLEAR THAN
 THIS NOTICE, IT IS DUE TO THE QUALITY OF THE DOCUMENT BEING FILMED.

Non-smoker Richard Woodward, left, and smoker Jack McDowell

Examiner: Walt Lynde

Who is on which side in Prop 5. battle

Supporters of Proposition 5, the anti-smoking initiative, are, not surprisingly, many of the groups and individuals who are most likely to quit cigarettes for health reasons.

Opponents include business and labor groups. Almost 90 percent of the No-on-5 committee's funding is coming from five tobacco companies.

Heading the Yes-on-5 Campaign Advocates Committee is Jesse Stenfield, the U.S. surgeon general from 1968 to 1974. Others on the committee include Albert Sorensen, the state health director, and Bob Stappa, Club President J. William Farrell and Dr. John Weeks, III, dean of the school of medicine at the University of California at San Diego.

Organizations for Prop 5 include the American Cancer Society, California Division, the Group Against Smoking Pollution, and the California Lung Association, the California PTA, Retail Store Employees Union, and the California Cancer and Lung Agency Council on Smoke and Health.

Cocitizens of Californians for Common Sense, the anti-tobacco group, include the state AFL-CIO, Houston Flourish, Republican candidate for governor in 1974, and Katherine Duhalap, former Los Angeles water and power commissioner.

Other groups against Prop. 5 are the California Labor Federation, the state Chamber of Commerce, the Democratic Party, the California Manufacturers Association, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, the National Federation of Independent Business, and the California Association of Realtors.

Tobacco companies fund 'no' vote

Other major donors:

Philip Morris, $700,000; Brown & Williamson, $470,000; Lorillard, $304,484; and Liggett & Myers, $134,025.

So far, the organization said, it has spent a total of $2,525,307 to fight the anti-smoking measure, mostly on pre-paid ads for future advertising "and other campaign services."

Californians for Common Sense, the group behind the anti-tobacco initiative, has received donations totaling $3,081,665 — the bulk of it from the nation's major tobacco companies.

In a fiscal report prepared for filing with the secretary of state today, the organization said its major benefactor to date has been the R.J. Reynolds company, which of time through with $1,067,700

6870 | 7 8 1 9

51