

THADDEUS
OF WARSAW

TUFTS COLLEGE

TUFTS COLLEGE LIBRARY

Unknown

January 1940

128560

80713

~~45~~

35

Thaddeus in Prison

THADDEUS

OF

WARSAW

BY

MISS JANE PORTER,

AUTHOR OF "THE SCOTTISH CHIEFS," ETC.

*"Loin d'aimer la guerre, il l'abhorre;
En triomphant même il déplore
Les désastres qu'elle produit;
Et couronné par la victoire,
Il gémit de sa propre gloire,
Si la paix n'en est pas le fruit."*

WITH

A NEW INTRODUCTION, NOTES, ETC.,

BY THE AUTHOR.

NEW YORK:

HURST & CO., PUBLISHERS,

122, NASSAU STREET.

100 0000

100 0000

128560

PR

5/89

PS

TS

1800

ABK - 44580

THE AUTHOR,

TO

HER FRIENDLY READERS

Written for the New Edition of "Thaddeus of Warsaw," forming one of the Series called "The Standard Novels."

To such readers alone, who, by the sympathy of a social taste, fall in with any blameless fashion of the day, and, from an amiable interest also in whatever may chance to afford them innocent pleasure, would fain know something more about an author whose works have brought them that gratification than the cold letter of a mere literary preface usually tells; to such readers this—something of an egotistical—epistle is addressed.

For, in the beginning the republication of a regular series of the novels, or, as they have been more properly called, biographical romances, of which I have been the author, it has been considered desirable to make certain additions to each work, in the form of a few introductory pages and scattered notes, illustrative of the origin of the tale, of the historical events referred to in it, and of the actually living characters who constitute its personages, with some account also of the really local scenery described; thus giving, it is thought, a double zest to the entertainment of the reader, by bringing him into a previous acquaintance with the persons he is to meet in the book, and making him agreeably familiar with the country through which he is to travel in their company. Indeed, the social taste of the times has lately fully shown how advantageous the like conversational disclosures have proved to the recent republications of the celebrated "Waverley Novels," by the chief of novel-writers; and in the new series of the admirable naval tales, by the distinguished American novelist, who paid to the mother-country the gratifying tribute of making it their birthplace.

Such evidences in favor of an argument, could not fail to persuade me to undertake the desired elucidating task; feeling, indeed, particularly pleased to adopt, in my turn, a successful example from the once Great Unknown—now the not less great avowed author of the Waverley Novels, in the person of Sir Walter Scott; who did me the honor to adopt the style or class of novel of which "Thaddeus of Warsaw" was the first:—a class which, uniting the personages and facts of real history or biography, with a combining and illustrative machinery of the imagination, formed a new species of writing in that day, and to which Madame de Staël and others have given the appellation of "an epic in prose." The day of its appearance is now pretty far back: for "Thaddeus of Warsaw" (a tale founded on Polish heroism), and the "Scottish Chiefs" (a romance grounded on Scottish heroism), were both published in England, and translated into various languages abroad, many years before the literary wonder of Scotland gave to the world his transcendent story of Waverley, forming a most impressive historical picture of the last struggle of the papist, but gallant, branch of Stuarts for the British throne.*

"Thaddeus of Warsaw" being the first essay, in the form of such an association between fact and fancy, was published by its author with a natural apprehension of its reception by the critical part of the public. She had not, indeed, written it with any view to publication; but from an almost resistless impulse to embody the ideas and impressions with which her heart and mind were then full. It was written in her earliest youth; dictated by a fervent sympathy with calamities which had scarcely ceased to exist, and which her eager pen sought to portray; and it was given to the world, or rather to those who might feel with her, with all the simple-hearted enthusiasm which saw no impediment when a tale of virtue or of pity was to be told.

* It was on the publication of these, her two first works, in the German language, that the authoress was honored with being made a lady of the chapter of St. Joachim, and received the gold cross of the order from Wirtemberg.

In looking back through the avenue of life to that time, what events have occurred, public and private, to the countries and to the individuals, named in that tale! to persons of even as lofty names and excellencies, of our own and other lands, who were mutually affected with me, in admiration and regret, for the virtues and the sorrows described! In sitting down now to my retrospective task, I find myself writing this, my second preface to the story of "Thaddeus of Warsaw," just thirty years from the date of its first publication. Then, I wrote when the struggle for the birthright independence of Poland was no more; when she lay in her ashes, and her heroes in their wounds; when the pall of death spread over the whole country; and her widows and her orphans traveled afar.

In the days of my almost childhood—that is, eight years before I dipped my pen in their tears—I remember seeing many of those hapless refugees wandering about St. James's Park. They had sad companions in the like miseries, though from different enemies, in the emigrants from France;—and memory can never forget the variety of wretched, yet noble-looking visages I then contemplated, in the daily walks which my mother's own little family-group were accustomed to take there. One person, a gaunt figure, with melancholy and bravery stamped on his emaciated features, is often present to the recollection of us all. He was clad in a threadbare blue uniform great coat, with a black stock, a rusty old hat, pulled rather over his eyes; his hands without gloves; but his aspect was that of a perfect gentleman, and his step that of a military man. We saw him constantly at one hour, in the middle walk of the Mall, and always alone; never looking to the right nor to the left, but straight on; with an unmoving countenance, and a pace which told that his thoughts were those of a homeless and a hopeless man—hopeless, at least, of all life might bring him. On, on he went to the end of the Mall; turned again, and on again; and so he continued to do always, as long as we remained spectators of his solitary walk: once, indeed, we saw him crossing into St. Martin's-lane. Nobody seemed to know him, for he spoke to none; and no person ever addressed him, though many, like ourselves, looked at him, and stopped in the path to gaze after him. We often longed to be rich, to follow him wherever his wretched abode might have been; and then silently to send comforts to him from hands he knew not of. We used to call him, when speaking of him to ourselves, Il Penseroso; and by that name we yet not unfrequently talk of him to each other, and never without recurrence to the very painful, because unavailing sympathy we then felt for that apparently friendless man. Such sympathy is, indeed right; for it is one of the secondary means by which Providence conducts the stream of his mercies to them who need the succor of their fellow-creatures; and we can not doubt that though the agency of such Providence was not to be in our hands, that there were those who had both the will and the power given, and did not, like ourselves, turn and visit that interesting emigrant in vain.

Some time after this, General Kosciusko, the justly celebrated hero of Poland, came to England, on his way to the United States, having been released from his close imprisonment in Russia, and in the noblest manner too, by the Emperor Paul, immediately on his accession to the throne. His arrival caused a great sensation in London; and many of the first characters of the times pressed forward to pay their respects to such real patriotic virtue in its adversity. An old friend of my family was among them; and whose own warm heart encouraging the enthusiasm of ours, he took my brother Robert to visit the Polish veteran, then lodging at Sablonnière's Hotel, in Leicester-square. My brother, on his return to us, described him as a noble-looking man, though not at all handsome, lying upon a couch in a very enfeebled state, from the effect of numerous wounds he had received in his breast by the Cossacks' lances after his fall, having been previously overthrown by a saber stroke on his head. His voice, in consequence of the induced internal weakness, was very low, and his speaking always with resting intervals. He wore a black bandage across his forehead, which covered a deep wound there; and, indeed his whole figure bore marks of long suffering.

Our friend introduced my brother to him by name, and as "a boy emulous of seeing and following noble examples." Kosciusko took him kindly by the hand, and spoke to him words of generous encouragement, in whatever path of virtuous ambition he might take. They never have been forgotten. Is it then to be wondered at that, combining the mute distress I had so often contemplated in other victims of similar misfortunes, with the magnanimous object then described to me by my brother, that the first story of heroism my young imagination should think of embodying into shape should be founded on the actual scenes of Kosciusko's sufferings, and molded out of his virtues!

To have made him the ostensible hero of the tale, would have suited neither the modesty of his feelings nor the humbleness of my own expectation of telling it as I wished. I therefore took a younger, and less pretending agent, in the personification of a descendant of the great John Sobieski.

But it was, as I have already said, some years after the partition of Poland that I wrote, and gave for publication, my historical romance on that catastrophe. It was finished amid a circle of friends well calculated to fan the flame which had inspired its commencement, some of the leading heroes of the British army just returned from the victorious fields of Alexandria and St. Jean d'Acre;—and, seated in my brother's little study, with the war-dyed coat in which the veteran Abercrombie breathed his last grateful sigh, while, like Wolfe, he gazed on the boasted invincible standard of the enemy, brought to him by a British soldier—with this trophy of our own native valor on one side of me, and on the other the bullet-torn vest of another English commander of as many battles—but who, having survived to enjoy his fame, I do not name here—I put my last strokes to the first campaigns of Thaddeus Sobieski.

When the work was finished, some of the persons near me urged its being published. But I argued in opposition to the wish, its different construction to all other novels or romances which had gone before it; from Richardson's time-honored domestic novels, to the penetrating feeling in similar scenes by the pen of Henry Mackenzie; and again, Charlotte Smith's more recent, elegant, but very sentimental love stories. But the most formidable of all were the widely interesting romances of Anne Radcliffe, whose indeed magical wand of wonders and mysteries was then the ruling style of the day. I urged, how could any one expect that the admiring readers of such works could consider my simply told biographical legend of Poland any thing better than a dull union between real history and a matter-of-fact imagination?

Arguments were found to answer all this; and being excited by the feelings which had dictated my little work, and encouraged by the corresponding characters with whom I daily associated, I ventured the essay. However, I had not read the sage romances of our elder times without turning to some account the lessons they taught to adventurous personages of either sex; showing that even the boldest knight never made a new sally without consecrating his shield with some impress of acknowledged reverence. In like manner, when I entered the field with my modern romance of "Thaddeus of Warsaw," I inscribed the first page with the name of the hero of Acre.

That dedication will be found through all its successive editions, still in front of the title page; and immediately following it is a second inscription, added, in after years, to the memory of the magnanimous patriot and exemplary man, Thaddeus Kosciusko, who had first filled me with ambition to write the tale, and who died in Switzerland, A.D. 1817, fuller of glory than of years. Yet, if life be measured by its vicissitudes and its virtues, we may justly say, "he was gathered in his ripeness."

After his visit to old friends in the United States—where, in his youth he had learned the art of war, and the science of a noble, unselfish independence, from the marvel of modern times, General Washington—Kosciusko returned to Europe, and abode a while in France; but not in its capital: he lived deeply retired; gradually restoring his shattered frame to some degree of health, by the peace of a resigned mind, and the occupation of rural employments. Circumstances led him to Switzerland; and the country of William Tell, and of simple Christian fellowship, could not but soon be found peculiarly congenial to his spirit, long turned away from the pageants and the pomp of this world. In his span, he had had all, either in his grasp, or proffered to him. For when nothing remained of all his military glory and his patriotic sacrifices but a yet existing fame, and a conscious sense within him of duty performed, he was content to “eat his crust” with that inheritance alone; and he refused, though with an answering magnanimity of acknowledgment, a valuable property offered to him by the Emperor of Russia, as a free gift from a generous enemy, esteeming his proved, disinterested virtues. He also declined the yet more dazzling present of a crown, from the then master of the continent, who would have set him on the throne of Poland—but, of a truth, under the vassalage of the Emperor of the French! Kosciusko was not to be consoled for Poland, by riches bestowed on himself; nor betrayed into compromising her birthright of national independence by the casuistry that would have made his parental scepter the instrument of a foreign domination.

Having such a theme as his name, and the heroes his co-patriots, the romance of “Thaddeus of Warsaw” was no sooner published than it overcame the novelty of its construction, and became universally popular. Nor was it very long before it fell into General Kosciusko’s hands, though then in a distant land; and he kindly and promptly lost no time in letting the author know his approbation of the narrative, but qualified with several modest expressions respecting himself. From that period she enjoyed many treasured marks of his esteem; and she will add, though with a sad satisfaction, that among her several relics of the great departed who have honored her with regard, she possesses, most dearly prized, a medal of Kosciusko, and a lock of his hair. About the same time she received a most incontestable proof of the accuracy of her story, from the lips of General Gardiner, the last British minister to the court of Stanislaus Augustus. On his reading the book, he was so sure that the facts it represented could only have been learned on the spot, that he expressed his surprise to several persons that the author of the work, an English lady, could have been at Warsaw during all the troubles there, and he not know it. On his repeating this observation to the late Duke of Roxburgh, his grace's sister-in-law, who happened to overhear what was said, and knew the writer, answered him by saying, "The author had never been in Poland." "Impossible!" replied the general; "no one could describe the scenes and occurrences there in the manner it is done in that book without having been an eye-witness." The lady, however, convinced the general of the fact being otherwise, by assuring him, from her own personal knowledge, that the author of "Thaddeus of Warsaw" was a mere school-girl in England at the time of the events of the story.

How then, it has often been asked, did she obtain such accurate information with regard to those events? and how acquire her familiar acquaintance with the places and persons she represents in the work? The answer is short. By close questioning every person who came in her way that knew any thing about the object of her interest; and there were many brave hearts and indignant lips ready to open with the sad yet noble tale. Thus every illustrious individual she wished to bring into her narrative gradually grew upon her knowledge, till she became as well acquainted with all her desired personages as if they were actually present with her; for she knew their minds and their actions; and those compose the man. The features of the country, also, were learned from persons who had trodden the spots she describes: and that they were indeed correct pictures of their homes and war-fields, the tears and bursting enthusiasm of many of Poland's long-expatriated sons have more than once borne testimony to her.

As one instance, out of the number I might repeat, of the inextinguishable love of those noble wanderers for their native country, I shall subjoin the copy of a letter addressed to me by one of these gallant men, then holding a high military post in a foreign service; and who, I afterward learned, is of the family of Kosciusko, whose portrait he sent to me: for the letter was accompanied with a curiously wrought ring of pure gold, containing a likeness of that hero. The letter was in French, and I transcribe it literally in the words of the writer:—

“MADAME!

“Un inconnu ose adresser la parole à l’auteur immortel de “Thaddeus de Warsaw;” attaché par tant de liens à l’héros que vous avez chanté, je m’enhardis à distraire pour un moment vos nobles veilles.

“Qu’il me soit permis de vous offrir, madame, l’hommage de mon admiration la plus exaltée, en vous présentant la bague qui contient le buste du Général Kosciusko:—elle a servi de signe de ralliement aux patriots Polonois, lorsque, en 1794, ils entreprirent de sécouer leur joug.

“Les anciens déposoient leurs offrandes sur l’autel de leurs divinités tutélaires;—je ne fais qu’imiter leur exemple. Vous êtes pour tous les Polonois cette divinité, qui la première ait élevée sa voix, du fond de l’impériale Albion, en leur faveur.

“Un jour viendra, et j’ose conserver dans mon cœur cet espoir, que vos accens, qui ont retenti dans le cœur de l’Europe sensible, produiront leur effet célestial, en ressuscitant l’ombre sanglante de ma chère patrie.

“Daignez agréer, madame, l’hommage respectueuse d’un de vos serviteurs le plus dévoué,

“Etc. Etc.”

Probably the writer of the above is now returned to his country, his vows having been most awfully answered by one of the most momentous struggles she has ever had, or to which the nations around have ever yet stood as spectators; for the balance of Europe trembles at the turning of her scale.

Thus, then, it can not but be that in the conclusion of this my, perhaps, last introductory preface to any new edition of "Thaddeus of Warsaw," its author should offer up a sincerely heartfelt prayer to the KING OF KINGS, the Almighty Father of all mankind, that His all-gracious Spirit may watch over the issue of this contest, and dictate the peace of Poland!

ESSEX, May, 1831.

Dedication to the First Edition.

THADDEUS OF WARSAW

IS INSCRIBED TO

SIR SIDNEY SMITH:

IN THE HOPE THAT, AS
SIR PHILIP SIDNEY
DID NOT DISDAIN TO WRITE A ROMANCE,
SIR SIDNEY SMITH
WILL NOT REFUSE TO READ ONE.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY CONSIGNED HIS EXCELLENT WORK TO THE AFFECTION OF A SISTER:

I CONFIDE MY ASPIRING ATTEMPT TO THE URBANITY OF THE BRAVE; TO THE MAN OF TASTE, OF FEELING, AND OF CANDOR;

TO HIM WHOSE FRIENDSHIP WILL BESTOW
THAT INDULGENCE ON THE AUTHOR WHICH HIS JUDGMENT MIGHT HAVE DENIED TO THE BOOK;

TO HIM OF WHOM FUTURE AGES WILL SPEAK WITH HONOR, AND THE PRESENT TIMES BOAST AS THEIR GLORY!

TO

SIR SIDNEY SMITH

I SUBMIT THIS HUMBLE TRIBUTE OF THE HIGHEST RESPECT WHICH CAN BE OFFERED BY A BRITON, OR ANIMATE THE HEART OF HIS SINCERE FRIEND,
THE AUTHOR.

A Subsequent Inscription.

THADDEUS OF WARSAW.

THE

TENTH EDITION

IS HUMBLY AND AFFECTIONATELY

INSCRIBED, BY ITS AUTHOR,

TO THE MEMORY

OF THE LATE

GENERAL THADDEUS KOSCIUSKO.

ONE view, in the original design of this work, having been to draw a distinguishing line between the spirit of patriotism and that of ambitious public disturbance; between the disinterested brave man and a military plunderer; between true glory, which arises from benefits bestowed, and the false fame which a captain of banditti has as much right to arrogate as the invader of kingdoms; to exhibit this radical difference between the hero and the mere soldier of fortune, the character of General Kosciusko presented itself as the completest existing exemplar for such a picture. Enthusiasm supplied the pencil of adequate genius. Though the written portraiture be imperfectly sketched, yet its author has been gratified by the sympathy of readers, not only of her own country, but of that of her hero. The work having gone through so many editions, proves that she did not aspire quite in vain; and the principles of heroic virtue, which she sought to inculcate in her story of Poland, having been pronounced by the great patriot of Poland as not unworthy his approbation, seems, now that he is removed from all earthly influences, to sanction her paying that tribute to his memory which delicacy forbade during his life.

The first publication of this work was inscribed to a British hero, whose noble nature well deserves the title bestowed upon it by his venerable sovereign—Cœur de Lion. He fully appreciated the character of Thaddeus Kosciusko; and the author of this sketch feels that she deepens the tints of honor on each name by thus associating them together. May the tomb of the British hero be long of finding its place! That of Kosciusko has already received its sacred deposit; and, with emotions far from a stranger's heart, this poor offering is laid on the grave of him who fought for freedom under the banner of a patriot king; who, when riches and a crown were proffered to himself, declined both, because no price could buy the independence of an honest man! Such was General Kosciusko!—Such was the model of disinterestedness, valor, and of public virtue, which I set before me in these pages!—Such was the man who honored the writer of them with his esteem; and in that one word she feels a sufficient privilege to dedicate, with humble and affectionate devotion, these few inadequate pages to his memory!—daring to catch at some memorial of herself in after-times, by thus uniting to the name of Thaddeus Kosciusko that of his ever grateful

JANE PORTER.

LONG DITTON, Sept. 4, 1819.

P R E F A C E

TO

THE FIRST EDITION OF THIS WORK.

HAVING attempted a work of Four Volumes, it is natural that the consideration of so much time and thought as must have been spent in its execution should occasion to the Author some anxiety respecting its fate; therefore, before the Reader favors the tale itself with his attention, I beg leave to offer him an account of its design.

Observing the mistakes which my young cotemporaries make in their estimates of character and of life; how much they require that the difference between certain splendid vices, and the brilliant order of virtues, should be distinctly marked; with perhaps a too daring hand, I here venture to sketch the sacred line.

Wishing to portray a character which prosperity could not inflate, nor adversity depress, I chose Magnanimity as the subject of my story. I found the original of my portrait in Poland. There is a powerful ray of the Almighty in truly great minds; it burns with equal splendor in prosperity and in adversity; its purity, as well as its ardor, declares its divine origin. This is the talisman of those achievements which amaze every one but their accomplisher. When the eye is fixed on heaven, "Ossa seems a wart."

What flattered Alexander into a madman, and degraded the high-souled Cæsar into a tyrant, I have selected as the first ordeal of Thaddeus Sobieski. Placed at the summit of mortal ambition, surrounded with greatness and glory, he shows neither pride nor vanity. And when, in the progress of his second trial, he is plunged into the depths of sorrow, the weakness of passion never sinks the dignity of his fortitude, neither does the firmness of that virtue blunt the amiable sensibility of his heart.

This being the aim to which every incident in the story ought to tend, it became necessary to station my hero amid scenes where events might probably arise that were proper to excite his valor and generosity, and to put his moderation to the test. Poland seemed the country best calculated to promote my intention. Her struggles for independence, and her misfortunes, afforded me situations exactly fitted to my plan:—and, preferring a series of incidents, which are true and interesting, before a legend of war fabricated by my own hand, I have made no hesitation to accept truth as the helpmate of fiction.

I have now described my plan; if it be disapproved, let the Work be neglected; but, should the Reader be so candid as to wish to proceed, I must beg him to peruse the whole of the first volume. Aware that war and politics are not promising subjects of amusement, it is requisite to assure him that he needs not to be alarmed at its battles; they are neither frequent, nor do they last long: and, I request him not to pass over any scene as extraneous, which, though it begin like a state-paper or a sermon, always terminates by casting some new light on the portrait of the hero. As the three remaining volumes are totally confined to domestic events, they have none of these prejudices to encounter; but if the Reader do not approach them regularly through all the development of character opened in the first volume, what they exhibit will seem a mere wilderness of incidents, without interest or end. Indeed, I have designed nothing in the personages of this story beyond the sphere of living evidence. I have sketched no virtue that I have not seen, nor painted any folly from imagination. I have endeavored to be as faithful to reality in my pictures of domestic morals, and of heroic life, as a just painter would be to the existing and engaging objects of nature; and, on these grounds, I have attempted steadily to inculcate, “That virtue is the highest proof of understanding, and the only solid basis of greatness; and that vice is the natural consequence of narrow thoughts; which begin in mistake, and end in ignominy.”

J. P

LONDON, 1803.

THADDEUS OF WARSAW.

CHAPTER I.

THE large and magnificent palace of Villanow, whose vast domains stretch along the northern bank of the Vistula, was the favorite residence of John Sobieski, King of Poland. That monarch, after having delivered his country from innumerable enemies, rescued Vienna, and subdued the Turks, retired to this place at certain seasons, and thence dispensed those acts of his luminous and benevolent mind which rendered his name great and his people happy.

When Charles the Twelfth of Sweden visited the tomb of Sobieski, at Cracow, he exclaimed, "What a pity that so great a man should ever die!"* Another generation saw the spirit of this lamented hero revive in the person of his descendant, Constantine, Count Sobieski; who, in a comparatively private station, as Palatine of Masovia, and the friend, rather than the lord, of his vassals, evinced by his actions that he was the inheritor of his forefather's virtue, as well as of his blood.

He was the first Polish nobleman who granted freedom to his peasants. He threw down their mud hovels and built comfortable villages; he furnished them with seed, cattle, and implements of husbandry; and calling their families together, laid before them the deed of their enfranchisement: but, before he signed it, he expressed a fear that they would abuse this liberty, of which they had not had experience, and become licentious.

* In the year 1683, this hero raised the siege of Vienna, then beleaguered by the Turks; and driving them out of Europe, saved Christendom from a Mohammedan usurpation.

“No,” returned a venerable peasant; “when we possessed no other property than the staffs which we hold in our hands, we were destitute of all worldly motive for discreet conduct: not having any thing to lose, we acted on too many occasions in an intemperate manner. But now that the fruits of our labors are absolutely our own, the care of protecting them will be a sufficient restraint upon our actions.”

The good sense and truth of this answer were manifested in the event. On the emancipation of these people, they became so prosperous in business, and correct in behavior, that the example of the palatine was speedily followed by several of the principal nobility. The king's reforming spirit moved in unison with that of Sobieski; and a constitution was given to Poland, to place her in the first rank of free nations.

Encircled by his happy tenantry, and within the bosom of his family, this illustrious man educated Thaddeus, the only male heir of his name, to the exercise of all the virtues which ennoble and endear the possessor.

But this reign of public and domestic peace was not to continue. A formidable, and apparently friendly, state envied the effects of a patriotism it would not imitate; and in the beginning of the year 1792, regardless of existing treaties, broke in upon the unguarded frontiers of Poland; threatening, with all the horrors of a merciless war, the properties, lives, and liberty of the people.

The family of Sobieski had ever been foremost in the ranks of their country; and at the present crisis, its venerable head did not hang behind the youngest warrior in preparations for the field.

On the evening of an anniversary of the birth-day of his grandson, the palatine rode abroad with a party of friends who had been celebrating the festival with their presence. The countess his daughter, and Thaddeus, were left alone in the saloon. She sighed as she gazed on her son, who stood at some distance, fitting to his youthful thigh a variety of sabers which his servant, a little time before, had laid upon the table. She observed with anxiety the eagerness of his motion, and the ardor that was flashing from his eyes.

“Thaddeus,” said she, “lay down that sword; I wish to speak with you.” Thaddeus looked gayly up. “My dear Thaddeus!” cried his mother, and tears started to her eyes. The blush of enthusiasm faded from his face; he threw the saber from him, and drew near the countess.

“Why, my dear mother, do you distress yourself? When I am in battle, shall I not have my grandfather near me; and be as much under the protection of God as at this moment?”

“Yes, my child,” answered she, “God will protect you. He is the protector of the orphan, and you are fatherless.” The countess paused—“Here, my son,” said she, giving him a sealed packet, “take this; it will reveal to you the history of your birth, and the name of your father. It is necessary that you should know the truth, and all the goodness of your grandfather.” Thaddeus received it, and stood silent with surprise. “Read it, my love,” continued she, “but go to your own apartments: here you may be interrupted.”

Bewildered by the manner of the countess, Thaddeus, without answering, instantly obeyed. Shutting himself within his study, he impatiently opened the papers; and soon found his whole attention absorbed in the following recital:—

“TO MY DEAR SON, THADDEUS CONSTANTINE SOBIESKI.

“You are now, my Thaddeus! at the early age of nineteen, going to engage the enemies of your country. Ere I resign my greatest comfort to the casualties of war, ere I part with you, perhaps forever, I would inform you who your father really was—that father whose existence you have hardly known, and whose name you have never heard. You believe yourself an orphan; your mother a widow: but, alas! I have now to tell you that you were made fatherless by the cruelty of man, not by the dispensation of heaven.

“Twenty years ago I accompanied my father in a tour through Germany into Italy. Grief for the death of my mother had impaired his health; and the physicians ordered him to reside in a warmer climate: accordingly we fixed ourselves near the Arno. During several visits to Florence, my father met, in that city, with a young Englishman of the name of Sackville. These frequent meetings opened into intimacy, and he was invited to our house.

“Mr. Sackville was not only the handsomest man I had ever beheld, but the most accomplished; and his heart seemed the seat of every graceful feeling. He was the first man for whose society I felt a lively preference. I used to smile at this strange delight, or sometimes weep; for the emotions which agitated me were undefinable: but they were enchanting; and unheedingly I gave them indulgence. The hours which we passed together in the interchange of reciprocal sentiments; the kind beaming of his looks; the thousand sighs that he breathed; the half-uttered sentences; all conspired to rob me of myself.

“Eight months were spent in these delusions.—During the last three, doubts and anguish displaced the blissful reveries of an infant tenderness. The attentions of Mr. Sackville died away. From being the object of his constant search, he now sedulously sought to avoid me. When my father withdrew to his closet, he would take his leave, and allow me to walk alone. Solitary and wretched were my rambles. I had full leisure to compare my then disturbed state of mind with the comparative peace I had enjoyed in my own country. Immured within the palace of Villanow, watching the declining health of my mother, I knew nothing of the real world; the little I had learned of society being drawn from books, and uncorrected by experience, I was taught to believe a perfection in man, which, to my affliction, I since found to be but poet's dream. When I came to Italy, I continued averse to public company. In such seclusion, the presence of Sackville, being almost my only pleasure, chased from my mind its usual reserve; and gradually, and surely, won upon the awakened affections of my heart. Artless and unwarned, I knew not the nature of the passion which I cherished until it had gained an ascendancy that menaced my life.

“On the evening of one of those days in which I had not seen this too dearly beloved friend, I strolled out, and, hardly conscious of my actions, threw myself along the summit of a flight of steps that led down to the Arno. My head rested against the base of a statue, which, because of its resemblance to me, Sackville had presented to my father. Every recollected kindness of his now gave me additional torment; and, clinging to the pedestal, as to the altar of my adoration, in the bitterness of disappointment, I addressed the insensible stone: ‘O! were I pale as thou art, and this breast as cold and still, would Sackville, when he looked on me, give one sigh to the creature he had destroyed?’ My sobs followed this adjuration, and the next moment I felt myself encircled in his arms. I struggled, and, almost fainting, begged to be released. He did release me, and, falling on his knees, implored my pardon for the misery which I had endured. ‘Now, Therese,’ cried he, ‘all is as it ought to be! you are my only hope. Consent to be mine, or the world has no hold on me!’ His voice was hurried and incoherent.—Raising my eyes to his, I beheld them wild and bloodshot. Terrified at his look, and overcome by my own emotions, my head sunk on the marble. With increased violence, he exclaimed, 'Have I deceived myself here too? Therese, did you not prefer me? Did you not love me?—Speak now, I conjure you, by your own happiness and mine! Do you reject me?' He clinched my hands with a force that made me tremble, and I hardly articulated, 'I will be yours.' At these words he hurried me down a dark vista, which led out of the gardens to the open country. A carriage stood at the gate. I fearfully asked what he intended. 'You have given yourself to me,' cried he; 'and by that vow, written in Heaven, no power shall separate us until you are mine beyond the reach of man!' Unnerved in body, and weak in mind, I yielded to his impetuosity; and, suffering him to lift me into the chariot, was carried to the door of the nearest monastery, where in a few minutes we were married.

"I am thus particular in the relation of every incident, in the hope that you, my dear son, will see some excuse for my great imprudence in the circumstance of my youth, and in the influence which a man who seemed all excellence had gained over my heart. However, my fault went not long unpunished.

"The ceremony passed, my husband conducted me in silence back to the carriage. My full bosom discharged itself in abundance of tears, while Sackville sat by me, unmoved and mute. Two or three times I raised my eyes, in hopes of discerning in his some consolation for my hasty compliance. But no; his gaze, vacant and glaring, was fixed on the window; and his brow scowled, as if he had been forced into an alliance with one he hated, rather than had just made a voluntary engagement with the woman he loved. My soul shuddered at this commencement of a contract which I had dared to make unsanctioned by my father's consent. At length my sighs seemed to startle my husband; and turning suddenly round, 'Therese,' cried he, 'this marriage must not be told to the palatine.'—I demanded a reason for so unexpected a prohibition. 'Because I have been précipitate. It would ruin me with my family. Wait, only for one month; and then I will publicly acknowledge you.' The agitation of his features, the sternness of his voice, and the feverish burning of his hand, which held mine, alarmed me. Trembling from head to foot, I answered, 'Sackville! I have already erred enough in consenting to this stolen marriage. I will not transgress further, by concealing it. I will instantly throw myself at my father's feet, and confess all.' His countenance darkened. 'Therese,' said he, 'I am your husband. You have sworn to obey me, and I command your silence. Till I allow you, divulge this marriage at your peril!' This last cruel sentence, and the more cruel look that accompanied it, pierced me to the heart, and I fell senseless on the seat.

"When I recovered, I found myself at the foot of that statue beneath which my unfortunate destiny had been fixed. My husband was leaning over me. He raised me with tenderness from the ground; and conjured me, in the mildest accents, to be comforted, to pardon the severity of those words which had arisen from a fear that, by an imprudent avowal on my part, I should risk both his happiness and my own. He informed me that he was heir to one of the first fortunes in England; he had pledged his honor with his father never to enter into any matrimonial engagement without first acquainting him with the particulars of the lady and her family. Should he omit this duty, his father declared that though she were a princess, he would disinherit him, and never again admit him to his presence.

"'Consider this, my dear Therese,' continued he; 'could you endure to behold me a beggar, and stigmatized with a parent's curse, when a little forbearance on your part would make all right? I know I have been hasty in acting as I have done, but now I can not remedy my error. To-morrow I will write to my father, describe your rank and merits, and request his consent to our immediate marriage. The moment his permission arrives, I will cast myself on the palatine's friendship and reveal what has passed.' The tenderness of my husband blinded my reason; and with many tears, I sealed his forgiveness, and pledged my faith on his word.

"My dear deceived parent little suspected the perfidy of his guest. He detained him as his visitor; and often rallied himself on the hold which his distinguished accomplishments had taken on his esteem. Sackville's manner to me in public was obliging and free; it was in private only that I found the tender, the capricious, the unfeeling husband. Night after night I have washed the memory of my want of duty to my father with bitter tears; but my husband was dear to me, was more precious than my life: one kind look from him, one fond word, would solace every pain, and make me wait the arrival of his father's letter with all the gay anticipations of youth and love.

"A fortnight passed away. A month, a long and lingering month. Another month, and a packet of letters was presented to Sackville. He was at breakfast with us. At sight of the superscription he colored, tore open the paper, ran his eyes over a few lines, and then, pale and trembling, rose from his seat and left the room. My emotions were almost uncontrollable. I had already half risen from my chair to follow him, when the palatine exclaimed, 'What can be in that letter? Too plainly I see some afflicting tidings.' And without observing me, or waiting for a reply, he hurried out after him. I stole to my chamber, where, throwing myself on my bed, I tried, by all the delusions of hope, to obtain some alleviation from the pangs of suspense.

"The dinner bell roused me from my reverie. Dreading to excite suspicion, and anxious to read in the countenance of my husband the denunciation of our fate, I obeyed the summons, and descended to the dining-room. On entering it, my eyes irresistibly wandered round to fix themselves on Sackville. He was leaning against a pillar, his face pale as death. My father looked grave, but immediately took his seat, and tenderly placed his friend beside him. I sat down in silence. Little dinner was eaten, and few words spoken.—As for myself, my agitations almost choked me. I felt that the first word I should attempt to pronounce must give them utterance, and that their vehemence would betray our fatal secret.

“When the servants withdrew, Sackville rose, and taking my father’s hand, said, in a faltering voice, ‘Count, I must leave you.’—‘It is a wet evening,’ replied the palatine; ‘you are unwell—disturbed—stay till to-morrow!’—‘I thank your excellency,’ answered he, ‘but I must go to Florence to-night. You shall see me again before to-morrow afternoon: all will then, I hope, be settled to my wish.’ Sackville took his hat. Motionless, and incapable of speaking, I sat fixed to my chair, in the direct way that he must pass. His eye met mine. He stopped, and looked at me, abruptly caught my hand; then as abruptly quitting it, darted out of the room. I never saw him more.

“I had not the power to dissemble another moment. I fell back, weeping, into the arms of my father. He did not even by this imprudence, read what I almost wished him to guess; but with all the indulgence of perfect confidence, lamented the distress of Sackville, and the sensibility of my nature, which sympathized so painfully with his friend. I durst not ask what was the distress of his friend; abashed at my duplicity to him, and overwhelmed with a thousand dreads, I obtained his permission to retire to my chamber.

“The next day I met him with a serene air, for I had schooled my heart to endure the sufferings it had deserved. The palatine did not remark my recovered tranquillity; neither did he appear to think any more of my tears; so entirely was he occupied in conjecturing the cause of Sackville’s grief, who had acknowledged having received a great shock, but would not reveal the occasion. This ignorance of my father surprised me; and to all his suppositions I said little. My soul was too deeply interested in the subject to trust to the faithfulness of my lips.

“The morning crept slowly on, and the noon appeared to stand still. I anxiously watched the declining sun, as the signal for my husband’s return. Two hours had elapsed since his promised time, and my father grew so impatient that he went out to meet him. I eagerly wished that they might miss each other. I should then see Sackville a few minutes alone, and by one word be comforted or driven to despair.

“I was listening to every footstep that sounded under the colonnade, when my servant brought me a letter which had just been left by one of Mr. Sackville’s grooms. I tore open the seal; and fell senseless on the floor ere I had read half the killing contents—”

Thaddeus, with a burning cheek, and a heart all at once robbed of that elastic spring which till now had ever made him the happiest of the happy, took up the letter of his father. The paper was worn, and blistered with his mother’s tears. His head seemed to swim as he contemplated the handwriting, and he said to himself, “Am I to respect or to abhor him?” He proceeded in the perusal.

“TO THERESE COUNTESS SOBIESKI:

“How, Therese, am I to address you? But an attempt at palliating my conduct would be to no purpose, indeed it is impossible. You can not conceive a viler opinion of me than I have of myself. I know that I forfeit all claim to honor; that I have sacrificed your tenderness to my distracted passions: but you shall no more be subject to the caprices of a man who can not repay your love with his own.—You have no guilt to torture you; and you possess virtues which will render you tranquil under every calamity. I leave you to your own innocence. Forget the ceremony that has passed between us: my wretched heart disclaims it forever. Your father is happily ignorant of it; pray spare him the anguish of knowing that I was so completely unworthy of his kindness; I feel that I am more than ungrateful to you and to him. Therese, your most inveterate hate can not more strongly tell me than I tell myself that I have treated you like a villain. But I can not retract. I am going where all search will be vain; and I now bid you an eternal farewell. May you be happier than ever can be the wretched, self-abhorring

“FLORENCE.

R. S——.”

Thaddeus went on with his mother's narrative.

“When my senses returned I was lying on the ground holding the half-perused paper in my hand. Grief and horror locked up the avenues of complaint, and I sat as one petrified to stone. My father entered. At the sight of me he started as if he had seen a specter. His well-known features opened at once my agonized heart. With fearful cries I cast myself at his feet, and, putting the letter in his hand, clung, almost expiring, to his knees.

“When he had read it he flung it from him, and, dropping into a chair, covered his face with his hands. I looked up imploringly, for I could not speak. My father stooped forward, and raising me in his arms, pressed me to his bosom. ‘My Therese,’ said he, ‘it is I who have done this. Had I not harbored this villain he never could have had an opportunity of ruining the peace of my child.’ In return for the unexampled indulgence of this speech, and his repeated assurances of forgiveness, I promised to forget a man who could have so little respect for gratitude, or his own honor. The palatine replied that he expected such a resolution in consequence of the principles which he had taught me; and to show me how far dearer to him was my real tranquillity than any false idea of impossible restitution, he would not remove even from one principality to another, were he sure by that means to discover Mr. Sackville, and to avenge my wrongs. My understanding assented to the justice of all his reasoning; but long and severe were the struggles before I could erase from my soul the image of that being who had been the lord of all its joys and sorrows.

“It was not until you, my dear Thaddeus, were born that I could repay the goodness of my father with the smiles of cheerfulness. He would not permit me to give you any name which could remind him, or myself, of the cruel parent who gave you being; and by his desire I christened you Thaddeus Constantine, after himself, and his best-beloved friend General Kosciusko. You have not yet seen that illustrious Polander, whose prescient watchfulness for his country has always kept him on the frontiers. He is now with the army at Winnica, whither you must soon go: in him you will see a second Sobieski. In him you may study one of the brightest models of patriotic and martial virtue that ever was presented to mankind. It may well be said of him—‘That he would have shone with distinguished luster in the ages of chivalry.’ Gallant, generous, and strictly just, he commands obedience by the reverence in which he is held, and attaches the troops to his person by the affability of his manners and the purity of his life. He teaches them discipline, endurance of fatigue, and contempt of danger, by his dauntless example; and inspires them with confidence by his tranquillity in the tumult of action, and in the invincible fortitude with which he meets the most adverse strokes of misfortune. His modesty in victory shows him to be one of the greatest among men; and his magnanimity under defeat confirms him to be little less than a god.

“Such is the man whose name you bear: how bitterly do I lament that the one to which nature gave you a claim was so unworthy to be united with it, and that of my no less heroic father!—

“On our return to Poland, the story which the palatine related, when questioned about my apparently forlorn state was simply this:—‘My daughter was married and widowed in the course of two months. Since then, to root from her memory as much as possible all recollection of a husband who was only given to be taken away, she still retains my name; and her son, as my sole heir, shall bear no other.’ This reply satisfied every one: the king, who was my father’s only confidant, gave his sanction to it, and no further inquiries were started.

“You are now, my beloved child, entering on the eventful career of life. God only knows, when the venerable head of your grandfather is laid in dust, and I, too, have shut my eyes upon you forever, where destiny may send you! perhaps to the country of your father. Should you ever meet him—but that is unlikely; so I will be silent on a subject which nineteen years of reflection have not yet deprived of its sting.

“Not to embitter the fresh spring of your youth, my Thaddeus, with the draught that has poisoned mine; not to implant in your breast hatred of a parent whom you may never behold, have I written this; but to inform you in fact from whom you sprung. My history is made plain to you that no unexpected events may hereafter perplex your opinion of your mother, or cause a blush to rise on that cheek for her, which from your grandfather can derive no stain. For his sake as well as for mine, whether in peace or in war, may the angels of Heaven guard my boy! This is the unceasing prayer of thy fond mother,

“THERESE, COUNTESS SOBIESKI

“VILLANOW, MARCH, 1792.”

When he finished reading, Thaddeus held the papers in his hand; but, unable to recover from the shock of their contents, he read them a second time to the end: then laying them on the table, against which he rested his now aching head, he gave vent to the fullness of his heart.

The countess, anxious for the effect which her history might have on her son, at this instant entered the room. Seeing him in so dejected an attitude she approached, and, pressing him to her bosom, mingled her tears with his. Thaddeus, ashamed of his emotions, yet incapable of dissembling them, struggled a few moments to release himself from her arms. The countess, mistaking his motive, said in a melancholy voice, "And do you, my son, despise your mother for the weakness which she has revealed? Is this the reception that I expected from a child on whose affection I reposed my confidence and my comfort?"

"No, my mother," replied Thaddeus; "it is your afflictions which have distressed me. This is the first unhappy hour I ever knew, and can you wonder I should be affected! Oh! mother," continued he, laying his hand on his father's letter, "whatever were his rank, had my father been but noble in mind, I would have gloried in bearing his name: but now, I put up my prayers never to hear it more."

"Forget him," cried the countess, hiding her eyes with her handkerchief.

"I will!" answered Thaddeus, "and allow my memory to dwell only on the virtues of my mother."

It was impossible for the countess, or her son, to conceal their agitation from the palatine, who now opened the door. On his expressing alarm at a sight so unusual, his daughter, finding herself incapable of speaking, put into his hand the letter which Thaddeus had just read. Sobieski cast his eye over the first lines; he comprehended their tendency, and seeing the countess had withdrawn, he looked toward his grandson. Thaddeus was walking up and down the room striving to command himself for the conversation he anticipated with his grandfather.

“I am sorry, Thaddeus,” said Sobieski “that your mother has so abruptly imparted to you the real name and character of your father. I see that his villainy has distressed a heart which heaven has made alive to the slightest dishonor. But be consoled, my son! I have prevented the publicity of his conduct by an ambiguous story of your mother’s widowhood. Notwithstanding this arrangement, she judged it proper that you should not enter general society without being made acquainted with the true events of your birth. I believe my daughter is right. But cheer yourself, my child! you will embitter the remainder of my days if you suffer the vices of a worthless man to prey upon your mind.”

“No, my lord,” answered his grandson; “you have been more than a parent to me; and henceforward, for your sake as well as my own, I shall hold it my duty to forget that I drew my being from any other source than that of the house of Sobieski.”

“You are right,” cried the palatine, with an exulting emotion, “you have the spirit of your ancestors; and I shall live to see you add glory to the name!”

The beaming eyes and smiling lips of the young count declared that he had shaken sorrow from his heart. His grandfather pressed his hand with delight; and saw in his recovered serenity the sure promise of his fond prophecy.

CHAPTER II.

THE fearful day arrived when Sobieski and his grandson were to bid adieu to Villanow and its peaceful scenes.

The well-poised mind of the veteran bade his daughter farewell with a fortitude which imparted some of its strength even to her. But when Thaddeus, ready habited for his journey, entered the room, at the sight of his military accoutrements she shuddered; and when, with a glowing countenance, he advanced, smiling through his tears, toward her, she clasped him in her arms, and riveted her lips to that face, the very loveliness of which added to her affliction. She gazed at him, she wept on his neck, she pressed him to her bosom.

“O! how soon might all that beauty be mingled with the dust! how soon might that warm heart, which then beat against hers, be pierced by the sword! be laid on the ground, mangled and bleeding, exposed, and trampled on!” These thoughts thronged upon her soul and deprived her of sense. She was carried away lifeless by her maids, while the palatine compelled Thaddeus to quit the spot.

It was not until the lofty battlements of Villanow blended with the clouds that Thaddeus could throw off his melancholy. The parting agony of his mother hung on his spirits; and heavy and frequent were his sighs as he gazed on the rustic cottages and fertile fields, which reminded him that he was yet passing through the territories of his grandfather. The picturesque mill of Mariemont was the last spot on which his sight lingered. The ivy that mantled its sides sparkled with the brightness of a shower which had just fallen; and the rays of the setting sun, gleaming on its shattered wall, made it an object of such romantic beauty that he could not help pointing it out to his fellow-travelers.

While the eyes of General Butzou, who was in the carriage, followed the direction of Thaddeus, the palatine observed the heightening animation of his features; and recollecting at the same time the transports which he himself had enjoyed, when he visited that place one-and-twenty years ago, he put his hand on the shoulder of the veteran, and exclaimed, "General, did you ever relate to my boy the particulars of that mill?"

"No, my lord."

"I suppose," continued the palatine, "the same reason deterred you from speaking of it uncalled for as lessened my wish to tell the story? We are both too much the heroes of the tale to have volunteered the recital."

"Does your excellency mean," asked Thaddeus, "the rescue of our king from this place?"

"I do."

"I have a very indistinct knowledge of the affair. I remember that it was told me many years ago; but I have almost forgotten it; and can only account for my apparent insensibility in never having inquired further, by pleading the happy thoughtlessness in which you have hitherto permitted me to live."

"But," said the palatine, whose object was to draw his grandson from melancholy reflections, "what will you say to me turning egotist?"

"I now ask the story of you," returned Thaddeus, smiling; "besides, as soldiers are permitted by the fireside to 'fight their battles o'er again,' your modesty, my dear grandfather, can not object to repeat it to me on the way to more."

"As a preliminary," said the palatine, "I must suppose that it is unnecessary to tell you that General Butzou was the brave soldier who, at the imminent risk of his life, saved our sovereign."

"Of course, I know that," replied the young count. "and that you, too, had a share in the honor: for when I was yesterday presented to his majesty, among other things which he said, he told me that he believed, under Heaven, he owed his present existence to General Butzou and yourself."

"So very little to me," resumed Sobieski, "that I will, to the best of my recollection, repeat every circumstance of the affair. Should I err, I must beg of you, general," turning to the veteran, "to put me right."

Butzou, with a glow of honest exultation still painting his face, nodded assent; and Thaddeus bowing in sign of attention, the palatine began.

"It was on a Sunday night, the 3d of September, in the year 1771, that this event took place. At that time, instigated by the courts of Vienna and Constantinople, a band of traitorous lords, confederated together, were laying waste their country, and perpetrating all kinds of outrage on their fellow-subjects who adhered to the king.

"Among their numerous crimes, a plan was laid for surprising and taking the royal person. Pulaski was one of the most daring of their leaders; and, assisted by Lukawski, Strawenski, and Kosinski, three Poles unworthy of their rank, he resolved to accomplish this design or perish. Accordingly, the three latter, in obedience to his orders, with forty other conspirators, met at Czetschokow, and, in the presence of their commander, swore with the most horrid oaths to deliver Stanislaus, alive or dead, into his hands.

"About a month after this meeting, these noblemen, at the head of a band of assassins, disguised themselves as peasants; and concealing their arms in wagons of hay, which they drove before them, they entered Warsaw unsuspected.

"It was about ten o'clock, P.M., on the 3d of September, as I have told you, that they found an opportunity to execute their scheme. They placed themselves under cover of the night in those avenues of the city through which they knew his majesty must pass in his way from Villanow, where he had been dining with me. His carriage was escorted by four of his own attendants, with myself and twelve of my guards. We had scarcely lost sight of Villanow when the conspirators rushed out and surrounded us, commanding the coachmen to stop, and beating down the men with the butt end of their muskets. Several shots were fired into the coach. One passed through my hat, as I was getting out sword in hand, the better to repel an attack the motive of which I could not divine. A cut across my right leg with a saber laid me under the wheels; and while in that situation, I heard the shot pouring into the coach like hail, and felt the villains stepping over my body to finish the murder of the king.

“It was then that our friend Butzou (who at that period was a private soldier in my service) stood between his sovereign and the rebels. In one instant he received several balls through his limbs, and a thrust from a bayonet in his breast, which cast him weltering in his blood upon me. By this time all the persons who had formed the escort were either wounded or dispersed; and George Butzou, our friend’s only brother, was slain; the last defender of our trodden bodies, and of his outraged king. Secure then of their prey, one of the assassins opened the carriage-door, and with shocking imprecations, seizing the king by the hair, discharged his pistol so near his majesty’s face that he felt the heat of the flash. A second villain cut him on the forehead with a sword; while a third, who was on horseback, laying hold of his collar, dragged him along the ground through the suburbs of the city.

“During the latter part of this outrageous scene, some of our affrighted people returned with a detachment, and seeing Butzou and me apparently lifeless, carried us to the royal palace, where all was commotion and distraction. The foot-guards followed the track which the conspirators had taken. In one of the streets they found the king’s hat dyed in blood, and his pelisse perfectly reticulated with bullet-holes. This confirmed their apprehensions of his death; and they came back, filling all Warsaw with dismay.

“The assassins, meanwhile, got clear of the town. Finding, however, that the king, by loss of blood, was not likely to exist much longer, if they continued their manner of dragging him toward their employer, and that delay might even lose them his dead body, they mounted him, and redoubled their speed. When they came to the moat which surrounds Warsaw, they compelled him to leap his horse across it. In the attempt the horse fell, and broke its leg. They then ordered his majesty, fainting as he was, to mount another and spur it over. The conspirators had no sooner passed the ditch, and saw their king fall insensible on the neck of his horse, than they tore from his neck the ribbon of the black eagle and its diamond cross. Lukawski was so foolishly sure of his prisoner, dead or alive, that he quitted his charge and repaired with these spoils to Pulaski; meaning to show them as proofs of his success. Many of the other plunderers, concluding that they could not do better than follow their leader’s example, fled also; and left only seven of the party, with Kosinski at their head, to remain over the unfortunate Stanislaus, who shortly after recovered from his swoon.

“The night was now grown so dark that they could not be sure of their way; and their horses stumbling at every step over stumps of trees and hollows in the earth, increased their apprehensions to such a degree that they obliged the king to keep up with them on foot. He literally marked his path with his blood; his shoes having been torn off in the struggle at the carriage. Thus they continued walking backward and forward, and round the outskirts of Warsaw, without any exact knowledge of their situation. The men who guarded him at last became so afraid of their prisoner’s taking advantage of these circumstances to escape, that they repeatedly called on Kosinski for orders to put him to death. Kosinski refused; but their demands growing more imperious, as the intricacies of the forest involved them completely, the king expected every moment to find their bayonets in his breast.

“When I recovered from my swoon, my leg was bound up, and I was able to stir. Questioning the officers who had stood about my couch, I found that a general panic had seized them. They knew not how to proceed; they shuddered at leaving the king to the mercy of the confederates; and yet were fearful, by pursuing him further, to incense them through terror or revenge to massacre their prisoner, if he were still alive. I did all that was in my power to dispel this last dread. Anxious at any rate to make another attempt to preserve him, though I could not ride myself, I strenuously advised an immediate pursuit on horseback; and insisted that neither darkness nor danger should be permitted to impede their course. Recovered presence of mind in the nobles restored hope and animation to the terrified soldiers; and my orders were obeyed. But I must add they were soon disappointed; for in less than half an hour the detachment returned in despair, showing me his majesty’s coat, which they had found in the fosse. I suppose the ruffians tore it off when they rifled him. It was rent in several places, and so wet with blood, that the officer who presented it to me thought they had murdered the king there, and had drawn away his body; for by the light of the torches, the soldiers could trace drops of blood to a considerable distance.

“While I was attempting to invalidate this new evidence of his majesty’s being beyond the reach of succor or of insult, he was driven before the seven conspirators so far into the wood of Bielany that, not knowing whither they went, they came up with one of the guard-houses, and, to their extreme terror, were accosted by a patrol. Four of the banditti immediately disappeared, leaving two only with Kosinski; who, much alarmed, forced his prisoner to walk faster and keep a profound silence. Notwithstanding all this precaution, scarce a quarter of an hour afterward they were challenged by a second watch; and the other two men taking to flight, Kosinski, full of dismay, was left alone with the king. His majesty, sinking with pain and fatigue, beseeched permission to rest for a moment; but Kosinski refused, and pointing his sword toward the king, compelled him to proceed.

“As they walked on, the unfortunate Stanislaus, who was hardly able to drag one limb after another, observed that his conductor gradually forgot his vigilance, until he was thoroughly given up to thought. The king conceived some hope from this change, and ventured to say, ‘I see that you know not how to proceed. You can not but be aware that the enterprise in which you are engaged, however it may end, is full of peril to you. Successful conspirators are always jealous of each other: Pulaski will find it as easy to rid himself of your life as it is to take mine. Avoid that danger; and I will promise you none on my account. Suffer me to enter the convent of Bielany; we can not be far from it; and then, do you provide for your own safety.’ Kosinski, rendered desperate by the circumstances in which he was involved, replied, ‘No; I have sworn; and I would rather sacrifice my life than my honor.’

“The king had neither strength nor spirits to make an answer. They continued to break their way through the under-wood, until they approached Mariemont. Here Stanislaus, unable to stir another step, sunk down at the foot of the old yew-tree, and again implored for one moment’s rest. Kosinski no longer refused. This unexpected humanity encouraged his majesty to employ the minutes they sat together, in another attempt to soften his heart; and to convince him that the oath which he had taken was atrocious, and by no means binding to a brave and virtuous man.

“Kosinski heard him with attention, and even showed he was affected. ‘But,’ said he, ‘if I should assent to what you propose, and reconduct you to Warsaw, what will be the consequence to me? I shall be taken and executed.’ ‘I give you my word,’ answered the king, ‘that you shall not suffer any injury. But if you doubt my honor, escape while you can. I shall find some place of shelter, and will direct your pursuers to take the opposite road to that which you may choose.’ Kosinski, entirely overcome, threw himself on his knees before his majesty; and, imploring pardon for what he had done, swore that from this hour he would defend his king against all the conspirators, and would trust confidently in his word for future preservation. Stanislaus repeated his promise of forgiveness and protection, and directed him to seek refuge for them both in the mill near which they were discoursing. Kosinski obeyed, and knocked; but no one gave answer. He then broke a pane of glass in the window, and through it begged succor for a nobleman who had been waylaid by robbers. The miller refused to come out or to let them in; telling them it was his belief that they were robbers themselves, and if they did not go away he would fire on them.

“This dispute had continued for nearly an hour, when the king contrived to crawl up close to the windows, and said. ‘My good friend, if we were banditti, as you suppose, it would be as easy for us, without all this parley, to break into your house, as to break this pane of glass; therefore, if you would not incur the shame of suffering a fellow-creature to perish for want of assistance, give us admittance.’ This argument had its weight with the man; and opening the door, he desired them to enter. After some trouble, his majesty procured pen and ink; and addressing a few lines to me at the palace, with difficulty prevailed on one of the miller’s sons to carry it, so fearful were they of falling in with any of the troop, who, they understood, had plundered their guests.

“My joy at sight of this note I can not describe. I well remember the contents; they were literally these:—

“ ‘By the miraculous hand of Providence I have escaped from the hands of assassins. I am now at the mill of Marie-mont. Send immediately, and take me hence. I am wounded, but not dangerously.’

“Regardless of my own condition, I instantly got into a carriage, and, followed by a detachment of horse, arrived at the mill. I met Kosinski at the door, keeping guard with his sword drawn. As he knew my person, he admitted me directly. The king had fallen into a sleep, and lay in one corner of the hovel on the ground, covered with the miller’s cloak. To see the most virtuous monarch in the world thus abused by his ungrateful subjects, pierced me to the heart; and kneeling down by his side, I took hold of his hand, and in a paroxysm of tears, which I am not ashamed to confess, I exclaimed, ‘I thank thee, Almighty God, that I again see my sovereign alive!’ It is not easy to say how these words struck the simple family. They dropped on their knees before the king, whom my voice had awakened, and beseeched his pardon for all their ill-manners. The good Stanislaus soon quieted their fears; and graciously thanking them for their kindness, told the miller to come to the palace the next day, when he would show him his gratitude in a better way than by promises.

“The officers of the detachment then assisted his majesty and myself into the carriage, and, accompanied by Kosinski, we reached Warsaw about six in the morning.”

“Yes,” interrupted Butzou, “I remember my tumultuous joy when the news was brought to me, in my bed, that my brave brother had not died in vain for his sovereign; it almost deprived me of my senses:—and besides, his majesty visited me, his poor soldier, in my chamber. Does not your excellency recollect how he was brought into my room in a chair, between two men? and how he thanked me, and shook hands with me? and he told me my brother should never be forgotten in Poland. It made me weep like a child.”

“And he never can!” cried Thaddeus, hardly recovering from the deep attention with which he had listened to this recital.* “But what became of Kosinski? I suppose the king kept his word.”

“He did indeed,” replied Sobieski; “his word is at all times sacred. Yet I believe Kosinski entertained fears that he would not be so generous; for I perceived him change color very often while we were in the coach. However, he was tranquillized when his majesty, on alighting at the palae in the midst of the joyous cries of the people, leaned upon his arm, and presented him to the populace as his preserver. The great gate was ordered to be left open; and never, while I live, shall I again behold such a scene! Every soul in Warsaw, from the highest to the lowest, came to catch a glimpse of their rescued sovereign. Seeing the doors free, they entered without ceremony, and thronged forward in crowds to get near enough to kiss his hand, or to touch his clothes; then, elated with joy, they turned to Kosinski, and loaded him with demonstrations of gratitude, calling him the ‘Saviour of their king.’ Kosinski bore all this with surprising firmness; but in a day or two, when the facts became known, he guessed he might meet with different treatment from the people, and therefore petitioned his majesty for leave to depart.

* The king had his brave defender buried with military honors, and caused a noble monument to be raised over him, with an inscription, of which the following is a translation:—

‘Here lie the respected remains of George Butzou; who, on the 3d of September, 1771, opposing his own breast to shield Stanislaus from the weapons of national parricides, was pierced with a mortal wound, and gloriously expired. The king, lamenting the death of a faithful subject, erects this monument as a tribute to him, and an example of heroic duty to others.’

Stanislaus consented; and he retired to Semigallia, where he now lives, on a handsome pension from the king."

"Generous Stanislaus!" exclaimed the general; "you see, my dear young count, how he has rewarded me for doing that which was merely my duty. He put it at my option to become what I pleased about his person, or to hold what rank I liked in the army. Love ennobles servitude; and, attached as I have ever been to your family, under whom all my ancestors have lived and fought, I vowed in my own mind never to quit it; and accordingly, begged permission of my sovereign to remain with the Count Sobieski. I did remain: but see," cried he, his voice faltering, "what my benefactors have made of me! I command those troops among whom it was once my greatest glory to be a private soldier."

Thaddeus pressed the hand of the veteran between both his; and regarded him with respect and affection, while the grateful old man wiped away a tear from his face.*

"How happy ought it to make you, my son," observed Sobieski, "that you are called out to support such a sovereign! He is not merely a king whom you follow to battle because he will lead you to honor: the hearts of his people acknowledge him in a superior light; they look on him as their patriarchal head; as a being delegated by God to study what is their greatest good; to bestow it; and, when it is attacked, to defend it. To preserve the life of such a sovereign, who would not sacrifice his own?"

"Yes," cried Butzou; "and how ought we to abhor them who threaten his life! How ought we to estimate those crowned heads who, under the mask of amity, have, from the year sixty-four, when he ascended the throne, until now, been plotting his overthrow or death! Either calamity, O Heaven, avert! For his death, I fear, will be a prelude to the certain ruin of our country!"

† Lukowski and Strawenski were afterward both taken, with others of the conspirators. At the king's entreaty, those of inferior rank were pardoned after condemnation; but the two noblemen who had deluded them were beheaded. Pulaski, the prime ring-leader, escaped to the wretched life of an outlaw and an exile, and finally died in America in 1779

"Not so," interrupted Thaddeus, with eagerness; "not while a Polander has power to lift an arm, shall it be quite lost."

Butzou applauded his spirit, and was warmly seconded by the palatine, who (never weary of infusing into every feeling of his grandson an interest for his country) pursued the discourse, and dwelt minutely on the happy tendency of the glorious Constitution of 1791, in defense of which they were now going to hazard their lives. As Sobieski pointed out its several excellences, and expatiated on the pure spirit of freedom which animated its laws, the soul of Thaddeus followed his eloquence; and, with the unrestrained fervor of youth, he branded the names of Catherine and the faithless Frederic with some of those epithets which posterity will affix to them forever. During these conversations Thaddeus forgot his regrets; and at noon, on the third day, he saw his grandfather put himself at the head of his men, and commence a regular march.

CHAPTER III.

THE little army of the palatine passed by the battlements of Chelm; crossed the Bug into the plains of Volhinia; and impatiently counted the leagues over those vast tracts, until it reached the borders of Kiovia.

When the column at the head of which Thaddeus was stationed descended the heights of Lininy, and the broad camp of his countrymen burst upon his sight, his heart heaved with an emotion quite new to him. He beheld with admiration the regular disposition of the intrenchments, the long intersected streets, and the warlike appearance of the soldiers, whom he could descry, even at that distance, by the beams of a bright evening sun which shone upon their arms.

In half an hour his troops descended into the plain, where, meeting those of the palatine and the general, the three columns again united; and Thaddeus joined his grandfather in the van.

“My lord,” cried he, as they met, “can I behold such a sight, and despair of the freedom of Poland!”

Sobieski made no reply; but giving him one of those expressive looks of approbation which immediately makes its way to the soul, commanded the troops to advance with greater speed. In a few minutes they reached the outworks of the camp, and entered the lines. The eager eye of Thaddeus wandered from object to object. Thrilling with that delight with which youth beholds wonders, and anticipates more, he stopped with the rest of the party before a tent, which General Butzou informed him belonged to the commander-in-chief. They were met in the vestibule by a hussar officer of a most commanding appearance. Sobieski and he having accosted each other with mutual congratulations, the palatine turned to Thaddeus, took him by the hand, and presenting him to his friend, said with a smile,

“Here, my dear, Kosciusko, this young man is my grandson; he is called Thaddeus Sobieski; and I trust that he will not disgrace either of our names!”

Kosciusko embraced the young count, and, with a hearty pressure of his hand, replied, “Thaddeus! if you resemble your grandfather, you can never forget that the only king of Poland who equaled Stanislaus was a Sobieski; and, as becomes his descendant, you will not spare your best blood in the service of your country.”

As Kosciusko finished speaking, an aid-de-camp came forward to lead the party into the room of audience. Prince Poniatowski welcomed the palatine and his suite with the most lively expressions of pleasure. He gave Thaddeus, whose figure and manner instantly charmed him, many flattering assurances of friendship; and promised that he would appoint him to the first post of honor which should offer. After detaining the palatine and his grandson half an hour, his highness withdrew; and they rejoined Kosciusko, who conducted them to the quarter where the Masovian soldiers had already pitched their tents.

The officers who supped with Sobieski left him at an early hour, that he might retire to rest; but Thaddeus was neither able nor inclined to benefit by their consideration. He laid himself on the bed, shut his eyes, and tried to sleep; but the attempt was without success. In vain he turned from side to side; in vain he attempted to restrict his thoughts to one thing at once: his imagination was so roused by anticipating the scenes in which he was to become an actor, that he found it impossible even to lie still. His spirits being quite awake, he determined to rise, and to walk himself drowsy.

Seeing his grandfather sound asleep, he got up and dressed himself quietly; then stealing gently from the marquée, he gave the word in a low whisper to the guard at the door, and proceeded down the lines. The pitying moon seemed to stand in the heavens, watching the awakening of those heroes who the next day might sleep to rise no more. At another time, and in another mood, such might have been his reflections; but now he pursued his walk with different thoughts: no meditations but those of pleasure possessed his breast. He looked on the moon with transport: he beheld the light of that beautiful planet, trailing its long stream of glory across the intrenchments. He perceived a solitary candle here and there, glimmering through the curtained entrance of the tents; and thought that their inmates were probably longing, with the same anxiety as himself, for the morning's dawn.

Thaddeus walked slowly on; sometimes pausing at the lonely footfall of the sentinel, or answering with a start to the sudden challenge for the parole; then lingering at the door of some of these canvas dwellings, he offered up a prayer for the brave inhabitant, who, like himself, had quitted the endearments of home to expose his life on this spot, a bulwark of liberty. Thaddeus knew not what it was to be a soldier by profession; he had no idea of making war a trade, by which a man is at any rate to acquire subsistence and wealth: he had but one motive for appearing in the field, and one for leaving it—to repel invasion, and to establish peace. The first energy of his mind was a desire to assert the rights of his country: it had been inculcated into him when an infant; it had been the subject of his morning thoughts and nightly dreams; it was now the passion which beat in every artery of his heart; yet he knew no honor in slaughter; his glory lay in defense; and, when that was accomplished, his sword would return to its scabbard, unstained by the blood of a vanquished or an invaded people. On these principles, he was at this hour full of enthusiasm: a glow of triumph flitted over his cheek, for he had left the indulgences of his mother's palace, had left her maternal arms, to take upon him the toils of war, and risk an existence just blown into enjoyment. A noble satisfaction rose in his mind; and with all that animation which an inexperienced and raised fancy imparts to that age when boyhood breaks into man, his soul grasped at every show of creation with the confidence of belief. Pressing the saber which he held in his hand to his lips, he half uttered, "Never shall this sword leave my arm but at the command of mercy, or when death deprives my nerves of their strength."

Morning was tinging the hills which bound the eastern horizon of Winnica, before Thaddeus found that his pelisse was wet with dew, and that he ought to return to his tent. Hardly had he laid his head upon the pillow, and "lulled his senses into forgetfulness," when he was disturbed by the drum beating to arms. He opened his eyes; and seeing the palatine out of bed, he sprang from his own, and eagerly inquired the cause of the alarm.

"Only follow me directly," answered his grandfather, and quitted the tent.

While Thaddeus was putting on his clothes, and buckling on his arms with a trembling eagerness which almost defeated his haste, an aid-de-camp of the prince entered. He brought information that an advance guard of the Russians had attacked a Polish out-post, under the command of Colonel Lomza; and that his highness had ordered a detachment from the palatine's brigade to march to its relief. Before Thaddeus could reply, Sobieski sent to apprise his grandson, that the prince had appointed him to accompany the troops which were turning out to assist the colonel.

Thaddeus heard this message with delight; yet fearful in what manner the event might answer the expectations which this wished distinction declared, he issued from his tent like a youthful Mars—or rather like the Spartan Isadas, trembling at the dazzling effects of his temerity—and hiding his valor and his blushes beneath the waving plumes of his helmet. Kosciusko, who was to head the party, observed this modesty with pleasure, and shaking him warmly by the hand, "Go, Thaddeus," said he, "take your station on the left flank; I shall require your fresh spirits to lead the charge I intend it to make, and to insure its success." Thaddeus bowed to these encouraging words, and took his place according to order.

Every thing being ready, the detachment quitted the camp; and dashing through the dews of a sweet morning

(for it was yet May), in a few hours arrived in view of the Russian battalions. Lomza, who, from the only redoubt now in his possession, caught a glimpse of this welcome reinforcement, rallied his few remaining men, and by the time that Kosciusko came up, contrived to join him in the van. The fight recommenced. Thaddeus at the head of his hussars, in full gallop, bore down upon the enemy. They received the charge with firmness; but their young adversary, perceiving that extraordinary means were necessary, exerted his voice to the utmost; calling on his men to follow him, he put spurs to his horse, and rushed into the thickest of the battle. His soldiers did not shrink; they pressed on, mowing down the foremost ranks; while he, by a lucky stroke of his saber, disabled the sword-arm of the Russian standard-bearer, and seized the colors. His own troops seeing the standard in his hands, with one accord, in loud and repeated cries, shouted victory. The reserve of the enemy, alarmed at this outcry, instantly gave way; and retreating with precipitation, was soon followed by the rear ranks of the center, where Kosciusko had already slain the commander of the attack. The flanks next gave ground; and after holding a short stand at intervals, at length fairly turned about, and fled, panic-struck, across the country.

The conquerors, elated with so sudden a success, put their horses on full speed; and, without order or attention, pursued the fugitives, until they were lost amid the trees of a distant wood. Kosciusko called on his men to stop; but he called in vain: they continued their career, animating each other, and with redoubled shouts drowned the voice of Thaddeus, who was galloping forward, repeating the command. At the entrance of the wood they were stopped by a few stragglers, who had formed themselves into a body. These men withstood the first onset of the Poles with considerable steadiness; but, after a short skirmish, they fled a second time, and took refuge in the bushes, where, still regardless of orders, their enemies followed. Kosciusko, foreseeing the consequence of this rashness, ordered Thaddeus to dismount part of his squadron, and march after these headstrong men into the forest. He came up with them on the edge of a healthy tract of land, just as they were closing in with a band of arquebusiers, who, having kept up a quick running fire as they retreated, had drawn their pursuers thus far into the thickets. Heedless of any thing but giving their enemy a complete defeat, the Poles went on, never looking to the left nor to the right, till all at once they found themselves encompassed by two thousand Muscovite horse, several battalions of chasseurs, and in front of fourteen pieces of cannon, which this dreadful ambuscade opened upon them.

Thaddeus threw himself into the midst of his countrymen, and taking the place of their unfortunate conductor, who had been killed in the first sweep of the artillery, prepared the men for a desperate stand. He gave his orders with intrepidity and coolness, though under a heavy shower of musketry, and a cannonade, which carried death in every round. For himself he had no care; how to relieve the brave Poles from the dilemma into which they had plunged themselves, was the only thought that occupied his mind. In a few minutes the scattered soldiers were consolidated into a close body, flanked and reared with pikemen, who stood like a grove of pines in a day of tempest, only moving their heads and arms. Many of the Russian horse impaled themselves on the sides of this little phalanx, which they vainly attempted to shake, although the ordnance was rapidly weakening its strength. File after file the men were swept down, their bodies making a horrid rampart for their brave comrades, who, rendered desperate, at last threw away their most cumbrous accouterments, and crying to their leader, "Escape or death!" followed him sword in hand; and bearing like a torrent upon the enemy's ranks cut their way through the forest. The Russians, exasperated that their prey should not only escape, but escape by such dauntless valor, hung closely on their rear, goading them with musketry, while they (like a wounded lion hardly pressed by the hunters, who retreats, and yet stands proudly at bay), gradually retired toward the camp with a backward step, their faces toward the foe.

Meanwhile Sobieski, anxious for the fate of the day, mounted the dyke, and looked eagerly around for the arrival of some messenger from the little army. As the wind blew strongly from the south, a cloud of dust precluded his view; but from the approach of firing, and the clashing of arms, he was led to fear that his friends had been defeated, and were retreating toward the camp. He instantly quitted the lines to call out a reinforcement; but before he could advance, Kosciusko and his squadron on the full charge appeared in flank of the enemy, who suddenly halted, and, wheeling round, left the harassed Polanders to enter the trenches unmolested.

Thaddeus, covered with dust and blood, flung himself into his grandfather's arms. In the heat of the action his left arm had been wounded by a Cossack. Aware that loss of blood might disable him from further service, at the moment it happened he bound it up in his sash, and had thought no more of the accident until the palatine remarked blood on his cloak.

“My injury is slight, my dear sir;” said he, “I wish to heaven that it were all the evil which has befallen us to-day! Look at the remnant of our brave comrades.”

Sobieski turned his eyes on the panting soldiers, and on Kosciusko, who was inspecting them. Some of them, no longer upheld by desperation, were sinking with wounds and fatigues; these the good general sent off in litters to the medical department; and others, who had sustained unharmed the conflict of the day, after having received the praise and admonition of their commander, were dismissed to their quarters.

Before this inspection was over, the palatine had to assist Thaddeus to his tent, who, in spite of his exertions to the contrary, became so faint that it was necessary to lead him off the ground.

A short time restored him. With his arm in a sling, he joined his brother officers on the fourth day. After the duty of the morning, he heard with concern that, during his confinement, the Russians had augmented their force to so tremendous a strength, it was impossible for the comparatively slender force of the Poles to remain longer at Winnica. In consequence of this report, the Prince had convened a council late the preceding night, in which it was determined that the camp should immediately be rased, and removed toward Zielme.

This information displeased Thaddeus, who in his fairy dreams of war had always made conquest the sure end of his battles;—and many were the sighs he drew, when, at an hour before dawn on the following day, he witnessed the striking of the tents, which, he thought, was only the prelude to a shameful flight from the enemy. While he was standing by the busy people, and musing on the nice line which divides prudence from pusillanimity, his grandfather came up. He desired him to mount his horse; and told him that, owing to the unhealed state of his wound, he was removed from the van guard, and ordered to march in the center, along with the prince. Thaddeus remonstrated against this arrangement, and almost reproached the palatine for forfeiting his promise, that he should always be stationed near his person. Sobieski would not be moved, either by argument or entreaty; and Thaddeus, finding that he neither could nor ought to oppose him, obeyed, and followed an aid-de-camp to his highness.

CHAPTER IV.

AFTER a march of three hours, the army came in sight of Volunna, where the advanced column suddenly halted. Thaddeus, who was about half a mile to its rear, with a throbbing heart, heard that a momentous pass must be disputed before they could proceed. He curbed his horse, then gave it the spur; so eagerly did he wish to penetrate the cloud of smoke which rose in volumes from the discharge of musketry, on whose wing, at every round, he dreaded might be carried the fate of his grandfather. At last the firing ceased, and the troops were commanded to go forward. On entering the contested defile, Thaddeus shuddered; for at every step the heels of his charger struck upon the wounded or the dead. There lay his enemies, here lay his friends! his respiration was nearly suspended; and his eyes clung to the ground, expecting at each moment to fasten on the breathless body of his grandfather.

Again the tumult of battle presented itself. About a hundred soldiers in one firm rank, stood at the end of the pass, firing on the rear-guard of the Russians. Thaddeus checked his horse. Five hundred had been detached to this post; how few remained! Could he hope Sobieski had escaped so desperate a rencontre? Fearing the worst, and dreading to have those fears confirmed, his heart sickened when he received orders from Poniatowski to examine the extent of the loss. He rode to the mouth of the defile. He could nowhere see the palatine. A few of his hussars, a little in advance, were engaged over a heap of the killed, defending it from a troop of chasseurs, who appeared fighting for the barbarous privilege of trampling on the bodies. Thaddeus at this sight, and impelled by despair, called out.

“Courage, soldiers; the prince is here.” The chasseurs looking forward, saw the information was true, and took to flight. Poniatowski, almost at the word, was by the side of his young friend, who, unconscious of any idea but that of filial solicitude, had dismounted.

“Where is the palatine?” was his immediate inquiry to a soldier who was stooping toward the slain. The man made no answer, but lifted from the heap the bodies of two soldiers; beneath, Thaddeus saw the pale and deadly features of his grandfather. He staggered a few paces back: and the prince thinking he was falling, hastened to support him; but he recovered himself, and flew forward to assist Kosciusko, who had raised the head of the palatine upon his knee.

“Is he alive?” inquired Thaddeus.

“He breathes.”

Hope was now warm in his breast. The soldiers soon released Sobieski from the surrounding dead; but his swoon continuing, the prince desired that he might be laid on a bank, until a litter could be brought from the rear ranks to convey him to a place of security. Meantime, Thaddeus and the general bound up his wounds, and poured some water into his lips. The effusion of blood being stopped, the brave veteran opened his eyes; and in a few minutes, while he leaned on the bosom of his grandson, was so far restored as to receive, with his usual modest dignity, the thanks of his highness for the intrepidity with which he had preserved a passage, which insured the safety of the whole army.

Two surgeons who arrived with the litter relieved the anxiety of the by-standers, by an assurance that the wounds, which they re-examined, were not dangerous. Having laid their patient on the vehicle, they were preparing to retire with it into the rear, when Thaddeus petitioned the prince to grant him permission to take the command of the guard which was appointed to attend his grandfather. His highness consented; but Sobieski positively refused.

“No, Thaddeus,” said he; “you forget the effect which this solicitude about so trifling a matter might have on the men. Remember that he who goes into battle only puts his own life to the hazard; but he that abandons the field sports with the lives of his soldiers. Do not give them leave to suppose that even your dearest interest could tempt you from the front of danger, when it is your duty to remain there.” Thaddeus obeyed his grandfather in silence; and at seven o'clock the army resumed its march.

Near Zieleme the prince was saluted by a reinforcement. It appeared very seasonably; for scouts had brought information that directly across the plain the Russians, under General Branicki, were drawn up in order of battle, to dispute his progress.

Thaddeus, for the first time, shuddered at the sight of the enemy. Should his friends be defeated, what might be the fate of his grandfather, now rendered helpless by many wounds! Occupied by these fears, with anxiety in his heart, he kept his place at the head of the light horse, close to the hill.

Prince Poniatowski ordered the lines to extend themselves, that the right should reach to the river; and the left be covered by a rising ground, on which were mounted seven pieces of ordnance. Immediately after these dispositions the battle commenced. It continued with violence and unabated fury from eight in the morning untill sunset. Several times the Poles were driven from their ground; but as often recovering themselves, and animated by their commanders, they prosecuted the fight with advantage. General Branicki perceiving that the fortune of the day was going against him, ordered up the body of reserve ; which consisted of four thousand men and several cannon. He erected temporary batteries in a few minutes ;—and with these new forces opened a rapid and destructive fire on the Poles. Kosciusko, alarmed at perceiving a retrograde motion in his troops, gave orders for a close attack on the enemy in front, while Thaddeus, at the head of his hussars, should wheel round the hill of artillery, and with loud cries, charge the opposite flank. This stratagem succeeded. The Cossacks who were posted on that spot, seeing the impetuosity of the Poles, and the quarter whence they came, supposed them to be a fresh squadron ; gave ground, and opening in all directions, threw their own people into a confusion that completed the defeat. Kosciusko and the prince were equally successful ; and a general panic among their adversaries was the consequence. The whole of the Russian army now took to flight, except a few regiments of carabineers, which were entangled between the river and the Poles. These were immediately surrounded by a battalion of Masovian infantry ; who, enraged at the loss their body had sustained the preceding day, answered a cry for quarter with reproach and derision. At this instant the Sobieski squadron came up ; and Thaddeus, who saw the perilous situation of these regiments, ordered the slaughter to cease, and the men to be taken prisoners. The Masovians exhibited strong signs of dissatisfaction at such commands ; but the young count charging through them, ranged his troops before the Russians, and declared that the first man who should dare to lift a sword against his orders should be shot. The Poles dropped their arms. The poor carabineers fell on their knees to thank his mercy ; while their officers in a sullen silence, which seemed ashamed of gratitude, surrendered their swords into the hands of their deliverers.

During this scene, only one very young Russian appeared wholly refractory. He held up his sword in a menacing posture when Thaddeus drew near, and before he had time to speak the young man made a cut at his head, which a hussar parried, by striking him to the earth, and would have killed him on the spot, had not Thaddeus caught the blow on his own sword; then instantly dismounting, he raised the officer from the ground, and apologized for the too hasty zeal of his soldier. The youth blushed, and bowing presented his sword; which was received, and as directly returned.

“Brave sir,” said Thaddeus, “I consider myself ennobled in restoring this sword to him who has so courageously defended it.”

The Russian made no reply, but by a second bow; and put his hand on his breast, which was wet with blood. Ceremony was now at an end. Thaddeus never looked upon the unfortunate as strangers, much less as enemies. Accosting the wounded officer with a friendly voice, he assured him of his services, and made him lean on his shoulder. The young man, incapable of speaking, accepted his assistance; but before a conveyance could arrive, for which two men were dispatched, he fainted in his arms. Thaddeus being obliged to join the prince with his prisoners, unwillingly left the young Russian in this situation; but, before he did so, he directed one of his lieutenants to take care that the surgeons should pay attention to the officer, and have his litter carried next to the palatine's during the remainder of the march.

When the army halted at nine o'clock, preparations were made to fix the camp; and in case of a surprisal from any part of the dispersed enemy, which might have rallied, orders were delivered for throwing up a dyke. Thaddeus, having been assured that his grandfather and the wounded Russian were comfortably stationed near each other, did not hesitate to accept the command of the intrenching party. To that end, he wrapped himself loosely in his pelisse, and prepared for a long watch. The night was beautiful. It being the month of June, a softening warmth still floated through the air, as if the moon, which shone over his head, emitted heat as well as splendor. His mind was in unison with the season. He rode slowly round from bank to bank; sometimes speaking to the workers in the fosse; sometimes lingering for a few minutes, looking on the ground, he thought on the element of which he was composed, to which he might so soon return; then gazing upward, he observed the silent march of the stars, and the moving scene of the heavens. On whatever object he cast his eyes, his soul, which the recent events had dissolved into a temper not the less delightful for being tinged with melancholy, meditated with intense compassion; and dwelt with wonder on the mind of man, which, while it adores the Creator of the universe, and measures the immensity of space, with an expansion of intellect almost divine, can devote itself to the narrow limits of sublunary possessions, and exchange the boundless paradise above for the low enjoyments of human pride. He looked with pity over that wide tract of land, which now lay betwixt him and the remains of those four thousand Russians who had fallen victims to the insatiate desires of ambition. He well knew the difference between a defender of his own country and the invader of another's. His heart beat, his soul expanded, at the prospect of securing liberty and life to a virtuous people. He felt all the happiness of such an achievement; while he could only imagine how that spirit must shrink from reflection, which animates the self-condemned slave to fight, not merely to fasten chains on others, but to rivet his own the closer. The best affections of man having put the sword into the hand of Thaddeus, his principles as a Christian did not remonstrate against his passion for arms.

When he was told the fortifications were finished, he retired with a tranquil step toward the Masovian quarters. He found the palatine awake, and eager to welcome him with the joyful information that his wounds were so slight as to promise a speedy amendment. Thaddeus asked for his prisoner. The palatine answered he was in the next tent, where a surgeon closely attended him, and who had given a very favorable opinion of the wound, which was in the muscles of the breast.

“Have you seen him, my dear sir?” inquired Thaddeus. “Does he appear to think himself well treated?”

“Yes,” replied the palatine; “I was supported into his marquee before I retired to my own. I told him who I was, and repeated your offers of service. He received my proffer with expressions of gratitude; and at the same time declared he had nothing to blame but his own folly for bringing him to the state in which he now lies.”

“How, my lord!” rejoined Thaddeus. “Does he repent of being a soldier? or is he ashamed of the cause for which he fought?”

“Both, Thaddeus; he is not a Russian, but a young Englishman.”

“An Englishman! and raise his arm against a country struggling for liberty!”

“It is very true,” returned the palatine: “but as he confesses it was his folly, and the persuasions of others which impelled him, he may be pardoned. He is a mere youth; I think hardly your age. I understand that he is of rank; and having undertaken the tour of Europe under the direction of a traveling governor, he took Russia in his route. At Petersburg he became intimate with many of the nobility, particularly with Count Branicki, at whose house he resided: and when the Count was named to the command of the army in Poland, Mr. Somerset (for that is your prisoner’s name) instigated by his own volatility, and the arguments of his host, volunteered with him; and so followed his friend to oppose that freedom here which he would have asserted in his own nation."

Thaddeus thanked his grandfather for this information; and pleased that the young man who had so much interested him was any thing but a Muscovite, he gayly and instantly repaired to his tent.

A generous heart is as eloquent in acknowledging benefits as it is bounteous in bestowing them; and Mr. Somerset received his preserver with the warmest demonstrations of gratitude. Thaddeus begged him not to consider himself as particularly obliged by a conduct which every soldier of honor has a right to expect from another. The Englishman bowed his head; and Thaddeus took a seat by his bedside.

While he gathered from his own lips a corroboration of the narrative of the palatine, he could not forbear inquiring how a person of his apparent candor, and who was also the native of a soil where liberty had so long been the palladium of its happiness, could volunteer in a cause the object of which was to make a brave people slaves?

Somerset listened to these questions with blushes; and they did not leave his face when he confessed that all he could say in extenuation of what he had done was to plead his youth, and having thought little on the subject.

"I was wrought upon," continued he, "by a variety of circumstances: first, the principles of Mr. Loftus, my governor, are strongly in favor of the court of Petersburg; secondly, my father disliked the army, and I am enthusiastically fond of it—this was the only opportunity in which I might ever satisfy my passion; and lastly, I believe that I was dazzled by the picture which the young men about me drew of the campaign. I longed to be a soldier; they persuaded me; and I followed them to the field as I would have done to a ball-room, heedless of the consequence."

“Yet,” replied Thaddeus, smiling, “from the intrepidity with which you maintained your ground, when your arms were demanded, any one might have thought that your whole soul as well as your body was engaged in the cause.”

“To be sure,” returned Somerset, “I was a blockhead to be there; but when there, I should have despised myself forever, had I given up my honor to the ruffians who would have wrested my sword from me! But when you came, noble Sobieski, it was the fate of war, and I confided myself to a brave man.”

CHAPTER V.

EACH succeeding morning not only brought fresh symptoms of recovery to the two invalids, but condensed the mutual admiration of the young men into a solid and ardent esteem.

It is not the disposition of youthful minds to weigh, for months and years, the sterling value of those qualities which attract them. As soon as they see virtue they respect it; as soon as they meet kindness they believe it; and as soon as a union of both presents itself they love it. Not having passed through the disappointments of a delusive world, they grasp for reality every pageant which appears. They have not yet admitted that cruel doctrine which, when it takes effect, creates and extends the misery it affects to cure. While we give up our souls to suspicion, we gradually learn to deceive; while we repress the fervors of our own hearts, we freeze those which approach us; while we cautiously avoid occasions of receiving pain, at every remove we acquire an unconscious influence to inflict it on those who follow us. They, again, meet from our conduct and lips the reason and the lesson to destroy the expanding sensibilities of their nature; and thus the tormenting chain of deceived and deceiving characters is lengthened to infinitude.

About the latter end of the month, Sobieski received a summons to court, where a diet was to be held, in consequence of the victory at Zieleme, to consider of future proceedings. In the same packet his majesty inclosed a collar and investiture of the order of St. Stanislaus, as an acknowledgment of service to the young Thaddeus; and he accompanied it with a note from himself, expressing his commands that the young knight should return with the palatine and other generals, to receive thanks from the throne.

Thaddeus, half wild with delight at the thought of so soon meeting his mother, ran to the tent of his British friend to communicate the tidings. Somerset participated in his pleasure; and with reciprocal warmth accepted the invitation to accompany him to Villanow.

“I would follow you, my friend,” said he, pressing the hand of Thaddeus, “all over the world.”

“Then I will take you to the most charming spot in it!” cried he. “Villanow is an Eden; and my mother, the dear angel, who would make a desert so to me.”

“You speak rapturously of your enchanted castle, Thaddeus,” returned his friend, “I believe I shall consider my knight-errantry, in being fool enough to trust myself amid a fray in which I had no business, as one of the wisest acts of my life!”

“I consider it,” replied Thaddeus, “as one of the luckiest events in mine.”

Before the palatine quitted the camp, Somerset thought it proper to acquaint Mr. Loftus, who was yet at Petersburg, of the particulars of his late danger; and that he was going to Warsaw with his new friends, where he should remain for several weeks. He added, that as the court of Poland, through the intercession of the palatine, had generously given him his liberty, he should be able to see every thing in that country worthy of investigation; and that he would write to him again, inclosing letters for England, soon after his arrival at the Polish capital.

The weather continuing fine, in a few days the party left Zieleme; and the palatine and Somerset being so far restored from their wounds that they could walk, the one with a crutch, and the other by the support of his friend's arm, they went through the journey with animation and pleasure. The benign wisdom of Sobieski, the intelligent enthusiasm of Thaddeus, and the playful vivacity of Somerset, mingling their different natures, produced such a beautiful union that the minutes flew fast as their wishes. A week more carried them into the palatinate of Masovia; and soon afterward within the walls of Villanow.

Every thing that presented itself to Mr. Somerset was new and fascinating. He saw, in the domestic felicity of his friend, scenes which reminded him of the social harmony of his own home. He beheld, in the palace and retinue of Sobieski, all the magnificence which bespoke the descendant of a great king; and a power which wanted nothing of royal grandeur but the crown, which he had the magnanimity to think and declare was then placed upon a more worthy brow. While Somerset venerated this true patriot, the high tone his mind acquired was not lowered by associating with characters nearer the common standard. The friends of Sobieski were men of tried probity; men who, at all times, preferred their country's welfare before their own peculiar interest. Mr. Somerset, day after day, listened with deep attention to these virtuous and energetic noblemen. He saw them full of fire and personal courage when the affairs of Poland were discussed; and he beheld with admiration their perfect forgetfulness of themselves in their passion for the general good. In these moments his heart bowed down before them; and all the pride of a Briton distended his breast when he thought that such as these men are his ancestors were. He remembered how often their chivalric virtues used to occupy his reflections in the picture-gallery at Somerset Castle; and his doubts, when he compared what is with what was, that history had glossed over the actions of past centuries, or that a different order of men lived then from those which now inhabit the world. Thus studying the sublime characters of Sobieski and his friends, and enjoying the endearing kindness of Thaddeus and his mother, did a fortnight pass away, without his even recollecting the promise of writing to his governor. At the end of that period he stole an hour from the countess's society; and inclosed in a short letter to Mr. Loftus the following epistle to his mother:—

“TO LADY SOMERSET, SOMERSET CASTLE, LEICESTERSHIRE.

“Many weeks ago, my dearest mother, I wrote a letter of seven sheets from Petersburg; which, long ere this time, you and my dear father must have received. I attempted to give you some idea of the manners of Russia; and my vanity whispers that I succeeded tolerably well. The court of the famous Catherine, and the attentions of the hospitable Count Branicki, were then the subjects of my pen.

“But, how shall I account for my being here? How shall I allay your surprise and displeasure, on seeing that this letter is dated from Warsaw! I know that I have acted against the wish of my father in visiting one of the countries he proscribed. I know that I have disobeyed your commands, in ever having at any period of my life taken up arms without an indispensable necessity; and I have nothing to allege in my defense. I fell in the way of temptation, and I yielded to it. I really can not enumerate all the things which induced me to volunteer with the Russians; suffice it to say, that I did so; and that we were defeated by the Poles at Zieleme : and as Heaven has rather rewarded your prayers than punished my imprudence, I trust you will do the same, and pardon an indiscretion I vow never to repeat.

“ Notwithstanding all this, I must have lost my life through my folly, had I not been preserved, even in the moment when death was pending over me, by a young officer with whose family I now am. The very sound of their title will create your respect ; for we of the patrician order have a strange tenacity in our belief that virtue is hereditary ; and in this instance our creed is duly honored. The title is Sobieski : the family which bears it is the only remaining posterity of the great monarch of that name ; and the count, who is at its head, is Palatine of Masovia ; which, next to the throne, is the first dignity in the state. He is one of the warmest champions of his country’s rights ; and, though born to command, has so far transgressed the golden adage of despots, ‘ Ignorance and subjection,’ that throughout his territories every man is taught to worship his God with his heart as well as with his knees. The understandings of his peasants are opened to all useful knowledge. He does not put books of science and speculations into their hands to consume their time in vain pursuits ; he gives them the Bible, and implements of industry to afford them the means of knowing and of practicing their duty. All Masovia, around his palace, blooms like a garden. The cheerful faces of the farmers, and the blessings which I hear them implore on the family, when I am walking in the fields with the young count (for in this country the sons bear the same title with their fathers), have even drawn a few delighted drops from the eyes of your thoughtless son ! I know that you think I have nothing sentimental about me ; else you would not so often have poured into my not inattentive ears, ‘ that to estimate the pleasures of earth and heaven we must cultivate the sensibilities of the heart. Shut our eyes against them, and we are merely nicely constructed speculums which reflect the beauties of nature but enjoy none.' You see, mamma, that I both remember and adopt your lessons.

"Thaddeus Sobieski is the grandson of the palatine, and the sole heir of his illustrious race. It is to him that I owe the preservation of my life at Zieleme, and much of my happiness since; for he is not only the bravest, but the most amiable young man in the kingdom; and he is my friend. Indeed, as things have happened, you must think that out of evil has come good. Though I have been disobedient, my fault has introduced me to the affection of people whose friendship will henceforward constitute the greatest pleasure of my days. The mother of Thaddeus is the only daughter of the palatine; and of her I can say no more than that nothing on earth can more remind me of you; she is equally charming, equally tender to your son.

"While the palatine is engaged at the diet, her excellency, Thaddeus, and myself, with now and then a few visitors from Warsaw, form the most agreeable parties you can suppose. We walk together, we read together, we converse together, we sing together—at least, the countess sings to us, which is all the same; and you know that time flies swiftly on the wings of harmony. She has an uncommonly sweet voice; and a taste which I never heard paralleled. By the way, you can not imagine any thing more beautiful than the Polish music. It partakes of that delicious languor so distinguished in the Turkish airs; with a mingling of those wandering melodies, which the now-forgotten composers must have caught from the Tartars. In short, while the countess is singing I hardly suffer myself to breathe; and I feel, just what our poetical friend, William Scarsdale, said a twelvemonth ago at a concert of yours, 'I feel as if love sat upon my heart, and flapped it with his wings.'

"I have tried all my powers of persuasion to prevail on this charming countess to visit our country. I have over and over again told her of you, and described you to her; that you are near her own age (for this lovely woman, though she has a son nearly twenty, is not more than forty); that you are as fond of your ordinary boy as she is of her peerless one; that, in short, you and my father will receive her, and Thaddeus, and the palatine, with open arms and hearts, if they will condescend to visit our humble home at the end of the war. I believe I have repeated my entreaties, both to the countess and my friend, regularly every day since my arrival at Vilanow; but always with the same issue: she smiles and refuses; and Thaddeus ‘shakes his ambrosial curls’ with a ‘very godlike frown’ of denial; I hope it is self-denial, in compliment to his mother’s cruel and unprovoked negative.

“Before I proceed I must give you some idea of the real appearance of this palace. I recollect your having read a superficial account of it in a few slight sketches of Poland which have been published in England; but the pictures they exhibit are so faint they hardly resemble the original. Pray do not laugh at me if I begin in the usual descriptive style! You know there is only one way to describe houses and lands and rivers; so no blame can be thrown on me for taking the beaten path, where there is no other. To commence:—

“When we left Zieleme, and advanced into the province of Masovia, the country around Prague rose at every step in fresh beauty. The numberless chains of gently-swelling hills, which encompass it on each side of the Vistula, were in some parts checkered with corn-fields, meadows, and green pastures covered with sheep, whose soft bleatings thrilled in my ears, and transported my senses into new regions; so different was my charmed and tranquillized mind from the tossing anxieties attendant on the horrors I had recently witnessed. Surely there is nothing in the world, short of the most undivided reciprocal attachment, that has such power over the workings of the human heart as the mild sweetness of nature. The most ruffled temper, when emerging from the town, will subside into a calm at the sight of a wild stretch of landscape reposing in the twilight of a fine evening. It is then that the spirit of peace settles upon the heart, unfetters the thoughts, and elevates the soul to the Creator. It is then that we behold the Parent of the universe in his works; we see his grandeur in earth, sea, and sky: we feel his affection in the emotions which they raise; and, half mortal, half etherealized, forget where we are, in the anticipation of what that world must be of which this lovely earth is merely the shadow.*

“Autumn seemed to be unfolding all her beauties, to greet the return of the palatine. In one part the haymakers were mowing the hay, and heaping it into stacks; in another, the reapers were gathering up the wheat, with a troop of rosy little gleaners behind them, each of whom might have tempted the proudest Palemon in Christendom to have changed her toil into ‘a gentler duty.’ Such a landscape, intermingled with the little farms of these honest people, whom the philanthropy of Sobieski has rendered free (for it is a tract of his extensive domains I am describing), reminded me of Somerset. Villages repose in the green hollows of the vales; and cottages are seen peeping from amid the thick umbrage of the woods which cover the face of the hills. The irregular forms and thatched roofs of these simple habitations, with their infant inhabitants playing at the doors, composed such lovely groups that I wished for our dear Mary's pencil and fingers (for, alas! that way mine are motionless!) to transport them to your eyes.

* This description of the banks of the Vistula was given to me with smiles and sighs. The reality was once enjoyed by the narrator, and there was a delight in the retrospection “sweet and mournful to the soul.” At the time these reflections arose on such a scene, I often tasted the same pleasure in evening visits to the beautiful rural environs of London, which then extended from the north side of Fitzroy Square to beyond the Elm Grove on Primrose Hill, and forward through the fields to Hampstead. But most of that is all streets, or Regent’s Park; and the sweet Hill, then the resort of many a happy Sunday group, has not now a tree standing on it, and hardly a blade of grass, “to mark where the primrose has been!”

“The palace of Villanow, which is castellated, and stands in the midst of a fortress, now burst upon my view. It rears its embattled head from the summit of a hill that gradually slopes down toward the Vistula, and borders to the south the plain of Vola;* a spot long famous for the election of the king of Poland. On the north of the building, the earth is cut into natural ramparts, which rise in high succession until

* It was from this very assumption by the nation, on the extinction of the male line of the monarchs of the House of Jaghellon, that all their subsequent political calamities may be dated. The two last sovereigns of this race were most justly styled good and great kings—father and son—Sigismund I. and II. But on the death of the last, about the middle of the sixteenth century, certain nobles of the nation, intoxicated with their wealth and privileges, ran wild for dictation in all things; and, as the foundation of such rule, they determined to make their future kings, each in his succession, entirely dependent on the free vote of public suffrage; and the plain of Vola was made the terrible arena. So it may be called; for, from the time of the first monarch so elected, Henry of Valois, a stranger to the country, and brother to the execrable Charles IX. of France, bribery or violence have been the usual keys to the throne of Poland. For the doors of the country being once opened, by the misguided people themselves, to the influence of ambition, partiality and passion, and shut against the old tenure of a settled succession, foreign powers were always ready to step in, with gold or the sword; and Poland necessarily became a vassal adjunct to whatever neighboring country had furnished the new sovereign. Thus it was, with a few exceptions (as in the case of the glorious John Sobieski), until the election of Stanislaus Augustus; who, though nominated by the power of the Empress of Russia, yet being, like Sobieski, a native prince of the nation, determined to govern the people of Poland in the spirit of his and their most glorious ancestors; and, true to the vow, treading in the steps of the last of the Jaghellons, he gave to Poland the Constitution of 1791; which, with the renovation of many wise laws, again made the throne hereditary.

they reach the foundations of the palace, where they terminate in a noble terrace. These ramparts, covered with grass, overlook the stone outworks, and spread down to the bottom of the hill; which, being clothed with fine trees and luxuriant underwood, forms such a rich and verdant base to the fortress as I have not language to describe: were I privileged to be poetical, I would say, it reminds me of the god of war sleeping amid roses in the bower of Love. Here, the eye may wander over the gifts of bounteous Nature, arraying hill and dale in all the united treasures of spring and autumn. The forest stretches its yet unseared arms to the breeze; while that breeze comes laden with the fragrance of the tented hay, and the thousand sweets breathed from flowers, which in this delicious country weep honey.

“A magnificent flight of steps led us from the foot of the ramparts up to the gate of the palace. We entered it; and were presently surrounded by a train of attendants in such sumptuous liveries that I found myself all at once carried back into the fifteenth century, and might have fancied myself within the courtly halls of our Tudors and Plantagenets. You can better conceive than I can paint the scene which took place between the palatine, the countess, and her son. I can only repeat that from that hour I have known no want of happiness but what arises from regret that my dear family are not partakers with me.

“You know that this stupendous building was the favorite residence of John Sobieski, and that he erected it as a resting-place from the labors of his long and glorious reign. I can not move without meeting some vestige of that truly great monarch. I sleep in his bed-chamber: there hangs his portrait, dressed in the robes of sovereignty; here are suspended the arms with which he saved the very kingdoms which have now met together to destroy his country. On one side is his library; on the other, the little chapel in which he used to pay his morning and evening devotions. Wherever I look, my eye finds some object to excite my reflections and emulation. The noble dead seem to address me from their graves; and I blush at the inglorious life I might have pursued, had I never visited this house and its inhabitants. Yet, my dearest mother, I do not mean to reproach you, nor to insinuate that my revered father and brave ancestors have not set me examples as bright as man need follow; but human nature is capricious; we are not so easily stimulated by what is always in our view as with sights which, rising up when we are removed from our customary associations, surprise and captivate our attention. Villanow has only awakened me to the lesson which I conned over in drowsy carelessness at home. Thaddeus Sobieski is hardly one year my senior; but, good heaven! what has he not done? what has he not acquired? While I abused the indulgence of my parents, and wasted my days in riding, shooting, and walking the streets, he was learning to act as became a man of rank and virtue; and by seizing every opportunity to serve the state, he has obtained a rich reward in the respect and admiration of his country. I am not envious, but I now feel the truth of Cæsar's speech when he declared, 'the reputation of Alexander would not let him sleep.' Nevertheless, I dearly love my friend. I murmur at my own demerits, not at his worth.

"I have scribbled over all my paper, otherwise I verily believe I should write more; however, I promise you another letter in a week or two. Meanwhile I shall send this packet to Mr. Loftus, who is at Petersburg, to forward it to you. Adieu, my dear mother! I am, with reverence to my father and yourself,

"Your truly affectionate son,

"PEMBROKE SOMERSET.

"VILLANOW, August, 1792."

CHAPTER VI.

“TO LADY SOMERSET, SOMERSET CASTLE, ENGLAND.

[Written three weeks after the preceding.]

“You know, my dear mother, that your Pembroke is famous for his ingenious mode of showing the full value of every favor he confers! Can I then relinquish the temptation of telling you what I have left to make you happy with this epistle?

“About five minutes ago, I was sitting on the lawn at the feet of the countess, reading to her and the Princess Poniatowski the charming poem of ‘The Pleasures of Memory.’ As both these ladies understand English, they were admiring it, and paying many compliments to the graces of my delivery, when the palatine presented himself, and told me, if I had any commands for Petersburg, I must prepare them, for a messenger was to set off on the next morning by daybreak. I instantly sprang up, threw my book into the hand of Thaddeus; and here I am in my own room, scribbling to you!

“Even at the moment in which I dip my pen in the ink, my hurrying imagination paints on my heart the situation of my beloved home when this letter reaches you. I think I see you and my good aunt seated on the blue sofa in your dressing-room, with your needle-work on the little table before you; I see Mary in her usual nook, the recess by the old harpsichord; and my dear father, bringing in this happy letter from your son! I must confess this romantic kind of fancy-sketching makes me feel rather oddly; very unlike what I felt a few months ago, when I was a mere coxcomb; indifferent, unreflecting, unappreciating, and fit for nothing better than to hold pins at my lady’s toilet. Well, it is now made evident to me that we never know the blessings of existence until we are separated from the possession of them. Absence tightens the string which unites friends as well as lovers; at least I find it so; and though I am in the fruition of every good on this side the ocean, yet my happiness renders me ungrateful, and I repine because I enjoy it alone. Positively, I must bring you all hither to pass a summer; or come back at the termination of my travels, and carry away this dear family by main force to England.

“Tell my cousin Mary that, either way, I shall present to her esteem the most accomplished of human beings; but I warn her not to fall in love with him, neither in propriâ personâ, nor by his public fame, nor with his private character. Tell her, ‘he is a bright and particular star,’ neither in her sphere nor in any other woman’s. In this way, he is as cold as ‘Dian’s Crescent;’ and to my great amazement too; for when I throw my eyes over the many lovely young women, who at different times fill the drawing-room of the countess, I can not but wonder at the perfect indifference with which he views their (to me) irresistible attractions.

“He is polite and attentive to them all; he talks with them, smiles with them, and treats them with every active complacency; but they do not live one instant in his memory. I mean, they do not occupy his particular wishes; for with regard to every respectful sentiment toward the sex in general, and esteem to some amiable individuals, he is as awakened as in the other case he is still asleep. The fact is, he has no idea of appropriation; he never casts one thought upon himself: kindness is spontaneous in his nature; his sunny eyes beam on all with modest benignity; and his frank and glowing conversation is directed to every rank of people. They imbibe it with an avidity and love which makes its way to his heart without awakening his vanity. Thus, while his fine person and splendid actions fill every eye and bosom, I see him moving in the circle unconscious of his eminence, and the interest he excites.

“Drawn by such an example, to which his high quality as well as extraordinary merit gives so great an influence, most of the younger nobility have been led to enter the army. These circumstances, added to the detail of his bravery and uncommon talents in the field, have made him an object of universal regard; and, in consequence, wherever he is seen he meets with applause and acclamation: nay, even at the appearance of his carriage in the streets, the passengers take off their hats, and pray for him till he is out of sight. It is only then that I perceive his cheek flush with the conviction that he is adored.

“‘It is this, Thaddeus,’ said I to him one day, when walking together we were obliged to retire into a house from the crowds that followed him; ‘it is this, my dear friend, which shields your heart against the arrows of love. You have no place for that passion; your mistress is glory, and she courts you.’

“‘My mistress is my country,’ replied he; ‘at present I desire no other. For her I would die; for her only I would wish to live.’ While he spoke, the energy of his soul blazed in his eyes: I smiled.

“‘You are an enthusiast, Thaddeus.’

“‘Pembroke!’ returned he, in a surprised and reproachful tone.

“‘I do not give you that name opprobriously,’ resumed I, laughing; ‘but there are many in my country, who, hearing these sentiments, would not scruple to call you mad.’

“‘Then I pity them,’ returned Thaddeus. ‘Men who can not ardently feel can not taste supreme happiness. My grandfather educated me at the feet of patriotism; and when I forget his precepts and example may my guardian angel forget me!’

“ ‘Happy, glorious Thaddeus!’ cried I, grasping his hand, ‘how I envy you your destiny!—To live as you do, in the lap of honor; virtue and glory, the aim and end of your existence!’

“The animated countenance of my friend changed at these words, and laying his hand on my arm, he said, ‘Do not envy me my destiny. Pembroke, you are the citizen of a free country, at peace with itself; insatiate power has not dared to invade its rights. Your king, in happy security, reigns in the hearts of his people; while our anointed Stanislaus is baited and insulted by oppression from without, and ingratitude within. Do not envy me: I would rather live in obscurity all my days, than have the means which calamity has bestowed, of acquiring celebrity over the ruins of Poland. O! my friend, the wreath that crowns the head of conquest is thick and bright; but that which binds the olive of peace on the bleeding wounds of my country will be the dearest to me.’

“Such sentiments, my dear madam, have opened new lights upon my poor mistaken faculties. I did not consider the subject so maturely as my friend has done; victory and glory were with me synonymous words. I had not learned, until frequent conversations with the young, ardent, and pious Sobieski taught me, how to discriminate between ferocity and valor; between the patriot and the assassin; between the defender of his country and the ravager of other states. In short, I see in Thaddeus Sobieski all that my fancy hath ever pictured of the heroic character. While I contemplate the sublimity of his sentiments, and the tenderness of his soul, I can not help thinking how few would believe that so many admirable qualities could belong to one mind, and yet that mind to remain unacquainted with the throes of ambition or the throbs of vanity.”

Pembroke judged rightly of his friend; for if ever the real disinterested amor patriæ glowed in the breast of a man, it animated the heart of the young Sobieski. At the termination of the foregoing sentence in the letter to his mother, Pembroke was interrupted by the entrance of a servant, who presented him a packet which had at that moment arrived from Petersburg. He took it and putting his writing materials into a desk, read the following epistle from his governor.

“TO PEMBROKE SOMERSET, ESQ.

“MY DEAR SIR,

“I have this day received your letter, inclosing one for Lady Somerset. You must pardon me that I have detained it, and will continue to do so until I am favored with your answer to this, for which I shall most anxiously wait.

“You know Mr. Somerset, my reputation in the sciences; you know my depth in the languages; and beside, the Marquis Inverary, with whom I traveled over the continent, offered you sufficient credentials respecting my knowledge of the world, and the honorable manner in which I treat my pupils. Sir Robert Somersét, and your lady mother, were amply satisfied with the account which his lordship gave of my character; but with all this, in one point every man is vulnerable. No scholar can forget those lines of the poet—

Felices ter, et amplius,
 Quos irrupta tenet copula; nec malis
 Divulsus quærimoniis,
 Supremâ citius solvet amor die.

It has been my misfortune that I have felt them.

“You are not ignorant that I was known to the Branicka family when I had the honor of conducting the marquis through Russia. The count's accomplished kinswoman, the amiable and learned widow of Baron Surowkoff, even then took particular notice of me; and when I returned with you to St. Petersburg, I did not find that my short absence had obliterated me from her memory.

“You are well acquainted with the dignity of that lady’s opinions on political subjects. She and I coincided in ardor for the cause of insulted Russia, and in hatred of that leveling power which pervades all Europe. Many have been the long and interesting conversations we have held on the prosecution of those schemes which her late husband had so principal a hand in laying, for the subversion of the miserable kingdom in which you now are.

“The baroness, I need not observe, is as handsome as she is ingenious; her understanding is as masculine as her person is desirable; and I had been more or less than man, if I had not understood that my figure and talents were agreeable to her. I can not say that she absolutely promised me her hand, but she went as far that way as delicacy would permit. I am thus circumstantial, Mr. Somerset, to show you that I do not proceed without proof. She has repeatedly said in my presence that she would never marry any man unless he were not only well-looking but of the profoundest erudition, united with an acquaintance with men and manners which none could dispute. ‘Besides,’ added she, ‘he must not differ with me one title in politics; for on that head I hold myself second to no man or woman in Europe.’ And then she has complimented me by declaring that I possessed more judicious sentiments on government than any man in St. Petersburg; and that she would consider herself happy, on the first vacancy in the Imperial College, to introduce me at court, where she was sure the empress would at once discover the value of my talents: ‘but,’ she continued, ‘in such case, I will not allow even her majesty shall rival me in your esteem.’ The modesty natural to my character told me these praises must have some other source than my comparatively unequal abilities; and I unequivocally found it in the partiality with which her ladyship condescended to regard me.

“Was I to blame, Mr. Somerset? Would not any man of sensibility and honor have comprehended such advances from a woman of her rank and reputation? I could not be mistaken, her looks and words needed no explanation which my judgment could not pronounce. Though I am aware that I do not possess that lumen purpureum juventæ which attracts very young uneducated women, yet I am not much turned of fifty; and from the baroness’s singular behavior, I had every reason to expect handsomer treatment than she has been pleased to dispense to me since my return.

“But to proceed regularly—(I must beg your pardon for the warmth which has hurried me to this digression): you know, sir, that from the hour in which I had the honor of taking leave of your noble family in England, I strove to impress upon your rather volatile mind a just and accurate conception of the people among whom I was to conduct you. When I brought you into this extensive empire, I left no means unexerted to heighten your respect, not only for its amiable sovereign, but for all regal powers. It is the characteristic of genius to be zealous: I was so, in favor of the pretensions of the great Catherine to that paltry country in which you now are, and to which she deigned to offer her protection. To this zeal and my unfortunate, though honorable devotion to the wishes of the baroness, I am constrained to date my present dilemma.

“When Poland had the insolence to rebel against its illustrious mistress, you remember that every man of rank in St. Petersburg was highly incensed. The Baroness Surowkoff declared herself frequently, and with vehemence; she appealed to me; my veracity and principles were called forth, and I confessed that I thought every friend to the Czarina ought to take up arms against that ungrateful people. The Count

Branicki was then appointed to command the Russian forces; and her ladyship, very unexpectedly on my part, answered me by approving what I said; and saying that of course I meant to follow her cousin into Poland; for that even she, as a woman, was so earnest in the cause, she would accompany him to the frontiers and there await the result.

‘What could I do? How could I withstand the expectations of a lady of her quality, and one who, I believed, loved me? However, for some time I did oppose my wish to oblige her; I urged my cloth, and the impossibility of accounting for such a line of conduct to the father of my pupil. The baroness ridiculed all these arguments as mere excuses; and ended with saying, ‘Do as you please, Mr. Loftus. I have been deceived in your character; the friend of the Baroness Surowkoff must be consistent; he must be as willing to fight for the cause he espouses as to speak for it: in this case the sword must follow the oration, else we shall see Poland in the hands of a rabble.’

“This decided me. I offered my services to the count, to attend him to the field. He and the young lords persuaded you to do the same; and as I could not think of leaving you, when your father had placed you under my charge, I was pleased to find that my approval confirmed your wish to turn soldier. I was not then acquainted, Mr. Somerset (for you did not tell me of it until we were far advanced into Poland), with Sir Robert’s and my lady’s dislike of the army. This has been a prime source of my error: had I known their repugnance to your taking up arms, my duty would have triumphed over even my devotion to the baroness; but I was born under a melancholy horoscope; nothing happens as any one of my humblest wishes might warrant.

“At the first onset of the battle, I became so suddenly ill that I was obliged to retire; and on this unfortunate event, which was completely unwilling on my part (for no man can command the periods of sickness), the baroness finds a contempt which has disconcerted all my schemes. Besides, when I attempted to remonstrate with her ladyship on the promise which, if not directly given, was implied, she laughed at me; and when I persisted in my suit, all at once, like the rest of her ungrateful, undistinguishing sex, she burst into a tempest of invectives, and forbade me her house.

“What am I now to do, Mr. Somerset? This inconsistent woman has betrayed me into a conduct diametrically opposite to the commands of your family. Your father particularly desired that I would not suffer you to go either into Hungary or Poland. In the last instance I have permitted you to disobey him. And my Lady Somerset (who lost both her father and brother in different engagements), you tell me, hath declared that she never would pardon the man who should put military ideas into your head.

“Therefore, sir, though you are my pupil, I throw myself on your generosity. If you persist in acquainting your family with the late transactions at Zieleme, and your present residence in Poland, I shall finally be ruined. I shall not only forfeit the good opinion of your father and mother, but lose all prospect of the living of Somerset; which Sir Robert was so gracious as to promise should be mine on the death of the present incumbent. You know, Mr. Somerset, that I have a mother and six sisters in Wales, whose support depends on my success in life; if my preferment be stopped now, they must necessarily be involved in a distress which makes me shudder.

“I can not add more, sir; I know your generosity, and I therefore rest upon it. I shall detain the letter which you did me the honor to inclose for my Lady Somerset till I receive your decision; and ever, while I live, will I henceforth remain firm to my old and favorite maxim, which I adopted from the glorious epistle of Horace to Numicius. Perhaps you may not recollect the lines? They run thus:

“Nil admirari, prope res est una, Numici,
Solaque, quæ possit facere et servare beatum.

“I have the honor to be, dear sir,

“Your most obedient servant,

“ANDREW LOFTUS.

“St. PETERSBURG, September 1792.

“P. S. Just as I was sealing this packet, the English ambassador forwarded to me a short letter from your father, in which he desires us to quit Russia, and to make the best of our way to England, where you are wanted on a most urgent occasion. He explains himself no further; only repeating his orders in express commands that we set off instantly. I wait your directions.”

This epistle disconcerted Mr. Somerset. He always guessed the Baroness Surowkoff was amusing herself with his vain and pedantic preceptor; but he never entertained a suspicion that her ladyship would carry her pleasantry to so cruel an excess. He clearly saw that the fears of Mr. Loftus with regard to the displeasure of his parents, were far from groundless; and therefore, as there was a probability, from the age of Dr. Manners, that the rectory of Somerset would soon become vacant, he thought it better to oblige his poor governor, and preserve the secret for a month or two, than to give him up to the indignation of Sir Robert. On these grounds, Pembroke resolved to write to Mr. Loftus, and ease the anxiety of his heart. Although he ridiculed his vanity, he could not help respecting the affectionate solicitude of a son and a brother; and, as that plea had won him, half angry, half grieved, and half laughing, he dispatched a few hasty lines.

“TO THE REV. ANDREW LOFTUS, ST. PETERSBURG.

“What whimsical fit, my dear sir, has seized my father, that I am recalled at a moment’s notice? Faith, I am so mad at the summons, and at his not designing to assign a reason for his order, that I do not know how I may be tempted to act.

“Another thing! you beg of me not to say a word of my having been in Poland; and for that purpose you have withheld the letter which I sent to you to forward to my mother! You offer far-fetched and precious excuses for having betrayed your own wisdom, and your pupil’s innocence, into so mortal an offense. One cause of my being here, you say, was your ‘ardor in the cause of insulted Russia, and your hatred of that leveling power which pervades all Europe.’

“Well, I grant it. I understood from you and Branicki that you were leading me against a set of violent discontented men of rank, who, in proportion as they were inflated with personal pride and insolence, despised their own order; and, under the name of freedom, were introducing anarchy throughout a country which Catherine would graciously have protected. All this I find is false. But both of you may have been misled; the count by partiality, and you by misrepresentation; therefore I do not perceive why you should be in such a terror. The wisest man in the world may see through bad lights; and why should you think my father would never pardon you for having been so unlucky?

“Yet to dispel your dread of such tidings ruining you with Sir Robert, I will not be the first to tell him of our Quixoting. Only remember, my good sir!—though, to oblige you, I withhold all my letters to my mother, and when I arrive in England shall lock up my lips from mentioning Poland, yet positively I will not be mute one day longer than that in which my father presents you with the living of Somerset; then you will be independent of his displeasure, and I may, and will, declare my everlasting gratitude to this illustrious family.

“I am half mad when I think of leaving them. I must tear myself from this mansion of comfort and affection, to wander with you in some rumbling old barouche ‘over brake and through briar!’ Well, patience! Another such drubbing given to my quondam friends of the Neva, and with, ‘victory perched like an eagle on their laureled brows,’ I may have some chance of wooing the Sobieskis to the banks of the Thames. At present, I have not sufficient hope to keep me in good humor.

“Meet me this day week at Dantzic: I shall there embark for England. You had best not bring any of the servants with you; they might blab: discharge them at Petersburg, and hire others for yourself and me when you arrive at the sea-port.

“I have the honor to remain, dear sir,

“Your most obedient servant,

“PEMBROKE SOMERSET.

“VILLANOW, September, 1792.”

When Somerset joined his friends at supper, and imparted to them the commands of his father, an immediate change was produced in the spirits of the party. During the lamentations of the ladies and the murmurs of the young men, the countess tried to dispel the effects of the information, by addressing Pembroke with a smile, and saying, “But we hope that you have seen enough at Villanow to tempt you back again at no very distant period? Tell Lady Somerst you have left a second mother in Poland, who will long to receive another visit from her adopted son.”

“Yes, my dear madam,” returned he; “and I shall hope before a very distant period to see those two kind mothers united as intimately by friendship as they are in my heart.”

Thaddeus listened with a saddened countenance. He had not been accustomed to disappointment; and when he met it now, he hardly knew how to proportion his uneasiness to the privation. Hope and all the hilarities of youth flourished in his soul; his features continually glowed with animation, while the gay beaming of his eyes ever answered to the smile on his lips. Hence the slightest veering of his mind was perceptible to the countess, who, turning round, saw him leaning thoughtfully in his chair; while Pembroke, with increasing vehemence, was running through various invectives against the hastiness of his recall.

“Come, come, Thaddeus!” cried she, “let us think no more of this separation until it arrives. You know that anticipation of evil is the death of happiness; and it will be a kind of suicide, should we destroy the hours we may yet enjoy together, in vain complainings they are so soon to terminate.”

A little exhortation from the countess, and a maternal kiss which she imprinted on his cheek, restored him to cheerfulness; and the evening passed away pleasanter than it had portended.

Much as the palatine esteemed Pembroke Somerset, his mind was too deeply absorbed in the losses of his country to attend to less considerable cares. He beheld his country, even on the verge of destruction, awaiting with firmness the approach of the earthquake which was to engulf it in the neighboring nations. He saw the storm lowering; but he determined, while there remained one spot of vantage-ground above the general wreck, that Poland should yet have a name and a defender. These thoughts possessed him; these plans engaged him; and he had not leisure to regret pleasure when he was struggling for existence.

The empress continued to pour her armies into the heart of the kingdom. The King of Prussia, boldly flying from his treaties, refused it his succor; and the Emperor of Germany following the example of so great a prince, did not blush to show that his word was equally contemptible.

Dispatches daily arrived of the villages being laid waste; that neither age, sex, nor situation prevented their unfortunate inhabitants becoming the victims of cruelty; and that all the frontier provinces were in flames.

The diet was called,* and the debates agitated with the anxiety of men who were met to decide on their dearest interests. The bosom of the benevolent Stanislaus bled at the dreadful picture of his people's sufferings; and, hardly able to restrain his tears, he answered the animated exordiums of Sobieski for resistance to the last, with an appeal immediately to his heart.

“What is it that you urge me to do, my lord?” said he. “Was it not to secure the happiness of my subjects that I labored? and finding my design impracticable, what advantage would it be to them should I pertinaciously oppose their small numbers to the accumulated hordes of the north? What is my kingdom but the comfort of my people? What will it avail me to see them fall around me, man by man; and the few who remain hanging in speechless sorrow over their graves? Such a sight would break my heart. Poland without its people would be a desert, and I a hermit rather than a king.”

In vain the palatine combated this argument, and the quiet which a peace would afford, by declaring it could only be temporary. In vain he told his majesty that he would purchase safety for the present race, at the vast expense of not only the liberty of posterity, but of its probity and happiness.

“However you disguise slavery,” cried he, “it is slavery still. Its chains, though wreathed with roses, not only fasten on the body but rivet on the mind. They bend it from the loftiest virtue to a debasement beneath calculation. They disgrace honor; they trample upon justice. They transform the legions of Rome into a band of singers. They prostrate the sons of Athens and of Sparta at the feet of cowards. They make man abjure his birthright, bind himself to another's will, and give that into a tyrant's hands which he received as a deposit from heaven—his reason, his conscience, and his soul. Think on this, and then, if you can, subjugate Poland to her enemies."

* The constitutional diet of Poland nearly answers, in principle to the British three estates in Parliament, of kings, lords, and commons.

Stanislaus, weakened by years, and subdued by disappointment, now retained no higher wish than to save his subjects from immediate outrage. He did not answer the palatine; but, with streaming eyes, bent over the table, and annulled the glorious Constitution of 1791. Then, with emotions hardly short of agony, he signed an order presented by a Russian officer, which directed Prince Poniatowski to deliver the army under his command into the hands of General Branicki.

As the king put his signature to these papers, Sobieski, who had strenuously withstood each decision, started from his chair, bowed to his sovereign, and in silence left the apartment. Several noblemen followed him.

These pacific measures did not meet with better treatment from without. When they were noised abroad, an alarming commotion arose among the inhabitants of Warsaw; and nearly four thousand men of the first families in the kingdom assembled themselves in the park of Villanow, and with tumultuous eagerness declared their resolution to resist the power of their combined ravagers to the utmost. The Prince Sapieha, Kosciusko, and Sobieski, with the brave Dombrowski, were the first who took the oath of eternal fidelity to Poland; and they administered it to Thaddeus, who, kneeling down, called on heaven to hear him, as he swore to assert the freedom of his country to the last gasp of its existence.

In the midst of these momentous affairs, Pembroke Somerset bade adieu to his friends; and set sail with his governor from Dantzic for England.

CHAPTER VII.

THOSE winter months, which before this year had been at Villanow the season for cheerfulness and festivity, now rolled away in the sad pomp of national debates and military assemblies.

Prussia usurped the best part of Pomerelia, and garrisoned it with troops; Catherine declared her dominion over the vast tract of land which lies between the Dwina and Borysthenes; and Frederic William marked down another sweep of Poland, to follow the fate of Dantzic and of Thorn.

Calamities, insults, and robberies, were heaped, day after day, on the defenseless Poles. The deputies of the provinces were put into prison; and the Russian ambassador had the insolence even to interrupt provisions intended for the king's table, and appropriate them to his own. Sobieski remonstrated on this outrage; but incensed at reproof, and irritated at the sway which the palatine still held at court, he issued an order for all the Sobieski estates in Lithuania and Podolia to be sequestrated, and divided between four of the Russian generals.

In vain the Villanow confederation endeavored to remonstrate with the empress. Her ambassador not only refused to forward the dispatches, but threatened the nobles, "if they did not comply with every one of his demands, he would lay al the estates, possessions, and habitations of the members of the diet under an immediate military execution. Nay, punishment should not stop there; for if the king joined the Sobieski party (to which he now appeared inclined), the royal domains should not only meet the same fate, but harsher treatment should follow, until both the people and their proud sovereign were brought into subjection."

These menaces were too arrogant to have any other effect upon the Poles than that of giving a new spur to their resolution. With the same firmness they repulsed similar fulminations from the Prussian ambassador; and, with a coolness which was only equaled by their intrepidity, they prepared to resume their arms.

Hearing by private information that his threats were despised, next morning before day-break, the insolent Russian surrounded the building where the confederation was sitting, with two battalions of grenadiers and four pieces of cannon; and then issued orders that no Pole should pass the gates without being fired on. General Rautenfeld, who was set over the person of the king, declared that not even his majesty should stir until the diet had given an unanimous and full consent to the empress's commands.

The diet set forth the unlawfulness of signing any treaty while thus withheld from the freedom of will and debate. They urged that it was not legal to enter into deliberation, when violence had recently been exerted against any individual of their body; and how could they do it now, deprived as they were of five of their principal members, whom the ambassador well knew he had arrested on their way to the senate? Sobieski and four of his friends, being the members most inimical to the wishes of Russia, were these five. In vain their liberation was required; and enraged at the pertinacity of this opposition, Rautenfeld repeated his former threatenings with the addition of more; swearing that they should take place without appeal, if the diet did not directly and unconditionally sign the pretensions both of his court and that of Prussia.

After a hard contention of many hours, at last the members agreed among themselves to make a solemn public protest against the present tyrannous measures of the Russian ambassador; and seeing that any attempt to inspire him even with decency was useless, they determined to cease all debate, and keep a profound silence when the marshal should propose the project in demand.

This sorrowful silence was commenced in resentment, and retained through despair; this sorrowful silence was called by their usurpers a consent; this sorrowful silence is held up to the world, and to posterity, as a free cession of the Poles of all those rights which they had received from nature, and defended with their blood.

The morning after this dreadful day, the senate met at one of the private palaces; and, indignant and broken-hearted, they delivered the following declaration to the people—

“The diet of Poland, hemmed in by foreign troops, menaced with an invasion which would be attended by universal ruin, and finally insulted by a thousand outrages, have been forced to witness the signing of a treaty with Prussia.

“They strenuously endeavored to add to that treaty some conditions, to which they supposed the lamentable state of this country would have extorted an acquiescence, even from the heart of power. But the diet were deceived: they found that power was unaccompanied by humanity; they found that Prussia, having thrown his victim to the ground, would not refrain from exulting in the barbarous triumph of trampling upon her neck.

“The diet rely on the justice of Poland; rely on her belief that they would not betray the citadel she confided to their keeping; her preservation is dearer to them than their lives: but fate seems to be on the side of their destroyer. Fresh insults have been heaped upon their heads, and new hardships have been imposed upon them. To prevent all deliberations on this debasing treaty, they are not only surrounded by foreign troops, and dared with hostile messages, but they have been violated by the arrest of their prime members; while those who are still suffered to possess a personal freedom have the most galling shackles laid upon their minds.

“Therefore I, the King of Poland, enervated by age, and sinking under the accumulated weight of afflictions; and also we, the members of the diet, declare that, being unable, even by the sacrifice of our lives, to relieve our country from the yoke of its oppressors, we consign it to posterity.

“In another age, means may be found to rescue it from chains and misery; but such means are not in our power. Other countries neglect us; while they reprobate the violations which a neighboring nation is alleged to have committed against rational liberty, they behold not only with apathy but with approbation, the ravages which are desolating Poland. Posterity must avenge it; we have done. We accede, for the reasons above mentioned, to the treaty laid before us; though we declare that it is contrary to our wishes, to our sentiments, and to our rights.”

Thus, in November, 1793—compressed to one fourth of her dimensions, by the lines of demarkation drawn by her enemies, Poland was stripped of her rank in Europe; the lands of her nobles given to strangers; and her citizens left to perish in chains. Ill-fated nation! Posterity will weep over thy wrongs; while the burning blush of shame that their fathers witnessed such wrongs unmoved, shall cause the tears to blister as they fall.*

* “O! bloodiest picture in the book of time;
Sarmatia fell, unwept, without a crime!” CAMPBELL.

During these transactions, the Countess Sobieski continued in solitude at Villanow, awaiting with awful anxiety the termination of those portentous events which so deeply involved her own comforts with those of her country. Her father was in prison, her son at a distance with the army. Sick at heart, she saw the opening of that spring which might be the commencement only of a new season of injuries; and her fears were prophetic.

Those soldiers who had dared to retain their arms in their hands were again ordered by the Russian ambassador to lay them down. Some few, thinking denial vain, obeyed; but bolder spirits followed Thaddeus Sobieski into South Prussia; whither he had directed his steps on the arrest of his grandfather; and where he had gathered and kept together a handful of brave men still faithful to their liberties. His name alone collected numbers in every district through which he marched. Persecution from their adversary, as well as admiration of Thaddeus, gave a resistless power to his appearance, look, and voice; all which had such an effect on the people they crowded to his standard by hundreds; while their lords, having caught a similar fire from the ardor of the young count, committed themselves without reserve to his sole judgment and command. The Empress, hearing of this, ordered Stanislaus to command him to disband his troops. But the king refusing, she augmented the strength of her own forces; and, enraged at so stubborn a resistance, renewed the war with redoubled energy.

The palatine remained in confinement, hopeless of obtaining release without the aid of stratagem. The emissaries of Catharine were too well aware of their interest to give freedom to so active an opponent. They loaded him with irons and insult;—but in spite of their arts, this patriotic victim to vindictive tyranny received every consolation which can soothe a brave man (his own arms being tied from serving his country) in the information which the blind malice of his jailors hourly brought to his ears. They told him "that his grandson continued to carry himself with such insolent opposition in the south it would be well if the empress, at the termination of the war, allowed him to escape with eternal banishment to Siberia." Every reproach which was leveled at the palatine he found had been bought by some new conquest of Thaddeus; and instead of permitting their malignity to intimidate his age, or alarm his affection, he told the officer (whose daily office was to attend and to torment him) that if his grandson were to lose his head for fidelity to Poland he should behold him with as proud an eye mounting the scaffold as entering the streets of Warsaw with Russia at his chariot-wheels. "The only difference would be," continued Sobieski, "that, as the first can not happen until all virtue be dead in this land, I should regard his last gasp as the expiring sigh of that virtue which, by him, had found a triumph even under the ax. And for the second—it would be joy unutterable to behold the victory of justice over rapine and murder! But, either way, Thaddeus Sobieski is still the same; ready to die, or ready to live, for his country—and equally worthy of the eternal halo with which posterity will encircle his name."

Indeed the accounts which arrived from this young soldier, who had formed a junction with General Kosciusko, were in the highest degree formidable to the coalesced powers. Having gained several advantages over the Prussians, his troops were advancing toward Inowlotz, when a large and fresh body of the enemy appeared closely on their rear. The fugitives on the opposite bank of the river (whom the Poles were driving before them), at sight of this reinforcement suddenly rallied; and to retard the approach of their pursuers, and insure their defeat from the army in view, they broke down the wooden bridge by which they might have escaped. The Poles were at a stand. Kosciusko pro posed swimming across ; but owing to the recent heavy rains the river was so swollen and rapid that the young men to whom he mentioned the project, terrified by the blackness and dashing of the water, drew back. The general perceiving their panic, called Thaddeus to him, and both plunged into the stream. Ashamed of hesitation, the others now tried who could first follow their example ; and, after hard buffeting with the waves, the whole army gained the opposite shore. The Prussians who were in the rear, incapable of the like intrepidity, halted ; and those in the van, intimidated at the daring courage of their adversaries, concealed themselves amid the thickets of an adjoining valley.

The two friends proceeded toward Cracow, carrying redress and protection to the provinces through which they marched. But they had hardly rested two days in that city before dispatches were received that Warsaw was lying at the mercy of General Branicki. No time could be lost ; officers and men had set their lives on the cause ; and they recommenced their toils with a perseverance which brought them before the capital on the 16th of April.

Things were in a worse state than even was expected. The Russian ambassador, with his usual arrogance, had not only demanded the surrender of the national arsenal, but subscribed his orders with a threat that whoever of the nobles presumed to dispute his authority should be arrested and put to death ; and if the people should dare to murmur, he would immediately command General Branicki to lay the city in ashes.

The king remonstrated against such oppression ; and to "punish his presumption," this proper representative of the imperial Catharine ordered that his majesty's garrison and guards should be instantly broken and dispersed. At the first attempt to execute this mandate the people flew in crowds to the palace, and, falling on their knees, implored Stanislaus for permission to avenge the insult offered to his troops. His majesty looked at them with pity, gratitude, and anguish; for some time his emotions were too strong to allow him to speak; at last, in a voice of agony, which was wrung from his tortured heart, he answered, "Go, and defend your honor!"

The army of Kosciusko marched into the town at this critical moment; they joined the armed citizens; and that day, after a dreadful conflict, Warsaw was rescued from the immediate grasp of Russia. During the fight, the king, who was alone in one of the rooms of his palace, sunk almost fainting on the floor; he heard the mingling clash of arms, the roar of musketry, and the cries and groans of the combatants; ruin seemed no longer to hover over his kingdom, but to have pounced at once upon her prey. At every renewed volley, which followed each pause in the firing, he expected to see his palace-gates burst open, and himself then indeed made a willing sacrifice to the fury of his enemies.

While he was yet upon his knees, petitioning the God of battles for a little longer respite from that doom which was to overthrow devoted Poland, Thaddeus Sobieski, panting with heat and toil, flew into the room; and before he could speak a word, was clasped in the arms of the agitated Stanislaus.

"Are my people safe?" asked the king.

"And victorious!" returned Thaddeus. "The foreign guards are beaten from the palace;—your own have resumed their station at the gates."

At this assurance tears of joy ran over the venerable cheeks of his majesty; and again embracing his young deliverer, he exclaimed, "I thank Heaven my unhappy country is not bereft of all hope! While Kosciusko and a Sobieski live, she will not quite despair."

CHAPTER VIII.

THADDEUS was not less eager to release his grandfather than he had been to relieve the anxiety of his sovereign. He hastened, at the head of a few troops, to the prison of Sobieski, and gave him liberty amid the acclamations of his soldiers.

The universal joy at these prosperous events did not last many days: it was speedily terminated by information that Cracow had surrendered to a Prussian force; the king of Prussia was advancing toward the capital; and that the Russians, more implacable in consequence of the late treatment their garrison had received at Warsaw, were pouring into the country like a deluge.

At this intelligence the consternation became dreadful. The Polonese army, worn with fatigue and long services, and without clothing or ammunition, were not in any way, excepting courage, fitted for the field.

The treasury was exhausted; and means of raising a supply seemed impracticable. The provinces were laid waste, and the city had already been drained of its last ducat. In this exigency, a council met in his majesty's cabinet, to devise some expedient for obtaining resources. The consultation was as desponding as their situation, until Thaddeus Sobieski, who had been a silent observer, rose from his seat. Sudden indisposition had prevented the palatine attending, but his grandson knew well how to be his substitute. While blushes of awe and eagerness crimsoned his cheek, he advanced toward Stanislaus; and taking from his neck, and other parts of his dress, those magnificent jewels it was customary to wear in the presence of the king, he knelt down, and laying them at the feet of his majesty, said in a suppressed voice, "These are trifles; but such as they are, and all of the like kind which I possess, I beseech your majesty to appropriate to the public service."

"Noble young man!" cried the king, raising him from the ground; "you have indeed taught me a lesson: I accept these jewels with gratitude. Here," said he, turning to the treasurer, "put them into the national fund; and let them be followed by my own, with my plate; which latter I desire may be instantly sent to the mint. One half the army shall have; the other we must expend in giving some little support to the surviving families of the brave men who have fallen in our defense." The palatine readily united with his grandson in the surrender of all their personal property, for the benefit of their country: and, according to their example, the treasury was soon filled with gratuities from the nobles. The very artisans offered their services gratis; and, all hands being employed to forward the preparations, the army was soon enabled to take the field, newly equipped, and in high spirits.

The countess had again to bid adieu to a son who was now become as much the object of her admiration as of her love. In proportion as glory surrounded him, and danger courted his steps, the strings of affection drew him closer to her soul; the "aspiring blood" of the Sobieskis, which beat in her veins, could not drown the feelings of a parent; could not cause her to forget that the spring of her existence now flowed from the fountain which had taken its source from her. Her anxious and waiting heart paid dearly, in tears and sleepless nights, for the honor with which she was saluted at every turning, as the mother of Thaddeus: that Thaddeus who was not more the spirit of enterprise, and the rallying point of resistance, than he was to her the gentlest, the dearest, the most amiable of sons. It matters not to the undistinguishing bolt of carnage whether it strike common breasts or those rare hearts whose lives are usually as brief as they are dazzling; this leaden messenger of death banquets as greedily on the bosom of a hero as if it had lit upon more vulgar prey: all is leveled to the chance of war, which comes like a whirlwind of the desert, scattering man and beast in one wide ruin.

Such thoughts as these possessed the melancholy reveries of the Countess Sobieski, from the hour in which she saw Thaddeus and his grandfather depart for Cracow until she heard that it was retaken, and that the enemy were defeated in many battles.

Warsaw was again bombarded; and again Kosciusko, with the palatine and Thaddeus, preserved it from destruction. In short, wherever they moved, this dauntless little army carried terror to their adversaries; and diffused hope through the homes and hearts of their countrymen.

They next turned their course to the relief of Lithuania; but while they were on their way thither they received intelligence that a detachment from their body having been beaten by the Russians under Suwarrow, that general, elated with success, was hastening forward to reattack the capital.

Kosciusko, resolved to prevent him, prepared to give immediate battle to Ferfen, another Russian commander, who was on his march to form a junction with his victorious countrymen. To this effect Kosciusko divided his forces: half of them, under the command of Prince Poniatowski, were to pursue Suwarrow, and to keep a watchful eye over his motions; while Kosciusko, accompanied by the two Sobieskis, would proceed with the remainder toward Brzesc.

It was the tenth of October. The weather being fine, a cloudless sun diffused life and brilliancy through the pure air of a keen morning. The vast green plain before them glittered with the troops of General Ferfen, who had already arranged them in order of battle.

The word was given. Thaddeus, as he drew his saber from his scabbard, raised his eyes to implore the justice of Heaven on that day's events. The attack was made. The Poles kept their station on the heights. Twice the Russians rushed on them like wolves, and twice they repulsed them by their steadiness. Conquest declared for Poland. Thaddeus was seen in every part of the field. But reinforcements poured in to the support of Ferfen, and war raged in new horrors. Still the courage of the Poles was unabated. Sobieski, fighting at the head of the infantry, would not recede one foot; and Kosciusko, exhorting his men to be resolute, appeared in the hottest places of the battle.

At one of these portentous moments the commander-in-chief was seen struggling with the third charger which had been shot under him that day. Thaddeus galloped to his assistance, and giving him his horse, mounted another which was offered by a soldier, and remained fighting by his side till, on the next charge, Kosciusko himself fell on the neck of his horse. Thaddeus caught him in his arms; and finding that his breast was immediately covered with blood (a Cossack having stabbed the general in the back), he unconsciously uttered a groan of horror. The surrounding soldiers took the alarm, and "Kosciusko, our general, is killed!" was echoed from rank to rank with such piercing shrieks that the wounded hero started from the breast of his young friend, just as two Russian chasseurs, at the same moment, made a cut at them both. The saber struck the exposed head of Kosciusko, who fell senseless to the ground; and Thaddeus received a gash in his shoulder that laid him by his side.

The consternation became universal; groans of despair seemed to issue from the whole army, while the few resolute Poles who had been stationed near the fallen general fell in mangled heaps upon his breast. Thaddeus with difficulty extricated himself from the bodies of the slain; and fighting his way through the triumphant troops which pressed around him, he joined his terror-stricken comrades ; who, in the wildest confusion, were dispersing under a heavy fire, and flying like frightened deer. In vain he called to them ; in vain he urged them to avenge Kosciusko ; the panic was complete, and they fled.

Almost alone, in the rear of his soldiers, he opposed, with his single and desperate arm, party after party of the enemy, until a narrow stream of the Muchavez stopped his retreat. The waters were crimsoned with blood. He plunged in, and beating the blushing wave with his left arm, in a few seconds gained the opposite bank ; where, fainting from fatigue and loss of blood, he sunk, almost deprived of sense, amid a heap of the killed.

When the pursuing squadrons had galloped by him, he again summoned strength to look around. He raised himself from the ground, and by the help of his sword, supported his steps a few paces further : but, good God ! what was the shock he received when the bleeding and lifeless body of his grandfather lay before him ? He stood for a few moments motionless and without sensation ; then, kneeling down by his side, while he felt as if his own heart was palsied with death, he searched for the wounds of the palatine. They were numerous and deep. He would have torn away the handkerchief with which he had stanchd his own blood to have applied it to that of his grandfather, but by so doing he must have disabled himself from giving him further assistance. He took his sash and neckcloth ; and when they were insufficient, he rent the linen from his breast ; then hastening to the river, he brought a little water in his cap, and threw some of its stained drops on the pale features of Sobieski.

The venerable hero opened his eyes : in a minute afterward he recognized that it was his grandson who knelt by him. The palatine pressed his hand, which was cold as ice : the marble lips of Thaddeus could not move.

“My son,” said the veteran in a low voice, “Heaven hath led you hither to receive the last sigh of your grandfather.” Thaddeus trembled; the palatine continued: “Carry my blessing to your mother; and bid her seek comfort in the consolations of her God. May that God preserve you! ever remember that you are his servant; be obedient to Him; and as I have been, be faithful to your country.”

“May God so bless me!” cried Thaddeus, looking up to Heaven.

“And ever remember,” said the palatine, raising his head, which had dropped on the bosom of his grandson, “that you are a Sobieski! it is my dying command that you never take any other name.”

“I promise.”

Thaddeus could say no more, for the countenance of his grandfather became altered; his eyes closed. Thaddeus caught him to his breast. No heart beat against his; all was still and cold. The body dropped from his arms, and he sunk senseless by its side.

When sensation returned to him he looked up. The sky was shrouded in clouds, which a driving wind was blowing from the orb of the moon, as a few of her white rays here and there gleamed on the weapons of the slaughtered soldiers.

The scattered senses of Thaddeus slowly recollected themselves. He was now lying, the only living creature, amid thousands of the dead, who, the preceding night, had been, like himself, alive to all the consciousness of existence! His right hand rested on the chilled face of his grandfather—it was wet with dew; he shuddered; and taking his own cloak from his shoulders, laid it over the body. He would have said as he did it, “So, my father, I would have sheltered thy life with my own!” but the words choked in his throat, and he sat watching by the corpse until the day dawned, and the Poles returned to bury their slain.

The wretched Thaddeus was discovered by a party of his own hussars, seated on a little mound of earth, with the cold hand of Sobieski grasped in his. At this sight the soldiers uttered a cry of horror. Thaddeus rose up: "My friends," said he, "I thank God that you are come! Assist me to bear my dear grandfather to the camp."

Astonished at this composure, but distressed at the deathful hue of his countenance, they obeyed him in mournful silence; and laid the remains of the palatine upon a bier, which they formed with their sheathed sabers; then gently raising it they retrod their steps to the camp, leaving a detachment to accomplish the duty for which they had quitted it. Thaddeus, hardly able to support his weakened frame, mounted a horse and followed the melancholy procession.

General Wawrzecki,* on whom the command had devolved, seeing the party returning so soon, and in such an order, sent an aid-de-camp to inquire the reason. He came back with dejection in his face, and informed the commander that the brave Palatine of Masovia, whom they supposed had been taken prisoner with his grandson and Kosciusko, was the occasion of this sudden return; that he had been killed, and was now approaching the lines on the arms of his soldiers. Wawrzecki, though glad to hear that Thaddeus was alive and at liberty, turned to conceal his tears; then calling out a guard, he marched at their head to meet the corpse of his illustrious friend.

The bier was carried into the general's tent. An aid-de-camp and some gentlemen of the faculty were ordered to attend Thaddeus to his quarters; but the young count, though scarcely able to stand, appeared to linger; and holding fast by the arm of an officer, he looked steadfastly on the body. Wawrzecki understood his hesitation. He pressed his hand: "Fear not, my dear sir," said he; every honor shall be paid to the remains of your noble grandfather." Thaddeus bowed his head, and was supported out of the tent to his own.

* This name, though marred in the spelling, has again occurred in the recent Polish affairs.

His wounds, of which he had received several, were not deep; and might have been of little consequence had not his thoughts continually hovered about his mother, and painted her affliction when she should be informed of the lamentable events of the last day's battle. These reflections, awake, or in a slumber (for he never slept) possessed his mind; and even while his wounds were healing, produced such an irritation in his blood as hourly threatened a fever.

Things were in this situation when the surgeon put a letter from the countess into his hand. He opened it, and read with breathless anxiety these lines:—

"TO THADDEUS COUNT SOBIESKI.

"Console yourself, my most precious son, console yourself for my sake. I have seen Colonel Lomza; and I have heard all the horrors which took place on the tenth of this month. I have heard them, and I am yet alive; I am resigned; but he tells me you are wounded. Oh! do not let me be bereft of my son also! Remember that you were my dear sainted father's darling: remember, that as his representative, you are to be my consolation: in pity to me, if not your suffering country, preserve yourself, to be at least the last comfort which Heaven will spare to me. I find that all is lost to Poland as well as to myself; that when my glorious father fell, and his friend with him, the republic became extinct. The Russian army is now on its march toward Masovia; and I am too weak to come to you. Let me see you soon, very soon, my beloved son; I beseech you come to me. You will find me feebler in body than in mind; for there is a holy Comforter that descends on the bruised heart which none other than the unhappy have conceived or felt. Farewell, my dear, dear Thaddeus! Let the memory that you have a mother check your too ardent courage. God for ever guard you. Live for your mother; who has no stronger words to express her affection for you than that she is thy mother;—thy “THERESE C. SOBIESKI.

‘VILLANOW, October, 1794.’

This letter was indeed a balm to the soul of Thaddeus. That his mother had received intelligence of the cruel event with such resignation was the best medicine that could now be applied to his wounds, both of mind and body; and when he was told that on the succeeding morning the body of his grandfather would be removed to the convent near Biala, he declared his resolution to attend it to the grave.

In vain his surgeons and General Wawrzecki remonstrated against the danger of this project; for once the gentle and yielding spirit of Thaddeus was inflexible. He had fixed his determination, and it was not to be shaken.

Next day, being the seventh from that in which the fatal battle had been decided, Thaddeus, at the first beat of the drum, rose from his bed, and, almost unassisted, put on his clothes. His uniform being black, he needed no other index than his pale and mournful countenance to announce that he was chief mourner.

The procession began to form, and he walked from his tent. It was a fine morning: Thaddeus looked up as if to upbraid the sun for shining so brightly. Lengthened and repeated rounds of cannon rolled along the air. The solemn march of the dead was moaning from the muffled drum, interrupted at measured pauses by the shrill tremor of the fife. The troops, preceded by their general, moved forward with a decent and melancholy step. The Bishop of Warsaw followed, bearing the sacred volume in his hands; and next, borne upon the crossed pikes of his soldiers, and supported by twelve of his veteran companions, appeared the body of the brave Sobieski. A velvet pall covered it, on which were laid those arms with which for fifty years he had asserted the liberties of his country. At this sight the sobs of the men became audible. Thaddeus followed with a slow but firm step, his eyes bent to the ground, and his arms wrapped in his cloak: it was the same which had shaded his beloved grandfather from the dews of that dreadful night. Another train of solemn music succeeded; and then the squadrons which the deceased had commanded, dismounted, and leading their horses, closed the procession.

On the verge of the plain that borders Biala, and within a few paces of the convent gate of St. Francis, the bier stopped. The monks saluted its appearance with a requiem, which they continued to chant till the coffin was lowered into the ground. The earth received its sacred deposit. The anthems ceased; and the soldiers kneeling down, discharged their muskets over it; then, with streaming cheeks, rose, and gave place to others. Nine volleys were fired, and the ranks fell back. The bishop advanced to the head of the grave; all was hushed; he raised his eyes to Heaven; then, after a pause, in which he seemed to be communing with the regions above him, he turned to the silent assembly, and in a voice, collected and impressive, addressed them in a short but affecting oration, in which he set forth the brightness of Sobieski's life; his noble forgetfulness of self in the interest of his country; and the dauntless bravery which had laid him in the dust. A general discharge of cannon and of musketry was the awful response to this appeal. Wawrzecki took the sword of the palatine, and breaking it, dropped it into the grave. The aids-de-camp of the deceased did the same by theirs; showing, that by so doing they resigned their offices; and then covering their faces with their handkerchiefs, they turned away with the soldiers who filed off. Thaddeus sunk on his knees : his hands were clasped, and his eyes for a few minutes fixed themselves on the coffin of his grandfather ; then rising, he leaned on the arm of Wawrzecki, and with a tottering step and pallid countenance mounted his horse, which had been led to the spot ; and returned with the scattered procession to the camp.

The cause for exertion being over, his spirits fell with the rapidity of a spring too highly wound up, which snaps, and runs down to immobility. He entered his tent, and threw himself on the bed, from which he did not arise for the five following days.

CHAPTER IX.

AT a time when the effects of these sufferings and fatigues had brought him very low, the young Count Sobieski was aroused by information that the Russians had planted themselves before Prague, and were preparing to bombard the town. This intelligence rallied the spirits of the depressed soldiers, who readily obeyed their commander, to put themselves in order of march the next day. Thaddeus saw the decisive blow was pending ; and though hardly able to sit his horse, he refused the indulgence of a litter ; determining that no illness, while he had power to master its effects, should make him recede one hour from the active exercise of his duty.

Devastation was spread over the face of the country. As the troops moved, the unhappy and houseless villagers presented an agonizing picture to their view. Old men stood among the ashes of their homes, deploring the cruelty of power; children and women sat by the wayside weeping over the last sustenance which the wretched infant drew from the breast of his perishing mother.

Thaddeus shut his eyes on the scene.

“Oh, my country! my country!” exclaimed he; “what are my personal griefs to thine? It is your wretchedness that bars me to the heart! Look there,” cried he, to the soldiers, pointing to the miserable spectacles before him, “look there, and carry vengeance into the breasts of their destroyers. Let Prague be the last act of this tragedy!”

Unhappy young man, unfortunate country! It was indeed the last act of a tragedy, to which all Europe were spectators; a tragedy which the nations witnessed without one attempt to stop or to allay its dreadful catastrophe! Oh, how must virtue be lost, when it is no longer an article of policy, even to assume it!

After a long march through a dark and dismal night, the morning began to break; and Thaddeus found himself on the southern side of that little river which divides the territories of Sobieski from the woods of Kobylka. Here, for the first time, he endured all the torturing varieties of despair.

The once fertile fields were burned to stubble; the cottages were yet smoking from the ravages of the fire; and, in place of smiling eyes and thankful lips, he beheld the dead bodies of his peasants stretched on the high roads, mangled, bleeding, and stripped of that decent covering which humanity would not deny to the vilest criminal.

Thaddeus could bear the sight no longer; but, setting spurs to his horse, fled from the contemplation of scenes which harrowed up his heart.

At nightfall, the army halted under the walls of Villanow. The count looked toward the windows of the palace, and by a light shining through the half drawn curtains, distinguished his mother's room. He then turned his eyes on that sweep of buildings which contained the palatine's apartments; but not one solitary lamp illumined its gloom; the moon alone glimmered on the battlements, silvering the painted glass of the study window, where, with that beloved parent, he had so lately gazed upon the stars, and anticipated a campaign which had now so fatally terminated.

These thoughts, with his grief and his forebodings, were buried in the depths of his soul. Addressing General Wawrzecki, he bade him welcome to Villanow, requesting, at the same time, that the men might be directed to rest till the morning, and that he and the officers would partake of refreshment within the palace.

As soon as Thaddeus saw his guests seated at different tables in the eating-hall, and had given orders for the soldiers to be served from the cellars, he withdrew to seek the countess. He found her in her dressing-room, surrounded by the attendants who had just informed her of his arrival. The moment he appeared at the door, the women went out at an opposite passage, and Thaddeus, with an anguished heart, threw himself on the bosom of his mother. They were silent for some time. Poignant recollection stopped their utterance; but neither tears nor sighs filled its place, until the countess—on whose soul the full tide of maternal affection pressed, and mingled with her grief—raised her head from her son's neck, and said, while she strained him in her arms; "Receive my thanks, O Father of Mercy, for having spared to me this blessing!"

Sobieski breathed a response to the address of his mother: and drying her tears with his kisses, dwelt upon the never-dying fame of his beloved grandfather, upon his preferable lot to that of their brave friend Kosciusko, who was doomed, not only to survive the liberty of his country, but to pass the residue of his life within the dungeons of a Russian prison.

He then tried to reanimate her spirits with hope. He spoke of the approaching battle without expressing any doubt of the valor and desperation of the Poles rendering it successful. He talked of the firmness of the king; of the courage of the general; of his own resolution. His discourse began in a wish to cheat her into tranquillity; but as he advanced on the subject his soul took fire at its own warmth, and he half believed the probability of his anticipations.

The countess looked on the honorable glow which crimsoned his harassed features with a pang at her heart.

“My heroic son!” cried she, “my darling Thaddeus! what a vast price do I pay for all this excellence! I could not love you were you otherwise than what you are; and being what you are, how soon may I lose you! Already has your noble grandfather paid the debt which he owed to his glory. he promised to fall with Poland; he has kept his word; and now all that I love on earth is concentrated in you.” The countess paused, and pressing his hand almost wildly on her heart, she continued in a hurried voice: “The same spirit is in your breast; the same principle binds you; and I may at last be left alone. Heaven have pity on me!”

She cast her eyes upward as she ended. Thaddeus, sinking on his knees by her side, implored her with all the earnestness of piety and confidence, to take comfort. The countess embraced him with a forced smile; “You must forgive me, Thaddeus, I have nothing of the soldier in my heart; it is all woman. But I will not detain you longer from the rest you require; go to your room, and try to recruit yourself for the dangers to-morrow will bring forth. I shall employ the night in prayers for your safety.”

Consoled to see any composure in his mother, he withdrew; and after having heard that his numerous guests were properly lodged, went to his own chamber.

Next morning at sunrise the troops prepared to march.

Genera' Wawrzecki, with his officers, begged permission to pay their personal gratitude to the countess for the hospitality of her reception; but she declined the honor, on the plea of indisposition; and, in the course of an hour, the count appeared from her apartment, and joined the general.

The soldiers filed off through the gates, crossed the bridge, and halted under the walls of Prague. The lines of the camp were drawn and fortified before the evening, at which time they found leisure to observe the enemy's strength.

Russia seemed to have exhausted her wide regions to people the narrow shores of the Vistula; from east to west, as far as the eye could reach, her armies were stretched to the horizon. Sobieski looked at them, and then on the handful of intrepid hearts contained in the small circumference of the Polish camp. Sighing heavily, he retired into his tent; and vainly seeking repose, mixed his short and startled slumbers with frequent prayers for the preservation of these last victims to their country.

The hours appeared to stand still. Several times he rose from his bed, and went to the door, to see whether the clouds were tinged with any appearance of dawn. All continued dark. He again returned to his marquee, and standing by the lamp, which was nearly exhausted, took out his watch, and tried to distinguish the points; but finding that the light burned too feebly, he was pressing the repeating spring, which struck five, when the report of a single musket made him start.

He fled to his tent door, and looking around, saw that all in that quarter was at rest. Suspecting it to be a signal of the enemy, he hurried toward the intrenchments; but found the sentinels in perfect security from any fears respecting the sound, as they supposed it to have proceeded from the town.

Sobieski paid little attention to their opinions, but ascending the nearest bastion to take a wider survey, in a few minutes he discerned, though obscurely, through the gleams of morning, the whole host of Russia advancing in profound silence toward the Polish lines. The instant he made this discovery, he came down, and lost no time in giving orders for a defense; then flying to other parts of the camp, he awakened the commander-in-chief, encouraged the men, and saw that the whole encampment was not only in motion, but prepared for the assault.

In consequence of these prompt arrangements, the Russians were received with the cross-fire of the batteries, and case shot and musketry from several redoubts, which raked their flanks as they approached. But, in defiance of this shower of bullets, they pressed on with an intrepidity worthy of a better cause; and overleaping the ditch by squadrons, entered the camp. A passage once secured, the Cossacks rushed in by thousands; and spreading themselves in front of the storming party, put every soul to the bayonet who opposed their way.

The Polish works being gained, the Russians turned the cannon on its former masters; and as they rallied to the defense of what remained, swept them down by whole regiments. The noise of artillery thundered from all sides of the camp: the smoke was so great that it was hardly possible to distinguish friends from foes; nevertheless the spirits of the Poles flagged not a moment: as fast as one rampart was wrested from them, they threw themselves within another; which was as speedily taken, by the help of hurdles, fascines, ladders, and a courage as resistless, as it was ferocious, merciless, and sanguinary. Every spot of vantage position, was at length lost; and yet the Poles fought like lions; quarter was neither offered to them nor required; they disputed every inch of ground, until they fell upon it in heaps; some, lying before the parapets; others, filling the ditches; and the rest covering the earth, for the enemy to tread on, as they cut their passage to the heart of the camp.

Sobieski, almost maddened by the scene, dripping with his own blood, and that of his brave friends, was seen in every part of the action; he was in the fosse, defending the trampled bodies of the dying; he was on the dyke, animating the few who survived. Wawrzecki was wounded, and every hope hung upon Thaddeus; his presence and voice infused new energy into the arms of his fainting countrymen. They kept close to his side, until the Russians, enraged at the dauntless intrepidity of this young hero, uttered the most unmanly imprecations, and rushing on his little phalanx, attacked it with redoubled numbers and fury.

Sobieski sustained the shock with firmness; but wherever he turned his eyes, they were blasted with some object which made them recoil; he beheld his companions, and his soldiers, strewing the earth; and their barbarous adversaries mounting their dying bodies, as they hastened with loud huzzas to the destruction of Prague, whose gates were now burst open. His eyes grew dim at the sight; and at the very moment in which he tore them from spectacles so deadly to his heart, a Lavonian officer struck him with a saber, to all appearance dead upon the field.

When Thaddeus recovered from the blow, which, having lit on the steel of his cap, had only stunned him, he looked around, and found that all near him was quiet; but a far different scene presented itself from the town. The roar of cannon, and the bursting of bombs, thundered through the air; which was rendered livid and tremendous by long spires of fire, streaming from the burning houses, and mingling with the volumes of smoke which rolled from the guns. The dreadful tocsin, and the hurras of the victors, pierced the soul of the count. Springing from the ground, he was preparing to rush toward the gates, when loud cries of distress issued from the interior of the place—and a moment after, the grand magazine blew up with a horrible explosion.

In an instant the field before Prague was filled with women and children, flying in all directions, and rending the sky with their shrieks. "Father Almighty!" cried Thaddeus, wringing his hands, "canst thou suffer this?" While he yet spoke, some straggling Cossacks from the town, who were prowling about, glutted but not sated with blood, seized the poor fugitives, and with a ferocity as wanton as unmanly, released them at once from life and affliction.

This hideous spectacle brought his mother's defenseless state before the eyes of Sobieski. Her palace was only four miles distant; and while the barbarous avidity of the Russians was too busily engaged in sacking the place to permit them to perceive a solitary individual hurrying away amid heaps of dead bodies, he flew across the desolated meadows which intervened between Prague and Villanow.

Thaddeus was met at the gate of the palace by General Butzou; who having learned the fate of Prague from the noise and flames in that quarter, anticipated the arrival of some part of the victorious army before the walls of Villanow. When the count crossed the drawbridge, he saw that the worthy veteran had prepared every thing for a stout resistance; the ramparts were lined with soldiers, and well mounted with artillery.

"Here, my dear lord," cried he, as he conducted the count to the keep, "let the worst happen, here I am resolved to dispute the possession of your grandfather's palace, until I have not a man to stand by me!"

Thaddeus strained him in silence to his breast; and after examining the force and dispositions, he approved all, with a cold despair of their being of any effectual use; and went to the apartments of his mother.

The countess's women, who met him in the vestibule, begged him to be careful how he entered her excellency's room; for she had only just recovered from a swoon, occasioned by alarm at hearing the cannonade against the Polish camp. Thaddeus waited for no more; but regardless of their caution, threw open the door of the chamber; and hastening to his mother's couch, cast himself into her arms. She clung round his neck, and for a while joy stopped her respiration, till bursting into tears she wept over him, incapable of expressing by words her tumultuous gratitude of again beholding him alive. He looked on her altered and pallid features.

"O! my mother," cried he, clasping her to his breast, "you are ill; and what will become of you?"

"My beloved son," replied she, kissing his forehead through the clotted blood which oozed from a cut on his temple; "my beloved son, before our cruel murderers can arrive, I shall have found a refuge in the bosom of my God."

Thaddeus could only answer with a groan. She resumed. "Give me your hand. I must not witness the grandson of Sobieski given up to despair: let your mother incite you to resignation. You see I have not breathed a complaining word, although I behold you covered with wounds." As she spoke, her eye pointed to the sash and handkerchief which were bound round his thigh and arm. "Our separation will not be long; a few short years, perhaps hours, may unite us forever in a better world."

The count was still speechless; he could only press her hand to his lips. After a pause, she proceeded—

"Look up, my dear boy! and attend to me. Should Poland become the property of other nations, I conjure you, if you survive its fall, to leave it. When reduced to slavery, it will no longer be an asylum for a man of honor. I beseech you, should this happen, go that very hour to England: that is a free country; and I have been told the people are kind to the unfortunate. Thaddeus! Why do you delay to answer me? Remember, these are your mother's dying prayers."

"I will obey you."

“Then,” continued she, taking from her bosom a picture, “let me tie this round your neck. It is the portrait of your father.” Thaddeus bent his head, and the countess fastened it under his neckcloth; “Prize this gift, my child; it is likely to be all that you will now inherit either from me or that father. Try to forget his injustice, my dear son; and in memory of me never part with it. O, Thaddeus! since the moment in which I first received it, until this instant, it has never been from my heart!”

“And it shall never leave mine,” answered he, in a stifled voice, “while I have being.”

The countess was preparing to reply, when a sudden volley of fire-arms made Thaddeus spring upon his feet. Loud cries succeeded. Women rushed into the apartment, screaming, “The ramparts are stormed!” and the next moment that quarter of the building rocked to its foundation. The countess clung to the bosom of her son; Thaddeus clasped her close to his breast, and casting up his petitioning eyes to Heaven, “O God!” cried he, “can I not find shelter for my mother!”

Another burst of cannon was followed by a heavy crash, and the most piercing shrieks echoed through the palace. “All is lost!” cried a soldier, who appeared for an instant at the room door, and vanished.

Thaddeus, overwhelmed with despair, grasped his sword, which had fallen to the ground, and crying, “Mother we will die together!” would have given her one last and assuring embrace, when his eyes met the dreadful sight of her before agitated features now tranquilized in death. She fell from his palsied arms back on the sofa, and he stood gazing on her, as if struck by a power which had benumbed all his faculties.

The tumult in the palace increased every moment; but he heard it not, until Butzou, followed by two or three of his soldiers ran into the apartment, calling out, “Count, save yourself!”

Sobieski still remained motionless. The general caught him by the arm, and covering the body of the deceased countess with the mantle of her son, hurried his unconscious steps, by an opposite door, through the state chambers into the gardens.

Thaddeus did not recover his recollection until he reached the outward gate; then breaking from the hold of his friend, was returning to the sorrowful scene he had left, when Butzou, aware of his intentions, just stopped him time enough to prevent his rushing on the bayonets of a party of Russian infantry who were pursuing them at full speed.

The count now rallied his distracted faculties; and making a stand with the general and his three Poles, they compelled this merciless detachment to seek refuge among the arcades of the building.

Butzou would not allow his young lord to pursue the wretches, but hurried him across the park. He looked behind him; a column of fire issued from the south towers. Thaddeus sighed as if his life were in that sigh; "All is indeed over:" and pressing his hand to his forehead, in that attitude followed the steps of the general toward the Vistula.

From the winds being very high, the flame spread itself over the roof of the palace; and catching at every combustible in its way, the Russians became so terrified at the quick progress of a fire which threatened to consume themselves as well as their plunder, that they quitted it with precipitation and desecrating the count and his soldiers at a little distance, directed all their malice to that point. Speedily overtaking the brave fugitives, they blocked up the bridge by a file of men with fixed pikes; and not only menaced the Polanders as they advanced, but derided their means of resistance.

Sobieski, indifferent alike to danger and to insults, stopped short to the left, and followed by his friends, plunged into the stream amid a shower of musket balls from the enemy.

After hard buffeting with the torrent, he at last reached the opposite bank; and was assisted from the river by some of the weeping inhabitants of Warsaw, who had been watching the expiring ashes of Prague, and the flames which were feeding on the boasted towers of Villanow.

Emerged from the water, Thaddeus stood to regain his breath; and leaning on the shoulder of Butzou he pointed to his burning palace with a smile of agony, "See what a funeral pile Heaven has given to the manes of my dear mother!"

The general did not speak, for grief stopped his utterance; but motioning the two soldiers to proceed, he supported the count into the citadel.*

CHAPTER X.

FROM the termination of this awful day, in which a brave and virtuous people were consigned to slavery, Thaddeus was confined to his apartment in the garrison.

It was now the latter end of November. General Butzou supposing that the illness of his lord might continue some weeks, and aware that no time ought to be lost in maintaining all that was yet left of the kingdom of Poland, obtained his permission; and quitting Warsaw, joined Prince Poniatowski, who was yet at the head of a few troops near Sachoryn.

Not long afterward, the young count finding himself tolerably restored, except in those wounds of the heart which time only can heal, was enabled to leave his room, and breathe the fresh air on the ramparts. His appearance was greeted by the officers, with melancholy congratulations; but their replies to his eager questions displaced the faint smile which he tried to spread over his countenance; and with a contracted brow he listened to the following information:—

* The memorable territory around Villanow has again been made the scene of battle and of conflagration, in the spring of 1831—just thirty-seven years since this closing act of the former portentous struggle of Poland.

“Prague was not only razed to the ground, but upward of thirty thousand persons, besides old men, women, and defenseless infants, had perished by the sword, the river, and the flames. All the horrors of Ismail were re-enacted by Suwarrow on the banks of the Vistula. The citizens of Warsaw, intimidated by such a spectacle, assembled in a body; and driven to desperation, repaired to the foot of the throne. On their knees they implored his majesty to forget the contested rights of his subjects; and in pity to their wives and children, allow them, by a timely submission, to save those dear relatives from the ignominy and cruelty which had been wreaked upon the inhabitants of Prague. Stanislaus saw that opposition would be fruitless. The walls of his capital were already surrounded by a train of artillery, ready to blow the town to atoms; the fate of Poland seemed inevitable: and with a deep sigh the king assented to the petition, and sent deputies to the enemy’s camp.

“Suwarrow,” continued the officer, “demands that every man in Poland shall not only surrender his arms, but sue for pardon for the past. This is his reply to the submission of the king, and these hard conditions are accepted.”

“They never shall be by me,” said Sobieski; and turning from his informer, hardly knowing what were his intentions, he walked toward the royal palace.

When his majesty was apprised that the young Count Sobieski awaited his commands in the audience-chamber, he left his closet, and entered the room. Thaddeus, with a swelling heart, would have thrown himself on his knee, but the king prevented him, and pressed him with emotion in his arms, “Brave young man!” cried he, “I embrace in you the last of those Polish youth who were so lately the brightest jewels in my crown.”

Tears stood in the monarch’s eyes, as he spoke; and Sobieski, with hardly a steadier utterance, answered, “I come to receive your majesty’s commands. I will obey them in all things, but in surrendering this sword (which was my grand father’s) into the hands of your enemies.”

“I will not desire you, my noble friend,” replied Stanislaus; “by my acquiescence with the terms of Russia, I comply only with the earnest prayers of my people; I do not wish them to be slaves. I shall not ask you to betray your country; but, alas! you must not throw away your life in a now hopeless cause. Fate has consigned Poland to subjection; and when heaven, in its all-wise though mysterious decrees, confirms the destruction of kingdoms, man’s duty is resignation. For myself, I am ordered by our conqueror to bury my griefs and indignities in the Castle of Grodno.”

The blood rushed over the cheek of Thaddeus at this meek declaration, to which the proud indignation of his soul could in no way subscribe: with a heated and agitated voice he exclaimed, “If my sovereign be already at the command of our oppressors, then indeed is Poland no more! and I have nothing to do but to perform the dying will of my mother. Will your majesty grant me permission to set off for England before I can be obliged to witness the last calamity of my wretched country?”

“I would to heaven,” replied the king, “that I, too, might repose my age and sorrows in that happy kingdom! Go, Sobieski; my prayers and blessings shall follow you.”

Thaddeus pressed his majesty’s hand to his lips.

“Believe me, my dear count,” continued Stanislaus, “my soul bleeds at this parting. I know the treasure which your family has always been to this nation: I know your own individual merit; I know the wealth which you have sacrificed for me and my subjects, and I am powerless to express my gratitude."

"Had I done any thing more than my duty," replied he, "such words from your majesty's lips would have been a reward adequate to every privation; but, alas, no! I have perhaps performed less than my duty; the blood of Sobieski ought not to have been spared one drop, when the liberties of his country perished!" Thaddeus blushed while he spoke; and almost repented the too ready zeal of his friends, in having saved him from the general slaughter at Villanow.

The voice of the venerable Stanislaus became fainter as he resumed—

"Perhaps had a Sobieski reigned at this time these horrors might not have been accomplished! That tyrannous power which has crushed my people, I can not forget is the same which put the scepter into my hand. Catharine misunderstood my principles; she calculated on giving a traitor to the Poles; but when she made me a king, she could not obliterate the stamp which the King of kings had graved upon my heart: I believed myself to be His vicegerent, and to the utmost I have struggled to fulfill my trust."

"Yes, my sovereign!" cried Thaddeus, "and while there remains one man on earth who has drawn his first breath in Poland, he will bear witness in all the lands through which he may be doomed to wander that he has received from you the care and affection of a father. O! sire, how will future ages believe that in the midst of civilized Europe a brave people and a virtuous monarch were suffered, unaided, undeplored, to fall into the grasp of usurpation and murder?"

Stanislaus laid his hand on the arm of the count.

"Man's ambition and baseness," said he, "are monstrous to the contemplation of youth only. You are learning your lesson early: I have studied mine for many years, and with a bitterness of soul, which in some measure prepared me for the completion. My kingdom has passed from me, at the moment you have lost your country. Before we part forever, my dear Sobieski, take with you this assurance!—You have served the unfortunate Stanislaus to the latest hour in which you beheld him. That which you have just said, expressive of the sentiments of those who were my subjects, is indeed a balm to my heart; and I will carry its consolations to my prison.”

The king paused; Sobieski, agitated and incapable of speaking, threw himself at his majesty's feet, and pressed his hand with fervency and anguish to his lips. The king looked down on his graceful figure; and, pierced to the soul by the more graceful feelings which dictated the action, the tear which stood on his eye-lid rolled over his cheek, and was followed by another, before he could add—

“Rise, my young friend, and take this ring. It contains my picture; wear it in remembrance of a man who loves you; and who never can forget your worth, or the loyalty and patriotism of your house.”

The chancellor at that moment being announced, Thaddeus rose from his knee, and was preparing to leave the room, when his majesty, perceiving his intention, desired him to stop.

“Stay, count!” cried he, “I will burden you with one request. I am now a king without a crown, without subjects, without a foot of land in which to bury me when I die; I can not reward the fidelity of any one of the few friends of whom my enemies have not deprived me; but you are young, and Heaven may yet smile upon you in some distant nation. Will you pay a debt of gratitude for your poor sovereign? Should you ever again meet with the good old Butzou, who rescued me when my preservation lay on the fortune of a moment; remember that I regard him as the saviour of my life! I was told to-day that on the destruction of Prague, this brave man joined the army of my brother. It is now disbanded and he, with the rest of my faithful soldiers, is cast forth in his old age on the bounty of a pitiless world. Should you ever meet him, Sobieski, succor him for my sake."

"As Heaven may succor me!" cried Thaddeus; and putting his majesty's hand a second time to his lips, he bowed to the chancellor, and passed into the street.

When the count returned to the citadel, he found that all was as the king had represented. The soldiers in the garrison were reluctantly preparing to give up their arms; and the nobles, in compassion to the cries of the people, were trying to humble their necks to the yoke of the ravager. The magistrates lingered as they went to take the city keys from the hands of their good king; and with bitter sighs anticipated the moment in which they must surrender them and their rights into the power of Suwarrow, and that "proud woman of the North," who exulted in nothing less than universal dominion.

Poland was now no place for Sobieski. He had survived all his kindred. He had survived the liberties of his country. He had seen the king a prisoner; and his countrymen trampled on by deceit and cruelty. As he walked on, musing over these circumstances, he met with little interruption; for the streets were deserted. Here and there a poor miserable wretch passed him, who seemed, by his wan cheeks and haggard eyes, already to repent the too successful prayers of the deputation. The shops were shut. Thaddeus stopped a few minutes in the great square, which used to be crowded with happy citizens, but now, not one man was to be seen. An awful and expecting silence reigned over all. He sighed; and walking down the east street, ascended that part of the ramparts which covered the Vistula.

He turned his eyes to the spot where once stood the magnificent towers of his paternal palace.

“Yes,” cried he, “it is now time for me to obey the last command of my mother! Nothing remains of Poland but its soil, nothing of my home but its ashes!”

The Russians had pitched a detachment of tents amid the ruins of Villanow; and were at this moment busying themselves in searching among the stupendous fragments for what plunder the fire might have spared.

“Insatiate robbers!” exclaimed Thaddeus, “Heaven will requite this sacrilege.” He thought on the countess, who lay beneath the ruins, and tore himself from the sight, while he added, “Farewell forever; farewell, thou beloved Villanow, in which I have spent so many blissful years! I quit thee and my country forever!” As he spoke he raised his hand, and eyes to heaven, and pressing the picture of his mother to his lips and bosom, turned from the parapet; determining to prepare that night for his departure the next morning.

He arose by daybreak; and having gathered together all his little wealth, the whole of which was compressed within the portmanteau that was buckled on his horse; precisely two hours before the triumphal car of General Suwarrow entered Warsaw, Sobieski left it; and as he rode along the streets, he bedewed its stones with his tears. They were the first that he had shed during the long series of his misfortunes; and they now flowed so fast from his eyes he could hardly discern his way out of the city.

At the great gate his horse stopped.

“Poor Saladin!” said Thaddeus, stroking his neck, “are you so sorry at leaving Warsaw that, like your unhappy master, you linger to take a last look!”

His tears redoubled; and the warder, as he closed the gate after him, implored permission to kiss the hand of the noble Count Sobieski ere he should turn his back on Poland never to return. Thaddeus looked kindly round; and shaking hands with the honest man, after saying a few friendly words to him, rode on with a loitering pace till he reached that part of the river which divides Masovia from the Prussian dominions.

Here he flung himself off his horse; and standing for a moment on the hill that rises near the bridge, retraced with his almost blinded eyes the long and desolated lands through which he had passed; then involuntarily dropping on his knees, he plucked a tuft of grass, and pressing it to his lips, exclaimed, "Farewell, Poland! Farewell all my earthly happiness!"

Almost stifled by emotion, he put this poor relic of his country into his bosom, and remounting his horse, crossed the bridge.

As one who, flying from any particular object, thinks to lose himself and his sorrows when it lessens to his view, Sobieski pursued the remainder of his journey with a speed which soon brought him to Dantzic.

Here he remained a few days, and during that interval the firmness of his soul was restored. He felt a calm arising from the conviction that his afflictions had gained their summit; and that, however heavy they were, Heaven had laid them on him as a trial of faith and virtue. Under this belief he ceased to weep; but he never was seen to smile.

Having entered into an agreement with the master of a vessel to carry him across the sea, he found the strength of his finances would barely defray the charges of the voyage. Considering this circumstance, he saw the impossibility of taking his horse to England.

The first time this idea presented itself it almost upset his determined resignation. Tears would have started into his eyes had he not by force withheld them.

"To part from my faithful Saladin," said he to himself, "that has borne me since I first could use a sword; that has carried me through so many dangers, and has come with me even into exile ; it is painful, it is ungrateful !” He was in the stable when this thought assailed him ; and as the reflections followed each other, he again turned to the stall ; “ But, my poor fellow, I will not barter your services for gold. I will seek for some master who may be kind to you, in pity to my misfortunes.”

He re-entered the hotel where he lodged, and calling a waiter, inquired who occupied the fine mansion and park on the east of the town. The man replied, “ Mr. Hopetown, an eminent British merchant, who has been settled at Dantzic above forty years.”

“ I am glad he is a Briton !” was the sentiment which succeeded this information, in the count’s mind. He immediately took his resolution, but hardly had prepared to put it into execution when he received a summons from the captain to be on board in half an hour, as the wind was set fair.

Thaddeus, rather disconcerted by this hasty call, with a depressed heart wrote the following letter :—

“ To JOHN HOPETOWN, Esq.

“ SIR—A Polish officer, who has sacrificed every thing but his honor to the last interests of his country, now addresses you.

“ You are a Briton ; and of whom can a victim to the cause of freedom with less debasement solicit an obligation ?

“ I can not afford support to the horse which has carried me through the battles of this fatal war, I disdain to sell him ; and, therefore, I implore you, by the respect that you pay to the memory of your ancestors, who struggled for and retained that liberty in defense of which we are thus reduced ! I implore you to give him an asylum in your park, and to protect him from injurious usage.

“ Perform this benevolent action, sir, and you shall ever be remembered with gratitude by an unfortunate “ POLANDER.

“ DANTZIC, November, 1794.”

The count, having sealed and directed this letter, went to the hotel-yard and ordered that his horse might be brought out. A few days of rest had restored him to his former mettle; and he appeared from the stable, prancing and pawing the earth, as he used to do when Thaddeus was to mount him for the field.

The groom was striving in vain to restrain the spirit of the horse, when the count took hold of his bridle. The noble animal knew his master, and became gentle as a lamb. After stroking him two or three times, with a bursting heart he returned the reins to the man's hand, and at the same time gave him the letter.

“There,” said he, “take that note and the horse directly to the house of Mr. Hopetown. Leave them; for the letter requires no answer.”

This last pang mastered, he walked out of the yard toward the quay. The wind continuing fair, he entered the ship, and within an hour set sail for England.

CHAPTER XI.

SOBIESKI passed the greater part of each day and the whole of every night on the deck of the vessel. He was too much absorbed in himself to receive any amusement from the passengers; who, observing his melancholy, thought to dispel it by their company and conversation.

When any of these people came upon deck he walked to the head of the ship, took his seat upon the cable which bound the anchor to the fore-castle; and while their fears rendered him safe from their well-meant persecution, he gained some respite from vexation, though none from misery.

The ship having passed through the Baltic and entered on the British sea, the passengers, running from side to side of the vessel, pointed out to Thaddeus the distant shore of England lying like a hazy ridge along the horizon. The happy people, while they strained their eyes through glasses, desired him to observe different spots on the hardly perceptible line, which they called Flamborough Head and the hills of Yorkshire. His heart turned sick at these objects of pleasure, for not one of them raised a corresponding feeling in his breast. England could be nothing to him; if any thing, it would prove a desert, which contained no one object for his regrets or wishes.

The image of Pembroke Somerset rose in his mind, like the dim recollection of one who has been a long time dead. While they were together at Villanow they loved each other warmly; and when they parted they promised to correspond. One day, in pursuit of the enemy, Thaddeus was so unlucky as to lose the pocket-book which contained his friend's address; but yet, uneasy at his silence, he ventured two letters to him, directed merely to Sir Robert Somerset, England. To these he received no answer; and the palatine evinced so much displeasure at Pembroke's neglect and ingratitude that he would not suffer him to be mentioned in his presence; and indeed Thaddeus, from disappointment and regret, felt no inclination to transgress the command.

When the count remembered these things, he found little comfort in recollecting the name of that young Englishman: and now that he was visiting England as a poor exile, with indignation and grief he gave up the wish with the hope of meeting Mr. Somerset. Sensible that Somerset had not acted as became the man to whom he could apply in his distress, he resolved, unfriended as he was, to wipe him at once from his memory. With a bitter sigh he turned his back on the land to which he was going, and fixed his eyes on the tract of sea which divided him from all that ever had given him delight.

“Father of Mercy!” murmured he, in a suppressed voice, “what have I done to deserve this misery? Why have I been, at one stroke, deprived of all that rendered existence estimable? Two months ago, I had a mother, a more than father, to love and cherish me; I had a country that looked up to them and to me with veneration and confidence; now, I am bereft of all; I have neither father, mother, nor country, but am going to a land of strangers.”

Such impatient adjurations were never rung from Sobieski by the anguish of sudden torture, without his ingenuous and pious mind reproaching itself for repining. His soul was soft as a woman’s; but it knew neither effeminacy nor despair. While his heart bled, his countenance retained its serenity. While affliction crushed him to the earth, and nature paid a few hard wrung drops to her expected dissolution, he contemned his tears, and raised his fixed and confiding eye to that power which poured down its tempests on his head. Thaddeus felt as a man, but received consolation as a Christian.

When the ship arrived at the mouth of the Thames the eagerness of the passengers increased to such an excess that they would not stand still, nor be silent a moment; and when the vessel, under full sail, passed Sheerness, and the dome of St. Paul’s appeared before them, their exclamations were loud and incessant. “My home! my parents! my wife! my friends!” were the burden of every tongue.

Thaddeus found his irritable spirits again disturbed; and rising from his seat he retired unobserved by the people, who were too happy to attend to any thing which did not agree with their own transports. The cabin was as deserted as himself. Feeling that there is no solitude like that of the heart, when it looks around and sees in the vast concourse of human beings not one to whom it can pour forth its sorrows, and in return receive the answering sigh of sympathy, he threw himself on one of the lockers, and with difficulty restrained the tears from gushing from his eyes. He held his hand over them, while he contemned himself for a weakness so unbecoming his character.

He despised himself: but let not others despise him. It is difficult for those who are in prosperity, who lie morning and evening in the lap of indulgence, to conceive the misery of being thrown out into a bleak and merciless world: it is impossible for the happy man, surrounded by luxury and gay companions, to figure to himself the reflections of a fellow-creature who, having been fostered in the bosom of affection and elegance, is cast at once from society, bereft of home, of comfort, of "every stay, save innocence and Heaven." None but the wretched can imagine what the wretched endure from actual distress; from apprehended misfortune; from outraged feelings; and ten thousand nameless sensibilities to injury, which only the unfortunate can conceive, dread, and experience.

Such were the anticipating fears of the count. Books and report led him to respect the English: Pembroke Somerset, at one time, would have taught him to love them; but the nearer he advanced toward the shore, the remembrance that it was from this country his father came, made him doubt the humanity of a people of which his own parent and forgetful friend were such detestable specimens.

The noise redoubled above his head; and in a few minutes afterward, one of the sailors came running down the stairs.

"Will it please your honor," said he, "to get up? That be my chest, and I want my clothes to clean myself before I go on shore; mother, I know, be waiting me at Blackwall."

Thaddeus rose, and with a withered heart again ascended to the deck.

On coming up the hatchway he saw that the ship was moored in the midst of a large city; and was surrounded by myriads of vessels from every quarter of the globe. Sobieski leaned over the railing, and in silence looked down on the other passengers, who were bearing off in boats and shaking hands with the people who came to receive them.

“It is near dark, sir,” said the captain; “mayhap you would like to go on shore? There is a boat just come round, and the tide won’t serve much longer; and as your friends don’t seem to be coming for you, you are welcome to a place in it with me.”

The count thanked him; and after defraying the expenses of the voyage, and giving money among the seamen, he desired that his portmanteau might be put into the wherry. The honest fellows, in gratitude to the bounty of their passenger, struggled who should obey his commands; when the captain, angry at being detained, snatched away the baggage, and flinging it into the boat leaped in after it, and was followed by Thaddeus.

The taciturnity of the sailor, and the deep melancholy of his guest, did not break silence until they reached the Tower Stairs.

“Go, Ben, fetch the gentleman a coach.”

The count bowed to the captain, who gave the order; and in a few minutes the boy returned, saying there was one in waiting. He took up the portmanteau, and Thaddeus followed him to the Tower Gate, where the carriage stood. Ben threw in the baggage: the count put his foot on the step.

“Where must the man drive to?”

Thaddeus drew it back again.

“Yes, sir,” continued the lad; “where is your honor’s home?”

“In my grave,” was the response his aching heart made to this question. He hesitated before he spoke. “An hotel,” said he, flinging himself on the seat, and throwing some silver into the sailor's hat.

“What hotel, sir?” asked the coachman.

“Any.”

The man closed the door, mounted his box, and drove off.

It was now near seven o'clock, of a dark December evening. The lamps were lighted; and it being Saturday night the streets were crowded with people. Thaddeus looked at them as he was driven along: “Happy creatures!” thought he, “you have each a home to go to; you have each expecting friends to welcome you; every one of you knows some being in the world who will smile when you enter; while I, unhappy man! am shut out from every social comfort. Wretched, wretched Sobieski! where are now all thy highly prized treasures; thy boasted glory; and those beloved friends who rendered that glory most precious to thee? Alas! all are withdrawn; vanished like a dream of enchantment; from which I have indeed awakened to a frightful solitude.”

His reflections were broken by the stopping of the carriage. The man opened the door.

“Sir, I have brought you to the Hummums, Covent Garden; it has as good accommodations as any in town. My fare is five shillings.”

Thaddeus gave the demand, and followed him and his baggage into the coffee-room. At the entrance of a man of his figure several waiters presented themselves, begging to know his commands.

“I want a chamber.”

He was ushered into a very handsome dining-room, where one of them laid down the portmanteau, and then bowing low inquired whether he had dined.

The waiter having received his orders (for the count saw that it was necessary to call for something), hastened into the kitchen to communicate them to the cook.

“Upon my soul, Betty,” cried he, “you must do your best to-night; for the chicken is for the finest-looking fellow you ever set eyes on. By heaven! I believe him to be some Russian nobleman; perhaps the great Suwarrow himself.”

“A prince you mean, Jenkins!” said a pretty girl, who entered at that moment: since I was born, I never see’d any English lord walk up and down a room with such an air; he looks like a king. For my part, I should not wonder if he was one of them there emigrant kings; for they say there is a power of them now wandering about the world.”

“You talk like a fool, Sally,” cried the sapient waiter. “Don’t you see that his dress is military? Look at his black cap, with its long bag and great feather, and the monstrous saber at his side; look at them, and then, if you can, say I am mistaken in pronouncing that he is some great Russian commander—most likely come over as ambassador!”

“But he came in a hackney-coach,” cried a little dirty boy in the corner. “As I was running up stairs with Colonel Leeson’s shoes, I see’d the coachman bring in his portmanteau.”

“Well, Jack-a-napes, what of that?” cried Jenkins; “is a nobleman always to carry his equipage about him, like a snail with its shell on its back? To be sure, this foreign lord or prince is only come to stay here till his own house is fit for him. I will be civil to him.”

“And so will I, Jenkins,” rejoined Sally, smiling; “for I never see’d such handsome blue eyes in all my born days; and they turned so sweet on me, and he spoke so kindly when he bade me stir the fire; and when he sat down by it, and throwed off his great fur cloak, he showed a glittering star; and a figure so noble that indeed, cook, I do verily believe he is, as Jenkins says, an enthroned king!”

“You and Jenkins be a pair of fools,” cried the cook, who without noticing their description, had been sulkily basting

the fowl: "I will be sworn he's just such another king as that palavering rogue was a French duke, who got my master's watch and pawned it! As for you, Sally, you had better beware of hunting after foreign men-folk: it's not seemly for a young woman, and you may chance to rue it."

The moralizing cook had now brought the whole kitchen on her shoulders. The men abused her for a surly old maid; and the women tittered, while they seconded her censure by cutting sly jokes on the blushing face of poor Sally, who stood almost crying by the side of her champion Jenkins.

While this hubbub was going forward below stairs, its unconscious subject was, as Sally had described, sitting in a chair close to the fire, with his feet on the fender, his arms folded, and his eyes bent on the flames. He mused; but his ideas followed each other in such quick and confused succession that it hardly could be said he thought of any thing.

The entrance of dinner roused him from his reverie. It was carried in by at least half a dozen waiters. The count had been so accustomed to a numerous suite of attendants he did not observe the parceling out of his temperate meal; one bringing in the fowl, another the bread, his neighbor the solitary plate, and the rest in like order: so solicitous were the male listeners in the kitchen to see this wonderful Russian.

Thaddeus partook but lightly of the refreshment. Being already fatigued in body, and dizzy with the motion of the vessel, as soon as the cloth was withdrawn, he ordered a night-candle and desired to be shown to his chamber.

Jenkins, whom the sight of the embroidered star confirmed in his decision that the foreigner must be a person of consequence, with increased agility whipped up the portmanteau, and led the way to the sleeping-rooms. Here curiosity put on a new form; the women-servants, determined to have their wishes gratified as well as the men, had arranged themselves on each side of the passage through which the count must pass. At so strange an appearance, Thaddeus drew back; but supposing that it might be a custom of the country, he proceeded through this fair bevy; and bowed as he walked along to the low courtesies which they continued to make until he entered his apartment and closed the door.

The unhappy are ever restless: they hope in every change of situation to obtain some alteration in their feelings. Thaddeus was too miserable awake not to view with eagerness the bed on which he trusted that for a few hours at least, he might lose his consciousness of suffering, with its remembrance.

CHAPTER XII.

WHEN he awoke in the morning, his head ached, and he felt as unrefreshed as when he had lain down; he undrew the curtain, and saw from the strength of the light it must be mid-day. He got up, and having dressed himself, descended to the sitting-room; where he found a good fire, and the breakfast already placed. He rang the bell; and walked to the window, to observe the appearance of the morning. A heavy snow had fallen during the night, and the sun, ascended to its meridian, shone through the thick atmosphere like a ball of fire. All seemed comfortless without; and turning back to the warm hearth, which was blazing at the other end of the room, he was reseating himself when Jenkins rought in the tea-urn.

“I hope, my lord,” said the waiter, “that your lordship slept well last night?”

“Perfectly, I thank you,” replied the count, unmindful that the man addressed him according to his rank; “when you come to remove these things, bring me my bill.”

Jenkins bowed and withdrew; congratulating himself on his dexterity in having saluted the stranger with his title.

During the absence of the waiter, Thaddeus thought it time to examine the state of his purse: he well recollected how he had paid at Dantzic; and from the style in which he was served here, he did not doubt but that to defray what he had contracted would nearly exhaust his all. He emptied the contents of his pocket into his hand; a guinea and some silver was all that he possessed. A flush of terror suffused itself over his face; he had never known the want of money before, and he trembled now lest the charge should exceed his means of payment.

Jenkins entered with the bill. On the count's examining it he was pleased to find it amounted to no more than the only piece of gold his purse contained. He laid it upon the tea-board, and putting half a crown into the hand of Jenkins, who appeared waiting for something, wrapped his cloak round him, and was walking out of the room.

"I suppose, my lord," cried Jenkins, pocketing the money with a smirk, and bowing with the things in his hands, "we are to have the honor of seeing your lordship again, as you leave your portmanteau behind you?"

Thaddeus hesitated a few seconds, then again moving toward the door, said, "I will send for it."

"By what name, my lord?"

"The Count Sobieski."

Jenkins immediately set down the tea-board, and hurrying after Thaddeus along the passage and through the coffee-room, darted before him, and opening the door for him to go out, exclaimed loud enough for every body to hear, "Depend upon it, Count Sobieski, I will take care of your lordship's baggage."

Thaddeus, rather displeased at his noisy officiousness, only bent his head, and proceeded into the street.

The air was piercing cold ; and on his looking around. he perceived by the disposition of the square in which he was, that it must be a market-place. The booths and stands were covered with snow ; while parts of the pavement were rendered nearly impassable by heaps of black ice which the market-people of the preceding day had shoveled up out of their way.* He now recollected that it was Sunday, and consequently the improbability of finding any lodgings on that day.

He stood under the piazzas for two or three minutes, bewildered on the plan he should adopt ; to return to the hotel for any purpose but to sleep, in the present state of his finances, would be impossible : he therefore gave himself up, in-clement as the season was, to walk the streets until night. He might then go back to the Hummums to his bed-chamber ; but he resolved to quit it in the morning for a residence more suitable to the reduction of his fortunes.

The wind blew a keen north-east, accompanied with a violent shower of sleet and rain ; yet such was the abstraction of his mind that he hardly observed its bitterness, but walked on, careless whither his feet led him, until he stopped opposite to St. Martin's church.

“God is my only friend,” said he to himself ; “and in His house I shall surely find shelter !”

He turned up the steps, and was entering the porch, when he met the congregation thronging out of it.

“Is the service over ?” he inquired of a decent old woman, who was passing him down the stairs. The woman started at this question, asked her in English by a person whose dress was so completely foreign. He repeated it ; and smiling and courtesying, she replied—

“Yes, sir ; and I am sorry for it. Lord bless your hand-

* Those who remember the terrible winter of 1794 will not call this description exaggerated.

some face, though you be a stranger gentleman, it does one's heart good to see you so devoutly given!"

Thaddeus blushed at this personal compliment, though it came from the lips of a wrinkled old woman; and begging permission to assist her down the stairs, he asked her when service would begin again.

"At three o'clock, sir, and may Heaven bless the mother who bore so pious a son!"

As the poor woman spoke, she raised her eyes with a melancholy resignation. The count touched with her words and manner, almost unconsciously to himself, continued by her side as she hobbled down the street.

His eyes were fixed on the ground, until, as he walked forward, somebody pressing against him, made him look round. He saw that his aged companion had just knocked at the door of a mean-looking house; and that his acquaintance and himself were surrounded by nearly a dozen people, besides boys, who through curiosity had followed them from the church porch.

"Ah! sweet sir," cried she; "these folks are staring at so fine a gentleman taking notice of age and poverty."

Thaddeus was uneasy at the inquisitive gaze of the bystanders; and his companion observing the fluctuations of his countenance, added, as the door was opened by a little girl—

"Will your honor walk in out of the snow, and warm yourself by my poor fire?"

He hesitated a moment; then, accepting her invitation, bent his head to get under the humble door-way; and following her through a neatly sanded passage, entered a small but clean kitchen. A little boy, who was sitting on a stool near the fire, uttered a scream at the sight of a stranger; and running up to his grandmother, rolled himself in her cloak, crying out—

"Mammy, mammy, take away that black man!"

“Be quiet, William; it is a gentleman, and no black man, I am so ashamed, sir; but he is only three years old.”

“I should apologize to you,” returned the count, smiling, “for introducing a person so hideous as to frighten your family.”

By the time he finished speaking, the good dame had pacified the screaming child; who stood trembling, and looking askance at the tremendous black gentleman stroking the head of his pretty sister. •

“Come here, my dear!” said Thaddeus, seating himself by the fire, and stretching out his hand to the child. It instantly buried its head in its grandmother’s apron.

“William! William!” cried his sisters, pulling him by the arm, “the gentleman will not hurt you!”

The boy again lifted up his head. Thaddeus threw back his long sable cloak, and taking off his cap, whose hearse-like plumes, he thought, might have terrified the child, he laid it on the ground; and again stretching forth his arms, called the boy to approach him. Little William now looked steadfastly in his face, and then on the cap, which he had laid beside him; and then, while he grasped his grandmother’s apron with one hand, he held out the other, half assured, toward the count. Thaddeus took it, and pressing it softly, pulled him gently to him, and placing him on his knee, “My little fellow,” said he, kissing him, “you are not frightened now?”

“No,” said the child; “I see you are not the ugly black man who takes away naughty boys. The ugly black man has a black face, and snakes on his head; but these are pretty curls!” added he, laughing, and putting his little fingers through the thick auburn hair which hung in neglected masses over the forehead of the count.

“I am ashamed your honor should sit in a kitchen,” rejoined the old lady; “but I have not a fire in any other room.”

“Yes,” said her granddaughter, who was about twelve years old, “grandmother has a nice first floor up stairs; but because we have no lodgers, there be no fire there.”

“Be silent, Nanny Robson,” said the dame: “your pertness teases the gentleman.”

“O, not at all,” cried Thaddeus; “I ought to thank her, for she informs me you have lodgings to let; will you allow me to engage them?”

“You, sir,” cried Mrs. Robson, thunderstruck, “for what purpose? Surely so noble a gentleman would not live in such a place as this.”

“I would, Mrs. Robson: I know not where I could live with more comfort; and where comfort is, my good madam, what signifies the costliness or plainness of the dwelling?”

“Well, sir, if you be indeed serious; but I can not think you so: you are certainly making a joke of me for my boldness in asking you into my poor house.”

“Upon my honor, I am not, Mrs. Robson. I would gladly be your lodger, if you will admit me; and to convince you that I am in earnest, my portmanteau shall this moment be brought here.”

“Well, sir,” resumed she, “I shall be honored in having you in my house; but I have no room for any one but yourself, not even for a servant.”

“I have no servant.”

“Then I will wait on him, grandmother,” cried the little Nanny; “do let the gentleman have them, I am sure he looks honest.”

“The old woman colored at this last observation of the child, and proceeded:

“Then, sir, if you should not disdain the rooms when you see them, I shall be too happy in having so good a gentleman under my roof. Pardon my boldness, sir; but may I ask? I think by your dress, you are a foreigner?”

“I am,” replied Thaddeus, the radiance which played over his features contracting into a gloom; “if you have no objection to take a stranger within your doors, from this hour I shall consider your house as my home.”

“As your honor pleases,” said Mrs. Robson; “my terms are half a guinea a week; and I will attend on you as though you were my own son! for I can not forget, excellent young gentleman, the way in which we first met.”

“Then I will leave you for the present,” returned he, rising, and putting down the little William, who had been amusing himself with examining the silver points of the star of St. Stanislaus, which the count wore on his breast: “In the mean while,” said he, “my pretty friend,” stooping to the child, “let this bit of silver” was just mounting to his tongue, as he put his hand into his pocket to take out half a crown; but he recollected that his necessities would no longer admit of such gifts; and drawing his hand back, with a deep and bitter sigh, he touched the boy’s cheek with his lips, and added, “let this kiss remind you of your new friend.”

This was the first time the generous spirit of Sobieski had been restrained; and he suffered a pang, for the poignancy of which he could not account. His had been a life accustomed to acts of munificence. His grandfather’s palace was the asylum of the unhappy; his grandfather’s purse a treasury for the unfortunate. The soul of Thaddeus did not degenerate from his noble relative: his generosity, begun in inclination, was nurtured by reflection, and strengthened with a daily exercise which rendered it a habit of his nature. Want never appeared before him without exciting a sympathetic emotion in his heart, which never rested until he had administered every comfort in the power of wealth to bestow. His compassion and his purse were the substance and shadow of each other. The poor of his country thronged from every part of the kingdom to receive pity and relief at his hands.

With these houseless wanderers he peopled the new villages his grandfather had erected in the midst of lands which in former times were the haunts of wild beasts. Thaddeus participated in the happiness of his grateful tenants; and many were the old men whose eyes he had closed in thankfulness and peace. These honest peasants, even in their dying moments, wished to give up that life in his arms which he had rescued from misery. He visited their cottage: he smoothed their pillow; he joined in their prayers: and when their last sigh came to his ear, he raised the weeping family from the dust, and cheered them with pious exhortations, and his kindest assurances of protection. How often has the countess clasped her beloved son to her breast, when after a scene like this he had returned home, the tears of the dying man and his children yet wet upon his hand! how often has she strained him to her heart, while floods of rapture have poured from her own eyes! Heir to the first fortune in Poland, he scarcely knew the means by which he bestowed all these benefits; and with a soul as bounteous to others as Heaven had been munificent to him, wherever he moved he shed smiles and gifts around him. How frequently has he said to the palatine, when his carriage-wheels were chased by the thankful multitude, "O, my father! how can I ever be sufficiently grateful to God, for the happiness He hath allotted to me, in making me the dispenser of so many blessings! The gratitude of these people overpowers and humbles me in my own eyes; what have I done to be so eminently favored of Heaven? I tremble when I ask myself the question."—"You may tremble, my dear boy," replied his grandfather, "for indeed the trial is a severe one: prosperity, like adversity, is an ordeal of conduct. Two roads are before the rich man; vanity of virtue; you have chosen the latter, and the best: and may Heaven ever hold you in it! May Heaven ever keep your heart generous and pure! Go on, my dear Thaddeus, as you have commenced; and you will find that your Creator hath bestowed wealth upon you not for what you have done, but as the means of evincing how well you would prove yourself His faithful steward."

This was the fortune of Thaddeus; and now, he who had scattered thousands without counting them, drew back his hand with something like horror at his own injustice when he was going to give away one little piece of silver—which he might want in a day or two to defray some indispensable debt.

"Mrs. Robson," said he, as he replaced his cap upon his head, "I shall return before it is dark."

"Very well, sir;" and opening the door, he went out into the lane.

Ignorant of the town, and thanking Providence for having prepared him an asylum, he directed his course toward Charing Cross. He looked about him with deepened sadness; the wet and plashy state of the streets gave to every object so comfortless an appearance he could scarcely believe himself to be in that London of which he had read with so much delight. Where were the magnificent buildings he expected to see in the emporium of the world? Where that cleanliness, and those tokens of greatness and splendor, which had been the admiration and boast of travelers? He could nowhere discover them; all seemed parts of a dark, gloomy, mean-looking city.

Hardly heeding whither he went, he approached the Horse-Guards; a view of the Park, as it appeared through the wide porch, promised him less unpleasantness than the dirty pavement, and he turned in taking his way along the Bird-Cage Walk.*

* The young readers of these few preceding pages will not recognize this description of St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross, and St. James's Park in 1794, in what they now see there in 1831. St. Martin's noble church was then

The trees, stripped of their leaves, stood naked, and dripping with melted snow. The season was in unison with the count's fate. He was taking the bitter wind for his repast, and quenched his thirst with the rain that fell on his pale and feverish lip: he felt the cutting blast enter his breast; and shutting his eyelids to repel the tears which were rising from his heart, he walked faster; but in spite of himself, their drops mingled with the wet that trickled from his cap upon his face. One melancholy thought introduced another, until his agitated soul lived over again, in memory, every calamity which had reduced him from happiness to misery. Two or three heavy convulsive sighs followed these reflections; and quickening his pace, he walked once or twice quite round the Park. The rain ceased. Hardly observing the people who passed, he threw himself down upon one of the chairs, and sat in a musing posture, with his eyes fixed on the opposite tree.

A sound of voices approaching, roused him; turning his eyes, he saw the speakers were two young men, and by their dress, he judged they must belong to the regiment of the sentinel who was patrolling at the end of the Mall.

“By Heavens, Berrington,” cried one, “it is the best shaped boot I ever beheld! I have a good mind to ask him whether it be English make.”

“And if it be,” replied the other, “you must ask him who made his legs, that you may send yours to be mended.”

“Who the devil can see my legs through that boot?”

“Oh, if to hide them be your reason, pray ask him immediately.”

the center of the east side of a long, narrow, and somewhat dirty lane of mean houses, particularly in the end below the church. Charing Cross, with the adjoining streets, showed nothing better than plain tradesmen's shops; and it was not till we saw the Admiralty, and entered the Horse-Guards, that any thing presented itself worthy the great name of London. The Park is almost completely altered.

“And so I will, for I think the boot perfection.”

At these words, he was making toward Sobieski with two or three long strides, when his companion pulled him back.

“Surely, Harwold, you will not be so ridiculous? He appears to be a foreigner of rank; and may take offense, and give you the length of his foot!”

“Curse him and his rank too; he is some paltry emigrant, I warrant! I care nothing about his foot or his legs, but I will know who made his boots!”

As he spoke, he would have dragged his companion along with him, but Berrington broke from his arm; and the fool, who now thought himself dared to it, strode up close to the chair, and bowed to Thaddeus, who (hardly crediting that he could be the subject of this dialogue) returned the salutation with a cold bend of his head.

Harwold looked a little confounded at this haughty demeanor; and once in his life blushing at his own insolence, he roared out, as in defiance of shame—

“Pray, sir, where did you get your boots?”

“Where I got my sword, sir,” replied Thaddeus, calmly; and, rising from his seat, he darted his eyes disdainfully on the coxcomb, and walked slowly down the Mall. Surprised and shocked at such behavior in a British officer, as he moved away he distinctly heard Berrington laughing aloud, and ridiculing the astonishment, and set-down air, of his impudent associate.

This incident did not so much ruffle the temper of Thaddeus as it amazed and perplexed him.

“Is this a specimen,” thought he, “of a nation which on the Continent is venerated for courage, manliness, and generosity? Well, I find I have much to learn. I must go through the ills of life, to estimate myself thoroughly; and I must study mankind in themselves, and not in their history, to have a true knowledge of what they are.”

This strange rencontre was of service to him, by diverting his mind from the intense contemplation of his situation; and as the dusk drew on, he turned his steps toward the Hummums.

On entering the coffee-room he was met by the obsequious Jenkins; who, being told by Thaddeus that he wanted his baggage and a carriage, went for the things himself, and sent a boy for a coach.

A man dressed in black was standing by the chimney, and seemed to be eyeing Thaddeus, as he walked up and down, with great attention. Just as he had taken another turn, and drew near him, the stranger accosted him rather abruptly—

“Pray, sir, are there any news stirring abroad? you seem, sir, to be come from abroad.”

“None, that I know of, sir.”

“Bless me, that’s strange. I thought, sir, you came from abroad, sir; from the Continent, from Poland, sir? at least the waiter said so, sir.”

Thaddeus colored: “The waiter, sir?”

“I mean, sir,” continued the gentleman, visibly confused at the dilemma into which he had brought himself, “the waiter said that you were a count, sir; a Polish count; indeed, the Count Sobieski! Hence I concluded that you are from Poland. If I have offended, I beg pardon, sir; but in these times we are anxious for every intelligence.”

Thaddeus made no other reply than a slight inclination of his head; and walking forward to see whether the coach were arrived, he thought—whatever travelers had related of the English—they were the most impertinent people in the world.

The stranger would not be contented with what he had already said, but plucking up new courage, pursued the count to the glass door through which he was looking, and resumed.

“I believe, sir, I am not wrong? you are the Count Sobieski; and I have the honor to be now speaking with the bravest champion of Polish liberty!"

Thaddeus again bowed; "I thank you, sir, for the compliment you intend me, but I can not take it to myself; all the men of Poland, old and young, nobles and peasants, were her champions, equally sincere, equally brave."

Nothing could silence the inquisitive stranger: the coach drew up, but he went on.

"Then I hope that many of these patriots, besides your excellency, have taken care to bring away their wealth from a land which is now abandoned to destruction?"

For a moment Thaddeus forgot himself in his country; and all her rights, and all her sufferings, rose in his countenance.

"No, sir! Not one of those men; and least of all, would I have drawn one vital drop from her heart! I left in her bosom all that was dear to me; all that I possessed; and not until I saw the chains brought before my eyes, that were to lay her in irons, did I turn my back on calamities I could no longer avert or alleviate."

The ardor of his manner, and the elevation of his voice, had drawn the attention of every person in the room upon him, when Jenkins entered with his baggage. The door being opened, Sobieski got into the coach, and gladly hastened from a conversation which had awakened all his griefs.

"Ah, poor enthusiast!" exclaimed his inquisitor, as the carriage drove off: "it is a pity that so fine a young man should have made so ill a use of his birth, and other advantages!"

"He appears to me," observed an old clergyman who sat in an adjoining box, "to have made the best possible use of his natural advantages; and had I a son, I would rather hear him utter such a sentiment as that with which he quitted the room, than see him master of millions."

“May be so,” cried the questioner, with a disdainful glance, “‘different minds incline to different objects!’ His has decided for ‘the wonderful, the wild;’ and a pretty end he has made of his choice!”

“Why, to be sure,” observed another spectator, “young people should be brought up with reasonable ideas of right and wrong, and prudence: nevertheless, I should not like a son of mine to run harum-scarum through my property, and his own life; and yet one can not help, when one hears such a brave speech, as that from yon Frenchman, just gone out—I say, one can not help thinking it very fine.”

“True, true,” cried the inquisitor, “you are right, sir; very fine, indeed, but too fine to wear; it would soon leave us naked as it has done him; for it seems by his own confession, he is penniless; and I know a twelvemonth ago, he was heir to a fortune which, however incalculable, he has managed with all his talents to see the end of.”

“Then he is in distress!” exclaimed the clergyman, “and you know him: what is his name?”

The man colored at this unexpected inference; and glad the company had not attended to the part of the dialogue in which the name of Sobieski was mentioned—he stammered some indistinct words, took up his hat, and looking at his watch, begged pardon, having an appointment;—and hurried out of the room without speaking further; although the good clergyman, whose name was Blackmore, hastened after him, requesting to know where the young foreigner lived.

“Who is that coxcomb?” cried the disconcerted doctor, as he returned from his unavailing application.

“I don’t know, sir,” replied the waiter: “I never saw him in this house before last night, when he came in late to sleep; and this morning he was in the coffee-room at breakfast, just as that foreign gentleman walked through; and Jenkins bawling his name out very loud, as soon as he was gone, this here gentleman asked him who that count was. I heard Jenkins say some Russian name; and tell him he came last night, and likely would come back again; and so that there gentleman has been loitering about all day till now, when the foreign gentleman coming in, he spoke to him."

"And don't you know any thing further of this foreigner?"

"No, sir; I forget what he is called;—but I see Jenkins going across the street; shall I run after him and ask him?"

"You are very obliging," returned the old man; "but does Jenkins know where the stranger lives?"

"No, sir; I am sure he don't."

"I am sorry for it," sighed the kind questioner: "then your inquiry would be of no use; his name will not do without his direction. Poor fellow! He has been unfortunate, and I might have befriended him."

"Yes, to be sure, doctor," said the first speaker, who now rose to accompany him out: "it is our duty to befriend the unfortunate; but charity begins at home; and as all's for the best, perhaps it is lucky we did not hear any more about this young fellow. We might have involved ourselves into a vast deal of unnecessary trouble; and you know people from outlandish parts have no claims upon us."

"Certainly," replied the doctor, "none in the world, excepting those which no human creature can dispute—the claims of nature. All mankind are born heirs of suffering; and as joint inheritors, if we do not wipe away each other's tears, it will prove but a comfortless portion."

"Ah! doctor," cried his companion, as they separated at the end of Charles-street, "you have always the best of the argument: you have logic and Aristotle at your finger ends."

"No, my friend; my arguments are purely Christian. Nature is my logic, and the Bible my teacher."

"Ah, there you have me again. You parsons are as bad as the lawyers; when once you get a poor sinner among you, he finds it as hard to get out of the Church as out of the chancery. However, have it your way; charity is your trade, and I won't be in a hurry to dispute the monopoly. Good day. If I stay much longer you'll make me believe that black is white."

Dr. Blackmore shook him by the hand, and wishing him a good-evening, returned home, pitying the worldliness of his friend's mind, and musing on the interesting stranger whom he admired and compassionated with a lively sorrow, for he believed him to be virtuous, unhappy, and unfortunate. Had he known that the object of his solicitude was the illustrious subject of many a former eulogium from himself, how increased would have been his regret;—that he had seen the Count Sobieski; that he had seen him in distress; and that he had suffered him to pass out of the reach of his services!

CHAPTER XIII.

THE Count Sobieski was cordially received by his worthy landlady; indeed, he never stood in more need of kindness. A slow fever, which had been gradually creeping over him since he quitted Poland, settled on his nerves; and reduced him to such weakness that he possessed neither strength nor spirits to stir abroad.

Mrs. Robson was greatly distressed at the illness of her guest; her own son, the father of the orphans she protected, had died of a consumption; and any appearance of that cruel disorder was a certain call upon her compassion.

Thaddeus gave himself up to her management; he had no money for medical assistance; and, to please her, he took what little medicines she prepared. According to her advice, he remained for several days shut up in his chamber, with a large fire, and the shutters closed, to exclude the smallest portion of that air which the good woman thought had already stricken him with death.

But all would not do; her patient became worse and worse. Frightened at the symptoms, Mrs. Robson begged leave to send for the apothecary who had attended her deceased son. In this instance only she found the count obstinate: no arguments, nor even her tears, could move him. When she stood weeping, and holding his burning hand, his answer was constantly the same.

“My excellent Mrs. Robson, do not grieve on my account; I am not in the danger you think; I shall do very well with your assistance.”

“No, no; I see death in your eyes. Can I feel this hand, and see that hectic cheek, without beholding your grave, as it were, opening before me?”

She was not much mistaken; for during the night after this debate Thaddeus grew so delirious that, no longer able to subdue her terrors, she sent for the apothecary to come instantly to her house.

“Oh! doctor,” cried she, as he ascended the stairs, “I have the best young gentleman ever the sun shone on dying in that room! He would not let me send for you; and now he is raving like a mad creature.”

Mr. Vincent entered the count's humble apartment, and undrew the curtains of the bed. Exhausted by delirium. Thaddeus had sunk senseless on the pillow. At this sight, supposing him dead, Mrs. Robson uttered a shriek, which was echoed by the cries of the little William, who stood near his grandmother.

“Hush, my good woman,” said the doctor, “the gentleman is not dead; leave the room till you have recovered yourself and I will engage that you shall see him alive when you return.”

Considering his words as oracles, she quitted the room with her grandson.

On entering the chamber, Mr. Vincent had felt that the hot and stifling state of the room must augment the fever of his patient; and, before he attempted to disturb him from the temporary rest of insensibility, he opened the window-shutters, unclosed the room-door wide enough to admit the air from the adjoining apartment; and pulling the heavy clothes from the count's bosom, raised his head on his arm, and poured some drops into his mouth. Sobieski opened his eyes, and uttered a few incoherent words: but he did not rave, he only wandered; and appeared to know that he did so; for he several times stopped in the midst of some confused speech, and laying his hand on his forehead, strove to recollect himself.

Mrs. Robson soon after entered the room, and poured out her thanks to the apothecary, whom she revered as almost a worker of miracles.

“I must bleed him, Mrs. Robson,” continued he; “and for that purpose shall go home for my assistant and lancets; but, in the mean while, I charge you to let every thing remain in the state I have left it. The heat alone would have given a fever to a man in health.”

When the apothecary returned he saw that his commands had been strictly obeyed; and finding that the change of atmosphere had wrought some alteration in his patient, he took his arm without any difficulty and bled him. At the end of the operation Thaddeus again fainted.

“Poor gentleman!” cried Mr. Vincent, binding up the arm: “look here, Tom,” pointing to the scars on the count's shoulder and breast; see what terrible cuts have been here! This has not been playing at soldiers! Who is your lodger, Mrs. Robson?”

“His name is Constantine, Mr. Vincent; but, for Heaven’s sake, recover him from that swoon.”

Mr. Vincent poured more drops into his mouth; and a minute afterward he opened his eyes, divested of their feverish glare, but still dull and heavy. He spoke to Mrs. Robson by her name; which gave her such delight that she caught his hand to her lips, and burst into tears. The action was so instantaneous and violent that it made him feel the stiffness of his arm; and, casting his eyes toward the surgeons, he conjectured what had been his state, and what the consequence.

“Come, Mrs. Robson,” said the apothecary, “you must not disturb the gentleman. How do you find yourself, sir?”

As the deed could not be recalled, Thaddeus thanked the doctor for the service he had received; and said a few kind and grateful words to his good hostess.

Mr. Vincent was glad to see so promising an issue to his proceedings, and soon after retired with his assistant and Mrs. Robson, to give further directions.

On entering the kitchen she threw herself into a chair, and broke into a paroxysm of lamentations.

“My good woman, what is all this about?” inquired the doctor. “Is not my patient better?”

“Yes,” cried she, drying her eyes; “but the whole scene puts me so in mind of the last moments of my poor, misguided son, that the very sight of it goes through my heart like a knife. Oh! had my boy been as good as that dear gentleman, had he been as well prepared to die, I think I would scarcely have grieved! Yet Heaven spare Mr. Constantine. Will he live?”

“I hope so, Mrs. Robson; his fever is high; but he is young, and with extreme care we may preserve him.”

“The Lord grant it!” cried she, “for he is the best gentleman I ever beheld. He has been above a week with no; and till this night, in which he has lost his senses, though hardly able to breathe or see, he has read out of books which he brought with him; and good books too; for it was but yesterday morning that I saw the dear soul sitting by the fire with a book on the table, which he had been studying for an hour: as I was dusting about I saw him lay his head down on it, and put his hand to his temples. ‘Alas! sir,’ said I, ‘you tease your brains with these books of learning, when you ought to be taking rest.’ ‘No, Mrs. Robson,’ returned he, with a sweet smile, ‘it is this book which affords me rest—I may amuse myself with others; but this alone contains perfect beauty, perfect wisdom, and perfect peace. It is the only infallible soother of human sorrows.’ He closed it and put it on the chimney-piece; and when I looked at it afterward I found it was the Scriptures. Can you wonder that I should love so excellent a gentleman?”

“You have given a strange account of him,” replied Vincent: “I hope he is not a Methodist; if so, I shall despair of his cure, and think his delirium had another cause besides fever.”

“A Methodist! No, sir, he is a Christian; and as good a reasonable sweet-tempered gentleman as ever came into a house. Alas! I believe he is more like a papist; though they say papists don’t read the Bible, but worship images.”

“Why, what reason have you to suppose that? He’s an Englishman, is he not?”

“No, he is an emigrant!”

“An emigrant! Oh! ho!” cried Vincent, with a discontented and contemptuous raise of his eyebrows; “what, a poor Frenchman! Good Lord, how this town is overrun with these fellows!”

“No, doctor,” exclaimed Mrs. Robson, much hurt at this affront to her lodger, whom she really loved, “whatever he be, he is not poor, for he has a power of fine things. he has got a watch all over diamonds, and diamond rings, and diamond pictures without number. So, doctor, you need not fear you are attending him for charity; no, I will sell my gown first."

"Nay, don't be offended, Mrs. Robson! I meant no offense," returned he, much mollified by this explanation; "but really, when we see the bread that should feed our children, and our own poor, eaten up by a parcel of lazy French drones, who cover our land and destroy its produce like a swarm of filthy locusts, we should be fools not to murmur. But Mr. —, Mr. —, what do you call him, Mrs. Robson? is a different sort of a body."

"Mr. Constantine," replied she, "and indeed he is; and no doubt, when you recover him, he will pay you as though he were in his own country."

This last assertion banished all remaining suspicion from the apothecary; and, after giving the good woman what orders he thought requisite, he returned home, promising to call in the evening.

Mrs. Robson went up stairs to the count's chamber, with other sentiments toward her sapient doctor than those with which she came down. She well recollected the substance of his discourse; and she gathered from it, that however clever he might be in his profession, he was a hard-hearted man, who would rather see a fellow-creature perish than administer relief to him without a reward.

But here Mrs. Robson was mistaken. She did him justice in esteeming his medical abilities, which were great: he had made medicine the study of his life; and, not allowing any other occupation to disturb his attention, he became master of that science, but remained ignorant of every other with which it had no connection. He was the father of a family; and, in the usual acceptation of the term, a very good sort of a man; he preferred his country to every other because it was his country: he loved his wife and his children: he was kind to the poor, to whom he gave his advice gratis, and letters to the dispensary for drugs; and when he had any broken victuals to spare he desired that it might be divided among them; but he seldom caught his maid obeying this part of his commands without reprimanding her for her extravagance in giving away what ought to be eaten in the kitchen:—"in these times it was a shame to waste a crumb; and the careless hussy would come to want for thinking so lightly of other people's property."

Thus, like many in the world, he was a loyal citizen by habit, and affectionate father from nature, and a man of charity because he now and then felt pity, and now and then heard it preached from the pulpit. He was exhorted to be pious, and to pour wine and oil into the wounds of his neighbor; but it never once struck him that piety extended further than going to church, mumbling his prayers, and forgetting the sermon, through most of which he generally slept: and his commentaries on the Good Samaritan were not more extensive; for it was so difficult to make him comprehend who was his neighbor, that the object of the argument might have been sick, dead, and buried before he could be persuaded that he had any claims on his care. Indeed, his "charity began at home;" and it was so fond of its residence that "it stopped there." To have been born on the other side of the British Channel spread an ocean between the poor foreigner and Mr. Vincent's purse which the swiftest wings of charity could never cross. "He saw no reason," he said, "for feeding the natural enemies of our country. Would any man be mad enough to take the meat from his children's mouths and throw it to a swarm of wolves just landed on the coast?" These wolves were his favorite metaphors when he spoke of the unhappy French, or of any other penniless foreigners that came in his way.

After this explanation it will appear paradoxical to mention an inconsistency in the mind of Mr. Vincent which never permitted him to discover the above Cainish mark of outlawry upon the wealthy stranger of whatever country. In fact, it was with him as with many : riches were a splendid and thick robe that concealed all blemishes ; take it away, and probably the poor stripped wretch would be treated worse than a criminal.

That his new patient possessed some property was sufficient to insure the respect and medical skill of Mr. Vincent ; and when he entered his own house he told his wife he had found “a very good job at Mrs. Robson’s in the illness of her lodger.”

When the Count Sobieski quitted the Hummums on the evening in which he brought away his baggage, he was so disconcerted by the impertinence of the man who accosted him there that he determined not to expose himself to a similar insult by retaining a title which might subject him to the curiosity of the insolent and insensible ; and, therefore, when Mrs. Robson asked him how she should address him, as he was averse to assume a feigned name, he merely said Mr. Constantine.

Under that unobtrusive character he hoped, in time, to accommodate his feelings to the change of fortune which Providence had allotted to him. He must forget his nobility, his pride, and his sensibility ; he must earn his subsistence. But by what means ? He was ignorant of business ; and he knew not how to turn his accomplishments to account. Such were his meditations until illness and delirium deprived him of them and reason together.

At the expiration of a week, in which Mr. Vincent attended his patient very regularly, Sobieski was able to remove into the front room ; but uneasiness about the debts he had so unintentionally incurred retarded his recovery ; and made his hours pass away in cheerless meditation on the means of repaying the good widow, and of satisfying the avidity of the apothecary. Pecuniary obligation was a load to which he was unaccustomed; and once or twice the wish almost escaped his heart that he had died.

Whenever he was left to think, such were his reflections. Mrs. Robson discovered that he appeared more feverish and had worse nights after being much alone during the day, and therefore contrived, though she was obliged to be in her little shop, to leave either Nanny to attend his wants, or little William to amuse him.

This child, by its uncommon quickness and artless manner, gained upon the count, who was ever alive to helplessness and innocence. Children and animals had always found a friend and protector in him. From the "majestic war-horse, with his neck clothed in thunder," to "the poor beetle that we tread upon;" every creature of creation met an advocate of mercy in his breast: and as human nature is prone to love what it has been kind to, Thaddeus never saw either children, dogs, or even that poor slandered and abused animal, the cat, without showing them some spontaneous act of attention.

Whatever of his affection he could spare from memory the count lavished upon the little William. He hardly ever left his side, where he sat on a stool prattling about any thing that came into his head; or, seated on his knee, followed with his eyes and playful fingers the hand of Thaddeus as he sketched a horse or a soldier for his pretty companion.

CHAPTER XIV.

By these means Thaddeus slowly acquired sufficient strength to allow him to quit his dressing-gown, and prepare for a walk.

A hard frost succeeded to the chilling damps of November; and looking out of the window he longed, almost eagerly, again to inhale the fresh air. After some tender altercations with Mrs. Robson, who feared to trust him even down stairs, he at length conquered; and taking the little William in his hand, folded his pelisse round him; and promising to venture no further than the King's-mews, was suffered to go out.

As he expected, he found the keen breeze act like a charm on his debilitated frame; and with braced nerves and exhilarated spirits he walked twice up and down the place, while his companion played before him, throwing stones and running to pick them up. At this moment one of the king's carriages, pursued by a concourse of people, suddenly drove in at the Charing-Cross gate. The frightened child screamed and fell. Thaddeus darted forward, and seizing the heads of the horses, which were within a yard of the boy, stopped them; meanwhile the mob gathered about, one of them raised William, who continued his cries. The count now let go the reins, and for a few minutes tried to pacify his little charge; but finding that his alarm and shrieks were not to be quelled, and that his own figure, from its singularity of dress (his high cap and feathers adding to his height) drew on him the whole attention of the people, he took the trembling child in his arms; and walking through the mews, was followed by some of the bystanders to the very door of Mrs. Robson's shop.

Seeing the people, and her grandson sobbing on the breast of her guest, she ran out, and hastily asked what had happened. Thaddeus simply answered that the child had been frightened. But when they entered the house and he had thrown himself exhausted on a seat, William, as he stood by his knee, told his grandmother that if Mr. Constantine had not stopped the horses he must have been run over. The count was now obliged to relate the whole story; which ended with the blessings of the poor woman, for his goodness in risking his own life for the preservation of her darling child.

Thaddeus in vain assured her the action deserved no thanks.

“Well,” cried she, “it is like yourself, Mr. Constantine you think all your good deeds nothing; and yet any little odd thing that I can do out of pure love to serve you, you cry up to the skies. However, we won’t fall out; I say, Heaven bless you, and that is enough!—Has your walk refreshed you? But I need not ask; you have got a fine color.”

“Yes,” returned he, rising and taking off his cap and cloak, “it has put me in a glow, and made me quite another creature.” As he finished speaking, he dropped the things from the hand that held them, and staggered back a few paces against the wall.

“Good Lord! what is the matter?” cried Mrs. Robson, looking in his face which was now as pale as death: “what is the matter?”

“Nothing, nothing,” returned he, recovering himself, and gathering up the cloak he had let fall; “don’t mind me, Mrs. Robson; nothing:” and he was leaving the kitchen, but she followed him, terrified at his look and manner.

“Pray, Mr. Constantine!”

“Nay, my dear madam,” said he, leading her back, “I am not well; I believe my walk has overcome me. Let me be a few minutes alone, till I have recovered myself. It will oblige me.”

“Well, sir, as you please!” and then, laying her withered hand fearfully upon his arm, "forgive me, dear sir," said she, "if my attentions are troublesome. Indeed, I fear that sometimes great love appears like great impertinence; I would always be serving you, and therefore I often forget the wide difference between your honor's station and mine."

The count could only press her hand gratefully, and with an emotion that made him hurry up stairs. When in his own room, he shut the door, and cast a wild and inquisitive gaze around the apartment; then throwing himself into a chair, he struck his head with his hand, and exclaimed, "It is gone! What will become of me?—of this poor woman, whose substance I have consumed?"

It was true, the watch, by the sale of which he had calculated to defray the charges of his illness, was indeed lost. A villain in the crowd, having perceived the sparkling of the chain, had taken it unobserved from his side; and he knew nothing of his loss until feeling for his watch to see the hour, he discovered his misfortune.

The shock went like a stroke of electricity through his frame; but it was not until the last glimmering of hope was extinguished, on examining his room where he thought he might have left it, that he saw the full horror of his situation.

He sat for some minutes, absorbed, and almost afraid to think. It was not his own, but the necessities of the poor woman, who had, perhaps, incurred debts on herself to afford him comforts, which bore so hard upon him. At last, rising from his seat, he exclaimed,

"I must determine on something. Since this is gone, I must seek what else I have to part with, for I can not long bear my present feelings!"

He opened the drawer which contained his few valuables.

With a trembling hand he took them out one by one. There were several trinkets which had been given to him by his mother; and a pair of inlaid pistols, which his grandfather put into his belt on the morning of the dreadful tenth of October; his miniature lay beneath them: the mild eyes of the palatine seemed beaming with affection upon his grandson. Thaddeus snatched it up, kissed it fervently, and then laid it back into the drawer, while he hid his face with his hands.

When he recovered himself he replaced the pistols, believing that it would be sacrilege to part with them. Without allowing himself time to think, he put a gold pencil-case and a pair of brilliant sleeve-buttons into his waistcoat-pocket.

He descended the stairs with a soft step, and passing the kitchen-door unperceived by his landlady, crossed through a little court; and then anxiously looking from right to left, to find any place in which he might probably dispose of the trinkets, he took his way up Castle street, and along Leicester square.

When he turned up the first street to the right, he was impeded by two persons who stood in his path, the one selling, the other buying a hat. The thought immediately struck Thaddeus of asking one of these men (who appeared to be a Jew and a vender of clothes) to purchase his pelisse. By parting with a thing to which he annexed no more value than the warmth it afforded him, he should possibly spare himself the pain, for this time at least, of sacrificing those gifts of his mother which had been bestowed upon him in happier days, and hallowed by her caresses.

He did not permit himself to hesitate, but desired the Jew to follow him into a neighboring court. The man obeyed; and having no ideas independent of his trade, asked the count what he wanted to buy?

“Nothing: I want to sell this pelisse,” returned he, opening it. The Jew, without any ceremony, inspected the covering and the fur.

“Ay, I see it is black cloth, lined with sable; but who would buy it of me? It is embroidered, and nobody wears such things here."

"Then I am answered," replied Thaddeus.

"Stop, sir" cried the Jew, pursuing him, "what will you take for it?"

"What would you give me?"

"Let me see. It is very long and wide. At the utmost I can not offer you more than five guineas."

A few months ago it had cost the count a hundred; but glad to get any money, however small, he readily closed with the man's price; and, taking off the cloak, gave it to him, and put the guineas into his pocket.

He had not walked much further before the piercing cold of the evening, and a shower of snow which began to fall, made him feel the effects of his loss; however that did not annoy him; he had been too heavily assailed by the pitiless rigors of misfortune to regard the pelting of the elements. While the wind blew in his face, and the sleet falling on his dress, lodged in its embroidered lappels, he went forward, calculating whether it were likely that this money, with the few shillings he yet possessed, would be sufficient to discharge what he owed. Unused as he had been to all kinds of expenditure which required attention, he supposed from what he had already seen of a commerce with the world, that the sum he had received from the Jew was not above half what he wanted; and with a beating heart he walked toward one of those shops which Mrs. Robson had described when speaking of the irregularities of her son, who had nearly reduced her to beggary.

The candles were lit. And, as he hovered about the door, he distinctly saw the master through the glass, assorting some parcels on the counter. He was a gentleman-like man, and the count's feelings took quite a different turn from those with which he had accosted the Jew, who, being a low sordid wretch, looked upon the people with whom he trafficked as pieces of wood. Thaddeus felt little repugnance at bargaining with him: but the sight of a respectable person, before whom he was to present himself as a man in poverty, as one who in a manner appealed to charity, all at once overcame the resolution of Sobieski, and he debated whether or not he should return. Mrs. Robson, and her probable distresses, rose before him; and, fearful of trusting his pride any further, he pulled his cap over his face, and entered the shop.

The man bowed very civilly on his entrance, and requested to be honored with his commands. Thaddeus felt his face glow; but indignant at his own weakness, he laid the gold case on the counter, and said, in a voice which, notwithstanding his emotion, he constrained to be without appearance of confusion, "I want to part with this."

Astonished at the dignity of his air, and the nobility of his dress, for the star did not escape the shopkeeper's eye; he looked at him for a moment, holding the case in his hand. Hurt by the steadiness of his gaze, the count rather haughtily repeated what he had said. The man hesitated no longer. He had been accustomed to similar requests from the emigrant French noblesse: but there was a loftiness, and an air of authority in the countenance and mien of this person, which surprised and awed him; and with a respect which even the application could not counteract, he opened the case, and inquired of Thaddeus what was the price he affixed to it.

"I leave that to you," replied he.

"The gold is solid," returned the man, "but it is very thin; I can not give more than three guineas. Though the workmanship is fine, it is not in the fashion of England, and will be of no benefit to me till it is melted.

"You may have it," said Thaddeus, hardly able to articulate, as he saw the gift of his mother pass into a stranger's hand.

The man directly paid him down the money, and the count with a bursting heart darted out of the shop.

Mrs. Robson was shutting up the windows of her little parlor, when he hastily passed her, and glided up the stairs. Hardly believing her senses, she hastened after him, and just got into the room as he drank off a glass of water.

“Good Lord, sir,” cried she, “where has your honor been? I thought you were all the while in the house, and I would not come near, though I was very uneasy; and there has been poor William crying himself blind, because you desired to be left alone.”

Thaddeus was unprepared to make an answer. He was in hopes to have gotten in as he had stolen out, undiscovered; for he determined not to agitate her good mind by the history of his loss. He would not allow her to know any thing of his embarrassments, from a sentiment of justice, as well as from that pride which all his sufferings and philosophy could not wholly subdue.

“I have been taking a walk, Mrs. Robson.”

“Dear heart! I thought when you staggered back, and looked so ill, after you brought in William, you had overwalked yourself!”

“No; I fancy my fears had a little discomposed me; and I hoped that more air might do me good; I tried it, and it has; but I am grieved for having alarmed you.”

This ambiguous speech satisfied his kind landlady; and, fatigued by a bodily exertion, which, in the present feeble state of his frame, nothing less than the perturbation of his mind could have carried him through, Thaddeus went directly to bed; where tired nature soon found temporary repose in a profound sleep.

CHAPTER XV.

NEXT morning Sobieski found himself rather better than worse by the exertions of the preceding day. When Nanny appeared as usual with his breakfast, and little William (who always sat on his knee, and shared his bread and butter), he desired her to request her grandmother to send to Mr. Vincent with his compliments, and to tell him he was so well at present as to decline any further medical aid, and therefore wished to have his bill.

Mrs. Robson, who could not forget the behavior of the apothecary, undertook to deliver the message herself, happy in the triumphs she should enjoy over the littleness of Mr. Vincent's suspicions.

After the lapse of a quarter of an hour, she reappeared in the count's rooms with the apothecary's assistant; who, with many thanks, received the sum total of his account, which amounted to three guineas for ten days' attendance.

The man having withdrawn, Thaddeus told Mrs. Robson he should next defray the smallest part of the vast debt he must ever owe to her parental care.

"O, bless your honor, it goes to my heart to take a farthing of you! but these poor children," cried she, laying a hand on each, and her eyes glistening, "they look up to me as their all here; and my quarter-day was yesterday, else, dear sir, I should scorn to be like Doctor Vincent, and take your money the moment you offer it."

"My good madam," returned Sobieski, giving her a chair, "I am sensible of your kindness, but it is your just due; and the payment of it can never lessen my gratitude for the friendship which you have shown to me, a poor stranger."

"Then there, sir," said she, looking almost as ashamed as if she were robbing him, when she laid it on the table; "there is my bill. I have regularly set down every thing. Nanny will bring it to me." And quite disconcerted, the good woman hurried out of the room.

Thaddeus looked after her with admiration and reverence.

"There goes," thought he, "in that lowly and feeble frame as generous and noble a spirit as ever animated the breast of a princess! Here Nanny," said he, glancing his eye over the paper, "there is the gold, with my thanks; and tell your grandmother I am astonished at her economy."

This affair over, the count was relieved of a grievous load; and turning the remaining money in his hand, how he might replenish the little stock before it were expended next occupied his attention. Notwithstanding the pawnbroker's civil treatment, he recoiled at again presenting himself at his shop. Besides, should he dispose of all that he possessed, it would not be of sufficient value to subsist him for a month. He must think of some source within himself that was not likely to be so soon exhausted. To be reduced a second time to the misery which he had endured yesterday from suspense and wretchedness, appeared too dreadful to be hazarded, and he ran over in his memory the different merits of his several accomplishments.

He could not make any use of his musical talents; for at public exhibitions of himself his soul revolted; and as to his literary acquirements, his youth, and being a foreigner, precluded all hopes on that head. At length he found that his sole dependence must rest on his talents for painting. Of this art he had always been remarkably fond; and his taste easily perceived that there were many drawings exhibited for sale much inferior to those which he had executed for mere amusement.

He decided at once; and purchasing, by the means of Nanny, pencils and Indian ink, he set to work.

When he had finished half a dozen drawings, and was considering how he might find the street in which he had seen the print-shops, the recollection occurred to him of the impression his appearance had made on the pawnbroker. He perceived the wide difference between his apparel and the fashion of England; and seeing with what security from impertinence he might walk about, could he so far cast off the relics of his former rank as to change his dress, he got up with an intention to go out and purchase a surtout coat and hat for that purpose; but catching an accidental view of his figure and the star of St. Stanislaus, as he passed the glass to the door, he no longer wondered at the curiosity which such an appendage, united with poverty, had attracted. Rather than again subject himself to a similar situation, he summoned his young messenger, and, by her assistance, furnished himself with an English hat and coat, while, with his penknife, he cut away the embroidery of the order from the cloth to which it was affixed.

Thus accoutered, with his hat flapped over his face, and his great coat wrapped round him, he put his drawings into his bosom, and about eight o'clock walked out on his disagreeable errand. After some wearying search, he at last found Great Newport street, the place he wanted; but as he advanced his hopes died away, and his fears and reluctance awakened.

He stopped at the door of the nearest print-shop. All that he had suffered at the pawnbroker's reassailed him with redoubled violence. What he presented there possessed a fixed value, and was at once to be taken or refused; but now he was going to offer things of mere taste, and he might meet not only with a denial but affronting remarks.

He walked to the threshold of the door, then as hastily withdrew, and hurried two or three paces down the street.

“Weak, contemptible that I am!” said he to himself, as he again turned round; “where is all my reason and rectitude of principle, that I would rather endure the misery of dependence and self-reproach than dare the attempt to seek support from the fruits of my own industry?"

He quickened his step, and started into the shop, almost fearful of his former irresolution. He threw his drawings instantly upon the counter.

"Sir, you purchase drawings. I have these to sell. Will they suit you?"

The man took them up without deigning to look at the person who accosted him, and turning them over in his hand, "One, two, three, hum! there is half a dozen. What do you expect for them?"

"I am not acquainted with the prices of these things."

The printseller, hearing this, thought, by managing well, to get them for what he liked, and throwing them over with an air of contempt, resumed—

"And, pray, where may the views be taken?"

"They are recollections of scenes in Germany."

"Ah," replied the man, "mere drugs! I wish, honest friend, you could have brought subjects not quite so threadbare, and a little better executed; they are but poor things! But every dauber, now-a-days, sets up for a fine artist; and thinks we are to pay him for idleness and conceit."

Insulted by this speech, and above all by the manner of the printseller, Thaddeus was snatching up the drawings to leave the shop without a word, when the man observing his design, and afraid to lose them, laid his hand on the heap, exclaiming—

"Let me tell you, young man, it does not become a person in your situation to be so huffy to their employers. I will give you a guinea for the six, and you may think yourself well paid."

Without further hesitation, while the count was striving to subdue the choler which urged him to knock him down, the man laid the gold on the counter, and was slipping the drawings into a drawer ; but Thaddeus snatching them out again, suddenly rolled them up, and walked out of the shop as he said—

“Not all the money, of all your tribe, would tempt an honest man to pollute himself by exchanging a second word with one so contemptible.”

Irritated at this unfeeling treatment, he returned home too much provoked to think of the consequences which might follow a similar disappointment.

Having become used to the fluctuations of his looks and behavior, the widow ceased altogether to tease him with inquiries she saw he was loath to answer. She now allowed him to walk in and out without a remark ; and silently contemplated his pale and melancholy countenance, when after a ramble of the greatest part of the day, he returned home exhausted and dispirited.

William was always the first to welcome his friend at the threshold, by running to him, taking hold of his coat, and asking to go with him up stairs. The count usually gratified him, and brightened many dull hours with his innocent caresses.

This child was literally his only earthly comfort ; for he saw that in him he could still excite those emotions of happiness which had once afforded him his sweetest joy. William ever greeted him with smiles ; and when he entered the kitchen, sprang to his bosom, as if that were the seat of peace, as it was of virtue. But, alas ! fate seemed averse to lend any thing long to the unhappy Thaddeus, which might render his desolate state more tolerable.

Just risen from the bed of sickness, he required the hand of some tender nurse to restore his wasted vigor, instead of being reduced to the hard vigils of poverty and want. His recent disappointment, added to a cold which he caught, increased his fever and debility ; yet he adhered to the determination not to appropriate to his own subsistence the few valables he had assigned as a deposit for the charges of his rent. During a fortnight he never tasted any thing better than bread and water; but this hermit's fare was accompanied by the thought that if it ended in death, his sufferings would then be over; and the widow amply remunerated by what little of his property remained.

In this state of body and mind he received a most painful shock, when one evening returning from a walk of many hours in the place of his little favorite, he met Mrs. Robson in tears at the door. She told him William had been sickening all the day, and was now so delirious that neither she nor his sister could hold him quiet.

Thaddeus went to the side of the child's bed, where he lay gasping on the pillow, held down by the crying Nanny. The count touched his cheek.

"Poor child," exclaimed he, "he is in a high fever. Have you sent for Mr. Vincent?"

"O, no; I had not the heart to leave him."

"Then I will go directly," returned Thaddeus; "there is not a moment to be lost."

The poor woman thanked him. Hastening through the streets with an eagerness which nearly overset several of the foot passengers, he arrived at Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; and in less than five minutes after he had quitted Mrs. Robson's door, he returned with the apothecary.

On Mr. Vincent's examining the pulse and countenance of his little patient, he declared the symptoms to be the small-pox, which some casualty had repelled.

In a paroxysm of distress, Mrs. Robson recollected that a girl had been brought into her shop three days ago, just recovered from that frightful malady.

Thaddeus tried to subdue the fears of the grandmother; and at last succeeded in persuading her to go to bed, while he and Nanny would watch by the pillow of the invalid.

Toward morning the disorder broke out in the child's face, and he recovered his recollection. The moment he fixed his eyes on the count, who was leaning over him, he stretched out his little arms, and begged to lie on his breast. Thaddeus refused him gently, fearing that by any change of position he might catch cold, and so again retard what had now so fortunately appeared; but the poor child thought the denial unkind, and began to weep so violently that his anxious friend believed it better to gratify him than hazard the irritation of his fever by agitation and crying.

Thaddeus took him out of bed, and rolling him in one of the blankets, laid him in his bosom; and drawing his dressing-gown to shield his little face from the fire, held him in that situation asleep for nearly two hours.

When Mrs. Robson came down stairs at six o'clock in the morning, she kissed the hand of the count as he sustained her grandson in his arms; and, almost speechless with gratitude to him, and solicitude for the child, waited the arrival of the apothecary.

On his second visit he said a few words to her of comfort; but whispered to the count, as he was feeling William's pulse, that nothing short of the strictest care could save the boy, the infection he had received having been of the most malignant kind.

These words fell like an unrepealable sentence on the heart of Thaddeus. Looking on the discolored features of the patient infant, he fancied that he already beheld its clay-cold face, and its little limbs stretched in death. The idea was bitterness to him; and pressing the boy to his breast, he resolved that no attention should be wanting on his part to preserve him from the grave. And he kept his promise.

From that hour until the day in which the poor babe expired in his arms, he never laid him out of them for ten minutes together: and when he did breathe his last sigh, and raised up his little eyes, Thaddeus met their dying glance with a pang which he thought his soul had long lost the power to feel. His heart seemed to stop; and covering the motionless face of the dead child with his hand, he made a sign to Nanny to leave the room.

The girl, who from respect had been accustomed to obey his slightest nod, went to her grandmother in the shop.

The instant the girl left the room, with mingled awe and grief the count lifted the little corpse from his knee; and without allowing himself to cast another glance on the face of the poor infant now released from suffering, he put it on the bed, and throwing a sheet over it, sunk into a chair and burst into tears.

The entrance of Mrs. Robson in some measure restored him; for the moment she perceived her guest with his handkerchief over his eyes she judged what had happened, and with a piercing scream flew forward to the bed, where pulling down the covering, she uttered another shriek, and must have fallen on the floor had not Thaddeus and little Nanny, who ran in at her cries, caught her in their arms and bore her to a chair.

Her soul was too much agitated to allow her to continue long in a state of insensibility; and when she recovered, she would again have approached the deceased child, but the count withheld her, and trying by every means in his power to soothe her, so far succeeded as to melt her agonies into tears.

While she concealed her venerable head in the bosom of her granddaughter, he once more lifted the remains of the little William; and thinking it best for the tranquillity of the unhappy grandmother to take him out of her sight, carried him up stairs and laid him on his own bed.

By the time he returned to the humble parlor, one of the female neighbors having heard an unusual outcry, and suspecting the cause, kindly stepped in to offer her consolation and services. Mrs. Robson could only reply by sobs, which were answered by the loud weeping of poor Nanny, who lay with her head against the table.

When the count came down he thanked the good woman for her benevolent intentions, and took her up stairs into his apartments. Pointing to the open door of the bed-room, "There, madam," said he, "you will find the remains of my dear little friend. I beg you will direct every thing for his interment, as you think will give satisfaction to Mrs. Robson, I would spare that excellent woman every pang in my power."

All was done according to his desire; and Mrs. Watts, the charitable neighbor, excited by a good disposition and reverence for "the extraordinary young gentleman who lodged with her friend," performed her task with kindness and activity.

"Oh! sir," cried Mrs. Robson, weeping afresh as she entered the count's room, "Oh! sir, how shall I ever repay all your goodness?—and Mrs. Watts? She has acted like a sister to me. But, indeed, indeed, I am yet the most miserable woman that lives. I have lost my dearest child, and must strip his poor sister and myself to bury him. That cruel Dr. Vincent, though he might have imagined my distress, sent his account last night saying he wanted to make up a large bill, and he wished I would let him have all or part of the payment. Heaven knows I have not a farthing in the house; but I will send poor little Nanny to pawn my silver spoons; for, alas! I have no other means of satisfying the cruel man."

"Rapacious wretch!" cried Thaddeus, rising indignantly from his chair, and for a moment forgetting how incapable he was to afford relief: "you shall not be indebted one instant to his mercy. I will pay him."

The words had passed his lips : he could not retract, though conviction immediately followed that he had not the means ; and he would not have retracted even should he be necessitated to part with every thing he most valued.

Mrs. Robson was overwhelmed by this generous promise, which indeed saved her from ruin. Had her little plate been pledged, it could not have covered one half of Mr. Vincent's demand, who, to do him justice, did not mean to cause any distress. But having been so readily paid by Thaddeus for his own illness, and observing his great care and affection for the deceased child, he did not doubt that rather than allow Mrs. Robson a minute's uneasiness, her lodger would defray his bill. So far he calculated right ; but he had not sufficient sagacity to foresee that in getting his money this way, he should lose the future business of Mrs. Robson and her friend.

The child was to be buried on the morrow ; the expenses of which event, Thaddeus saw he must discharge also ; and he had engaged to pay Mr. Vincent that night. He had not a shilling in his purse. Over and over he contemplated the impracticability of answering these debts ; yet he could not for an instant repent of what he had undertaken : he thought he was amply recompensed for bearing so heavy a load in knowing that he had taken it off the worn-down heart of another.

CHAPTER XVI.

SINCE the count's unmannerly treatment at the printsellers he had not sufficiently conquered his pride to attempt an application to another. Therefore, he had no prospect of collecting the money he had pledged himself to Mrs. Robson to pay, but by selling some more of his valuables to the pawnbroker.

For this purpose he took his saber, his pistols, and the fated brilliants he had brought back on a similar errand. He drew them from their deposit with less reluctance than before. They were now going to be devoted to gratitude and benevolence; an act which his parents, were they alive, would warmly approve; and here he allowed the end to sanctify the means.

About half after six in the evening he prepared himself for his task. Whether it be congenial with melancholy to seek the gloom, or whether the count found himself less observed under the shades of night, is not evident; but since his exile, he preferred the dusk to any other part of the day.

Before he went out, he asked Mrs. Robson for Mr. Vincent's bill. Sinking with obligation and shame, she put it into his hand, and he left the house. When he approached a lighted lamp he opened the paper to see the amount, and finding it was almost two pounds, he hastened forward to the pawnbroker's.

The man was in the shop alone. Thaddeus thought himself fortunate, and after subduing a few qualms, entered the door. The moment he laid his sword and pistols on the counter, and declared his wish, the man, even through the disguise of a large coat and slouched hat, recollected him.— This honest money-lender carried sentiments in his breast above his occupation. He did not commiserate all who presented themselves before him, because many exhibited too evidently the excesses which brought them to his shop. But there was something in the figure and manner of the Count Sobieski which struck him at first sight; and by continuing to possess his thoughts, excited such an interest in his mind as to produce pleasure when he discerned the noble foreigner in the person before him.

Mr. Burket (for so this money-lender was called) asked him what he demanded for the arms.

“Perhaps more than you would give. But I have something else here,” laying down the diamonds; “I want eight guineas.”

Mr. Burket looked at them and then at their owner, hesitated, and then spoke.

“I beg your pardon, sir; I hope I shall not offend you, but these things appear to have a value independent of their price—they are inlaid with crests and ciphers.”

The blood flushed over the cheeks of the count. He had forgotten this circumstance—unable to answer, he waited to hear what the man would say further.

“I repeat sir, I mean not to offend; but you appear a stranger to these transactions. I only wish to suggest that in case you should ever like to repossess these things, had you not better pledge them?”

“How?” asked Thaddeus, irresolutely, and not knowing what to think of the man’s manner.

At that instant some other people came into the shop; and Mr. Burket, gathering up the diamonds and the arms in his hands, said “If you do not object, sir, we will settle this business in my back parlor.”

The delicacy of this behavior penetrated the mind of Thaddeus; and without demurring, he followed him into a room. As Mr. Burket offered his guest a chair the count took off his hat and laid it on the table. Burket contemplated the saddened dignity of his countenance with renewed interest and respect; and entreating him to be seated, resumed the conversation.

“I see, sir, you do not understand the meaning of pledging or pawning, for it is one and the same thing; but I will explain it in two words. If you leave these things with me, I will give you a paper in acknowledgment, and lend on them the guineas you request; which, when you return to me with a stated interest, you shall have your deposit in exchange."

Sobieski received this offer with pleasure and thanks. He had entertained no idea of any thing more being meant by the trade of a pawnbroker than a man who bought what others wished to sell.

"Then, sir," continued Burket, opening an escrutoire, "I will give you the money, and write the paper I spoke of."

As he put his hand to a drawer, he heard voices in an adjoining passage; and instantly shutting the desk, caught up the things on the table, threw them behind a curtain, and nastily taking the count by the hand, "My dear sir," cried he, "do oblige me, and step into that closet! you will find a chair. A person is coming, whom I will dispatch in a few seconds."

Thaddeus, rather surprised at such hurry, did as he was desired; and the door was closed on him just as the parlor door opened. Being aware, from such concealment, that the visitor came on secret business, he found his situation not a little awkward. Seated behind a curtained window, which the lights in the room made transparent, he could not avoid seeing, as well as hearing, every thing that passed.

"My dear Mr. Burket," cried an elegant young creature, who ran into the apartment, "positively without your assistance I shall be undone."

"Any thing in my power, madam," returned Mr. Burket, with a distant, respectful voice: "will your ladyship sit down?"

"Yes; give me a chair: I am half dead with distraction Mr. Burket, I must have another hundred upon those jewels."

"Indeed, my lady, it is not in my power; you have already had twelve hundred; and, upon my honor, that is a hundred and fifty more than I ought to have given."

“Pooh, who minds the honor of a pawnbroker!” cried the lady, laughing: “you know very well you live by cheating.”

“Well, ma’am,” returned he, with a good-natured smile, “as your ladyship pleases.”

“Then I please that you let me have another hundred. Why, man, you know you lent Mrs. Hinchinbroke two thousand upon a case of diamonds not a quarter so many as mine.”

“But consider, madam, Mrs. Hinchinbroke’s were of the best water.”

“Positively, Mr. Burnet,” exclaimed her ladyship, purposely miscalling his name, “not better than mine! The King of Sardinia gave them to Sir Charles when he knighted him. I know mine are the best, and I must have another hundred. Upon my life, my servants have not had a guinea of board wages these four months, and they tell me they are starving. Come, make haste, Mr. Burnet, you can not expect me to stay here all night; give me the money.”

“Indeed, my lady, I can not.”

“Heavens, what a brute of a man you are! There,” cried she, taking a string of pearls from her neck and throwing it on the table, “lend me some of your trumpery out of your shop, for I am going immediately from hence to take up the Misses Dundas to the play; and so give me the hundred on that, and let me go.”

“This is not worth a hundred.”

“What a teasing man you are!” cried her ladyship, angrily. “Well, let me have the money now, and I will send you the bracelets which belong to the necklace to-morrow.”

“Upon those conditions I will give your ladyship another hundred.”

“Oh, do; you are the veriest miser I ever met with. You are worse than Shylock, or—Good Lord! what is this?” exclaimed she, interrupting herself, and taking up the draft he had laid before her; “and have you the conscience to think,

Mr. Pawnbroker, that I will offer this at your banker's? that I will expose myself so far? No, no; take it back, and give me gold. Come, dispatch! else I can not go to the play. Look, there is my purse," added she, showing it, "make haste and fill it."

After satisfying her demands, Mr. Burket handed her ladyship out the way she came in, which was by a private passage and, having seated her in her carriage, made his bow.

Meanwhile the Count Sobieski, wrapped in astonishment at the profligacy which the scene he had witnessed implied, remained in concealment until the pawnbroker returned and opened the closet-door.

"Sir," said he, coloring, "you have, undesignedly on your part, been privy to a very delicate affair; but my credit, sir, and your honor—"

"Shall both be sacred," replied the count, anxious to relieve the poor man from his perplexity, and forbearing to express surprise: but Burket perceived it in his look; and before he proceeded to fulfill his engagement with him, stepped half way to the escrutoire, and resumed.

"You appear amazed, sir, at what you have seen. And, if I am not mistaken, you are from abroad?"

"Indeed I am amazed," replied Sobieski; "and I am from a country where the slightest suspicion of a transaction such as this would brand the woman with infamy."

"And so it ought," answered Burket: "though by that assertion I speak against my own interest; for it is by such as Lady Villiers we make our money. Now, sir," continued he, drawing nearer to the table, "perhaps, after what you have just beheld you will not hesitate to credit what I am going to tell you. I have now in my hands the jewels of one duchess, of three countesses, and of women of fashion without number. When these ladies have an ill run at play they apply to me in their exigences: they bring their diamonds here, and, as their occasions require, on this deposit I lend them money; for which they make me a handsome present when the jewels are released."

'You astonish me!' exclaimed Thaddeus. "What a degrading system of deceit must govern the lives of these women."

"It is very lamentable," returned Burket, "but so it is. And they continue to manage matters very cleverly. By giving me their note or word of honor (for if these ladies are not honorable with me I know by what hints to keep them in order), I allow them to have the jewels out for the birth-days, and receive them again when their exhibition is over. As a compensation for these little indulgences, I expect considerable additions to the present at the end."

Thaddeus could hardly believe such a history of those women whom travelers mentioned as not only the most lovely, but the most amiable creatures in the world."

"Surely, Mr. Burket," cried he, "these ladies must despise each other, and become contemptible even to our sex."

"Oh, no," rejoined the pawnbroker, "they seldom trust each other in these affairs. All my fair customers are not so silly as that pretty little lady who just now left us. She and another woman of quality have made each other confidants in this business. And, Lord have mercy upon me, when they come together! They are as ravenous of my money as if it had no other use but to supply them. As to their husbands, brothers and fathers, they are usually the last people who suspect or hear of these matters: their applications, when they run out, are made to Jews and professed usurers, a race completely out of our line."

"But are all English women of quality of this disgraceful stamp?"

"No; Heaven forbid!" cried Burket: "if these female spendthrifts were not held in awe by the dread of superior characters we could have no dependence on their promises. Oh, no ; there are ladies about the court whose virtues are as eminent as their rank ; women whose actions might all be performed in mid-day before the world ; and them I never see within my doors."

"Well, Mr. Burket," rejoined Thaddeus, smiling, "I am glad to hear that. Yet I can not forget the unexpected view of the so famous British fair which this night has offered to my eyes. It is strange!"

"It is very bad, indeed, sir," returned the man, giving him the money and the paper he had been preparing ; "but if you should have occasion to call again upon me, perhaps you may be astonished still further."

The count bowed ; and, thanking him for his kindness, wished him a good evening, and left the shop.*

It was about seven o'clock when Thaddeus arrived at the apothecary's. Mr. Vincent was from home. To say the truth, he had purposely gone out of the way. For though he did not hesitate to commit a shabby action, he wanted courage to face its consequence ; and to avoid the probable remonstrances of Mrs. Robson he commissioned his assistant to receive the amount of the bill. Without making an observation the count paid the man ; and was returning homeward along Duke street and the piazzas of Drury-lane Theater, when the crowd pressing round the doors constrained him to stop.

After two or three ineffectual attempts to get through the bustle, he retreated a little behind the mob at the moment when a chariot drew up, and a gentleman stepping out with two ladies, darted with them into the house. One glance was sufficient for Sobieski, who recognized his friend Pembroke Somerset, in full dress, gay, and laughing. The heart of

* The whole of this scene at the pawnbroker's is too true : the writer knows it from an eye and ear witness.

Thaddeus sprang to him at the sight; and forgetting his neglect, and his own misfortunes he ejaculated--

“Somerset!”

Trembling with eagerness and pleasure he pressed through the crowd, and entered the passage at the instant a green door within shut upon his friend.

His disappointment was dreadful. To be so near Somerset and to lose him was more than he could sustain. His bounding heart recoiled; and the chill of despair running through his veins turned him faint. Leaning against the door he took his hat off to give himself air. He scarcely had stood a minute in this situation revolving whether he should follow his friend into the house or wait until he came out again, when a gentleman begged him to make way for a party of ladies that were entering. Thaddeus moved on one side; but the opening of the green door casting a strong light both on his face and the group behind, his eyes and those of the impertinent inquisitor of the Hummums met each other.

Whether the man were conscious that he deserved chastisement for his former insolence, and dreaded to meet it now, can not be explained; but he turned pale, and shuffled by Thaddeus as if he were fearful to trust himself within reach of his grasp. For the count, he was too deeply interested in his own pursuit to waste one surmise upon him.

He continued to muse on the sight of Pembroke Somerset, which had conjured up ten thousand fond and distressing recollections; and, with impatient anxiety, determining to watch till the performance was over, he thought of inquiring his friend's address of the servants; but on looking round for that purpose he perceived the chariot had driven away.

Thus foiled, he returned to his post near the green door; which was opened at intervals by footmen passing and repassing. Seeing the chamber within was a lobby, in which it would be less likely he should miss his object than if he stood without, he entered with the next person that approached; and, finding seats along the sides, sat down on the one nearest to the stairs.

His first idea was to proceed into the play-house. But he considered the little chance of discovering any particular individual in so vast a building as not equal to the expense he must incur. Besides, from the dress of the gentlemen who entered the box-door, he was sensible his great coat and hat were not admissible.

Having remained above an hour with his eyes invariably fixed on the stairs, he observed that same curious person who had passed almost directly after his friend, come down the steps and walk out. In two minutes he was returning with a smirking countenance, when his eyes accidentally falling on the count (who sat with his arms folded, and almost hidden by the shadow of the wall), he faltered in his walk; and stretching out his neck toward him, the gay grin left his features; and exclaiming in an impatient voice, "Confound him!" he hastened once more into the house.

This rencontre with his Hummums' acquaintance affected Thaddeus as slightly as the former; and, without annexing even a thought to his figure as it flitted by him, he remained watching in the passage until half after eleven. At that hour the doors were thrown open, and the company began to pour forth.

The count's hopes were again on his lips and in his eyes. With the first party who came down the steps he rose; and planting himself close to the bottom stair drew his hat over his face, and narrowly examined each group as it descended. Every set that approached made his heart palpitate: how often did it rise and fall during the long succession which continued moving for near half an hour!

By twelve the house was cleared. He saw the middle door locked; and, motionless with disappointment, did not attempt to stir, until the man who held the keys told him to go, as he was about to fasten the other doors.

This roused Thaddeus; and as he was preparing to obey he asked the man if there were any other passage from the boxes.

“Yes,” cried he, “there is one into Drury lane.”

“Then, by that I have lost him!” was the reply which he made to himself. And returning homeward he arrived there a few minutes after twelve.

CHAPTER XVII.

THADDEUS awoke in the morning with his heart full of the last night's rencontre. One moment he regretted that he had not been seen by his friend. In the next, when he surveyed his altered state, he was almost reconciled to the disappointment. Then reproaching himself for a pride so unbecoming his principles and dishonorable to friendship, he asked if he were in Somerset's place, and Somerset in his, whether he could ever pardon the morose delicacy which prevented the communication of his friend's misfortunes and arrival in the same kingdom with himself?

These reflections soon persuaded his judgment to what he was so much inclined, determining him to inquire Pembroke's address of every one likely to know a man of Sir Robert Somerset's consequence; and then to venture a letter.

In the midst of these meditations the door opened, and Mrs. Robson appeared, drowned in tears.

“My dear, dear sir!” cried she, “my William is going; I have just taken a last look of his sweet face. Will you go down and say farewell to the poor child you loved so dearly?”

“No, my good madam,” returned Thaddeus, his straying thoughts at once gathering round this mournful center; “I will rather retain you here until the melancholy task be entirely accomplished.”

With a gentle violence he forced her upon a seat, and in silence supported her head on his breast, against which she unconsciously leaned and wept. He listened with a depressed heart to the removal of the coffin; and at the closing of the street door, which forever shut the little William from that house in which he had been the source of its greatest pleasure, a tear trickled down the cheek of Thaddeus; and the sobbings of the poor grandmother were audible.

The count, incapable of speaking, pressed her hand in his.

“O, Mr. Constantine!” cried she, “see how my supports, one after the other, are taken from me! first my son, and now his infant! To what shall I be reduced?”

“You have still, my good Mrs. Robson, a friend in Heaven who will supply the place of all you have lost on earth.”

“True, dear sir! I am a wicked creature to speak as I have done; but it is hard to suffer: it is hard to lose all we loved in the world!”

“It is,” returned the count, greatly affected by her grief. “But God, who is perfect wisdom, as well as perfect love, chooseth rather to profit us than to please us in His dispensations. Our sweet William has gained by our loss; he is blest in heaven, while we weakly lament him on earth. Besides, you are not yet deprived of all; you have a granddaughter.”

“Ah! poor little thing! what will become of her when I die? I used to think what a precious brother my darling boy would prove to his sister when I should be no more!”

This additional image augmented the affliction of the good old woman; and Thaddeus, looking on her with affectionate compassion, exclaimed—

“Mrs. Robson, the same Almighty Being that protected ne, the last of my family, will protect the orphan offspring of so excellent a woman as you are.”

Mrs. Robson lifted up her head for a moment. She had never before heard him utter a sentence of his own history; and what he now said, added to the tender solemnity of his manner, for an instant arrested her attention. He went on:

“In me you see a man, who, within the short space of three months, has lost a grandfather that loved him as fondly as you did your William; a mother whom he saw expire before him, and whose sacred remains he was forced to leave in the hands of her murderers! Yes, Mrs. Robson, I have neither parents nor a home. I was a stranger and you took me in; and Heaven will reward your family in kind. At least I promise, that while I live, whatever be my fate, should you be called hence, I will protect your granddaughter with a brother’s care.”

“May heaven in its mercy bless you!” cried Mrs. Robson, dropping on her knees. Thaddeus raised her with gushing eyes; and, having replaced her in a seat, left the room to recover himself.

According to the count’s desire, Mrs. Watts called in the evening with an estimate of the expenses attending the child’s interment. Fees and every charge collected, the demand on his benevolence was six pounds. The sum proved rather more than he expected, but he paid it without a demur, leaving himself only a few shillings.

He considered what he had done as the fulfillment of a duty so indispensable that it must have been accomplished even by the sacrifice of his uttermost farthing. Gratitude and distress held claims upon him which he never allowed his own necessities to transgress. All gifts of mere generosity were beyond his power, and consequently in a short time beyond his wish; but to the cry of want and wretchedness his hand and heart were ever open. Often has he given away to a starving child in the street that pittance which was to purchase his own hard meal; and he never felt such neglect of himself a privation. To have turned his eyes and ears from the little mendicant would have been the hardest struggle; and the remembrance of such inhumanity would have haunted him on his pillow. This being the disposition of the Count Sobieski, he found it more difficult to bear calamity, when viewing another's poverty he could not relieve, than when assailed himself by penury in all its other shapes of desolation.

Toward night the idea of Somerset again presented itself. When he fell asleep, his dreams repeated the scene at the play-house; again he saw him, and again he eluded his grasp.

His waking thoughts were not less true to their object; and the next morning he went to a coffee-house in the lane, where he called for breakfast, and inquired of the master if he knew the residence of Sir Robert Somerset. The question was no sooner asked than it was answered to his satisfaction. The Court Guide was examined, and he found this address: "Sir Robert Somerset, Bart. Grosvenor-square. Somerset Castle, L——shire, —— Deerhurst, C——shire."

Gladdened by the discovery, Thaddeus hastened home, and unwilling to affect his friend by a sudden appearance, with an overflowing heart he wrote the following letter:—

"TO PEMBROKE SOMERSET, ESQ., GROSVENOR-SQUARE.

"DEAR SOMERSET,

"Will the name at the bottom of this paper surprise you? Will it give you pleasure? I can not suffer myself to retain a doubt, although the silence of two years would almost convince me I am forgotten. In truth, Somerset, I had resolved never to obtrude myself and my misfortunes on your knowledge, until last Wednesday night when I saw you going into Drury-lane Theater; the sight of you quelled all my resentment, and I called after you, but you did not hear. Pardon me, my dear friend, that I speak of resentment. It is hard to learn resignation to the forgetfulness of those we love.

“Notwithstanding that I lost the pocket-book which contained your direction, I wrote to you frequently, at a venture; and yet, though you knew in what spot in Poland you left Thaddeus and his family, I have never heard of you since the day of our separation. You must have some good reason for your silence; at least I hope so.

“Doubtless public report has afforded you some information relative to the destruction of my ever-beloved country! I bear its fate on myself. You will find me in a poor lodging at the bottom of St. Martin’s-lane. You will find me changed in every thing. The first horrors of grief have subsided; and my dearest consolation in the midst of my affliction rises out of its bitterest cause: I thank Heaven my revered grandfather and mother were taken from a consummation of ills which would have reduced them to a misery I am content to endure alone.

“Come to me, dear Somerset. To look on you, to press you in my arms, will be a happiness, which even in hope makes my heart throb with pleasure.

“I will remain at home all day to-morrow in the expectation of seeing you; meanwhile adieu, my dear Somerset: you will find at No. 5 St. Martin’s-lane, your very affectionate

“THADDEUS CONSTANTINE COUNT SOBIESKI.

“Friday noon.

“P. S. Inquire for me by the name of Mr. Constantine.”

With the most delightful emotions Thaddeus sealed this letter, and gave it to Nanny, with orders to inquire at the post-office when he might expect an answer. The child returned with information it would reach Grosvenor-square in an hour, and he could have a reply by three o’clock.

Three o’clock arrived, and no letter. Thaddeus counted the hours until midnight, but they brought him nothing but disappointment. The whole of the succeeding day wore away in the same uncomfortable manner. His heart bounded at every step in the passage; and throwing open his room-door, he listened to every person that spoke, but no voice bore any resemblance to that of Somerset.

Night again shut in; and overcome by a train of doubts, in which despondence held the greatest share, he threw himself on his bed though unable to close his eyes.

Whatever be our afflictions, not one human creature who has endured misfortune will hesitate to aver that of all the tortures incident to mortality there are none like the rackings of suspense. It is the hell which Milton describes with such horrible accuracy; in its hot and cold regions the anxious soul is alternately tossed from the ardors of hope to the petrifying rigors of doubt and dread. Men who have not been suspended between confidence and fear in their judgment of a beloved friend's faithfulness, are ignorant of "the nerve whence agonies are born." It is when sunk in sorrow; when adversity loads us with divers miseries; and our wretchedness is complete; it is then we are compelled to acknowledge—that though life is brief, there are few friendships which have strength to follow it to the end.

Such were the reflections of the Count Sobieski when he arose in the morning from his sleepless pillow. The idea that the letter might have been delayed afforded him a faint hope which he cherished all day, clinging to the expectation of seeing his friend before sunset. But Somerset did not appear; and obliged to seek an excuse for his absence in the supposition of his application having miscarried, Thaddeus determined to write once more, and to deliver the letter himself at his friend's door. Accordingly, with emotions different from those with which he had addressed him a few days before, he wrote these lines:—

“TO PEMBROKE SOMERSET, ESQ.

“If he, who once called Thaddeus Sobieski his friend, has received a letter which that exile addressed to him on Friday last, this note will meet the same neglect. But if this be the first intelligence that tells Somerset his friend is in town, perhaps he may overlook his friend’s change of fortune; he may visit him in his distress, who will receive him with open arms at his humble abode in St. Martin’s-lane.

“Sunday evening, No. 5 St. Martin’s-lane.”

Thaddeus having sealed the letter, walked out in search of Sir Robert Somerset’s habitation. After some inquiries, he found Grosvenor-square; and amid the darkness of the night, was directed to the house by the light of the lamps and the lusters which shone through the open windows. He hesitated a few minutes on the pavement, and looked up. An old gentleman was standing with a little boy at the nearest window. While the count’s eyes were fixed on these two figures, he saw Somerset himself come up to the child and lead it away toward a group of ladies.

Thaddeus immediately flew to the door with a tremor over his frame which communicated itself to the knocker, for he knocked with such violence that the door was opened in an instant by half a dozen footmen at once. He spoke to one.

“Is Mr. Pembroke Somerset at home?”

“Yes,” replied the man, who saw by his plain dress he could not be an invited guest; “but he is engaged with company.”

“I do not want to see him now,” rejoined the count; “only give him that letter, for it is of consequence.”

“Certainly, sir,” replied the servant; and Thaddeus instantly withdrew.

He now turned homeward, with his mind more than commonly depressed. There was a something in the whole affair which pierced him to the soul. He had seen the house that contained the man he most warmly loved, but he had not been admitted within it. He could not forbear recollecting that when his gates opened wide as his heart to welcome Pembroke Somerset, how he had been implored by his then grateful friend to bring the palatine and the countess to England, where his father would be proud to entertain them as the preservers of his son. How different from these professions did he find the reality! Instead of seeing the doors unclose to receive him, he was allowed to stand like a beggar on the threshold; and he heard them shut against him, while the form of Somerset glided above him, even as the shadow of his buried joys.

These discomfiting retrospections on the past, and painful meditations on the present, continued to occupy his mind, until passing over from Piccadilly to Coventry-street, he perceived a wretched-looking man, almost bent double, accosting a party of people in broken French, and imploring their charity.

The voice and the accent being Sclàvonian, arrested the ear of Thaddeus. Drawing close to the man, as the party proceeded without taking notice of his application, he hastily asked, "Are you a Polander?"

"Father of mercies!" cried the beggar, catching hold of his hand, "am I so blessed! have I at last met him?" and, bursting into tears, he leaned upon the arm of the count, who, hardly able to articulate with surprise, exclaimed—

"Dear, worthy Butzou! What a time is this for you and I to meet! But come, you must go home with me."

"Willingly, my dear lord," returned he; "for I have no home. I begged my way from Harwich to this town; and have already spent two dismal nights in the streets."

"O, my country!" cried the full heart of Thaddeus.

"Yes," continued the poor old soldier, "it received its death wound when Kosciusko and my honored master fell."

Thaddeus could not reply ; but, supporting the exhausted frame of his friend, who was hardly able to walk, after many pauses gladly descried his own door.

The widow opened it the moment he knocked ; and seeing some one with him, was retreating, when Thaddeus, who found from the silence of Butzou that he was faint, begged her to allow him to take his companion into the parlor. She instantly made way, and the count placed the now insensible old man in the arm-chair by the fire.

“He is my friend, my father’s friend!” cried Thaddeus, looking at his pale and haggard face, with a strange wildness in his own features ; “for heaven’s sake give me something to restore him !”

Mrs. Robson, in dismay, and literally having nothing better in the house, gave him a glass of water.

“That will not do,” exclaimed he, still upholding the motionless body on his arm ; “have you no wine ? nothing ? He is dying for want.”

“None, sir : I have none ;” answered she, frightened at the violence of his manner ; “run, Nanny, and borrow some of Mrs. Watts.”

“Do,” said Thaddeus ; “and bring me a bottle from the nearest inn.” As he spoke he threw her the only half guinea he possessed, and added, “Fly, for he may die in a moment.”

The child flew like lightning to the Golden Cross ; and brought the wine just as Butzou had opened his eyes, and was gazing at Thaddeus with a languid agony that penetrated his soul. Mrs. Robson held the water to his lips. He swallowed a little, and scarcely articulated, “I am perishing for want of food.”

Thaddeus caught the bottle from Nanny, and pouring some wine into a glass, made him drink it. This draught a little revived him. He raised himself in his seat ; and though still panting and speechless, leaned his swimming head upon the bosom of his friend, who knelt by his side, while Mrs. Robson was preparing some toasted bread and heated wine.

After much exertion between the good landlady and the count, they sufficiently recovered the poor invalid to enable him to walk up stairs and lie down on the bed. The drowsiness usually attendant on debility, aided by the fumes of the wine, threw him into an immediate and deep sleep.

Thaddeus, seeing him at rest, thought it proper to rejoin Mrs. Robson; and, by a partial history of his friend, acquaint her with the occasion of the foregoing scene. He found the good woman surprised and concerned, but no way displeased; and, in a few words, he gave her a summary explanation of the precipitancy with which, without her permission, he had introduced a stranger under her roof.

The substance of what he said related that the person up stairs had served with him in the army; and that, on the ruin of his country (which he could no longer conceal was Poland), he had come in quest of him to England, and in his journey had sustained misfortunes which had reduced him to the state she saw.

“I met him,” continued he, “as a beggar in the street; and while he lives I shall hold it my duty to protect him. I love him for his own sake, and I honor him for my grandfather’s. Besides, Mrs. Robson,” cried he, with additional energy, “before I left my country, I made a vow to my sovereign that wherever I should meet this brave old man, I would serve him to the last hour of his life. Therefore we must part no more. Will you give him shelter?” added he, in a subdued voice. “Will you allow me to retain him in my apartments?”

“Willingly, sir; but how can I accommodate him; he is already in your bed, and I have not one to spare?”

“Leave that to me, best, kindest of women!” exclaimed the count; “your permission has rendered me happy.”

He then wished her a good-night, and returning up stairs, wrapped himself in his dressing-gown, and passed the night by the little fire of the sitting-room.

CHAPTER XVIII.

OWING to comfortable refreshment and a night of undisturbed sleep, General Butzou awoke in the morning much recovered from the weakness which had subdued him the preceding day.

Thaddeus observed this change with pleasure. While he sat by his bed, ministering to him with the care of a son, he dwelt with a melancholy delight on his reverend features, and listened to his languid voice with those tender associations which are dear to the heart, though they pierce it with anguish.

“Tell me, my dear general,” said he, “for I can bear to hear it now; tell me what has befallen my unhappy country since I quitted it.”

“Every calamity,” cried the brave old man, shaking his head, “that tyranny could devise.”

“Well, go on,” returned the count, with a smile, which too truly declared the composure of his air was assumed; “we, who have beheld her sufferings and yet live, need not fear hearing them described! Did you see the king before he left Warsaw?”

“No,” replied Butzou, “our oppressors took care of that. While you, my lord, were recovering of your wounds in the citadel, I set off for Sachoryn to join Prince Poniatowski. In my way thither I met some soldiers, who informed me that his highness having been compelled to discharge the troops, was returning to support his brother under the indignities which the haughtiness of Suwarrow might premeditate. I then directed my steps toward Sandomir, where I hoped to find Dombrowski, with a few faithful followers; but here too I was disappointed. Two days before my arrival, that general, according to orders, had disbanded the whole party.* I now found that Poland was completely in the hands of her ravagers, and I prepared to return. I was shocked and agonized at every step I retrod. I beheld the shores of the Vistula lined on every side with Russian troops. Ten thousand were posted on her banks, and eighteen thousand among the ruins of Prague and Villanow.

“When I approached the walls of Warsaw, imagine, my dear count, how great was my indignation! How barbarous, how unmanly the conduct of our enemies! Batteries of cannon were erected around the city, to level it with the ground on the smallest murmur of discontent.

“On the morning of my arrival I was hastening to the palace to pay my duty to the king, when a Russian officer intercepted me, and threatened if I attempted to pass my obstinacy should be fatal to me, and hazardous to his majesty; whose confinement and sufferings were augmented in proportion to the adherents he retained among the Poles. Hearing this, I was turning away overwhelmed with grief, when the doors of the audience-chamber opened, and the Counts Potocki, Kilinski, and several others of your grandfather's dearest friends, were led forth under a guard. I was standing motionless with surprise when Potocki, perceiving me, held forth his hand. I took it, and wringing it, in the bitterness of my heart uttered some words which I can not remember, but the Russian bade me beware how I again gave way to such injurious remarks on his nation.

* Dombrowski withdrew into France, where he was soon joined by others of his brave countrymen; which little band, in process of time, by gradual accession of numbers, became what was afterward styled the celebrated Polish legion, in the army of Napoleon; at the head of which legion, the Prince Poniatowski, so often mentioned in these pages, lost his life in the fatal frontier river his dauntless courage dared to swim. His remains were taken to Cracow, and buried near to the tomb of John Sobieski.

“ ‘Farewell, my worthy general,’ said the count, ‘you see we are arrested. We loved Poland too faithfully for her enemies; and for that reason we are to be sent prisoners to Petersburg. Sharing the fate of Kosciusko, our chains are our distinction; such a collar of merit is the most glorious order which the imperial Catharine can bestow:—the knights of St. Stanislaus would reject all other from their hands.’— ‘Sir, I can not admit of this conversation,’ cried the officer of the guard; and commanding the escort to proceed, I lost sight of these illustrious patriots, probably forever.

“I understood from the few Poles who remained in the citadel that the good Stanislaus was to be sent on the same dismal errand to Grodno the next day. They also told me that Poland being no more you had torn yourself from its bleeding remains rather than behold the triumphant entry of its conqueror. This insulting pageant was performed on the 9th of November last. On the 8th, I believe, you left Warsaw for England.”

“Yes,” replied the count, who listened with a breaking heart to this distressing narrative; “and doubtless I saved myself much misery.”

“You did. One of the magistrates described to me the whole scene, at which I would not have been present for worlds. He told me that when the morning arrived in which Suwarrow was to make his public entrée, not a citizen would be seen that was not brought out by compulsion. A dead silence reigned in the streets; the doors and windows of every house remained so closed that a stranger might have supposed it to be a general mourning; and it was the bitterest which could have fallen upon our souls! At this moment, when Warsaw, I may say, lay dying at the feet of her conqueror, the Russian troops marched into the city, the only spectators of their own horrible tragedy. At length, with eyes which could no longer weep, the magistrates, reluctant, and full of indignation, proceeded to meet Suwarrow on the bridge of Prague. When they came near the procession, they presented the keys of Warsaw on their knees ——”

“On their knees!” interrupted Thaddeus, starting up, and the blood flushing over his face.

“Yes,” answered Butzou, “on their knees.”

“Almighty Justice!” exclaimed the count, pacing the room with emotion; “why did not the earth open and swallow them? Why did not the blood which saturated the spot whereon they knelt cry out to them? O Butzou, this humiliation of Poland is worse to me than all her miseries!”

“I felt as you feel, my lord,” continued the general; “and I expressed myself with the same resentment; but the magistrate who related to me the circumstance urged in excuse for himself and his brethren that such a form was necessary; and had they refused, probably their lives would have been forfeited.”

“Well,” inquired Thaddeus, resuming his seat, “but where was the king during this transaction?”

“In the castle; where he received orders to be present next day at a public thanksgiving, at which the inhabitants of Warsaw were also commanded to attend, to perform a Te Deum in gratitude for the destruction of their country. I thank Heaven that I was spared from witnessing this monstrous blasphemy; I was then at Sandomir. The day after I heard these horrid accounts I saw the carriage which contained the good Stanislaus guarded like a traitor’s out of the gates; and that very hour I left the city. I traveled toward Hamburg, where I took my passage to Harwich. Owing to excessive fatigue one of my old wounds broke out afresh; and continuing ill a week, I expended all my money. Reduced to my last shilling, and eager to find you, I begged my way from that town to this. I had already spent two miserable days and nights in the open air, with no other sustenance than the casual charity of passengers, when Heaven sent you, my beloved lord, to save me from perishing in the streets."

Butzou pressed the hand of his young friend as he concluded. Displeasure still kept its station on the count's features.

The good general observed it with satisfaction; well pleased that indignation at the supposed pusillanimity of his countrymen prevented those bursts of grief which he had expected from his sensitive nature, when he should be informed that ruined Poland was not only treated by its ravager as a slave, but loaded with the shackles and usage of a criminal.

Toward evening General Butzou fell asleep. Thaddeus, leaning back in his chair, fixed his eyes on the fire, and mused with amazement and sorrow on what had passed. When it was almost dark, and he was yet lost in reflection, Mrs. Robson, gently opened the door, and presenting a letter; "Here, sir," said she, "is a letter, which a servant has just left; he told me it required no answer."

Thaddeus sprung from his seat at sight of the paper, and almost catching it from her, his former gloomy cogitations dispersed before the hopes and fond emotions of friendship which now lit up in his bosom. Mrs. Robson withdrew. He looked at the superscription—it was the handwriting of his friend. Tearing it asunder, two folded papers presented themselves; he opened them, and they were his own letters, returned without a word. His beating heart was suddenly checked. Letting the papers fall from his hand, he dropped on a seat, and closed his eyes, as if he would shut them from the world and its ingratitude.

Unable to recover from astonishment, his thoughts whirled about in a succession of accusations, surmises, and doubts, which seemed for a few minutes to drive him to distraction.

“Was it really the hand of Somerset?”

Again he examined the envelop. It was; and the inclosures were his own letters, without one word of apology for such ingratitude.

“Could he make one? No,” replied Thaddeus to himself. “Unhappy that I am, to have been induced to apply twice to so despicable a man! Oh, Somerset,” cried he, looking at the papers as they lay before him, “was it necessary that insult should be added to unfaithfulness and ingratitude, to throw me off entirely? Good Heaven! did he think, because I wrote twice I would persecute him with applications? I have been told this of mankind, but that I should find it in him!”

In this way, agitated and muttering, and walking up and down the room, he spent another wakeful and cheerless night.

When he went down stairs next morning to beg Mrs. Robson to attend his friend until his return, she mentioned her uneasiness at having heard him most of the preceding night moving above her head. He was accounting to her for his restlessness by complaining of a headache, when she interrupted him by saying, “O no, sir; I am sure it is the hard boards you lie on, to accommodate the poor old gentleman. I am certain you will make yourself ill.”

Thaddeus thanked her for her solicitude: but declaring that all beds, hard or soft were alike to him, he left her; and, with his drawings in his pocket, once more took the path to Great Newport-street.

Indignation against his fickle friend, and anxiety for the tranquillity of General Butzou, whose age, infirmities, and sufferings, threatened a speedy termination of his life, determined the count to sacrifice all false delicacy and weakness; and to hazard another attempt at acquiring the means of affording those comforts to the sick veteran which his condition demanded. Happen how it would, he resolved that Butzou should never know the complete wreck of his property. He shuddered at loading him with the additional distress of thinking that he was a burden on his protector.

Thaddeus passed the door of the printseller who behaved so ill to him on his first application; and walking to the furthest shop on the same side, entered it; and laying his drawings on the counter, requested the master to look at them. The man opened the packet; and the count, dreading a second repulse, or even more than similar insolence, hastily added—

“They are scenes in Germany. If you like to have them their price is a guinea.”

“Are you the painter, sir?” asked the man.

“Yes, sir. Do they please you?”

“Yes,” answered the man, examining them nearer; “there is a breadth and freedom in the style which is novel, and may take. I will give you your demand.”

Rejoiced that he had succeeded where he entertained no hope, Thaddeus with a bow, was, leaving the shop, when the man called after him, “Sir! sir!”

He returned, prepared to hear some impertinent remark.

It is strange, but it is true, that those who have been thrust by misfortune to a state beneath their birth and expectations consider themselves the objects of universal hostility. They see contempt in every eye, they suppose insult in every word; the slightest neglect is sufficient to set the sensitive pride of the unfortunate in a blaze: and, alas! how little is this sensibility respected by the rich and gay in their dealings with the unhappy! To what an addition of misery are the wretched exposed; meeting not only those contumelies which the prosperous are not backward to bestow, but those fancied ills which, however unfounded, keep the mind in a feverish struggle with itself, and warfare with the surrounding world!

Repeated insults infused into the Count Sobieski much of this anticipating irritability; and it was with a very haughty step that he turned back to hear what the printseller meant to say.

“I only want to ask whether you follow this art as a profession?”

“Yes.”

“Then I shall be glad if you can furnish me with six such drawings every week.”

“Certainly,” replied Thaddeus, pleased with the probability of securing something toward the support of his friend.

“Then bring me another half dozen next Monday.”

Thaddeus promised, and with a relieved mind took his way homeward.

Who is there in England that does not remember the dreadful winter of 1794, when the whole country lay buried in a thick ice which seemed eternal? Over that ice, and through those snows, the venerable General Butzou begged his way from Harwich to London. He rested at night under the shelter of some shed or outhouse; and cooled his feverish thirst with a little water, taken from under the broken ice which locked up the springs. The effect of this was a painful rheumatism, which fixed itself in his limbs, and now rendered them nearly useless.

Two or three weeks passed over the heads of the general and his young protector: Thaddeus cheering the old man with his smiles; and he in return, imparting the only pleasure to him which his melancholy heart could receive—the conviction that his attentions and affection were productive of comfort.

In the exercise of these duties, the count not only found his health gradually recover its tone, but his mind became more tranquil, and less prone to those sudden floods of regret which were rapidly sapping his life. By a strict economy on his own part, he managed to pay the widow and support his friend out of the weekly profits of his drawings, which were now and then augmented by a commission to do one or two more than the stipulated number.

Thus, conversing with Butzou, reading to him when awake, or pursuing his drawings when he slept, Thaddeus spent the time until the beginning of March.

One fine starlight evening in that month, just before the frost broke up, after painting all day, he desired little Nanny to take care of the general; and leaving his work at the printseller's, he then proceeded through Piccadilly, intending to go as far as Hyde Park Corner, and return.

Pleased with the beauty of the night, he walked on, not remarking that he had passed the turnpike, until he heard a scream. The sound came from near the Park wall. He hurried along, and at a short distance perceived a delicate-looking woman struggling with a man, who was behaving in a very brutal manner.

Without a moment's hesitation, with one blow of his arm Thaddeus sent the fellow reeling against the wall. But while he supported the outraged person who was fainting, the man recovered himself and rushing on her champion, aimed a stroke at his head with an immense bludgeon, which the count catching hold of as it descended, wrenched out of his hand. The horrid oaths of the ruffian, and the hysterical sobs of the woman, collected a mob, when the villain, fearing worse usage, made off, and left Thaddeus to restore the terrified female at his leisure.

As soon as she was able to speak she thanked her deliverer in a voice and language that assured him it was no common person he had befriended. But, in the circumstance of her distress, all would have been the same to him: a helpless female was insulted; and whatever her rank might be, he thought she had an equal claim on his protection.

The mob dispersed; and finding the lady capable of walking, he begged permission to see her safe home.

“I thank you, sir,” replied she; “and I accept your offer with gratitude. Besides, after your generous interference, it is requisite I should account to you how a woman of my appearance came out at this hour without attendance. I have no other excuse to advance for such imprudence than that I have often done so with impunity. I have a friend, whose husband being in the Guards, lives near the barracks. We often drink tea with each other; sometimes my servants come for me; and sometimes when I am wearied and indisposed, I come away earlier, and alone. This happened to-night; and I have to thank your gallantry, sir, for my rescue from the first outrage of the kind which ever assailed me.”

By the time that a few more complimentary words on her side, and a modest reply from Thaddeus, had passed, they stopped before a house in Grosvenor-place.* The lady knocked at the door; and, as soon as it was opened, the count was taking his leave, but she laid her hand on his arm, and exclaimed,

“No, sir; I must not lose the opportunity of convincing you that you have not succored a person unworthy of your kindness. I entreat you to walk in!”

Thaddeus was too much pleased with her manner not to accept this invitation. He followed her up stairs into a drawing-room, where a young lady was seated at work.

* All this local scenery is changed. There is no turnpike gate now at the Hyde Park end of Piccadilly; neither is there a park wall: splendid railings occupy its place; and two superb triumphal arches, in the fashion of France, one leading into the park, and the other leading into—nothing! gorgeously fill the sites of the former plain, wayfaring, English turnpike lodges. We can not, however we may admire fine architecture, but find something appalling in novel splendors of the kind; for history has ever shown that nations are simplest while they are the greatest:—like beautiful women, who need no ornaments; but as vanity increases, and the natural charms wane, they put on decorations, to hide the decay, “to which complexion, alas! all must come at last.”

“Miss Egerton,” cried his conductress, “here is a gentleman who has this moment saved me from a ruffian. You must assist me to express my gratitude.”

“I would with all my heart,” returned she; “but your ladyship confers benefits so well you can not be at a loss how to receive them.”

Thaddeus took the chair which a servant set for him, and with mingled pleasure and admiration, turned his eyes on the lovely woman he had rescued. She threw off her cloak and vail, and displayed a figure and countenance full of dignity and interest.

She begged him to lay aside his great-coat, as she must insist upon his supping with her. There was a commanding softness in her manner, and a gentle yet unappealable decision in her voice he could not withstand; and he prepared to obey, although he was aware the fashion and richness of the military dress concealed under his coat would give her ideas of his situation it could not answer.

The lady did not notice his hesitation, but, ringing the bell, desired the servant to take the gentleman's hat and coat. Thaddeus instantly saw in the looks of both the ladies what he feared.

“I perceive,” said the elder, as she took her seat, “that my deliverer is in the army; yet I do not recollect having seen that uniform before.”

“I am not an Englishman,” returned he.

“Not an Englishman,” exclaimed Miss Egerton, “and speak the language so accurately! You can not be French?”

“No, madam; I had the honor of serving under the King of Poland.”

“Then, his was a very gallant court, I suppose,” rejoined Miss Egerton, with a smile; “for I am sorry to say there are few about St. James's who would have taken the trouble to do what you have done by Lady Tinemouth.”

He returned the young lady's smile. "I have seen too little, madam, of Englishmen of rank, to show any gallantry in defending this part of my sex against so fair an accuser." Indeed, he recollected the officers in the park, and the perfidy of Somerset, and thought he had no reason to give them more respect than their countrywoman.

"Come, come, Maria," cried Lady Tinemouth; "though no woman has less cause to speak well of mankind than I have, I will not permit my countrymen to be run down in toto. I dare say this gentleman will agree with me that it shows neither a candid nor a patriotic spirit."

"I dare say he will not agree with you, Lady Tinemouth. No gentleman yet, who had his wits about him, ever agreed with an elder lady against a younger. Now, gentleman! for it seems that is the name by which we are to address you, what do you say?"

Thaddeus almost laughed at the singular way she had chosen to ask his name; and allowing some of the gloom which generally obscured his fine eyes to disperse, he answered, with a smile,

"My name is Constantine."

"Well, you have replied to my last question first; but I will not let you off about my bearish countrymen. Don't you think, Mr. Constantine, I may call them so without any breach of good manners to them or duty to my country?—or you see her ladyship hangs much upon patriotism."

Lady Tinemouth shook her head.

"O Maria, Maria, you are a strange mad-cap."

"I don't care for that; I will have Mr. Constantine's unprejudiced reply. I am sure if he had taken as long a time in answering your call as he does mine, the ruffian might have killed and eaten you too before he moved to your assistance. Come, sir, may I not say they are bears, or growling mastiffs, or any thing but well-bred men?"

“Certainly. A pretty woman may say any thing.”

“Positively, Mr. Constantine, I won’t endure contempt! Say such another word, and I will call you as abominable an animal as the worst of them.”

“But I am not a proper judge, Miss Egerton. I have never been in company with any of these men: so, to be impartial, I must suspend my opinion.”

“And not believe my word!”

Thaddeus bowed.

“There, Lady Tinemouth,” cried she, affecting pet, “take your champion to yourself; he is too great a savage for me.”

“Thank you, Maria,” returned her ladyship, giving her hand to the count to lead her to the supper-room; “this is the way she quarrels with every man that comes into my house, and then her ill-humor transforms them to its own likeness.”

“And where is the man,” observed Thaddeus, “who would not be happy under the spells of so charming a Circe?”

“It won’t do, Mr. Constantine,” cried she, taking her place opposite to him; “my anger is not to be appeased by calling me names; you don’t mend the matter by likening me to a heathen and a witch.”

Lady Tinemouth bore her part in the conversation in a strain more in unison with the count’s mind. However, he found no inconsiderable degree of amusement from the unreflecting volubility and giddy sallies of her friend; and, on the whole, spent the few hours he passed there with some perceptions of his almost forgotten sense of pleasure.

He was in an elegant apartment, he was in the company of two lovely and accomplished women, and he was the object of their entire attention and gratitude. He had been used to this in his days of happiness, when he was “the expectancy and rose of the fair state, the glass of fashion and the mold of form, the observed of all observers;” and the reappearance of such a scene awakened with tender remembrance an associating sensibility which made him rise with regret when the clock struck one.

Lady Tinemouth bade him good-night with an earnest request he would shortly repeat his visit; and they parted, mutually delighted with each other.

CHAPTER XIX.

PLEASED as the count was with the acquaintance to which his gallantry had introduced him, he did not repeat his visit for a long time.

A few mornings after his meeting with Lady Tinemouth, the hard frost broke up. The change in the atmosphere produced so alarming a relapse of the general's rheumatic fever that his friend watched by his pillow ten days and nights. At the end of this period he recovered sufficiently to sit up and read; or to amuse himself by registering the melancholy events of the last campaigns in a large book, and illustrating it with plans of the battles. The sight of this volume would have distressed Thaddeus had he not seen that it afforded comfort to the poor veteran, whom it transported back into scenes on which he delighted to dwell; yet he would often lay down his pen, shut the book, and weep like an infant.

The count left him one morning at this employment, and strolled out with the intention of calling on Lady Tinemouth. As he walked along by Burlington House he perceived Pembroke Somerset, with a gentleman on his arm, approaching from Bond-street.

All the blood in the count's body seemed rushing to his heart. He trembled. The ingenuous smile on his friend's countenance, and his features so sweetly marked with frankness, made his resolution falter.

“But proofs,” cried he to himself, “are absolute!” and turning his face to a stand of books which was near him, he stood there until Somerset had passed. He went by him speaking these words—

“I trust, father, that ingratitude is not his vice.”

“But it is yours, Somerset!” murmured Thaddeus, as for a moment he gazed after them, and then proceeded on his walk.

When his name was announced at Lady Tinemouth’s he found with her another lady, but not Miss Egerton. Lady Tinemouth expressed her pleasure at this visit, and her surprise that it had been so long deferred.

“The pain of such an apparent neglect of your ladyship’s goodness,” replied he, “has been added to my anxiety for the declining health of a friend, whose increased illness is my apology.”

“I wish,” returned her ladyship, her eyes beaming approbation, “that all my friends could excuse their absence so well!”

“Perhaps they might if they chose,” observed the other lady, “and with equal sincerity.”

Thaddeus understood the incredulity couched under these words. So did Lady Tinemouth.

“However,” rejoined she, “be satisfied, Mr. Constantine, that I believe you.”

The count bowed.

“Fie, Lady Tinemouth,” cried the lady, “you are partial; nay, you are absurd; did you ever hear a man speak truth to a woman?”

“Lady Sara!” replied her ladyship, with one of those arch glances which seldom visited her eyes, “where will be your vanity if I assent to this?”

“In the moon, with man’s sincerity.”

Thaddeus paid little attention to this dialogue. His thoughts, in spite of himself, were wandering after the figures of Somerset and his father.

Lady Tinemouth, whose fancy had not been quiet about him since the hour in which chance introduced him to her acquaintance, observed his present absence without noticing it. Indeed, the fruitful imagination of Maria Egerton had not lain still. She declared “he was a soldier by his dress; a man of rank from his manners; an Apollo in his person; and a hero from his gallantry!”

Thus did Miss Egerton describe him to Lady Sara Roos; “and,” added she, “what convinces me he is a man of fashion, he has not been within these walls since we told him we should take it as a favor.”

Lady Sara was eager to see this handsome stranger. Having previously determined to drop in at Lady Tinemouth’s every morning until her curiosity was gratified, she was not a little pleased when she heard his name announced.

Lady Sara was married; but she was young and beautiful also, and she liked that her power should be acknowledged by others besides her husband. The instant she beheld the Count Sobieski she formed the wish to entangle him in her chains. She learned by his pale countenance and thoughtful air that he was a melancholy character; and above all things, she sighed for such a lover. She expected to receive from one of his cast a tenderness, a devotedness; in short, a fervent, wild, and romantic passion, which would feed on her sighs and its own fires to eternity. Thaddeus appeared to her to be the very creature of whom she had been in search. His abstraction, his voice and eyes, the one so touching, the other so neglectful of any thing but the ground, were irresistible; and she resolved from that moment (in her own words) “to make a set at him.”

Not less pleased with this second view of her new acquaintance than she had been at the first, Lady Tinemouth directed her discourse to him, accompanied by all that winning interest so endearing to a liberal heart. Lady Sara never augured well to the success of her fascinations when the countess addressed any of her victims; and therefore she now tried every means in her power to draw aside the attention of the count. She played with her ladyship's dog; but that not succeeding, she determined to strike him at once with the elegance of her figure. Complaining of heat, she threw off her large green velvet mantle; and rising from her chair, walked toward the window.

When she looked round to enjoy her victory, she saw that this maneuver had failed like the rest; for the provoking countess was still standing between her and Thaddeus. Almost angry, she flung open the sash, and putting her head out of the window, exclaimed in her best modulated tones—

“How d'ye do?”

“I hope your ladyship is well this fine morning!” was answered in the voice of Pembroke Somerset.

Thaddeus grew pale; and the countess feeling the cold, turned round to ask Lady Sara to whom she was speaking.

“To a pest of mine, my dear,” returned she; and then, stretching out her neck, she resumed, “But where in the name of wonder, Mr. Somerset, are you driving with all that traveling apparatus?”

“To Deerhurst: I am going to take Lord Arun down. But I keep your ladyship in the cold. Good-morning.”

“My compliments to Sir Robert. Good-by! good-by!” waving her white hand until his curricule was out of sight; when she turned round her desires were gratified, for the elegant stranger was standing with his eyes fixed on that hand. But had she known that for any cognizance they took of its beauty they might as well have been fixed on vacancy she would not have pulled down the window and reseated herself with such an air of triumph.

The count took his seat with a sigh, and Lady Tinemouth did the same.

“So that is the son of Sir Robert Somerset?”

“Yes,” replied Lady Sara; “and what does your ladyship think of him? He is called very handsome?”

“You forget that I am near-sighted,” answered the countess; “I could not discriminate his features, but I think his figure fine. I remember his father was a handsome man, and celebrated for taste and talents.”

“That may be,” resumed Lady Sara, laughing, and anxious to excite some emotion of rivalry in the breast of Thaddeus. “I am sure I ought not to call in question his talents and taste, for he has often wished that fate had reserved me for his son.” Her ladyship sighed, and looked down.

This sigh and gesture had more effect upon her victim than all her exhibited graces. So difficult it is to break affection and habit. Any thing relating to Pembroke Somerset could yet so powerfully interest the count as to stamp itself on his features. Besides, the appearance of any latent disquietude, where all seemed splendor and vivacity, painfully reminded him of the checkered lot of man. His eyes were resting upon her ladyship, full of a tender commiseration, pregnant with compassion for her, himself, and all the world, when she raised her head. The meeting of such a look from him filled her with agitation. She felt something strange at her heart. His eyes seemed to have penetrated to its inmost devices. Blushing like scarlet, she got up to hide an embarrassment not to be subdued; and hastily wishing the countess a good-morning, courtesied to him and left the room.

Her ladyship entered the carriage with feelings all in commotion. She could not account for the confusion which his look had occasioned ; and half angry at a weakness so like a raw, inexperienced girl, she determined to become one of Lady Tinemouth's constant visitors until she should have brought him (as she had done most of the men in her circle) to her feet.

These were her ladyship's resolutions as she rolled along toward St. James's-place. But she a little exceeded the fact in her statement ; for notwithstanding she could have counted as many lovers as most women, yet few of them would have ventured the consequences of a kneeling position. In spite of her maiden charms, these worthy lords and gentlemen had, to a man, adopted the oracle of the poet—

“Love, free as air, at sight of human ties, Spreads his light wings, and in a moment flies !”

They all professed to adore Lady Sara : some were caught by her beauty, others by her éclat, but none had the most distant wish to make this beauty and éclat his own legal property.

The young Marquis of Severn fluttered around her ladyship during the first year of his appearance at court ; but at the end of that time, instead of offering her his hand, he married the daughter of a rich banker.

Lady Sara was so incensed at this intelligence that, to show her disdain of her apostate lover, she set off the same evening for Scotland with Harry Roos, a grandson of the Duke of Lincoln. They were married ; and her ladyship had the triumph of being presented to her majesty the same day with the Marchioness of Severn.

When the whirlwind of her resentment subsided, she began most dismally to repent her union. She loved Captain Roos as little as she had loved Lord Severn. She admired the rank and gallantry of the one ; and the profound adoration of the other had made a friend of her vanity. But now that her revenge was gratified, and the homage of Harry Roos ceased to excite the envy of her companions ; from the hour in which he became her husband she grew weary of his attentions ; and was rejoiced when the Admiralty ordered him to take the command of a ship bound to the Mediterranean.

The last fervent kiss which he imprinted on her lips, as they breathed out the cold "Good-by, Roos ; take care of yourself !" seemed to her the seal of freedom ; and she returned into her dressing-room, not to weep, but to exult in the prospect of a thousand festivities and a thousand lovers.

Left at an early age without a mother, and ignorant of the duties of a wife, she thought that if she kept her husband and herself out of Doctors' Commons, she should do no harm by amusing herself with the heart of every man who came in her way. Thus she hardly moved without a train of admirers. She had already attracted every one she deemed worthy of the trouble ; and had listened to their compliments and insolent presumptions until she was wearied of both. In this juncture of ennui, Miss Egerton related to her the countess's recounter with the gallant foreigner.

As soon as she heard he was of rank (for Miss Egerton was not backward to affirm the dreams of her own imagination), she formed a wish to see him ; and when to her infinite satisfaction he did present himself, in her eyes he exceeded every thing that had been described. To secure such a conquest, she thought would not only raise the envy of the women, but put the men on the alert to discover some novel and attractive way of proving their devotion.

While Lady Sara was meditating on her new plans, the count and Lady Tinemouth remained alone. Her ladyship talked to him on various subjects, but he answered ill upon them all, and sometimes very wide of the matter. At last, conscious that he must be burdensome, he arose, and looking paler and more depressed than when he entered, wished her a good morning.

“I am afraid, Mr. Constantine, you are unwell.”

Like most people who desire to hide what is passing in their minds, Thaddeus gladly assented to this as an excuse for a taciturnity he could not overcome.

“Then,” cried her ladyship, “I hope you will let me know where to send to inquire after your health.”

Thaddeus was confounded for a moment; then, returning into the room, he took up a pen which lay on the table, and said—

“I will write my address to a place where any of your ladyship’s commands may reach me; but I will do myself the honor to repeat my call very soon.”

“I shall always be happy to see you,” replied the countess, while he was writing; “but before I engage you in a promise of which you may afterward repent, I must tell you that you will meet with dull entertainment at my house. I see very little company; and were it not for the inexhaustible spirits of Miss Egerton, I believe I should become a complete misanthrope.”

“Your house will be my paradise!” exclaimed the count. with an earnestness to the force of which he did not immediately attend.

Lady Tinemouth smiled.

“I must warn you here, too,” cried she. “Miss Egerton must not be the deity of your paradise. She is already under engagements.”

Thaddeus blushed at being mistaken, and wished to explain himself.

“You misunderstand me, madam. I am not insensible to beauty, but upon my word at that moment I had nothing else in my thoughts than gratitude for your ladyship’s kindness to an absolute stranger.”

“That is true, Mr. Constantine, you are an absolute stranger if the want of a formal introduction, and an ignorance of your family constitute that title. But your protection introduced you to me ; and there is something in your appearance which convinces me that I need not be afraid of admitting you into the very scanty number of my friends.”

Thaddeus perceived the delicacy of Lady Tinemouth, who wished to know who he was, and yet was unwilling to give him pain by a question so direct that he must answer it. As she now proposed it, she left him entirely to his own discretion ; and he determined to satisfy her very proper curiosity as far as he could, without exposing his real name and circumstances.

The countess, whose benevolent heart was deeply interested in his favor, observed the changes of his countenance with an anxious hope that he would be ingenuous. Her solicitude did not arise from any doubts of his quality and worth, but she wished to be enabled to reply with promptness to the inquisitive people who might see him at her house.

“I hardly know,” said Thaddeus, “in what words to express my sense of your ladyship’s generous confidence in me ; and that my character is not undeserving of such distinction, time, I trust, will prove.” He paused for a moment, and then resumed : “For my rank, Lady Tinemouth, it is now of little consequence to my comfort ; rather, perhaps, a source of mortification ; for ——” he hesitated, and then proceeded with a faint color tinging his cheek, “exiles from their country, if they would not covet misery, must learn to forget ; hence I am no other than Mr. Constantine, though, in acknowledgment of your ladyship’s goodness, I deem it only just that I should not conceal my real quality from you.

“My family was one of the first in Poland. Even in banishment the remembrance that its virtues were as well known as its name, affords some alleviation to the conviction that when my country fell all my property and all my kindred were involved in the ruin. Soon after the dreadful sealing of its fate

I quitted it; and, by the command of a dying parent who expired in my arms, sought a refuge in this island from degradations which otherwise I could neither repel nor avoid.”

Thaddeus stopped; and the countess, struck by the graceful modesty with which this simple account was related, laid her hand upon his.

“Mr. Constantine, I am not surprised at what you have said. The melancholy of your air induced me to suspect that you were not happy; and my sole wish in penetrating your reserve was to show you that a woman can be a sincere friend.”

Tears of gratitude glistened in the count's eyes. Incapable of making a suitable reply, he pressed her hand to his lips. She rose; and, willing to relieve a sensibility that delighted her, added, “I will not detain you longer, only let me see you soon.”

Thaddeus uttered a few inarticulate words, whose significance conveyed nothing, but every thing was declared by their confusion. The countess's eloquent smile showed that she comprehended their meaning, and he left the room.

CHAPTER XX.

ON the count's return home, he found General Butzou in better spirits, still poring over his journal. This book seemed to be the representative of all which had ever been dear to him. He dwelt upon it, and talked about it with a doating eagerness bordering on insanity.

These symptoms increasing from day to day, gave his young friend considerable uneasiness. He listened with pain to the fond dreams which took possession of the poor old man; who delighted in saying that such might yet be done in Poland when he should be recovered, and they be enabled to return together to Warsaw and stimulate the people to resume their rights.

Thaddeus at first attempted to prove the emptiness of these schemes; but seeing that contradiction on this head threw the general into deeper despondency, he thought it better to affect the same sentiments; too well perceiving that death would soon terminate these visions with the venerable dreamer's life.

Accordingly, as far as lay in the count's power, he satisfied all the fancied wants of his revered friend, who, on every other subject, was perfectly reasonable; but at last he became so absorbed in this chimerical plot, that even conversation and his meals seemed to oppress him with restraint.

When Thaddeus perceived that his company was rather irksome than a comfort to his friend, he the more readily repeated his visits to Lady Tinemouth. She now looked for his entrance at least once a day. If ever a morning and an evening passed away without his appearance, he was sure of being scolded by Miss Egerton, reproached by the countess, and frowned at by Lady Sara Roos. In defiance of all other engagements, this lady contrived to drop in every night at Lady Tinemouth's. Her ladyship was not more surprised at this sudden attachment of Lady Sara to her house than pleased with her society, who, she found, could lay aside that tissue of affectation and fashion which she wore in public, and really become a charming woman.

Though Lady Sara was vain, she was mistress of sufficient sense to penetrate with tolerable certainty into the characters of her acquaintance. Most of the men with whom she had hitherto associated having, living from youth to manhood among those fashionable assemblies where individuality is absorbed in the general mass of insipidity, she saw they were frivolous; or at the best, warped in taste, if not in principle; and the fascinations she called forth to subdue them were suited to their objects—her beauty, her thoughtlessness, or her caprice. But on the reverse when she formed the wish to entangle such a man as Thaddeus, she soon discovered that to engage his attention she must appear in the unaffected graces of nature. To this end she took pains to display the loveliness of her form in every movement and position; yet she managed the action with so inartificial and frank an air that she seemed the only person present who was unconscious of the versatility and power of her charms. She conversed with good sense and propriety. In short, she appeared completely different from the gay ridiculous creature he had seen some weeks before in the countess's parlor.

He now admired both her person and her mind. Her winning softness, the vivacity of Miss Egerton, and the kindness of the countess, beguiled him many an evening from the contemplation of melancholy scenes at home.

One night it came into the head of Maria Egerton to banter him about his military dress. "Do, for Heaven's sake, my dear Don Quixote," cried she, "let us see you out of your rusty armor! I declare I am tired of the sight. And I can not but think you would be merrier out of that customary suit of solemn black!"

This demand was not pleasing to Thaddeus, but he good-naturedly replied, "I knew not till you were so kind as to inform me, that a man's temper depends on his clothes."

"Else, I suppose, cried she," interrupting him, "you would have changed yours before? Therefore, I expect you will do as I bid you now, and put on a Christian's coat against you next enter this house."

Thaddeus was at a loss what to say; he only bowed; and the countess and Lady Sara smiled at her nonsense.

When they parted for the night this part of the conversation passed off from all minds but that of Lady Finemouthe.

She had considered the subject, but in a different way from Maria. Maria supposed that the handsome Constantine wore the dress of his country because it was the most becoming. But as such a whim did not correspond with the other parts of his character, Lady Tinemouth, in her own mind, attributed this adherence to his national habit to the right cause.

She remarked that whenever she wished him to meet any agreeable people at her house, he always declined these introductions under the plea of his dress, though he never proposed to alter it. This conduct, added to his silence on every subject which related to the public amusements about town, led her to conclude that, like the banished nobility of France, he was encountering the various inconveniences of poverty in a foreign land. She hoped that he had escaped its horrors; but she could not be certain, for he always shifted the conversation when it too closely referred to himself.

These observations haunted the mind of Lady Tinemouth, and made her anxious to contrive some opportunity in which she might have this interesting Constantine alone; and by a proper management of the discourse lead to some avowal of his real situation. Hitherto her benevolent intentions had been frustrated by various interruptions at various times. Indeed had she been actuated by mere curiosity she would long ago have resigned the attempt as fruitless; but pity and esteem kept her watchful until the very hour in which her considerate heart was fully satisfied.

One morning when she was writing in her cabinet, a servant informed her that Mr. Constantine was below. Pleased at this circumstance, she took advantage of a slight cold that affected her; and hoping to draw something out of him in the course of a tête-à-tête, begged he would come to her room.

When he entered she perceived that he looked more pensive than usual. He sat down by her, and expressed his concern at her indisposition. She sighed heavily, but remained silent Her thoughts were too much occupied with her kind plan to immediately form a reply. She had determined to give him a cursory idea of her own unhappiness; and thus, by her confidence, attract his.

“I hope Miss Egerton is well?” inquired he.

“Very well, Mr. Constantine. A heart at ease almost ever keeps the body in health. May she long continue as happy as at this period, and never know the disappointments of her friend!”

He looked at the countess.

“It is true, my dear sir,” continued she. “It is hardly probable that the mere effect of thirty-seven years could have made the inroads on my person which you see: but sorrow has done it; and, with all the comforts you behold around me, I am miserable. I have no joy independent of the few friends which Heaven has preserved to me; and yet,” added she, “I have another anxiety united with those of which I complain; some of my friends who afford me the consolation I mention deny me the only return in my power, the office of sharing their griefs.”

Thaddeus understood the expression of her ladyship’s eye and the tenderness of her voice as she uttered these words. He saw to whom the kind reproach was directed, and he looked down confused and oppressed.

The countess resumed.

“I can not deny what your countenance declares; you think I mean you. I do, Mr. Constantine. I have marked your melancholy; I have weighed other circumstances; and I am sure that you have many things to struggle with besides the regrets which must ever hang about the bosom of a brave man who has witnessed the destruction of his country. Forgive me, if I give you pain (added she, observing his heightening color), I speak from real esteem; I speak to you as I would to my own son were he in your situation.”

“My dearest madam!” cried he, overcome by her benevolence, “you have judged rightly; I have many things to struggle with; I have a sick friend at home whom misfortune hath nearly bereft of reason; and whose wants are now so complicated and expensive that never till now did I know the complete desolation of a man without a country or a profession. For myself, Lady Tinemouth, adversity has few pangs; but for my friend, for an old man whose deranged faculties have forgotten the change in my affairs; he leans on me for support and comfort; it is this that must account to your ladyship for those inconsistencies in my manner and spirits which are so frequently the subject of Miss Egerton’s raillery.”

Thaddeus in the course of this short and rapid narrative gradually lowered the tone of his voice; and at the close covered his face with his hand. He had never before confided the history of his embarrassments to any creature; and he thought (notwithstanding the countess’s solicitations) he had committed an outrage on the firmness of his character by having in any way acknowledged the weight of his calamities.

Lady Tinemouth considered a few minutes, and then addressed him.

“I should ill repay this generous confidence, my young friend, were I to hesitate a moment in forming some plan which may prove of service to you. You have told me no more, dear Mr. Constantine, than I suspected. And I had something in view.” Here the countess stopped, expecting that her auditor would interrupt her. He remained silent, and she proceeded; “You spoke of a profession, of an employment.”

“Yes, madam,” returned he, taking his hand from his eyes; “I should be glad to engage in any profession or employment you would recommend.”

“I have little interest,” answered her ladyship, “with people in power ; therefore I can not propose any thing which will in any degree suit with your rank ; but the employment that I have in view several of the most illustrious French nobility have not disdained to execute."

"Do not fear to mention it to me," cried the count, perceiving her reluctance ; "I would attempt any thing that was not dishonorable to render service to my poor friend."

"Well, then, would you have any objection to teach languages?"

Thaddeus immediately answered—"Oh no! I should be happy to do so."

"Then," replied she, greatly relieved by the manner in which he received her proposal ; "I will now tell you that about a week ago I paid a visit to Lady Dundas, the widow of Sir Hector Dundas, the rich East Indian Director. While I was there I heard her talking with her two daughters about finding a proper master to teach them German. That language has become a very fashionable accomplishment among literary ladies ; and Miss Dundas, being a member of the Blue-stocking Club,* declared her resolution to make a new translation of Werter. Lady Dundas made a thousand objections against the vulgarity of various teachers whom the young ladies proposed, and ended with saying that unless some German gentleman could be found they must remain ignorant of the language. Your image instantly shot across my mind ! and, deeming it a favorable opportunity, I told her ladyship that if she could wait a few days I would sound a friend of mine who, I knew, if he would condescend to take the trouble, must be the most eligible person imaginable. Lady Dundas and the girls gladly left the affair to me, and I now propose it to you."

* Such was the real name given at the time to Mrs. Montagu's celebrated literary parties, held at her house in Portman square. The late venerable Sir William Pepys was one of their last survivors.

“And I,” replied he, “with a thousands thanks, accept the task.”

“Then I will make the usual arrangements,” returned her ladyship, “and send you the result.”

After half an hour's further conversation Lady Tinemouth became more impressed with the unsophisticated delicacy and dignity of the count's mind; and he, more grateful than utterance could declare, left his respects for Miss Egerton, and took his leave.

CHAPTER XXI.

NEXT morning while Thaddeus was vainly explaining to the general that he no longer possessed a regiment of horse, which the poor old man wanted him to order out to try the success of some maneuvers he had been devising, little Nanny brought a letter from Slaughter's Coffee-house; where he had desired Lady Tinemouth to direct to him. He opened it, and found these contents:—

“MY DEAR SIR,

“So anxious was I to terminate the affair with Lady Dundas that I went to her house last night. I affirmed it as a great obligation that you would undertake the trouble to teach her daughters; and I insist that you do not, from any romantic ideas of candor, invalidate what I have said: I know the world too well not to be convinced of the truth of Dr. Goldsmith's maxim—‘If you be poor do not seem poor, if you would avoid insult as well as suffering.’

“I told Miss Dundas you had undertaken the task solely at my persuasion; and that I could not propose other terms than a guinea for two lessons. She is rich enough for any expense, and made no objection to my demand; besides, she presented the inclosed by way of entrance-money. Thus I have settled all preliminaries, and you are to commence your first lesson on Monday, at two o'clock. But before then pray let me see you.

“Can not you dine with us on Sunday? I have informed Miss Egerton of as much of the affair as I think necessary to account for your new occupation. In short, good girl as she is, I thought it most prudent to say as little to her and Lady Sara as I have done to the Dundases; therefore, do not be uneasy on that head.

“Come to-morrow, if not before, and you will give real pleasure to your sincere friend, “ADELIZA TINEMOUTH.

“Saturday Morning, Grosvenor-place.”

Truly grateful to the active friendship of the countess, and looking at the general, who appeared perfectly happy in the prosecution of his wild schemes, Thaddeus inwardly exclaimed, “By these means, I shall at least have it in my power to procure the assistance which your melancholy state requires.”

On opening the inclosure which her ladyship mentioned, he found it to be a bank note for ten pounds. Both the present and its amount gave him pain; not having done any service to earn it, he regarded the money more as a gift than as a bond of engagement. However, he found that this delicacy, with many other painful repugnances, must at this moment be laid aside; and, without further self-torment, he consigned the money to the use for which he was aware the countess had intended it, namely, to provide himself with an English dress.

During these various reflections he did not leave Lady Tinemouth's letter unanswered. He thanked her sincerely for her zeal; but declined dining with her the next day, on account of leaving his poor friend so long alone; though he promised to come in the evening, when he should be retired to rest.

This excuse was regretted by none more than Lady Sara Roos; who, having heard from Lady Tinemouth that she expected Mr. Constantine to dinner on Sunday, invited herself to be one of the party. She had now seen him constantly for nearly a month; and found, to her amazement, that in seeking to entrap him, she only had ensnared herself. Every word he uttered penetrated to her heart; every glance of his eyes shook her frame like electricity. She had now no necessity to affect softness; a young and seducing passion imparted to her voice and countenance all its bewitching pathos.

Thaddeus was not insensible to the enchantment which this intoxicating power threw around her; but it did not reach as far as she intended. He confessed that she was a lovely woman, who might have affected his thoughts had she been free, and his heart been as in happier days. He knew that she was a married woman; and, as he believed her to be a virtuous one, he could not credit the evidence of his observations, which would often have whispered to him the language her ladyship wished to convey.

When Lady Tinemouth mentioned to Lady Sara and Miss Egerton the great favor she had conferred on the Miss Dundases, by prevailing on Mr. Constantine to undertake the task of teaching them German, Lady Sara could hardly conceal her vexation. She was angry at the count for his acquiescence, and hated Lady Tinemouth for having made the proposal.

Miss Egerton laughed at the scrape into which Lady Tinemouth had brought his good-nature; and declared she would tell him next day, at dinner, what a mulish pair of misses he had presumed to manage.

It was the youngest of these misses that excited Lady Sara's displeasure. Euphemia Dundas was very pretty; she had a large fortune at her disposal ; and what might not such united temptations effect on the mind of a man exposed every day to her habitual flirtation ? Torn with jealousy, Lady Sara caught at the mention of his coming to dinner on the morrow ; and offering to be one of the party, resolved to make one more essay on his hitherto insensible soul before she beheld him enter scenes so likely to extinguish her hopes. Hopes of what ? She never allowed herself to inquire. She knew that she never had loved her husband, that now she hated him, and was devoted to another. To be assured of a reciprocal passion from that other, she believed was the extent of her wish. Thinking that she held her husband's honor safe as her life, she determined to do what she liked with her heart. Her former admirers were now neglected ; and, to the astonishment and admiration of the graver part of her acquaintance, she relinquished all the assemblies in which she had so recently been the brightest attraction, to seclude herself by the domestic fireside of the Countess of Tinemouth.

Thus, while the world were admiring a conduct they supposed would give a lasting happiness to herself and to her husband, she was cherishing a passion which might prove the destruction of both.

On Sunday evening Thaddeus entered Lady Tinemouth's drawing-room just as Miss Egerton seated herself before the tea equipage. At sight of him she nodded her head, and called him to sit by her. Lady Tinemouth returned the grateful pressure of his hand. Lady Sara received him with a palpitating heart, and stooped to remove something that seemed to incommode her foot ; but it was only a feint, to hide the blushes which were burning on her cheek. No one observed her confusion. So common is it for those who are the constant witnesses of our actions to be the most ignorant of their expression and tendency.

Thaddeus could not be so uninformed. The frequent falling of her eye when it met his, the unequivocal intonation of her voice, and sometimes the framing of her speech, often alarmed his sensibility, and made him retreat into himself. He gladly obeyed a second summons from the gay Maria, and drew his chair close to hers.

Lady Sara observed his motions with a jealous pang she could not conceal; and pulling her seat as far on the opposite side as possible, began in silence to sip her tea.

“Ye powers of gallantry!” suddenly exclaimed Miss Egerton, pushing away the table, and lifting her eye-glass to her eye, “I declare I have conquered! Look, Lady Tinemouth; look, Lady Sara! If Mr. Constantine does not better become this English dress than his Polish horribles, drown me for a witch!”

“You see I have obeyed you, madam,” returned Thaddeus, bowing.

“Ah! you are in the right. Most men do that cheerfully, when they know they gain by the bargain. Now, you look like a Christian man; before, you always reminded me of some stalking hero in tragedy.”

“Yes,” cried Lady Sara, forcing a smile, “and now a striking resemblance to George Barnwell!”

Maria, who did not perceive the sarcasm couched under this remark, good-humoredly replied—

“May be so, Lady Sara; but I don’t care for his black suit: obedience was the thing I wanted, and I have it in the present appearance.”

“Pray, Lady Tinemouth,” asked her ladyship, seeking to avenge herself on his alacrity to obey Miss Egerton, “what o’clock is it? I have promised to be at Lady Sarum’s concert by nine.”

“It is not eight,” returned the countess; “besides this is the first time I have heard of your engagement. I hoped you would have spent all this evening with us.”

“No,” answered Lady Sara, “I can not.” And ringing the bell, she rose.

“Bless me, Lady Sara!” cried Miss Egerton, “you are not going? Don’t you hear that it is only eight o’clock?”

Busying herself in tying her cloak, Lady Sara affected not to hear her, and told the servant who opened the door to order the carriage.

Surprised at this precipitation, but far from guessing the cause, Lady Tinemouth requested Mr. Constantine to see her ladyship down stairs.

“I would rather not,” cried she in a quick voice; and darting out of the room, was followed by Thaddeus, who came up with her just as she reached the street door. He hastened to assist her into the carriage, and saw by the light of the flambeaux her face streaming with tears. He had already extended his hand, when, instead of accepting it, she pushed it from her, and jumped into the carriage, crying in an indignant tone, “To Berkeley-square.” He remained for a few minutes looking after her; then returned into the house, too well able to translate the meaning of all this petulance.

When he reascended the stairs, Lady Tinemouth expressed her wonder at the whimsical departure of her friend; but, as Thaddeus (who was really disturbed) returned a vague reply, the subject ended.

Miss Egerton, who hardly thought two minutes on the same thing, sent away the tea-board; and, sitting down by him, exclaimed—

“Mr. Constantine, I hold it right that no man should be thrown into a den of wild beasts without knowing what kind of monsters he shall meet there. Hence, as I find you have undertaken the taming of that ursa major Lady Dundas, and her pretty cubs, I must give you a taste of their quality.—Will you hear me?”

“Certainly.”

“Will you attend to my advice?”

“If I like it.”

“Ha!” replied she, returning his smile with another; “that is just such an answer as I would have made myself, so I won’t quarrel with you. Lady Tinemouth, you will allow me to draw your friends’ pictures?”

“Yes, Maria, provided you don’t make them caricatures. Remember, your candor is at stake; to-morrow, Mr. Constantine will judge for himself.”

“And I am sure he will agree with me. Now, Lady Dundas, if you please. I know your ladyship is a great stickler for precedence.”

Lady Tinemouth laughed, and interrupted her—

“I declare, Maria, you are a very daring girl. What do you not risk by giving way to this satirical spirit?”

“Not any body’s love that I value, Lady Tinemouth; you know that I never daub a fair character; Mr. Constantine takes me on your credit; and if you mean Charles Montresor, he is as bad as myself, and dare not for his life have any qualms.”

“Well, well, proceed,” cried her ladyship; “I will not interrupt you again.”

“Then,” resumed she, “I must begin with Lady Dundas. In proper historical style, I shall commence with her birth, parentage, and education. For the first, my father told me he remembers her when she was the maid of Chief Justice Sefton’s wife at Surat. Soon after her arrival there, this pretty Abigail by some means cajoled old Hector Dundas (who was then governor of the province) to marry her. When she returned in triumph to England, she coaxed her foolish husband to appropriate some of his ill-gotten riches to the purchase of a baronetage. I suppose the appellation of mistress put her in mind of her ci-devant abigailship; and in a happy hour he complied, and she became my lady. That over, Sir Hector had nothing more to do in this world. He was so good as to think so himself; and to add to former obligations, had the civility to walk out of it; for one night, whether he had been dreaming of his feats in India, or of a review on the platform at Newgate, I can not affirm, but he marched out of his bedroom window and broke his neck. Ever since that fortunate event, Lady Dundas has exhibited the finest parties in town. Every body goes to see her; but whether in compliment to their own taste or to her silver muslins, I don't know; for there are half-a-dozen titled ladies of her acquaintance, who, to my certain knowledge, have not bought a ball-dress this twelvemonth. Well, how do you like Lady Dundas?"

"I do not like your sketch," replied Thaddeus, with an unconscious sigh.

"Come, don't sigh about my veracity," interrupted Miss Egerton; "I do assure you I should have been more correct had I been more severe; for her Indian ladyship is as ill-natured as she is vulgar, and as presumptuous as ignorant; in short she is a fit mother for the delectable Miss Dundas, whose description you shall have in two questions. Can you imagine Socrates in his wife's petticoats? Can you imagine a pedant, a scold, and a coquette, in one woman? If you can, you have a foretaste of Diana Dundas. She is large and ugly, and thinks herself delicate and handsome; she is self-willed and ignorant, and believes herself wise and learned; and to sum up all, she is the most malicious creature breathing."

"My dear Maria," cried Lady Tinemouth, alarmed at the effect such high coloring might have on the mind of Thaddeus; "for Heaven's sake be temperate! I never heard you so unbecomingly harsh in my life."

Miss Egerton peeped archly in her face.

"Are you serious, Lady Tinemouth? You know that I would not look unbecoming in your eyes. Come, shake hands with me, and I will be more merciful to the gentlo Euphemia, for I intend that Mr. Constantine shall be her lover. Won't you?" cried she, resigning her ladyship's hand. Thaddeus shook his head. "I don't understand your Lord Burleigh nods; answer me in words, when I have finished; for I am sure you will immediately unclasp your heart to receive the sweet creature. She is so tiny and so pretty that I never see her without thinking of some gay little trinket all over precious stones. Her eyes are too diamond sparks, melted into luster; and her teeth seed pearl lying between rubies. So much for the casket; but for the quality of the jewel within, I leave you to make the discovery."

Miss Egerton having run herself out of breath, suddenly stopped. Seeing that he was called upon to say something, Thaddeus made an answer which only drew upon him a new volley of raillery. Lady Tinemouth tried to avert it, but she failed; and Maria continued talking with very little interruption until the party separated for the night.

CHAPTER XXII.

Now that the count thought himself secure of the means of payment, he sent for a physician, to consult him respecting the state of the general. When Dr. Cavendish saw and conversed with the venerable Butzou, he gave it as his opinion that his malady had originated in grief.

"I can too well suppose it," replied Thaddeus.

"Then," rejoined the physician, "I fear, sir, that unless I know something of its cause, my visits will prove almost useless."

The count was silent. The doctor resumed—

"I shall be grieved if his sorrows be of too delicate a nature to be trusted with a man of honor; for in these cases unless we have some knowledge of the springs of the derangement, we lose time, and perhaps entirely fail of a cure. Our discipline is addressed both to the body and the mind of the patient.”

Thaddeus perceived the necessity of compliance, and did so without further hesitation.

“The calamities, sir, which have occasioned the disorder of my friend need not be any secret; too many have shared them with him; his sorrows have been public ones. You must have learned by his language, Dr. Cavendish, that he is a foreigner and a soldier. He held the rank of general in the King of Poland’s service. Since the period in which his country fell, his wandering senses have approximated to what you see.”

Dr. Cavendish paused for a moment before he answered the count; then fixing his eye on the veteran, who was sitting at the other end of the room constructing the model of a fortified town, he said—

“All that we can do at present, sir, is to permit him to follow his schemes without contradiction; meanwhile strengthening his system with proper medicines, and lulling its irritation by gentle opiates. We must proceed cautiously, and I trust in Heaven success will crown us at last.”

When the doctor had written his prescription and was preparing to go, Thaddeus offered him his fee; but the good Cavendish, taking the hand that presented it, and closing it on the guinea, “No, my dear sir,” said he, “real patriotism is too much the idol of my heart to allow me to receive payment when I behold her face. Suffer me, Mr. Constantine, to visit you and your brave friend as a friend, or I never come again.”

“Sir, this generous conduct to strangers—”

“Generous to myself, Mr. Constantine, and not to strangers.”

I can not consider you as such; for men who devote themselves to their country must find a brother in every honest breast. I will not hear of our meeting on any other terms.”*

Thaddeus could not immediately form a reply adequate to the sentiment which the generous philanthropy of the doctor awakened. While he stood incapable of speaking, Cavendish with one glance of his penetrating eye deciphered his countenance; and giving him a friendly shake by the hand, disappeared.

The count took up his hat; and musing all the way he went on the unexpected scenes we meet in life—disappointment where we expected kindness; and friendship where no hope could arise—he arrived at the door of Lady Dundas, in Harley-street.

He was instantly let in, and with much ceremony ushered into a splendid library, where he was told the ladies would attend him. Before they entered, they allowed him time to examine its costly furniture, its glittering book-cases, bird-cages, globes, and reading-stands, all shining with burnished gilding; its plaster casts of the nine muses, which stood in nine recesses about the room draped with blue net, looped up with artificial roses; and its fine cut-steel Grecian stove, on each side of which was placed, on sandal-wood pedestals, two five feet statues of Apollo and Minerva.

Thaddeus had twice walked round these fopperies of learning when the door opened, and Lady Dundas, dressed in a morning-wrapper of Indian shawls, waddled into the apartment. She neither bowed nor courtesied to the count, who was standing when she entered, but looking at him from head to foot, said as she passed, "So you are come;" and ringing the bell, called to the servant in no very soft tones, "Tell Miss Dundas the person Lady Tinemouth spoke of is here." Her ladyship then sat down in one of the little gilded chairs, leaving Thaddeus still standing on the spot where he had bowed to her entrance.

* This generous man is no fictitious character; the original being Dr. Blackburne, late of Cavendish-square; but who has been long retired from his profession, passing a revered old age in the beautiful neighborhood of our old British classic scenes, the Abbey of Glastonbury.

"You may sit down," cried she, stirring the fire, and not deigning to look at him; "for my daughter may not choose to come this half hour."

"I prefer standing," replied the count, who could have laughed at the accuracy of Miss Egerton's picture, had he not prognosticated many disagreeables to himself from the ill-manners of which this was a specimen.

Lady Dundas took no further notice of him. Turning from her bloated countenance (which pride, as well as high eating, had swollen from prettiness to deformity), he walked to a window, and stationed himself there, looking into the street until the door was again opened, and two ladies made their appearance.

"Miss Dundas," cried her ladyship, "here is the young man that is to teach you German."

Thaddeus bowed; the younger of the ladies courtesied; and so did the other, not forgetting to accompany such condescension with a toss of the head, that the effect of undue humility might be done away.

While a servant was setting chairs round a table on which was painted the Judgment of Hercules, Lady Dundas again opened her lips.

"Pray, Mr. Thingumbob, have you brought any grammars and primers, and dictionaries, and syntaxes, with you?"

Before he had time to reply in the negative, Miss Dundas interrupted her mother.

"I wish, madam, you would leave the arrangement of my studies to myself. Does your ladyship think we would learn out of any book which had been touched by other people?" Thomas," cried she to a servant, "send Stephens hither."

Thaddeus silently contemplated this strange mother and daughter, while the pretty Euphemia paid the same compliment to him. During his stay he ventured to look once only at her Sylphid figure. There was an unreceding something in her liquid blue eyes, when he chanced to meet them, which displeased him; and he could not help seeing that from the instant she had entered the room, she had never ceased staring in his face.

He was a little relieved by the maid putting the books on the table; and Miss Dundas, taking a seat, desired him to sit down by her and arrange the lessons. Lady Dundas was drawing to the other side of Thaddeus, when Euphemia suddenly whisking round, pushed before her mother, and exclaimed—

"Dear mamma! you don't want to learn!" and squeezed herself upon the edge of her mother's chair; who, very angrily getting up, declared that rudeness to a parent was intolerable from such well-bred young women, and left the room.

Euphemia blushed at the reproof, more than at her conduct; and Miss Dundas added to her confusion by giving her a second reprimand. Thaddeus pitied the evident embarrassment of the little beauty, and to relieve her, presented the page in the German grammar with which they were to begin. This had the desired effect; and for an hour and a half they prosecuted their studies with close attention.

While the count continued his directions to her sister, and then turned his address to herself, Miss Euphemia, wholly unseen by him, with a bent head was affecting to hear him; though at the same time she looked obliquely through her thick flaxen ringlets, and gazing with wonder and admiration on his face as it inclined toward her, said to herself, "If this man were a gentleman, I should think him the most charming creature in the world."

"Will your task be too long, madam?" inquired Thaddeus; "will it give you any inconvenience to remember?"

"To remember what?" asked she, for in truth she had neither seen what he had been pointing at, nor heard what he had been saying.

"The lesson, madam, I have just been proposing."

"Show it to me again, and then I shall be a better judge."

He did as he was desired; and was taking his leave when she called after him,

"Pray, Mr. Constantine, come to-morrow at two. I want you particularly."

The count bowed and withdrew.

"And what do you want with him to-morrow, child?" asked Miss Dundas; "you are not accustomed to be so fond of improvement."

Euphemia knew very well what she was accustomed to be fond of; but not choosing to let her austere sister into her predilection for the contemplation of superior beauty, she merely answered, "You know, Diana, you often reproach me for my absurd devotion to novel-reading, and my repugnance to graver books; now I want at once to be like you, a woman of great erudition; and for that purpose I will study day and night at the German till I can read all the philosophers, and be a fit companion for my sister."

This speech from Euphemia (who had always been so declared an enemy to pedantry as to affirm she learned German merely because it was the fashion), would have awakened Miss Dundas to some suspicion of a covert design, had she not been in the habit of taking down such large draughts of adulation, that whenever herself was the subject, she gave it full confidence. Euphemia seldom administered these doses but to serve particular views; and seeing in the present case that a little flattery was necessary, she felt no compunction in sacrificing sincerity to the gratification of caprice. Weak in understanding, she had fed on works of imagination until her mind loathed all other kind of food. Not content with devouring the elegant pages of Mackenzie, Radcliffe, and Lee, she flew with voracious appetite to sate herself on the garbage of any circulating library that fell in her way.

The effects of such a taste were exhibited in her manners. Being very pretty, she became very sentimental. She dressed like a wood nymph; and talked as if her soul was made up of love and sorrow. Neither of these emotions she had really ever felt; but, in idea, was always the victim of some ill-fated passion; at least she fancied herself, at different periods, in love with all the fine men about town.

By this management, she kept faithful to her favorite principle, that "love was a want of her soul!" As it was the rule of her life, it ever trembled on her tongue; ever introduced the confession of any new attachment, which usually happened three times a year, to her dear friend Miss Arabella Rothes. Fortunately for the longevity of their mutual friendship, this young lady lived in an ancient house, forty miles to the north of London. This latter circumstance proved a pretty distress for their pens to descant on; and Arabella remained a most charming sentimental writing stock, to receive the catalogue of Miss Euphemia's lovers; indeed that gentle creature might have matched every lady in Cowley's calendar with a gentleman. Every throb of her heart could have acknowledged a different master. First, the fashionable sloven, Augustus Somers, lounged and sauntered himself into her good graces; but his disheveled hair, soiled linen, and dirty great coat, not exactly meeting her ideas of an elegant lover, she gave him up at the end of three weeks. The next object her eyes fell upon, as most opposite to her former fancy, was the charming Marquis of Inverary. But here all her arrows failed, for she never could extract from him more than a "how d'ye do?" through the long lapse of four months; during which time she continued as constant to his fine figure, and her own folly, as could have fallen to the lot of any poor despairing damsel. However, my lord was so cruel, so perfidious, as to allow several opportunities to pass, in which he might have declared his passion; and she told Arabella, in a letter of six sheets, she would bear it no longer.

She put this wise resolution in practice; and had already played the same game with half a score (the last of whom was a young guardsman, who had just rode into her heart, by managing his steed with the air of an Alexander one day in Hyde Park), when Thaddeus made his appearance before her.

The moment she set her eyes on him, her inflammable imagination was set in a blaze. She forgot his apparent subordinate quality in the nobleness of his figure; and once or twice that evening, while she was flitting about the sparkling cynosure of the Duchess of Orkney's masquerade, her thoughts hovered over the handsome foreigner.

She viewed the subject first one way and then another, and in her ever-varying mind, "he was every thing by turns, and nothing long;" but at length she argued herself into a belief that he must be a man of rank from some of the German courts, who having seen her somewhere unknown to herself, had fallen in love; and persuaded Lady Tinemouth to introduce him as a language-master to her family, that he might be enabled to appreciate the disinterestedness of her disposition.

This wild idea having once gotten into her head, received instant credence. She resolved, without seeming to suspect it, to treat him as his quality deserved, and to deliver sentiments in his hearing which should charm him with their delicacy and generosity.

With these chimeras floating in her brain, she returned home, went to bed, and dreamed that Mr. Constantine had turned out to be Monsieur, had offered her his hand, and that she was conducted to the altar by a train of princes and princesses, his brothers and sisters.

She awoke the next morning from these deliriums in an ecstasy, deeming them prophetic; and taking up her book, began with a fluttering attention to scan the lesson which Thaddeus had desired her to learn.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE following day at noon, as the Count Sobieski was crossing Cavendish-square, to keep his appointment in Harley-street, he was met by Lady Sara Roos. She had spoken with the Miss Dundases the night before at the masquerade; where, discovering the pretty Euphemia through the dress of Eloisa, her jealous and incensed heart could not withstand the temptation of hinting at the captivating Abelard she had selected to direct her studies. Her ladyship soon penetrated into the situation of Euphemia's heated fancy; and drew from her, without betraying herself, that she expected to see her master the following day. Stung to the soul, Lady Sara quitted the rooms, and in a paroxysm of disappointment, determined to throw herself in his way as he went to her rival's house.

With this hope she had been traversing the square upward of an hour, when her anxious eye at last caught a view of his figure proceeding along Margaret-street. Hardly able to support her tottering frame, shaken as it was with contending emotions, she accosted him first; for he was passing straight onward, without looking to the right or the left. On seeing her ladyship, he stopped and expressed his pleasure at the meeting.

“If you really are pleased to meet me,” said she, forcing a smile, “take a turn with me round the square. I want to speak with you.”

Thaddeus bowed, and she put her arm through his, but remained silent for a few minutes in evident confusion. The count recollected it must now be quite two. He knew the awkwardness of making the Misses Dundas wait; and notwithstanding his reluctance to appear impatient with Lady Sara, he found himself obliged to say,

“I am sorry I must urge your ladyship to honor me with your commands, for it is already past the time when I ought to have been with the Miss Dundases.”

“Yes,” cried Lady Sara, angrily, “Miss Euphemia told me as much; but, Mr. Constantine, as a friend, I must warn you against her arts, as well as against those of another lady, who would do well to correct the boldness of her manner.”

“Whom do you mean, madam?” interrogated Thaddeus, surprised at her warmth, and totally at a loss to conjecture to whom she alluded.

“A little reflection would answer you,” returned she, wishing to retreat from an explanation, yet stimulated by her double jealousy to proceed: “she may be a good girl, Mr. Constantine, and I dare say she is; but a woman who has promised her hand to another ought not to flirt with you. What business had Miss Egerton to command you to wear an English dress? But she must now see the danger of her conduct by your having presumed to obey her.”

“Lady Sara!” exclaimed the count, much hurt at this speech, “I hardly understand you, yet I believe I may venture to affirm that in all you have now just said, you are mistaken. Who can witness the general frankness of Miss Egerton, or listen to the candid manner with which she avows her attachment to Mr. Montresor, and conceive that she possesses any thoughts which would not do her honor to reveal? And for myself," added he, lowering the tone of his voice, "I trust the least of my faults is presumption. It never was my character to presume on any lady's condescension; and if dressing as she desired be deemed an instance of that kind, I can declare, upon my word, had I not found other motives beside her raillery, my appearance should not have suffered a change."

"Are you sincere, Mr. Constantine?" cried Lady Sara, now smiling with pleasure.

"Indeed I am, and happy if my explanation has met with your ladyship's approbation."

"Mr. Constantine," resumed she, "I have no motive but one in my discourse with you—friendship." And casting her eyes down, she sighed profoundly.

"Your ladyship does me honor."

"I would have you regard me with the same confidence that you do Lady Tinemonth. My father possesses the first patronage in this country; I therefore have it a thousand times more in my power than she has to render you a service."

Here her ladyship overshot herself: she had not calculated well on the nature of the mind she wished to ensnare.

"I am grateful to your generosity," replied Thaddeus; "but on this head I must decline your kind offices. While I consider myself the subject of one king, though he be in a prison, I will not accept of any employment under another who is in alliance with his enemies."

Lady Sara discovered her error the moment he had made his answer, and in a disappointed tone exclaimed, "Then you despise my friendship!"

"No, Lady Sara; it is an honor far beyond my merits; and my gratitude to Lady Tinemonth must be doubled when I recollect that I possess it through her means."

“Well,” cried her ladyship, “have that as you will; but I expect, as a specimen of your confidence in me, you will be wary of Euphemia Dundas. I know she is artful and vain; she finds amusement in attracting the affections of men, and then, notwithstanding her affected sensibility, she turns them into a subject for laughter.”

“I thank your ladyship,” replied the count; “but in this respect I think I am safe both from the lady and myself.”

“How,” asked Lady Sara, rather too eagerly, “is your heart?” She paused, and looked down.

“No, madam,” replied he, sighing as deeply as herself, but with his thoughts far from her, and the object of their discourse; “I have no place in my heart to give to love. Besides, the quality in which I appear at Lady Dundas’s would preclude the vainest man alive from supposing that such behavior from any lady there to him could be possible. Therefore I am safe; though I acknowledge my obligation to your ladyship’s caution.”

Lady Sara was satisfied with the first part of this answer. It declared that his heart was unoccupied; and, as he had accepted her proffered friendship, she doubted not, when assisted by more frequent displays of her fascinations, she could destroy its lambent nature; and, in the end, light up in his bosom a similar fire to that which consumed her own.

The almost unconscious object of all these desires began internally to accuse his vanity of being too fanciful in the formation of suspicions, which on a former occasion he had believed himself forced to admit; and, blushing at a quickness of perception his contrition nominated a weakness, he found himself at the bottom of Harley-street.

Lady Sara called her servant to walk nearer to her; and, telling Thaddeus she should expect him the next evening at Lady Tinemouth’s, wished him good-morning.

He was certain that he must have staid at least half an hour beyond the time when he had promised to be with the sisters. Anticipating very haughty looks, and perhaps a reprimand, he knocked at the door, and was again shown into the library. Miss Euphemia was alone.

He offered some indistinct excuse for having made her wait; but Euphemia, with good-humored alacrity, interrupted him.

“O pray, don't mind; you have made nobody wait but me; and I can easily forgive it; for mamma and my sister chose to go out at one, it being May-day, to see the chimney-sweepers dine at Mrs. Montagu's.* They did as they liked; and I preferred staying home to repeat my lesson.”

Thaddeus, thanking her for her indulgence, sat down, and taking the book, began to question her. Not one word could she recollect. She smiled.

“I am afraid, madam, you have never thought of it since yesterday morning.”

“Indeed I have thought of nothing else; you must forgive me; I am very stupid, Mr. Constantine, at learning languages; and German is so harsh—at least to my ears? Can not you teach me any other thing? I should like to learn of you of all things, but do think of something else besides this odious jargon! Can not you teach me to read poetry elegantly? Shakspeare, for instance; I doat upon Shakspeare!”

“That would be strange presumption in a foreigner.”

“No presumption in the least,” cried she; “if you can do it, pray begin! there is Romeo and Juliet.”

* This was a gay spectacle, and a most kind act to these poor children, who thus once a year found themselves refreshed and happy. They resorted to the green court-yard of Mrs. Montagu's house every May-day, at about one o'clock, dressed in their gala wreaths, and sporting with their brushes and shovels; where they found a good dinner, kind words from their hostess and her guests, and each little sweep received a shilling at parting. On the death of Mrs. Montagu, this humane and pleasurable spectacle ceased.

Thaddeus pushed away the book with a smile.

“I can not obey. I understand Shakspeare with as much ease as you, madam, will soon do Schiller, if you apply; but I can not pretend to read the play aloud.”

“Dear me, how vexatious!—but I must hear you read something. Do take up that Werter. My sister got it from the Prussian ambassador, and he tells me it is sweetest in its own language.”

The count opened the book.

“But you will not understand a word of it.”

“I don’t care for that; I have it by heart in English; and if you will only read his last letter to Charlotte I know I can follow you in my own mind.”

To please this whimsical little creature Thaddeus turned to the letter, and read it forward with the pathos natural to his voice and character. When he came to an end and closed the volume, the cadence of his tones and the lady’s memory did ample justice to her sensibility. She looked up, and smiling through her watery eyes, which glittered like violets wet with dew, drew out her perfumed handkerchief, and wiping them, said—

“I thank you, Mr. Constantine. You see, by this irrepressible emotion, that I feel Goethe, and did not ask you a vain favor.

Thaddeus bowed; for he was at a loss to guess what kind of a reply could be expected by so strange a creature.

She continued—

“You are a German, Mr. Constantine. Did you ever see Charlotte?”

“Never, madam.”

“I am sorry for that; I should have liked to have heard what sort of a beauty she was. But don’t you think she behaved cruelly to Werter? Perhaps you knew him?”

“No, madam; this lamentable story happened before I was born.”

“How unhappy for him! I am sure you would have made the most charming friends in the world! Have you a friend, Mr. Constantine?”

The count looked at her with surprise. She laughed at the expression of his countenance.

“I don’t mean such friends as one’s father, mother, sisters, and relations; most people have enough of them. I mean a tender, confiding friend, to whom you unbosom all your secrets; who is your other self, a second soul! In short, a creature in whose existence you forget your own!”

Thaddeus followed with his eyes the heightened color of the fair enthusiast; who, accompanying her rhapsody with action expressive as her words, had to repeat her question, “Have you such a friend?” before he found recollection to answer her in the negative.

The count, who never had been used to such extravagant behavior in a woman, would have regarded Miss Euphemia Dundas as little better than insane had he not been prepared by Miss Egerton’s description; and he now acquiesced in the young lady’s desire to detain him another hour; half amused and half wearied with her aimless and wild fancies. But here he was mistaken—her fancies were not aimless; his heart was the game she had in view; and she determined a desperate attack should make it her own, in return for the deep wounds she had received from every tone of his voice while reading the “Sorrows of Werter.”

CHAPTER XXIV.

THADDEUS spent near a fortnight in the constant exercise of his occupations. In the mornings, until two, he prepared those drawings by the sale of which he was empowered to pay the good Mrs. Robson for her care of his friend. And he hoped, when the ladies in Harley-street should think it time to defray any part of their now large debt to him, he might be enabled to liquidate the very long bill of his friend's apothecary. But the Misses Dundas possessed too much money to think of its utility; they used it as counters; for they had no conception that to other people it was the purchaser of almost every comfort. Their comforts came so certainly they supposed they grew of necessity out of their situation; and that their great wealth owned no other commission than to give splendid parties and buy fine things. Their golden shower being exhaled by the same vanity by which it had been shed, they as little regarded its dispersion as they had marked its descent.

Hence, these amiable ladies never once recollected that their master ought to receive some weightier remuneration for his visits than the honor of paying them; and as poets say the highest honors are achieved by suffering, so these two sisters, though in different ways, seemed resolved that Thaddeus should purchase his distinction with adequate pains.

Notwithstanding that Miss Dundas continued very remiss in her lessons, she unrelentingly required the count's attendance; and sometimes, not in the most gentle language, reproached him for a backwardness she owed entirely to her own inattention and stupidity. The fair Diana would have been the most learned woman in the world could she have found any fine-lady path to the temple of science; but the goddess who presides there being only to be won by arduous climbing, poor Miss Dundas, like the indolent monarch who made the same demand of the philosophers, was obliged to lay the fault of her own slippery feet on the weakness of her conductors.

As Thaddeus despised her most heartily, he bore ill-humor from that quarter with unshaken equanimity. But the pretty Euphemia was not so easily managed. She had now completely given up her fanciful soul to this prince in disguise; and already began to act a thousand extravagances. Without suspecting the object, Diana soon discovered that her sister was in one of her love-fits. Indeed she cared nothing about it; and leaving her to pursue the passion as she liked, poor Euphemia, according to her custom when laboring under this whimsical malady, addicted herself to solitude. This romantic taste she generally indulged by taking her footman to the gate of the green in Cavendish-square, where he stood until she had performed a pensive saunter up and down the walk. After this, she returned, adjusted her hair in the Madonna fashion (because Thaddeus had one day admired the female head in a holy family, by Guido, over the chimney-piece), and then seating herself in some becoming attitude, usually waited, with her eyes constantly turning to the door, until the object of these devices presented himself. She impatiently watched all his motions and looks while he attended to her sister; and the moment that was done, she ran over her own lessons with great volubility, but little attention. Her task finished, she shut the books, and employed the remainder of the time in translating a number of little mottoes into German, which she had composed for boxes, baskets, and other frippery.

One day, when her young teacher was, as usual, tired to death with making common sense out of so much nonsense, Euphemia observed that Diana had removed to the other end of the room with the honorable Mr. Lascelles. To give an éclat to her new studies, Miss Dundas had lately opened her library door to morning visitors; and seeing her sister thus engaged, Euphemia thought that she might do what she wished without detection, and hastily drawing a folded paper from her pocket, she desired Thaddeus to take it home and translate it into the language he liked best.

Surprised at her manner, he held it in his hand.

“Put it in your pocket,” added she, in a hurrying voice, “else my sister may see it, and ask what it is!”

Full of wonder, he obeyed her; and the little beauty, having executed her scheme, seemed quite intoxicated with delight. When he was preparing to withdraw, she called to him, and asked when he should visit Lady Tinemouth.

“This evening, madam.”

“Then,” returned she, “tell her ladyship I shall come and sit half an hour with her to-night; and here, added she, running up to him, “present her that rose, with my love.” While she put it into his hand she whispered in a low voice, “and you will tell me what you think of the verses I have given you.”

Thaddeus blushed, and bowed. He hurried out of the house into the street, as if by that haste he could have gotten out of a dilemma to which he feared all this foolish mystery of Euphemia was only the introduction.

Though of all men in the world he was perhaps the least inclined to vanity, yet he must have been the most stupid, had he not been convinced, by this time, of the criminal attachment of Lady Sara. Added to that disagreeable certainty, he now more than dreaded a similar folly in Miss Euphemia.

Can a man see himself the daily object of a pair of melting eyes, hear everlasting sighs at his entrance and departure, day after day receive tender though covert addresses about disinterested love—can he witness all this and be sincere when he affirms it is the language of indifference? If that be possible, the Count Sobieski has no pretensions to modesty: he comprehended the “discoursing” of Miss Euphemia’s “eye ;” also the tendency of the love-sick mottoes which, under various excuses, she put into his hand; and with many a smile of pity he contemplated her childish absurdity.

A few days prior to that in which she made this appointment with Thaddeus she presented to him another of her devices, which ran thus:—“Frighted love, like a wild beast, shakes the wood in which it hides.”

Thaddeus almost laughed at the oddity of the conceit.

“Do, dear Mr. Constantine,” cried she, “translate it into the sweetest French you can; for I mean to have it put into a medallion, and to give it to the person whom I most value on earth!”

There was something so truly ridiculous in the sentence that, reluctant to allow even Miss Euphemia to expose herself so far, he considered a moment how he should make any thing so bad better, and then said, “I am afraid I can not translate it literally; but surely, madam, you can do it yourself!”

“Yes, but I like your French better than mine; so, pray oblige me.”

He had done the same kind of thing a hundred times, and, without further discussion, wrote as follows:—

“L’amour, tel qu’une biche blessée, se trahit lui-même par sa crainte, qui fait remuer le feuillage qui le couvre.”

“Bless me, how pretty!” cried she, and immediately put it into her bosom.

To this unlucky addition the words se trahit lui-même, Thaddeus was indebted for the present of the folded paper. The ever-working imagination of Euphemia had seized the inserted thought as a delicate avowal that he was the wounded deer he had substituted in place of the wild beast ; and as soon as he arrived at home he found the effects of her mistake in the packet she had given with so much secrecy.

When he broke the seal, something dropped out and fell on the carpet. He took it up, and blushed for her, on finding a gold medallion, with the words he had altered for Miss Euphemia, engraved on blue enamel. With an agitated hand he next looked at the envelop ; it contained a copy of verses, with this line written at the top :—

“To him who will apply them.”

On perusing further, he found them to be Mr. Phillip's beautiful translation of that ode of Sappho, which runs—“Blest as the immortal gods is he,

The friend who fondly sits by thee.
And hears and sees thee all the while Softly speak, and sweetly smile!

“'T was this deprived my soul of rest,
And raised such tumults in my breast :
For while I gazed in transport tossed,
My breath was gone, my voice was lost.

“My bosom glowed ; the subtle flame
Ran quick through all my frame ;
O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung ;
My ears with hollow murmurs rung.

“In dewy damps my limbs were chilled ;
My blood with gentle horrors thrilled :
My feeble pulse forgot to play :
I fainted, sunk, and died away!

“EUPHEMIA ”

Thaddeus threw the verses and the medallion together on the table, and sat for a few moments considering how he should extricate himself from an affair so truly farcical in itself, but which might be productive to him of very distressing consequences.

He was thinking of at once giving up the task of attending either of the sisters, when his eyes falling on the uncomplaining but melancholy features of his poor friend, he exclaimed, "No ; for thy sake, gallant Butzou, I will brave every scene, however abhorrent to my heart !"

Well aware, from observation on Miss Euphemia, that the seeming tenderness which prompted an act so wild and unbecoming originated in mere caprice, he did not hesitate in determining to return the things in as handsome a manner as possible ; and, by so doing, at once crush the whole affair. He felt no pain in forming these resolves ; because he saw that not one impulse of her conduct sprung from her heart. It was a whim raised by him to-day which might be superseded by another to-morrow.

But how different was the case with regard to Lady Sara ! Her uncontrolled nature could not long brook the restraints of friendship. Every attention he gave to Lady Tinemouth, every civility he paid to Miss Egerton, or to any other lady whom he met at the countess's, went like a dagger to her soul ; and whenever she could gain his ear in private, she generally made him sensible of her misery, and his own unhappiness in being its cause, by reproaches which too unequivocally proclaimed their source.

He now saw that she had given way to a dangerous and headstrong passion ; and, allowing for the politeness which is due to the sex, he tried by an appearance of the most stubborn coldness, and an obstinate perversity in shutting his apprehension against all her speeches and actions, to stem a tide that threatened her with ruin.

Lady Tinemouth at last began to open her eyes to the perilous situation of both her friends. Highly as she esteemed Thaddeus, she knew not the extent of his integrity. She had lived too long near the circle of the Prince of Wales, and had seen too many men from the courts of the continent, to place much reliance on the honor of a single and unattached young man, when assailed by rank, beauty, and love.

Alarmed at what might be the result of her observations, and fearing to lose any time, she had that very evening in which she expected Thaddeus to supper, drawn out of Lady Sara the unhappy state of her heart.

The dreadful confession was made by her ladyship with repeated showers of tears, and in paroxysms of agony which pierced the countess to the soul.

“My dear Lady Sara,” cried she, “for heaven’s sake remember your duty to Captain Roos!”

“I shall never forget it!” exclaimed her ladyship, shaking her head mournfully, and striking her breast with her clinched hand; “I never look on the face of Constantine that I do not execrate from my heart the vows which I have sworn to Roos; but I have bound myself his property; and, though I hate him, whatever it may cost me, I will never forget that my faith and honor are my husband’s.”

With a countenance bathed in tears, Lady Tinemouth put her arms round the waist of Lady Sara, who now sat motionless, with her eyes fixed on the fire.

“Dear Lady Sara! that was spoken like yourself. Do more; abstain from seeing Mr. Constantine.”

“Don’t require of me that,” cried she; “I could easier rid myself of existence. He is the very essence of my happiness. It is only in his company that I forget I am a wretch.”

“This is obstinacy, my dear Lady Sara! This is courting danger.”

“Lady Tinemouth, urge me no more. Is it not enough,” continued she, sullenly, “that I am miserable? Would you drive me to desperation? If there be danger, you brought me into it.”

“I?”

“Yes, you, Lady Tinemouth; you introduced him to me.”

“But you are married. Handsome and amiable as he is, could I suppose ——”

“Nonsense!” cried her ladyship, interrupting her; “you know that I am married to a mere fool! But it is not because Constantine is handsome that I like him. No; though no human form can come nearer to perfection, yet it was not that: it was you. You and Maria Egerton were always telling me of his bravery; what wealth and honors he had sacrificed in the service of his country; how nobly he succored the distresses of others; how heedless he was of his own. This fired my imagination and won my heart. No, it was not his beauty; I am not so despicable!”

“Dear Lady Sara, be calm!” entreated the countess, completely at a loss how to manage a spirit of such violence; “think, my dear friend, what horrors you would experience if Mr. Constantine were to discover this predilection and presume upon it! You know where even the best men are vulnerable.”

The eyes of Lady Sara sparkled with pleasure.

“Why, surely, Lady Sara!” exclaimed Lady Tinemouth, doubtfully.

“Don’t fear me, Lady Tinemouth; I know my own dignity too well to do any thing disgraceful; yet I would acquire the knowledge that he loves me at almost any price. But he is cold,” added she; “he is a piece of obstinate petrification, which Heaven itself could not melt!”

Lady Tinemouth was glad to hear this account of Thaddeus; but ere she could reply, the drawing-room door opened, and Miss Euphemia Dundas was announced.

When the little beauty expressed her amazement at not seeing Mr. Constantine, Lady Sara gave her such a withering look that had her ladyship’s eyes been Medusan, poor Euphemia would have stood there forever after a stone statue of disappointment

CHAPTER XXV.

MEANWHILE the count having seen Dr. Cavendish, and received a favorable opinion of his friend, wrote the following note to Miss Euphemia :—

“TO MISS EUPHEMIA DUNDAS.

“Mr. Constantine very much admires the taste of Miss Euphemia Dundas, in her choice of the verses which she did him the honor of requesting he would translate into the most expressive language; and to the utmost of his abilities he has obeyed her commands in Italian, thinking that language the best adapted to the versification and the subject.

“Mr. Constantine equally admires the style of the medalion which Miss E. Dundas has condescended to inclose for his inspection, and assures her the letters are correct.”

Having sealed his note, and seen the general in bed, with little Nanny seated by him to watch his slumbers, Thaddeus pursued his way to Grosvenor place.

When he entered Lady Tinemouth's drawing-room, he saw that his young innamorata was already arrived, and in close conversation with the countess. Lady Sara, seated alone on a sofa, inwardly upbraided Constantine for what she thought an absolute assignation with Euphemia.

Her half resentful eyes, yet swimming in the tears which her discourse with Lady Tinemouth had occasioned, sought his averted face as he looked at Miss Dundas with evident surprise and disgust. This pleased her, and the more so as he only bowed to her rival, shook the countess by the hand, and then returning, took his station beside her on the sofa.

She would not trust her triumphant eyes toward Lady

Tinemouth, but immediately asked him some trifling question. At the same moment Euphemia tapped him on the arm with her fan, and inquired how it happened she had arrived first.

He answered Lady Sara. Euphemia impatiently repeated her demand, "How did it happen I arrived first?" "I suppose, madam," replied he, smiling, "because you were so fortunate as to set out first. But had I been so happy as to have preceded you, I should certainly have executed your commands, and have delivered your message and present to Lady Tinemouth. I hope your ladyship will permit me to do it now?" said he, rising, and taking Euphemia's rose from his button as he approached the countess: "Miss Euphemia Dundas has done me the honor to make me the bearer of sweets to the sweet; and thus I surrender my trust." He bowed and put the flower into Lady Tinemouth's hand, who smiled and thanked Euphemia. But the little beauty blushed like her own rose; and murmuring within herself at the literal apprehension of her favorite, whom she thought as handsome as Cimon and as stupid too, she flirted her fan, and asked Miss Egerton whether she had read Charlotte Smith's last delightful novel.

The evening passed off more agreeably to Thaddeus than he had augured from the scene that presented itself on his entrance. Lady Sara always gave him pain: Miss Euphemia teased him to death; but to-night the storm which had agitated the breast of her ladyship having subsided into thoughtfulness, it imparted so abstracted an air to her ever-lovely countenance that, merely to elude communication with Euphemia, he remained near her; and by paying those attentions which he could not avoid, he so deluded the wretched Lady Sara as to subdue her melancholy into an enchanting softness that rendered her the most captivating of women.

The only person present who did not approve the change was Lady Tinemouth. At every dissolving smile of her

Circean ladyship she beheld the intoxicating cup at the lips of Thaddeus, and dreaded its effect. Euphemia was too busily employed repeating some new poems, and too intensely dreaming of what her tutor might say on the verses and medallion, to observe the dangerous ascendancy which the superior charms of Lady Sara might acquire over the heart of Constantine. Indeed, she had no suspicion of finding a rival in her ladyship; and when a servant announced the arrival of her mother's coach, and she saw by her watch it was twelve o'clock, she arose reluctantly, exclaiming—

“I dare say some plaguing people have arrived who are to stay with us; else mamma would not have sent for me so soon.”

“I call it late,” said Lady Sara, who would not lose an opportunity of contradicting her: “so I will thank you, Mr. Constantine,” addressing herself to him, “to hand me to my coach at the same time.”

Euphemia bit her lip at this movement of her ladyship, and followed her down stairs reddening with anger. She got into her carriage, but would not suffer the servant to close the door until she had seen Lady Sara seated in hers; and then she called to Mr. Constantine to speak with her.

Lady Sara leaned her head out of the window. As she saw the man she loved approach Lady Dundas's carriage, she, in her turn, bit her lips with vexation.

“Home, my lady?” asked the servant, touching his hat.

“No, not till Miss Dundas's coach drives on.”

Miss Euphemia desired Thaddeus to step in for a moment; and reluctantly he obeyed.

“Mr. Constantine,” cried the pretty simpleton, trembling with expectation as she made room for him beside her, “have you opened the paper I gave you?”

“Yes, madam,” returned he, holding the door open, and widening it with one hand as he spoke—while with the other he presented his note, "and I have the honor in that paper to have executed your commands."

Euphemia caught it eagerly; and Thaddeus immediately leaping out, wished her a good-night, and hurried back into the house. While the carriages drove away he ascended to the drawing-room to take leave of the countess.

Lady Tinemouth, seated on the sofa, was leaning thoughtfully against one its arms when he re-entered. He approached her.

"I wish you a good-night, Lady Tinemouth."

She turned her head.

"Mr. Constantine, I wish you would stay a little longer with me! My spirits are disturbed, and I am afraid it will be near morning before Maria returns from Richmond. These rural balls are sad dissipated amusements!"

Thaddeus laid down his hat and took a seat by her side.

"I am happy, dear Lady Tinemouth, at all times to be with you; but I am sorry to hear you have met with any thing to discompose you. I was afraid when I came in that something disagreeable had happened; your eyes—"

"Alas! if my eyes were always to show when I have been weeping they might ever be telling tales!" Her ladyship passed her hand across her eyes as she spoke, and added, "We may think on our sorrows with an outward air of tranquillity; but we can not always speak of them without some agitation."

"Ah, Lady Tinemouth!" exclaimed the count, drawing closer to her, "could not even your sensible heart escape calamity?"

"To cherish a sensible heart, my young friend," replied she, "is not a very effectual way to avoid the pressure of affliction. On the reverse, such a temper extracts unhappiness from causes which would fail to extort even a sigh from dispositions of less susceptibility. Ideas of sensibility and sympathy are pretty toys for a novice to play with, but change those wooden swords into weapons of real metal, and you will find the points through your heart before you are aware of the danger—at least, I found it so. Mr. Constantine, I have frequently promised to explain to you the reason of the sadness which so often tinges my conversation; indeed, I know not when I shall be in a fitter humor to indulge myself at your expense, for I never was more wretched, never stood more in need of the consolations of a friend.”

She covered her face with her handkerchief, and remained so for some time. Thaddeus pressed her hand several times, and waited in respectful silence until she recommenced.

“Forgive me, my dear sir; I am very low to-night—very nervous. Having encountered two or three distressing circumstances to-day these tears relieve me. You have heard me speak of my son and of my lord; yet I never collected resolution to recount how we were separated. This morning I saw my son pass my window; he looked up; but the moment I appeared he turned away and hastened down the street. Though I have received many stronger proofs of dislike, both from his father and himself, yet, slight as this offense may seem, it pierced me to the heart. O, Mr. Constantine, to know that the child to whom I gave life regards me with abhorrence is dreadful—is beyond even the anxious partiality of a mother either to excuse or to palliate!”

“Perhaps, dear Lady Tinemouth, you misjudge Lord Harwold; he may be under the commands of his father, and yet long to show you his affection and duty.”

“No, Mr. Constantine, your heart is too good even to guess what may be the guilt of another. Gracious Heaven! am I obliged to speak so of my own son! He who was my darling! He who once loved me so dearly! But hear me, my dear sir; you shall judge for yourself; and you will wonder that I am now alive to endure more. I have suffered by him, by his father, and by a dreadful woman, who not only tore my husband and children from me, but stood by till I was beaten to the ground. Yes, Mr. Constantine, any humane man would shudder as you do at such an assertion; but it is too true. Soon after Lady Sophia Lovel became the mistress of my lord and persuaded him to take my son from me I heard that the poor boy had fallen ill through grief, and lay sick at his lordship's house in Hampshire. I heard he was dying. Imagine my agonies. Wild with distress I flew to the lodge, and forgetful of any thing but my child, was hastening across the park when I saw this woman, this Lady Sophia, approaching me, followed by two female servants. One of them carried my daughter then an infant, in her arms: and the other, a child of which this unnatural wretch had recently become the mother. I was flying toward my little Albina to clasp her to my heart when Lady Sophia caught hold of my arm. Her voice now rings in my ears. 'Woman!' cried she, 'leave this place: there are none here to whom you are not an object of abhorrence.'

"Struggling to break from her, I implored to be permitted to embrace my child; but she held me fast, and, regardless of my cries, ordered both the women to return into the house. Driven to despair I dropped on my knees, conjuring her by her feelings as a mother to allow me for one moment to see my dying son; and that I would promise, by my hopes of everlasting happiness, to cherish her child as my own should it ever stand in need of a friend. The horrid woman only laughed at my prayers, and left me in a swoon. When I recovered, the first objects I beheld were my lord and Lady Sophia standing near me, and myself in the arms of a manservant, whom they had commanded to carry me outside of the gate. At the sight of my husband I sprung to his feet, when, with one dreadful blow of his hand he knocked me to the ground. Merciful Providence! how did I retain my senses! I beseeched this cruel husband to give me a second blow that I might suffer no more.

“‘Take her out of my sight,’ cried he, ‘she is mad.’”

“I was taken out of his sight more dead than alive; and led by his pitying servants to an inn, where I was afterward confined three weeks with a brain fever. From that hour I have never known a day of health.”

Thaddeus was shocked beyond utterance at this relation. The paleness of his countenance being the only reply he made to her ladyship, she resumed,

“I have gone out of order. I proposed to inform you clearly of my situation, but the principal outrage of my heart rose immediately to my lips. I will commence regularly if I can methodize my recollection.

“The Earl of Tinemouth married me from passion: I will not sanctify his emotions by the name of affection: though,” added she, forcing a smile, “these faded features too plainly show that, of all mankind, I loved but him alone. I was just fifteen when he came to visit my father, who lived in Berkshire. My father, Mr. Cumnor, and his father, Lord Harwold, had been friends at college. My lord, then Mr. Stanhope, was young, handsome, and captivating. He remained the autumn with us; and at the end of that period declared an affection for me which my heart too readily answered. About this time he received a summons from his father, and we parted. Like most girls of my age I cherished an unconquerable bashfulness against admitting any confidant in my attachment; hence my parents knew nothing of the affair until it burst upon them in the cruelest shape.

“About two months after Mr. Stanhope’s departure, a letter arrived from him urging me to fly to Scotland. He alleged as a reason for such a step that his grandfather, the Earl of Tinemouth, insisted on his forming a union with Lady Sophia Lovel, who was then a young widow, and the favorite niece of the most powerful nobleman in the kingdom. Upon this demand he told the earl his affections were engaged. His lordship, whose passions were those of a mad-man, broke into such horrible execrations of myself and my family, that Mr. Stanhope confessed he forgot his duty as a grandson, and peremptorily swore that no power on earth should compel him either to marry so notorious a woman as Lady Sophia Lovel, or to give up me. After communicating these particulars to me, he concluded with repeating his entreaties that I would consent to go with him to Scotland. The whole of this letter so alarmed me that I showed it to my parents. My father answered it in a manner befitting his own character; but he irritated the impetuous passions of my lover almost to frenzy. In short, in a paroxysm of rage he flew to his grandfather, upbraided him with the ruin of his happiness, and so exasperated the old man that he drew his sword upon him; and had it not been for the interference of Lord Harwold, a most fatal catastrophe might have ensued. To end the affair at once, Lord Harwold, whose gentle nature embraced the mildest measures, obtained the earl's permission to send Mr. Stanhope abroad.

“Meanwhile I was upheld by my father, who is now no more, in firmly rejecting my lover's entreaties for a private marriage. And as his grandfather continued resolutely deaf to his prayers or threats, Stanhope was at length persuaded by his excellent father to accompany a relation to France.

“At the end of a few weeks Mr. Stanhope began to regard his cousin as a spy; and after a violent quarrel they parted, no one knowing to what quarter my lover directed his steps. I believe I was the first who heard any tidings of him. I remember well it was in 1770, about four and twenty years ago, that I received a letter from him; (O! how legibly are these circumstances written in my memory!) it was dated from Italy, where he told me he resided in complete retirement under the assumed name of Sackville."

At this name, with every feature fixed in dismay, Thaddeus fell back on the sofa.

The countess caught his hand.

"What is the matter? Are you ill? What is the matter?"

The bolt of indelible disgrace had struck to his heart. It was some minutes before he could recover; but when he did speak, he said, "Pray go on madam, I am subject to this. Pray forgive me, and go on; I shall become better as you proceed."

"No, my dear friend; I will quit my dismal story at present, and resume it at some other time."

"Pray continue it now," rejoined Thaddeus; "I shall never be more fit to listen. Do, I entreat you."

"Are you sincere in your request? I fear I have already affected you too much."

"No; I am sincere; let me hear it all. Do not hold back any thing which relates to that barbarian Englishman who completed his crimes by rendering you wretched!"

"Alas! he did," resumed her ladyship; for when he returned, which was in consequence of the Earl of Tinemouth's death, my father was also dead, who might have stood between me and my inclinations and so preserved me from many succeeding sorrows. I sealed my fate and became his wife.

"The father of my husband was now Earl of Tinemouth; and as he had never been averse to our union, he presented me with a cottage on the banks of the Wye, where I passed three delightful years, the happiest of womankind. My husband, my mother, and my infant son, formed my felicity; and greatly I prized it; too greatly to be allowed a long continuance!

“At the end of this period, some gay friends paid us a visit. When they returned to town they persuaded my lord to be of the party. He went; and from that fatal day all my sufferings arose.

“Lord Harwold, instead of being with me in a fortnight as he had promised, procrastinated his absence under various excuses from week to week, during which interval my Albina was born. Day after day I anticipated the delight of putting her into the arms of her father, but she was three months old before he appeared; and, ah! how changed. He was gloomy to me, uncivil to my mother, and hardly looked at the child.”

Lady Tinemouth stopped at this part of her narrative to wipe away her tears. Thaddeus was sitting forward to the table, leaning on his arm with his hand covering his face. The countess was grateful for an excess of sympathy she did not expect; and taking his other hand as it lay motionless on his knee, “What a consolation would it be to me,” exclaimed she, “durst I entertain a hope that I may one day behold but half of such pity in my son!”

Thaddeus only pressed her hand; he did not venture to reply; he could not tell her that she deceived herself even here; that he did not deplore only her misfortunes, but owed the agonies which were shaking him to the injuries of his own mother, whom the villainous conduct of this very earl, under the name of Sackville, he now believed, had devoted to a life of sorrow! Had he derived existence from the husband of Lady Tinemouth? The conviction humbled him, crushed him, and trod him to the earth.

The countess resumed:—

“It would be impossible, my dear sir, to describe to you the gradual changes which assured me that I had lost the heart of my husband. Before the end of the winter, he left me again, and I saw him no more until that frightful hour in which he struck me to the ground.

“Lord Tinemouth came into Monmouthshire about six weeks after I parted with my lord. I was surprised and rejoiced to see my good father-in-law; but how soon were my emotions driven into a different course! He revealed to me that during Lord Harwold’s first visit to town he had been in the habit of spending entire evenings with Lady Sophia Lovel.

“‘This woman,’ added he, ‘is the most artful of her sex. In spite of her acknowledged dishonor, you well know my deceased father would gladly have married her to my son; and now it seems, actuated by revenge, she resents Lord Harwold’s refusal of her hand by seducing him from his wife. Alas! I am too well convinced the errors of my son bear too strict a resemblance to those of his grandfather. Impatient of contradiction, flattery can mold him to what it pleases. Lady Sophia has discovered these weak points in his character! and I am informed she has persuaded him that you impose on his affection by detaining him from the world. This argument must have been well seconded by other fascinations; for in regard to beauty she is only moderate, yet she has succeeded, and my deluded son has accompanied her to Spain.’

“You may imagine, Mr. Constantine, my distraction at this intelligence. I was like one lost; and Lord Tinemouth, fearing to trust me in such despair out of his sight, brought us all with him to London. In less than four months afterward I was deprived of this inestimable friend by a paralytic stroke. His death summoned the new earl to England. While I lay on a sick bed, into which I had been thrown by the shock, my lord and his mistress arrived.

“They immediately assumed the command of my protector’s house, and ordered my mother to clear it directly of me. My heart-broken parent obeyed, and I was carried in a senseless state to a lodging in the nearest street. But when this dear mother returned for my children, neither of them were permitted to see her. The malignant Lady Sophia, actuated by an insatiable hatred of me, easily wrought on my frantic husband (for I must believe him mad) to detain them entirely. A short time after this that dreadful scene happened which I have before described.

“Year succeeded year, during which time I received many cruel insults from my husband, many horrible ones from my son; for I had been advised to institute a suit against my lord, in which I only pleaded for the return of my children. I lost my cause, owing, I hope, to bad counsel, not to the laws of my country. I was adjudged to be separated from the earl, with a maintenance of six hundred a year, which he hardly pays. I was tied down never to speak to him, his son, nor his daughter. Though this sentence was passed, I never acknowledged its justice, but wrote several times to my children. Lord Harwold, who is too deeply infected with his father’s cruelty, has either returned my letters unopened, or with insulting replies. For my daughter, she keeps an undeviating silence; and I have not even seen her since the moment in which she was hurried from my eyes in Tinemouth Park.

“In vain her brother tries to convince me that she detests me; I will not believe it; and the hope, that should I survive her father, I may yet embrace my child, has been, and will be, my source of comfort until it be fulfilled, or I bury my disappointment in the grave.”

Lady Tinemouth put her handkerchief to her eyes, which were again flowing with tears. Thaddeus thought he must speak, if he would not betray an interest in her narrative which he determined no circumstance should ever humble him to reveal; and raising his head from his hand, unconsciously discovered to the countess his agonized countenance.

“Kind sympathizing Constantine; surely such a heart as thine never would bring sorrow to the breast of a virtuous wife!”

These were her ladyship's thoughts, though she did not give them utterance. Thaddeus rose from his seat.

"Farewell, Lady Tinemouth," said he; "may Heaven bless you, and pardon your husband!"

Then grasping her hand, with what he intended should be a pressure of friendship, but which his internal tortures rendered almost intolerable, he hastened down stairs, opened the outward door, and got into the street.

Unknowing and heedless whither he went, with the steps of a man driven by the furies, he traversed first one street and then another. As he went along, in vain the watchmen reminded him, by their cries, that it was past three o'clock; he still wandered on, forgetting that it was night, that he had any home, any destination.

His father was discovered! That father of whom he had entertained a latent hope, should they ever meet, might produce some excuse for having been betrayed into an act disgraceful to a man of honor. But when all these filial dreams were blasted by the conviction that he owed his being to the husband of Lady Tinemouth; that his mother was the victim of a profligate; that he had sprung from a man who was not merely a villain, but the most wanton, the most despicable of villains; he saw himself bereft of hope, and overwhelmed with shame and horror.

Full of reflections which none other than a son in such circumstances can conceive, he was lost amid the obscure alleys of Tottenham-court-road, when loud and frequent cries recalled his attention. A quantity of smoke, with flashes of light, led him to suppose that they were occasioned by a fire; and a few steps further, the tremendous spectacle burst upon his sight.

It was a house from the windows of which the flames were breaking out in every direction, while a gathering concourse of people were either standing in stupified astonishment, or uselessly shouting for engines and assistance.

At the moment in which he arrived, two or three naked wretches, just escaped from their beds, were flying from side to side, making the air echo with their shrieks.

“Will nobody save my children?” cried one of them, approaching Thaddeus, and wringing her hands in an agony; “Will nobody take them from the fire?”

“Where shall I seek them?” replied he.

“Oh! in that room,” exclaimed she, pointing: “the flames are already there; they will be burned! they will be burned!”

The poor woman was hurrying madly forward when the count stopped her, and giving her in charge to a bystander, ‘Take care of this woman,’ cried he: “if possible, I will save her children.” Darting through the open door;—in defiance of the smoke and danger, he made his way to the children’s room; where, almost suffocated by the sulphureous cloud that surrounded him, he at last found the bed, but it contained one child only. This he instantly caught up in his arms; and was hastening down stairs, when the cries of the other from a distant part of the building, made him hesitate; but thinking it better to secure one than to hazard both by lingering, he got into the street just as a post-chaise had stopped to inquire the particulars of the accident. The carriage door being open, and Thaddeus seeing people in it, without saying a word threw the sleeping infant into their laps, and hastened back into the house, where he hoped to rescue the other before the fire could increase.

The flames having now made a dreadful progress, his face, hands, and clothes were scorched by their fury as he flew from room to room, following the shrieks of the child, who seemed to change its situation with every exertion that he made to reach it. At length when every moment he expected the house would sink under his feet, as a last attempt he directed his steps along a passage he had not before observed, and to his great joy beheld the object of his search flying down a back staircase The boy sprung into his arms ; and Thaddeus turning round, leaped from one landing-place to another, until he found himself in the street, and surrounded by a crowd of people.

He saw the poor mother clasp the rescued child to her breast ; and while the spectators were loading her with congratulations, he slipped unseen away ; and proceeded homeward with a warmth at his heart which made him forget in the joy of a benevolent action that petrifying shock which had been occasioned by the vices of one too nearly allied to his being to be hated without horror.

CHAPTER XXVI.

WHEN Thaddeus awoke next morning, he found himself more refreshed and free from the effects of the last night's discovery than he could have reasonably hoped. The presence of mind and activity which the fire called on him to exert, having forced his thoughts into a different channel, afforded his nerves an opportunity to regain some portion of their usual strength. He could now reflect on what he had heard without suffering the crimes of another to lay him on the rack. The reins were again restored to his hand ; and neither agitation nor anxiety showed themselves in his face or manner.

Though the count's sensibility was very irritable, and when suddenly attacked he could not always conceal his emotion, yet he possessed a power of look which immediately repressed the impertinence of curiosity or insolence. Indeed, this mantle of repulsion proved to be his best shield ; for never had man more demands on the dignity of his soul to shine out about his person.

Not unfrequently has his sudden appearance in the room at Lady Dundas's at once called a natural glow through the ladies' rouge, and silenced the gentlemen, when he has happened to enter while Miss Dundas and half a dozen beaux and belles have been ridiculing Euphemia on the absurd civilities she paid to her language-master!

The morning after the fire a little bevy of fashionable butterflies were collected in this way, at one corner of Miss Dundas's study, when during a moment's pause, "I hope, Miss Beaufort," cried the Honorable Mr. Lascelles, "I hope you don't intend to consume the brightness of your eyes over this stupid language?"

"What language, Mr. Lascelles?" inquired she: "I have this moment entered the room, and I don't know what you are talking about."

"Good Lud, that is very true," cried he; "I mean a shocking jargon which a shocking penseroso man teaches to these ladies. We want to persuade Miss Euphemia that it spoils her mouth."

"You are always misconceiving me, Mr. Lascelles," interrupted Miss Dundas, impatiently; "I did not advance one word against the language; I merely remonstrated with Phemy against her preposterous attentions to the man we hire to teach it."

"That was what I mean, madam," resumed he, with a low bow.

"You mean, what, sir?" demanded the little beauty, contemptuously; "but I need not ask. You are like a bad mirror, which from radical defect always gives false reflections."

"Very good, efaith, Miss Euphemia! I declare, sterling wit. It would do honor to Sheridan, or your sister."

"Mr. Lascelles," cried Euphemia, more vexed than before, "let me tell you such impertinence is very unbecoming a gentleman."

“Upon my soul, Miss Euphemia!”

“Pray allow the petulant young lady to get out of her airs, as she has, I believe, got out of her senses, without our help!” exclaimed Miss Dundas; “for I declare I know not where she picked up these vile democratic ideas.”

“I am not a democrat, Diana,” answered Euphemia, rising from her seat; “and I won’t stay to be abused when I know it is all envy because Mr. Constantine happened to say that I have a quicker memory than you have.”

She left the room as she ended. Miss Dundas ready to storm with passion, but striving to conceal it, burst into a violent laugh, and turning to Miss Beaufort, “You see, my dear,” said she, “a sad specimen of Euphemia’s temper: yet I hope you won’t think too severely of her; for, poor thing, she has been spoiled by us all.”

“Pray, do not apologize to me in particular!” replied Miss Beaufort; “but, to be frank, I think it probable she would have shown her temper less had you given your admonition in private. I doubt not that she has committed something wrong, yet—”

“Yes, something very wrong,” interrupted Miss Dundas, reddening at this rebuke; “both Mr. Lascelles and Lord Berrington there—”

“Don’t bring in my name, I pray Miss Dundas,” cried the viscount, who was looking over an old edition of Massinger’s plays; “you know I hate being squeezed into squabbles.”

Miss Dundas dropped the corners of her mouth in contempt, and went on.

“Well, then, Mr. Lascelles and Miss Poyntz, here, have both, at different times, been present when Phemy has conducted herself in a very ridiculous way toward a young man Lady Tinemouth sent here to teach us German. Can you believe it possible that a girl of her fashion could behave in this style without having first imbibed some very dangerous notions? I am sure I am right, for she could not be more civil to him if he were a gentleman." Miss Dundas supposed she had now set the business beyond controversy, and stopped with an air of triumph. Miss Beaufort perceived that her answer was expected.

"I really can not discover any thing in the affair so very reprehensible," replied she: "perhaps the man you speak of may have talents and worth; he may be above his situation."

"Ah! above it, sure enough!" cried Lascelles, laughing boisterously at his own folly: "he is tall enough to be above every thing, even good manners; for notwithstanding his plebeian calling, I don't find he knows how to keep his distance."

"I am sorry for that, Lascelles," cried Berrington, measuring the puppy with his good-natured eye; "for these Magog men are terrible objects to us of meaner dimensions! 'A substitute shines brightly as a king until a king be by.'"

"Why, my lord, you do not mean to compare me with such a low fellow as this? I don't understand, Lord Berrington—"

"Bless me, gentlemen!" cried Miss Dundas, frightened at the angry looks of the little honorable, "why, my lord, I thought you hated squabbles."

"So I do, Miss Dundas," replied he, laying down his book, and coming forward; "and upon my honor, Mr. Lascelles," added he, smiling, and turning toward the coxcomb, who stood nidging his head with anger by Miss Beaufort's chair; "upon my honor, Mr. Lascelles, I did not mean to draw any parallel between your person and talents and those of this Mr. —, I forget his name; for truly I never saw him in my life; but I dare swear no comparison can exist between you."

Lascelles took the surface of this speech, and bowed; while his lordship, turning to Miss Beaufort, began to compliment himself on possessing so fair an ally in defense of the absent person.

“I never have seen him,” replied she; “and what is more, I never heard of him, till on entering the room Mr. Lascelles attacked me for my opinion. I only arrived from the country last night, and can have no guess at the real grounds of this ill-judged bustle of Miss Dundas’s about a man she styles despicable. If he be so, why retain him in her service? and, what is more absurd, why make a person in that subordinate situation the subject of debate among her friends?”

“You are right, Miss Beaufort,” returned Lord Berrington; “but the eloquent Miss Dundas is so kind to her friends she lets no opportunity slip of displaying her power, both over the republic of words and the empire of her mother’s family.”

“Are not you severe now, Lord Berrington? I thought you generous to the poor tutor.”

“No; I hope I am just on both subjects. I know the lady, and it is true that I have seen nothing of the tutor; but it is natural to wield the sword in favor of the defenseless, and I always regard the absent in that light.”

While these two conversed at one end of the room, the other group were arraigning the presumption of the vulgar, and the folly of them who gave it encouragement.

At a fresh burst of laughter from Miss Dundas, Miss Beaufort mechanically turned her head: her eye was arrested by the appearance of a gentleman in black, who was standing a few paces within the door. He was regarding the party before him with that lofty tranquillity which is inseparable from high rank, when it is accompanied by virtue. His figure, his face, and his air, contained that pure simplicity of contour which portrays all the graces of youth with the dignity of manhood.

Miss Beaufort in a moment perceived that he was unobserved; and, rising from her seat, “Miss Dundas,” said she, “here is a gentleman.”

Miss Dundas looked round carelessly.

“You may sit down, Mr. Constantine.”

“Is it possible !” thought Miss Beaufort, as he approached, and the ingenuous expression of his fine countenance was directed toward her, “can this noble creature have been the subject to such impertinence !”

“I commend little Phemy’s taste !” whispered Lord Berrington, leaving his seat ; “ha ! Miss Beaufort, a young Apollo ?”

“And not in disguise !” replied she in the same manner, just as Thaddeus had bowed to her ; and, with “veiled lids,” was taking up a book from the table ; not to read, but literally to have an object to look on which could not insult him.

“What did Miss Dundas say was his name ?” whispered the viscount.

“Constantine, I think.”

“Mr. Constantine,” said the benevolent Berrington, “will you accept of this chair ?”

Thaddeus declined it. But the viscount read in the “proud humility” of his bow, that he had not always waited, a dependent on the nods of insolent men and women of fashion ; and, with a good-humored compulsion, he added, “Pray oblige me ; for by that means I shall have an excuse to squeeze into the sultane, which is so ‘happy as to bear the weight of Beaufort !’”

Though Miss Beaufort was almost a stranger to his lordship, having only seen him once before, with her cousin in Leicestershire, she smiled at this unexpected freedom, and in consideration of the motive, made room for him on the sofa.

Insult was not swifter than kindness in its passage to the heart of Thaddeus ; who, while he received the viscount’s chair, raised his face toward him with a look beaming such graciousness and obligation that Miss Beaufort turned with renewed contempt upon the party. The next instant they left the study.

The instant Miss Dundas closed the door after her Lord Berrington exclaimed, "Upon my honor, Mr. Constantine, I have a good mind to put that terrible pupil of yours into my next comedy! Don't you think she would beat Katherine and Petruchio all to nothing? I declare I will have her."

"In propria persona, I hope?" asked Miss Beaufort, with more bitterness than she was accustomed to conceive, much less approve by giving it expression.

The count remained silent during these remarks, though he fully appreciated the first civil treatment which had greeted him since his admission within the doors of Lady Dundas. Miss Euphemia's attentions owned any other source than benevolence.

Miss Beaufort wished to relieve his embarrassment by addressing him; but the more she thought the less she knew what to say; and she had just abandoned it as a vain attempt when Euphemia entered the room alone. She courtesied to Thaddeus, and took her place at the table. Lord Berrington rose.

"I must say good-by, Miss Euphemia; I will not disturb your studies. Farewell, Miss Beaufort," added he, addressing her, and bending his lips to her hand! "adieu! I shall look in upon you to-morrow. Good-morning, Mr. Constantine."

Thaddeus bowed to him, and the viscount disappeared.

"I am surprised, Miss Beaufort," observed Euphemia, pettishly, her temper not having subsided since her sister's lecture, "how you can endure that coxcomb!"

"Pardon me, Euphemia," replied she; "though I did not exactly expect the ceremony his lordship uses in taking leave, yet I think there is a generosity in his sentiments which deserves a better title."

"I know nothing about his sentiments, for I always run away from his conversation. A better title! I declare you make me laugh. Did you ever see such fantastical dressing? I vow I never meet him without thinking of Jemmy Jessamy, and the rest of the gossamer beaux who squired our grand mothers!"

"My acquaintance with Lord Berrington is trifling," returned Miss Beaufort, withdrawing her eyes from the pensive features of the count, who was sorting the lessons; "yet I am so far prepossessed in his favor that I see little in his appearance to reprehend. However, I will not contest that point, as perhaps the philanthropy I this morning discovered in his heart—the honest warmth with which he defended an absent character after you left the room—might render his person as charming in my eyes as I certainly found his mind."

Thaddeus had not for a long time heard such sentiments out of Lady Tinemouth's circle; and he now looked up to take up a distinct view of the speaker.

In consequence of the established mode, that the presiding lady of the house is to give the tone to her guests, many were the visitors of Miss Dundas whose faces Thaddeus was as ignorant of when they went out of the library as when they came in. They took little notice of him; and he, regarding them much less, pursued his occupation without evincing a greater consciousness of their presence than what mere ceremony demanded.

Accordingly, when in compliance with Lord Berrington's politeness, he received his chair, and saw him remove to a sofa beside a very beautiful woman, he supposed that she resembled the rest of Miss Dundas's friends, and never directed his eyes a second time to her figure. But when he heard her (in a voice that was melody itself) defend his lordship's character on principles which bore the most honorable testimony to her own, his eyes riveted themselves on her face.

Though a large Turkish shawl involved her fine person, a modest grace was observable in every limb. Her exquisitely turned arm, rather veiled than concealed by the muslin sleeve that covered it, was extended toward Euphemia in the energy of her defense; her beautiful eyes shone with benevolence, and her rosy lips seemed to breathe balm while she spoke.

Thaddeus did not withdraw his fixed eyes until they encountered those of Miss Beaufort, which immediately retreated with a deep blush covering her face and neck. She never had met such a look before; except from the dark and penetrating glances of her cousin, who had long elected himself the guardian of her heart.

Miss Beaufort was the orphan heiress of Admiral Beaufort, the only brother of the late Lady Somerset. Her parents, dying at an early age, bequeathed her to the care of Lady Somerset, her paternal aunt; and nominated Sir Robert Somerset, her ladyship's husband, to be her sole guardian. When Lady Somerset died, which happened three days before her son's arrival from the Continent, a double portion of Sir Robert's love fell upon his niece. In her society alone he found comfort: and relinquishing the splendid scenes of London, he retired into the country; living sometimes at one seat and sometimes at another; in hopes by change of place to dissipate the grief that preyed upon his heart.

Sir Robert Somerset, from the time of his marriage with Miss Beaufort to the hour in which he followed her to the grave, attracted esteem and affection from people of every rank. The fascination of his manners, united with the inflexible probity of his character both as a man and as a senator, drew after him the confidence of all men. The good and even the bad looked on him as a pillar of strength, whenever reliance was to be allied with virtue. For instance, the excellent Lord Arun consigned his only child to his protection; and that sordid peculator, Sir Hector Dundas, named Sir Robert Somerset to be sole trustee of the immense fortunes of his wife and daughters.

This latter circumstance explains the intimacy between two families the female parts of which might otherwise never have met.

On Sir Robert's last visit to London Lady Dundas became so urgent in requesting Miss Beaufort to pass the ensuing season with her in town that he could not, without absolute rudeness, refuse. In compliance with this arrangement Miss Beaufort, accompanied by Mrs. Dorothy Somerset, a maiden sister of the baronet's, quitted Deerhurst, and settled themselves in Harley-street for the remainder of the winter—at least the winter of fashion; which, by a strange effect of her magic hand, in defiance of grassy meadows, leafy trees, and sweetly-scented flowers, extends its nominal scepter over the vernal months of April, May, and even the rich treasures of “resplendent June.”

The summer part of this winter Miss Beaufort reluctantly consented should be sacrificed to ceremony, in the dust and heat of a great city; and if the melancholy which daily increased upon Sir Robert since the death of his wife, had not rendered her averse to oppose his wishes, she certainly would have made objections to the visit.

During the journey she could not refrain from drawing a comparison between the insipid routine of Lady Dundas's way of life and the rational as well as splendid arrangement of her late aunt's.

Lady Somerset's monthly assemblies were not only the most elegant and brilliant parties in town, but her weekly conversaciones surpassed every thing of the kind in the kingdom. On these nights her ladyship's rooms used to be filled with the most eminent characters which England could produce. There the young Mary Beaufort listened to pious divines of every Christian persuasion. There she gathered wisdom from real philosophers; and in the society of our best living poets, cherished an enthusiasm for all that is great and good. On these evenings Sir Robert Somerset's house reminded the visitor of what he had read or imagined of the School of Athens. He beheld not only sages, soldiers, statesmen, and poets, but intelligent and amiable women. And in this rare assembly did the beautiful Mary imbibe that steady reverence of virtue and talent, which no intermixture with the ephemera of the day could ever after either displace or impair.

Notwithstanding this freedom from the chains with which her fashionable advisers would have shackled her mind, Miss Beaufort possessed too much judgment and delicacy to flash her liberty in their eyes. Enjoying her independence with meekness, she held it more secure. Mary was no declaimer; not even in defense of oppressed goodness or injured genius. Aware that direct opposition often incenses malice, she directed the shaft from its aim, if it were in her power; and when the attempt failed, strove by respect or compassion to heal the wound she could not prevent. Thus, whatever she said or did bore the stamp of her soul, whose leading attribute was modesty. By having learned much, and thought more, she proved in her conduct that reflection is the alchemy which turns knowledge into wisdom.

Never did Miss Beaufort feel her powers fail her when she wished to come forward in support of the oppressed until she witnessed Thaddeus Sobieski standing under the overbearing insolence of Miss Dundas's parasites. But she perceived that his dignified composure rebounded their darts upon his insulters, and respect took the place of pity. The situation was new to her; and when she dropped her confused eyes beneath his unexpected gaze, she marveled within herself at the ease with which she had just taken up the cause of Lord Berrington; and the difficulty she had found to summon one word as a repellant to the unmerited attack on the man before her.

Euphemia cared nothing about Lord Berrington; to her, his faults or his virtues were alike indifferent; and forgetting that civility demanded some reply to Miss Beaufort's last observation; or rather taking advantage of the tolerated privilege usurped by many high-bred people, of being ill-bred, when and how they please; she returned to Thaddeus, and said with a forced smile—

“Mr. Constantine, I don't like your opinion upon the ode I showed to you; I think it a very absurd opinion; or perhaps you did not conceive me rightly?”

Miss Beaufort took up a book, that her unoccupied attention might not disturb their studies.

Euphemia resumed, with a more natural dimple, and touching his glove with the rosy points of her fingers—

“You are stupid at translation.”

Thaddeus colored, and sat uneasily; he knew not how to evade this direct, though covered attack.

“I am a bad poet, madam. Indeed, it would be dangerous for a good one to attempt the same path with Sappho and Phillips.”

Euphemia now blushed as deeply as the count, but from another motive; and opening her grammar, whispered, “You are either a very dull, or a very modest man!” and sighing, began to repeat her lesson.

While he bent his head over the sheet he was correcting, she suddenly exclaimed, “Bless me, Mr. Constantine, what have you been doing? I hope you don't read in bed! The top of your hair is burnt to a cinder!—Why, you look much more like one who has been in a fire than Miss Beaufort does.”

Thaddeus put his hand to his head.

“I thought I had brushed away all marks of a fire, in which I really was last night.”

“A fire!” interrupted Miss Beaufort, closing her book, “was it near Tottenham-court-road?”

“It was, madam,” answered he, in a tone almost as surprised as her own.

“Good gracious!” cried Euphemia, exerting her little voice that she might be heard before Miss Beaufort could have time to reply; “then I vow you are the gentleman who Miss Beaufort said ran into the burning house, and, covered with flames, saved two children from perishing!”

“Am I so happy as to meet the lady,” replied he, turning with an animated air to Miss Beaufort, “in you, madam, who so humanely assisted the poor sufferers, and received the child from my arms?”

“It was, indeed, myself, Mr. Constantine,” returned she, a tear swimming over her eye, which in a moment gave the cue to the tender Euphemia. She drew out her handkerchief; and while her pretty cheeks overflowed, and her sweet voice was rendered sweeter by an emotion raised by ten thousand delightful fancies, she took hold of Miss Beaufort’s hand.

“O! my lovely friend, wonder not that I esteem this brave Constantine far beyond his present station!”

Thaddeus drew back. Miss Beaufort looked amazed; but Euphemia had mounted her romantic Pegasus, and the scene was too sentimental to close.

“Come here, Mr. Constantine,” cried she, extending her other hand to his. Wondering where this folly would terminate, he gave it to her; when, instantly joining it with that of Miss Beaufort, she pressed them together, and said, “Sweet Mary! heroic Constantine! I thus elect you the two dearest friends of my heart. So charmingly associated in the delightful task of compassion, you shall ever be commingled in my faithful bosom.”

Then putting her handkerchief to her eyes, she walked out of the room, leaving Miss Beaufort and the count, confused and confounded, by the side of each other. Miss Beaufort, suspecting that some extravagant passion subsisted between Euphemia and her young tutor, declined speaking first. Thaddeus, fixing his gaze on her downcast and revolving countenance, perceived nothing like offended pride at his undesigned presumption. He saw that she was only embarrassed; and after a minute's hesitation broke the silence.

“I hope that Miss Beaufort is sufficiently acquainted with the romance of Miss Euphemia's character to pardon the action, unintentional on my part, of having touched her hand? I declare I had no expectation of Miss Euphemia's design.”

“Do not make any apology to me, Mr. Constantine,” returned she, resuming her seat: “to be sure I was a little electrified by the strange situation in which her vivid feelings have just made us actors. But I will not forego my claim on what she promised—your acquaintance?”

Thaddeus expressed his high sense of her condescension.

“I am not fond of fine terms,” continued she, smiling; “but I know that time and merit must purchase esteem. I can engage for the first, as I am to remain in town at least three months; but for the last, I fear I shall never have the opportunity of giving such an earnest of my merit as you did last night of yours.”

Footsteps sounded on the stairs. Thaddeus took up his hat, and bowing, replied to her compliment with such a modest yet noble grace, that she gazed after him with wonder and concern. Before he closed the door he again bowed. Pleased with the transient look of pleasure which beamed from eyes, through whose ingenuous mirrors every thought of his soul might be read—she smiled a second adieu, and as he disappeared, left the room by another passage.

CHAPTER XXVII.

WHEN the count appeared the succeeding day in Harley-street, Miss Beaufort introduced him to Mrs. Dorothy Somerset as the gentleman who had so gallantly preserved the lives of the children at the hazard of his own.

Notwithstanding the lofty tossings of Miss Dundas's head, the good old maid paid him several encomiums on his intrepidity; and telling him that the sufferers were the wife and family of a poor tradesman who was gone into the country, she added, "but we saw them comfortably lodged before we left them; and, all the time we staid, I could not help congratulating myself on the easy compliance of Mary with my whims. I dislike sleeping at an inn; and to prevent it then, I had prevailed on Miss Beaufort to pursue our road to town even through the night. It was lucky it happened so, for I am certain Mary will not allow these poor creatures a long lament over the wreck of their little property."

"How charmingly charitable, my lovely friend!" cried Euphemia; "let us make a collection for this unfortunate woman and her babes. Pray, as a small tribute, take that from me!" She put five guineas into the hand of the blushing Mary.

The ineffable grace with which the confused Miss Beaufort laid the money on her aunt's knee, did not escape the observation of Thaddeus; neither did the animated approbation of his eye pass unnoticed by the amiable object of his attention.

When Lady Tinemouth was informed by the count of the addition to the Harley-street party, she declared her pleasure at the news; saying that she had been well acquainted with Mrs. Dorothy and her niece during the lifetime of Lady Somerset.

As the countess paused, Thaddeus was on the point of ex pressing his concern that Pembroke had lost his highly-prized mother; but recollecting that Lady Tinemouth was ignorant of their knowing each other, he allowed her to proceed without a remark.

“I never have been in company with Sir Robert’s son,” continued the countess: “it was during his absence on the continent that I was introduced to Lady Somerset. She was a woman who possessed the rare talent of conforming herself to all descriptions of people; and while the complacency of her attentions surpassed the most refined flattery, she commanded the highest veneration for herself. Hence you may imagine my satisfaction in an acquaintance which it is probable would never have been mine had I been the happy Countess of Tinemouth instead of a deserted wife. Though the Somersets are related to my lord, they had long treated him as a stranger; and doubly disgusted at his late behavior, they commenced a friendship with me, I believe to demonstrate more fully their detestation of him. Indeed, my husband is a creature of inconsistency. No man possessed more power to attract friends than Lord Tinemouth, and no man possessed less power to retain them; as fast as he made one he offended the other, and has at last deprived himself of every individual out of his own house who would not regard his death as a fortunate circumstance.”

“But Lady Somerset?” cried Thaddeus, impatient to change a subject every word of which was a dagger to his heart, “I mean Miss Dorothy Somerset, Miss Beaufort—”

“Yes,” returned her ladyship; “I see, kind Mr. Constantine, your friendly solicitude to disengage me from retrospections so painful! Well then, I knew and very much esteemed the two ladies you mention; but the death of Lady Somerset, and their consequent residence in the country, have prevented a renewal of this pleasure. However, as they are now in town, I will thank you to acquaint them with my intention to call upon them in Harley-street. I remember thinking Miss Beaufort a very charming girl.”

Thaddeus thought so too; he saw that she was beautiful; he had witnessed instances of her goodness; and the recollection filled his mind with a complacency the more tender, since it had so long been a stranger to his bosom. But further observations were prevented by the entrance of Miss Egerton and Lady Sara Roos.

“I am glad to see you, Mr. Constantine,” cried the lively Maria, shaking hands with him: “you are the very person I have been plotting against.”

Lady Tinemouth was uneasy at the care with which Lady Sara averted her face; well knowing that it was to conceal the powerful agitation of her features, which always took place at the sight of Thaddeus.

“What is your plot, Miss Egerton?” inquired he: “I shall consider myself honored by your commands, and do not require a conspiracy to entrap my obedience.”

“That’s a good soul! Then I have only to apply to you, Lady Tinemouth. Your ladyship must know,” cried she, “that as Lady Sara and I were a moment ago driving up the Haymarket I nodded to Mr. Coleman, who was coming out of the playhouse. He stopped, pulled the check-string, and we had a great deal of confab out of the window. He tells me a new farce is to come out this day week, and he hoped I would be there! ‘No,’ says I, ‘I can not; for I am on a visit with that precise body the Countess of Tinemouth, who would not, to save you and all your generation, come into such a mob.’ ‘Her ladyship shall have my box,’ cried he; ‘for I would not for the world lose the honor of your opinion on the merits of my farce.’ ‘To be sure not!’ cries I; so I accepted his box, and drove off, devising with Lady Sara how to get your ladyship as a chaperon, and Mr. Constantine for our beau. He has promised ; so, dear Lady Tinemouth don't be inflexible !”

Thaddeus was confounded at the dilemma into which his ready acquiescence had involved his prudence. The countess shook her head.

“Now I declare, Lady Tinemouth,” exclaimed Miss Egerton, “this is an absolute stingy fit ! You are afraid of your purse ! You know this private box precludes all awkward meetings, and you can have no excuse.”

“But it can not preclude all awkward sights,” answered her ladyship. “You know, Maria, I never go into public for fear of being met by the angry looks of my lord or son.”

“Disagreeable people !” cried Miss Egerton, pettishly : “I wish some friendly whirlwind would take your lord and son out of the world altogether !”

“Maria !” retorted her ladyship, with a grave air.

“Rebuke me, Lady Tinemouth, if you like ; I confess I am no Serena ; and these trials of temper don't agree with my constitution. There,” cried she, throwing a silver medal on the table, and laughing in spite of herself, “there is our passport ; but I will send it back, and so break poor Coleman's heart.”

“Fie, Maria,” answered her ladyship, patting her half-angry cheek, “would you owe to your petulance what was denied to your good humor ?”

“Then your ladyship will go !” exclaimed she, exultingly ; “you have yielded ; these sullens were a part of my stratagem, and I won't let you recede.”

Lady Tinemouth thought this would be a good opportunity to show one of the theaters to her young friend, without involving him in expense or obligation ; and, accordingly, she ratified her consent.

“Do you intend to favor us with your company, Lady Sara ?” asked the countess, with a hope she would refuse.

Lady Sara, who had been standing silently at the window, rather proudly answered—

“Yes, madam, if you will honor me with your protection.”

Lady Tinemouth was the only one present who understood the resentment which these words conveyed; and almost believing that she had insulted her by implying suspicion, she approached her with a pleading anxiety of countenance; “Then, Lady Sara, perhaps you will dine with me? I mean to call on Mrs. Dorothy Somerset, and invite her to be of the party.”

Lady Sara courtesied her acceptance of the invitation, and smiling, appeared to think no more of the matter. But she neither forgot it, nor found herself able to forgive Lady Tinemouth for having betrayed her into a confidence which her own turbulent passions had made but too easy. She had listened unwillingly to the reasonable declaration of the countess that her only way to retreat from an error which threatened criminality was to avoid the object.

“When a married woman,” observed her ladyship, “is so unhappy as to love any man beside her husband, her only safety rests in the resolution to quit his society, and to banish his image whenever it obtrudes.”

Lady Sara believed herself incapable of this exertion, and hated the woman who thought it necessary. By letter and conversation Lady Tinemouth tried to display in every possible light the enormity of giving encouragement to such an attachment; and ended with urging the consideration of her duty to Heaven.

Of this argument Lady Sara knew little. She never reflected on the nature of her Creator, though she sometimes went to church, repeated the prayers without being conscious of their spirit; and when the coughing, sneezing, and blowing of noses, which commonly accompany the text, subsided, she generally called up the remembrance of the last ball, or an anticipation of the next assembly, to amuse herself until the prosing business was over. From church she drove to the park, where, bowling round the ring, or sauntering in the gardens, she soon forgot that there existed in the universe a Power of higher consequence to please than her own vanity—and the admiration of the spectators.

Lady Sara would have shuddered at hearing any one declare himself a deist, much more an atheist; but for any influence which her nominal belief held over her desires, she might as well have been either. She never committed an action deserving the name of premeditated injury; nor went far out of her way to do her best friend a service; not because she wanted inclination, but she ceased to remember both the petitioner and his petition before he had been five minutes from her sight. She had read as much as most fine ladies have read: a few histories, a few volumes of essays, a few novels, and now and then a little poetry, comprised the whole range of her studies; these, with morning calls, and evening assemblies, occupied her whole day. Such had been the routine of her life, until she met the Count Sobieski at Lady Tinemouth's, which event caused a total revolution in her mind and conduct.

The strength of Lady Sara's understanding might have credited a better education; but her passions bearing an equal power with this vigor, and having taken a wrong direction, she neither acknowledged the will, nor the capability, to give the empire to her reason. When love entered her heart, its first conquest was her vanity: she surrendered all her admirers, in the hope of securing the admiration of Thaddeus; its second victory mastered her discretion; she revealed her unhappy affection to Lady Tinemouth, and more than hinted it to himself. What had she else to lose; she believed her honor to be safer than her life. Her honor was the term. She had no conception, or at best, a faint one, that a breach of the marriage-vow could be an outrage on the laws of Heaven. The word Sin has been gradually banished the oligarchy of fashion, from the hour in which Charles the Second and his profligate court trod down piety with hypocrisy—to this day when the new philosophy, having accomplished its total outlawry, denounced it a rebel to decency and the freedom of man.

Thus the Christian religion being driven from the haunts of the great, pagan morality is raised from that prostration where, Dagon-like, it fell at the feet of the Scriptures, and is again erected as the idol of adoration. Guilt against Heaven fades before the decrees of man; his law of ethics reprobates crime; but crime is only a temporary transgression, in opposition to the general good; it draws no consequent punishment heavier than the anger of the offended parties. Morality neither promises rewards after death, nor denounces future chastisement for error. The disciples of this independent doctrine hold forth instances of the perfectibility of human actions produced by the unassisted decisions of human intellect on the limits of right and wrong. They admire virtue, because it is beautiful. They practice it because it is heroic. They do not abstain from the gratification of an intemperate wish under a belief that it is sinful; but in obedience to their reason, which rejects the commission of a vicious act, because it is uncomely. In the first case, God is their judge; in the latter, themselves. The comparison need only be proposed, to humble the pride that made it necessary. How do these systematizers refine and subtilize? How do they dwell on the principle of virtue, and turn it in every metaphysical light, until their philosophy rarefies it to nothing! Some degrade, and others abandon, the only basis on which an upright character can stand with firmness. The bulwark, which Revelation erected between the passions and the soul is leveled first; and then that instinctive rule of right, which the modern casuist nominates citadel of virtue, falls of course.

By such gradations the progress of depravity is accomplished; and the general leaven having worked to Lady Sara's mind on such premises (though she might not arrange them so distinctly), she deduced that what is called conjugal right is a mere establishment of man, and might be extended or limited by him to any length he pleased. For instance, the Turks were not content with one wife, but appropriated hundreds to one man; and because such indulgence was permitted by Mohammed, no other nation presumed to call them culpable.

Hence she thought that if she could once reconcile herself to believe that her own happiness was dearer to her than the notice of half a thousand people to whom she was indifferent; that only in their opinion and the world's her flying to the protection of Thaddeus would be a crime; could she confidently think this, what should deter her from instantly throwing herself into the arms of the man she loved?

"Ah!" cried she, one night as she traversed her chamber in a paroxysm of tears, "what are the vows I have sworn? How can I keep them? I have sworn to love, to honor Captain Roos; but in spite of myself, without any action of my own, I have broken both these oaths. I can not love him; I hate him; and I can not honor the man I hate. What have I else to break? Nothing. My nuptial vow is as completely annihilated as if I had left him never to return.—How?" cried she, after a pause of some minutes, "how shall I know what passes in the mind of Constantine? Did he love me, would he protect me, I would brave the whole universe; oh, I should be the happiest of the happy!"

Fatal conclusion of reflection! It infected her dreaming and her waking fancy. She regarded every thing as an enemy that opposed her passion; and, as the first of these enemies, she detested Lady Tinemouth. The countess's last admonishing letter enraged her by its arguments; and, throwing it into the fire with execrations and tears, she determined to pursue her own will, but to affect being influenced by her ladyship's counsels.

The Count Sobieski, who surmised not the hundredth part of the love which Lady Sara bore him, began to hope that her ardent manner had misled him; or that she had seen the danger of such imprudence.

Under these impressions the party for the theater was settled; and Thaddeus, after sitting an hour in Grosvenor-place, returned to his humble home and attendance on his friend.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE addition of Mrs. Dorothy Somerset and Miss Beaufort to the morning group at Lady Dundas's imparted a less reluctant motion to the before tardy feet of the count whenever he turned them toward Harley-street.

Mrs. Dorothy readily supposed him to have been better born than he appeared; and, displeased with the treatment he received from Miss Dundas and her guests, behaved to him herself with the most gratifying politeness.

Aunt Dorothy (for that was the title by which every branch of the Baronet's family addressed her) was full twenty years the senior of her brother Sir Robert Somerset. Having in her youth been thought very like the famous and lovely Mrs. Woffington, she was considered the beauty of her time; and as such for ten years continued the reigning toast. Nevertheless she arrived at the age of seventy-two without having been either the object, or the subject, of a fervent passion.

Possessing a fine understanding, a fine taste, and fine feelings, by some chance she had escaped love. It can not be denied that she was much admired, much respected, and much esteemed; and that she received two or three splendid proposals from men of rank. Some of those men she admired, some she respected, and some she esteemed, but not one did she love; and she successively refused them all. Shortly after their discharge, they generally consoled themselves by marrying other women, who perhaps wanted both the charms and the sense of Miss Somerset; yet she congratulated them on their choice, and usually became the warm friend of the happy couple.

Thus year passed over year; Miss Somerset continued the esteemed of every worthy heart, though she could not kindle the embers of a livelier glow in any one of them: and at the epoch, called a certain age, she found herself an old maid, but possessing as much good humor and affection toward the young people about her as if she had half a dozen of her own offspring to mingle in the circle.

This amiable old lady usually took her netting into the library beside the fair students; and whenever Thaddeus entered the room (so natural is it for generous natures to sympathize), his eyes first sought her venerable figure; then glancing around to catch an assuring beam from the heavenly countenance of the lovely Mary, he seated himself with confidence.

The presence of these ladies operated as a more than sufficient antidote to the disagreeables of his situation. To them he directed all the attention that was not required by his occupation; he heard them only speak when a hundred others were talking; he saw them only when a hundred others were in company.

In addition to this pleasant change, Miss Euphemia's passion assumed a less tormenting form. She had been reading Madame d'Arblay's Camilla; and becoming enamored of the delicacy and pensive silence of the interesting heroine, she determined on adopting the same character; and at the same time taking it into her ever-creative brain that Constantine's coldness bore a striking affinity to the caution of Edgar Mandelbert, she wiped the rouge from her face, and prepared to "let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on her damask cheek."

To afford decorous support to this fancy her gayest eldresses were thrown aside to make way for a negligence of apparel which cost her two hours each morning to compose. Her dimpling smiles were now quite banished. She was ever sighing, and ever silent, and ever lolling and leaning about; reclining along sofas, or in some pretty disconsolate attitude grouping herself with some marble urn, and sitting "like Patience on a monument smiling at grief."

Thaddeus preferred this pathetic whim before her former love-like advances; as it afforded him quiet, and relieved him from much embarrassment.

Every succeeding visit induced Miss Beaufort to observe him with nicer accuracy and a more lively interest. The nobleness, yet humility, with which he behaved toward herself and her aunt; and the manly serenity with which he suffered the insulting sarcasms of Miss Dundas, led her not merely to conceive, but to entertain many doubts that his present situation was that of his birth.

The lady visitors who dropped in on the sisters' studies were not backward in espousing the game of ridicule, as it played away a few minutes to join in a laugh with the witty Diana. These gracious beings thought their sex gave them privilege to offend; but it was not always that the gentlemen durst venture beyond a shrug of the shoulder, a drop of the lip, a wink of the eye, or a raising of the brows. Mary observed with contempt they were prudent enough not to exercise even these specimens of hostility but when the count had turned his back; and, regarding him with increased admiration, she was indignant, and then disdainful at the envy which actuated these men to treat with affected scorn him whom they secretly feared.

The occasional calls of Lady Tinemouth and Miss Egerton stimulated the cabal against Thaddeus. The sincere sentiment of equality with themselves, which these two ladies evinced by their behavior to him, and the same conduct being adopted by Mrs. Dorothy and her beautiful niece, besides the evident partiality of Euphemia, altogether inflamed the spleen of Miss Dundas, and excited her coterie to acts of the most extravagant rudeness.

This little phalanx, at the head of which was the superb Diana, could offer no reason for disliking a man who was not only their inferior, but who had never offended them even by implication. It was a sufficient apology to their easy consciences that "he gave himself such courtly airs as were quite ridiculous; that his presumption was astonishing. In short, they were all idle; and it was monstrous amusing to lounge a morning with the rich Dundas's and hoax monsieur."

Had Thaddeus known one fourth of the insolent derision with which his misfortunes were treated behind his back, perhaps even his friend's necessity could not have detained him in his employment. The brightness of a brave man's name makes shadows perceptible which might pass unmarked over a duller surface. Sobieski's delicate honor would have supposed itself sullied by enduring such contumely with toleration. But, as was said before, the male adjuncts of Miss Dundas had received so opportune a warning from an accidental knitting of the count's brow, they never could muster temerity to sport their wit to his face.

These circumstances were not lost upon Mary; she collected them as part of her treasure, and turned them over on her pillow with the jealous examination of a miser. Like Euphemia, she supposed Thaddeus to be other than he seemed; yet her fancy did not gift him with the blood of the Bourbons ; she merely believed him to be a gentleman ; and, from the maternal manner of Lady Tinemouth toward him, suspected that her ladyship knew more of his history than she chose to reveal.

Things were in this state when the countess requested that Mrs. Dorothy would allow her niece to make one in her party to the Haymarket theater. The good lady having consented, Miss Beaufort received the permission with pleasure ; and as she was to sup with her ladyship, she ventured to hope that something might fall from the countess or Miss Egerton which would throw a light on the true situation of Mr. Constantine.

From infancy Miss Beaufort had loved with enthusiasm all kinds of excellence. Indeed, she esteemed no person warmly whom she did not think exalted by their virtues above the common race of mankind. She sought for something to respect in every character ; and when she found any thing to admire, her ardent soul blazed, and by its own pure flame lit her to a closer inspection of the object about whom she had become interested.

When Lady Somerset collected all the virtue and talent in the country around her table, they were not brought there on a vain errand. From them Miss Beaufort gathered her best lessons in conduct and taste, and from them her earliest perceptions of friendship. Mary was the beloved pupil and respected friend of the brightest characters in England ; and though they were men, some of whom had not passed the age of forty, she never had been in love, nor had she mistaken the nature of her esteem so far as to call it by that name. Hence she was neither afraid nor ashamed to acknowledge a correspondence she knew to be her highest distinction. But had the frank and innocent Mary exhibited half the like attentions which she paid to these men in one hour, to the common class of young men through the course of a month, they would have declared “ the poor girl was over head in love with them ; and have pitied (what they would have justly denominated) her folly." Foolish must that woman be who will sacrifice the most precious gift in her possession to the superficial graces or empty blandishments of a self-idolized coxcomb!

Such a being was not Mary Beaufort; and on these principles she contemplated the extraordinary merits of the exiled Thaddeus with an interest honorable to her penetration and her heart.

When Miss Egerton called with Lady Sara Roos to take Miss Beaufort to the Haymarket, Mary was not displeased at seeing Mr. Constantine step out of the carriage to hand her in. During their drive Miss Egerton informed her that Lady Tinemouth had been suddenly seized with the headache; but that Lady Sara had kindly undertaken to be their chaperon, and had promised to return with them to sup in Grosvenor-place.

Lady Sara had never seen Mary, though she frequently had heard of her beauty and vast fortune. This last qualification her ladyship hoped might have given an unmerited éclat to the first: therefore when she saw in Miss Beaufort the most beautiful creature she had ever beheld, nothing could equal her surprise and vexation.

The happy luster that beamed in the fine eyes of Mary, shone like a vivifying influence around her; a bright glow animated her cheek; while a pleasure, for which she did not seek to account, bounded at her heart, and modulated every tone of her voice to sweetness and enchantment.

"Syren!" thought Lady Sara, withdrawing her large dark eyes from her face, and turning them full of dissolving languor upon Thaddeus, "here are all thy charms directed!" then drawing a sigh, so deep that it made her neighbor start, she fixed her eyes on her fan, and never looked up again until they had reached the playhouse.

The curtain was raised as the little party seated themselves in the box.

“Can any body tell me what the play is?” asked Lady Sara.

“I never thought of inquiring,” replied Maria.

“I looked in the paper this morning,” said Miss Beaufort, “and I think it is called Sighs—a translation from a drama of Kotzebue’s.”

“A strange title!” was the general observation, when Mr. Suett, who personated one of the characters, beginning to speak, their attention was summoned to the stage.

On the entrance of Mr. Charles Kemble in the character of Adelbert, the count unconsciously turned pale. He perceived by the dress of the actor he was to personate a Pole; and alarmed at the probability of seeing something to recall recollections he strove to banish, his agitation did not allow him to hear any thing that passed.

Miss Egerton was not so tardy in the use of her eyes and ears; but, stretching out her hand to the back of the box, where Thaddeus was standing by Lady Sara’s chair, she caught hold of his sleeve.

“There, Mr. Constantine!” cried she, “look at Adelbert! that is exactly the figure you cut in your outlandish gear two months ago.”

Thaddeus bowed with a forced smile, and, glancing at the stage, replied—

“Then, for the first time in my life I regret having followed a lady’s advice; I think I must have lost by the change.”

“Yes,” rejoined she, “you have lost much fur and much embroidery; but you now look much more like a Christian.”

The substance of these speeches was not lost upon Mary, who continued with redoubling interest to mark the changes his countenance underwent along with the scene. As she sat forward, by a slight turn of her head she could discern the smallest fluctuation in his features; and they were not a few; for placing himself at the back of Lady Sara’s chair, he leaned over, with his soul set in his eye, watching every motion of Mr. Charles Kemble.

Mary knew that Constantine was a Polander; and the surmise she had entertained of his being unfortunate received full corroboration at the scene in which Adelbert is grossly insulted by the rich merchant. During the whole of it she scarcely dared trust her eyes toward Constantine's flushed and agitated face.

The interview between Adelbert and Leopold commenced. When the former was describing his country's miseries with his own, Thaddeus, unable to bear it longer, unobserved by any but Mary, drew back into the box. In a moment or two Mr. Charles Kemble made the following reply to an observation of Leopold's, that "poverty was no dishonor."

"Certainly none to me! To Poland, to my struggling country, I sacrificed my wealth, as I would have sacrificed my life, had she required it. My country is no more; and we are wanderers on a burdened earth, finding no refuge but in the hearts of the humane and virtuous."

The passion and force of these words could not fail of reaching the ears of Thaddeus. Mary's attention followed them to their object, by the heaving of whose breast she plainly discovered the anguish of their effect. Her heart beat with redoubling violence. How willingly would she have approached him and said something of sympathy, of consolation! but she durst not; and she turned away her tearful eye and looked again toward the stage.

Lady Sara now stood up; and hanging over Mary's chair, listened with congenial emotions to the scene between Adelbert and the innocent Rose. Lady Sara felt it all in her own bosom; and looking round to catch what was passing in the count's mind, she beheld him leaning against a corner of the box, with his head inclined to the curtain of the door. "Mr. Constantine!" almost unconsciously escaped her lips. He started, and discovered by the humidity on his eye-lashes, why he had withdrawn. Her ladyship's tears were gliding down her cheeks. Miss Egerton, greatly amazed at the oddness of the scene, turned to Miss Beaufort; who a moment before having caught a glimpse of the distressed countenance of the count, could only smile, and bow her head to Maria's observation.

Who is there that can enter into the secret folds of the heart and know all its miseries? Who participate in that joy which dissolves and rarefies man to the essence of heaven? Soul must mingle with soul, and the ethereal voice of the spirit must speak before these can be comprehended.

Ready to suffocate with the emotions she repelled from her eyes, Mary gladly affected to be absorbed in the business of the stage (not one object of which she now saw), and with breathless attention lost not one soft whisper which Lady Sara poured into the ear of Thaddeus.

"Why?" asked her ladyship, in a tremulous and low tone; "why should we seek ideal sorrows, when those of our own hearts are beyond alleviation?—Happy Rose!" sighed her ladyship. "Mr. Constantine," continued she, "do not you think that Adelbert is consoled, at least, by the affection of that lovely woman?"

Like Miss Beaufort, Constantine had hitherto replied with bows only.

"Come," added Lady Sara, laying her soft hand on his arm, and regarding him with a look of tenderness so unequivocal that he cast his eyes to the ground, although its sympathy touched his heart; "Come," repeated she, animated by the faint color which tinged his cheek, "you know that I have the care of this party; and I must not allow our only chevalier to be melancholy."

"I beg your pardon, Lady Sara," returned he, gratefully pressing the hand that yet rested on his arm; "I am not very well. I wish that I had not seen this play!"

Lady Sara sunk into the seat from which she had arisen. He had never before taken her hand, except when assisting her to her carriage; this pressure shook her very soul, and awakened hopes which rendered her for a moment incapable of sustaining herself or venturing a reply.

There was something in the tones of Lady Sara's voice and in her manner far more expressive than her words: mutual sighs, which breathed from her ladyship's bosom and that of Thaddeus as they sat down, made a cold shiver run from the head to the foot of Miss Beaufort. Mary's surprise at the meaning of this emotion caused a second tremor; and with a palpitating heart she asked herself a few questions.

Could this interesting young man, whom every person of sense appeared to esteem and respect, could he sully his virtues by participating in a passion with a married woman. No; it was impossible.

Notwithstanding this decision she determined to observe him narrowly, and be well convinced of his worth before she permitted him to augment the share of regard which he already possessed in her bosom.

With her head full of these reflections she awaited the farce, without observing when it appeared. Indeed, none of the party knew any thing about this piece (to see which they had professedly come to the theater) excepting Miss Egerton; whose ever merry spirits had enjoyed the humor of Totum in the play, and now laughed heartily, though unaccompanied, through the ridiculous whims of the farce.

Nothing that passed could totally disengage the mind of Thaddeus from those remembrances which the recent drama had aroused. When the melting voice of Lady Sara, in whispers, tried to recall his attention, by a start only he evinced his recollection of not being alone. Sensible, however, to the kindness of her motive, he exerted himself; and by the time the curtain dropped, he had so far rallied his spirits as to be able to attend to the civility of seeing the ladies safe out of the theater.

Miss Egerton, laughing, as he assisted her into the carriage, said, "I verily believe, Mr. Constantine, had I glanced round during the play I should have seen as pretty a lachrymal scene between you and Lady Sara as any on the stage. I won't have this flirting! I declare I will tell Captain Roos—"

She continued talking; but turning about to offer his service to Miss Beaufort, he heard no more.

Miss Beaufort felt strangely: she felt cold and reserved; and undesignedly she appeared what she felt. There was a grave dignity in her air, accompanied with a collectedness and stillness in her before animated countenance, which astonished and chilled Thaddeus, though she bowed her head and gave him her hand to put her into the coach.

In their way home Miss Egerton ran over the merits of the play and farce; rallied Thaddeus on the "tall Pole," which she threatened should be his epithet whenever he offended her; and then flying from subject to subject, talked herself and her hearers so weary they mutually rejoiced when the carriage stopped in Grosvenor-place.

After they had severally paid their respects to Lady Timemouth, who, being indisposed, was lying along the sofa, she desired Thaddeus to draw a chair near her.

"I want to learn," said she, "what you think of our English theater?"

"Prithee, don't ask him!" cried Miss Egerton, pouring out a glass of water, "we have seen a tremendous brother Pole of his, who I believe has 'hopped off' with all his spirits! Why, he has been looking as rueful as a half-drowned man all the night; and for Lady Sara—and I could vow, Miss Beaufort, too, they have been two Niobes, 'all tears.' So, good folks, I must drink better health to you, to save myself from the vapors."

“What is all this, Mr. Constantine?” asked the countess, addressing Thaddeus, whose eyes were now fixed with grateful surprise on the blushing though displeased face of Miss Beaufort.

“My weakness,” replied he, sighing and turning to her ladyship: “the play relates to a native of Poland; one who, like myself, an exile in a strange land, is subjected to sufferings and contumelies the bravest spirits may find hard to bear. Any man may combat misery, but even the most intrepid will shrink from insult. This I believe is the sum of the story. Its resemblance in some points to my own affected me; and,” added he, looking gratefully at Lady Sara, and timidly toward Miss Beaufort, “if these ladies have sympathized with emotions against which I strove but could not entirely conceal, I owe to it the sweetest consolation now in the power of fate to bestow!”

“Poor Constantine!” cried Maria Egerton, patting his head with one hand, while with the other she wiped a tear from her always smiling eye, “forgive me if I have hurt you. I like you vastly, though I must now and then laugh at you; you know I hate dismals, so let this tune enliven us all!” and flying to her piano, she played and sung two or three merry airs, till the countess commanded her to the supper-table.

At this most sociable repast of the whole day, cheerfulness seemed again to disperse the gloom which threatened the circle. Thaddeus set the example. His unrestrained and elegant conversation acquired new pathos from the anguish that was driven back to his heart; like the beds of rivers which infuse their own nature with the current, his hidden grief imparted an indescribable interest and charm to all his sentiments and actions.

Mary now beheld him in his real character. Unmolested by the haughty presence of Miss Dundas, he became unrestrained, intelligent, and enchanting. He was master of every subject, and discoursed on all with a grace which corroborated her waking visions that he was as some archangel ruined.

With the increase of Miss Beaufort's admiration of the count's fine talents, she gradually lost the recollection of what had occupied her mind relative to Lady Sara; and her own beautiful countenance dilating into confidence and delight, the evening passed away with pleasure until the little party separated for their several homes.

Lady Tinemouth and Maria were fascinated by the lovely Miss Beaufort. Miss Beaufort was equally pleased with the countess and her friend; but when she thought on Thaddeus, she was surprised, interested, charmed.

Lady Sara Roos's reflections were not less flattering; she dwelt with redoubled passion on that look from the count's eyes, that touch of his hand, which she thought were signs of a reciprocal flame. Both actions were forgotten by him the moment after they were committed; yet he was not ungrateful, but while he acknowledged her attentions, and assented to the loveliness of her form, he saw that she sought to lead him to the brink of a precipice, where, if he fell, he must sink never to rise again.

He found a refuge from such dangerous meditation in the idea of the ingenuous Mary, on whose modest countenance Virtue seemed to have "set her seal." While recollecting the pitying kindness of her voice and looks, his heart owned the empire of purity; and in the contemplation of her unaffected excellence, he soon forgot the witcheries of Lady Sara, and her seductive love.

CHAPTER XXIX.

NEXT morning, when Thaddeus approached the general's bed to give him his coffee, he found him feverish and his intellects more than usually unsettled.

The count awaited with anxiety the arrival of the benevolent Cavendish, whom he expected; and when he appeared, he declared his increased alarm. Dr. Cavendish having felt the patient's pulse, expressed a wish that he could be induced to take a little exercise. Thaddeus had often urged this necessity to his friend; and having met with constant refusals, he hopelessly repeated the entreaty now, when to his surprise and satisfaction the old man instantly consented.

Having seen him comfortably dressed (for the count attended to these minutiæ with the care of a son), the doctor said they must ride with him to Hyde Park; where he would put them out to walk until he had made a visit in Piccadilly, when he would return and take them home.

The general not only expressed pleasure at the drive; but as the air was warm and balmy (it being about the beginning of June), he made no objection to the proposed walk.

He admired the Park, the Serpentine River, the cottage on its bank, and seemed highly diverted by the horsemen and carriages in the ring. The pertinency of his remarks afforded Thaddeus a ray of hope that his senses had not entirely lost their union with reason; and with awakened confidence he was contemplating what might be the happy effects of constant exercise, when the general's complaints of weariness obliged him to stop near Piccadilly Gate and wait the arrival of the doctor's coach.

He was standing against the railing, supporting Butzou; and with his hat in his hand was shading his friend's face from the sun, when two or three carriages driving in, he met the eyes of Miss Euphemia Dundas; who pulling the check-string, exclaimed, "Bless me, Mr. Constantine! Who expected to see you here? Why your note told us you were confined with a sick friend.

Thaddeus bowed to her, and still sustaining the debilitated frame of the general on his arm, advanced to the side of the coach. Miss Beaufort, who now looked out, expressed her hope that his invalid was better.

"This is the friend I mentioned," said the count, turning his eyes on the mild features of Butzou; "his physician having ordered him to walk, I accompanied him hither."

"Dear me! how ill you look, sir," cried Euphemia addressing the poor invalid; "but you are attended by a kind friend."

"My dear lord!" exclaimed the old man, not regarding what she said, "I must go home; I am tired; pray call up the carriage."

Euphemia was again opening her mouth to speak, but Miss Beaufort perceiving a look of distress in the expressive features of Thaddeus, interrupted her by saying, "Good-morning, Mr. Constantine; I know we detain you and oppress that gentleman, whose pardon we ought to beg." She bowed her head to the general; whose white hairs were blowing about his face, as he attempted to pull the count toward the pathway.

"My friend can not thank you, kind Miss Beaufort," cried Thaddeus with a look of gratitude, that called the brightest roses to her cheeks; "but I do from my heart!"

"Here it is! Pray, my dear lord, come along!" cried Butzou; Thaddeus seeing that his information was right, bowed to the ladies, and their carriage drove off.

Though the wheels of Lady Dundas's coach rolled away from the retreating figures of Thaddeus and his friend, the images of both occupied the meditations of Euphemia and Miss Beaufort, while tête-à-tête, and in silence, they made the circuit of the Park.

When the carriage again passed the spot on which the subject of their thoughts had stood, Mary almost mechanically looked out toward the gate.

“Is he gone yet!” asked Euphemia, sighing deeply.

Mary drew in her head with the quickness of conscious guilt; and while a color stained her face, which of itself might have betrayed her prevarication, she asked “Who?”

“Mr. Constantine,” replied Euphemia, with a second sigh. “Did you remark, Mary, how gracefully he supported that sick old gentleman? Was it not the very personification of Youth upholding the fainting steps of Age? He put me in mind of the charming young prince, whose name I forget, leading the old Belisarius.”

“You are an enthusiast, Euphemia!” returned Mary, striving to smile; and wondering within herself what could be the meaning of the appellations with which the old man had addressed Thaddeus.

“So all tell me,” replied Euphemia; “so all say, who neither possess the sensibility nor the candor to allow that great merit may exist without being associated with great rank. Yet,” cried she in a more animated tone, “I have my doubts, Mary, of his being what he seems. Did you observe the sick gentleman call him my lord?”

“I did,” returned Mary, “and I was not surprised. Such manners as Mr. Constantine’s are not to be acquired in a cottage.”

“Dear, dear Mary,” cried Euphemia, flinging her ivory arms round her neck; “how I love you for these words! you are generous, you think nobly, and I will not longer hesitate to—to—” and breaking off, she hid her head in Miss Beaufort’s bosom.

Mary’s heart throbbed, her cheeks grew pale, and almost unconsciously, she wished to stop the tide of Miss Dundas's confidence.

"Dear Euphemia," answered she, "your regard for this interesting exile is very praiseworthy. But beware of—" she hesitated; a remorseful twitch in her own breast, staid the warning that was rising to her tongue; and blushing at a motive she could not at the instant assign to friendship, selfishness, or envy, she touched the cheek of Euphemia with her quivering lips.

Euphemia had finished the sentence for her, and raising her head exclaimed—"What should I fear in esteeming Mr. Constantine? Is he not the most captivating creature in the world? And for his person! Oh, Mary, he is so beautiful that when the library is filled with the handsomest men in town, the moment Constantine enters, their reign is over. I compare them with his godlike figure, and I feel as one looking at the sun; all other objects appear dim and shapeless."

"I hope," returned Mary, pressing her own forehead with her hand, her head beginning to ache strangely, "that Mr. Constantine does not owe your friendship to his fine person? I think his mental qualities are more deserving of such a gift."

"Don't look so severe, dear Mary!" cried Miss Dundas, observing her contracting brow; "are you displeased with me?"

Mary's displeasure was at the austerity of her own words, and not at her auditor. Raising her eyes with a smile, she gently replied, "I do not mean, my dear girl, to be severe; but I would wish, for the honor of our sex, that the objects which attract either our love or our compassion, should have something more precious than exterior beauty to engage our interest."

"Well, I will soon be satisfied," cried Euphemia in a gayer tone, as they drove through Grosvenor gate: "we all know that Constantine is sensible and accomplished he writes poetry like an angel, both in French and Italian : I have hundreds of mottoes composed by him : one of them, Mary, is on the work-box I gave you yesterday ; and, what is more, I will ask him to-morrow why that old gentleman called him my lord ? If he be a lord !” exclaimed she.

“What then ?” inquired the eloquent eyes of Mary.

“Don’t look so impertinent, my dear,” cried the now animated beauty : “I positively will not say another word to you to-day.”

Miss Beaufort’s headache became so painful she rejoiced when Euphemia ceased, and the carriage drew up to Lady Dundas’s door.

A night of almost unremitted sleep performed such good effects on the frame and intellect of General Butzou that Dr. Cavendish thought his patient so much better as to sanction his hoping the best consequences from a constant repetition of air and exercise. When the drive and walk had been repeated on the following day, Thaddeus left his friend to his maps and little Nanny, and once more took the way to Harley-street.

He found only Miss Dundas and her sister in the study. Mary (against her will, which she opposed because it was her will) went out a-shopping with Mrs. Dorothy and Lady Dundas.

Miss Dundas left the room the moment she finished her lessons.

Delighted at being tête-à-tête with Thaddeus, Euphemia forgot that she was to act the fascinating character of Madame d’Arblay’s heroine ; and shutting her book the instant Diana disappeared, all at once opened her attack on his confidence.

To the eager questions which the few words of the general had excited, the count afforded no other reply than that his poor friend knew not what he said, having been a long time in a state of mental derangement.

This explanation caused a momentary mortification in the fanciful Euphemia; but as her busy mind was nimble in its erection of her airy castles, as fast as one sunk another rose; and she now rallied with the idea that "he might be a duke, which was more than a lord." At any rate, let him be what he would, he charmed her; and had much ado to parry the increasing boldness of her speeches without letting her see they were understood.

"You are very diffident, Constantine," cried she, looking down. "If I consider you worthy of my friendship, why should you make disqualifying assertions?"

"Every man, madam," returned Thaddeus, bowing as he rose from his chair, "must be diffident of deserving the honor of your notice."

"There is no man living," replied she, blushing, "to whom I would offer my friendship but yourself."

Thaddeus bit his lip; he knew not what to answer: bowing a second time, he stretched out his hand and drew his hat toward him. Euphemia's eyes followed the movement.

"You are in a prodigious haste, Mr. Constantine!"

"I know I intrude, madam; and I have promised to be with my sick friend at an early hour."

"Well, you may go, since you are obliged," returned the pretty Euphemia, rising and smiling sweetly as she laid one hand on his arm, and put the other into her tucker. She drew out a little white leather souvenir, marked on the back in gold letters with the words, "Toujours cher;" and slipping it into his hand, "There, receive that, Constantine; and retain it as the first pledge of Euphemia Dundas's friendship."

Thaddeus colored as he took it; and again having recourse to the convenient reply of a bow, left the room in embarrassed vexation.

There was an indelicacy in this absolutely wooing conduct of Miss Euphemia, which, notwithstanding her beauty and the softness that was its vehicle, filled him with the deepest disgust. He could not trace real affection, either in her words or manner; and that any woman, instigated by a mere whim, should lay aside the decent reserves of her sex, and actually court his regard, surprised while it impelled him to loathe her.

They who adopt Euphemia's sentiments are little aware of the conclusions which society infer from such intemperate behavior. The mistaken creature who, either at the impulse of her own disposition, or by the influence of example, is induced to despise the guard of modesty, literally "forsakes the guide of her youth;" and leaves herself open to every attack which men can devise against her. By leveling the barrier raised by nature, she herself exposes the strong hold of virtue, and may find, too late for recovery, that what modesty has abandoned is not long held by honor.

Euphemia's affected attachment, suggested to Thaddeus a few unpleasant recollections respecting the fervent and unequivocal passion of Lady Sara. Though guilty, it sprung from a headlong ardor of disposition which formed at once the error and its palliation. He saw that love was not welcomed by her (at least he thought so) as a plaything, but struggled against as with a foe; he had witnessed her tortures, he pitied them; and to render her happy would gladly have made any sacrifice short of his conscience. Too well assured of being all the world to Lady Sara, the belief that Miss Euphemia liked him only from idleness, caprice, and contradiction, caused him to repay her overtures with decided contempt.

When he arrived at home he threw on his table the pocket-book, whose unambiguous motto made him laugh at her and himself; and looking round his humble room, whose wicker chairs, oil-cloth floor, and uncurtained windows announced any thing but splendor: "Poor Euphemia!" thought he,

“how you would be dismayed, were the indigent Constantine to really take you at your word, and bring you home to so cheerless a habitation!”

CHAPTER XXX.

THE repetition of the late scene, which was communicated to Miss Beaufort by Euphemia, failed in producing a similar effect on her.

Mary could discover no reason why the old gentleman's mental derangement should dignify his friend with titles he had never borne. She remarked that his answer to Euphemia was evasive; she remembered his emotion and apology on seeing Mr. C. Kemble in Adelbert; and uniting with these facts, his manners and acquirements so far beyond the charges of vulgar education, she could retain no doubt of his being at least well born.

This mysterious Constantine occupied her hourly thoughts during the space of two months; in which time she had full opportunity to learn much of a character with whom she associated almost every day. At Lady Tinemouth's (one of whose evening guests she frequently became) she beheld him disencumbered of that armor of reserve which he usually wore in Harley-street.

At the house of the countess, Mary saw him welcomed like an idolized being, before whose cheering influence all frowns and clouds must disappear. When he entered, the smile resumed its seat on the languid features of Lady Tinemouth; Miss Egerton's eye lighted up to keener archness; Lady Sara's Circassian orbs floated in pleasure; and for Mary herself, her breast heaved, her cheeks glowed, her hands trembled, a quick sigh escaped her bosom; and while she remained in his presence, she believed that happiness had lost its usual even-escent property, and became tangible, to hold and press upon the heart.

Mary who investigated the cause of these tremors on her pillow, bedewed it with delicious though bitter tears, when her alarmed soul whispered that she nourished for this amiable foreigner "a something than friendship dearer."

"Ah! is it to come to this?" cried she, pressing down her saturated eyelids with her hand. "Am I at last to love a man who perhaps never casts a thought on me? How despicable shall I become in my own eyes!"

The pride of woman puts this charge to her taken heart: that heart which seems tempered of the purest clay, and warmed with the fire of heaven; that tender and disinterested heart, asks as its appeal—What is love? Is it not an admiration of all that is beautiful in nature and morality? Is it not a union of loveliness with truth? Is it not a passion whose sole object is the rapture of contemplating the supreme beauty of this combined character?

"Where, then," cried the enthusiastic Mary, "where is the shame that can be annexed to my loving Constantine? If it be honorable to love delineated excellence, it must be equally so to love it when embodied in a human shape. Such it is Constantine; and if love be the reflected light of virtue, I may cease to arraign myself of that which otherwise I would have scorned. Therefore, Constantine," cried she, raising her clasped hands, while renewed tears streamed over her face, "I will love thee! I will pray for thy happiness, though its partner should be Euphemia Dundas."

Mary's eager imagination would not allow her to perceive those obstacles, in the shapes of pride and prudence, which would stand in the way of his obtaining Euphemia's hand; its light showed to her only a rival, in the person of the little beauty; but from her direct confidence, she continued to retreat with abhorrence.

Had Euphemia been more deserving of Constantine, Miss Beaufort believed she would have been less reluctant to hear that she loved him. But Mary could not avoid seeing that Miss E. Dundas possessed little to ensure connubial comfort, if mere beauty and accidental flights of good-humor were not to be admitted into the scale. She was weak in understanding, timid of principle, absurd in almost every opinion she adopted; and as for love, true, dignified, respectable love, she knew nothing of the passion.

While Miss Beaufort meditated on this meager schedule of her rival's merits, the probability that even such a man as Constantine might sacrifice himself to flattery and splendor, stung her to the soul.

The more she reflected on it the more she conceived it likely. Euphemia was considered a beauty of the day; her affectation of refined prettiness, pleased many, and might charm Constantine; she was mistress of fifty thousand pounds, and did not esteem it necessary to conceal from her favorite the empire he had acquired. Perhaps there was generosity in this openness. If so, what might it not effect on a grateful disposition? or rather (her mortified heart murmured in the words of her aunt Dorothy), "how might it not operate on the mind of one of that sex which, at the best, is as often moved by caprice as sentiment!"

Mary blushed at her adoption of this opinion; and angry with herself for the injustice which a lurking jealousy had excited in her, to apply it to Constantine's noble nature, she resolved whatever might be her struggles, to promote his happiness, even with Euphemia, to the utmost of her power.

The next morning, when Miss Beaufort opened the study-door she found Mr. Constantine at his station literally baited between Miss Dundas and her honorable lover. At such moments Mary appeared the kindest of the kind. She loved to see Constantine smile; and whenever she could produce that effect by turning the spleen of these polite sneerers against themselves—his smiles which entered her heart, afforded her a banquet for hours after his departure.

Mary drew out her netting (which was a purse for Lady Tinemouth), and taking a seat beside Euphemia, united with her to occupy his attention entirely; that he might not catch even one of those insolent glances which were passing between Lascelles and a new visitant, the pretty Lady Villiers.

This lady seemed to take extreme pleasure in accosting Thaddeus by the appellation of "Friend, My good Man, Mr. What's-your-name?" and similar squibs of insult, with which the prosperous assail the unfortunate. Such random shots often inflict the most galling wounds.

However, Friend, My good Man, and Mr. What's-your-name? disappointed this lady's small artillery of effect. He seemed invulnerable both to her insolence and to her affectation; for to be thought charming, by even Miss Dundas's emigrant tutor, was not to be despised; though at the very moment in which she desired his admiration, she supposed her haughtiness had impressed him with a proper sense of his own meanness, and a high conception of her dignity.

She jumped about the room; assumed infantine airs; played with Euphemia's lap-dog, fondled it, seated herself on the floor, and swept the carpet with her fine flaxen tresses; but she performed the routine of captivation in vain. Thaddeus recollected having seen this pretty full-grown baby, in her peculiar character of a profligate wife, pawning her own and her husband's property; he remembered this; and the united shafts of her charms and folly fell unnoticed to the ground.

When Thaddeus took his leave, Miss Beaufort, as was her custom, retired for an hour to read in her dressing-room before she directed her attention to the toilet. She opened a book and ran over a few pages of De Staël's Treatise on the Pas- sions; but such reasoning was too abstracted for her present frame of mind, and she threw the volume down.

She dipped her pen in the inkstand. Being a letter in debt to her guardian, she thought she could defray it now. She accomplished "Dear Sir," and stopped. While she rested on her elbow, and heedless of what she was doing bit the feather of her quill to pieces; no other idea offered itself than the figure of Thaddeus, sitting "severe in youthful beauty!" and surrounded by the contumelies with which the unworthy hope to disparage the merit they can neither emulate nor overlook.

Uneasy with herself, she pushed the table away; and leaning her cheek on her arm, gazed into the rainbow varieties of a beau-pot of flowers which occupied the fire-place. Even their gay colors appeared to fade before her sight, and present to her vacant eye the form of Thaddeus, with the melancholy air which shaded his movements. She turned round, but could not disengage herself from the spirit that was within her; his half-suppressed sighs seemed yet to thrill in her ear, and weigh upon her heart.

"Incomparable young man!" cried she, starting up, "why art thou so wretched?—Oh! Lady Tinemouth, why have you told me of his virtues? Why have I convinced myself that what you said is true? Oh! why was I formed to love an excellence which I never can approach?"

The natural reply to these self-demanded questions suggesting itself, she assented with a tear to the whisperings of her heart—that when philosophy would banish the affections, it is incapable of filling their place.

She rung the bell for her maid.

"Marshall, who dines with Lady Dundas to-day?"

"I believe, ma'am," replied the girl, "Mr. Lascelles, Lady Villiers, and the Marquis of Ellesmere."

"I detest them all three!" cried Mary, with a petulance to which she was little liable; "dress me how you like, I am indifferent to my appearance."

Marshall obeyed the commands of her lady, who, hoping to dissipate her thoughts, took up the poems of Egerton Brydges. But the attempt only deepened her emotion; for every line in that exquisite little volume "gives a very echo to the seat where love is throned!"

She closed the book, and sighed. Marshall having fixed the last pearl-comb in her mistress's beautiful hair, and seeing that something was wrong, exclaimed, "Dear ma'am, you are so pale to-day! I wish I might put on some gayer ornaments!"

"No," returned Mary, glancing a look at her languid features; "no, Marshall, I appear as well as I desire. Any chance of passing unnoticed in company I despise is worth retaining. No one will be here this evening whom I care to please."

She was mistaken; other company had been invited besides those whom the maid mentioned. But Miss Beaufort continued from seven o'clock until ten, the period at which the ladies left the table, annoyed to death by the insipid and pert compliments of Lord Elesmere.

Sick of his subjectless and dragging conversation, she gladly followed Lady Dundas to the drawing-room; where, opening her netting-case, she took her station in a remote corner.

After half an hour had elapsed, the gentlemen from below, recruited by fresh company, thronged in fast; and, notwithstanding it was styled a family party, Miss Beaufort saw many new faces—among whom she observed an elderly clergyman, who was looking about for a chair. The yawning Lascelles threw himself along the only vacant sofa, just as the gentleman approached it.

Miss Beaufort immediately resigned her place, and was moving on to another room, when the coxcomb springing up, begged permission to admire her work; and without permission taking it from her, pursued her, twisting the purse round his fingers, and talking all the while.

Mary walked forward, smiling with contempt, until they reached the saloon, where the Misses Dundas were closely engaged in conversation with the Marquis of Ellesmere.

Lascelles, who trembled for his Golconda at this sight, stepped briskly up. Miss Beaufort, who did not wish to lose sight of her purse while in the power of such a Lothario, followed him, and placed herself against the arm of the sofa on which Euphemia sat.

Lascelles now bowed his scented locks to Diana in vain, Lord Ellesmere was describing the last heat at Newmarket, and the attention of neither lady could be withdrawn.

The beau became so irritated by the neglect of Euphemia, and so nettled at her sister's overlooking him, that assuming a gay air, he struck Miss Dundas's arm a smart stroke with Miss Beaufort's purse; and laughing, to show the strong opposition between his broad white teeth, and the miserable mouth of his lordly rival, hoped to alarm him by his familiarity, and to obtain a triumph over the ladies by degrading them in the eyes of the peer.

"Miss Dundas," demanded he, "who was that quiz your sister walked with the other day in Portland-place?"

"Me!" cried Euphemia, surprised.

"Ay," returned he; "I was crossing from Weymouth-street when I perceived you accost a strange-looking man. You may remember you sauntered with him as far as Sir William Miller's. I would have joined you; but, seeing the family standing in the balcony, I did not choose them to suppose that I perhaps had brought you into such low company."

"Who was it, Euphemia?" inquired Miss Dundas in a severe tone.

"I wonder he affects to be ignorant," answered her sister angrily. "he knows very well it was only Mr. Constantine."

“And who is Mr. Constantine?” demanded the marquis. Mr. Lascelles shrugged his shoulders.

“E’faith, my lord! a fellow whom nobody knows; a teacher of languages, giving himself the airs of a prince. A writer of poetry; and a man who will draw you, your house, and dogs, if you will pay him for it.”

Mary’s heart swelled.

“What, a French emigrant?” drawled his lordship, dropping his lip; “and the lovely Euphemia wishes to soothe his sorrows.”

“No, my lord,” stammered Euphemia, “he is—he is——”

“What!” interrupted Lascelles, with a malicious grin, “a wandering beggar, who thrusts himself into a society, which may some day repay his insolence with chastisement! And for the people who encourage him, they had better beware of being themselves driven from all good company. Such confounders of degrees ought to be degraded from the rank they disgrace. I understand his chief protectress is Lady Tine-mouth his second Lady Sarah Roos; who, by way of passant le temps, shows she is not quite inconsolable at the absence of her husband.”

Mary, pale and trembling at the scandal his last words insinuated, opened her lips to speak, when Miss Dundas (whose angry eyes darted from her sister to her lover) exclaimed, “Mr. Lascelles, I know not what you mean. The subject you have taken up is below my discussion; yet I must confess, if Euphemia ever has disgraced herself so far as to be seen walking with a schoolmaster, she deserves all you have said.”

“And why might I not walk with him, sister?” asked the poor culprit, suddenly recovering from her confusion, and looking up, “who knew that he was not a gentleman?”

“Every body, ma’am,” interrupted Lascelles; “and when a young woman of fashion condescends to be seen equalizing herself with a creature depending on his wits for support, sho is very likely to incur the contempt of her acquaintance, and the censure of her friends.”

“She is, sir,” said Mary, holding down her indignant heart and forcing her countenance to appear serene; “for she ought to know, that if those men of fashion who have no wits to be either their support or ornament, did not proscribe talents from their circle, they must soon find ‘the greater glory dim the less.’”

“True, madam,” cried Lord Berrington; who, having entered during the contest, had been unobserved until this moment; “and their gold and tinsel would prove but dross and bubble, if struck by the Ithuriel touch of Merit!”

Mary turned at the sound of his philanthropic voice, and gave him one of those glances which go immediately to the soul.

“Come, Miss Beaufort,” cried he, taking her hand, “I see the young musician yonder who has so recently astonished the public. I believe he is going to sing. Let us leave this discordant corner, and seek harmony by his side.”

Mary obeyed the impulse of his arm; and, seating herself a few paces from the musical party, Berrington took his station behind her chair.

When the last melting notes of “From shades of night” died upon her ear, Mary’s eyes, full of an admiration and transport which the power of association rendered more intense, remained fixed on the singer. Lord Berrington smiled at the vivid expression of her countenance; and, as the young Orpheus moved from the instrument, exclaimed, “Come, Miss Beaufort, I won’t allow you quite to fancy Braham the god on whom Enamored Clitie turned and gazed!

Listen a little to my merits. Do you know if it were not for my timely lectures, Lascelles would grow the most insuffer-able gossip about town? There is not a match nor a divorce near St. James's of which he can not repeat all the whys and wherefores. I call him Sir Benjamin Backbite; and I believe he hates me worse than Asmodeus himself!"

"Such a man's dislike," rejoined Mary, "is the highest encomium he can bestow. I never yet heard him speak well of any person who did not resemble himself."

"And he is not consistent even there," resumed the viscount; "I am not sure I have always heard him speak in the gentlest terms of Miss Dundas. Yet on that I can not quite blame him; for, on my honor, she provokes me beyond any woman breathing."

"Many women, replied Mary, smiling, "would esteem that a flattering instance of power."

"And, like every thing that flatters," returned he, "it would tell a falsehood. A shrew can provoke the man who detests her. As to Miss Dundas, notwithstanding her parade of learning, she generally espouses the wrong side of the argument; and I may say with somebody, whose name I have forgotten, that any one who knows Diana Dundas never need be at a loss for a woman to call impertinent."

"You are not usually so severe, my lord!"

"I am not usually so sincere, Miss Beaufort," answered he; "but I see you think for yourself; therefore I make no hesitation in speaking what I think—to you."

His auditor bowed her head. Lady Dundas at that moment beckoned him across the room. She compelled him to sit down to whist. He cast a rueful glance at Mary, and took a seat opposite to his costly partner.

"Lord Berrington is a very worthy young man," observed the clergyman, to whom, at the beginning of the evening, Miss Beaufort had resigned her chair; "I presume, madam, you have been honoring him with your conversation?"

"Yes," returned Mary, noticing the benign countenance of the speaker; "I have not had the pleasure of long knowing his lordship; but what I have seen of his character is highly to his advantage."

"I was intimate in his father's house for years," rejoined the gentleman: "I knew this young nobleman from a boy. If he have faults, he owes them to his mother, who doated on him, and rather directed his care to the adornment of his really handsome person, than to the cultivation of talents he has since learned to appreciate."

"I believe Lord Berrington to be very sensible, and above all very humane," returned Miss Beaufort.

"He is so," replied the old gentleman; "yet it was not till he had attained the age of twenty-two that he appeared to know he had any thing to do in the world besides dressing and attending on the fair. His taste produced the first, while the urbanity of his disposition gave birth to the latter. When Berrington arrived at his title, he was about five-and-twenty. Sorrow for the death of his amiable parents, who died in the same month, afforded him leisure to find his reason. He discovered that he had been acting a part beneath him; and he soon implanted on the good old stock those excellent acquirements which you see he possesses. In spite of his regeneration," continued the clergyman, casting a good-humored glance on the dove-colored suit of the viscount, "you perceive that first impressions will remain. He loves dress, but he loves justice and philanthropy better."

"This eulogy, sir," said Mary, "affords me real pleasure. May I know the name of the gentleman with whom I have the honor to converse?"

"My name is Blackmore," returned he.

"Dr. Blackmore?"

"The same."

He was the same Dr. Blackmore who had been struck by the appearance of the Count Sobieski at the Hummums; and who, being a rare visiter at Lady Dundas's, had never by chance met a second time with the object of his compassion.

"I am happy," resumed Miss Beaufort, "in having the good fortune to meet a gentleman of whom I have so frequently heard my guardian speak with esteem."

"Ah!" replied he, "I have not seen him since the death of his lady; I hope that he and his son are well!"

"Perfectly," returned she.

"You, madam, I suppose, are my lady's niece, the daughter of the brave Admiral Beaufort?"

"I am, sir."

"Well, I rejoice at this incident," rejoined he, pressing her hand; "I knew your mother when she was a lovely girl. She used to spend her summers with the late Lady Somerset, then Miss Beaufort, at the castle. It was there I had the honor of cultivating her friendship."

"I do not remember ever having seen my mother," replied the now thoughtful Mary. Dr. Blackmore observing the expression of her countenance, smiled kindly, and said, "I fear I am to blame here. This is a sad way of beginning an acquaintance to which I introduced myself. But your goodness must pardon me," continued he; "for I have so long accustomed myself to speak what I think to those whom I love, that sometimes, as in this case, I undesignedly inflict pain."

"Not in this case," returned Miss Beaufort: "I am always pleased when listening to a friend of my mother; and particularly so, when he speaks in her praise."

The breaking up of the card-tables prevented further conversation; and Lord Berrington again approaching the sofa where she sat, exclaimed as he perceived her companion, "Ah! my good doctor, what, you have presented yourself at this fair shrine? I declare you eccentric folk may dare any thing. While you are free, Miss Beaufort," added he, turning to her, "adopt the advice which a good lady once gave me, and which I implicitly followed: 'When you are young, get the character of an oddity, and it seats you in an easy chair for life.' "

Mary was interrupted in her reply by a general stir among the company; who, now that cards were over, like bees and wasps, were swarming about the room, gathering and stinging as they went.

At one the house was cleared; and Miss Beaufort threw herself on her pillow to think and dream of Thaddeus.

CHAPTER XXXI.

If it be true, what the vivid imagination of poets have often asserted, that when the soul dreams it is in the actual presence of those beings whose images present themselves to their slumbers, then have the spirits of Thaddeus and Mary been commingled at the hour of midnight; then has the young Sobieski again visited his distant country, again seen it victorious, again knelt before his sainted parents.

From such visions as these did Thaddeus awake in the morning, after having spent the preceding evening with Lady Tinemouth.

He had walked with her ladyship in Hyde park till a late hour. By the mild light of the moon, which shone brightly through the still balmy air of a midsummer night, they took their way along the shadowy bank of the Serpentine.

There is a solemn appeal to the soul in the repose of nature that "makes itself be felt." No syllable from either Thaddeus or the countess broke the universal silence. Thaddeus looked around on the clear expanse of water, overshadowed by the long reflection of the deepening woods: then raising his eyes to that beautiful planet which has excited tender thoughts in every feeling breast since the creation of the world, he drew a deep sigh. The countess echoed it.

“In such a night as this,” said Thaddeus, in a low voice, as if afraid to disturb the sleeping deity of the place, “I used to walk the ramparts of Villanow with my dear departed mother, and gaze on that lovely orb: and when I was far from her I have looked at it from the door of my tent, and, fancying that her eyes were then fixed on the same object with mine, I found happiness in the idea.”

A tear stole down the cheek of Thaddeus. That moon yet shone brightly; but his mother’s eyes were closed in the grave.

“Villanow!” repeated the countess in a tone of surprise; “surely that was the seat of the celebrated Palatine of Masovia!—You have discovered yourself, Constantine! I am much mistaken if you be not his grandson, the young, yet far-famed, Thaddeus Sobieski.”

Thaddeus had allowed the remembrances pressing on his mind to draw him into a speech which had disclosed to the quick apprehension of the countess what his pride would forever have concealed.

“I have indeed betrayed my secret,” cried he, incapable of denying it; “but, dear Lady Tinemouth, as you value my feelings never let it escape your lips. Having long considered you as my best friend, and loved you as a parent, I forgot, in the recollection of my beloved mother, that I had withheld any of my history from you.”

“Mysterious Providence!” exclaimed her ladyship after a pause, in which ten thousand admiring and pitying reflections thronged on her mind: “is it possible? Can it be the Count Sobieski, that brave and illustrious youth, of whom every foreigner spoke with wonder? Can it be him that I behold in the poor unfriended Constantine?”

“Even so,” returned Thaddeus, pressing her hand; “my country is no more. I am now forgotten by the world as I have been by fortune. I have nothing to do on the earth but to fulfill the few duties which friendship has enjoined; and then it will be indifferent to me how soon I am laid in its bosom."

"You are too young, dear Constantine (for I am yet to call you by that name) to despair of happiness being yet reserved you."

"No, my dear Lady Tinemouth, I do not cheat myself with such hope; I am not so importunate with the gracious Being who gave me life and reason. He bestowed upon me for a while the tenderest connections; friends, rank, honors, glory: all these were crushed in the fall of Poland; yet I survive. I seek resignation only, and I have found it: it cost me many a struggle; but the contest was due to the decrees of that all-wise Creator who gave my first years to happiness."

"Inestimable young man!" cried the countess, wiping the flowing tears from her eyes, "you teach misfortune dignity! Not when all Warsaw rose in a body to thank you; not when the king received you in the senate with open arms; could you have appeared to me so worthy of admiration as at this moment, when, conscious of having been all this, you submit to the direct reverse because you believe it to be the will of your Maker! Ah! little does Miss Beaufort think when seated by your side that she is conversing with the very hero whom she has so often wished to see!"

"Miss Beaufort!" echoed Thaddeus, his heart glowing with delight. "Did she ever hear of me by the name of Sobieski?"

"Who has not?" returned the countess: "every heart that could be interested by suffering virtue has heard, and must well remember the calamities of your country. While the newspapers of the day informed us of the struggles which Poland made for liberty, they noticed among the first of her champions the Palatine of Masovia, Kosciusko, and yourself

Many an evening have I passed with Mrs. Dorothy and Mary Beaufort lamenting the fate of that devoted kingdom."

During this declaration a variety of transporting emotions agitated the mind of Thaddeus; until recollecting, with a bitter pang, the shameless ingratitude of Pembroke, and the cruel possibility of being recognized by the Earl of Tinemouth as his son, he exclaimed, "My dearest madam, I entreat that what I have revealed to you may never be divulged! Miss Beaufort's friendship would indeed be happiness; but I can not purchase even so great a bliss at the expense of principles which are knit with my life."

"How?" cried the countess: "is not your name and all its attendant ideas an honor which the proudest man may boast?"

Thaddeus pressed her hand to his heart.

"You are kind! very kind! yet I can not retract. Confide, dear Lady Tinemouth, in the justice of my resolution. I could not bear cold pity; I could not bear the heartless comments of people who, pretending to compassion, would load me with a heavier sense of my calamities. Besides, there are persons in England who are so much the object of my aversion I would rather die than let them know I exist. Therefore, once again, dear Lady Tinemouth, let me implore you to preserve my secret."

She saw by the earnestness of his manner she ought to comply; and, without further hesitation, promised all the silence he desired.

This long moonlight conversation, by awakening those dormant remembrances which were cherished though hidden in his bosom, gave birth to an effort of imagination that painted within the rapid series of his tumultuous dreams the images of every being whom he had ever loved, or now continued to regard with interest.

Proceeding next morning toward Harley-street he mused on what had happened; and pleased that he had, though unpremeditatedly, paid the just compliment of his entire confidence to the uncommon friendship of the countess, he arrived at Lady Dundas's door before he was sensible of the ground he had passed over; and in a few minutes afterward was ushered into his accustomed purgatory.

When the servant opened the study-door, Miss Euphemia was again alone. Thaddeus recoiled, but he could not retreat.

"Come in, Mr. Constantine," cried the little beauty in a languid tone; "my sister is gone to the riding-school with Mr. Lascelles. Miss Beaufort wanted me to drive out with her and my mother; but I preferred waiting for you."

The count bowed; and almost retreating with fear of what might next be said, he gladly heard a thundering knock at the door, and a moment after the voice of Miss Dundas ascending the stairs.

He had just opened his books when she entered, followed by her lover. Panting under a heavy riding-habit she flung herself on a sofa, and began to villify "the odious heat of Fozard's odious place;" then telling Euphemia she would play truant to-day, ordered her to attend to her lessons.

Owing to the warmth of the weather Thaddeus came out this morning without boots; and it being the first time the exquisite proportion of his limb had been seen by any of the present company excepting Euphemia, Lascelles, bursting with an emotion (which he would not call envy) measured the count's fine leg with his scornful eyes; then declaring that he was quite in a furnace, took the corner of his glove and waving it to and fro, half muttered, "Come, gentle air."

"The fairer Lascelles cries!" exclaimed Euphemia, looking off her exercise.

"What! does your master teach you wit?" drawled the coxcomb, with a particular emphasis.

Thaddeus, affecting not to hear, continued to direct his pupil.

The indefatigable Lascelles having observed the complacency with which the count always regarded Miss Beaufort deter mined the goad should fret; and drawing the netting out of his pocket which he had taken the night before from Mary, he exclaimed, "Fore Heaven, here is my little Beaufort's purse!"

Thaddeus started, and unconsciously looking up beheld the well-known work of Mary dangling in the hand of Lascelles. He suffered pangs unknown to him; his eyes became dim; and hardly knowing what he saw or said, he pursued the lesson with increased rapidity.

Finding his malice take effect, with a careless air the malicious puppy threw his clumsy limbs on the sofa, which Miss Dundas had quitted to seat herself nearer the window, and cried in a voice of sudden recollection—

"By the by, that Miss Mary Beaufort when she chooses to be sincere, is a stanch little aristocrat."

"You may as well tell me," replied Miss Dundas, with a contemptuous curl of her lip, "that she is the Empress of Russia."

"I beg your pardon," cried he, raising his voice at his judgment being doubted; "I will prove it to you. When she gave me this gew-gaw," added he, rumpling the purse in his hand, "she told me an everlasting story about some friend of hers, whose music-master, having mistaken some condescensions on her part, had dared to snatch a kiss from her snowy fingers as they were flying over the strings of her harp. You can not imagine how Beaufort's pretty eyes blazed as she related the tale; I verily believe had it been herself she would have given poor Tweedledum a flourish across the cheek."

Miss Dundas laughed.

"These energetic young ladies possess not the gentlest passions in the world; and after Miss Beaufort's outrageous sally last night upon you, I should not wonder at any indecorum she might commit!"

“Outrageous to me!” echoed the fop, dipping the end of the netting into Diana’s lavender-bottle, and dabbing his temples, “she was always too civil by half. I hate forward girls.”

Thaddeus shut the large dictionary which lay before him with a violence that made the puppy start; and rising hastily from his chair, with a face all crimson, was taking his hat, when the door opened, and Mary appeared.

A white-chip bonnet was resting lightly on the glittering tresses which waved over her forehead; while her lace-shade, gently discomposed by the air, half veiled and half revealed her graceful figure. She entered with a smile; and, walking up to the side of the table where Thaddeus was standing, inquired after his friend’s health. He answered her in a voice unusually agitated. All that he had been told by the countess of her favorable opinion of him, and the slander he had just heard from Diana’s lover, were at once present to his mind.

He was yet speaking when Miss Beaufort, casually looking toward the other side of the room, saw her purse still acting the part of a handkerchief in the hand of Mr. Lascelles.

“Look, Mr. Constantine,” said she, gayly tapping his arm with her parasol, “how the most precious things may be degraded! There is the netting you have so often admired, and which I intended for Lady Tinemouth’s pocket, debased to do the office of Mr. Lascelles’s napkin.”

“You gave it to him, Miss Beaufort,” cried Miss Dundas; “and after that surely he may use it as he values it!”

“If I could have given it to Mr. Lascelles, madam, I should hardly have taken notice of its fate.”

Believing what her lover had advanced, Miss Dundas was displeased with Mary for having, by presents, interfered with any of her dangles, and rather angrily replied—“Mr. Lascelles said you gave it to him; and certainly you would not insinuate a word against his veracity?”

“No, not insinuate,” returned Miss Beaufort, “but affirm that he has forgotten his veracity in this statement.”

Lascelles yawned—“Lord bless me, ladies, how you quarrel! You will disturb monsieur.”

“Mr. Constantine,” returned Mary, blushing with indignation, “can not be disturbed by nonsense.”

Thaddeus again took his hat: bowing to his lovely champion with an expression of countenance which he little suspected had passed from his heart to his eyes, he was preparing to take his leave when Euphemia requested him to inform her whether she had folded down the right pages for the next exercise. He drew near, and was leaning over her chair to look at the book when she whispered, “Don’t be hurt at what Lascelles says; he is always jealous of any body who is handsomer than himself.”

Thaddeus bowed to her with a face of scarlet; for on meeting the eyes of Mary, he saw that she had heard this intended comforter as well as himself; and, uttering a few incoherent sentences to both ladies, he hurried out of the room.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE Count Sobieski was prevented paying his customary visit next morning in Harley-street by the sudden illness of the general, who was struck at seven o’clock by a fit of the palsy.

When Dr. Cavendish beheld the poor old man stretched on the bed and hardly exhibiting signs of life, he pronounced it to be a death-stroke. At this sentence Thaddeus, turning deadly pale, staggered to a seat, with his eyes fixed on the altered features of his friend. Dr. Cavendish took his hand.

“Recollect yourself, my dear sir! Happen when it will, his death must be a release. But do not expect it for some time; he may yet linger a few days.”

“Not in pain, I hope!” said Thaddeus.

“No,” returned the doctor; “probably he will remain as you now see him and expire like the last glimmer of a dying taper.”

The benevolent Cavendish gave proper directions to Thaddeus and to Mrs. Robson, who promised to act as nurse; and then with regret left the stunned count to the melancholy task of watching by the bedside of his venerable friend.

Thaddeus now retained no thought that was not riveted to the emaciated form before him. While the unconscious invalid struggled for respiration, he listened to his short and convulsed breathing with sensations which seemed to tear the strings of his own breast. Unable to bear it longer, he moved to the fire, and seating himself, with his pallid face and aching head supported on his arm, which rested on a plain deal table, he remained; meeting no other suspension from deep meditation than the occasional appearance of Mrs. Robson, on tip-toes, peeping in, and inquiring whether he wanted any thing.

From this depressing reverie he was aroused next morning at nine o'clock by the entrance of Dr. Cavendish. Thaddeus seized his hand with the eagerness of anxiety—“He has not been worse, my dear sir, may I hope—”

Not suffering him to finish with what he hoped, the doctor shook his head in sign of the vanity of that hope, and advanced to the bed of the general. He felt his pulse. No change of opinion was the consequence, only that he now saw no threatenings of immediate dissolution.

“Poor Butzou!” said Thaddeus, as the doctor withdrew putting the general's motionless hand to his quivering lips, “I never will leave thee! I will watch by thee, thou last relic of my country!”

With anguish at his heart he wrote a few hasty lines to the countess; then addressing Miss Dundas, he mentioned as the reason for his late and continued absence the danger of his friend.

His note found Miss Dundas attended by her constant shadow, Mr. Lascelles, Lady Villiers, and two or three more fine ladies and gentlemen; besides Euphemia and Miss Beaufort, who, with pensive countenances, were waiting the arrival of its writer.

When Miss Dundas took the billet off the silver salver on which her man presented it, and looked at the superscription, she threw it into the lap of Lascelles.

"There," cried she, "is an excuse, I suppose, from Mr. Constantine for his impertinence in not coming hither yesterday. Read it, Lascelles."

"Fore Gad, I would n't touch it for an earldom!" exclaimed the affected puppy, jerking it on the table. "It might affect me with the hypochondriacs. Pray, Phemy, do you peruse it."

Euphemia, in her eagerness to learn what detained Mr. Constantine, neglected the insolence of the request, and hastily breaking the seal, read as follows:—

"Mr. Constantine hopes that a sudden and dangerous disorder, which has attacked the life of a very dear friend with whom he resides, will be a sufficient appeal to the humanity of the Misses Dundas, and obtain their pardon for his relinquishing the honor of attending them yesterday and to-day."

"Dear me!" cried Euphemia, piteously, "how sorry I am! I dare say it is that white-haired old gentleman we saw in the Park. You remember, Mary, he was sick?"

"Probably," returned Miss Beaufort, with her eyes fixed on the agitated handwriting of Thaddeus.

"Throw the letter into the street, Phemy!" cried Miss Dundas, affecting sudden terror; "who knows but what it is a fever the man has got, and we may all catch our deaths."

“Heaven forbid!” exclaimed Mary, in a voice of real alarm; but it was for Thaddeus, not fear of any infection which the paper might bring to herself.

“Lascelles, take away the filthy scrawl from Phemy. How can you be so headstrong, child?” cried Diana, snatching the letter from her sister, and throwing it from the window; “I declare you are sufficient to provoke a saint.”

“Then you may keep your temper, Di,” returned Euphemia, with a sneer; “you are far enough from that title.”

Miss Dundas made a very angry reply, which was retaliated with another; and a still more noisy and disagreeable altercation might have taken place, had not a good-humored lad, a brother-in-law of Lady Villiers, in hopes of calling off the attention of the sisters, exclaimed, “Bless me, Miss Dundas, your little dog has pulled a folded sheet of paper from under that stand of flowers! Perhaps it may be of consequence.”

“Fly! Take it up, George!” cried Lady Villiers; “Esop will tear it to atoms, while you are asking questions.”

After a chase round the room, over chairs and under tables, George Villiers at length plucked the devoted piece of paper out of the dog’s mouth; and as Miss Beaufort was gathering up her working materials to leave the room, he opened it, and cried in a voice of triumph, “By Jove, it is a copy of verses!”

“Verses!” demanded Euphemia, feeling in her pocket, and coloring; “let me see them.”

“That you shan’t,” roared Lascelles, catching them out of the boy’s hand; “if they are your writing we will have them.”

“Help me, Mary!” cried Euphemia, turning to Miss Beaufort; “I know that nobody is a poet in this house but myself. They must be mine, and I will have them.”

“Surely, Mr. Lascelles,” said Mary, compassionating the poor girl’s anxiety, “you will not be so rude as to detain them from their right owner?”

“O! but I will,” cried he, mounting on a table to get out of Euphemia’s reach, who, half crying, tried to snatch at the paper. “Let me alone, Miss Phemy. I will read them; so here goes it.”

Miss Dundas laughed at her sister’s confused looks, while Lascelles prepared to read in a loud voice the following verses. They had been hastily written in pencil by Thaddeus, a long time ago. And having put them by mistake with some other papers into his pocket, he had dropped them next day in taking out his handkerchief at Lady Dundas’s. Lascelles cleared his throat with three hems, then raised his right hand with a flourishing action, in a very pompous tone began—

“Like one whom Etna’s torrent fires have sent Far from the land where his first youth was spent.
 Who, inly drooping, on a foreign shore
 Broods over scenes which charm his eyes no more.
 And while his country’s ruin wakes the groan,
 Yearns for the buried hut he called his own—
 So driven, O Poland! from thy ravaged plains,
 So mourning o’er thy sad, but loved remains,
 A houseless wretch, I wander through the world,
 From friends, from grandeur, and from glory hurl’d
 Oh! not that each long night my weary eyes
 Sink into sleep, unlulled by Pity’s sighs;
 Not that in bitter tears my bread is steep’d;
 Tears drawn by insults on my sorrows heap’d;
 Not that my thoughts recall a mother’s grave—
 Recall the sire I would have died to save,
 Who fell before me, bleeding on the field,
 While I in vain opposed the useless shield.
 Ah! not for these I grieve! Though mental woe,
 More deadly still, scarce Fancy’s self could know.
 O’er want and private griefs the soul can climb,
 Virtue subdues the one, the other Time;
 But at his country’s fall, the patriot feels
 A grief, no time, no drug, no reason heals.

Mem'ry!—remorseless murderer, whose voice
 Kills as it sounds; who never says, Rejoice!—
 To my deserted heart, by joy forgot;
 Thou pale, thou midnight specter, haunt me not!
 Thou dost but point to where sublimely stands
 A glorious temple, reared by Freedom's hands,
 Circled with palms and laurels, crowned with light,
 Darting Truth's piercing sun on mortal sight:
 Then rushing on, leagued fiends of hellish birth,
 Level the mighty fabric with the earth!
 Slept the red bolt of Vengeance in that hour,
 When virtuous Freedom fell the slave of Power?
 Slumber'd the God of Justice! that no brand
 Blasted, with blazing wing, the impious band!
 Dread God of Justice! to thy will I kneel,
 Though still my filial heart must bleed and feel,
 Though still the proud convulsive throb will rise,
 When fools my country's wrongs and woes despise
 When low-soul'd Pomp, vain Wealth, that Pity gives,
 Which Virtue ne'er bestows, and ne'er receives
 That Pity, stabbing where it vaunts to cure,
 Which bars the dart of Want, and makes it sure.
 How far removed from what the feeling breast
 Yields boastless, breathed in sighs to the distressed;
 Which whispers sympathy, with tender fear,
 And almost dreads to pour its balmy tear.
 But such I know not now! Unseen, alone,
 I heave the heavy sigh, I draw the groan,
 And, madd'ning, turn to days of liveliest joy,
 When o'er my native hills, I cast mine eye,
 And said, exulting, "Freemen here shall sow
 The seed that soon in tossing gold shall glow!
 While Plenty, led by Liberty, shall rove,
 Gav and rejoicing, through the land they love;
 And 'mid their loaded vines, the peasant see
 His wife, his children, breathing out—'We're free!'
 But now, O wretched land! above thy plains,
 Half viewless through the gloom, vast Horror reigns,
 No happy peasant, o'er his blazing hearth,
 Devotes the supper hour to love and mirth;

No flowers on Liberty's pure altar bloom ;
 Alas! they wither now, and strew her tomb!—
 From the Great Book of Nations, fiercely rent,
 My country's page to Lethe's stream is sent ;
 But sent in vain! The historic Muse shall raise O'er wrong'd Sarmatia's cause, the voice of praise;
 Shall sing her dauntless on the field of death,
 And blast her royal robbers' bloody wreath!"

"It must be Constantine's!" cried Euphemia in a voice of surprised delight, while springing up to take the paper out of his hand, when the reader had finished.

"I dare say it is," answered the ill-natured Lascelles, holding it above his head. "You shall have it; only first let us hear it again—it is so mighty pretty, so very lackadaisical."

"Give it me!" cried Euphemia, quite angry.

"Don't, Lascelles," exclaimed Miss Dundas; "the man must be a perfect idiot to write such rhodomontade."

"O! it is delectable!" returned her lover, opening the paper again; "it would make a charming ditty! Come, I will sing it. Shall it be to the tune of "The Babes in the Wood," or "Chevy Chase," or "The Beggar of Bethnal Green?"

"Pitiless, senseless wretch!" exclaimed Mary, rising from her chair, where she had been striving to subdue the emotions with which every line in the poem filled her heart.

"Brute!" cried the enraged Euphemia, taking courage at Miss Beaufort's unusual warmth; "I will have the paper."

"You shan't," answered the malicious coxcomb; and raising his arm higher than her reach, he tore it into a hundred pieces.

At this sight, no longer able to contain herself, Mary rushed out of the room and hurrying to her chamber threw herself upon the bed, where she gave way to a paroxysm of tears which shook her almost to suffocation.

During the first burst of her indignation, her agitated spirit breathed every appellation of abhorrence and reproach on Lascelles and his malignant mistress. Then wiping her flowing eyes, she exclaimed, "Yet can I wonder, when I compare Constantine with what they are? The man who dares to be virtuous and great and to appear so, arms the self-love of all common characters against him."

Such being her meditations, she refused to join the family at dinner; and it was not until evening that she felt herself at all able to treat the ill-natured group with decent civility.

To avoid spending more hours than were absolutely necessary in the company of a woman she now loathed, next morning Miss Beaufort borrowed Lady Dundas's sedan chair; and ordering it to Lady Tinemouth's, found her at home alone, and evidently much discomposed.

"I intrude on you, Lady Tinemouth!" said Mary, observing her looks, and withdrawing from the offered seat.

"No, my dear Miss Beaufort," replied she, "I am glad you are come. I assure you I have few pleasures in solitude. Read that letter," added she, putting one into her hand: "it has just conveyed one of the cruelest stabs ever offered by a son to the heart of his mother. Read it, and you will not be surprised at finding me in the state you see."

The countess looked on her paralyzed hands as she spoke; and Miss Beaufort taking the paper, sat down and read to herself the following letter:

"TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE THE COUNTESS OF TINEMOUTH
"MADAM,

"I am commissioned by the earl, my father, to inform you, if you have lost all regard for your own character, he considers that some respect is due to the mother of his children; therefore he watches your conduct.

"He has been apprised of your frequent meetings during these many months in Grosvenor-place, and at other people's houses, with an obscure foreigner, your declared lover. The earl wished to suppose this false until your shameless behavior became so flagrant that he esteems it worthy neither of doubt nor indulgence.

“With his own eyes he saw you four nights ago, alone with this man in Hyde Park. Such demonstration is dreadful. Your proceedings are abominable; and if you do not, without further parley, set off either to Craighall in Cornwall, or to the Wolds, you shall receive a letter from my sister as well as myself, to tell the dishonored Lady Tinemouth how much she merits her daughter's contempt, added to that of

HARWOLD.”

“And what do you mean to do, my dear madam?” inquired Mary, shocked almost beyond the power of remark.

“I will obey my lord and his children,” returned the countess, bursting into tears. “My last action shall be in obedience to their will. I can not live long, and when I am dead perhaps the earl's vigilance may be satisfied; perhaps some kind friend may then plead my cause to my daughter's heart. One cruel line from her would kill me. I will at least avoid the completion of that threat by leaving town to-morrow night.”

“So soon? but I hope not to Cornwall?”

“No,” replied her ladyship; “Craighall is too near Plymouth; I determine on the Wolds. Yet why should I have a choice? It is almost a matter of indifference to what spot I am banished; in what place I am to die: any where I shall be equally remote from a friend.”

Miss Beaufort's heart was oppressed when she entered the room! Lady Tinemouth's sorrows seemed to give her a license to weep. She took her ladyship's hand, and with difficulty sobbed out this inarticulate offer.—“Take me, dear Lady Tinemouth! I am sure my guardian will be happy to permit me to be with you, where and how long you like."

"My dear girl," replied the countess, kissing her wet cheek, "I thank you from my heart; but I can not take so ungenerous an advantage of your goodness as to consign your tender nature to the harassing task of attending on sorrow and sickness. How strangely different may even amiable dispositions be tempered! Maria Egerton is better framed for such an office. Kind as she is, the hilarity of her disposition does not allow the sympathy she bestows on others to injure either her mind or her body."

Mary interrupted her. "I should be grieved to believe that my very aptitude to serve my friends will prove the first reason why I should be denied the pleasure. It is only in scenes of affliction that friendship is tried, and declares its truth. If Miss Egerton were not going with you, I should certainly insist on putting my affection to the ordeal."

"You mistake, my sweet friend," returned her ladyship; "Maria is forbidden to remain any longer with me. You have overlooked the postscript to Lord Harwold's letter, else you must have seen the whole of my cruel situation. Turn over the leaf."

Miss Beaufort opened the sheet and read these few lines, which being written on the interior part of the paper, had before escaped her sight:—

"Go where you will, it is our special injunction that you leave Miss Egerton behind you; she, we hear, has been the embassadress in this intrigue. If we learn that you disobey, it shall be worse for you in every respect; as it will convince us beyond a possibility of doubt how uniform is the turpitude of your conduct."

Lady Tinemouth grasped Miss Beaufort's hand as she threw the barbarous scrawl on the table. "And that is from the son for whom I felt all a mother's agonies; all a mother's love!

Had he died the first hour in which he saw the light, what a mass of guilt might he not have escaped! It is he," added she, in a lower voice, and looking wildly round, "that breaks my heart. I could have borne his father's perfidy; but, insult, oppression, from my child! Oh! Mary, you know not its bitterness!"

Miss Beaufort could only answer with her tears.

After a pause of nearly a quarter of an hour, in which the countess strove to tranquilize her spirits, she resumed in a more composed voice—

"Excuse me for an instant, my dear Miss Beaufort; I must write to Mr. Constantine. I have yet to inform him that my absence is to be added to his other misfortunes."

With her eyes raining down upon the paper, she took up a pen, and hastily writing a few lines, was sealing them, when Mary looking up, hardly conscious of the words which escaped her, said with inarticulate anxiety, "Lady Tinemouth, you know much of that noble and unhappy young man?" Her eye irresolute, and her cheek glowing, awaited the answer of the countess, who continued to gaze on the letter she held in her hand, as if in profound thought; then all at once raising her head, and regarding the now downcast face of her lovely friend with tenderness, replied in a tone which conveyed the deep interest of her heart—

"I do, Miss Beaufort: but he has reposed his griefs in my friendship and honor; therefore I must hold them sacred."

"I will not ask you to betray them," returned Mary, in a faltering voice: "yet I can not help lamenting his sufferings and esteeming the fortitude with which he supports his fall."

The countess looked steadfastly on her fluctuating countenance. "Has Constantine, my dear girl, insinuated to you that he ever was otherwise than as he now appears?"

Miss Beaufort could not reply. She would not trust her lips with words; but shook her head in sign that he had not,

Lady Tinemouth was too well read in the human heart to doubt for an instant the cause of her question, and consequent emotion. Feeling that something was due to an anxiety so disinterested, she took her passive hand, and said, "Mary, you have guessed rightly. Though I am not authorized to tell you the real name of Constantine nor the particulars of his history, yet let this satisfy your generous heart, that it can never be more honorably employed than in compassionating calamities which ought to wreath his young brows with glory."

Miss Beaufort's eyes streamed afresh, while her exulting soul seemed ready to rush from her bosom.

"Mary!" continued the countess, warmed by the recollection of his excellence, "you have no need to blush at the interest which you take in this amiable Constantine! Every trial of spirit which could have tortured youth or manhood, has been endured by him with the firmness of a hero. Ah, my sweet friend," added the countess, pressing the hand of the confused Miss Beaufort, who ashamed and conscious that her behavior betrayed how dearly she considered him, had covered her face with her handkerchief, "when you are disposed to believe that a man is as great as his titles and personal demands would assert, examine with a nice observance whether his pretensions be real or artificial. Imagine him disrobed of splendor, and struggling with the world's inclemencies. If his character can not stand this ordeal, he is only a vain pageant, inflated and garnished; and it is reasonable to punish such arrogance with contempt. But on the reverse, when, like Constantine, he rises from the ashes of his fortunes in a brighter blaze of virtue, then, dearest girl," cried the countess, encircling her with her arms, "it is the sweetest privilege of loveliness to console and bless so rare a being."

Mary raised her weeping face from the bosom of her friend; and clasping her hands together with trepidation and anguish implored her to be as faithful to her secret as she had proved herself to Constantine's: "I would sooner die," added she, "than have him know my rashness, perhaps my indelicacy! Let me possess his esteem, Lady Tinemouth! Let him suppose I only esteem him! More I should shrink from: I have seen him beset by some of my sex; and to be classed with them! To have him imagine that my affection is like theirs! I could not bear it—I entreat you, let him respect me!"

The impetuosity, and almost despair, with which Miss Beaufort uttered these incoherent sentences, pierced the soul of Lady Tinemouth. How different was the spirit of this pure and dignified love, to the wild passion she had seen shake the frame of Lady Sara Roos!

They remained silent for some time.

"May I see your ladyship to-morrow?" asked Mary, drawing her cloak about her.

"I fear not," replied the countess; I leave this house to-morrow."

Miss Beaufort rose; her lips, hands, and feet, trembled so that she could hardly stand. Lady Tinemouth put her arm round her waist and kissing her forehead, added, "Heaven bless you, my sweet friend! May all the wishes of your innocent heart be gratified!"

The countess supported her to the door. Mary hesitated an instant; then flinging her snowy arms over her ladyship's neck, in a voice scarcely audible, articulated—"Only tell me!—does he love Euphemia?"

Lady Tinemouth strained her to her breast—"No, my dearest girl; I am certain, both from what I have heard him say, and observed in his eyes, that had he dared to love any one, you would have been the object of his choice"

How Miss Beaufort got into Lady Dundas's sedan chair, she had no recollection, so completely was she absorbed in the recent scene. Her mind was perplexed, her heart acted and she arrived in Harley-street so much disordered and unwell as to oblige her to retire immediately to her room with the excuse of a violent pain in her head.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THIS interview induced Lady Tinemouth to destroy the note she had written to Thaddeus; and to frame another, better calculated to produce comfort to all parties. What she had declared to Mary respecting the state of the count's affections was sincere.

She had early penetrated the veil of bashfulness with which Miss Beaufort obscured that countenance so usually the tablet of her soul. The countess easily translated the quick receding of her eye, whenever Thaddeus turned his attention toward her; the confused reply that followed any unexpected question from his lips; and, above all, the unheeded sighs heaved by her when he left the room, or when his name was mentioned during his absence. These symptoms too truly revealed to Lady Tinemouth the state of her young friend's bosom.

But the circumstances being different, her observations on Thaddeus were not nearly so conclusive. Mary had absolutely given the empire of her happiness, with her heart, into his hands. Thaddeus felt that his ruined hopes ought to prevent him laying his at her feet; and regarding her as a being beyond his reach, he conceived no suspicions that she entertained one dearer thought of him than what mere philanthropy could authorize.

He contemplated her unequalled beauty, graces, talents, and virtues, with an admiration bordering on idolatry! yet his heart flew from the confession that he loved her ; and it was not until reason demanded of his candor, why he felt a pang on seeing Mary's purse in the hands of Mr. Lascelles, that with a glowing cheek he owned to himself, he was jealous : that although he had not presumed to elevate one wish toward the possession of Miss Beaufort ; yet when Lascelles flaunted her name on his tongue, he found how deep would be the wound in his peace should she ever give her hand to another.

Confounded at this discovery of a passion, the seeds of which he supposed had been crushed by the weight of his misfortunes, he proceeded homeward in a trance of thought ; not far differing from that of the dreamer who sinks into a light but harassing slumber, and, full of terror, doubts whether he be sleeping or awake.

The sudden illness of General Butzou having put these ideas to flight, Thaddeus was sitting on the bedside with his anxious thoughts fixed on the pale spectacle of mortality before him, when Nanny brought in a letter from the countess. He took it, and going to the window, read with mingled pain and pleasure the following epistle :

“ TO MR. CONSTANTINE.

“ I know not, my dear count, when I shall be permitted to see you again ; perhaps never on this side of the grave !

“ Since Heaven has denied me the tenderness of my own children, it would have been a comfort to me, might I have continued to act a parent's part by you. But my cruel lord, and my more cruel son, jealous of the consolation I meet in the society of my few intimate friends, command me to quit London ; and as I have ever made it a system to obey their injunctions, I shall go.

“ It pierces me to the soul, my dear son ! (allow my maternal heart to call you by that name !) it distresses me deeply that I am compelled to leave the place where you are : and the more that I can not see you before my departure, for I quit town to-morrow afternoon.

“ Write to me often ; my loved Sobieski : your letters will be some alleviation to my lot during the fulfillment of my hard duty.

“ Wear the inclosed gold chain for my sake ; it is one of two given me a long time ago by Miss Beaufort. If I have not greatly mistaken you, the present will now possess a double value in your estimation : indeed it ought. Sensibility and thankfulness being properties of your nature, they will not deny a lively gratitude to the generous interest with which that amiable young woman regards your fate. It is impossible that the avowed Count Sobieski (whom, a year ago, I remember her animated fancy painted in the most romantic colors) could excite more of her esteem than I know she has bestowed on the untitled Constantine.

“ She is all nobleness and affection. Although I am sensible she will leave much behind her in London to regret, she insists on accompanying me to the Wolds. Averse to transgress so far on her goodness, I firmly refused her offer till this evening, when I received so warm and urging a letter from the kind girl, that I could no longer withhold my consent.

“ Indeed, this lovely creature’s active friendship proves of high consequence to me now, situated as I am with regard to a new whim of the earl’s. Had she not benevolently presented herself, in obedience to my lord’s commands, I should have been obliged to go alone ; he having taken some wild antipathy to Miss Egerton, whose company he has interdicted. At any rate her parents would not have allowed me her society much longer, for Mr. Montresor is to return this month.

“ I shall not be easy, my dear count, until I hear from you. Pray write soon ; and inform me of every particular respecting the poor general : is he likely to recover ?

“In all things, my loved son, in which I can serve you, remember that I expect that you will call upon me as a mother. Your own could hardly have regarded you with deeper tenderness than does your affectionate and faithful

“ADELIZA TINEMOUTH.

“Grosvenor-place, Thursday, midnight.

“Direct to me at Harwold-place, Wolds, Lincolnshire.”

Several opposite emotions discomposed the mind of Thaddeus while reading this epistle. Increased abhorrence of the man whom he believed to be his father, and regret at the proposed departure of Lady Tinemouth, could neither subdue the balmy effect of her maternal affection, nor wholly check the emotion which the unusual mentioning of Miss Beaufort's name had made throb in his heart. He read the sentence which contained the assurance of her esteem a third time.

“Delicious poison!” cried he, kissing the paper; “if adoring thee, lovely Mary, be added to my other sorrows, I shall be resigned! There is sweetness even in the thought. Could I credit all which my dear Lady Tinemouth affirms, the conviction that I possess one kind solicitude in the mind of Miss Beaufort would be ample compensation for—”

He did not finish the sentence, but sighing profoundly, rose from his chair.

“For any thing, except beholding her the wife of another!” was the sentiment with which his heart panted. Thaddeus had never known a selfish wish in his life; and this first instance of his desiring that good to be unappropriated, which he might not himself enjoy, made him start.

“There is a fault in my heart, a dreadful one!” Dissatisfied with himself, he was preparing to answer her ladyship's letter when, turning to the date, he discovered that it had been written on Thursday night, and in consequence of Nanny's neglect in not calling at the coffee-house, had been delayed a day and a half before it reached his hands.

His disappointment at this accident was severe. She was gone, and Miss Beaufort along with her.

“Then, indeed, I am unfortunate!” said he, holding the chain in his hand, and looking on it; “I am at once deprived of all that rendered my forlorn existence in this land tolerable!”

He put the chain round his neck, and with a true lover-like feeling, thought that it warmed the heart which mortification had chilled; but the fancy was evanescent, and he again turned to watch the fading life of his friend.

“During the lapse of a few days, in which the general appeared merely to breathe, Thaddeus, instead of his attendance dispatched regular notes to Harley-street. In answer to these excuses, he commonly received little tender billets from Euphemia; the strain of which he seemed totally to overlook, by the cold respect he evinced in his dismal apologies for absence.

This young lady was so full of lamentation over the trouble which her elegant tutor must endure in watching his sick friend, that she never thought it worth while to mention any creature in the house excepting herself and her commiseration. Thaddeus longed to inquire about Miss Beaufort; but the more he wished it the greater was his reluctance to write her name.

Things were in this situation, when, one evening, as he was reading by the light of a solitary candle in his little sitting-room, the door opened, and Nancy stepped in, followed by a person wrapped in a large black cloak. Thaddeus rose.

“A lady, sir,” said Nancy, courtesying.

The moment the girl withdrew, the visiter cast herself into a chair, and sobbing aloud seemed in violent agitation. Thaddeus, astonished and alarmed, approached her, and, though she was unknown, offered her every assistance in his power.

Catching hold of the hand which, with the greatest respect, he extended toward her, she instantly displayed to his dismayed sight the features of Lady Sara Roos.

“Merciful Heaven!” exclaimed he, involuntarily starting back.

“Do not cast me off, Constantine!” cried she, clasping his arm, and looking up to him with a face of anguish; “on you alone I now depend for happiness, for existence!”

A cold damp stood on the forehead of her auditor.

“Dear Lady Sara, what am I to understand by this emotion; has any thing dreadful happened? Is Captain Roos—”

Lady Sara shuddered, and still grasping his hand, answered in words every one of which palsied the heart of Thaddeus. “He is coming home. He is now at Portsmouth. O Constantine! I am not yet so debased as to live with him, when my heart is yours.”

At this shameful declaration Thaddeus clinched his teeth in agony of spirit, and striking his hand upon his eyes to shut her from his sight, he turned suddenly round and walked toward another part of the room.

Lady Sara followed him. Her cloak having fallen off, now displayed her fine form in all the fervor of grief and distraction; she wrung her snowy arms in despair; and with accents rendered more piercing by the anguish of her mind, exclaimed, “What? You hate me? You throw me from you? Cruel, barbarous Constantine! Can you drive from your feet the woman who adores you? Can you cast her who is without a home into the streets?”

Thaddeus felt his hand wet with her tears; he fixed his eyes upon her with almost delirious horror. Her hat being off, gave looseness to her long black hair, which falling in masses over her shoulders and eyes, gave such additional wildness to the imploring and frantic expression of those eyes, as distracted his soul.

“Rise madam! For Heaven’s sake, Lady Sara!” and he stooped to support her.

“Never,” cried she, covering her face with her hands, “never! till you promise to protect me. My husband comes home to-night, and I have left his house forever. You, you!” exclaimed she, extending her arms to his averted face; “O Constantine! you have robbed me of my peace! On your account I have flown from my home. For mercy’s sake, do not abandon me!”

“Lady Sara,” cried he, looking wildly around him, “I can not speak to you in this position! Rise, I implore you!”

“Only,” returned she, “only say that you will protect me! That I shall find shelter here! Say this, and I will rise and bless you forever.”

Thaddeus knew not what to reply. Distressed by her imprudence, terror-struck at the violent lengths to which she seemed determined to carry her unhappy and guilty passion, he in vain sought to evade this direct demand; for Lady Sara, perceiving the reluctance and horror of his looks, sprang from her knees, and in a more resolute voice exclaimed, “Then, sir, you will not protect me? You scorn and desert a woman whom you well know has long loved you? whom, by your artful behavior, you have reduced to this disgrace!”

The count, surprised and shocked at this accusation, with respectful gentleness but resolution denied the charge.

Lady Sara again melted into tears, and supporting her tottering frame against his shoulders, replied, in a stifled voice, “I know it well; I have nothing to blame for my wretched state, but my own weakness. Pardon, dear Constantine, the dictates of my madness! Oh! I would gladly owe such misery to any other source than myself!”

“Then, dear Lady Sara,” rejoined Thaddeus, gaining courage from the mildness of her manner, “let me implore you to return to your own house!”

“Don’t ask me,” cried she, grasping his hand; “O Constantine! if you knew what it was to receive with smiles of affection a creature whom you loathe! you would shrink with disgust from what you require. I hate Captain Roos. Can I open my arms to meet him when my heart excludes him forever? Can I welcome him home when I wish him in his grave?"

The count extricated his hand from her grasp. Her ladyship perceived the repugnance which dictated this action; and clasping her hands together, ejaculated, "Unhappy woman that I am! to hate where I am loved! to love where I am hated! Kill me, Constantine!" cried she, turning suddenly toward him, and sinking down on a chair; "but do not give me such another look as that!"

"Dear Lady Sara," replied he, seating himself by her side, "what would you have me do? You see that I have no proper means of protecting you. I have no mother, no sisters, no friends to receive you. You see that I am a poor man. Besides your character —"

"Talk not of my character!" cried she: "I will have none that does not depend on you! Cruel Constantine! you will not understand me. I want no riches, no friends, but yourself. Give me your home and your arms," added she throwing herself in an agony on his bosom, "and beggary would be paradise!"

Thaddeus felt a dimness spread over his eyes. So much loveliness, such love, such disinterestedness, for a moment obliterated every other impression on his heart; but recovering himself in an instant, he tore himself from her clinging arms, and staggering back, a few paces, held her off with his hand, and in a voice of distraction exclaimed, "Leave me, for pity's sake!"

"No, dearest Constantine!" cried she, aware of her advantage, and again casting herself at his feet; "never, never will I leave this spot till you consent that your home shall be my home! That I shall serve you forever!"

“All-powerful Heaven!” exclaimed Thaddeus, in an agony.

Lady Sara redoubled her tears and prayers.

“Seducing, dangerous woman!” cried he, looking at her with wild horror, “what is it you demand? Would you tear from me all that renders life bearable? Would you take from me a blameless conscience and drive me to end my miserable days by a deed of desperation?”

Despair was in every feature of his countenance as he uttered the last words, and flew from her into the apartment where the general lay asleep. Little expecting to see any one but the man she loved, Lady Sara rushed in after him; and was again pressing to throw her imploring arms about her determined victim, when her eyes were suddenly arrested by a livid, and, as she thought, dead face of a person lying on the bed. Fixed to the spot, she stood for a moment; then putting her spread hand on her forehead, uttered a faint cry, and fell heart-struck to the floor.

Having instant conviction of her mistake, Thaddeus eagerly seized the moment of her insensibility to convey her home. He hastily went to the top of the stairs, called to Nanny to run for a coach, and then returning to the extended figure of Lady Sara, lifted her in his arms and carried her back to the room they had left.

By the help of hartshorn and water he restored her to a sense of existence. She slowly opened her eyes; then raising her head looked round her with a terrified air, when her eye falling on the still open door of the general's room, she caught Thaddeus by the arm, and said in a trembling voice, “Ch! take me hence!”

While she yet spoke a coach stopped at the door. The count rose, and attempted to support her agitated frame against his shoulder; but she trembled to such a degree that he was obliged to throw his arm about her waist, and almost carry her down stairs.

When he placed her in the carriage she said, in a faint tone, "You surely will not leave me?"

Thaddeus returned no other answer than desiring Nanny to sit by the general until she saw him again; and stepping into the coach Lady Sara snatched his hand and bathed it with her tears.

"Whither are you going to take me?"

"You shall again, dear Lady Sara," replied he, "return to a guiltless and peaceful home."

"I can not meet my husband," cried she, wringing her hands: "he will see all my premeditated guilt in my countenance. O! Constantine, have pity on me! Miserable creature that I am!" added she, redoubling her grief; "It is horrible to live with you! It is dreadful to live with him! Take me not home I entreat you!"

The count took her clasped hand in his.

"Reflect for a moment, my dear Lady Sara. I believe, if you love me, that it was in consequence of virtues which you thought I possessed."

"Indeed you do me justice!" cried she.

He continued.

"Think, then, should I yield to the influence of your beauty, and plunge you into a situation like that ——" and he pointed to a group of unhappy women assembled at the corner of Pall-Mall. Lady Sara drew back with a thrill of horror: "Think, where would be not only your innocence, but its price? I being no longer worthy of your esteem, you would hate me; you would hate yourself; and we should continue together two guilty creatures abhorring each other."

Lady Sara, drowned in tears, did not articulate any sounds but deep sighs until the coach stopped in St. James's-place.

"Go in with me," were all the words she could utter, as pulling her vail over her face, she gave him her hand to assist her down the step.

“Is Captain Roos arrived?” asked Thaddeus of a servant, who, to his great joy, replied in the negative. During the drive he had alarmed himself by anticipating the disagreeable suspicions which might arise in the mind of the husband should he see his wife in her present strange and distracted state.

When Thaddeus seated Lady Sara in her drawing-room he offered to take a respectful leave; but she laid one hand on his arm, while with the other she covered her convulsed features, and said, “Constantine, before you go; before we part, perhaps, eternally; O! tell me that you do not hate me! That you do not hate me!” repeated she, in a firmer tone: “I know too well how deeply I am despised.”

“Cease, my dearest madam,” returned he, tenderly replacing her on the sofa, “cease these vehement expressions. Shame does not depend on possessing passions, but on yielding to them. You have conquered, Lady Sara; and, in future, I shall respect and love you as a dear friend. Whoever holds the first place in my heart, you shall always retain the second.”

“Noble! generous Constantine!” cried she, straining his hand to her lips, and bathing it with her tears; “I can require no more. May Heaven bless you wherever you go.”

Thaddeus dropped upon his knee, imprinted on both her hands a compassionate and fervent kiss, and rising hastily quitted the room without a word.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE dream-like consternation which enveloped the count's faculties after the preceding scene was dissipated the next morning by the appearance of Dr. Cavendish. When he saw the general he declared it to be his opinion that in consequence of his long and tranquil slumbers some favorable crisis was near:—"Probably," added he, "the recovery of his intellects. Such phenomena, in these cases, often happen immediately before death."

"Heaven grant it may in this!" ejaculated Thaddeus; "to hear his venerable voice again acknowledge that I have acted by him as became the grandson of his friend, would be a comfort to me."

"But, sir," said the kind physician, touching his burning hand, "you must not forget the cares which are due to your own life. If you wish well to the general during the few days he may have to live, you are indispensably obliged to preserve your own strength. You are already ill, and require air. I have an hour of leisure," continued he, pulling out his watch; "I will remain here till you have taken two or three walks round St. James's Park. It is absolutely necessary; in this instance I must take the privilege of friendship and insist on obedience."

Seeing the benevolent Cavendish would not be denied, Thaddeus took his hat, and with harassed spirits walked down the lane toward Charing-cross.

On entering Spring-garden gate, to his extreme surprise, the first objects that met his sight were Miss Euphemia Dundas and Miss Beaufort.

Euphemia accosted him with ten thousand inquiries respecting his friend, besides congratulations on his own good looks.

Thaddeus bowed; then smiling faintly, turned to the blushing Mary; who, conscious of what had passed in the late conversation between herself and Lady Tinemouth, trembled so much that, fearing to excite the suspicion of Miss E. Dundas by such tremor, she withdrew her arm and walked forward alone, tottering at every step.

"I thought, Miss Beaufort," said he, addressing himself to her, "that Lady Tinemouth was to have had the happiness of your company to Harwold Park?"

"Yes," returned she, fearfully raising her eyes to his face; the hectic glow of which conveyed impressions to her different from those which Euphemia expressed; "but to my indescribable alarm and disappointment, the morning after I had written to fix my departure with her ladyship, my aunt's foot caught in the iron of the stair-carpet as she was coming down stairs; and, throwing her from the top to the bottom, broke her leg. I could not quit her a moment during her agonies; and the surgeons having expressed their fears that a fever might ensue, I was obliged altogether to decline my attendance on the countess.

"And how is Mrs. Dorothy?" inquired Thaddeus, truly concerned at the accident.

"She is better, though confined to her bed," replied Euphemia, speaking before her companion could open her lips; "and indeed poor Mary and myself have been such close nurses, my mother insisted on our walking out to-day."

"And Lady Tinemouth," returned Thaddeus, again addressing Miss Beaufort, "of course she went alone?"

"Alas, yes!" replied she: "Miss Egerton was forced to join her family in Leicestershire."

"I believe," cried Euphemia, sighing, "Miss Egerton is going to be married. Hers has been a long attachment. Happy girl! I have heard Captain Roos, whose lieutenant her intended husband was, declare that he is the finest young man in the navy. Did you ever see Mr. Montresor?" added she, turning her pretty eyes on the count.

"I never had that honor."

"Bless me! that is odd, considering your intimacy with Miss Egerton. I assure you he is very charming."

Thaddeus neither heard this, nor a great deal more of the same trifling chit-chat, which was slipping from the tongue of Miss Euphemia; so intently were his eyes (sent by his heart) searching the downcast, but expressive countenance of Miss Beaufort. His soul was full; and the fluctuations of her color, with the embarrassment of her step, interested and affected him.

“Then you do not leave town for some time, Miss Beaufort?” inquired he: “I may yet anticipate the honor of seeing——” he hesitated a moment, then added in a depressed tone—“your aunt, when I next wait on the Misses Dundas.”

“Our stay depends entirely on her health,” returned she, striving to rally herself; “and I am sure she will be happy to see you better; for I am sorry to say I can not agree with Euphemia in thinking you look well.”

“Merely a slight fever,” replied he; “the effect of an anxiety, which I fear will too soon cease in the death of its cause. I came out now, for a little air, while the physician remains with my friend.”

“Poor old gentleman!” sighed Mary, “how venerable was his appearance the morning in which we saw him in the Park! What a benign countenance!”

“His countenance,” replied Thaddeus, his eyes turning mournfully toward the lovely speaker, “is the emblem of his character. He was the most amiable of men.”

“And you are likely to lose so interesting a friend? dear Mr. Constantine, how I pity you!” As Euphemia uttered these words, she put the corner of her glove to her eye.

The count looked at her, and perceiving that her commiseration was affectation, he turned to Miss Beaufort who was walking pensively by his side, and made further inquiries respecting Mrs. Dorothy. Anxious to be again with his friend, he was preparing to quit them, when Mary, as with a full heart she courtesied her adieu, in a hurried and confused manner, said—“Pray, Mr. Constantine, take care of yourself. You have other friends besides the one you are going to lose.

I know Lady Tinemouth, I know my aunt——” she stopped short, and covered with blushes, stood panting for another word to close the sentence; when Thaddeus forgetting all presence but her own, with delighted precipitancy caught hold of the hand, which in her confusion was a little extended toward him, and pressing it with fervor, relinquished it immediately: overcome by confusion at the presumption of the action, he bowed with agitation to both ladies, and hastened through the Friary passage into St. James’s street.

“Miss Beaufort!” cried Euphemia, reddening with vexation, and returning a perfumed handkerchief to her pocket, “I did not understand that you and Mr. Constantine were on such intimate terms!”

“What do you mean, Euphemia?”

“That you have betrayed the confidence I reposed in you,” cried the angry beauty, wiping away the really starting tears with her white lace cloak; “I told you the elegant Constantine was the lord of my heart; and you have seduced him from me! Till you came, he was so respectful, so tender, so devoted!—But I am rightly used! I ought to have carried my secret to the grave.”

In vain Miss Beaufort protested; in vain she declared herself ignorant of possessing any power over even one wish of Constantine. Euphemia thought it monstrous pretty to be the injured friend and forsaken mistress; and all along the Park, and up Constitution Hill, until they arrived at Lady Dundas’s carriage, which was waiting opposite Devonshire wall she affected to weep. When seated she continued her invectives:—she called Miss Beaufort ungenerous, perfidious, traitor to friendship; and every romantic and disloyal name, which her inflamed fancy could devise; till the sight of Harley-street checked her transports, and relieved her patient hearer from a load of impertinence and reproach.

During this short interview, Thaddeus received an impulse to his affections which hurried them forward with such a force that neither time nor succeeding sorrows could stop nor stem.

Mary's heavenly-beaming eyes seemed to have encircled his head with love's brightest halo. The command, "Preserve yourself for others beside your dying friend," yet throbbed at his heart; and with ten thousand rapturous visions dancing before his sight, he trod in air, until the humble door of his melancholy home presenting itself, at once wrecked the illusion, and offered sad reality in the person of his emaciated friend.

On the count's entrance into the sick chamber, Doctor Cavendish gave him a few directions to pursue when the general should awake from the sleep into which he had been sunk for so many hours. With a heart the more depressed from its late unusual exaltation, Thaddeus sat down on the bed for the remainder of the day.

At five in the afternoon, General Butzou awoke; seeing the count, he stretched out his withered hand, and, as the doctor predicted, accosted him rationally.

"Come, dear Sobieski! Come nearer, my dear master!"

Thaddeus rose, and throwing himself on his knees, took the offered hand with apparent composure. It was a hard struggle to restrain the emotions which were roused by this awful contemplation;—the return of reason to the soul, on the instant she was summoned into the presence of her Maker!

"My kind, my beloved lord!" added Butzou, "to me you have, indeed, performed a Christian's part; you have clothed, sheltered, and preserved me in your bosom. Blessed son of my most honored master!"

The good old man put the hand of Thaddeus to his lips. Thaddeus could not speak.

"I am going, dear Sobieski," continued the general, in a lower voice, "where I shall meet your noble grandfather, your mother, and my brave countrymen; and if Heaven grants me power, I will tell them by whose labor I have lived, on whose breast I have expired."

Thaddeus could no longer restrain his tears.

"Dear, dear general!" exclaimed he, grasping his hand, "my grandfather, my mother, my country! I lose them all again in thee!—O! would the same summons take me hence!"

"Hush!" returned the dying man: "Heaven reserves you, my honored lord, for wise purposes. Youth and health are the marks of commission:* you possess them, with virtues which will bear you through the contest. I have done; and my merciful Judge has evinced His pardon of my errors, by sparing me in my old age, and leading me to die with you."

Thaddeus pressed his friend's hand to his streaming eyes, and promised to be resigned. Butzou smiled his satisfaction; then closing his eyelids, he composed himself to a rest that was neither sleep nor stupor, but a balmy serenity; which seemed to be tempering his lately recovered soul for its immediate entrance on a world of eternal peace.

At nine o'clock his breath became broken with quick sighs.

The count's heart trembled, and he drew closer to the pillow. Butzou felt him; and opening his eyes languidly, hardly

* I can not but pause here, in revising the volume, to publicly express the emotion, grateful to Heaven, I experienced on receiving a letter, quoting these words, many, many years ago. It was from the excellent Joseph Fox, the well-known Christian philanthropist of our country, who spent both his fortune and his life in establishing and sustaining several of our best charitable and otherwise patriotic institutions. And once, when some of his anxious friends would gladly have persuaded him to grant himself more personal indulgences, and to labor less in the then recently begun plans for national education, he wrote, "to the authoress of Thaddeus of Warsaw," and, quoting to her those words from the work, declared "they were on his heart! and he would, with the blessing of God, perform what he believed to be his commission, to the last powers of his youth and health."

Such things make a novel-writer feel answerable for something more in his or her pages, than the purpose of mere amusement.

articulated (though not a sound escaped the ear of his friend)
"Raise my head."

Thaddeus put his arm under his neck, and lifting him up, reclined him against his bosom. Butzou grasped his hands, and looking gratefully in his face said, "The arms of a soldier should be a soldier's death-bed. I am content."

He lay for a moment on the breast of the almost fainting Thaddeus; then suddenly quitting his hold, he cried, "I lose you, Sobieski!"

"I am here," exclaimed the count, catching his motionless hand. The dying general murmured a few words of blessing; and turning his face inward, breathed his last sigh on the heart of his last friend.

For a minute Sobieski remained incapable of thought or action. When he recovered recollection he withdrew from his melancholy station; and laying the venerable remains of the general on the bed, did not trust his rallied faculties with a second trial; but hastening down stairs, was met by Mrs. Robson.

"My dear madam," said he, "all is over with my poor friend. Will you do me the kindness to perform those duties to his sacred relics which I can not?"

Thaddeus would not allow any person to watch by his friend's coffin besides himself. The meditations of this solitary night presented to his sound and sensible mind every argument rather to induce rejoicing than regret that the eventful life of the brave Butzou was terminated.

"Yes, illustrious old man!" cried he, gazing on his marble features; "if valor and virtue be the true sources of nobility thou surely wast noble! Inestimable defender of Stanislaus and thy country! thou hast run a long and bright career; and though thou art fated to rest in the humble grave of poverty, it will be embalmed by the tears of Heaven; it will be engraven on my heart."

Thaddeus did not weep while he spoke. Nor did he weep when he beheld the mold of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, close from his view the last dwelling of his friend. It began to rain. Dr. Cavendish, putting his arm through the count's, tried to pull him away; but he lingered a moment, and looking on the dust as the sexton piled it up, "Wretched Poland!" sighed he, "how far from thee lies one of thy bravest sons!"

Doctor Cavendish regarded him with pity and admiration; but he vainly attempted to persuade him to return with him to dinner: Thaddeus refused the kind invitation, alleging, with a faint smile, that under every misfortune he found his best comforter in solitude.

Respecting the resignation and manliness of this answer, Doctor Cavendish urged him no further; but expressing his regret that he could not see him again until the end of the week, as he was obliged to go to Stamford next day on a medical consultation, he shook hands with him at the door of Mrs. Robson, and bade him farewell.

CHAPTER XXXV.

NEXT morning, when the Count Sobieski unfolded the several packets of papers which were put into his hands by little Nanny, he laid them one after the other on the table, and sighing heavily, said to himself, "Now comes the bitterness of poverty!—Heaven only knows by what means I shall defray these terrific charges."

The mere personal privations induced by his fallen fortunes excited little uneasiness in the mind of Thaddeus. As he never had derived peculiar gratification from the enjoyment of a magnificent house, splendid table, and numerous attend ants, he was contented in the field, where he slept on the bare ground, and snatched his hasty meal at uncertain intervals. Watching, rough fare, and other hardships, were dust in the path of honor; he had dashed through them with light and buoyant spirits; and he repined as little at the actual wants of his forlorn state in exile; until, compelled by friendship to contract demands which he could not defray, he was plunged as once into the full horrors of poverty and debt.

He looked at the amount of the bills. The apothecary's was fifteen pounds; the funeral twenty. Thaddeus turned pale. The value of all that he possessed would not produce one half of the sum; besides, he owed five guineas to his good landlady for numerous little comforts procured for his deceased friend.

“Whatever be the consequence,” cried he, “that excellent woman shall not suffer by her humanity! If I have to part with the last memorial of them who were so dear, she shall be repaid.”

He scarcely had ceased speaking when Nanny re-entered the room, and told him the apothecary's young man and the undertaker were both below waiting for answers to their letters. Reddening with disgust at the unfeeling avidity of these men, he desired Nanny to say he could not see either of them to-day, but would send to their houses to-morrow.

In consequence of this promise the men made their bows to Mrs. Robson (who too well guessed the reason of this message), and took their leave.

When Thaddeus put the pictures of his mother and the palatine, with other trinkets, into his pocket, he could not forbear an internal invective against the thoughtless meanness of the Misses Dundas; who had never offered any further liquidation of the large sum they now stood indebted to him than the trifling note which had been transmitted to him, prior to his attendance, through the hands of Lady Tinemouth.

While his necessities reproached them for this illiberal conduct his proud spirit recoiled at making a request to their charity; for he had gathered from the haughty demeanor of Miss Diana that what he was entitled to demand would be given, not as a just remuneration for labor received, but as alms of humanity to an indigent emigrant.

“I would rather perish,” cried he, putting on his hat, “than ask that woman for a shilling.”

When the count laid his treasure on the table of the worthy pawnbroker he desired to have the value of the settings and the pictures put into leather cases. Having examined the gold of the miniatures and the other trinkets, Mr. Burket declared, on the word of an honest man, he could not give more than fifteen pounds.

With difficulty Thaddeus stifled as torturing a sigh as ever distended his breast, while he said—

“I will take it. I only implore you to be careful of the things; trifling as they are, circumstances with which they were connected render them valuable to me.”

“You may depend on me, sir,” replied the pawnbroker, presenting him with the notes and acknowledgment.

When Thaddeus took them Mr. Burket’s eye was caught by the ring on his finger.

“That ring seems curious! If you won’t think me impertinent, may I ask to look at it?”

The count pulled it off, and forcing a smile, replied, “I suppose it is of little intrinsic value. The setting is slight, but the painting is fine.”

Burket breathed on the diamonds. “If you were to sell it,” returned he, “I don’t think it would fetch more than three guineas. The diamonds are damaged; and the emeralds would be of little use, being out of fashion here; as for the miniature, it goes for nothing.”

“Of course,” said Thaddeus, putting it on again; “but I shall never part with it." While he drew on his glove Mr. Burket asked him whether the head were not intended for the King of Poland?"

The count, surprised, answered in the affirmative.

"I thought so," answered the man; "it is very like two or three prints which I had in my shop of that king. Indeed, I believe I have them somewhere now: these matters are but a nine days' wonder, and the sale is over."

His auditor did not clearly comprehend him, and he told him so.

"I meant nothing," continued he, "to the disparagement of the King of Poland or of any other great personage who is much the subject of conversation. I only intended to say that every thing has its fashion. The ruin of Poland was the fashionable topic for a month after it happened; and now nobody minds it; it is extinct—it is forgotten."*

Thaddeus, in whose bosom all its miseries were written, with a clouded brow bowed to the remarks of Mr. Burket, and in silence quitted the shop.

Having arrived at home, he discharged his debt to the worthy Mrs. Robson; then entering his room, he laid the remainder of his money on the bills of the two claimants. It was unequal to the demands of either; yet, in some measure to be just to both, he determined on dividing it between them; and to promise the liquidation of the rest by degrees.

Surely he might hope that even should the Misses Dundas entirely forget his claims on them, he could, in the course of time, make drawings sufficient to cover the residue of the debt! but he was not permitted to put this calculation to the trial.

* The author has a very correct likeness of this memorable king, copied from an original miniature; and it is not one of the least valued portraits in a little room which contains those of several other heroes of different countries—friends and gallant foes.

When he called on the apothecary and offered him what was less than half his demand, the man refused it with insolence, insisting upon having the whole. Unused to the language of compulsion and vulgarity, the count quitted the shop; telling the man that he was at liberty to act as he thought fit; and, with no very serene countenance he entered the undertaker's warehouse. This man was civil: to him Thaddeus gave the sum, half of which the apothecary had rejected with so much derision. The undertaker's politeness a little calmed the irritated temper of the count who returned home, musing on the vile nature of that class of mankind who can with indifference heap insult upon distress.

Judging men by his own disposition he seldom gave credence to the possibility of such conduct. He had been told of dastardly spirits; but never having seen them and possessing no archetype within his own breast of what he heard, the repeated relation passed over his mind without leaving an impression. He sprung into the world filled with animating hopes of virtue and renown. He was virtuous; he became powerful, great, and renowned. Creation seemed paradise to his eyes; it was the task of adversity to teach him a different lesson of mankind. Not less virtuous, not less great, his fortunes fell, he became poor; the perfidy, the hard-heartedness of man made and kept him friendless. When he wanted succor and consolation, he found the world peopled by a race too mean even to bear the stamp of the devil.

While Sobieski was employed next morning at his drawing, Mrs. Robson sent Nanny to say there were two strange-looking men below who wanted to speak with him. Not doubting they were messengers from the apothecary, he desired the girl to show them up stairs. When they entered his room the count rose. One of them stepped forward, and laying a slip of paper on the table, said, "I arrest you, sir, at the suit of Mr. Jackson the apothecary."

Thaddeus colored; but suppressing every indignant emotion, he calmly asked the men whither they were going to take him?

“If you like,” replied one of them, “you may be well enough lodged. I never heard a word against Clements’ in Wych-street.”

“Is that a prison?” inquired Thaddeus.

“No, not exactly that, sir,” answered the other man, laughing. “You seem to know little of the matter which, for a Frenchman, is odd enough! but mayhap you have never a lock-up-house in France? Howsomever, if you pay well, Mr. Clements will give you lodgings as long as you like. It is only poor rogues who are obligated to go to Newgate; such gemmen as you can live as ginteelly in Wych-street as at their own houses.”

There was such an air of derision about this fellow as he spoke and glanced round the room, that Thaddeus, sternly contracting his brows, deigned to take no further notice of him; but, turning toward his more civil companion, said—

“Has this person informed me rightly? Am I going to a prison, or am I not? If I do not possess money to pay Mr. Jackson, I can have none to spare elsewhere.”

“Then you must go to Newgate!” answered the man, in as surly a tone as his comrade’s had been insolent.

“I’ll run for a coach, Wilson,” cried the other, opening the room-door.

“I will not pay for one,” said Thaddeus, at once comprehending the sort of wretches into whose custody he had fallen: “follow me down stairs. I shall walk.”

Mrs. Robson was in her shop as he passed to the street. She called out, “You will come home to dinner, sir?”

“No,” replied he; “but you shall hear from me before night.”

The men, winking at each other, sullenly pursued his steps down the lane. In the Strand, Thaddeus asked them which way he was to proceed ?

“Straight on,” cried one of them ; “most folks find the road to jail easy enough.”

Involved in thought, the count walked forward, unmindful of the stare which the well-known occupation of his attendants attracted toward him. When he arrived at Somerset House, one of the men stepped up to him, and said, “We are now nearly opposite Wych-street. You had better take your mind again, and go there instead of Newgate. I don’t much think your honor will like the debtor’s hole.”

Thaddeus, coldly thanking him, repeated his determination to be led to Newgate. But when he beheld the immense walls, within which he believed he should be immured for life, his feet seemed rooted to the ground ; and when the massy gates were opened and closed upon him he felt as if suddenly deprived of the vital spring of existence. A mist spread over his eyes, his soul shuddered, and with difficulty he followed the men into the place where his commitment was to be ratified. Here all the proud energies of his nature again rallied round his heart.

The brutal questions of the people in office, re-echoed by taunts from the wretches who had brought him to the prison, were of a strain so much beneath his answering that he stood perfectly silent during the business ; and when dismissed without evincing any signs of discomposure, he followed the turnkey to his cell.

One deal chair, a table, and a miserable bed, were all the furniture it contained. The floor was paved with flags ; and the sides of the apartment daubed with discolored plaster, part of which having been peeled off by the damp, exposed to view large spaces of the naked stones.

Before the turnkey withdrew, he asked Thaddeus whether he wanted any thing ?

“Only a pen, ink, and paper.”

The man held out his hand.

“I have no money,” replied Sobieski.

“Then you get nothing here,” answered the fellow, pulling the door after him.

Thaddeus threw himself on the chair, and in the bitterness of the moment, exclaimed, “Can these scoundrels be Christians? can they be men?” He cast his eyes round him with the wildness of despair: “Mysterious Heaven! can it be possible that for a few guineas I am to be confined in this place during life? In these narrow bounds, am I to waste my youth, my existence? Even so: I can not, I will not degrade the spirit of Poland, by imploring assistance from any native of a land in which avarice has extinguished the feelings of humanity.”

By the next morning, the first paroxysm of indignation having subsided, Thaddeus entertained a cooler and more reasonable opinion of his situation. He considered that though he was a prisoner, it was in consequence of debts incurred in behalf of a friend whose latter hours were rendered less wretched by such means. Notwithstanding “all that man could do unto him,” he had brought an approving conscience to lighten the glooms of his dungeon; and resuming his wonted serenity, he continued to distance the impertinent freedom of his jailors by a stern dignity which extorted civility and commanded respect.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

SEVERAL days elapsed without the inhabitants of Harley-street hearing any tidings of Thaddeus.

Miss Dundas never bestowed a thought on his absence, except when descanting on her favorite subject, "the insolence of dependent people," she alleged his daring to withdraw himself, as an instance. Miss Euphemia uttered all her complaints to Miss Beaufort, whom she accused of not being satisfied with seducing the affections of Mr. Constantine; but she must also spirit him away, lest by remorse he should be induced to renew his former devotion at the shrine of her tried constancy.

Mary found these secret conferences very frequent and very teasing. She believed neither the count's past devoirs to Euphemia, nor his present allegiance to herself. With anxiety she watched the slow decline of every succeeding day, hoping that each knock at the door would present either himself or an apology for his absence.

In vain her reason urged the weakness and folly of giving way to the influence of a passion as violent as it was unforeseen. "It is not his personal graces," murmured she, while her dewy eyes remained riveted on the floor; "it is not they; they have not accomplished this effect on me! No; matchless as he is; though his countenance when illumined by the splendors of his mind, expresses consummate beauty; yet my heart tells me I would rather see all that perfection demolished than lose one beam of those bright charities which first attracted my esteem. Yes, Constantine!" cried she, rising in agitation; "I could adore thy virtues were they even in the bosom of deformity. It is these that I love; it is these that are thyself! it is thy noble, godlike soul, that so entirely fills my heart, and will forever!"

She recalled the hours, which in his society glided so swiftly by, to pass in review before her. They came and her tears redoubled. Neither his words nor his looks had been kinder to her than to Miss Egerton, or Lady Sara Roos. She remembered his wild action in the Park: it had transported her at the moment; it even now made her heart throb; but she ceased to believe it intended more than an animated expression of gratitude.

An adverse apprehension seemed to have taken possession of her breast. In proportion to the vehemence of Miss Euphemia's reproaches (who insisted on the passion of Thaddeus), she the more doubted the evidence of those delightful emotions which had rushed over her soul when she found her hand so fervently pressed in his.

Euphemia never made a secret of the tendresse she professed: and Miss Beaufort having been taught by her own heart to read distinctly the eyes of Lady Sara, the result of her observations had long acted as a caustic on her peace; it robbed her cheeks of their bloom, and compelled her to number the lingering minutes of the night with sighs. But her deep and modest flame assumed no violence; retreated far from sight, it burned the more intensely.

Instead of over-valuing the fine person of Thaddeus, the encomiums which it exacted even from the lips of prejudice, occasioned one source of her pain. She could not bear to think it probable that the man whom she believed and knew to be gifted with every attribute of goodness and of heroism, might one day be induced to sacrifice the rich treasure of his mind to a creature who would select him from the rest merely on account of his exterior superiority.

Such was the train of Mary's meditations, when covering her face with her handkerchief, she exclaimed in a tender and interrupted voice, "Ah! why did I leave my quiet home to expose myself to the vicissitudes of society? sequestered from the world, neither its pageants nor its mortifications could have reached me there. I have seen thee, matchless Constantine! Like a bright star, thou hast passed before my eyes! Like a being of a superior order! And I never, never can debase my nature to love another. Thy image shall follow me into solitude; shall consecrate my soul to the practice of every virtue! I will emulate thy excellence, when, perhaps, thou hast forgotten that I exist."

The fit of despondence which threatened to succeed this melancholy reflection was interrupted by the sudden entrance of Euphemia. Miss Beaufort hastily rose, and drew her ringlets over her eyes.

"O, Mary!" cried the little beauty, holding up her pretty hands, "what do you think has happened!"

"What?" demanded she in alarm, and hastening toward the door, "any thing to my aunt?"

"No, no," answered Euphemia, catching her by the arm; "but could my injured heart derive satisfaction from revenge, I should now be happy. Punishment has overtaken the faithless Constantine."

Miss Beaufort looked aghast; and grasping the back of a chair to prevent her falling, breathlessly inquired what she meant?

"Oh! he is sent to prison!" cried Euphemia, not regarding the real agitation of her auditor (so was she occupied in appearing overwhelmed herself), and wringing her hands, she continued, "that frightful wretch, Mr. Lascelles, is just come in to dinner. You can not think with what fiendish glee he told me that about a week ago, as he was driving out of town, he saw Mr. Constantine, with two bailiffs behind him, walking down Fleet-street! And besides, I verily believe he said he had irons on."

"O! no, no!" ejaculated Mary, with a cry of terror at this ad libitum of Euphemia's, "what can he have done?"

"Bless me, child," returned Euphemia, staring at her as she sat pale and trembling in a chair; "why what frightens you so? Does not every body run in debt without minding it?"

Miss Beaufort shook her head; and looking distractedly about her, put her hand to her forehead. Euphemia now quite alarmed, forced her to drink some water; and while the horror-struck Mary, with ten thousand vague and hideous fancies racking her heart, leaned against the wainscot, the little beauty, unconscious what part of her narrative occasioned these emotions, thought to obliterate what she had said by saying more; and determining not to be out done in "tender woe," drew forth her handkerchief, and putting it to her eyes, resumed in a piteous tone—

"I am sure I shall hate Lascelles all my life, because he did not stop the men and inquire what jail they were taking him to!— You know my dear, you and I might have visited him. It would have been delightful to have consoled his sad hours! We might have planned his escape."

"In irons!" ejaculated Mary, raising her tearless eye to Heaven.

Euphemia colored at the agonized manner in which these words were reiterated, and rather confusedly replied, "Not absolutely in irons. You know that is a metaphorical term for captivity."

"Then he was not in irons?" cried Miss Beaufort, seizing her hand eagerly: "tell me, for Heaven's sake, tell me, he was not in irons?"

"Why, then," returned Euphemia, half angry at being obliged to contradict herself, "if you are such a fool that you can not understand poetical language, I must tell you he was not."

Mary heard no further; but even at this moment when a bright glow overspread her countenance, fell back senseless into the chair.

Euphemia flew to the top of the stairs, and shrieking violently, stood wringing her hands, until Diana and Lady Dundas, followed by several gentlemen, hastened out of the saloon and demanded what was the matter? As Euphemia pointed to Miss Beaufort's dressing room, she staggered, and sinking into the arms of Lord Ellesmere, fell into the most outrageous hysterics. The marquis, who had just dropped in on his return from St. James's, was so afraid of the agitated lady's tearing his point-lace ruffles, that in almost as trembling a state as herself, he gladly shuffled her into the hands of her maid; and scampering down stairs, as if all Bedlam were at his heels sprung into his vis-à-vis, and drove off like lightning.

When Miss Beaufort opened her eyes, at the sight of such a crowd she almost relapsed; but trying to dispel her confusion, she arose, and supporting herself on the arm of Mrs. Dorothy's maid, thanked the company for their attention, and desired to be assisted to her chamber.

Meanwhile, Euphemia, who had been carried down into the saloon, thought it time to raise her lily head and utter a few incoherent words: the instant they were breathed, Miss Dundas and Mr. Lascelles, in one voice, demanded what was the matter?

"Has not Mary told you?" returned her sister, languidly opening her eyes.

"No," answered Lascelles, rubbing his hands with delighted curiosity: "come let us have it."

Euphemia, pleased at this, and loving mystery with all her heart, waved her hand solemnly, and in an awful tone replied, "Then it passes not my lips."

"What, Phemy!" cried he: "you want us to believe you have seen a ghost? But you forget, they don't walk at mid-day."

"Believe what you like," returned she, with an air of consequential contempt; "I am satisfied to keep the secret."

Miss Dundas burst into a provoking laugh; and calling her the most incorrigible little idiot in the world, encouraged Lascelles to join in the ridicule. Determining to gratify his spleen, if he could not satisfy his curiosity, this witless Cox-comb continued the whole day in Harley-street for the mere pleasure of tormenting Euphemia. From the dinner hour until twelve at night neither his drowsy fancy or wakeful malice could find one other weapon of assault than the stale jokes of mysterious chambers, lovers incognito, or the silly addition of two Cupid-struck sweeps popping down the chimney to pay their addresses to their fair friends. Diana talked of Jupiter with his thunder; and patting her sister under the chin, added, "I can not doubt that Miss Beaufort is the favored Semelé: but, my dear, you over-acted your character! As confidant, a few tears were enough when your lady fainted." During these attacks Euphemia reclined pompously on a sofa; and not deigning a reply, repelled them with much conceit and haughtiness.

Miss Beaufort remained above an hour alone in her chamber before she ventured to go near her aunt. Hurt to the soul that the idle folly of Euphemia should have aroused a terror which had completely unvailed to the eyes of that inconsiderate girl the empire which Thaddeus held over her fate, Mary, overwhelmed with shame, and arraigning her easy credulity, threw herself on the bed.

Horror-struck at hearing he was led along the streets in chains, she could have no other idea but that, hurried into the commission of some dreadful deed, he was become amenable to the laws, and might suffer an ignominious death. These thoughts having rushed at once on her heart, deprived her of self-command. In the conviction that he was a murderer, she felt as if her life, her honor, her soul were annihilated. And when, in consequence of her agonies, Euphemia confessed that she had in this last matter told a falsehood, the tumult of her joy took refuge in insensibility.

Before Miss Beaufort quitted her room various plans suggested themselves to relieve the unfortunate Thaddeus. She found no hesitation in believing him poor; and perhaps rendered wretchedly so by the burden of that sick friend, ~~who~~ she suspected might be a dear relation. At any rate, she resolved that another sun should not pass over her head and shine on him in a prison. Having determined to pay all his debts herself, she next thought of how she might manage the affair without betraying the hand whence the assistance came. Had her aunt been well enough to leave the house she would not have scrupled unfolding to her the recent calamity of Mr Constantine. But well aware that Mrs. Dorothy's maidenly nicety would be outraged at a young woman appearing the sole mover in such a business, she conceived herself obliged entirely to withhold her confidence at present, and to decide on prosecuting the whole transaction alone.

In consequence of these meditations her spirits became less discomposed; and turning toward Mrs. Dorothy Somerset's apartments, she found the good lady sipping her coffee.

“What is this I have just heard my dear Mary? Williams tells me you have been ill!”

Miss Beaufort returned her aunt's gracious inquiry with an affectionate kiss; and informing her that she had only been alarmed by an invention of Miss Euphemia's, begged the subject might drop; it being merely one of the many schemes which she believed that young lady had devised to give her torment.

“Ah!” replied Mrs. Dorothy, “I hope I shall be well enough to travel in the course of a few days! I can now walk with a stick; and, upon my word, I am heartily tired both of Lady Dundas and her daughters.”

Mary expressed similar sentiments; but as the declaration passed her lips, a sigh almost buried her last word. Go when she would she must leave Constantine behind; leave him without an expectation of beholding him more; without a hope of penetrating the thick cloud which involved him; and with which he had ever baffled any attempt to discover his birth or misfortunes. She wept over this refinement on delicacy, and "loved him dearer for his mystery."

When the dawn broke next morning it shone on Miss Beaufort's yet unclosed eyes. Sleep could find no languid faculty in her head while her heart was agitated with plans for the relief of Thaddeus. The idea of visiting the coffee-house to which she knew the Misses Dundas directed their letters, and of asking questions about a young and handsome man, made her timidity shrink.

"But," exclaimed she, "I am not going on an errand which could spread a blush on the cheek of prudery itself. I am going to impart alleviation to the sufferings of the noblest creature that ever walked the earth!"

Perhaps there are few persons who, being auditors of this speech, would have decided quite so candidly on the superlative by which it was concluded. Mary herself was not wholly divested of doubt about the issue of her conduct; but, conscious that her motive was pure, she descended to the breakfast-room with a quieter mind than countenance.

Never before having had occasion to throw a gloss on her actions, she scarcely looked up during breakfast. When the cloth was removed she rose suddenly from her chair; and turning to Mrs. Dorothy, who sat at the other end of the parlor with her foot on a stool, said in a low voice, "Good-by, aunt. I am going to make some particular calls; but I shall be back in a few hours." Luckily no one observed her blushing face while she spoke, nor the manner in which she shook hands with the old lady and hurried out of the room.

Breathless with confusion, she could scarcely stand when she arrived in her own chamber; but aware that no time ought to be lost, she tied on a muslin cloak, covered her head with a large summer-bonnet; and put a long shawl with a veil into her pocket. She hesitated a moment within her chamber-door; her eyes filled with tears drawn from her heart by that keen spirit of truth which had ever been the guardian of her conduct; and looking up to Heaven, she sunk on her knees, and exclaimed with impetuosity, "Father of Mercy! Thou only knowest my heart! Direct me, I beseech Thee! Let me not commit any thing unworthy of myself nor of the unhappy Constantine—for whom I would sacrifice my life; but not my duty to Thee!"

Reassured by the confidence which this simple act of devotion inspired, she took her parasol and descended the stairs. The porter was alone in the hall. She inquired for her servant.

"He is not returned, madam."

Having foreseen the necessity of getting rid of all attendants, she had purposely sent her footman on an errand as far as Cheapside.

"It is of no consequence," returned she to the porter, who was just going to propose one of Lady Dundas's men; "I can not meet with any thing disagreeable at this time of day, so I shall walk alone."

The man opened the door; and with a bounding heart Mary hastened down the street, crossed the square, and at the bottom of Orchard-street stepped into a hackney-coach, which she ordered to drive to Slaughter's Coffee-house, St. Martin's-lane.

She drew up the glasses; then taking the shawl and vail, with trembling hands covered her graceful figure. Various thoughts agitated her anxious mind while the carriage rolled along; and when it drew up at the coffee-house she involuntarily retreated into the corner. The coach-door was opened.

"Will you alight, ma'am?"

"No; call the waiter."

A waiter appeared; and Miss Beaufort, in a tolerably collected voice, inquired if Mr. Constantine lived there?

"No, ma'am."

A cold dew stood on her forehead; but taking courage from a latent and last hope, she added, "I know he has had letters directed to this place."

"Oh! I beg your pardon, ma'am!" returned the man, recollecting himself; "I remember a person of that name has received letters from hence, but they were always fetched away by a little girl."

"And do you not know where he lives?"

"No, ma'am," answered he; "yet some one else may: I will inquire."

Miss Beaufort bowed her head in token of acknowledgment, and sat shivering with suspense until he returned, followed by another man.

"This person, ma'am," resumed he, "says he can tell you."

"Thank you, thank you!" cried Mary; then, blushing at her eagerness, she stopped, and drew back into the carriage.

"I can not for certain," said the man, "but I know the girl very well by sight who comes for the letters; and I have often seen her standing at the door of a chandler's shop a good way down the lane. I think it is No. 5 or 6. I sent a person there, who came after the same gentleman about a fortnight ago. I dare say he lives there."

Miss Beaufort's expectations sunk again, when she found that she had nothing but a dare say to depend on; and giving half a crown to each of her informers, she desired the coachman to drive as they would direct him.

While the carriage drove down the lane, with a heart full of fears she looked from side to side, almost believing she should know by intuition the house which had contained Constantine. When the man checked his horses, and her eyes fell on the little mean dwelling of Mrs. Robson, she smothered a deep sigh.

"Can this be the house in which Constantine has lived? How comfortless! And should it not," thought she, as the man got off his box to inquire, "whither shall I go for information?"

The appearance of Mrs. Robson, and her immediate affirmative to the question, "Are these Mr. Constantine's lodgings?" at once dispelled this last anxiety. Encouraged by the motherly expression of the good woman's manner, Mary begged leave to alight. Mrs. Robson readily offered her arm; and with many apologies for the disordered state of the house, led her up stairs to the room which had been the count's home.

Mary trembled; but seeing that every thing depended on self-command, with apparent tranquillity she received the chair that was presented to her, and turning her eyes from the books and drawings which told her so truly in whose apartment she was, she desired Mrs. Robson, who continued standing, to be seated. The good woman obeyed; and, after some trepidation, Mary asked where Mr. Constantine was? Mrs. Robson colored, and looking at her questioner for some time, as if doubting what to say, burst into tears.

Miss Beaufort's ready eyes were much inclined to flow in concert: but, subduing the strong emotions which shook her, she added, "I do not come hither out of impertinent curiosity. I have heard of the misfortunes of Mr. Constantine. I am well known to his friends."

"Dear lady!" cried the good woman, grasping at any prospect of succor to her benefactor: "if he has friends, whoever they are, tell them he is the noblest, most humane gentleman in the world. Tell them he has saved me and mine from the deepest want; and now he is sent to prison, because he can not pay the cruel doctor who attended the poor dead general."

"What, is his friend dead?" ejaculated Mary, unable to restrain the tears which now streamed over her face.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Robson; "poor old gentleman! he is dead, sure enough; and Heaven knows many have been the dreary hours the dear young man has watched by his pillow! He died in that room."

Miss Beaufort's swimming eyes would not allow her to discern objects through the open door of that apartment, within which the heart of Thaddeus had undergone such variety of misery. Forming an irresistible wish to know whether the deceased were any relation of Constantine, she paused a moment to compose the agitation which might betray her, and then asked.

"I thought, ma'am," replied Mrs. Robson, "you said you knew his friends?"

"Only his English ones," returned Mary, a little confused at the suspicion this answer implied; "I imagined that this old gentleman might have been his father, or an uncle, or—"

"O no," interrupted Mrs. Robson, sorrowfully, "he has neither father, mother, nor uncle in the wide world. He once told me they were all dead, and that he saw them die. Alas! sweet soul! What a power of griefs he must have seen in his young life! But Heaven will favor him at last; for though he is in misfortune himself, he has been a blessing to the widow and the orphan!"

"Do you know the amount of his debts?" asked Miss Beaufort.

"Only thirty pounds," returned Mrs. Robson; "and for that they took him out of this room a week ago, and hurried him away without letting me know a word of the matter. I believe to this hour I should not have known where he was, if that cruel Mr. Jackson had not come to demand all that Mr. Constantine left in my care. But I would not let him have it. I told the man if my lodger had filled my house with bags of gold, he should not touch a shilling; and then he abused me, and told me Mr. Constantine was in Newgate."

"In Newgate!"

"Yes, madam. I immediately ran there, and found him more able to comfort me than I was able to speak with him."

"Then be at rest, my good woman," returned Miss Beaufort, rising from her chair; "when you next hear of Mr. Constantine, he shall be at liberty. He has friends who will not sleep till he is out of prison."

"May Heaven bless you and them, dear lady!" cried Mrs. Robson, weeping with joy; "for they will release the most generous heart alive."

Mary cast a wishful look on the drawings which stood on a bureau; then withdrawing her eyes with a deep sigh, she descended the stairs. At the street-door she took Mrs. Robson's hand, and not relinquishing it until she was seated in the coach, pressed it warmly, and leaving within it a purse of twenty guineas, ordered the man to return whence he came.

Now that the temerity of going herself to learn the particulars of Mr. Constantine's fate had been achieved, determined as she was not to close her eyes while the man whom she valued above her life remained a prisoner and in sorrow, she thought it best to consult with Mrs. Dorothy respecting the speediest means of compassing his emancipation.

In Oxford road she desired the coachman to proceed to Harley-street. She alighted at Lady Dundas's door, paid him his fare, and stepped into the hall, before she perceived that a traveling carriage belonging to her guardian had driven away to afford room for her humble equipage.

"Is Sir Robert Somerset come to town?" she hastily inquired of the porter.

"No, madam; but Mr. Somerset is just arrived."

The next minute Miss Beaufort was in the drawing-room, and clasped within the arms of her cousin.

"Dear Mary!"—"Dear Pembroke!" were the first words which passed between these two affectionate relatives.

Mrs. Dorothy, who doted on her nephew, taking his hand as he seated himself between her and his cousin, said in a congratulatory voice, "Mary, our dear boy has come to town purposely to take us down."

"Yes, indeed," rejoined he; "my father is moped to death for want of you both. You know I am a sad runagate! Lord Arun and Mr. Loftus have been gone these ten days to his lordship's aunt's in Bedfordshire; and Sir Robert is so completely weary of solitude that he has commanded me," bowing to the other ladies, "to run off with all the fair inhabitants of this house, sooner than leave you behind."

"I shall be happy at another opportunity to visit Somerset Castle," returned Lady Dundas; "but I am constrained to spend this summer in Dumbartonshire. I have not yet seen the estate my poor dear Sir Hector bought of the Duke of Dumfries!"

Pembroke offered no attempt to shake this resolution. In the two or three morning calls he had made with Sir Robert Somerset on the rich widow, he saw sufficient to make him regard her arrogant vulgarity with disgust; and for her daughters they were of too common a stamp, to occupy his mind any longer than with a magic-lantern impression of a tall woman with bold eyes, and the prettiest blue-eyed fairy he ever beheld.

After half an hour's conversation with this family-group, Miss Beaufort sunk into abstraction. During the first month of Mary's acquaintance with Thaddeus, she did not neglect to mention in her correspondence with Pembroke having met with a very interesting and accomplished emigrant, in the quality of a tutor at Lady Dundas's. But her cousin, in his replies, beginning to banter her on pity being allied to love, she had gradually dropped all mention of Constantine's name; as she too truly found by what insensible degrees the union had taken place within her own breast. She remembered these particulars, while a new method of accomplishing her present project suggested itself; and determining (however extraordinary her conduct might seem) to rest on the rectitude of her motives, as a man must be the properest person to transact such a business with propriety, she resolved to engage Pembroke for her agent, without troubling Mrs. Dorothy about the affair.

So deeply was she absorbed in these reflections, that Somerset, observing her vacant eye fixed on the opposite window, took her hand with an arch smile and exclaimed—

“Mary! What is the matter? I hope, Lady Dundas, you have not suffered any one to run away with her heart? You know that I am her cousin, and it is my unalienable right.”

Lady Dundas replied that young ladies best knew their own secrets.

“That may be, madam,” rejoined he; “but I won’t allow Miss Beaufort to know any thing that she does not transfer to me. Is not that true, Mary?”

“Yes,” whispered she, coloring; “and the sooner you afford me an opportunity to interest you in one, the more I shall be obliged to you.”

Pembroke pressed her hand in token of assent; and a desultory conversation continuing for another half hour, Miss Beaufort, who dreaded the wasting one minute in a day so momentous to her peace, sat uneasily until her aunt proposed retiring to dress for dinner, and requested Pembroke to assist her up stairs.

When he returned to the drawing-room, to his extreme satisfaction he found all the party were gone, excepting Miss Beaufort; who was standing by one of the windows, lost in thought. He approached her, and taking her hand—

“Come, my dear cousin,” said he, “how can I oblige you?”

Mary struggled with her confusion. Had she loved Thaddeus less, she found she could with greater ease have related the interest which she took in his fate. She tried to speak distinctly, and she accomplished it; although her burning cheek and downcast look told to the fixed eye of Pembroke what she vainly attempted to conceal.

“You can, indeed, oblige me! You must remember a Mr. Constantine! I once mentioned him to you in my letters.”

“I do, Mary. You thought him amiable!”

“He was the intimate friend of Lady Tinemouth,” returned she, striving to look up; but the piercing expression she met from the eyes of Somerset, beating hers down again, covered her face and neck with deeper blushes: she panted for breath.

“Rely on me,” said Pembroke, pitying her embarrassment, while he dreaded that her gentle heart had indeed become the victim of some accomplished and insidious foreigner—“Rely on me, my beloved cousin: consider me as a brother. If you have entangled yourself——”

Miss Beaufort guessed what he would say; and interrupting him, added with a more assured air, “No, Pembroke, I have no entanglements. I am going to ask your friendly assistance, in behalf of a brave and unfortunate Polander.” Pembroke reddened, and she went on. “Mr. Constantine is a gentleman. Lady Tinemouth tells me he has been a soldier, and that he lost all his possessions in the ruin of his country. Her ladyship introduced him here: I have seen him often, and I know him to be worthy the esteem of every honorable heart.

He is now in prison in Newgate, for a debt of thirty pounds and I ask you to go and release him. That is my request, my secret; and I confide in your discretion, that you will keep it, even from him.”

“Dear, generous, lovely Mary!” cried Pembroke, kissing her hand; “it is thus you always act! Possessed of all the softness of thy sex, dearest girl,” added he, still more affectionately, “nature has not alloyed it with one particle of weakness!”

MISS Beaufort smiled and sighed:—If to love tenderly, to be devoted life and soul to one being, whom she considered as the most perfect work of creation, be weakness—Mary was the weakest of the weak; and with a languid despondence at her heart, she was opening her lips to give some directions to her cousin, when the attention of both were arrested by a shrill noise of speakers talking above stairs. Before the cousins had time to make an observation, the disputants descended toward the drawing-room, and bursting open the door with a violent clamor, presented the enraged figure of Lady Dundas followed by Diana; who, with a no less swollen countenance, was scolding vociferously, and dragging forward the weeping Euphemia.

“Ladies! ladies!” exclaimed Somerset, amazed at so extraordinary a scene, “what has happened!”

Lady Dundas lifted up her clinched hand in a passion. “A jade! a hussy!” cried her vulgar ladyship, incapable to articulate more.

Miss Dundas, still grasping the hands of her struggling sister, broke out next, and turning furiously toward Mary, exclaimed, “You see, madam, what disgrace your ridiculous conduct to that vagabond foreigner has brought on our family! This bad girl has followed your example, and done worse; she has fallen in love with him!”

Shocked, and trembling at so rude an accusation, Miss Beaufort was unable to speak. Lost in wonder, and incensed at his cousin’s goodness having been the dupe of imposition, Pembroke stood silent, while Lady Dundas took up the subject.

“Ay,” cried she, shaking her daughter by the shoulder, “you little minx! if your sister had not picked up these abominable verses you chose to write on the absence of this beggarly fellow, I suppose you would have finished the business by running off with him? But you shall go down to Scotland, and be locked up for months. I won't have Sir Hector Dundas's family disgraced by a daughter of mine."

"For pity's sake, Lady Dundas," said Pembroke, stepping between her shrewish ladyship and the trembling Euphemia, "do compose yourself. I dare say your daughter is pardonable. In these cases, the fault in general lies with our sex. We are the seducers."

Mary was obliged to reseat herself; and with pale attention she listened to the reply of the frightened Euphemia; who, half assured that her whim of creating a mutual passion in the breast of Thaddeus was no longer tenable, without either shame or remorse, exclaimed, "Indeed, Mr. Somerset, you are right; I never should have thought of Mr. Constantine if he had not teased me every time he came with his devoted love."

Miss Beaufort rose hastily from her chair. Though Euphemia colored at the suddenness of this motion, and the immediate flash she met from her eye, she went on; "I know Miss Beaufort will deny it, because she thinks he is in love with her; but indeed, indeed, he has sworn a thousand times on his knees, that he was a Russian nobleman in disguise, and adored me, above every one else in the world."

"Villain!" cried Pembroke, inflamed with indignation at his double conduct. Afraid to read in the expressive countenance of Mary her shame and horror at this discovery, he turned his eyes on her with trepidation; when, to his surprise he beheld her standing perfectly unmoved, by the side of the sofa from which she had arisen. She advanced with a calm step toward Euphemia, and taking hold of the hand which concealed her face while uttering this last falsehood, she drew it away; and regarding her with a serene but penetrating look, "Euphemia!" said she, "you well know that you are slandering an innocent and unfortunate man. You know that never in his life did he give you the slightest reason to suppose he was attached to you! and as for myself, I can also clear him of making pretensions to me.—Upon the honor of my word, I declare,” added she, addressing herself to the whole group, “that he never breathed a sentence to me, beyond mere respect. By this last deviation of Euphemia from truth, you may form an estimate how far the rest she has alleged deserves credit.”

The young lady burst into a vehement passion of tears.

“I will not be browbeat and insulted, Miss Beaufort!” cried she, taking refuge in noise, since right had deserted her. “You know you would fight his battles through thick and thin! else you would not have fallen into fits yesterday when I told you he was sent to jail.”

This last assault struck Mary motionless; and Lady Dundas lifting up her hands, exclaimed, “Good Lord, keep me from the forward misses of these times! As for you, Miss Euphemia,” added she, seizing her daughter by the arm, “you shall leave town to-morrow morning. I will have no more tutoring and falling in love in my house; and for you, Miss Beaufort,” turning to Mary, who having recovered herself stood at a little distance, “I shall take care to warn Mrs. Dorothy Somerset to keep an eye over your conduct.”

“Madam,” replied she, indignantly, “I shall never do any thing which can dishonor either my family or myself; and of that Mrs. Dorothy Somerset is too well assured to doubt for an instant, even should calumny be as busy with me as it has been injurious to Mr. Constantine.”

Miss Beaufort walked toward the door. When she passed Mr. Somerset, who stood bewildered and frowning beside Miss Dundas, she said in a collected and decided voice, “Pembroke, I shall leave the room; but remember I do not release you from your engagement.”

Staggered by the open firmness of her manner, he looked after her as she withdrew, and was almost inclined to believe that she possessed the right side of the argument. Malice did not allow him to think so long. The moment the door closed on her, both the sisters fell on him pell-mell; and the prejudiced illiberality of the one, supported by the ready falsehoods of the other, soon dislodged all favorable impressions from the mind of Somerset, and filled him anew with displeasure.

In the midst of Diana's third harangue, Lady Dundas having ordered Euphemia to be taken to her chamber, Mr. Somerset was left alone more incensed than ever against the object of their invectives; whom he now considered in the light of an adventurer, concealing his poverty and perhaps his crimes, beneath a garb of lies. That such a character, by means of a fine person, and few meretricious talents, could work himself into the confidence of Mary Beaufort, pierced her cousin to the soul; and as he mounted the stairs with an intent to seek her in her dressing-room, he almost resolved to refuse obeying her commands.

When he opened the room door, he found Miss Beaufort with his aunt. The instant he appeared, the ever-benevolent face of Mrs. Dorothy contracted into a frown.

"Nephew!" cried she, "I shall not take it well of you if you give stronger credence to the passionate and vulgar assertions of Lady Dundas and her daughters than you choose to bestow on the tried veracity of your cousin Mary.

Pembroke was conscious that if his countenance had been a faithful transcript of his mind, Miss Beaufort did not err in supposing he believed the foreigner to be a villain. Knowing that it would be impossible for him to relinquish his reason into what he now denominated the partial hands of his aunt and cousin, he persisted in his opinion to both the ladies, that their unsuspecting natures had been rendered subservient to knavery and artifice.

"I would not, my dear madam," said he addressing Mrs. Dorothy, "think so meanly of your sex, as to imagine that such atrocity can exist in the female heart as could give birth to cruel and unprovoked calumnies against an innocent man. I can not suspect the Misses Dundas of such needless guilt—particularly poor Euphemia, whom I pity. Lady Dundas forced me to read her verses; and they were too full of love and regret for this adventurer to come from the same breast which could wantonly blacken his character. Such wicked inconsistencies in so young a woman are not half so probable as that you, my dear aunt and cousin, have been deceived.”

“Nephew,” returned the old lady, “you are very peremptory. Methinks a little more lenity of opinion would better become your youth! I knew nothing of this man’s present distress until Miss Beaufort mentioned it to me; but before she breathed a word in his favor I had conceived a very high respect for his merits. From the first hour in which I saw him, I gathered by his deportment and conversation that they were far above his fortunes. I thought so: I still think so; and, notwithstanding all which the Dundases may choose to fabricate, I am determined to believe the assertions of an honest countenance.”

Pembroke smiled, while he forced his aunt’s reluctant hand into his, and said, “I see, my dear madam, you are bigoted to the idol of your own fancy! I do not in the least doubt this Mr. Constantine’s enchantments; but you must pardon me if I keep my senses at liberty. I shall think of him as I could almost swear he deserves, although I am aware that I hazard your affection by my firmness.” He then turned to Mary, who, with a swelling and distressed heart, was standing by the chimney; “Forgive me, my dearest cousin,” continued he, addressing her in a softened voice, “that I am forced to appear harsh. It is the first time I ever dissented from you; it is the first time I ever thought you prejudiced!”

Miss Beaufort drew the back of her hand over her glistening eyes. All the tender affections of Pembroke’s bosom smote him at once; and, throwing his arms round his cousin's waist, he strained her to his breast, and added, "Ah! why, dear girl, must I love you better for thus giving me pain? Every way my darling Mary is more estimable. Even now, while I oppose you, I am sure, though your goodness is abused, it was cheated into error by the affection of honorable calamities!"

Miss Beaufort thought "that if the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence in some circumstances, in others a prudence of a higher order would justify her in declaring her sentiments." Accordingly she withdrew from the clasping arms of Mr. Somerset; and while her beautiful figure seemed to dilate into more than its usual dignity, she mildly replied—

"Think what you please, Pembroke; I shall not contend with you: "Mr. Constantine is of a nature not to be hidden by obscurity; his character will defend itself: and all that I have to add is this, I do not release you from your promise. Could a woman transact the affair with propriety, I would not keep you to so disagreeable an office; but I have passed my word to myself, that I will neither 'slumber nor sleep' till he is out of prison." She put a pocket-book into Pembroke's hand, and added, "Take that, my dear cousin; and without suffering a syllable to transpire by which he may suspect who served him, accomplish what I have desired."

"I will obey you, Mary," returned he; "but I am sorry that such rare enthusiasm was not awakened by a worthier object. When you see me again I hope I shall be enabled to say that your ill-placed generosity is satisfied."

"Fie, nephew, fie!" cried Mrs. Dorothy; "I could not have supposed you capable of conferring a favor so ungraciously."

Pained at what he called the obstinate infatuation of Miss Beaufort, and if possible more chagrined by what he consid ered the blind and absurd encouragement of his aunt, Mr. Somerset lost the whole of her last reprimand in his hurry to quit the room.

Disturbed, displeased, and anxious, he stepped into a hackney-coach; and ordering it to drive to Newgate, determined to go through the business without exposing himself to an interview with a man whom he considered as an artful and unprincipled villain.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE first week of the count's confinement was rendered in some degree tolerable by the daily visits of Mrs. Robson; who, having brought his drawing materials, enabled him, through the means of the printseller, to purchase some civility from the brutal and hardened people who were his jailers. After the good woman had performed her diurnal kindness, Thaddeus used to turn to the sad circumference of his miserable apartment, and would have been glad to have found there even the dumb companionship of the poor little spider which had beguiled the attention of many a brother in captivity. When his pencil had accomplished its task, it wearied him; when he took up a book, having read it before, it failed to engage him. He possessed nothing to beguile the tedious day, and more tedious night. His spirit was in solitude—in the most dismal solitude; banished and shut out from all that could render life desirable.

The elasticity and enterprise of soul inherent in youth, renders no calamity so difficult to be borne as that which fetters its best years and most active virtues within the walls of a prison. Thaddeus felt this benumbing conviction in every pulse of his ardent and energetic heart. He retraced all that he had been. He looked on what he was. Though he had reaped glory when a boy, his "noon of manhood," his evening sun was to waste its light, and set in captivity.

At short and distant intervals, such melancholy reveries gave place to the pitying image of Mary Beaufort. It sometimes visited him in the day, it always was his companion during the night. He courted her lovely idea as a spell that for a while stole him from painful reflections. With an entranced soul he recalled every lineament of her beautiful face, every dissolving note of that voice which had hurried him into the rashness of touching her hand. One moment he pressed her gold chain closer to his heart, almost believing what Lady Tinemouth had insinuated; the next he would sigh over his credulity, and return with despondent, though equally intense love, to her bewitching recollection.

The more he meditated on the purity of her manners; the elevated principles to which he could trace her actions; and, above all, the benevolent confidence with which she had ever treated him (a man contemned by one part of her acquaintance, and merely received on trust by the remainder), the more he found reasons to admire her character and adore herself. When he drew a comparison between Miss Beaufort and women of the same quality whom he had seen in England and in other countries, he contemplated with delighted wonder that spotless mind which, having passed through the various dangers annexed to wealth and fashion, still bore itself uncontaminated. She was beautiful, and she did not regard it; she was accomplished, but she did not attempt a display: what she acquired from education, the graces so incorporated with her native intelligence that the perfection of her character seemed to have been stamped at once by the beneficent hand of Providence.

Never were her numberless attractions so fascinating to Thaddeus as when he witnessed the generous eagerness with which, forgetful of her own almost unparalleled talents, she pointed out merit, and dispensed applause to the deserving. Miss Beaufort's nature was gentle and benevolent; but it was likewise distinguishing and animated. While the count saw that the urbanity of her disposition made her politeness universal, he perceived that neither rank, riches, nor splendor, could extract from her bosom one spark of that lambent flame which streamed from her heart like fire to the sun, toward the united glory of genius and virtue.

He dwelt on her lovely unsophisticated character with an enthusiasm bordering on idolatry. He recollected that she had been educated by the mother of Pembroke Somerset; and turning from the double remembrance with a sigh fraught with all the bitterness and sweetness of love, he acknowledged how much wisdom (which includes virtue) gives spirit and immortality to beauty. "Yes," cried he, "it is the fragrance of the flower, which lives after the bloom is withered."

From the like seducing day-dreams, Thaddeus was one evening awakened by the entrance of the jailor into his cell. The man presented a sealed paper and told him he brought it from a stranger; who having paid the debts for which he was confined immediately withdrew, desiring the packet might be delivered to Mr. Constantine.

Scarcely crediting this information, Thaddeus hastily opened the letter hoping it might throw some light on his benefactor: a blank cover inclosing notes to the amount of fifty pounds presented itself. Surprised at this, he ordered the man to leave him, who, without ceremony, was staring at the money over his shoulder; and sitting down, he tried to conjecture who could have acted so generously and be so careful to conceal the donor.

He had seen sufficient proofs of a heedless want of charity in Miss Euphemia Dundas, to lead him to suppose that she could not be so munificent and solicitous of secrecy. Beside, now could she have learned his situation? He thought it was impossible: and that impossibility compelled an erratic hope of his present liberty's having sprung from the friendship of Miss Beaufort, to pass by him with painful swiftness.

“Alas!” cried he, starting from his chair, “it is the indefatigable spirit of Lady Sara Roos, that I recognize in this deed! The generous but unhappy interest which she yet takes in my fate, has discovered my last misfortune, and thus seeks to relieve me!”

The moment he conceived this supposition he believed it; and taking up a pen with a grateful though disturbed soul, he addressed to her the following guarded note:—

“TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE LADY SARA ROOS.

“An unfortunate exile, who is already overpowered by a sense of not having deserved the notice which Lady Sara Roos has deigned to take of his misfortunes—was this morning liberated from prison in a manner so generous and delicate that he can ascribe the act to no other than the noble heart of her ladyship.

“The object of this bounty, bending under the weight of obligations which he can not repay, begs permission to re-enclose the bills which Lady Sara's agent transmitted to him; but as the deed which procures his freedom can not be recalled, with the most grateful emotions he accepts that new instance of her ladyship's goodness.

“Newgate.”

Thaddeus dispatched the letter by a porter; and was preparing another to acquaint Mrs. Robson of his release, when the good woman made her appearance. She hastened to him with an animated countenance and exclaimed before he had time to speak, “Dear sir! I have seen a dear sweet lady who promised not to sleep till you are out of this horrid place!”

The suspicions of the count that his benefactress was indeed Lady Sara Roos, were now confirmed: seating his landlady in the only chair which furnished the apartment; to satisfy her humility, he took his station on the table, and then said, "The lady has already fulfilled her engagement; I am free; and only wait for an answer to my acknowledgments before I quit the prison."

At this assurance the delighted Mrs. Robson crying and laughing by turns did not cease her ejaculations of joy until the porter returned with a reply from Lady Sara evidently blotted with tears. Thaddeus took out the reinclosed bills with a flushed cheek, and read as follows:—

"I can not be mistaken in recognizing the proud and high-souled Constantine in the lines I hold in my hand. Could any thing have imparted to me more comfort than your generous belief that there is indeed some virtue left in my wretched and repentant heart, it would have arisen from the consciousness of having been the happy person who has succored you in your distress. But no: that enjoyment was beyond my deserving. The bliss of being the lightener of your sorrows was reserved by Heaven for a less criminal creature. I did not even know that you were in prison. Since our dreadful parting I have never dared to inquire after you; and much as it might console me to serve one so truly valued, I will not insult your nice honor by offering any further instance of my friendship than what will evince my soul's gratitude to your prayers, and my acquiescence with the commands of duty.

"My husband is here without perceiving the ravages which misery and remorse have made in my unhappy heart. Time, perhaps, may render me less unworthy of his tenderness; at present I detest myself.

"I return the bills; you may safely use them for they never were mine.

S. R."

The noble heart of Thaddeus bled over every line of this letter. He saw that it bore a stamp of truth which did not leave him a moment in doubt that he owed his release to some other hand. While he folded it up, his suspicions next lighted on Lady Tinemouth. He had received one short letter from her since her departure, mentioning Maria's staying in town to meet Mr. Montresor; Miss Beaufort's detention on account of Mrs. Dorothy's accident; and closing with the intelligence of her own arrival at the Wolds. He was struck with the idea that, as he had delayed answering this letter in consequence of his late embarrassment, she must have made inquiries after him; that probably Miss Egerton was the lady who had visited Mrs. Robson; and finding the information true, had executed the countess's commission to obtain his release.

According to these suppositions, he questioned his landlady about the appearance of the lady whom she had seen. Mrs. Robson replied, "She was rather tall, but so wrapped up I could neither see her face nor her figure; though I am certain, from the softness of her voice, she must be both young and handsome. Sweet creature! I am sure she wept two or three times. Besides, she is the most charitable soul alive, next to you sir; for she gave me a purse with twenty guineas; and she told me she knew your honor's English friends."

This narration substantiating his hope of Lady Tinemouth's being his benefactress; that the kind Maria was her agent, and the gentleman who defrayed the debt Mr. Montresor; he was easier under an obligation which a mysterious liberation would have doubled. He knew the countess's maternal love for him. To reject her present benefaction would be to sacrifice gratitude to an excessive and haughty delicacy. Convinced that nothing can be great that it is great to despise, he no longer hesitated to accept Lady Tinemouth's bounty; but smothered in his breast the embers of a proud, repulsive ar dor, which, having burst forth in the first hour of his misfortunes, was ever ready to consume any wish that might oppress him with the weight of obligation.

Thaddeus quitted his cell. He ordered a coach to the great gate of Newgate; and with thankfulness to Heaven for again being permitted to taste the wholesome breeze of a free atmosphere; he handed his delighted landlady into the vehicle.

So true it is that advantages are only appreciated by comparison; when the count re-entered his humble apartment in St. Martin's-lane, he considered it a palace of luxury compared to the dungeon he had left.

"Ah!" cried Mrs. Robson, pointing to a chair, 'there is the very seat in which that dear lady sat! sweet creature! If I had known that I durst believe all she promised, I would have fallen on my knees and kissed her feet for bringing back your dear self!"

"I thank you, my good madam," returned Thaddeus, with a smile and a tear at such ardent demonstration of affection; "but where is little Nanny that I may shake hands with her?"

The child welcomed the count with those animated expressions of joy which are inseparable from a good and unexperienced heart. Being exhausted by the events of the day he retired at an early hour to his pillow, where he found that repose he had sought in vain within the gloomy, and (he supposed) eternal, walls of a prison.

In the morning he was awakened by the light footsteps of his pretty waiting-maid entering the front room. His chamber-door being open he asked her what was the hour? She replied, nine o'clock; adding that she had brought a letter which one of the waiters from Slaughter's Coffee-house had just left, with information that he did so by the orders of a footman in a rich livery.

Thaddeus desired it might be given to him. The child obeyed, and quitted the room. He saw the superscription was in Miss Dundas's hand; and opening it with pleasure, because every thing interested him which came from the house which contained Mary Beaufort, to his amazement and consternation he read the following accusations:—

“TO MR. CONSTANTINE.

MR. CONSTANTINE,

“By a miraculous circumstance this morning your deep and daring plan of villainy has been discovered to Lady D—— and myself. The deluded victim whom your arts and falsehoods would have seduced to dishonor her family by connecting herself with a vagabond, has at length seen through her error, and now detests you as much as ever your insufferable presumption could have hoped she would distinguish you with regard. Thanks be to Heaven! you are completely exposed! This young woman of fashion (whose name I will not trust in the same page with yours) has made a full confession of your villainous seductions; of her own reprehensible weakness in ever having deigned to listen to so low a creature. She desires me to assure you that she hates you; and commands you never again to attempt the insolence of appearing in her sight. Indeed this is the language of every soul in the house, Lady D——, Mrs. D—— S——, Miss B——, besides that of

“D—— D——.

“Harley-street.”

Thaddeus read this ridiculous letter twice before he could perfectly comprehend its meaning. In a paroxysm of indignation at the vile subterfuge under which he did not doubt that Euphemia had screened some accidental discovery of her absurd passion, he hastily threw on his clothes; and determined, though in defiance of Miss Dundas's mandates, to fly to Harley-street and clear himself in the eyes of Miss Beaufort and her venerable aunt.

Having flown rather than walked, he arrived in sight of Lady Dundas's house just as a coach full of her ladyship's maids and packages drove from the door. Hurrying up the step, he asked if Mrs. Dorothy Somerset were at home.

"No," replied the man; "she and Miss Beaufort, with Miss Dundas and Mr. Somerset, went out of town this morning by eight o'clock; and my lady and Miss Euphemia, about an hour ago, set off for Scotland, where they mean to stay all the summer.

At this information, which seemed to be the sealing of his condemnation with Mary, the heart of Thaddeus was pierced to the core. Unacquainted, until this moment, with the torments attending the calumniated, he could scarcely subdue the tempest in his breast when forced to receive the conviction that the woman whom he loved above all the world, now regarded him as not merely a villain, but the meanest of villains.

He returned home indignant and agitated. The knowledge that Pembroke Somerset had probably listened to the falsehood of Euphemia without suggesting one word in defense of him who was once his friend, inflicted a pang more deadly than the rest. Shutting himself within his apartment, tossed and tortured in soul, he traversed the room. First one idea occurred, then another, until he resolved to seek redress from the advice of Lady Tinemouth. With this determination he descended the stairs; and telling Mrs. Robson he should leave London next morning for Lincolnshire, begged her not to be uneasy on his account as he went on business, and would return in a few days.

The good woman almost wept at this intelligence; and when she saw him depart, followed the wheels of the stage-coach with sighs and blessings. His long journey passed not more in resentful reveries than in affectionate anticipations of the moment in which he should pour out his gratitude to the maternal tenderness of Lady Tinemouth; and learn from her delicacy and experience how to efface from the minds of Mrs. Dorothy Somerset and her lovely niece sentiments of him so dishonoring, torturing, and false.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE porter at Lady Dundas's was strictly correct in his account respecting the destination of the dispersed members of her ladyship's household.

While Pembroke Somerset was sullenly executing his forced act of benevolence at Newgate, Miss Dundas suddenly took it into her ever-scheming head to compare the merits of Somerset's rich expectancy with the penniless certainty of Lascelles. She considered the substantial advantages which the wife of a wealthy baronet would hold over the humble cara sposa of a man owning no other rank than a reflected luster shot from the coronet of an elder brother. Besides, Pembroke was very handsome; Lascelles only tolerably so: indeed, some women had presumed to call him ugly; but they were odd mortals, who, not believing the metempsychosis doctrine of the tailor and his decorating adjuncts, could not comprehend that although a mere human creature can have no such property, a man of fashion may possess an elixir vitæ which makes age youth, deformity beauty, and even transforms vice into virtue.

In spite of remembrance, which reminded Diana how often she had contended that all Mr. Lascelles's teeth were his own; that his nose was not a bit too long, being a fac simile of the feature which reared its sublime curve over the capacious mouth of his noble brother, Lord Castle Conway; notwithstanding all this, the Pythagorean pretensions of fashion began to lose their ascendancy; and in the recesses of her mind, when Miss Dundas compared the light elegance of Pembroke's figure with the heavy limbs of her present lover; Pembroke's dark and ever-animated eyes with the gooseberry orbs of Lascelles, she dropped the parallel; and resolving to captivate the heir of Somerset Castle, admitted no remorse at jilting the brother of Castle Conway.

To this end, before Pembroke's return from Newgate, Diana had told her mother of her intention to accompany Mrs. Dorothy to the baronet's, where she would remain until her ladyship should think Euphemia might be trusted to rejoin her in town. Neither Mrs. Dorothy nor Miss Beaufort liked this arrangement; and next morning, with an aching heart, the latter prepared to take her seat in the traveling equipage which was to convey them all into Leicestershire.

At supper, Pembroke sullenly informed his cousin of the success of her commands—that Mr. Constantine was free. This assurance, though imparted with so ungracious an air laid her head with less distraction on her pillow; and as she stepped into Sir Robert's carriage next day, enabled her with more ease to deck her lips with smiles. She felt that the penetrating eyes of Mr. Somerset were never withdrawn from her face; offended with his perverseness, and their scrutiny, she tried to baffle their inspection. She attempted gayety, when she gladly would have wept. But when the coach mounted the top of Highgate Hill, and discovered a last view of that city which contained the being whose happiness was the sole object of her thoughts and prayers, she leaned out of the window to hide a tear she could not repress; feeling that another and another would start, she complained of the dust, and pulling her vail over her eyes, drew back into the corner of the carriage. The trembling of her voice and hands during the performance of this little artifice, too well explained to Pembroke what was passing in her mind. At once dispelling the gloom which shrouded his own countenance, he turned toward her with compassionate tenderness in his words and looks; he called her attention by degrees to the happy domestic scene she was to meet at the castle; and thus gradually softening her displeasure into the easy conversation of reciprocal affection, he rendered the remainder of their long journey less irksome.

When at the end of the second day Miss Beaufort found herself in the old avenue leading to the base of the hill which sustains the revered walls of Somerset Castle, a mingled emotion took possession of her breast: and when the carriage arrived at the foot of the highest terrace she sprung impatiently out of it; and hastening up the stone stairs into the front hall, met her uncle at the door of the breakfast-parlor, where he held out his arms to receive her.

“My Mary! my darling!” cried he, embracing her now wet cheek, and straining her throbbing bosom to his own. “Why, my dear love,” added he, almost carrying her into the room, “I am afraid this visit to town has injured your nerves! Whence arises this agitation?”

She knew it had injured her peace, and now that the flood-gates of her long-repelled tears were opened, it was beyond her art, or the soothing of her affectionate uncle, to stay them. A moment afterward her cousin entered the room, followed by Mrs. Dorothy and Miss Dundas. Miss Beaufort hastily rose to conceal what she could not check; and kissing Sir Robert’s hand, asked permission to retire under the pretense of regaining those spirits which had been dissipated by the fatigues of her journey.

In her own chamber she did indeed struggle to recover herself. She shuddered at the impetuosity of her emotions, when once abandoned of their reins; and resolved from this hour to hold a stricter guard over the consequences of her ill-fated passion.

She sat in the window of her apartment; and looking down the extensive vale of Somerset, watched the romantic wanderings of the Witham winding its course through the domains of the castle, and nourishing the roots of those immense oaks which for many a century had waved their branches over its stream. She reflected on the revolution which had taken place in herself, since she walked on its banks the evening that preceded her visit to London. Then, she was as free as air, and gay as the lark; each object was bright and lovely in her eyes: hope seemed to woo her from every green slope, every remote dingle: all nature breathed of joy, because her own breast was the abode of gladness. Now, all continued the same, but she was changed. Surrounded by beauty, she acknowledged its presence; the sweetness of the flowers bathed her senses in fragrance; the setting sun gilding the heights, shed a yellow glory over the distant hills; the birds were hailing the fallen dew which spangled every leaf; she gazed around, and sighed heavily when she said to herself, "Even in this paradise I shall be wretched. Alas! my heart is far away! My soul lingers about one I may never more behold! about one who may soon cease to remember that such a being as Mary Beaufort is in existence. He will leave England!" cried she, raising her hands and eyes to the glowing heavens. "He will live, he will die, far, far from me! In a distant land he will wed another, while I shall know no wish that strays from him."

While she indulged in these soliloquies, she forgot both Sir Robert and her resolution, until he sent her maid to beg, if she were better, she would come down and make tea for him. At this summons she dried her eyes, and with assumed serenity descended to the saloon, where the family were assembled. The baronet having greeted Miss Dundas with an hospitable welcome, seated himself between his sister and his son; and, while he received his favorite beverage from his beloved niece, he found that comfort once more re-entered his bosom.

Sir Robert Somerset was a man whose appearance alone attracted respect. His person bore the stamp of dignity; and his manners, which possessed the exquisite polish of travel, secured him universal esteem. Though little beyond fifty, various perplexing situations having distressed his youth, had not only rendered his hair prematurely gray; but by clouding his once brilliant eyes with thoughtfulness, marked his aspect with premature old age and melancholy. The baronet's entrance into gay life had been celebrated for wit and vivacity; he was the animating spirit of every party: but an inexplicable metamorphosis suddenly took place. Soon after his return from abroad he had married Miss Beaufort (a woman whom he loved to madness), when, strange to say, excess of happiness seemed to change his nature, and give his character a deep tinge of sadness. After his wife's death, the alteration in his mind produced still more extraordinary effects, and showed itself more than once in all the terrors of approaching insanity.

His latest attack of the kind assailed him during the last winter, under the appearance of a swoon, while he sat at breakfast reading the newspaper. He was carried to bed, and awoke in a delirium which threatened either immediate death or the total extinction of his intellects. However, neither of these dreads being confirmed, in the course of several weeks, to the wonder of every body, he recovered both his health and his sound mind. Notwithstanding this happy event, the circumstances of his danger so deeply affected his family that he ceased not to be an object of the most anxious attention. Indeed, solicitude did not terminate with them: the munificence of his disposition having spread itself through every county in which he owned a rood of land, as many prayers ascended for the repose of his spirit as ever petitioned Heaven from the mouths of "monkish beadsmen," in favor of power or virtue.

Since the demise of Lady Somerset, this once admired man drew all his earthly comfort from the amiable qualities of his son Pembroke. Sometimes in his livelier hours, which came "like angels visits, few and far between," he amused himself with the playfulness of the little Earl of Arun, the pompous erudition of Mr. Loftus (who was become his young ward's tutor), and with giving occasional entertainments to the gentry in his neighborhood.

Of all the personages contained within the circle (which the hospitality of Sir Robert extended to a circumference of thirty miles) Lord Berrington was the most respected.

The numerous visitants that attended the Somerset hunt were too gay to be admitted with intimacy. A son of one of these itinerant families (which, ever on the full chase of pleasure, had fixed itself at Woodhill Lodge, near the little town of Grantham), by calling at the castle soon after the arrival of the London party, caused a trifling change in its social arrangement.

When Richard Shafto was ushered into the saloon he nodded to Sir Robert, and, turning his back on the ladies, told Pembroke he had ridden to Somerset on purpose to bring him to Woodhill Lodge.

"Upon my life," cried he, "if you don't come I will cut and run! There is not a creature but yourself within twenty miles to whom I can speak; not a man worth a sixpence. I wish my father had broken his neck before he accepted that confounded embassy, which encumbers me with the charge of my old mother!"

After this dutiful wish, which brought down a weighty admonition from Mrs. Dorothy, the young gentleman promised to behave better, provided she would persuade Pembroke to accompany him to the Lodge. Mr. Somerset did not show much alacrity in his consent; but to rid his family of such a noisy guest, he rose from his chair, and acquiescing in the sac-rice of a few days to good nature, bade his father farewell, and gave orders for a ride to Grantham.

As soon as the gentlemen left the saloon Miss Dundas ran up stairs, and, from her dressing-room window in the west tower, pursued the steps of their horses as they cantered down the winding steep into the high road. An abrupt angle of the hill hiding them from her view, she turned round with a toss of the head, and flinging herself into a chair, exclaimed, "Now I shall be bored to death by this prosing family! I wish his boasted hunter had run away with Shafto before he thought of coming here!"

In consequence of the temper which engendered the above no very flattering compliment to the society at the castle, Miss Dundas descended to the dining-room with sulky looks and a chilly air. She ate what the baronet laid on her plate with an indolent appetite; cut her meat carelessly, and dragged the vegetables over the table-cloth. Mrs. Dorothy colored at this indifference to the usual neatness of her damask covers; but Miss Dundas was so completely in the sullen that, heedless of any other feelings than her own, she continued to pull and knock about the things just as her ill humor dictated.

The petulance of this lady's behavior did not in the least assimilate with the customary decorum of Sir Robert's table; and when the cloth was drawn he could not refrain from expressing his concern that Somerset Castle appeared so little calculated to afford satisfaction to a daughter of Lady Dundas. Miss Dundas attempted some awkward declaration that she never was more amused—never happier.

But the small credit Sir Robert gave to her assertion was fully warranted the next morning by the ready manner in which she accepted a casual invitation to spend the ensuing day and night at Lady Shafto's. Her ladyship called on Mrs. Dorothy; and intending to have a party in the evening, invited the two young ladies to return with her to Grantham, and be her guests for a week. Miss Beaufort, whose spirits were far from tranquilized, declined her civility; but with a gleam of pleasure she heard it accepted by Miss Dundas, who departed with her ladyship for the Lodge.

While the enraptured Diana, all life and glee, bowled along with Lady Shafto, anticipating the delight of once more seating herself at the elbow of Pembroke Somerset; Mary Beaufort, relieved from a load of ill-requited attentions, walked out into the park to enjoy in solitude the "sweet sorrow" of thinking on the unhappy and far-distant Constantine. Regardless of the way, her footsteps, though robbed of elasticity by nightly watching and daily regret, led her beyond the park to the ruined church of Woolthorpe, its southern boundary. Her eyes were fixed on the opposite horizon. It was the extremity of Leicestershire; and far, far behind those hills was that London which contained the object dearest to her soul. The wind seemed scarcely to breathe as it floated toward her; but it came from that quarter; and, believing it laden with every sweet which love can fancy, she threw back her veil to inhale its balm; then blaming herself for such baby weakness, she turned, blushing, homeward, and wept at what she thought her unreasonably tenacious passion.

The arrival of Miss Dundas at the Lodge was communicated to the two young men on their return from a traverse on foot of half the county in quest of game. The news drew an oath from Shafto; but rather pleased Somerset, who augured some amusement from her attempts at wit and judgment. Tired to death, and dinner being over when they entered, with ravenous appetites they devoured their uncomfortable meal in a remote room; then, throwing themselves along the sofas, they yawned and slept for nearly two hours.

Pembroke waking first, suddenly jumped on the floor, and shaking his disordered clothes, exclaimed, "Shafto! get up.

This is abominable! Efaith, I can not help thinking if we spend one half of our days in pleasure and the other in lolling off its fatigues, we shall have passed through life more to our shame than our profit!"

"Then you take the shame and leave me the profit," cried his companion, turning himself round: "so good-night to you."

Pembroke rang the bell. A servant entered.

"What o'clock is it?"

"Nine, sir."

"Who are above?"

"My lady, sir, and a large party of ladies."

"There, now!" cried Shafto, yawning and kicking out his legs. "You surely won't go to be bored with such maudlin company?"

"I choose to join your mother," replied Pembroke. "Are there any gentlemen, Stephen?"

"One, sir, Dr. Denton."

"Off with you!" roared Shafto; "what do you stand jabbering there for? You won't let me sleep. Can't you send away the fellow, and go look yourself?"

"I will, if you can persuade yourself to rise off that sofa and come with me."

"May Dr. Denton catch me if I do! Go about your business and leave me to mine."

"You are incorrigible, Shafto," returned Pembroke, as he closed the door.

He went up stairs to change his dress; and before he gained the second flight he resolved not to spend another whole day in the company of such an ignorant, unmannerly cub.

On Mr. Somerset's entrance into Lady Shafto's drawing-room he saw many ladies; but only one gentleman, who was the before-mentioned Dr. Denton; a poor, shallow-headed, parasitical animal. Pembroke having seen enough of him to despise his pretensions both to science and sincerity, returned his wide smirk and eager inquiries with a ceremonious bow, and took his seat by the side of the now delighted Miss Dundas. The vivid spirits of Diana, which she now strove to render peculiarly sparkling, entertained him. When compared with the insipid sameness of her ladyship or the brutal ribaldry of her son, the mirth of Miss Dundas was wit and her remarks wisdom.

“Dear Mr. Somerset!” cried she, “how good you are to break this sad solemnity. I vow, until you showed your face I thought the days of paganism were revived, and that, lacking men, we were assembled here to celebrate the mysteries of the Bona Dea.”

“Lacking men!” replied he, smiling, “you have overlooked the assiduous Dr. Denton?”

“Oh, no; that is a chameleon in man’s clothing. He breathes air, he eats air, he speaks air; and a most pestilential breath it is. Only observe how he is pouring its fumes into the ear of yonder sable statue.”

Pembroke directed his eyes as Miss Dundas desired him; and saw Dr. Denton whispering and bowing before a lady in black. The lady put up her lip, the doctor proceeded; she frowned, he would not be daunted; the lady rose from her seat, and slightly bending her head, crossed the room. While Mr. Somerset was contemplating her graceful figure, and fine though pale features, Miss Dundas touched his arm, and smiling satirically, repeated in an affected voice—“Hail, pensive nun! devout and holy!

Hail, divinest Melancholy!

“If she be melancholy,” returned Pembroke, unconsciously sighing, “I would forever say,

“Hence, unholy Mirth, of Folly born ”

Miss Dundas reddened. She never liked this interesting woman; who was not only too handsome for competition, but possessed an understanding that would not tolerate ignorance and presumption. Diana's ill-natured impertinence having several times received deserved chastisement from that quarter, she was vexed to the soul when Pembroke closed his animated response with the question, "Who is she?"

Rather too bitterly for the design on his heart, Miss Dundas iterated his words, and then answered, "Why, she is crazed. She lives in a place called Harrowby Abbey, at the top of that hill," continued she, pointing through the opposite window to a distant rising ground on which the moon was shining brightly; "and I am told frightens the cottagers out of their wits by her midnight strolls."

Hardly knowing how to credit this wild account, Pembroke asked his informer if she were serious.

"Never more so. Her eyes are uncommonly wild."

"You must be jesting," returned he; "they seem perfectly reasonable."

Miss Dundas laughed. "Like Hamlet's they 'know not seems, but have that within which passeth show!' believe me, she is mad enough for Bedlam; and of that I could soon convince you. I wonder how Lady Shafto thought of inviting her here!"

"Well," cried Pembroke, "if those features announce madness, I shall never admire a look of sense again."

"Bless us," exclaimed Miss Dundas, "you are wonderfully struck! Don't you see she is old enough to be your mother?"

"That may be," answered he, smiling; "nevertheless she is one of the most lovely women I ever beheld. Come, tell me her name."

"I will satisfy you in a moment," rejoined Diana; "and then away with your rhapsodies! She is the very Countess of Tinemouth who brought that vagabond foreigner to our house, who would have run off with Phemy."

“Lady Tinemouth!” exclaimed Pembroke, “I never saw her before. My ever-lamented mother knew her while I was abroad, and she esteemed her highly. Pray, introduce me to her!”

“Impossible,” replied Diana, vexed at the turn his curiosity had taken; “I wrote to her about the insidious wretch, and now we don’t speak.”

“Then I will introduce myself,” answered he. He was moving away, when Miss Dundas caught his arm, and by various attempts at badinage and raillery, held him in his place until the countess made her farewell courtesy to Lady Shafto, and the door was closed.

Disappointed at this maneuver, Pembroke reseated himself; and wondering why his aunt and cousin had not heard of Lady Tinemouth’s arrival at Harrowby, he determined to wait on her next day. Regardless of every word which the provoked Diana addressed to him, he remained silent and meditating, until the loud voice of Shafto roaring in his ear, made him turn suddenly round. Miss Dundas tried to laugh at his reverie, though she knew that such a flagrant instance of inattention was death to her hopes; but Pembroke, not inclined to partake in the jest, coolly asked his bearish companion what he wanted.

“Nothing,” cried he, “but to hear you speak! Miss Dundas tells me you have lost your heart to yonder grim countess? my mother wanted me to gallant her up the hill, but I would see her in the river first!”

“Shafto!” answered Pembroke, rising from his chair, “you can not be speaking of Lady Tinemouth?”

“Efaith I am,” roared he; “and if she be such a scamp as to live without a carriage, I won’t be her lackey for nothing. Two miles are not to be tramped over by me with no pleasanter companion than an old painted woman of quality.”

“Surely you can not mean,” returned Pembroke, “that her ladyship was to walk from this place?”

“Without a doubt,” cried Shafto, bursting into a horse-laugh; “you would be clever to see my Lady Stingy in any other carriage than her clogs.”

Irritated at the malice of Miss Dundas, and despising the vulgar illiberality of Shafto, without deigning a reply, Pembroke abruptly left the room; and hastening out of the house, ran rather than walked in hopes of overtaking the countess before she reached Harrowby.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

PEMBROKE crossed the little wooden bridge which lies over the Witham; he scoured the fields; he leaped every stile and gate in his way, and at last gained the inclosure that leads to the top of the hill, where he descried a light moving, and very rightly conjectured it must be the lantern carried by the countess's attendant. Another spring over the shattered fence cleared all obstacles; and he found himself close to Lady Tinemouth, who was leaning on the arm of a gentleman. Pembroke stopped at this sight. Supposing she had been met by some person belonging to the town, whose readier gallantry now occupied the place which Miss Dundas had prevented him from filling, he was preparing to retreat, when Lady Tinemouth happening to turn her head, imagined, from the hesitating embarrassment of his manner, that he was a stranger who had lost his way, and accosted him with that inquiry.

Pembroke bowed in some confusion; and related the simple fact of his having heard that she had quitted Lady Shafto's house without any guard but the servant, and that the moment he learned the circumstance he had hurried out to proffer his services. The countess not only thanked him for such at tention, but constrained by a civility which at that instant she could have wished not to have been necessary, asked him to walk forward with her to the Abbey, and partake of some refreshment.

“But,” added she, “though I perfectly recollect having seen another gentleman in Lady Shafto’s room, besides Doctor Denton, I have not the honor of knowing your name?”

“It is Somerset,” returned Pembroke; “I am the son of that Lady Somerset who, during the last year of her life, had the happiness of being intimate with your ladyship.”

Lady Tinemouth declared her pleasure at this meeting; and turning to the gentleman who was walking in silence by her side, “Mr. Constantine,” said she, “allow me to introduce to you the cousin of the amiable Miss Beaufort.”

Thaddeus, who had too well recognized the voice of his false friend, in the first accents he addressed to the countess, with a swelling heart bent his head to the cold salutation of Somerset. Hearing that her ladyship’s companion was the same Constantine whom he had liberated from prison, Pembroke was stimulated with a desire to unmask his double villainy to Lady Tinemouth; and conceiving a curiosity to see the man whose person and meretricious qualities had blinded even the judgment of his aunt, he readily obeyed the second invitation of the countess, and consented to go home and sup with her.

Meanwhile Thaddeus was agitated with a variety of emotions. Every tone of Pembroke’s voice reminding him of happier days pierced his heart; while a sense of his ingratitude awakened all the pride and indignation of his soul. Full of resentment, he determined that, whatever might be the result, he would not shrink from an interview, the anticipation of which Pembroke (who had received from himself an intimation of the name he had assumed) seemed to regard with indifference.

Not imagining that Somerset and the count had any personal knowledge of each other, Lady Tinemouth begged the gentlemen to accompany her into the supper-parlor. Pembroke, with no inconsiderable degree of rudeness, pushed by Thaddeus to give his hand to the countess. Thaddeus was so shocked at this instance of ungrateful defiance, and so insulted in every nerve, that he was obliged to pause a moment in the hall, to summon coolness to follow him with a composed step and dispassionate countenance. He accomplished this conquest over himself; and taking off his hat, entered the room. Lady Tinemouth began to congratulate herself with many kind expressions on his arrival. The eyes of Pembroke fixed themselves on the calm but severe aspect of the man before him: he stood by the table with such an air of noble greatness, that the candid heart of Pembroke Somerset soon whispered to him, "Sure nothing ill can dwell in such a breast!"

Still his eyes followed him, when he turned round, and when he bent his head to answer the countess, but in a voice so low that it escaped his ear. Pembroke was bewildered. There was something in the features, in the mien of this foreigner, so like his friend Sobieski! But then Sobieski was all frankness and animation; his cheek bloomed with the rich coloring of youth and happiness; his eyes flashed pleasure, and his lips were decked with smiles. On the contrary, the person before him was not only considerably taller and of more manly proportions, but his face was pale, reserved, and haughty; besides, he did not appear even to recollect the name of Somerset; and what at once destroyed the supposition, his own was Constantine.

These reasonings having quickly passed through the mind of Pembroke, they left his heart unsatisfied. The conflict of his mind flushed his cheek; his bosom beat; and keeping his searching and ardent gaze riveted on the man who was either his friend or his counterpart, Lady Tinemouth turned away, and the eyes of the young men met. Thaddeus turned paler than before. There is an intelligence in the interchange of looks which can not be mistaken; it is the communication of souls, and there is no deception in their language. Pembroke flew forward, and catching hold of his friend's hand, exclaimed in an impetuous voice, "Am I right? Are you Sobieski?"

"I am," returned Thaddeus, almost inarticulate with emotion, and hardly knowing what to understand by Somerset's behavior.

"Gracious Heaven!" cried he, still grasping his hand, "and can you have forgotten your friend Pembroke Somerset?"

The ingenuous heart of Thaddeus acknowledged the words and manner of Pembroke to be the language of truth; and, trusting that some mistake had involved his former conduct, he at once cast off suspicion, and throwing his arms around him, strained him to his breast, and burst into tears.

Lady Tinemouth, who during this scene stood mute with surprise, now advanced to the friends who were weeping on each other's necks, and taking a hand of each, "My dear Sobieski," cried she, "why did you withhold the knowledge of this friendship from me! Had you told me that you and Mr. Somerset were acquainted, this happy meeting might have been accomplished sooner."

"Yes," replied Pembroke, turning to the countess, and wiping away the tears which were trembling on his cheek, "nothing could have given me pain at this moment but the conviction that he who was the preserver of my life, and my most generous protector, should in this country have endured the most abject distress, rather than let me know it was in my power to be grateful."

Thaddeus took out his handkerchief, and for a few moments concealed his face. The countess looked on him with tenderness; and believing he would sooner regain composure were be alone with his friend, she stole unobserved out of the room.

Pembroke affectionately resumed—"But I hope, dear Sobieski, you will never leave me more. I have an excellent father, who, when he is made acquainted with my obligations to you and your noble family, will glory in loving you as a son."

Having subdued "the woman in his heart," Thaddeus raised his head with an expression in his eyes far different from that which had chilled the blood of Pembroke on their first encounter.

"Circumstances," said he, "dear Somerset, have made me greatly injure you. A strange neglect on your side, since we separated at Villanow, gave the first blow to my confidence in your friendship.

Though I lost your direct address, I wrote to you often, and yet you persevered in silence. After having witnessed the destruction of all that was dear to me in Poland, and then of Poland itself, when I came to England I wished to give your faithfulness another chance; I addressed two letters to you; I even delivered the last at your door myself, and I saw you in the window when I sent it in."

"By all that is sacred," cried Pembroke, vehemently, and amazed, "I never saw any letter from you! I wrote you many. I never heard of these you mention. Indeed, I should even now have been ignorant of the Palatine's, and your mother's cruel fate, had it not been too circumstantially related in the newspapers."

"I believe you," returned Thaddeus, drawing an agonizing sigh at the dreadful picture which the last sentence recalled; "I believe you; though at the time of which I speak, I thought otherwise; for both my letters were reinclosed to me, in a blank cover, directed as if by your hand, and brought by a servant with a message that there was no answer."

"Amazing!" exclaimed Somerset; "there must be some villainy in this!—Dearest Thaddeus!” cried he, breaking off abruptly and grasping his hand, “I would have flown to you, had it been to meet death! But why did you not come in yourself? Who prevented you? Then no mistake could have happened. Why did you not come in yourself?”

“Because I was uncertain of your sentiments: my first letter remained unnoticed; and my heart, dear Somerset,” added he, pressing his hand, “would not stoop to solicitation.”

“Solicitation!” exclaimed Pembroke, with warmth, “you have a right to demand my life! But there is some rascally business in this affair; nothing else could have carried it through: if any of my servants have dared to open these letters—O Sobieski!” cried he interrupting himself, “how you must have despised me!”

“I was afflicted,” returned Thaddeus, “that the man whom my family so warmly loved could prove so unworthy; and afterward, whenever I met you in the streets, which I think was once or twice, I confess, to pass you cut me to the heart.”

“And you have met me?” exclaimed Pembroke, “and I not see you! I can not comprehend it.”

“Yes,” answered Thaddeus; “and the first time was going into the playhouse. I believe I called after you.”

“It is now ten months since,” returned Pembroke; “I remember very well that somebody called out my name while I was handing Lady Calthorpe and her sister into the porch. I looked about, and not seeing any one I knew, thought I must have been mistaken. But why, dear Sobieski, why did you not follow me into the theater?”

Thaddeus shook his head, and smiling languidly, “My poverty would not permit me,” replied he; “but I waited in the hall until every body left the house, in hopes of intercepting you as you passed.”

Pembroke sprung from his chair at these words, and with most vehement voice and action, exclaimed, “I see it! That nypocrite Loftus is at the bottom of it! He followed me into the theater; he must have seen you, and his cursed selfishness was alarmed. Yes, it must be he! He would not allow me to return that way; when I said I would, he told me a thousand lies about the carriages coming round; and, like a fool, I went out by another door."

"Who is Mr. Loftus?" inquired Thaddeus, surprised at his friend's suspicion; "I do not know the man."

"What!" returned Pembroke, walking about the room in a heat, "don't you remember that Loftus is the name of the scoundrel who persuaded me to volunteer against Poland? To screen his baseness I have brought all this upon myself."

"Now I recollect it," replied Thaddeus; "but I never saw him."

"Yet I am not less certain that I am right," replied Somerset; "I will tell you my reasons. After I quitted Villanow, you remember I met him at Dantzic. Before we left the port, he implored, almost on his knees, that in pity to his mother and his sisters whom he said he supported out of his salary, I would refrain from incensing my parents against him by relating any circumstance of our visit to Poland. The man shed tears as he spoke; and like a fool I consented to keep the secret till the vicar of Somerset (a poor soul, ill of the dropsy) dies, and he be in possession of the living. When we landed in England I found the cause of my sudden recall was the illness of my dear mother. But Heaven denied me the happiness of beholding her again: she had been buried two days before I reached the shore." Pembroke paused a moment, and then resumed—"For near a month after my return I could not quit my room; but on my recovery, I wrote both to you and to the palatine. I repeated my letters at least every six weeks during the first year of our separation; yet you persisted in being silent. Hurt as I was at this neglect, I believed that gratitude demanded some sacrifices from pride, and I continued to write even till the spring following. Meanwhile the papers of the day teemed with Sobieski's actions, Sobieski's fame; and supposing that increasing glory had blotted me out of your memory, I resolved thenceforth to regard our friendship as a dream, and never to speak of it more."

Confounded at this double misapprehension, Thaddeus, with a glowing countenance, expressed his regret for having doubted his friend; and repeating the assurance of having been punctual to his promise of correspondence even when he deemed him inconstant, acknowledged that nothing but a premeditated scheme could have effected so many disappointments.

"Ay," returned Pembroke, reddening with awakened anger; "I could swear that Mr. Loftus has all my letters in his bureau at this moment! No house ever gave a man a better opportunity to play the rogue in than ours. It is a custom with us to lay our letters every morning on the hall-table, whence they are sent to the office; and when the post arrives they are spread out in the same way that their several owners may take them as they pass to breakfast. From this management I can not doubt the means by which Mr. Loftus, under the hope of separating us forever, has intercepted every letter to you and every letter from you. I suppose the wretch feared I might repent my engagement if our correspondence were allowed. He trembled lest the business should be blown before the vicar died, and he in consequence lose both the expected living and his present situation about Lord Arun. A villain! for once he has judged rightly! I will unmask him to my father, and show him what it is to purchase subsistence at the expense of honor and justice."

Thaddeus who could not withhold immediate credit to these evidences of chicanery, tried to calm the violence of his friend; who only answered by insisting on having his company back with him to Somerset Castle.

“I long to present you to my father,” cried he: “when I tell him who you are, of your kindness to me, how rejoiced he will be! How happy, how proud to have you his guest; to show the grandson of the Palatine of Masovia the warm gratitude of a Briton’s heart! Indeed, Sobieski, you will love him; for he is generous and noble, like your inestimable grandfather. Besides,” added he, smiling with a sudden recollection, “there is my lovely cousin, Miss Beaufort, who I verily believe will fly into your arms!”

The blood rushed over the cheeks of Thaddeus at this speech of his friend; and half-suppressing a sigh, he shook his head.

“Don’t look so like an infidel,” resumed Somerset. “If you have any doubts of possessing her affections I can put you out of your pain by a single sentence! When Lady Dundas’s household, with myself among them (for little did I suspect I was joining the cry against my friend) were asserting the most flagrant instances of your deceit to Euphemia, Mary alone withstood the tide of malice, and compelled me to release you.”

“Gracious Providence!” cried Thaddeus, catching Pembroke’s hand, and looking eagerly and with agitation in his face, “was it you who came to my prison? Was it Miss Beaufort who visited my lodgings?”

“Indeed it was,” returned his friend, “and I blush for myself that I quitted Newgate without an interview. Had I followed the dictates of common decency I should have seen you; and then, what pain would have been spared my dear cousin! What a joyful surprise would have awaited myself!”

Thaddeus could only reply by pressing his friend’s hand. His brain whirled. He could not decide on the nature of his feelings; one moment he would have given worlds to throw himself at Miss Beaufort’s feet, and the next he trembled at the prospect of meeting her so soon.

“Dear Sobieski!” cried Pembroke, “how strangely you receive this intelligence! Is it possible the love of Mary Beaufort can be rejected?”

“No,” cried the count, his fine face flushed with emotion; “I adore Miss Beaufort. Her virtues possess my whole heart. But can I forget that I have only that heart to offer? Can I forget that I am a beggar? That even now I exist on her bounty?” The eyes of Thaddeus, and the sudden tremor which shook his frame finished this appeal to his fate.

Pembroke found it enter his soul. To hide its effect he threw himself on his friend’s breast, and exclaimed, “Do not injure me and my father by these sentiments! You are come, dearest Sobieski, to a second home. Sir Robert Somerset will consider himself ennobled in supplying the place of your lamented grandfather!—and my cousin Mary, as you love her, shall bind us still closer; you must be my relation as well as my friend.”

Thaddeus replied with animated acknowledgments of Pembroke’s affection:—“But,” added he, “I must not allow the generous spirit of my dear Somerset to believe that I can live a dependent on any power but the Author of my being. I consider nothing so degrading as an existence wasted in idleness; therefore, if Sir Robert Somerset will assist me to procure some honest means of acquiring support, I shall thank him from my soul. In no other way, my kindest friend, can I ever be brought to tax the gratitude of your father.”

Pembroke colored at this, and exclaimed in a voice of displeasure, “Gracious Heaven, Sobieski, what can you mean? Do you imagine that ever my father or myself can forget that you were little less than a prince in your own country? That when in such a high station you treated me like a brother? That you preserved me even when I lifted my arm against your life? Can we be such monsters as to forget all this? or to think that we acted justly by you in permitting you to la-for your bread? No, Thaddeus, my very soul spurns the idea. Your mother sheltered me as a son; and I insist that you allow my father to perform the same part by you! Besides, you shall not be idle; you may have a commission in the army, and I will follow you."

The count pressed the hand of his friend, and looking gratefully in his face, shook his head, and replied, "Had I a hundred tongues, my generous Pembroke, I could not express my sense of your friendship; it is indeed a cordial to my heart; it imparts to me an earnest of happiness which I thought had fled forever; but it shall not allure me from my principles. I am resolved not to live a life of indolence: and I am resolved at this period not to enter the British army. No," added he, emotion elevating his tone and manner, "rather would I toil for subsistence by the sweat of my brow than be subjected to the necessity of acting in concert with those ravagers who destroyed my country! I can not fight by the side of the Russians! I can not enlist under their allies! I will not be led out to devastation! Mine was, and ever shall be, a defensive sword; and should danger threaten England, I would be as ready to withstand her enemies as I ardently, though ineffectually, opposed those of unhappy Poland."

Pembroke recognized the high-souled Thaddeus of Warsaw in this lofty burst of enthusiasm; and aware that his father's munificence and manner of conferring esteem and obligations would go further toward removing these scruples than all his arguments, he did not attempt to combat a resolution which he knew he could not subdue; but tried to prevail with him to become his guest until something could be arranged to suit his wishes.

Thaddeus consented to accompany Somerset to the castle when Sir Robert had been apprised of his coming. Pembroke perceived the morning had surprised them; and shaking his friend warmly by the hand bade him farewell: then hastening down the hill he arrived at the Lodge as the dawn began to break.

At an early hour he gave orders to his groom, wrote a slight apology to Shafto for his abrupt departure, and mounting his horse, galloped away full of delight toward Somerset Castle.

CHAPTER XL.

NEXT morning when the countess and Thaddeus met at breakfast, she expressed surprise and pleasure at the scene of the preceding night; but intimated some mortification that he had withheld any part of his confidence from her. Sobieski soon obtained her pardon, by relating the manner of his first meeting with Mr. Somerset, and the consequent events of that momentous period.

Lady Tinemouth wept over the distressful fate that marked the residue of his narrative with a tenderness which endeared her to his soul. But when in compliance with his inquiries she informed him how it happened that she was at Harrowby Abbey when he supposed her to be on the Wolds, it was his turn to pity and to shudder at his consanguinity with Lord Harwold.

“Indeed,” added the countess, “you must have had a most tedious journey from Harwold Park to Harrowby; and nothing but my pleasure could exceed my astonishment when I met you last night on the hill.”

Thaddeus declared that traveling a few miles further than he intended was no fatigue to him; yet were it otherwise, the happiness which he then enjoyed would have acted as a panacea for worse ills, could he have seen her looking as well as when she left London.

Lady Tinemouth smiled. "You are right, Sobieski; I am worse than when I was in town. My solitary journey to Harwold harassed me much; and when my son sent me orders to leave it because his father wanted the place for the autumnal months, his capricious cruelty seemed to augment the hectic of my disorder. Nevertheless I obeyed him; and in great distress of heart arrived here last week. How kind you were to follow me! Who informed you of the place of my destination: hardly any of Lady Sophia's household?"

"No," returned Thaddeus; "I luckily had the precaution to inquire at the inn where the coach stopped, what part of Lord Tinemouth's family were at the park; and when I heard that the earl himself was there, my next question was, where then is the countess? The landlord very civilly told me of your having engaged a carriage from his house a day or two before to carry you to one of his lordship's seats within a few miles of Somerset Castle. Hence, from what I had heard you say of the situation of Harrowby, I concluded it must be the Abbey; and so I sought you at a venture."

"And I hope a happy issue," replied she, "will arise from your wanderings! This rencounter from so old a friend as Mr. Somerset is a pleasing omen. For my part I was ignorant of the arrival of the family at the castle until yesterday morning; and then I sent off a messenger to apprise my dear Miss Beaufort of my being in her neighborhood. To my great dissatisfaction Lady Shafto found me out immediately; and when, in compliance with her teasing invitation I walked down to sit an hour with her last night, little did I expect to meet the amiable cousin of our sweet friend. So delightful an accident has amply repaid me for the pain I endured in seeing Miss Dundas in her ladyship's house; an insolent and reproachful letter which she wrote to me on your account has rendered her an object of my most decided aversion."

Thaddeus smiled and bowed: "Since, my dear Lady Tinemouth, her groundless malice and Miss Euphemia's folly have failed in estranging either your confidence or the esteem of Miss Beaufort from me, I despise and pardon them both. Perhaps I ought to pity them; for is it not difficult to pass through the enchantments of wealth and adulation and emerge as pure as when we entered them? Unclouded fortune is, indeed, a trial of spirits; and how brightly does Miss Beaufort rise from the blaze! Surrounded by splendor, homage, and indulgence, she is yet all nature, gentleness, and virtue!"

The countess, who wished to appear cheerful, rallied him on the warmth of his expressions; and observing the day was fine invited him out to walk with her through the romantic though long neglected domains of the Abbey.

The family of Somerset were just drawn round the breakfast-table when they were agreeably surprised by the sudden entrance of Pembroke. During the repast Miss Beaufort repeated the contents of the note she had received the preceding day from Lady Tinemouth; and requested her cousin would be kind enough to drive her in his curricule that morning to Harrowby.

"I will, with pleasure," answered he. "I have seen her ladyship, and even supped with her last night."

"How came that?" asked Mrs. Dorothy.

"I shall explain it to my father, whenever he will honor me with an audience," returned he, addressing the baronet with all the joy of his heart looking out at his eyes; "will you indulge me, dear sir, by half an hour's attention?"

"Certainly," replied Sir Robert; "at present I am going into my study to settle my steward's books; but the moment I have finished I will send for you."

Mrs. Dorothy walked out after her brother, to attend her aviary; and Miss Beaufort remaining alone with her cousin made some inquiries about the countess's reasons for coming to the Abbey. "I know nothing about them," replied he, gayly, "for she went to bed almost the instant I entered the house. Too good to remain where her company was not wanted, she left me to enjoy a most delightful tête-à-tête with a dear friend from whom I parted four years ago. In short, we sat up the whole night together, talking over past scenes—and present ones too, for I assure you, you were not forgotten."

"I! what had I to do with it?" replied Mary, smiling: "I can not recollect any dear friend of yours whom you have not seen these four years."

"Well, that is strange!" answered Pembroke; "he remembers you perfectly; but true to your sex, you affirm what you please; though I know there is not a man in the world you prefer before him."

Miss Beaufort shook her head, laughed and sighed; and withdrawing her hand from his, threatened to leave him if he would not be serious.

"I am serious," cried he. "Would you have me swear that I have seen him whom you most wish to see?"

She regarded the expressions of his countenance with a momentary emotion; and taking her seat again, "You can have seen no man," said she, "that is of consequence to me! so whoever your friend may be I have only to congratulate you on a meeting which affords you so much delight."

Pembroke burst into a laugh at her composure. "So cold!" cried he, "so cautious! Yet I verily believe you would participate my delight were I to tell you who he is. However, you are such a skeptic that I won't hint even one of the many fine things he said of you."

She smiled incredulously.

"I could beat you, Mary," exclaimed he, "for this oblique way of saying I am telling lies! But I will have my revengo on your curiosity; for on my honor I declare," added he, emphatically, "that last night I met with a friend at Lady Tinemouth's, who four years ago saved my life; who entertained me several weeks in his house; and who has seen and adores you! 'Tis true; true, on my existence!—and what is more, I have promised that you will repay these weighty obligations by the free gift of this dear hand. What do you say to this, my sweet Mary?"

Miss Beaufort looked anxious at the serious and energetic manner in which he made these assertions; even the sportive kiss that ended the question did not dispel the gravity with which she prepared to reply.

Pembroke perceiving her intent, prevented her by exclaiming, "Cease, Mary, cease! I see you are going to make a false statement. Let truth prevail, and you will not deny that I am suing for a plighted faith. You will not deny who it was that softened and subdued your heart? You can not conceal from me that the wanderer Constantine possesses your affections?"

She reddened with pain and displeasure; and rising from her seat, "I did not expect this cruel, this ungenerous speech from you, Pembroke!" cried she, averting her tearful eyes. "What have I done to deserve so rude, so unfeeling a reproach?"

Pembroke threw his arm round her. "Come," said he, in a sportive voice, "don't be tragical. I never meant to reproach you, Mary: I dare say, if you gave your heart, it was only in return for his. I know you are a grateful girl; and, I verily believe, you won't find much difference between my friend, the young Count Sobieski, and the forlorn Constantine."

A suspicion of the truth flashed across Miss Beaufort's mind: unable to speak, she caught hold of her cousin's hands, and looking eagerly in his face, her eyes declared the question she would have asked.

Pembroke laughed triumphantly; but a servant entering to tell him Sir Robert was ready, he strained her to his breast and exclaimed, "Now I am revenged! Farewell! I leave you to all the pangs of doubt and curiosity!" He then flew out of the room with an arch glance at her agitated countenance, and hurried up stairs.

She clasped her trembling hands together, as the door closed on him. "O gracious Providence!" cried she, "what am I to understand by this mystery, this joy of my cousin's? Can it be possible that the illustrious Sobieski, and my condemned Constantine, are the same person?" A burning blush overspread her face and bosom, at the expression my which had escaped her lips.

While the graces, the sweetness, the dignity of Thaddeus captivated her notice, his sufferings, his virtues, and the mysterious interests which involved his history, fixed her attention and awakened her esteem. From these grounds the step is short to love. "When the mind is conquered, the heart surrenders at discretion." But she knew not that she had advanced too far to retreat, until the last scene at Dundas House, by forcing her to defend Constantine against the charge of loving her, made her confess to herself how much she wished the charge were true.

Poor and lowly as he seemed, she found that her whole heart and life were wrapped in his remembrance; that his worshiped idea was her most precious solace; her property, the dear treasure of her secret and supreme felicity. It was the companion of her walks, the monitor of her actions. Whenever she planned, whenever she executed, she asked herself, how would Constantine consider this? and accordingly did she approve or condemn her conduct; for she had heard enough from Mrs. Robson, to convince her that piety was the sure fountain of his virtues.

Though separated far from this idol of her memory, thus was the impression he had stamped on her heart ever present.

The shade of Laura visited the solitude of Vaucuse: the image of Constantine haunted the walks of Somerset. The loveliness of nature; its leafy groves, and verdant meadows; its blooming mornings, and luxuriant sunsets; the romantic shadows of twilight, or the soft glories of the moon and stars; as they pressed beauty and sentiment upon her heart, awoke it to the remembrance of Constantine; she saw his image, she felt his soul, in every object. Subtile and undefinable is that ethereal chord which unites our tenderest thoughts with their chain of association!

Before this conversation, in which Pembroke mentioned the name of Constantine with such badinage and ambiguity, he had never permitted him to be spoken of by Mary or his aunt, without declaring a displeasure nearly amounting to anger. Hence when he now so strangely altered his tone, Miss Beaufort necessarily concluded that he had seen, in the person of him she most valued, the man whose public character she had often heard him admire; and who, she now doubted not, had at some former period given him some private reason for calling him his friend. Before this time, she more than once had suspected, from the opinions which Somerset occasionally repeated respecting the affairs of Poland, that he could only have acquired so accurate a knowledge of its events by having visited the country itself. She mentioned her suspicion to Mr. Loftus: he denied the fact; and she had thought no more on the subject, until the present ambiguous hints of her cousin conjured up these doubts anew; and led her to suppose that if Pembroke had not disobeyed his father so far as to go to Warsaw, he must have met with the Count Sobieski in some other realm. The possibility that this young hero, of whom fame spoke so loudly, might be the mysterious Constantine, bewildered and delighted her. The more she compared what she had heard of the one with what she witnessed in the other, the more was she reconciled to the probability of her ardent hope. Besides, she could not for a moment believe that her cousin would so cruelly sport with her delicacy and peace, as to excite expectations he could not fulfill.

Agitated by a suspense which bordered on agony, with a beating heart, she heard his quick step descending the stairs. The door opened, and Pembroke flying into the room caught up his hat: as he was darting away again, unable to restrain her impatience, Miss Beaufort with an imploring voice ejaculated his name. He turned, and displayed to her amazed sight a countenance in which no vestige of his former animation could be traced; his cheek was flushed; and his eyes shot a wild fire that struck to her heart. Unconscious what she did, she ran up to him; but Pembroke, pushing her back, exclaimed, "Don't ask me any questions, if you would not drive me to madness."

"O Heaven!" cried she, catching his arm and clinging to him while the eagerness of his motion dragged her into the hall; "tell me! Has any thing happened to my guardian? to your friend? to Constantine?"

"No," replied he, looking at her with a face full of desperation; "but my father commands me to treat him like a villain."

She could hardly credit her senses at this confirmation that Constantine and Sobieski were one: turning giddy with the tumultuous delight that rushed over her soul, she staggered back a few paces, and leaning against the open door, tried to recover breath to regain the room she had left.

Pembroke, having escaped from her grasp, ran furiously down the hill, mounted his horse, and forbidding any groom to attend him, galloped toward the high road with the impetuosity of a madman. All the powers of his soul were in arms. Wounded, dishonored, stigmatized with ingratitude and baseness, he believed himself to be the most degraded of men.

It appeared that Sir Robert Somerset had long cherished a hatred to the Poles, in consequence of some injury he had received in early youth from one of that nation. In this instance, his dislike was implacable; and when his son set out for the Continent, he positively forbade him to enter Poland. Notwithstanding his remembrance of this violated injunction, when Pembroke joined the baronet in his library, he did it with confidence. With a bounding heart and animated countenance, he recapitulated how he had been wrought upon by his young Russian friends to take up arms in their cause, and march into Poland. At these last words his father turned pale, and though he did not speak, the denunciation on his brow was terrible.

Pembroke, who expected some marks of displeasure, hastened to obliterate his disobedience by narrating the event which had introduced not only the young Count Sobieski to his succor, but the consequent friendship of the whole of that princely family.

Sir Robert still made no verbal reply, but his countenance deepened in gloom; and when Pembroke, with all the pathos of grief, attempted to describe the calamitous death of the Palatine, the horrors which attended the last hours of the countess, and the succeeding misery of Thaddeus, who was now in England, no language can paint the frenzy which burst at once from the baronet. He stamped on the ground, he covered his face with his clinched hands; then turning on his son, with the most tremendous fury he exclaimed, "Pembroke! You have outraged my commands! O! never will I pardon you, if this young man ever blast me with his sight."

"Merciful Heaven!" cried Pembroke, thunderstruck at a violence, which he almost wished might proceed from real madness: "Surely something has agitated my father! What can this mean?"

Sir Robert shook his head, while his teeth ground against each other. "Don't mistake me," replied he in a firm voice. "I am perfectly in my senses. It depends on you that I continue so. You know my oath against all of that nation! and, I repeat again, if you ever bring that young man into my presence, you shall never see me more."

A cold dew overspread the body of Pembroke. He would have caught his father's hand, but he held it back. "O sir!" said he, "you surely can not intend that I shall treat with ingratitude the man who saved my life?"

Sir Robert did not vouchsafe him an answer, but continued walking up and down the room, until his agitation increasing at every step, he opened the door of an interior apartment and retired, bidding his son remain where he left him.

The horror-struck Pembroke waited a quarter of an hour, before his father re-entered. When he did appear, the deep gloom of his eye gave no encouragement to his son, who, hanging down his head, recoiled from speaking first. Sir Robert approached with a composed but severe countenance, and said, "I have been seeking every palliation that your conduct will admit, but I can find none. Before you quitted England, you knew well my abhorrence of Poland. One of that country, many years ago, wounded my happiness in a way I shall never recover. From that hour I took an oath never to enter its borders; and never to suffer one of its people to come within my doors. Rash, disobedient boy! You know my disposition, and you have seen the emotion with which this dilemma has shaken my soul! But be it on your own head, that you have incurred obligations which I can not repay. I will not perjure myself to defray a debt contracted against my positive and declared principles. I never will see this Polander you speak of; and it is my express command, on pain of my eternal malediction, that you break with him entirely."

Pembroke fell into a seat. Sir Robert proceeded.

"I pity your distress, but my resolution can not be shaken. Oaths are not to be broken with impunity. You must either resign him or resign me. We may compromise your debt of gratitude. I will give you deeds to put your friend in possession of five hundred pounds a year for life, forever; but, from the hour in which you tell him so, you must see him no more."

Sir Robert was quitting the room, when Pembroke starting from his chair, threw himself in agony on his knees, and catching by the skirt of his father's coat, implored him for God's sake to recall his words; to remember that he was affixing everlasting dishonor on his son! "Remember, dear sir!" cried he, holding his struggling hand, "that the man to whom you offer money as a compensation for insult, is of a nature too noble to receive it. He will reject it, and spurn me; and I shall know that I deserve his scorn. For mercy's sake, spare me the agony of harrowing up the heart of my preserver; of meeting reproach from his eyes!"

"Leave me!" cried the baronet, breaking from him; "I repeat, unless you wish to incur my curse, do as I have commanded."

Thus outraged, thus agonized, Pembroke had appeared before the eyes of his cousin Mary; more like a distracted creature than a man possessed of his senses. Shortly after his abrupt departure, her apprehension was petrified to a dreadful certainty of some cruel ruin to her hopes, by an order she received in the hand-writing of her uncle, commanding her not to attempt visiting Lady Tinemouth while the Count Sobieski continued to be her guest.

Hardly knowing whither he went, Pembroke did not arrive at the ruined aisle which leads to the habitable part of the abbey until near three o'clock. He inquired of the servant that took his horse whether the countess and Mr. Constantine were at home. The man replied in the affirmative; but added with a sad countenance, he feared neither of them could be seen.

“For what reason?” demanded Somerset.

“Alas! sir,” replied the servant, “about an hour ago, my lady was seized with a violent fit of coughing, which ended in the rupture of a blood vessel. It continued to flow so long that Mr. Constantine told the apothecary, whom he had summoned, to send for a physician. The doctor is not yet arrived; and Mr. Constantine won’t leave my lady.

Though Mr. Somerset was truly concerned at the illness of the countess, the respite it afforded him from immediately declaring the ungrateful message of Sir Robert, gave him no inconsiderable degree of ease. Some little relieved by the hope of being for one day spared the anguish of displaying his father in a disgraceful light, he entered the Abbey, and commissioned a maid-servant to inform Thaddeus he was below.

In a few minutes the girl returned with the following lines on a piece of paper:—

“I am grieved I can not see my dear Somerset to-day! I fear my revered friend is on her death-bed. I have sent for Dr. Cavendish, who is now at Stamford; doubtless you know he is a man of the first abilities. If human skill could preserve her, I might yet have hopes; but her disorder is a consumption, and its stroke is sure. I am now sitting by her bedside, and writing what she dictates to her husband, her son, and her daughter: painful, you may believe, is the task! I can not, my dear Somerset, add more than my hope of seeing you soon; and that you will join in prayers to Heaven for the restoration of my inestimable friend, with your faithful

“SOBIESKI.”

“Alas! unhappy, persecuted Sobieski!” thought Pembroke, as he closed the paper: “to what art thou doomed! Some friends are torn from thee by death; others desert thee in the hour of trouble.”

He took out his pencil to answer this distressing epistle, but he stopped at the first word; he durst not write that his father would fulfill any of these engagements, which he had so largely promised; and throwing away the pencil and the paper, he left a verbal declaration of his sorrow at what had happened, and an assurance of calling next day. Turning his back on a house which he had left in the morning with such animating hopes, he remounted his horse; and melancholy and slow, rode about the country until evening. So unwilling was he to return to that home, which now threatened him with the frowns of his father, the tears of Mary Beaufort, and the miserable reflections of his own wretched heart.

CHAPTER XLI.

DOCTOR CAVENDISH, not having quitted his friend at Stamford, set off for Harrowby the instant Mr. Constantine's messenger arrived; and before midnight alighted at the Abbey.

When he entered Lady Tinemouth's chamber, he found her supported in the arms of Thaddeus, and struggling with a second rupture of her lungs. As he approached the bed, Thaddeus turned his eyes on him with an expression that powerfully told his fears. Dr. Cavendish silently pressed his hand; then taking from his pocket some styptic drops, he made the countess swallow them, and soon saw that they succeeded in stopping the hemorrhage.

Thaddeus and his friend remained by the side of the suffering Lady Tinemouth until ten in the morning, when she sunk into a gentle sleep. Complete stillness being necessary to continue this repose, the doctor proposed leaving a maid to watch by her ladyship; and drawing the count out of the room, descended the stairs.

Mr. Somerset had been arrived half an hour, and met them in the breakfast-parlor. After a few kind words exchanged between the parties, they sat down with dejected countenances to their melancholy meal. Thaddeus was too much absorbed in the scene he had left to take any thing but a dish of coffee.

“Do you think Lady Tinemouth is in imminent danger?” inquired Pembroke of the doctor.

Dr. Cavendish sighed, and turning to Thaddeus, directed to him the answer which his friend’s question demanded. “I am afraid, my dear Constantine,” said he, in a reluctant voice, “that you are to sustain a new trial! I fear she can not live eight and forty hours.”

Thaddeus cast down his eyes and shuddered, but made no reply. Further remarks were prevented, by a messenger from the countess, who desired Mr. Constantine’s immediate attendance at her bedside. He obeyed. In half an hour he returned, with the tears yet wet on his cheek.

“Dearest Thaddeus!” cried Pembroke, “I trust the countess is not worse? This emotion of yours is too distressing: it afflicts my very heart.” Indeed it rent it; for Pembroke could not help internally acknowledging that when Sobieski should close the eyes of Lady Tinemouth he would be paying the last sad office to his last friend. That dear distinction he durst no longer arrogate to himself. Denied the fulfillment of its duties, he thought to retain the title would be an assumption without a right.

Thaddeus drew his hand over his again overflowing eyes. “The countess herself,” said he, “feels the truth of what Dr. Cavendish told us. She sent for me to beg that as I loved her, or would wish to see her die in peace, to devise some means of bringing her daughter to the Abbey to-night. As for Lord Harwold, she says his behavior since he arrived at manhood has been of a nature so cruel and unnatural that she would not draw on herself the misery nor on him the added guilt of a refusal: but with regard to Lady Albina, who has been no sharer in those barbarities, she trusts a daughter's heart might be prevailed on to seek a last embrace from a dying parent. It is this request," continued he, "that agitates me. When she pictured to me, with all the fervor of a mother, her doating fondness for this daughter (on whom, whenever she did venture to hope, all those hopes rested); when she wrung my hands and beseeched me, as if I had been the sole disposer of her fate, to let her see her child before she died; I could only promise every exertion to effect it: and with an aching heart I came to consult you."

Dr. Cavendish was opening his lips to speak, but Somerset, in his eagerness to relieve his friend, did not perceive it, and immediately answered: "This very hour I will undertake what you have promised. I know Lord Tinemouth's family are now at the Wolds. It is only thirty miles distant; I will send a servant to have relays of horses ready. My curriole, which is at the door, will be more convenient than a chaise; and I will engage to be back before to-morrow morning. Write a letter, Thaddeus," added he, "to Lady Albina; tell her of her mother's situation; and, though I never have seen the young lady, I will give it into her own hand; and bring her off directly, even were it in the face of her villainous father."

The pale cheeks of Sobieski were flushed with a momentary hectic; turning to Dr. Cavendish, he begged him, as the most proper person, to write to Lady Albina, while he walked out with his friend to order the carriage. Pembroke was thanked for his zeal, but it was not by words; they are too weak vehicles to convey strong impressions: Thaddeus pressed his hand, and accompanied the action with a look which spoke volumes. The withered heart of Pembroke expanded under the animating gratitude of his friend: and receiving the letter, he sprung into his seat; and until he lost sight of Harrowby Hall, forgot how soon he must appear to that friend the most ungrateful of men.

It was near four in the afternoon before Mr. Somerset left his curriole at the little inn which skirts the village of Harthorpe. He affected to make some inquiries respecting the families in the neighborhood; and his host informed him the ladies of the earl's family were great walkers, passing almost the whole of the day on the grounds. The measures to be adopted were now obvious. The paling belonging to Lord Tinemouth's park was only a few yards distant; but fearful of being observed, Pembroke sought a more obscure part; and, scaling a wall which was covered by the branches of high trees, he found his way to the house through an almost impassable thicket.

He watched two hours in vain for the appearance of Lady Albina, whose youth and elegance, he thought, would unequivocally distinguish her from the rest of the earl's household. Desponding of success, he was preparing to change his station when he heard a sound among the dry leaves, and the next moment a beautiful young creature passed the bush behind which he was concealed. The fine symmetry of her profile assured him that she must be the daughter of Lady Tinemouth. She stooped to gather a china-aster: knowing that no time should be lost, Pembroke gently emerged from his recess; but not in so quiet a manner as to escape the ear of Lady Albina, who, instantly looking round, screamed and would have fled had he not thrown himself before her and exclaimed, "Stay, Lady Albina! For Heaven's sake, stay! I come from your mother!"

She gazed fearfully in his face and tried to release her hand, which he had seized to prevent her flight.

"Do not be alarmed," continued he; "no harm is intended you. I am the son of Sir Robert Somerset; and the friend of your mother, who is now on the point of death. She implores to see you this night (for she has hardly an hour to live), to hear from your own lips that you do not hate her."

Lady Albina trembled dreadfully; and with faded cheeks and quivering lips replied, "Hate my mother! Oh, no! I have ever dearly loved her!"

A flood of tears prevented her speaking further; and Pembroke perceiving that he had gained her confidence, put the doctor's letter into her hand. The gentle heart of Lady Albina bled at every word which her almost blinded eyes perused; turning to Pembroke, who stood contemplating her lovely countenance with the deepest interest, she said, "Pray, Mr. Somerset, take me now to my mother. Were she to die before I arrive I should be miserable for life. Alas! alas! I have never been allowed to behold her! Never been allowed to visit London because my father knew that I believed my poor mother innocent, and would have seen her had it been possible."

Lady Albina wept violently as she spoke, and giving her hand to Pembroke, timidly looked toward the house and added, "You must take me this instant. We must hasten away in case we should be surprised. If Lady Sophia were to know that I have been speaking with any body out of the family I should be locked up for months."

Pembroke did not require a second command from his beautiful charge; but conducting her through the unfrequented paths by which he had entered, seated her in his curriole; and whipping his horses, set off, full gallop, toward the melancholy goal of his enterprise.

CHAPTER XLII.

WHILE the two anxious travelers were pursuing their sad journey, the inhabitants of the Abbey were distracted with apprehension that the countess would expire before their arrival. Ever since Lady Tinemouth received information that Mr. Somerset was gone to the Wolds, hope and fear agitated her by turns, till, wearied out with solicitude and expectation, she turned her dim eyes upon Thaddeus, and said, in a languid voice, "My dear friend, it must be near midnight. I shall never see the morning; I shall never in this world see my child. I pray you thank Mr. Somerset for all the trouble I have occasioned;—and my daughter, my Albina! O Father of mercies!" cried she, holding up her clasped hands, "pour all Thy blessings upon her head! she never wilfully gave this broken heart a pang!"

The countess had hardly ended speaking when Thaddeus heard a bustle on the stairs; suspecting that it might be the arrival of his friend, he made a sign to Dr. Cavendish to go and inquire. His heart beat violently while he kept his eye fixed on the door, and held the fainting pulse of Lady Tinemouth in his hand. The doctor re-entered, and in a low voice whispered, "Lady Albina is here."

The words acted like magic on the fading senses of the countess; with preternatural strength she started from her pillow, and catching hold of Sobieski's arm with both hers, cried, "Oh! give her to me while I have life."

Lady Albina appeared, led in by Pembroke, but instantly quitting his hand, with an agonizing shriek she rushed toward the bed, and flung herself into the extended arms of her mother. Those arms closed on her, and the head of the countess rested on her bosom.

Dr. Cavendish perceived by the struggles of the young lady that she was in convulsions; and taking her off the bed, he consigned her to Pembroke and Thaddeus, who carried her into another apartment: he remained to assist the countess.

Albina was removed; but the eyes of her amiable and injured mother were never again unclosed: she had breathed her last sigh in grateful ecstasy on the bosom of her daughter; and Heaven had taken her spotless soul to itself.

Being convinced that the countess was indeed no more, the good doctor left her remains in charge with the women; and repairing to the adjoining room, found Lady Albina yet senseless in the arms of his two friends. She was laid on a sofa, and Cavendish was pouring some drops into her mouth, when he descried Thaddeus gliding out of the room: desirous to spare him the shock of suddenly seeing the corpse of one whom he loved so truly, he said, "Stop, Mr. Constantine! I conjure you, do not go into the countess's room!"

The eyes of Thaddeus turned with quickness on the distressed face of the physician; one glance explained what the doctor durst not speak; and hastily saying, "I shall obey you," he hurried from the chamber.

In the count's rapid descent from Lady Albina's room to the breakfast parlor, he too plainly perceived by the tears of the servants that he had now another sorrow to add to his accumulated load. He darted from the clamorous laments of these honest people into the parlor, and shutting the door, threw himself on a sofa; but rest induced thought, and thought harrowed up his soul. He started from his position; he paced the room in a paroxysm of anguish; he would have given worlds for one tear to relieve his oppressed heart. Ready to suffocate, he threw open a window and leaned out. Not a star was visible to light the darkness; the wind blew freshly; and with parched lips he inhaled it as the reviving breath of heaven.

He was sitting on the window-seat, with his head leaning against the casement, when Pembroke entered unobserved: walking up to him, he laid his hand upon his arm, and ejaculated in a tremulous voice, "Thaddeus, dear Thaddeus!"

Thaddeus rose at the well-known sounds; they reminded him that he was not yet alone in the world; and throwing himself upon the bosom of Mr. Somerset, he exclaimed, "Heaven has still reserved thee, my dear Pembroke, to be my comforter! In thy friendship," added he, wiping away the tears which relieved his bursting heart, "I shall find an affection, similar with those which are gone forever: my friend, my brother! you are the last cord that binds me to the world."

Pembroke received the embrace of his friend; he felt his tears upon his cheek; but he could neither return the one, nor sympathize with the other. The conviction that he was soon to sever that cord; that he was to deprive the man who had preserved his life, of the only stay of his existence, and to abandon him to despair, struck to his soul; and grasping the hand of his friend, he gazed at his averted and dejected features with a look of desperate horror. "Sobieski," cried he, "whatever may happen, never forget that I swear that I love you dearer than my life! And when I am forced to abandon my friend, I shall not be long of abandoning what will then be worthless to me."

Not perceiving the frenzied look which accompanied this energetic declaration, Thaddeus gave no other meaning to the words than a renewed assurance of his friend's affection.

The entrance of Dr. Cavendish disturbed the two young men, to whom he communicated the increased indisposition of Lady Albina.

"The shock she has received," said he, "has so materially shaken her frame, I have ordered her to bed and administered an opiate which I hope will procure her repose:—and you, my dear sir," added he, addressing the count, "you had better seek rest! The stoutest constitution must sink under what you have lately endured. Pray, allow Mr. Somerset and myself to prevail with you, on our accounts, if not on your own, to retire for half an hour!"

Thaddeus, in disregard of his personal comfort, never infringed on that of others; he felt that he could not sleep, but he knew it would gratify his benevolent friends to suppose that he did; and accordingly he went to a room, and throwing himself on a bed, lay for an hour, ruminating on all that had passed.

There is an omnipresence in thought, or a celerity producing nearly the same effect, which brings within the short space of a few minutes, the images of many foregoing years. In almost the same moment, Thaddeus reflected on his strange meeting with the countess; her melancholy story; her forlorn death-bed; the fatal secret that her vile husband and son were his father and brother; and that her daughter whom his warm heart acknowledged as a sister, was with him under the same roof, and, like him, the innocent inheritor of her father's shame.

While these multifarious and painful meditations were agitating his perturbed mind, Dr. Cavendish found repose on a couch; and Pembroke Somerset, resolving once more to try the influence of entreaty on the hitherto generous spirit of his father, with mingled hope and despondency commenced a last attempt to shake his fatal resolution.

“TO SIR ROBERT SOMERSET, BART., SOMERSET CASTLE.

“I have not ventured into the presence of my dear father since he uttered the dreadful words which I would give my existence to believe I had never heard. You denounced a curse upon me if I opposed your will, to have me break all connection with the man who preserved my life! When I think on this ; when I remember that it was from you I received a command, so inexplicable from one of your character ; so disgraceful to mine ; I am almost mad :—and what I shall be, should you by repeating your injunctions, force me to obey them, Heaven only knows ! but I am certain that I can not survive the loss of my honor ; I can not survive the sacrifice of all my principles to virtue ; which such conduct must forever destroy.

“ Oh, my father ! I conjure you, reflect, before, in compliance with an oath it was almost guilt to make, you decree your only son to everlasting shame and remorse ! Act how I will, I shall never be happy more. I can not live under your malediction ; and should I give up my friend, my conscience will reproach me every instant of my existence. Can I draw the breath which he prolonged and cease to remember that I have abandoned him to want and misery ? It were vain to flatter myself that he will condescend to escape either by the munificence which you offer as a compensation for your friendship. No ; I can not believe that his sensible and independent nature is so changed ; circumstances never had any power over the nobility of his soul.

“ Misfortune, which threw the Count Sobieski on the bounty of England, can not make him appear otherwise in my eyes than as the idol of Warsaw, whose smile was honor, and whose friendship conferred distinction.

“ Though deprived of the splendor of command ; though the eager circle of friends no longer cluster round him, though a stranger in this country and without a home ; though in place of an equipage and retinue, he is followed by calamity and neglect ; yet, in my mind, I still see him in a car of triumph : I see not only the opposer of his nation’s enemies, but the vanquisher of his own desires ; I see the heir of a princely house, who, when mankind have deserted him, is yet encompassed by his virtues ; I see him, though cast out from a hardened and unjust society, still surrounded by the lingering spirits of those who were called to better worlds!

“And this is the man, my dear father (whom I am sure, had he been of any other country than Poland, you would have selected from all other men to be the friend and example of your son), this is he whom you command me to thrust away!

“I beseech you to examine this injunction! I am now writing under the same roof with him: it depends on you, my ever revered father, whether I am doing so for the last time; whether this is the last day in which your son is to consider himself a man of honor; whether he is henceforth to be a wretch overwhelmed with shame and sorrow!

“I have not yet dared to utter one word of your cruel orders to my unhappy friend; he is now retired to seek some rest, after the new anguish of having witnessed the almost sudden death of Lady Tinemouth. Should I have to tell him that he is to lose me too—but I can not add more. Your own heart, my father, must tell you that my soul is on the rack until I have an answer to this letter.

“Before I shut my paper, let me implore you on my knees! whatever you may decide, do not hate me; do not load my breaking heart with a parent’s curse! Whatever I may be, however low and degraded in my own eyes, still that I have sacrificed what is most precious to me, to my father, will impart the only consolation which will then have power to reach your dutiful and afflicted son,

“P. SOMERSET.

“Harrowby Abbey, five o’clock in the morning.”

Dr. Cavendish remained in a profound sleep, while Pembroke, with an aching heart having written the above letter and dispatched it by a man and horse, tried to compose him self to half an hour's forgetfulness of life and its turmous; but he found his attempts as ineffectual as those of his friend.

Thaddeus found no repose on his restless pillow. Reluctant to disturb the doctor and Somerset, who, he hoped, having less cause for regret, were sleeping tranquilly, he remained in bed, but he longed for morning. To his irritated nerves any change of situation seemed better than the state in which he was, and with some gleams of pleasure he watched the dawn, and the rising of the sun behind the opposite hill. He got up, opened the window, and looking out saw a man throw himself off a horse, which was all in a foam, and enter the house.

Surprised at this circumstance he descended to the parlor, where he found the man; who being Pembroke's messenger, had returned express from the castle, bearing an order from Sir Robert (who was taken alarmingly ill) that his son must come back immediately.

Dismayed with this new distress, Mr. Somerset pressed the count so closely to his breast when he bade him farewell that a more suspicious person might have apprehended it was a final parting: but Thaddeus discerned nothing more in the anguish of his friend's countenance than fear for the safety of Sir Robert; and fervently wishing his recovery, he bade Pembroke remember that should more assistance be necessary, Dr. Cavendish would remain at the Abbey until Lady Albina's return to the Wolds.

Mr. Somerset being gone; toward noon, when the count was anxiously awaiting the appearance of the physician from the room of the new invalid, he was surprised by the abrupt entrance of two gentlemen. He rose, and bowing, inquired their business? The elder of the men, with a fierce countenance and voice of thunder, announced himself to be the Earl of Tinemouth, and the other his son.

“We are come,” continued he, standing at a haughty distance; “we are come to carry from this nest of infamy Lady Albina Stanhope, whom some one of her mother’s paramours—perhaps you, sir—dared to steal from her father’s house yesterday evening. And I am come to give you that chastisement which your audacity deserves.”

With difficulty the Count Sobieski suppressed the passions which were rising in his breast. He turned a scornful glance on the person of Lord Harwold (who, with an air of insufferable derision, was coolly measuring his figure through an eye-glass); and then replying to the earl, said, in a firm voice, “My lord, whoever you suppose me to be it matters not; I now stand in the place of Lady Tinemouth’s executor; and to my last gasp I will prove myself the defender of her injured name.”

“Her lover!” interrupted Lord Harwold, turning on his heel.

“Her defender, sir!” repeated Thaddeus with a tremendous frown; “and shame and sorrow will pursue that son who requires a stranger to supply his duty.”

“Wretch!” cried the earl, forgetting his assumed loftiness, and advancing passionately toward Thaddeus with his stick held up; how dare you address such language to an English nobleman?”

“By the right of Nature, which holds her laws over all mankind,” returned he, calmly looking on the raised stick. “When an English nobleman forgets that he is a son he deserves reproach from his meanest vassal.”

“You see, my lord,” cried Harwold, sliding behind his father, “what we bring on ourselves by harboring these democratic foreigners! Sir,” added he, addressing himself to Thaddeus, “your dangerous principles shall be communicated to the alien-office! Such traitors ought to be hanged.”

Sobieski eyed the enraged little lord with contempt; and turning to the earl, who was again going to speak, he said in an unaltered tone, "I can not guess, Lord Tinemouth, what is the reason of this attack on me. I came hither by accident, I found the countess ill; and, from respect to her excellent qualities, I remained with her until her eyes were closed forever. She desired to see her daughter before she died. What human heart could deny a mother such a request? and my friend Pembroke Somerset undertook to bring Lady Albina to the Abbey."

"Pembroke Somerset!" echoed the earl. "A pretty guard for my daughter, truly! I have no doubt that he is just such a fellow as his father; just such a person as yourself! I am not to be imposed on: I know Lady Tinemouth to have been a disgrace to me; and you to be that German adventurer on whose account I sent her from London."

Surprised at this calumny on the memory of a woman whose fame from any other mouth came as unsullied as purity itself, Thaddeus gazed with horror at the furious countenance of the man whom he believed to be his father. His heart swelled: but not deigning to reply to a charge as unmanly as it was false, he calmly took out of his pocket two letters which the countess had dictated to her husband and her son.

Lord Harwold tore his open, cast his eyes over the first words, then crumpling it in his hand threw it from him, exclaiming, "I am not to be frightened either by her arts or the falsehoods of the fellows with whom she dishonored her name."

Thaddeus, no longer master of himself, sprung toward this unnatural son, and seizing his arm with the strength of a Hercules, "Lord Harwold!" cried he, in a dreadful voice, "were it not that I have some mercy on you for the parent's sake to whom, like a parricide, you are giving a second death by such murderous slander, I would resent her wrongs at the hazard of your worthless life!"

"My lord! my lord!" cried the trembling Harwold, quaking under the gripe of Thaddeus, and shrinking from the terrible brightness of his eyes; "my lord! my lord, save me!"

The earl, almost suffocated with rage, called out, "Ruffian! let go my son!" and again raising his arm aimed a blow at the head of Thaddeus, who wrenching the stick out of the foaming lord's hand, snapped it in two, and threw the pieces out of the window.

Lord Harwold took this opportunity to ring the bell violently; on which summons two of his servants entered the room.

"Now, you low-born, insolent scoundrel," cried the disarmed earl, stamping with his feet, and pointing to the men who stood at the door; "you shall be turned by the neck and heels out of this house. Richard, James, collar the fellow instantly."

Thaddeus only extended his arm to the men (who were looking confusedly on each other) and calmly said, "If either of you attempt to obey this command of your lord, you shall have cause to repent it."

The men retreated. The earl repeated his orders.

"Rascals! do as I command, or instantly quit my service. I will teach you," added he, clinching his fist at the count, who stood resolutely and serenely before him, "I will teach you how to behave to a man of high birth."

The footmen were again deterred from approaching by a glance from the intimidating eyes of Thaddeus; who, turning with stern dignity to the storming earl, "You can teach me nothing about high birth," said he, "that I do not already know. Could it be of any independent benefit to a man, then had I not received the taunts and insults which you have dared to cast upon me."

At that moment, Dr. Cavendish having heard a bustle, made his appearance. Amazed at the sight of two strangers, who, from their enraged countenances and the proud elevation with which Thaddeus was standing between them, he rightly judged to be the earl and his son; he advanced toward his friend, intending to support him in the attack which he saw was menaced by the violent gestures of his visitors.

“Dr. Cavendish,” said Thaddeus, speaking to him as he approached, “your name must be a passport to the confidence of any man; I therefore shall gratify the husband of my ever-lamented friend by quitting this house; but I delegate to you the office with which she intrusted me. I leave you in charge of her sacred remains; and of the jewels which you will find in her apartment. She desired the half of them might be given, with her blessing, to her daughter; and the other half, with her pardon, to her son.”

“Tell me, Dr. Cavendish,” cried the earl, as Thaddeus was passing him to leave the room; “who is that insolent fellow? By Heaven, he shall smart for this!”

“Ay, that he shall,” added Lord Harwold, “if I have any interest with government.”

Dr. Cavendish was preparing to speak, when Thaddeus, turning round, at this last threat of the viscount's, said, “If I did not know myself to be as high above Lord Harwold as heaven is above the earth, perhaps he might provoke me to treat him as he merits; but I spurn such resentment, as I despise him. For you, my lord,” added he, addressing the earl with an agitated countenance, “there is an angel in heaven who pleads against the insults you have obstinately heaped upon an innocent man.”

Thaddeus disappeared as he uttered the last word; and, hastening from the house and park, stopped at a farmer's cottage, near the brow of the hill. The owners of this humble little place being the parents of one of Lady Tinemouth's maids, gladly welcomed the so highly praised Mr. Constantine; and offered him the command of their house, until he might find it convenient to quit the neighborhood.

Any prospect of repose promised elysium to him; with harassed and torn nerves he took possession of an apartment which looked down upon the road that led from the Abbey to the town. The rapidity of the late events bewildered his senses like the illusions of a dream. He had seen his father, his brother, his sister; and most probably he had parted from them forever! At least he hoped that he should never again be tortured with the sight of Lord Tinemouth or his son.

“How!” thought he, while he walked up and down his solitary apartment, “how could the noble nature of my mother love such a man? And how could he have held so long an empire over the pure heart of the countess?”

Over and over again he asked himself the question, but could return no answer. He could nowhere discern in the bloated visage and passionate gestures of the earl any of that beauty of countenance or grace of manners which had alike charmed Therese Sobieski, and the tender Adeliza. Like those hideous chasms which are dug deep in the land, by the impetuous sweep of a torrent—the course of violent passions leaves vast and irreparable traces in the soul and on the features. So it was with Lord Tinemouth.

“How legibly does vice or virtue,” ejaculated Thaddeus, “write itself on the countenance! The earl’s figure and face may have been fine, but the lineaments of profligacy have now degraded every part of him. Good God! can he be my father? Can it be his blood that is now running in my veins? Can it be his blood that rises at this moment with detestation against him?”

Before the sun set Thaddeus was aroused from these painful soliloquies by still more painful emotions; he saw from his window a hearse driving at full gallop up the road which ascended to the Abbey; and presently return with a more equal pace, followed by a postchaise and the earl’s coach.

“Inhuman wretches!” cried Thaddeus, leaning out of the window; and pursuing with his eye the tips of the sable plumes, as the cavalcade wound round the road; "could you not allow this poor corse a little rest? Must her injuries be extended to the grave? Must her cold relics be insulted, be hurried to the tomb without reverence, without decency?"

The noble heart of Thaddeus was convulsed with horror at this climax of the earl's barbarity. Dr. Cavendish entered: he spoke of the perpetrators of an act which he deemed sacrilege against the dead; but Thaddeus could not bear the subject; and he interrupted him by inquiring how Lady Albina had borne the removal of her mother's remains.

"Very ill," returned the doctor; "and though I warned the earl, that to compel her ladyship to follow the hearse would be at the peril of her life, yet he would not be softened. He put her into the coach in a state of insensibility; and then loaded with the secret curses of every honest heart, I saw him set off in a postchaise, which was already occupied by his detestable son. Heaven's malediction must follow them!"

The doctor pursued the subject. Sobieski's wearied spirits heard him with patience; for nothing could now be said to increase an abhorrence which had reached its height. He acknowledged to himself that he hated the earl; and in gloomy silence he listened to these new crimes recounted by his friend.

In the midst of this depressing conversation a courier arrived from Dr. Cavendish's Stamford patient, desiring that he would return immediately, the gentleman having suffered a relapse. Cavendish, with some reluctance to quit the count (whom he still knew by no other name than Constantine), ordered the chaise to the door. He shook hands with Thaddeus; requested he would let him hear from him; and bidding him many affectionate adieus, looked out of the carriage window until the faint light of the moon and the receding glimmer of the cottage-candles failed to make the little spot which contained his friend even discernible.

CHAPTER XLIII.

For the first time during many nights Thaddeus slept soundly ; but his dreams were disturbed ; and he awoke from them at an early hour unrefreshed and in much fever.

The simple breakfast which his cottage host and hostess set before him was hardly touched. Their nicely drest dinner met with the same fate. He was ill, and possessed neither appetite nor spirits to eat. The good people being too civil to intrude upon him, he sat alone in his window from eight o'clock (at which hour he had arisen) until the cawing of the rooks, as they returned to the Abbey woods, reminded him of the approach of evening. He was uneasy at the absence of Somerset ; not so much on his own account as on that of Sir Robert, whose increased danger might have occasioned this delay ; however, he hoped otherwise. Longing earnestly for a temporary asylum under the roof of his friend, he trusted that the sympathy of Pembroke would heal all his wounds, and fit him (if it were required) yet further to brave the buffets of adverse fortune. Nor was Miss Beaufort forgotten. If ever one idea more than another sweetened the bitterness of his reflections, it was the remembrance of the lovely Mary. Whenever her image rose before him, whether he was standing with folded arms, and looking with vacant gaze on the valley beneath ; or when, cast upon his watchful pillow, he opened his aching eyes to the morning light ; still, as her beautiful figure presented itself to his mind, he sighed ; but it was a sigh laden with balm ; it did not tear his breast like those which were wrung from him by the hard hand of calamity and insult ; it was the soft breath of love, which makes man dream of heaven while it betrays him to the grave. Thaddeus thought it delightful to recollect how she had locked on him ; it was happiness to know that he owed his liberty to her ; and the anticipation that he should again dwell in her smiles, again draw bliss from her eyes, swelled, agitated, and intoxicated his soul.

“ Sweet Mary,” murmured he, “ I shall see thee once more ! I shall again experience thy kindness ! I will thank thee with my heart, and think myself blest in being allowed the privilege of loving thee in silence and forever.”

The sight of Pembroke riding through the farmer’s fields, toward the cottage, agreeably recalled the wandering mind of Sobieski. He went out to meet him ; Mr. Somerset, putting his horse on a gallop, was at his friend’s side, and had alighted before he could cross the first meadow. Thaddeus inquired after the baronet’s health. Pembroke answered the question with an incoherency devoid of all meaning. Thaddeus looked at him with surprise. They walked toward the house, but Pembroke did not recover himself ; and his absence of mind, and the wild rambling of his eyes, whenever he was spoken to, were so striking, that Thaddeus could have no doubt of some dreadful accident.

As soon as they entered the little parlor, Pembroke threw himself into a chair, and throwing off his hat, wiped away the perspiration which, though a cold October evening, was streaming down his forehead. Thaddeus endured a suspense almost too painful to be borne.

“ What is the matter, dear Pembroke ? Is any you love ill ?”

“ No, no,” returned he : “ every body is well, excepting myself, and my father, who, I verily believe, has lost his senses ; at any rate he will drive me mad.”

The manner in which this reply was uttered, astonished Thaddeus so much that he could only gaze with wonder on the convulsed features of his friend. Pembroke observed his amazement, and laying his hand on his arm, “ My dear, dear Sobieski!" said he, "what do I not owe to you? Good Heaven, how humbled am I, in your sight! But there is a power above who knows how intimately you are woven with every artery of this heart."

"I believe it, my kind Pembroke," cried Thaddeus, yet more alarmed than before: "tell me what it is that distresses you? If my counsel, or my sympathy, can offer any thing to comfort or assist you, you know I am your own."

Pembroke burst into tears, and covering his streaming eyes with his handkerchief, exclaimed, "I am indeed distressed; distressed even beyond your comfort. Oh! how can I speak it! You will despise my father, Thaddeus! You will spurn me!"

"Impossible," cried he, with energy; though his flushed cheek, and fainting heart, immediately declared that he had anticipated what he must hear.

"I see," cried Pembroke, regarding the altered features of his friend, with a glance of agony; "I see that you think it is possible that my father can sink me below my own contempt."

The benumbing touch of ingratitude ran through the veins of Thaddeus; his frame was chilled, was petrified: but his just affection, and calmed countenance, proclaimed how true a judgment he had passed on the whole. He took the burning hand of Mr. Somerset in his own hand, and with a steady consoling voice, said, "Assure yourself, dear Pembroke, whatever be the commands of your father, I shall adhere to them. I can understand by these generous emotions, that he objects to receive me as your friend. Perhaps," added he, a flash of suspicion gleaming through his mind; "perhaps Miss Beaufort may have perceived the devotedness of my heart, and disdain my——"

"Hush, for Heaven's sake!" cried Pembroke, starting from his chair; "do not implicate my poor cousin! Do not add to her disappointment the misery that you suspect her! No, Thaddeus," continued he, in a calmer tone, "Mary Beaufort loves you: she confessed it in an agony of grief on my bosom, just before I came away; and only through her, I dare ever expect to meet forgiveness from you. In spite of my father, you may marry her. She has no curse to dread; she need not sacrifice all that is most precious in her sight to the obstinate caprice of criminal resentment."

"A curse!" reiterated Thaddeus. "How is this! what have I done to deserve such hatred from your father?"

"Oh! nothing," cried Pembroke, "nothing. My father never saw you. My father thanks you for all that you have done for me; but it is your country that he hates. Some Polander, years back, injured him; and my father took a fatal oath against the whole nation. He declares that he can not, he will not break it, were he by so doing to save his own life, or even mine; for (Heaven forgive me!) I was this morning wrought up to such frenzy that I threatened to destroy myself rather than sacrifice my gratitude and honor to his cruel commands! Nay, to convince you that his is no personal enmity to yourself, he ordered me to give you writings, which will put you in possession of five hundred a year forever. I have them with me."

All the pride of his princely house rose at once in the breast of Thaddeus. Though full of indignation at this insult of Sir Robert's, he regarded the averted face of his friend with compassion, while in a firm voice he rejected the degrading compromise.

"Tell your father," added he, addressing Pembroke in a tone which even his affection could not soften from a command, "that my absence is not to be bought with money, nor my friendship so rewarded."

Pembroke covered his burning face with his hands. This sight at once brought down the haughty spirit of the count who continued in gentler accents; "Whatever be the sentiments of Sir Robert Somerset, they shall meet with due attention from me. He is your father, therefore I respect him; but he has put it out of his power to oblige me: I can not accept his bounty. Though your heart, my dearest Pembroke, is above all price, yet I will make it a sacrifice to your duty." And by so doing, put the last seal on my misfortunes! was the meaning of the heavy sigh which accompanied his last words.

Pembroke traversed the room in an agony. "Merciful Providence!" cried he, wringing his clasped hands, "direct me! O Thaddeus, if you could read my tortured heart, you would pity me; you would see that this affair is tearing my soul from my body. What am I to do? I can not, I will not, part with you forever."

The count went up to him, and drew him to a seat:—"Be satisfied," said he, "that I am convinced of your affection. Whatever may happen, this assurance will be sufficient to give me comfort; therefore, by that affection, I entreat you, dear Pembroke, not to bring regret to me, and reproach on yourself, by disobeying the will of your father! If we separate for life, remember, my beloved friend that the span of our existence here is short; we shall meet again in a happier world perhaps more blest for having immolated our wishes to hard duty in this."

"Cease, Sobieski, cease!" cried Pembroke: "I can draw no consolation from this reasoning. It is not duty to obey a hatred little short of distraction; and if we now separate, I feel that I shall never know peace again. Good Heaven! what comfort can I find when you are exposed to all the indignities which the world levels against the unfortunate? Can I indulge in the luxuries of my father's house when I know that you have neither a home nor subsistence? No, Thaddeus, I am not such a villain. I will not give you up, though my father should load me with curses;—I trust there is a just power above who would avert them.”

Perceiving that argument would not only be fruitless, but might probably incense his friend's irritated nature to the commission of some rash action, Thaddeus pretended to overlook the frantic gesture and voice which terminated this speech; and assuming a serene air, replied—“Let this be the subject of future conversation. At present I must conjure you, by the happiness of us both, to return to the castle. You know my message to Sir Robert. Present my respects to your aunt; and,” added he, after a pause, “assure Miss Beaufort, that while I have life, her goodness will be its most animating principle.”

Pembroke interrupted him. “Why these messages, dear Thaddeus? Do not suppose, though I fulfill my father's order to return to Somerset to-night, that it is our separation. Gracious Heaven! Is it so easy to part forever?”

“Not forever! Oh no,” replied Thaddeus, grasping his hand “we shall see each other again; only, meanwhile repeat these messages to your aunt and cousin. Go, my dear Pembroke, to your father; and may the Lord of Heaven bless you!”

The last words were spoken in almost a stifled voice, as he opened his arms, and strained his friend to his breast.

“I shall see you to-morrow,” cried Pembroke; “on no other condition I leave you now.”

Thaddeus made no further answer to this demand (which he determined should never be granted) than a second embrace. Pembroke went out of the room to order his horses; then returning, he stood at the door, and holding out his hand to the count, said, “Farewell till to-morrow.” Thaddeus shook it warmly, and he disappeared.

The outward gate closed after his friend, but the count remained on the seat into which he had thrown himself. He did not venture to move, lest he should by chance catch a second glance of Pembroke from the window. Now that he was gone he acknowledged the full worth of what he had relinquished. He had resigned a man who loved him; one who had known and revered his ever-lamented grandfather, and his mother; the only one with whom he could have discoursed of their virtues! He had severed the link which united his present state with his former fortunes! and throwing his arms along a table that stood near him, he leaned his aching head upon them, and in idea followed with a bleeding heart the progress and reception of his friend at the castle.

The racking misery which tortured the mind of Mr. Somerset, was not borne with equal resignation. Conscious of his having inflicted fresh wounds on the breast of his noble friend, his spirits were so ill adapted to society that he was pleased rather than disappointed when he found the supper room at the castle quite vacant, and only one cover on the table awaiting his arrival.

He asked a few questions of the servants, who informed him it was past twelve o'clock; and that Sir Robert, who was worse, had retired to bed early in the evening.

“And where are my aunt and cousin?” demanded Pembroke.

One of the men replied that in consequence of Miss Beaufort's having been suddenly indisposed, both the ladies left the room before eleven. Pembroke readily guessed the cause of this disorder: he too truly ascribed it to Mary's anxiety respecting the reception which the Count Sobieski would give to his disgraceful errand; and sighing bitterly, he said no more, but went to his chamber.

The restless state of his mind awoke Mr. Somerset betimes. Anxious for the success of an application which he intended to make to Miss Beaufort, he traversed the terrace for an hour before he was summoned to breakfast. The baronet continuing unwell, the ladies only were in the parlor when he entered. Mrs. Dorothy, who had learned the particulars of the late events from her niece, longed to ask Pembroke how his friend would act on her brother's command; but every time she moved her lips, his inflamed eye and wan countenance made her stop, and fear to venture on the subject. Mary sat in mute dejection, watching the agitation of her cousin; and when he rose to leave the room, she looked wistfully toward him. Pembroke turned at the same moment, and holding out his hand to her, "Come, Mary," said he, "I want to say something to you. Will you walk with me on the terrace?"

With trepidation and a beating heart Miss Beaufort took his arm, and proceeded in silence until they reached the gravel-walk. A mutual and deep-drawn sigh was the first opening of a conversation on which the souls of both hung with interest, hope, and dread. Pembroke was the first who spoke.

"My dear, dear Mary," said he, "you are now my sole dependence. From what I told you yesterday of my father's inflexibility, we can have no hope of his relenting; indeed, after what has passed, I could not flatter myself that Thaddeus Sobieski would now submit to an obligation at his hands. Already he has refused, with all the indignation I expected, Sir Robert's offer of an annuity. My dear cousin, how can I exist, and yet witness this noble friend in distress, and living without the succor of my friendship? Heaven knows, this must be the case; for I would sooner perish than venture to insult the man my father has treated so ill with any pecuniary offers from me! Therefore, dear girl, it is on you alone that I depend. Thaddeus adores you, and you love him. Marry him, my beloved cousin," cried Pembroke, pressing her hand to his lips, "and relieve my heart from a load of misery! Be generous, my sweet Mary," added he, supporting her now trembling frame against his breast, "act up to your noble nature and offer him, by me, that hand, which his calamities and disinterestedness preclude him from wooing himself."

Miss Beaufort, hardly able to articulate, replied, "I would give him all that I possess, could it purchase him one tranquil hour: I would serve him for ever, could I do it, and be unknown; but —"

"O, do not hesitate! Do not doubt!" interrupted Pembroke. "To serve your friends, I know you are capable of the most extraordinary exertions; I know there is nothing within the verge of possibility that your generous disposition would not attempt: then, my beloved Mary, dare to be what you are, by having the magnanimity to act as you know you ought; by offering your hand to him, show the noble Sobieski that you really deserve the devotion of a hero's heart."

"Dear Pembroke," replied Miss Beaufort, wiping the still gliding tears from her burning cheek, "after the confession which you drew from me yesterday, I will not deny that to possess the esteem of your friend, would render me the happiest of created beings; but I can not believe what your sanguine affection tells me. I can not suppose, situated as I was at Lady Dundas's, under a cloud of fashion, and surrounded by frivolous and contemptible society, that he should discover any thing in me to regard: every way embarrassed as I was, disliking my companions, afraid of my own interest in him, a veil was drawn over my mind, through which he could neither judge of my good nor bad qualities. How then can I flatter myself, or do the Count Sobieski so great an injury, as to imagine he could conceive any preference for such an insignificant character as I must have appeared?"

It was some time before Pembroke could shake the hold which this prepossession had taken on Miss Beaufort's mind. After having set, in every possible light, the terms with which his friend had spoken of her, he at length convinced her of what her heart so earnestly wished to believe, that she was not entirely indifferent to Sobieski.

Mr. Somerset's next achievement was to overcome her scruples against commissioning him with the message he was desirous to communicate to Thaddeus. From the continual recurrence of her fears, that the warmth of her cousin might have too highly colored the first object of debate, this task was not more easy to accomplish than the former. In vain she remonstrated, in vain she doubted, in vain demurred; Pembroke would not be denied; and as with faltering lips she assented to the permission which he almost extorted, she threw her arms round his neck and implored him to be careful of her honor; to remember that she put into his charge all that was most precious to her—the modesty of her sex, and her own delicacy.

Delighted at this consent, notwithstanding he received it through the medium of many tears, he embraced his cousin, with ten thousand animating promises of future happiness; and having allowed her to enter the house, mounted his horse, and set off on the spur toward Harrowby Hill.

CHAPTER XLIV.

WHEN Thaddeus recovered from the reverie into which he fell on the departure of Mr. Somerset, he considered how he might remove out of a country in which he had only met and occasioned distress.

The horrid price that Pembroke's father had set on the continuance of his son's friendship with Thaddeus, rendered it necessary that the latter's flight should be immediate. Averse to a second interview with his friend, which could only produce them new pangs, he determined that not another morn should rise upon him in Lincolnshire; and taking a pen, with all the future loneliness of his fate painted on his heart, he wrote two letters.

One he addressed to Mr. Somerset, bidding him that farewell which, he confessed, he could never take. As he wrote, his hand trembled, his bosom swelled; and he hastily shut his eye-lids, to withhold his tears from showing themselves on the paper: his emotion, his grief were driven back, were concealed, but the tenderness of his soul flowed over the letter. He forgave Pembroke's father, for Pembroke's sake; and in spite of their personal disunion, he vowed that no earthly power should restrain his love from following the steps of his friend, even into the regions of eternity. He closed his melancholy epistle with informing Mr. Somerset that, as he should quit England directly, any search after him, which his generous nature might dictate, would be in vain.

Though Thaddeus Sobieski would have disdained a life of dependence on the greatest potentate of the world; though he rejected with the same sincerity a similar proposal from his friend; and despised the degrading offer of Sir Robert; yet he did not disparage his dignity, nor infringe on the disinterested nature of friendship, when he accepted, and resolved to retain, the money which Pembroke had conveyed to him in prison. Thaddeus never acted but from principle. His honorable and penetrating mind knew exactly at what point to draw the tender thread of delicacy. Pride and independence were with him distinct terms. Receiving assistance from a friend, and leaning on him wholly for support, have different meanings: he accepted the first with gratitude; he would have thought it impossible to live and endure the last. On these premises, Pembroke was never pained by an attempt to return his bounty. Indeed Thaddeus would have considered himself unworthy to confer a benefit, if he had not known how to receive one. This spirit left no part of Miss Beaufort's obligation on his mind, but its sweetness; and with these impressions, and a throbbing heart, he began a short address to her.

"TO MISS BEAUFORT.

"My faculties lose their power when I take up my pen to address, for the first and the last time, Miss Beaufort. I hardly know what I would say—what I ought to say; I dare not venture to write all that I feel. But have you not been my benefactress? Did you not assert my character and give me liberty, when I was calumniated and in distress? Did you not ward from me the scorn of unpitying folly? Did you not console me with your own compassion? You have done all this; and surely you will not despise the gratitude of a heart which you have condescended to soothe and to comfort? At least, I can not leave England forever, without imploring blessings on the head of Miss Beaufort; without thanking her on my knees, on which I am writing, for that gracious and benign spirit, which discovered a breaking heart under the mask of serenity; which penetrated through the garb of poverty and dependence, and saw that the contemned Constantine was not what he seemed! Your smiles, Miss Beaufort, your voice speaking commiseration, were my sweetest consolations during those heavy months of sorrow which I endured at Dundas House: I contemplated you as a pitying angel sent to reconcile me to a life which had already become a burden. These are the benefits which Miss Beaufort has bestowed on a friendless exile; these are the benefits which she has bestowed on me! and they are written on my soul. Not until I go down into the grave shall they be forgotten. Oh! not even then, for when I rise again I shall find them still registered there!

"Farewell, most respected, most dear Miss Beaufort. May the Father of Heaven bless with his choicest care, her, whose name shall ever be first in the prayers of her most grateful, most devoted servant,

THADDEUS CONSTANTINE COUNT SOBIESKI.

"Harrowby-hill, eleven o'clock at night."

When he finished this epistle, with a trembling hand he inclosed it in the cover which contained Somerset's; then writing a few lines to the good old farmer his host, he begged him to accept the gold which they contained as a small compensation for his great hospitality; and having sealed both packets, he disposed them so on the table that they might be the first things seen on entering the room.

It being now midnight, he thought it the best time to set out unobserved on his journey. Having tied some linen in a gray silk handkerchief (which had been wrapped round his neck by Lady Sara one wet evening in Grosvenor-place), he put all his remaining money into his pocket. It did not exceed twenty pounds; the rest having been expended in his way to the Abbey, and in defraying little expenses attending the illness of the countess, to which her purse (ever kept low by the tardiness of the earl's payments) was not prepared to answer. However, as he determined to walk to London, where he intended to embark for America, he hoped that his little store would at least hold out until he had landed on a shore whence he trusted never to return.

"Ah!" cried he, as he gently closed the window by which he leaped into the garden, "Austria! ungrateful leader in the destruction of the country which more than once was thy preserver! And thou Russia, who embraced our monarch as a friend, and then betrayed him! What accumulated sins will be heaped on your heads? Every hasty sigh that rebels in my breast against the Almighty hand which again drives me out a wanderer on the wide world, calls vengeance upon you! How many ruthless empires!" added he, resting on the bar of the outward gate; "how many have ye driven from their homes? how many have ye made vagabonds and murderers, for that scanty pittance of which, with remorseless and wanton gripe, they were deprived by you?—Oh, righteous Power of Justice and of Mercy!" cried he, stretching his arms toward the heavens, over which the piercing winds of a bleak October night were scattering the thick and gloomy clouds, "grant me fortitude to bear with resignation to Thy will the miseries I have yet to encounter. Oh!" added he, his heart melting as the idea presented itself, "teach me to forget what I have been! Teach me to forget that on this dreadful night last year, I clasped the dying body of my dear grandfather in these arms!"

He could not speak further; but leaning his pale face against the gate, remained for a few minutes dissolved in painful recollection: then recovering himself by a sudden start, he proceeded with hasty steps through the different meadows until they conducted him into the high road.*

It was on the tenth of October, 1795, that the Count Sobieski commenced this lonely and melancholy journey. It was on the tenth of October, 1794, that he found the Palatine bleeding to death in the midst of a heap of slain. The coincidence of his present sufferings, was those of a twelvemonth before, powerfully affected Thaddeus: they recalled remembrances to him in their most vivid colors, which time, and so many intermediate events had considerably softened.

* A recent Review, while remarking on Monsieur de Salvandy's History of Poland, and his account of the reign of Sobieski, observes that "the campaign of Vienna has ever been reckoned among this king's most glorious achievements; and of that memorable event the pages of the United Service Journal have presented the most faithful and complete narrative on record." The narrative alluded to was written by Count Orchowski, a brave inheritor of Polish memorials, who sent it to England in MS., about the year 1815, to a friend, with the author's request to have it published there, and, if possible, to obtain the pen of one of three British writers, whom he mentioned, to give it an English translation. The author of "Thaddeus of Warsaw" had the honor to be one of these; but the original MS. being lost for twelve years after its arrival in England, she never even heard of it till about two years ago, when a train of somewhat strange and romantic circumstances rescued it from oblivion, and brought it, with the Count Orchowski's request, to her. The interesting correspondence between the count and the friend who found the lost manuscript, is attached to the translation of "The Narrative of the siege of Vienna" (by the author of "Thaddeus of Warsaw,") and published in the United Service Journal of 1829. That narrative fully explains the accusation of Thaddeus Sobieski against Austria's ingratitude to the sons of the brave Poles, who, in the year 1683, had liberated her from the impending Turkish yoke, and half continental Christendom with her.

Distressed by these sorrowful scenes which memory, ever true to her nature, raised before his mind's eye in rapid and long succession, he quickened his pace; he slackened it, he quickened it again; but nothing could rid him of those tormenting images which seemed to glide around him like mournful apparitions of the departed.

When the dawn broke, and the sun rose, he found himself advanced several miles on the south side of Ponton Hill. The spiry aisles of Harrowby Abbey were discernible through the mist; and the towers of Somerset Castle, from their height and situation, were as distinctly seen as if he had been at their base. Neither of these objects were calculated to raise the spirits of Thaddeus. The sorrows of the countess, whose eyes he so recently had closed, and the treatment which he afterward received from the man to whom he owed his life, were recollections which made him turn from the Abbey with a pang, and fix his eyes on Somerset. He looked toward its ivied battlements, with all the regret and all the tenderness which can overflow a human heart: under that roof, he believed the eyes of his adored Mary were sealed in sleep; and in an instant his agitated soul addressed her as if she had been present.

“Farewell, most lovely, most beloved! The conviction that I resign the hope of ever again beholding thee to the peace of my friend, shall give me comfort, when I am drawing my breath in a far, far distant region.”

Thus communing with his troubled spirit, he walked the whole day on his way to London. Totally absorbed in meditation, he did not remark the gaze of curiosity which followed his elegant yet distressed figure, as he passed through the different towns and villages. Musing on the past, the present, and the future, he neither felt hunger nor thirst; but, with a fixed eye and abstracted countenance, pursued his route until night and weariness overtook him in the midst of the high road, far from any house.

Thaddeus looked around and above: the sky was clear and glittering with stars: the moon, shining on a branch of the Ouse which divides Huntingdonshire from Cambridgeshire, lit the green heath which skirted its banks.* He wished not for a more magnificent canopy; and placing his bundle under his head, he laid himself down beneath a hillock of furze, and slept till morning.

When he awoke from a sleep which fatigue and fasting had rendered more oppressive than refreshing, he found that the splendors of the night were succeeded by a heavy rain, and that he was wet through. He rose with stiffness in his limbs, pain in his head, and a dimness over his eyes, with a sense of weakness which almost disabled him from moving. He readily judged that he had caught cold; and every moment feeling himself grow worse, he thought it necessary to seek some house where he might purchase rest and assistance.

Leaning on his stick, but no longer able to encumber himself with even the light load of his bundle, he threw it among the brambles. Thinking, from the symptoms which he felt, that he had not many hours to endure the ills of life, he staggered a few yards further: no habitation appeared: his limbs became more feeble, his eyes seemed totally obscured, and he sunk down on a bank. For a minute he attempted to struggle with the cold grasp of death, which he believed was fastening on his heart.

* The author has often rambled through all this foregoing scenery; but the aisles of Harrowby Abbey no longer exist; and the venerable house that stood there has passed to other owners than the revered friends that then gave her hospitable welcome.

“And are my days to be so short? Are they to end thus?” thought he: “Merciful Providence, pardon my repining!”

These were the last movements of the lips of Thaddeus, while his blood seemed freezing to insensibility. His eyes closed, his head fell back; and pale and without animation he lay at the foot of a tree near which he had dropped.

He remained a quarter of an hour in this death-like state before he was perceived; at length a gentleman, who was passing along that road in his way to a country-seat in Cambridgeshire, thought he perceived a man lying among the grass a little onward on the heath. The traveler stopped his carriage, and ordering one of the out-riders to alight, bade him examine whether the object he saw were living or dead.

The servant obeyed; and presently returning, with an affrighted countenance informed his master it was the body of a man who by his dress appeared to be a gentleman; and, being quite senseless, he supposed had been murdered by robbers. The features of the benevolent stranger instantly reflected the distress of his servant's; and ordering the chariot-door to be opened, he took in his hand a bottle of drops (which, from his own invalid state, was his traveling companion), and alighting, hastened to the side of the lifeless Thaddeus.

By this time all the servants were collected round the spot; and the master himself, while he gazed with pity on the marble features of the count, observed with pleasure that he saw no marks of violence. Supposing that the present accident might have been occasioned by a fit; and thinking it possible to recall life, he desired that the unfortunate person's waistcoat might be unclosed; and, taking off his hat, he contrived to pour some drops into his mouth. Their warmth renewed pulsation in the heart; for one of the servants who was stooping declared that it beat under his hand. When the benevolent gentleman was satisfied of the truth of this report, he ordered his servants to place the poor traveler in his carriage. Having only another mile to go, he said he hoped his charge might be restored at the end of their journey.

While the postillions drove rapidly toward the house the cold face of Thaddeus rested on the bosom of the stranger, who continued to chafe his temples with lavender-water until the chariot stopped before the gates. Two men carried the count to the house; and leaving him with their master and a medical man who resided near, other restoratives were applied, which succeeded in recovering his lost senses. When he was recalled to recollection and able to distinguish objects he saw that he was supported by two gentlemen and in a magnificent bed-chamber.

Gratitude was an active virtue in the soul of Thaddeus. At the moment of his awakening from that sleep, which, when it fell upon him, he believed would last until time should be lost in eternity--he pressed the hands of them who held his own, not doubting but that they were the good Samaritans who had preserved him from perishing.

The younger of the gentlemen perceiving, by the animated luster which spread over his patient's eyes, that he was going to speak, put his hands on his lips and said, "Pardon me, sir! you must not speak. Your life at present hangs on a thread; the slightest exertion would snap it: but as all you want is resuscitation to supply some great expense which the vital powers have sustained, I must require that you neither speak nor be spoken to until I give permission. Meanwhile, be satisfied, sir, you are in the kindest hands. This gentleman," added he, pointing to his friend, "saw you on the heath and brought you to his house, where you now are."

Thaddeus bowed his head to them both in sign of gratitude and compliance, and the elder left the room.

CHAPTER XLV.

NEXT morning, when the seal was taken off the lips of Thaddeus, he expressed in the most animated terms his deep sense of the humanity which actuated both the gentlemen to take such a generous interest in his fate.

“You owe no thanks to me,” replied the one who had enjoined and released him from silence, and who was alone with him; “I am only the agent of another. Yet I do not deny that in obeying the benevolent orders of Sir Robert Somerset I have frequent opportunities of gratifying my own heart.”

Thaddeus was so confounded at this discovery he could not speak, and the gentleman proceeded.

“I am apothecary to Sir Robert’s household; and, as my excellent employer has been long afflicted with an ill state of health, I live in a small lodge at the other end of the park. He is the boast of the country: the best landlord and the kindest neighbor. All ranks of people love him; and when he dies (which his late apoplectic fits make it too probable may be soon), both poor and rich will lose their friend. Ill as he was this morning, when I told him you were out of danger, he expressed a pleasure that done him more good than all my medicines.”

Not considering the wildness of the question, Thaddeus hastily demanded, “Does he know who I am?”

The honest apothecary stared at the look and tone with which these words were delivered, and then replied, “No, is there any reason, sir, to make you wish that he should not?”

“Certainly none,” replied Thaddeus, recollecting himself, and sighing; “and I shall be impatient until I have an opportunity of telling him how grateful I am for the goodness he has shown to me as a stranger.”

Surprised at these hints (which the count, not considering their tendency, allowed to escape him), the apothecary gathered sufficient from them, united with the speaker's superior mien, to make him suppose that his patient was some emigrant of quality, whom Sir Robert would rejoice in having served. These surmises and conclusions having passed quickly through the honest gentleman's brain, he bowed his head with that respect which the generous mind is proud to pay to nobility in ruins, and resumed :—

“ Whatever you may be, sir, a peasant or a prince, you will meet with British hospitality from the noble owner of this house. The magnificence of his spirit is equaled by the goodness of his heart; and I am certain Sir Robert will consider as fortunate the dreadful apoplexy which brought him from Somerset for change of air, as it has afforded him an opportunity of serving and of knowing you.”

Thaddeus blushed at the strain of this speech; and readily understanding what was passing in the mind of the apothecary, hardly knew what to reply. He paused for a moment, and then said, “ All you have declared, sir, in praise of Sir Robert Somerset, I can not doubt his deserving. I have already felt the effects of his humanity, and shall ever remember that my life was prolonged by his means; but I have no pretensions to the honor of his acquaintance. I only wish to see him that I may thank him for what he has done; therefore, if you will permit me to rise this evening, instead of tomorrow morning, you will oblige me.”

To this request the apothecary gave a respectful yet firm denial; and went down stairs to communicate his observations to his patron.

The anxiety which agitated the count when he reflected that he was receiving these obligations from his most implacable enemy, so occupied and disturbed him that he spent a sleepless night. The dawn found his fever much augmented;

but no corporeal sufferings could persuade him to abandon the resolution of seeing the baronet, and immediately leaving his house. Believing, as he did, that all this kindness would have been withheld had his host known on whom he was pouring such benefits, he thought that every minute which passed over him, while he was under Sir Robert's roof, inflicted a new outrage on his own dignity and honor.

To this end, then, as soon as Mr. Middleton, the apothecary, retired to breakfast, Thaddeus rose from his bed; and was completely dressed before he returned. The good man expostulated on the rashness of what he had done, and augured no less than a relapse from the morning symptoms of his patient. Thaddeus, once in his life, was obstinate, though civilly so; and desiring a servant to request Sir Robert would indulge him with an audience for a few minutes alone in his library, he soon convinced Mr. Middleton that his purpose was not to be shaken.

The baronet returning his compliments that he should be happy to see his guest, the still anxious apothecary offered him his assistance down the stairs. Thaddeus needed no help, and gratefully declined it. The exertion necessary to be summoned for this interview imparted as much momentary strength to his frame as to his mind; and though his color was heightened, he entered the library with a firm step.

Sir Robert met him at the door, and, shaking him by the hand with many warm assurances of pleasure at his recovery, would have led him to a seat; but Thaddeus drawing back, only supported himself against the back of it with his hand; while in a steady voice he expressed the most earnest thanks for the benefits he had received; then pausing, and casting the proud luster of his eyes to the ground, lest their language should tell all that he thought, he continued, "I have only to regret, Sir Robert, that your benevolence has been lavished on a man whom you regard with abhorrence. I am the Count Sobieski, that Poland whom you commanded your son to see no more. Respecting even the prejudices of my friend's parent, I was hastening to London, meaning to set sail for America with the first ship, when I swooned on the road. I believe I was expiring: your humanity saved me; and I now owe to gratitude, as well as to my own satisfaction, the fulfilment of my declaration. I shall leave Deerhurst immediately, and England as soon as I am able to embark."

Thaddeus with a second bow, and not quite so firm a step, without venturing a glance at what he supposed must be the abashed looks of the baronet, was preparing to quit the room, when Sir Robert, with a pale and aghast countenance, exclaimed, "Stop!"

Thaddeus looked round, and struck by the change in his preserver's appearance, paused in his movement. The baronet, incapable of saying more, pointed to a chair for him to sit down; then sinking into another himself took out his handkerchief, and wiping away the large drops which stood on his forehead, panted for respiration. At last, with a desperate kind of haste, he said—

"Was your mother, indeed, Therese Sobieski?"

Thaddeus, still more astonished, replied in the affirmative; and Sir Robert threw himself back on the chair with a deep groan. Hardly knowing what he did, the count rose from his seat and advanced toward him. Hearing his approach, Sir Robert stretched out his hand, and, with a look and tone of agony, said—"Who was your father?" and then, without waiting for a reply, covered his convulsed features with his handkerchief. The baronet's agitation, which now shook him like an earthquake, became contagious: Thaddeus gazed at him with a palsy uncertainty in his heart; and laying his hand on his bewildered brain, he answered, "I know not. Yet I fear I must believe him to be the Earl of Tinemouth. But here is his picture." With a trembling hand he took the case which held it from his pocket; and, tearing open the clasps, gave it to Sir Robert, who had started from his seat at the name of the earl. The moment the baronet's eyes rested on the miniature he fell senseless upon the chair.

Thaddeus, hardly more alive, sprinkled some water on his face, and, with throbbing temples and a beating heart, stood in wordless expectation over him. Such excessive emotion told him that something more than Sir Robert's hatred of the Poles had stimulated his late conduct; and, too earnest for an explanation to ring for assistance, he rejoiced to see by the convulsion of the baronet's features and the heaving of his chest that animation was returning. In a few minutes he opened his eyes, but when he met the anxious gaze of Thaddeus he closed them as suddenly, and, rising from his seat, staggered against the chimney-piece, exclaiming, "O God, direct me!"

Thaddeus, whose conjectures were now wrought almost to wildness, followed him, and while his exhausted frame was ready to sink to the earth he implored him to speak.

"Sir Robert," cried he, "if you know any thing of my family, if you know any thing of my father, I beseech you answer me! Or only tell me: am I so wretched as to be the son of Lord Tinemouth?"

The violence of the count's emotions during this agonizing address totally overcame him; before he finished speaking his limbs withdrew their support; and he dropped breathless against the side of a chair.

Sir Robert turned hastily round. He saw him sunk, like a beautiful flower bruised and trampled on by the foot of him who had given it root: and unable to make any evasive reply to this last appeal of virtue and of nature, he threw himself with a burst of tears upon his neck, and exclaimed, "Wretch that I have been! O Sobieski! I am thy father. Dear, injured son of the unhappy Therese!"

The first words which carried this avowal to the heart of Thaddeus deprived him of motion; and when Sir Robert expected to receive the returning embrace of his son, he found him senseless in his arms.

The cries of the baronet brought Mr. Middleton and the servants into the room. When the former saw the state of the count, and perceived the agonized position of his patron (who was supporting and leaning over his son), the honest man declared that he expected nothing less from the gentleman's disobedience of his orders. The presence of the servants having recalled Sir Robert's wandering faculties, he desired them to remove Thaddeus to his chamber. Then, following them in silence; when they had laid their charge on the bed he watched in extreme, but concealed, anxiety, until Mr. Middleton again brought animation to his patient.

The moment the count unclosed his eyes they fixed themselves on his agitated father. He drew the hand which held his to his lips. The tears of paternal love again bathed the cheeks of Sir Robert; he felt how warm at his heart was the affection of his deserted son; and (making a sign for Mr. Middleton to leave the room, who obeyed) he bent his streaming eyes upon the other hand of Thaddeus, and said in a faltering voice, "Can you pardon me?"

Thaddeus threw himself on his father's bosom, and wept profusely; then raising Sir Robert's clasped hands in his, while his eloquent eyes seemed to search the heavens, he said, "My dear, dear mother loved you to her latest hour; and I have all my mother's heart: whatever may have been your errors, I love my father."

Sir Robert strained him to his breast. After a pause, while he shook the tears from his venerable cheeks, he resumed—"Certain, my dear son, that you require repose, and assured that you will not find it until I have offered some apology for my unnatural conduct, I will now explain the circum.

stances which impelled my actions ; and drew distress upon that noble creature, your mother.”

Sir Robert hesitated a moment to recover breath, and then went on.

“Keep your situation,” added he, putting down Thaddeus, who at this opening was raising himself: “I shall tell my melancholy story with less pain if your eyes be not upon me. I will begin from the first.”

The baronet proceeded to say that very early in life he attached himself to Miss Beaufort, the only sister of the late Admiral Beaufort, who was Mary’s father: they were then wards of Sir Fulke Somerset. Mr. Beaufort had been in the navy from a boy ; but his sister remaining always at the castle, an affection, as strong as it was mutual, took place between herself and her cousin Robert. When the young people applied to Sir Fulke for his consent to their marriage, he refused on the plea of youth. In vain the passionate Robert declared the reasonableness and ardor of his affection ; his father urged his being only a younger son ; and, indeed, that he was totally unworthy of his cousin, unless he would consent to undergo the polish of a three year’s tour over the Continent. After some altercation this arrangement was complied with ; and Robert and Miss Beaufort bade each other an almost despairing adieu. Indignant at the pertinacity of Sir Fulke, and provoked with his elder brother for seconding his father’s argument, Robert Somerset set off for Dover. There he was joined by the present Earl of Tinemouth (then Mr. Stanhope), who was banished the country on a similar errand : but his was to forget a mistress ; Somerset’s to deserve one. Stanhope’s mother and Robert’s having been sisters, the young men met as relations. Encouraging each other in rebellious thoughts against their fathers (their mothers having been long dead), they determined to change their names ; and to let no one know any thing about them during their travellers, excepting the two women on whose dear accounts they were thus exiled. To this end, as soon as they landed in France, they gave themselves out to be brothers, which their great personal resemblance corroborated, and called themselves Sackville. This settled, they traveled pretty amicably until they reached Naples; here Mr. Stanhope involved himself in an intrigue with the only daughter of an old British officer who had retired to that climate for his health. Somerset remonstrated on the villainy of seducing an innocent girl, when he knew that his heart and hand were absolutely devoted to another; and Stanhope, enraged at finding a censor in a companion whom he considered as headstrong as himself, ended the argument by striking him. Somerset drew his sword; and it is likely, if the servants of the hotel had not interfered, the affray would have terminated with one of their lives. Since that hour they never met. Mr. Stanhope left his shame and his bleeding friend; and, fearful of consequences, fled to Palermo. When recovered from his wounds, Robert Somerset (still retaining the name of Sackville) proceeded to Florence; in which beautiful city, determining to stay some time, he rather sought than repelled the civilities of the inhabitants. Here he became acquainted with the palatine and the lovely Therese. Her beauty pleased his taste; her gentle virtues affected his heart; and he often gazed on her with tenderness, when his fidelity to Miss Beaufort only meant him to convey a look of gratitude. In the midst of this intimacy, as if aware of a friendship so hostile to her love, his cousin ceased to answer his letters. Desperate with jealousy, he was on the point of going to England, when he received a packet from home. On opening it he found a letter from Miss Beaufort, in which she informed him that having long considered their attachment as a childish entanglement, she had tried to wean him from his former folly by an obstinate silence. Having hardly a doubt that she had succeeded, she now wrote to him one letter, as it was to show him at once the unreasonableness of making such early engagements. For, soon after his departure, a journey to town had taught her to know her own heart; and, in consequence, she had yielded her hand to his elder brother; who, he knew, had always been averse to her marriage with him. This shameless declaration concluded with the insult of subscribing herself his "affectionate sister." Having read the letter to the end Mr. Somerset forswore his family forever; and flying to Therese Sobieski, in a paroxysm of madness and revenge, married her. This rash act perpetrated, he in vain sought for tranquillity; he saw that she idolized him, but his thoughts were always fixed on his ungrateful Mary; were always deploring her lightness, and execrating the perfidy of his brother. In this temper a second packet found him. Again he saw Miss Beaufort's handwriting; but he dropped it with horror into the envelop, and tore open the black seal which was affixed to a letter from his father. Here Sir Fulke confessed such a plan of deceit as petrified his son. He declared that all which had passed was devised by his eldest son in hopes of tempting his brother to revenge the affront of Mary's supposed infidelity by running himself into some inconsiderate marriage. With many prayers for pardon the wretched old man acknowledged that this bitter confession was wrung from him by the sudden death of his eldest son, who now lay a corpse in the house. The disconsolate father having related the particulars of Mr. Somerset's death (which happened after three days' illness), added that it was in compliance with his entreaties to preserve Miss Beaufort for him that he had agreed to drive Robert from the kingdom. To further the scheme of separation he had intercepted their mutual letters; and Mr. Somerset himself had forged the one in Miss Beaufort's name which had carried the intelligence of their union. By the same means a similar effect was wrought upon the abused Mary. Believing Robert unfaithful, she fell into so sad a dejection, and appeared so careless of herself, that the cruel father and son hoped she might be induced, through mere weakness of mind, to give her hand to the persecuting passion of Mr. Somerset. "But," continued Sir Fulke, "death has put an end to this unnatural rivalry; and my poor girl, undeceived in her opinion of you, pants to see you, and to give you that hand which my ill-fated son and your unhappy father so unjustly detained."

On the receipt of this packet, with a soul divided between love, pity, and honor, Robert Somerset sacrificed all to his passions. He adored the woman on whose account he had left his country; and, though every tie of heaven and earth bound him to his deceived and injured wife, he consigned her to the full horrors of desertion, and hastened to England.

"Horrible to relate," added Sir Robert, "immediately on my landing I married Mary Beaufort. In her arms I forgot for a while Therese and her agonies. But when my dear Pembroke first saw the light, when I pressed him to my heart it seemed as if at the same instant I stabbed it with a dagger. When I would have breathed a blessing over him the conviction struck me that I durst not; that I had deluded the mother who gave him birth; and that at some future period he might have cause to curse the author of his existence. Well," continued the baronet, wiping his forehead, "though the birth of this boy conjured up the image of your mother, which haunted me day and night, I never could summon courage to inquire respecting her fate. When the troubles of Poland commenced, what a dreadful terror seized me! The success of the Russians, and the consequent distresses of the nobility, overwhelmed me with fear: I knew not but they might be forced, like the French noblesse, to fly their country; and the bare idea of meeting your grandfather or the injured Therese in England, precipitated me into such a series of apprehensions as menaced my life. I became melancholy and ill; I avoided the sight of the newspapers; and as far as I could (under the plea of the story which you have heard), I withheld my family from speaking on a subject which manifestly gave me pain. But I could not prevent the tongues of our visitors from discoursing on a theme which at that period interested every thinking mind. I heard of the valiant Kosciusko, the good Stanislaus, and the Palatine Sobieski with his brave grandson, spoken of in the same breath. I durst not surmise who this grandson was; I dare not ask; I dreaded to know. At length," added he, quickening his voice, "the idol of my heart, she for whom I had perhaps sacrificed my eternal peace, died in my arms! I received the shock as became a Christian; I bent beneath the blow with humility; for I embraced it as the expiation of a crime which, till then, even in the midst of my felicity, sat on my soul like the hand of death. I bore this trial with resignation. But when two years afterward my eye fell by accident upon the name of Sobieski in one of the public papers I could not withdraw it; my sight was fascinated as if by a rattlesnake; and in one column I read how bravely the palatine fell, and in the next the dreadful fate of his daughter. She was revenged!" cried Sir Robert, eagerly grasping the hand of Thaddeus, who could not restrain the groan which burst from his breast. "For nearly three months I was deprived of that reason which had abused her noble nature. When I recovered my senses," continued he, "and found I had so fatally suffered the time of restitution to go by, I began to torment myself that I had not, on the death of Lady Somerset, hastened to Poland, and entreated Therese's pardon on my knees. This period of vivid remorse was, however, soon terminated by the same arguments which, on the first year of my wife's loss had deterred me from being just. I reconsidered that the Countess Sobieski having possessed a prior claim to my name, such restitution on my part must have illegitimated my darling Pem broke. It was this horrid conviction," exclaimed Sir Robert, a sudden distraction agitating his before affectionate eye, "that caused all my cruelty to you. When my dear son described the danger from which you had rescued him; when he told me that Therese had fostered him with a mother's tenderness, I was probed to the heart; but when he added that the young Count Sobieski was now an alien from his country, and relying on my friendship for a home, my terror was too truly manifested. Horror drove all natural remorse from my soul. I thought an avenging power had sent my deserted child to discover his father, to claim his rights, and to publish me as a villain; and when I saw my innocent son even on his knees, petitioning for the man who I believed was come to undo him, I became almost frantic. Under this temper," added he, putting the trembling hand of Thaddeus to his streaming eyes, "I drove out my first-born to be a wanderer on the face of the earth, not for his own crimes, but for those of his father; and Heaven punished my injustice. When I thought that the evidence of my shame was divided from me by an insuperable barrier; when I believed that the ocean would soon separate me from all my fears, a righteous Providence brought thee before me forlorn and expiring. It was the son of Therese Sobieski I had exposed to such wretchedness! It was the darling of her heart I had consigned to the beating elements! O Thaddeus," cried he, "can I be forgiven for all this?"

Thaddeus lulled the wakeful remorse of his repentant father with such kind arguments of excuse for his conduct as at least imparted to him a consoling assurance in the generous affection of his son.

When this long and interesting conversation terminated, Sir Robert, well remembering the violent effects of Mr. Somerset's grief at Sobieski's flight, and declared abjuration of England, pardoned his son the outrageous reproaches which had driven him from his own house, and very joyfully dispatched a messenger to desire his presence at Deerhurst.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THAT sickness which is the consequence of mental pain usually vanishes with its cause. Long before the evening of the ensuing day, Thaddeus quitted his chamber and related to his father the rapid incidents of his brief and eventful career. The voice of fame had blazoned him abroad as "the plume of war with early laurels crowned," but it was left to his own eloquent tongue to prove, with all the pathos of modesty and feeling, that the most desperate conflicts are not those which we sustain in the field.

Sir Robert listened to him with affection, admiration, and delight. He was answering the interesting details with many grateful apostrophes to that Providence which had crowned his gray hairs with pardon and peace; when the servant opened the door, and announced that Mr. Somerset was in the library.

Thaddeus instantly rose; but Sir Robert put him down again. "Remain here, my dear son," said he, "until I apprise your brother how nearly you are related to him. That door leads into my study; I will call you when he is prepared."

The moment Sir Robert joined Pembroke, he read in his pale and harassed countenance how much he required the intelligence he was summoned to hear. Mr. Somerset bowed coldly on his father's entrance, and begged to be honored with his commands.

"They are what I expect will restore to you your usual looks and manner, my dear boy," answered his father, taking his passive hand and seating him by him; "so attend to me."

Pembroke listened to the beginning of the baronet's narrative with respectful attention; but when the name of Therese Sobieski was mentioned, as the woman whom he had married and deserted, the ready apprehension of his son conceiving the rest, he had only to affirm his eager demand that Thaddeus was indeed his brother. Pembroke looked wildly around him.

“O, my father!” cried he, “what have you done?—Where is he? For what have you sacrificed him?”

“Hear me to an end,” rejoined the baronet; who then, in as few words as possible, repeated the subsequent events with the recent meeting.

Pembroke’s raptures were now as high as his despair had been leep. He threw himself on his father’s breast; he asked for his friend, his brother; and begged to be conducted to him. Sir Robert did no more than open the door which divided the library from the dining-room, and in one moment the brothers were locked in each other’s arms.

The transports of the young men for a long time denied them words; but their eyes, their tears, and their united hands, imparted to each breast a consciousness of mutual love unutterable, if not to be expressed by those looks which are indeed the heralds of the soul.

Sir Robert wept like an infant while contemplating these two affectionate brothers: in a faltering voice he exclaimed, “How soon may these plighted hands be separated by the harpies of the law! Alas, Pembroke, you can not be ignorant that I buy this son at the price of your legitimacy?”

At this speech the blood rushed over the cheek of the ingenuous Pembroke; but Thaddeus, turning instantly to Sir Robert, said, with an eloquent smile,

“On this head, I trust that neither my father nor my brother will entertain one thought to trouble them. Had I even the inclination to act otherwise than right, my revered grandfather has put it out of my power to bear any other name than that of Sobieski. He made me swear never to change it; and as I hope to meet him hereafter,” added he, with solemnity, "I will obey him! Therefore, my beloved father, in secret only can I enjoy the conviction that I am your son, and Pembroke's brother; yet the happiness I receive with the knowledge of being so, will ever live here; will ever animate my heart with gratitude to Heaven and to you."

"Noble son of the sainted Therese!" cried Sir Robert, "I do not deserve thee!"

"How shall I merit your care of my honor, of my dearest feelings!" exclaimed Pembroke, pressing the hands of his brother to his heart; "I can do nothing, dearest Thaddeus. I am a bankrupt in the means of evincing what is passing in my soul. My mother's chaste spirit thanks you from my lips. Yet I will not abuse your generosity; though I retain the name of Somerset, it shall only be the name; the inheritance entailed on my father's eldest son belongs to you."

While Thaddeus embraced his brother with affection, he calmly and firmly replied that he would rather encounter all the probable miseries from which his father's benevolence had saved him, than rob his brother of any part of what he believed was his just due.

Sir Robert, with hatred of himself, and admiration of his sons, attempted to stop this generous contention, by saying that it should be determined by an equal division of his estates.

"Not so, my dear father," replied Thaddeus, "I will never consent that the title of Somerset shall want wealth to support the munificence of its possessor."

After a few more arguments of the same tendency, the controversy was settled; and the remainder of the evening passed in that sweet reciprocity of confidence and bliss which the imagination can best picture.

According to the decisions of this night, Sir Robert wrote next morning to his sister; informing her, that accident had introduced Pembroke's friend, the Count Sobieski, to his presence; when to his amazement and joy, he discovered that this celebrated young hero (though of a nation to which he had declared an abhorrence, but which feeling he now abjured), was the only remaining branch of a family to whom he owed unnumbered obligations. He added, that five and twenty years ago, having contracted an immense debt to the Palatine of Masovia—as a small compensation to his brave representative, he now signed over to the count (who would resume all the distinctions of his rank), the house and estates of Deerhurst to the amount of three thousand a year. He told her that Pembroke did not deem such abstraction from the rent-roll of Somerset any loss; for twelve thousand annually would yet remain; and could his wishes have been complied with, he would have divided his whole patrimony with his friend. He closed this letter with expressions of impatience to present to his sister and niece, their interesting émigré under a character which reflected honor on their discernment.

This epistle was put into the hands of Mrs. Dorothy as she was following the melancholy steps of Miss Beaufort and Lady Albina Stanhope into the traveling coach. Having seated herself, the old lady read it aloud to both the young ones. At every welcome word the bosom of the amazed and overjoyed Mary heaved with exultation, hope, and gratitude; and while her eyes, beneath her veil, poured the tribute of happy tears to Heaven, to that Heaven alone, her virgin spirit breathed the emotions of her heart. The good old lady was not backward in demonstrating her astonishment. Surprised at her brother's rencounter with Thaddeus, but more at his avowal of obligations to any of that nation, about which he always had asserted directly the reverse; she was so wrapped in wonder and pleasure, that her ever cheerful tongue lightened her happy heart by relating to the attentive Lady Albina, the public, as well as private history, of the Count Sobieski.

When the carriage arrived at Deerhurst, it was past midnight; and to the no small disappointment of the ladies, the family were retired to bed. Mrs. Dorothy who would not suffer her brother to be disturbed, sent the girls to their rooms; and was crossing one of the galleries to her own apartment, when a door opening, Pembroke, in his night-gown and slippers, looked out. Having heard a bustle in the house, he was going to inquire the reason, just as his aunt appeared. She congratulated him on the change in his father's conduct, kissed him, bade him good-night, told him to prepare for more good news in the morning, and smiling, hurried to her chamber.

Pembroke thought so little of Mrs. Dorothy's lively promise, that he was one of the last who descended to the breakfast-parlor. She reproached him for his undutiful laziness; while Miss Beaufort with a glowing cheek embraced her cousin, who whispered, "Now, I shall see the two dearest friends I possess, happy in each other."

Mary's vivid blush had not subsided when the entrance of Thaddeus, and his agitated bow, overspread her neck and bosom with crimson. A dimness obscured her faculties; she hardly heard the animated words of Sir Robert, while he presented him as the Count Sobieski, the darling son of one who had deserved the highest place in his heart. Whatever he was, she was conscious he was lord of her's; and withdrawing her hand hastily from the timid and thrilling touch of him she would have lingered near forever, she glided toward an open casement, where the fresh air helped to dispel the faintness which had seized her.

After Mrs. Dorothy, with all the urbanity of her nature, had declared her welcomes to the count, she put away the coffee that was handed to her by Pembroke, and said with a smile, "Before I taste my breakfast, I must inform you, Sir Robert, you have a guest in this house you little expect. I forbade Miss Beaufort saying a word, because, as we are told that 'the first tellers of unwelcome news have but a loosing office,' vice versâ, I hoped for a gaining one; therefore preserved such a profitable piece of intelligence for my own promulgation. Indeed, I doubt whether it will not intoxicate some folks here," added she, glancing archly on Pembroke, who looked suddenly round at this whimsical declaration. "Suffice it to say that yesterday morning, Lady Albina Stanhope, more dead than alive, accompanied by her maid, arrived in a post-chaise at Somerset Castle, and implored my protection. Our dear Mary embraced the poor weeping young creature, who, amid many tears, recapitulated the injuries she had suffered since she parted with the Count Sobieski at the Abbey. The latest outrage of her cruel father was his immediate marriage with the vile Lady Sophia Lovel; and his commands, that Lady Albina would treat her as became a daughter. Ill as she was, when she received these disgraceful orders, she determined to prevent the degradation her obedience to them would cast on the memory of her own mother, by instantly quitting the house. She engaged her maid to assist her flight; 'and,' added she, 'whither could I go? Who would receive the unfortunate victim of the profligate Lady Sophia?' I could think of none so likely as the father of the generous Mr. Somerset. He told me we were relations; I beseech you to be my friends!'. Certain of your benevolence, my dear brother," continued Mrs. Dorothy, "I stopped this sweet girl's petition with my caresses, and promised her a kinder father in Sir Robert Somerset."

"You did right, Dorothy," returned the baronet; "though the earl and I must ever be strangers, I have no enmity to his children. Where is this amiable girl?"

Mrs. Dorothy informed him that, in consequence of her recent grief and ill-treatment, she had found herself too unwell to rise with the family: but that she hoped to join them at noon.

Pembroke was indeed deeply interested in this intelligence

The simple graces of the lovely Albina had, on the first interview, penetrated his heart. Her sufferings at Harrowby, and the sensibility which her ingenuous nature exhibited without affectation or disguise, had left her image in his soul long after she disappeared. He now gave the reins to his eager imagination, and was the first in the saloon to greet his lovely mistress.

Sir Robert Somerset welcomed her with the warmth of a parent: but his enraptured son broke out into the most vehement expressions of joy, which she received with timid and grateful bows.

During this scene, Miss Beaufort, no longer able to bear the restraint of company; nor even the accidental encountering of his eyes, whose presence, dear as it was, disconcerted and oppressed her; walked out into the park. Though it was the month of October, the weather continued fine. A bright sun tempered the air, and gilded the yellow leaves which the fresh wind drove before her in a thousand glittering eddies. This was Mary's favorite season. She found its softness infuse the tenderest thoughts into her soul. The rugged form of care seems to dissolve under the magic touch of beautiful nature. Forgetful of the world's anxieties, the tranquilizing spirit of melancholy shades the heart of sorrow with a veil which might well be called the twilight of the mind; and the entranced soul, happy in delusion, half closes its bright eye, reluctant to perceive that such sweet repose is pillowed on the shifting clouds.

Such were the reflections of Miss Beaufort, after her disturbed thoughts had tossed themselves in a sea of doubts relative to the interest she might probably possess in the heart of Sobieski. She recalled the hours they had passed together: they agitated, but did not satisfy her heart. She remembered Pembroke's vehement declaration that Thaddeus loved her; but then it was Pembroke's declaration, not his; and the circumstances in which it was made were too likely to mislead the wishes of her cousin. And then Sobieski's farewell letter! It was noble, grateful; but where appeared the glowing soul-pervading passion which consumed her life for him? Exhausted by the anguish of this suspense, she resolved to resign her future fate to Providence; and, turning her gaze on the lovely objects around, soon found the genius of the season absorb her wholly. Her cheeks glowed, her eyes became humid and casting their mild radiance on the fading flowers beneath, she pursued her way through a cloud of fragrance. It was the last breath of the expiring year. Love is full of imagination. Mary easily glided from the earth's departing charms to her own waning beauty: the chord once touched, every note vibrated; and hope and fear, joy and regret, again dispossessed her late-acquired serenity.

CHAPTER XLVII.

It being almost three o'clock, Lady Albina having expressed a wish to walk out in search of Miss Beaufort, the two brothers offered their attendance. Before her ladyship had passed through the first park, she complained of fatigue; Pembroke urged her to enter a shepherd's hut close by, while the Count Sobieski would proceed alone in quest of his cousin.

With a beating heart, Thaddeus undertook this commission. Hastening along the nearest dell, with the lightness of a young hunter, he mounted the heights, descended to the glades, traversed one woody nook, and then another, but could see no trace of Miss Beaufort. Supposing she had returned to the house, he was slackening his pace to abandon the search, when he caught a glimpse of her figure as she turned the corner of a thicke' leading to the terrace above. In an instant he was at her side ; and with his hat in his hand, and a glowing cheek, he repeated his errand.

Mary blushed, faltered, and was alarmed at finding herself alone with him. Though he now stood before her in a quality which she ever believed was his right, yet remembrance of what had passed between them in other circumstances, confounded and overwhelmed her. When Constantine was poor and unfriended, it was delicious to pity and to love him. When the same Constantine appeared as a man of rank, invested with a splendid fortune and extensive fame, she was lost, annihilated. The cloud which had obscured, not extinguished his glory, was dispersed. He was that Sobieski whom she had admired unseen ; he was that Constantine whom she had loved unknown ; he was that Sobieski, that Constantine, who seen and known, she now adored.

Weighed down by the weight of these reflections, she only bowed to what he said ; and gathering her cloak from the winds which blew it around her, was hurrying with downward eyes to the stairs of the terrace, when her foot slipping, she must have fallen had not Thaddeus caught her in his ready arm. She rose from it with a blushing face, and the color did not recede when she found that he had not relinquished her hand. Her heart beat violently, her head became giddy, her feet lost their power ; and finding that after a slight attempt to withdraw her hand, he still held it fast, though in a trembling grasp, nearly overcome by inexplicable distress, she turned away her face to conceal its confusion.

Thaddeus saw all this ; and with a fluttering hope, instead of surrendering the hand he had retained, he made it a yet closer prisoner by clasping it in both his ; and pressing it earnestly to his breast, said in a hurried voice, while his eloquent eyes poured all their beams upon her averted cheek, " Surely, Miss Beaufort will not deny me the dearest happiness I possess—the privilege of being grateful to her ?"

He paused : his soul was too full for utterance , and raising Mary's hand from his heart to his lips, he kissed it fervently. Almost fainting, Miss Beaufort leaned her head against a tree of the thicket where they were standing : she thought of the confession which Pembroke had extorted from her, and dreading that all this was rather the tribute of gratitude than of love, she waved her other hand in sign for him to leave her.

Such extraordinary agitation palsied the warm and blissful emotions of the count. He too, began to blame the sanguine representation of his friend ; and dreading that he had offended her, that she might suppose he presumed on her kindness, he stood for a moment in silent astonishment ; then dropping on his knee (hardly conscious of the action), with an energy of voice declarative of the passion he had so long smothered in his heart, he implored her pardon for what had passed.

“Forgive me,” added he, with increased earnestness ; “forgive me, in justice to your own virtues. I meant only to thank you for your goodness to an unfortunate exile ; but if my words or manner have obeyed the more fervid impulse of my soul, and declared aloud what is its glory in secret, blame my nature, most respected Miss Beaufort, not my presumption. I have not dared to look steadily on any aim higher than your esteem.”

Mary knew not how to receive this address. The position in which he uttered it, his countenance, when she turned to answer him, were both demonstrative of something less equivocal than his speech. He was still grasping the drapery of her cloak ; and his eyes, from which the wind blew back his fine hair, were beaming upon her full of that piercing tenderness which at once dissolves and seizes the soul.

She passed her hand over her eyes. Her soul was in tumults. She too fondly wished to believe that he loved her, to trust the evidence of what she saw. His words were ambiguous, and that was sufficient to fill her with uncertainty.

Jealous of that delicacy which is the parent of love, and its best preserver, she checked the overflowings of her heart; and while her concealed face streamed with tears, conjured him to rise. Instinctively she held out her hand to assist him. He obeyed; and hardly conscious of what she said, she continued—

“You have done nothing, Count Sobieski, to offend me. I was fearful of my own conduct—that you might have supposed—I mean, unfortunate appearances might lead you to imagine that I was influenced—was so forgetful of myself—”

“Cease, madam! Cease, for pity’s sake!” cried Thaddeus, starting back, and dropping her hand. Every emotion which faltered on her tongue had met an answering pang in his breast.

Fearing that he had set his heart on the possession of a treasure totally out of his reach, he knew not how high had been his hope until he felt the depth of his disappointment. Taking up his hat, which lay on the grass, with a countenance from which every gleam of joy was banished, he bowed respectfully, and in a lowered tone continued—“The dependent situation in which I appeared at Lady Dundas’s being ever before my eyes, I was not so absurd as to suppose that any lady could then notice me from any other sentiment than humanity. That I excited this humanity, where alone I was proud to awaken it, was, in those hours of dejection, my sole comfort. It consoled me for the friends I had lost; it repaid me for the honors which were no more. But that is past! Seeing no further cause for compassion, you deem the delusion no longer necessary. Since you will not allow me an individual distinction in having attracted your benevolence, though I am to ascribe it all to a charity as diffused as effective; yet I must ever acknowledge, with the deepest gratitude, that I owe my present home and happiness to Miss Beaufort. Further than this, I shall not—I dare not, presume.”

These words shifted all the count’s anguish to Mary’s breast.

She perceived the offended delicacy which actuated every syllable as they fell; and fearful of having lost every thing by her cold and haughty reply, she opened her lips to say what might better explain her meaning; but her heart failing her, she closed them again, and continued to walk in silence by his side. Having allowed the opportunity to escape, she believed that all hopes of exculpation were at an end; and not daring to look up, she cast a despairing glance at Sobieski's graceful figure as he walked near her. His arms were folded, his hat pulled over his forehead; and his long dark eyelashes shading his downward eyes, imparted a dejection to his whole air which wrapped her weeping heart round and round with regretful pangs. "Ah!" thought she, "though the offspring of but one moment, they will prey on my peace forever."

At the turning of a little wooded knoll, the silent and pensive pair heard the sound of some one on the other side, walking toward them through the dry leaves. In a minute after Sir Robert Somerset appeared.

While his father advanced smiling toward him, Thaddeus attempted to dispel the gloom of his countenance; but not succeeding, he bowed abruptly to the agitated Mary; and hastily said, "I will leave Miss Beaufort in your protection, sir, and go myself and see whether or not Lady Albina be recovered from her fatigue."

"I thought to find you all together," returned Sir Robert; "where is her ladyship?"

"I left her with Pembroke in a hut by the river," said Thaddeus, and bowing again he hurried away; while his father called after him to return in a few minutes and accompany him in a walk.

This desertion of Sobieski, when he had come expressly to attend her to Lady Albina, nearly overwhelmed Miss Beaufort's before exhausted spirits; hardly knowing whether to remain or to retreat, she was attempting the latter, when her uncle caught her by the arm.

“Stay,” cried he: “why, Mary, you surely would not leave me alone?”

Miss Beaufort's tears had gushed over her eyes the moment her back was turned; and as Sir Robert drew her toward him, to his extreme amazement he saw that she was weeping. At a sight so unexpected, the smile of hilarity left his lips. Putting his arm tenderly round her waist (for now that her distress had discovered itself, her agitation became so great that she could hardly stand), he inquired in an affectionate voice what afflicted her?

She answered by sobs only, until finding it impossible to break away from her uncle's arms, she hid her face in his bosom, and gave a loose to the full tide of her tears.

Sir Robert, recollecting the strange haste in which Thaddeus hurried from them, and remembering Miss Beaufort's generosity to him in town, followed by her succeeding melancholy, at once united these circumstances with her present confusion; and conceiving an instantaneous suspicion of the reality, pressed her with redoubled affection to his bosom.

“I fear, my dearest girl,” said he, “that something disagreeable has happened between you and the Count Sobieski? Perhaps he has offended you? perhaps he has found my sweet Mary too amiable?”

Alarmed at this supposition, after a short struggle, she answered, “O no, sir! it is I who have offended him. He thinks I pride myself on the insignificant services I rendered to him in London.”

This reply convinced the baronet he had not been premature in his judgment; and, with a new-born delight springing in his soul, he inquired why she thought so? Had she given him any reason to believe so?

Mary trembled at saying more. Dreading that every word she might utter would betray how highly she prized the count's esteem, she faltered, hesitated, stopped. Sir Robert put the question a second time in different terms.

"My loved Mary," said he, seating her by him on the trunk of a fallen tree, "I am sincerely anxious that you and this young nobleman should regard each other as friends; he is very dear to me; and you can not doubt, my sweet girl, my affection for yourself. Tell me, therefore, the cause of this little misunderstanding."

Miss Beaufort took courage at this speech. Drying her glowing eyes, though still concealing them with her handkerchief, she replied in a firmer voice, "I believe, sir, the fault lies totally on my side. The Count Sobieski met me on the terrace, and thanked me for what I had done for him. I acted very weakly; I was confused. Indeed I know not what he said; but he fell upon his knees, and I became so disconcerted—so frightened at the idea of his having attributed my behavior to indelicacy or forwardness, that I answered something which offended him: and I am sure he now thinks me inhuman and proud."

Sir Robert kissed her throbbing forehead, as she ended this rapid and hardly articulate explanation.

"Tell me candidly, my dearest Mary!" said he; "can you believe that a man of Sobieski's disposition would kneel to a woman whom he did not both respect and love? Simple gratitude, my dear girl, is not so earnest. You have said enough to convince me, whatever may be your sentiments, that you are the mistress of his fate; and if he should mention it to me, may I tell him the scene which has now passed between us? May I tell him that its just inference would requite his tenderness with more than your thanks and best wishes?"

Miss Beaufort, who believed that the count must now despise her, looked down to conceal the wretchedness which spoke through her eyes, and with a half-suppressed sigh, answered, "I will not deny that I deeply esteem the Count Sobieski. I admired his character before I saw him; and when I saw him, although ignorant that it was he, my respect increased. Yet I never have aspired to any share in his heart, or even his remembrance: I could not have the presumption. Therefore, my dear uncle," added she, laying her trembling hand on his arm, "I beseech you, as you value my feelings, my peace of mind! never to breathe a syllable of my weakness to him. I think," added she, clasping her hands with energy, and forgetting the force of her expression, "I would sooner suffer death than lose his esteem."

"And yet," inquired Sir Robert, "you will at some future period give your hand to another man?"

Mary, who did not consider the extent of this insidious question, answered with fervor, "Never. I never can be happier than I am," added she, with breathless haste; seeing, by the smile on Sir Robert's lips, that far more had been declared by her manner than the words intended. Fearful of betraying herself further, she begged permission to retire to the house.

The baronet took her hand, and reseating her by him, said, "No, my dearest Mary; you shall not leave me, unless you honestly avow what your sentiments truly are toward the Count Sobieski. You know, my sweet girl, that I have tried to make you regard me as a father; to induce you to receive from my love the treble affection of your deceased parents, and my lamented wife. If my dear niece do not deny this, she can not treat me with reserve."

Miss Beaufort was unable to restrain her tears. Sir Robert continued—

"I will not overwhelm your delicacy by repeating the inquiry whether I have mistaken the source of your recent emotion; only allow me to bestow some encouragement on the count's attachment should he claim my services in its behalf."

Mary drew her uncle's hand to her lips; and while her dropping tears fell upon it, threw herself on her knees, and replied in a timid voice—"I should be a monster of ingratitude could I hide any thing from you, my dearest sir, after this goodness! I confess that I do regard the Count Sobieski more than any being on earth. Who could see and know him and think it possible to love another?"

"And you shall be his! my darling Mary!" cried the baronet, mingling his own blissful tears with hers; "I once hoped to have contrived an attachment between you and Pembroke, but Heaven has decreed it better. When you and Thaddeus are united I shall be happy. I may then die in peace."

Miss Beaufort sighed heavily. She could not participate in her uncle's rapture. She thought that she had insulted and disgusted the count by her late behavior; and was opening her lips to urge it again, when the object of their conversation appeared at a little distance coming toward them. Full of renewed trepidation, she burst from the baronet's hand; and taking to flight, left her uncle to meet Sobieski alone.

Sir Robert's anxious question received a more rapid reply from Thaddeus than had proceeded from the reluctant Miss Beaufort. The animated gratitude of Sobieski, the ardent, yet respectful manner with which he declared her eminence above all other women, soon convinced the baronet that Mary's retreating delicacy had misinformed her. A complete explanation was the consequence; and Thaddeus, who had not been more sanguine in his hopes than his lovely mistress was in hers, allowed the clouds over his sunny eyes to disappear.

Impatient to see these two beings so near to his heart, repose confidently in each other's affection, the moment Sir Robert returned to the house he asked his sister for Miss

Beaufort. Mrs. Dorothy replied that she had seen her about an hour ago retire to her own apartments; the baronet, therefore, sent a servant to beg she would meet him in the library.

This message found her in a paroxysm of distress. She reproached herself for her imprudence, her temerity, her unwomanly conduct, in having given away her heart to a man who never had required it. She remembered that her weakness, not her sincerity, had betrayed this humiliating secret to Sir Robert; and nearly distracted, she lay on the bed, almost hoping she was in a miserable dream, when her maid entered with the baronet's commands.

Disdaining herself, and determining to regain some portion of her own respect by steadily opposing all her uncle's deluding hopes, with an assumed serenity she arrived at the study-door. She laid her hand on the lock, but the moment it yielded to her touch all her firmness vanished; and trembling, and pale as death, she appeared before him.

Sir Robert, having supported her to a chair, with the most affectionate and delicate expressions of paternal affection repeated to her the sum of his conversation with the count. Mary was almost wild at this discourse. So inconsistent and erratic is the passion of love when it reigns in a woman's breast, she forgot in an instant the looks and voice of Thaddeus; she forgot her terror of having forfeited him by her affected coldness alone; and dreading that the first proposal of their union had proceeded from her uncle, she buried her agitated face in her hands, and exclaimed, "Oh, sir! I fear that you have made me forever hateful in my own eyes, and despicable in those of the Count Sobieski!"

Sir Robert tried to assure her that she alarmed herself without a cause; but she would not, she could not be pacified: she believed that her delicacy had been made a rash sacrifice; and was sitting gloomily weeping on a window when the baronet gently added, "Well, Mary, since I can not prevail over this strange incredulity, I will call in a more powerful pleader.”

He rose and opened the door which led to the dining-room. Miss Beaufort instantly got up, and flying to the opposite door, would have retreated had not Sir Robert suddenly thrown himself in her way. He threw his arm about her, and turning her round, she saw the count, who had entered, regarding her with an anxiety which covered her before pale features with blushes.

His father bid him come near. Sobieski obeyed, though with a step that expressed how reluctant he was to oppress the woman he so truly loved. Mary's face was now hidden in her uncle's bosom. Sir Robert put her almost lifeless hand into that of his son, who, dropping on his knee, said in an agitated voice, “Dearest Miss Beaufort, do you really recall the cruel words of this morning? May I indulge myself in the idea that I am blessed with your esteem?”

She could not reply, but whispered her uncle, “Pray, sir, desire him to rise! I am already sufficiently overwhelmed.”

“My sweet Mary!” returned the baronet, pressing her in his arms, “this is no time for deception on either side. I know both your hearts. Rise, Thaddeus,” said he to the count, while he locked both their hands within his: “Take him, Mary! receive from your uncle his most precious gift—my matchless and injured son.”

The shock which the first part of this speech occasioned Miss Beaufort would have sunk her exhausted spirits to insensibility had not the extraordinary assertion at the end, and Sir Robert's audible sobs, aroused and surprised her.

“Your son!” exclaimed she: “what do you mean, my uncle?”

“Thaddeus will explain all to you,” returned he. “May Heaven bless you both!”

Mary was too much astonished to think of following her agitated uncle out of the room. She sunk on a seat, and turning her eyes full of amazement toward the count, seemed to demand an explanation. Thaddeus, who still retained her passive hand, pressed it warmly to his heart; and while his effulgent eyes were beaming transport and love, he imparted to her a concise but impressive narrative of his relationship with Sir Robert. He touched with short, yet ardent enthusiasm on the virtues of his mother; he acknowledged the unbounded gratitude that was due to that God who had so wonderfully conducted him to find a parent and a home in England; and with renewed pathos of look and manner ratified the proffer which Sir Robert had made of his heart and hand.

Mary listened with uncontrollable emotion to this interesting detail. Her eyes overflowed: their ingenuous language, enforced by the eloquent blood which glowed on her cheek, did not require the medium of words to declare what was passing in her mind. Thaddeus gazed on her with a certainty of bliss which penetrated his soul until its raptures almost amounted to pain. The heart may ache with joy: neither sighs nor language could express what passed in the count's: he held her hand to his lips: his other arm fell unconsciously round her waist; and in a moment he found he had pressed her to his breast. His heart beat violently. Miss Beaufort rose instantaneously from her chair; but her pure nature needed no disguise: she looked up to him, while her blushing eyes were shedding tears of delight, and pronounced in a trembling voice, "Tell my dear uncle that Mary Beaufert glories in the means by which she becomes his daughter."

She moved to the door: Thaddeus, whose full tide of transport denied him utterance, only clasped her hands again to his lips and bosom; then, relinquishing them, he suffered her to quit the room.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

THE magnificent establishment which this projected union offered to Sobieski seemed to heal the yet bleeding conscience of Sir Robert Somerset. Although he had acquiesced in the count's generous surrender of the family honors, his heart remained ill at ease. Every dutiful expression from this long-neglected son stabbed him with unavailing remorse. Conscious that his criminal marriage with Pembroke's mother deprived the son of Therese of his just inheritance, he could never meet Sobieski's filial attentions without enduring pangs of self-reproach which embittered all his joy. Miss Beaufort's avowed and returned affection at once removed the sting of this incessant recollection: mistress of immense wealth, her hand would not only put the injured Thaddeus in possession of the pure delights which are dependent on mutual sympathy, but would empower his munificent spirit to again exert itself in the disposal of an almost princely fortune.

Such meditations having followed the now tranquilized baronet to his pillow, they brought him into the breakfast-parlor next day full of that calm pleasure which promises a steady continuance. The happy family were assembled. Mrs. Dorothy saluted her brother, whose brightened eye declared that he had something pleasant to communicate; and he did not keep her in suspense. With the first dish of coffee which was poured out, his grateful heart unburdened itself of the delightful tidings that before the present month should expire, Miss Beaufort would give her hand to the Count Sobieski. Pembroke was the only hearer who did not express surprise at this declaration. The transported Thaddeus had flown to his bedside the preceding night, and with a bounding and enraptured heart related the recent scenes.

During Sir Robert's animated speech, Mary's blushing yet triumphant eyes sought a veil in a branch of geranium which she held in her trembling hand and affected to smell.

Mrs. Dorothy rose from her chair ; her smiling tears spoke more than her lips, when she pressed first her niece, and then the Count Sobieski, in her venerable arms.

“Heaven bless you both!” cried she. “This marriage will be the glory of my age.”

Miss Beaufort turned from the embrace of her aunt to meet the warm congratulations of Pembroke. While he kissed her burning cheek, he whispered loud enough for every one to hear, “and why may I not participate in my good aunt's triumph? Attempt it, dear Mary! If you can persuade my father to allow me to make myself as happy with Lady Albina Stanhope as you will render Sobieski, I shall forever bless you!”

Lady Albina colored and looked down. Sir Robert took her hand with a smile of pleased surprise. “Do you, my lovely guest—do you sanction what this bold boy has just said?”

Lady Albina made no answer, but blushing deeper than before, cast a sidelong glance at Pembroke as if to petition his support. He was at her side in an instant ; then seriously and earnestly entreating his father's consent to an union with his cousin (whose approbation of his passion he had obtained the preceding day in the shepherd's hut), he awaited with hoping anxiety the sounds which seemed faltering on Sir Robert's lips.

The baronet, quite overcome by his darling Pembroke having like his brother disposed of his heart so much to his own honor, found himself unable to say what he wished ; and joining the hands of the two young people in silence, hurried out of the room. He ascended to the library where, kneeling down, he returned devout thanks to that all-gracious Being who crowned one so unworthy with blessings so conspicuous.

Thaddeus no less than his father, remembered the hand which, having guided him through a thorny but short path of sorrow, had, in the end, conducted him to an Eden of bliss; his heart did not forget, even in the midst of gayety and smiles, the ardent gratitude which was due to the beneficent Dispenser of his happiness.

Before the lapse of a week it was discovered that Sir Robert must hasten the marriage of Pembroke with Lady Albina or be forced by law to yield her to the demands of her father. After much search Lord Tinemouth learned that his daughter was under the protection of Sir Robert Somerset. Inflamed with rage and revenge he sent to order her immediate return under pain of an instantaneous appeal to the courts of judicature.

Too well aware that her nonage laid her open to the realizing of this threat, Lady Albina fell into the most alarming fits on the first communication of the message. Sir Robert urged that in her circumstances no authority could be opposed to the ear's, excepting that of a husband's; and on this consideration she complied with his arguments and the prayers of her lover directly to give that power into the hands of Pembroke.

Accordingly next morning by daybreak, accompanied by Mrs. Dorothy and the enraptured Mr. Somerset, the terrified Lady Albina commenced her journey to Scotland; that being the only place where, in her situation, the marriage could be legally solemnized.

While these young runaways, chaperoned by an old maiden aunt, were pursuing their rapid flight to Gretna Green, Sir Robert sent his steward to London to prepare two houses near his own in Grosvenor square, for the reception of his children. During these necessary arrangements a happy fortnight elapsed at Deerhurst. Thrice happy to Mary, because its tranquil hours imparted to her captive heart "a sober cer tainty of that waking bliss," which had so often animated the visions of her imagination. Morning, noon, and evening, the companion of the Count Sobieski, she saw with added enthusiasm that the sublime and princely virtues did not reign alone in his bosom. Their insufferable brightness was rendered less intense, was beautifully veiled by the softening shades of those gentle amiabilities which are the soothers and sweeteners of life. His breast seemed the residence of love; of a love that not only infused a warmer existence through her soul, but diffused such a light of benevolence over every being within its influence, that all appeared happy who caught a beam of his eye; all enchanted who shared the magic of his smile. Under what different effects had she seen this man! Yet how consistent! At the first period of their acquaintance, she beheld him, like that glorious orb which her ardent fancy told her he resembled, struggling with the storm, or looking with steady grandeur through the clouds which obscured his path; but now, like the radiant sun of summer amid a splendid sky, he seemed to stand the source of light, and love, and joy.

Thus did the warm fancy and warmer heart of Mary Beaufort paint the image of her lover; and when Sir Robert received intelligence that the Gretna Green party had arrived in town, and were impatient for the company of the dear inhabitants of Deerhurst, on preparing to return to the gay world, she confessed that some embers of human frailty did sparkle in her bosom, at the anticipation of witnessing the homage which they, who had despised the unfriended Constantine, would pay to the declared and illustrious Sobieski.

The news of Lady Albina's marriage enraged the Earl of Tinemouth almost to madness. Well aware that his withholding her fortune would occasion no uneasiness to a family of Sir Robert Somerset's vast possessions, he gave way to still more vehement bursts of passion; and in a fit of impotent threatening embarked with all his household to spend the remainder of the season on his estates in Ireland.

This abrupt departure of the earl caused Lady Albina little uneasiness. His unremitted cruelty, her brother's indifference, and the barbed insults of Lady Sophia Lovel, rankled too deeply to leave any filial regret behind. Considering their absence a suspension of pain, rather than a punishment, she did not stain the kiss which she imprinted on the revered cheek of her new parent with one tear to the memory of her unnatural father.

While all was preparation, splendor and happiness in Grosvenor-square, Thaddeus did not forget the excellent Mrs. Robson. He hastened to St. Martin's-lane, where the good woman received him with open arms. Nanny hung, crying for joy, upon his hand; and sprung rapturously about his neck when he told her he was now a rich man, and that she and her grandmother should live with him forever. "I am going to be married, my dear Mrs. Robson," said he; "that ministering angel who visited you while I was in prison, has wiped away all tears from my eyes." Drying the cheek of his weeping landlady as he spoke, with his own handkerchief, he continued: "She commanded me not to leave you until you had assured me you will brighten our happiness by taking possession of a pretty cottage which is close to her house in Kent. It is within Beaufort Park; and there my Mary and myself will visit you continually."

"Blessed Mr. Constantine!" cried the worthy woman, pressing his hand, "myself, my Nanny—we are yours;—take us where you please;—for wherever you go, there will the Almighty's hand lead us, and there will his right hand hold us."

The count rose and turned to the window; his heart was full; and he was obliged to take time to recover himself before he could resume the conversation. He saw her twice after this; and on the day of her departure for Kent, he put into her hand the first quarterly payment of an annuity which would henceforward afford her every comfort, and raise her to that easy rank in society which her gentle manners and rare virtues were so admirably fitted to adorn. Neither did he neglect Mr. Burket. It was not in his nature to allow any who had served him to pass unrequited. He visited him on the day he called in St. Martin's-lane; and having repaid him, with a generosity which astonished even the good money-lender, he took his sword, with the other relics of what were once so dear; and pressing them mournfully yet gratefully to his breast, re-entered Sir Robert's carriage, and drove home.

Next day Thaddeus directed his steps to Dr. Cavendish's. He found his worthy friend at home, who received him with kindness. But how was that kindness increased to transport when Thaddeus told him with a smiling countenance that he was the very Sobieski about whose wayward fate he had asked so many ill-answered questions! The delighted doctor embraced him with an ardor which spoke, better than language, his admiration and esteem. His amazement having subsided, he was discoursing with animated interest on events at once so fatal and so glorious to Sobieski when a gentleman was announced by the name of Mr. Hopetown. He entered; and Dr. Cavendish at the same time introducing Thaddeus as the Count Sobieski, Mr. Hopetown fixed his eyes upon him with an expression which neither of the friends could comprehend. A little disconcerted at the merchant's rudeness, the good doctor attempted to draw off the steadiness of his gaze by asking him how long he had been in England.

"I left Dantzic," replied he, "about a fortnight ago; and I should have been in London five days ago, but a favorite horse of mine which I brought with me fell sick at Harwich; and I waited until he was well enough to travel."

While he spoke, he never withdrew his eyes from the face of Thaddeus; who at the words Dantzic and horse recollected ms faithful Saladin; and almost hoping that this Mr. Hoptown might prove to be the Briton to whom he had consigned the noble animal, he took a part in the conversation by inquiring of the merchant whether he were a resident of Dantzic.

“No, my lord,” replied he: “I live within a mile of it. Several years ago I quitted the smoke and bustle of the town to enjoy fresh air and quiet.”

“Last year,” rejoined Sobieski, “I passed through Dantzic in my way to England. I believe I saw your house and remarked its situation: the park is beautiful.”

“And I am indebted, count,” resumed the merchant, “to a nobleman of your country for its finest ornament: I mean the very horse I spoke of just now. He was sent to me one morning, with a letter from his brave owner requesting me to give him shelter in my park. He is the most beautiful animal I ever beheld; and, unwilling to leave so valuable a deposit when I came to England, I brought him with me.”

“Poor Saladin!” cried Thaddeus, his heart overflowing with remembrance; “how glad I shall be to see thee!”

“What! was the horse yours?” asked Dr. Cavendish, surprised at this apostrophe.

“Yes,” returned Thaddeus, “he was mine! and I owe Mr. Hoptown a thousand thanks for his generous acquiescence with the prayers of an unfortunate stranger.”

“No thanks to me, Count Sobieski. The moment I entered this room I recollected you to be the same Polish officer I had observed on the beach at Dantzic. When I described your figure to the man who brought the horse, he said it was the same who gave him the letter. I could not learn your lordship’s name; but I hoped one day or other to have the pleasure of meeting you again, and of returning Saladin into your hands in as good condition as when he came to mine.”

Tears started into the eyes of Thaddeus.

“That horse, Mr. Hoptown, has carried me through many a bloody field; he alone witnessed my last adieu to the bleeding corpse of my country! I shall receive him again as an old and dear friend; but to his kind protector how can I ever demonstrate the whole of my gratitude?"*

"To have had it in my power to serve the Count Sobieski is a privilege of itself," returned Mr. Hopetown. "I am proud of that distinction; and to be called the friend of a man whom all the world honors, will be a title which John Hopetown would not exchange to be made sovereign of the Indies!"

Before the worthy merchant took his leave he promised Thaddeus to send Saladin to Grosvenor-square that evening; and to accompany Dr. Cavendish to meet the count the following day at dinner, at Mr. Somerset's.

CHAPTER XLIX.

LADY ALBINA SOMERSET'S arrival in London was greeted by the immediate visits of all the people in town who had been

* The love of Thaddeus to his horse has had some resemblances in the author's knowledge, in yet more recent times. For it seems to belong to the brave heart of every country in our civilized Europe, as well as to that of the wild Arab of the desert, to companion itself with his war-steed as with a friend or brother. I knew more than one gallant man who wept over the doom of his horse when shot in the lines near Corunna; and another, of the same and other fields, who never can mention, without turning pale, the name of his faithful and beloved horse Columbus; who had carried him through various dangers on the South American Continent, and at last perished at his side during a tremendous storm at sea, when no exertions of his master could save him. These are pangs of which only those who have the generous sensibility to feel them can have any idea. But they are true to the noble nature of which the inspired page speaks, when it says, "The just man is merciful to his beast."

acquainted with the late Countess of Tinemouth, or known to the baronet's family. Among the earliest names whose tickets appeared at her door, were those of Lord Berrington, Captain and Mrs. Montresor, and Dr. Blackmore. Lady Albina did not propose opening her gates to the gay world until Miss Beaufort and the count were married, and both bridal parties had been presented at court; but having heard Pembroke speak with particular respect of the select few mentioned above, when she took the list of her numerous visitors out of the porter's hand, she requested that these might be the first who should grace her table. To this group of friends Thaddeus informed the fair bride that he had taken the liberty to add Dr. Cavendish, and Mr. Hopetown of Dantzic.

When the count alighted at Mr. Somerset's door on the appointed day, he was rejoiced to see so many happy countenances. Lady Albina received Dr. Cavendish and Mr. Hopetown with graceful hospitality. But the lovely Mary taking the hand of the generous protector of Saladin, pressed it warmly; and accompanied the action with a sincere avowal of her interest in every thing that was attached to the count. Sobieski turned to meet Lord Berrington, and the ever lively Maria Egerton (now Mrs. Montresor), who both ran up to him at the same instant to express their joy at not only seeing him again, but in a situation so consonant to his fame and quality.

Thaddeus replied to their felicitations with a frankness and grace peculiarly his own; and was not a little surprised when Dr. Blackmore, a moment afterward, recognized him to be the stranger who had so much engaged his attention about a twelvemonth before. The count did not recollect the circumstance until the good doctor brought the very hour to his remembrance by mentioning the Hummums; and recapitulating the rudeness of the man in black, whose name, he said, he had since learned was Loftus.

Pembroke could hardly hear the worthy clergyman to an end. He exclaimed against his vile tutor's indefatigable villainy; and turning to Sir Robert, exclaimed, "My dear sir the recent happy events have hitherto averted justice from seizing this man; but I must beg that his connection with any thing belonging to us may end, even to-morrow."

The baronet promised; and Sobieski, trying to change a conversation which agitated his brother, addressed Mrs. Montresor on some general topic. Captain Montresor joined them, and expressed great regret at the loss he should shortly suffer in the absence of his friend Captain Roos.

"How? Whither is he going?" demanded his wife.

Montresor replied by lamenting the ill state of Lady Sara Roos's health, and the necessity which her husband found to carry her to Italy for its restoration.

"I met him this morning," continued he, "in despair about her."

Thaddeus too well defined that this increased indisposition owed its rise to his return to town; and, inwardly petitioning Heaven that absence might complete her cure, he could not suppress the sigh which her fatal devotedness to him wrung from his pity and his gratitude.

No one present, except the affectionate Mary, marked the transient melancholy which passed over his countenance. She, who had suspected the unhappy Lady Sara's attachment, loved Thaddeus, if possible, still dearer for the compassion he bestowed on the victim of a passion often as inscrutable as destructive.

When the party descended to dinner, Mrs. Dorothy, who sat next to Thaddeus, rallied him upon the desertion of one of his most dauntless admirers. This strange attack, following so closely the information relating to Lady Sara Roos, summoned a fervid color into the face of the count: he looked surprised and rather confusedly at the good old lady, who smiling, related what she had been told that morning, by her milliner, of Miss Euphemia Dundas having married a Scotch nobleman at Hamilton.

“So much the better for Miss Beaufort!” cried Pembroke: “her jealous fears may now be at an end: little Phemy was no contemptible rival. Besides, Albina,” said he, turning gayly to her ladyship, “you may congratulate yourself on the same score. I hear that an old friend of mine is going to take her loving sister off my hands. Come, Lord Berrington, you must validate my report, for I learned it of you.”

His lordship smiled, and answered in the affirmative; adding, that a friend of his had written to him as news that “the eldest son of Sir Halerand Shafto was on the point of marriage with Miss Dundas, who was visiting my Lady Shafto, his mother.”

Sobieski wished them happy. Lord Berrington protested the count was more generous than just.

“I vow to Heaven,” cried his lordship, “I never knew people the aim of whose lives seemed so bent on mischief. Euphemia, pretty as she is, was better known by her spirit of tormenting than by her beauty; and as for the poor squire whom Diana has conjured into matrimony, I have little doubt of his future honors.”

“Ah!” cried Mrs. Montresor, “poor fool! I warrant she will allot him the punishment he merits, for stepping between her and that delectable Endymion Lascelles!”

“A truce, my dear madam!” entreated Miss Beaufort.

“She does not deserve it of you,” returned the laughing lady, pursuing the subject; until Mrs. Dorothy and Sir Robert Somerset were obliged to call loudly upon charity.

Thaddeus who knew not the nature of that disposition which rejoices over the probable misconduct of our enemies, thought this conversation by far the least pleasant of the day.

Pembroke’s wish with regard to Mr. Loftus was complied with next morning. Dr. Blackmore being prevailed upon to take charge of the young Lord Arun, reluctantly bore the mandate for his predecessor's dismissal, and set out the same day for the seat of his lordship's aunt.

While Sir Robert Somerset denounced the guilty, he was careful neither to plunge him into fresh temptations, nor to suffer his crimes to injure the innocent. In pity to age and helplessness, he settled two hundred pounds per annum on the wretched man's mother and sisters in Wales. And shortly after, in consequence of Loftus's confessing that all Pembroke's allegations were but too just, Sir Robert judged one hundred more to be yearly paid to the culprit himself; that, at least, he might not be induced to obtain subsistence by new villainies. As for the living of Somerset, which had been the price of Mr. Loftus's integrity, that Sir Robert determined to bestow on Dr. Blackmore whenever it should fall.

The appointed day being arrived in which Miss Beaufort was to give herself, and her earthly happiness, into the power of the only man to whom (having once beheld him) she could ever have resigned them, she pronounced her vows at the altar with unsteadiness of tongue, but a fixed heart. And when she alighted at her own paternal mansion in Kent, she received the congratulations of the old domestics, with a tenderness, an elevation of soul, which drowned her glowing and enraptured face in tears.

Mrs. Robson, and the joyous little Nanny dressed in a white frock for the occasion, threw themselves at her feet, at the entrance of the drawing-room, and sobbed forth their happiness in the count's arms; who gently raised them both; embracing them with a filial tenderness, which hailed the old lady as a parent; and the sweet girl, as an adopted child.

Sobieski was fully sensible to all the duties, all the privileges, all the joys of the favored path which Providence now spread before him. He had passed through hosts of evils, and he now looked forward to a long sabbath of peace and gratitude. He found it at Beaufort Hall. He enjoyed its full possession, when he returned to town, and saw his beautiful wife at the head of fashion; not only adorning his house, but filling his home with all the ineffable comforts of domestic life, and domestic virtues.

One fine evening in which they were out together, she ordered the carriage to stop in Covent Garden. When it drew up, she expressed a wish to walk through the church-yard. Thaddeus complied; and before he had time to express his surprise at the strangeness of her request, she led him toward the grave of his revered friend Butzou. It was no longer the same; a white marble tablet occupied the place of grass and yarrow. The count bent forward and read, with swimming eyes, the following inscription:—

STOP, TRAVELER, THOU TREADEST ON A HERO!

HERE

RESTS THE BODY

OF

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL BUTZOU.

Sobieski's soul was pierced. Incapable of speaking, he led his wife back to her carriage; and placing her within it, clasped her suddenly and fondly to his breast. His tears gushed out in spite of himself, and mingling with her's, poured those thanks, those assurances of animated approbation through her heart, as made it even ache with excess of happiness.*

* To see this tomb, many were the visitants to the church-yard described, for a considerable time after the publication of the work; and the sexton of the period has often lamented the unaccountable circumstance which must have removed an object that brought him so much profit, even in search of it. Subsequent alterations, on a more extensive scale, have now obliterated the very site of the lowly dwelling in St. Martin's Lane, which had become an object of a similar curiosity. But the author would

Thus mutually endeared, we leave the family of Sir Robert Somerset. We leave Thaddeus Sobieski, blessed in the fruition of every earthly good. The Virtues, the Muses, and the Charities, were the guests at his table. Misfortune could not veil Genius from his eyes; nor calamity obscure the brightness of the just. Though banished from his native country, where his birth gave him dominion over rich territories, now in ruins; and a once numerous and happy people, now no more; he had not yet relinquished the love of empire. But it was not over principalities, and embattled hosts that he wished to extend the scepter of command—he wished to reign in the soul: his throne was in the hearts of the Good, the Amiable, and the Unfortunate. The Unhappy of every rank and nation, found refuge, consolation, and repose among the shades of Beaufort. No eye looked wistfully on him to turn away and weep; no voice addressed him with the petition of distress, to close it with the sigh of disappointment: his smiles cheered the disconsolate; and his protecting arms warded off the approach of new sorrows. “Peace was within his walls and plenteousness within his palaces.” And, when a few eventful months distinguished their course with the death of the imperious destroyer of Poland, and General Kosciusko (having been set at liberty by her generous successor, and honorably treated) arrived in England, he was received with the warmest welcome by his now happy friend:—“Ah, my dear general,” cried he, as he clasped the veteran to his breast; “I am indeed favored above mortals:—I see thee again on whom I believed the gates of a Russian prison had closed forever. I have all that remains of my country now within my arms—pressing upon my heart! Kosciusko, my friend, my father, bless your son!”— fain hope the same oblivion will not fall to the lot of the humble individuals, the possessors of that house, who really had the “local habitation and the name;” and were the hospitable and tender soothers of “the poor and noble destitute.”

Kosciusko did bless him; and embalmed the benediction with a shower of tears, more precious than the richest unction that ever flowed on a royal head—they were drawn from the heart of a hero. Sobieski presented his lovely wife to his illustrious friend; and while he gratefully acknowledged the rare felicity of his ultimate fate, he owned that the retrospection of past misfortunes, like shade to a picture, gives to our present bliss greater force and brightness. But, that the felicity was his, he could only ascribe to the gracious providence of that God, who “trieth the spirit of man,” and can bring him to a joy on earth, even like a resurrection from the dead.

THE END

TUFTS UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES

3 9090 003 861 362

PR5189.P5 T5 1800

Porter, Jane, 1776-1850.
Thaddeus of Warsaw.
[18---?]

