The important secret of the apostasy. His religious disinclination of Julian was intrusted to the fidelity of the initiated, with whom he was united by the sacred ties of friendship and religion. The pleasing rumour was cautiously circulated among the adherents of the Platonian school, as an object of the hopes, the prayers, and the predictions of the pagans, in every province of the empire. From the zeal and virtues of their royal prospelyte, they fondly expected the cure of every evil, and the restoration of every blessing; and instead of disapproving of the arbour of Jove, they recommended it to the Julianists. It was reported that he was ambitious to attain a situation, in which he might be useful to his country and to his religion. But this religion was viewed with an hostile eye by the successor of Constantine, whose passionate and alternately saved and threatened the life of Julian.

The arts of magic and divination were strictly prohibited under a despotic government, which condescending to fear them; and if the pagans were reluctantly indulged in the exercise of their superstition, the rank of Julian would have excepted him from the general inhibition. His ardent ambition and dextrous policy, the speculative heir of the monarchy, and his death could alone have appeased the just apprehensions of the Christians.
But the young prince, who aspired to the glory of a hero rather than of a martyr, consulted his safety by dissembling his religion; and the easy temper of Polytheism permitted him to join in the public worship of a sect which he inwardly despised. Libanius has considered the hypocrisy of his friend as a subject not of censure, but of praise. "As the statues of the gods," says that orator, "which have been defiled with filth, and again purified with water, prove that the beauty of truth was seated in the mind of Julian, after it had been purified from the errors and follies of his education. His sentiments were changed, but as it would have been dangerous to have avowed his sentiments, his conduct still continued the same. Very different from his philosopher, Zosip, who disguised himself within Julian's hide, out from which, according to Euseb, he concealed himself under the skin of an ass; and, while he embraced the dictates of reason, to obey the laws of prudence and necessity." The dissolution of Julian lasted above ten years, from his secret initiation at Ephesus to the beginning of the civil war; when he declared himself at once the implacable enemy of Christ and of Constantius. This state of constraint might contribute to strengthen his devotion; and as soon as he had satisfied the obligation of assisting, on solemn festivals, at the assemblies of the christians, Julian returned, with the impatience of a lover, to burn his free and voluntary incense in the common temple of religion, without distinction of sects. But as every act of dissimulation must be painful to an ingenuous spirit, the profession of Christianity increased the aversion of Julian for a religion which oppressed the freedom of his mind, and compelled him to hold a conduct repugnant to the noblest attributes of human nature—simplicity and courage.

The inclination of Julian might prefer Christianity, the gods of Homer, and of the Scipios, to the new faith, which his uncle had established in the Roman empire; and in which he himself had been sanctified by the sacrament of baptism. But, as a philosoper, it was incumbent on him to justify his dissent from Christianity, which was supported by the number of its converts, by the chain of prophecy, the splendour of miracles, and the weight of evidence. The elaborate work, which he composed amidst the preparations of the Persian war, contained the substance of his reasonings on this subject, which are still preserved in his mind. Some fragments have been transcribed and preserved, by his adversary, the vehement Cyril of Alexandria; and they exhibit a very singular mixture of wit and learning, of sophistry and fanaticism. The elegance of the style, and the rank of the author, recommended these pages to universal attention; and in the impious list of the enemies of Christianity, the celebrated name of Porphyry was effaced by the superior merit or reputation of Julian. The minds of the faithful were either seduced, or scandalized, or alarmed; and the pagans, who sometimes presumed to engage in the unequal dispute, derived, from the popular reputation of their imperial missionary, an inexhaustible supply of fallacious objections. But in the assiduous prosecution of these theological studies, the emperor of the Romans imbibed the libellous prejudices and passions of a polemic divine. He contrived an irrevocable obligation to maintain and propagate his religious opinions; and whilst he secretly applauded the strength and dexterity with which he wielded the weapons of controversy, he was tempted to despise the cold reason, to inveigh against the understanding, of his antagonists, who could obstinately resist the force of reason and eloquence.

The Christians, who beheld with horror Universal toleration and indignation the apostasy of Julian, were not so acutely affected. He had much more to fear from his power than from his arguments. The pagans, who sincerely admired the purity of his fervent zeal, expected, perhaps with impatience, that the flames of persecution should be immediately kindled against the enemies of the gods; and that the ingenious malice of Julian would invent some cruel refinements of death and torture, which had been unknown to the ancients. But, they said, "who could resist the anger of the gods? But the hopes, as well as the fears, of the religious factions were apparently disappointed, by the prudent humanity of a prince, who was careful of his own fame, of the public peace, and of the rights of mankind. Instructed by history and reflection, Julian was persuaded, that if the diseases of the body may sometimes be cured by solitary violence, neither steel nor fire can eradicate the erroneous opinions of the mind. The reluctant victim may be dragged to the foot of the altar; but the heart still abhors and disdain the sacrilegious act of the hand. Religious obstinacy is hardened and exasperated by oppression; and, as soon as the religious subsystems, which had been yielded, are restored as penitents, and those who have resisted, are honoured as saints and martyrs. If Julian adopted the unsuccessful cruelty of Diocletian and his colleagues, he was sensible that he should stain his memory with the name of tyrant, and add new gloires to the Catholic church, which had derived strength and increase from the severity of the pagan magistrates. Actuated by these motives, and apprehensive of disturbing the repose of an unsettled reign, Julian surprised the world by an edict, which was not unworthy of a statesman or a philosopher. He extended to all the inhabitants of the Roman world the privilege of a public profession, of their religion; and the only hardship which he inflicted on the christians, was to deprive them of the power of tormenting their fellow-subjects, whom they stigmatized with the odious titles of idolaters and heretics. The pagans received a gracious permission, or rather an expression of the opinion of the emperor, and they were once delivered from the oppressive laws, and arbitrary vexations, which they had sustained under the reign of Constantine and of his sons. At the same time the bishops and clergy, who had been banished by the Arian monarch, were recalled from exile, and received every honor, and the Donatists, the Novatians, the Macedonians, the Eunomians, and those who, with a more prosperous fortune, adhered to the doctrine of the council of Nice. Julian, who understood and derided their theological disputes, invited to the palace the leaders of the hostile sects, that he might enjoy the agreeable spectacle of their various encounters. The clamour of controversy sometimes provoked the emperor to exclaim, "Hear me! the Franks have heard me, and the Alemanni." but he soon discovered that he was now engaged with more obstinate and implacable enemies; and though he exerted the powers of oratory to persuade them to live in concord, or at least in peace, he was perfectly satisfied, before he dismissed them from his presence, that he had nothing to dread from the union of the christians. The impartial Ammianus has ascribed this af

3 About seventy years after the death of Julian, he executed a task which had been freely offered by Philip of Side, a prolix and contemporary writer. Even the work of Cyril has not entirely satisfied the most favorable judges: and the Abbe de la Blettere (Pre- face a la Hist. de Jovien, p. 30, 32, 36) wishes that some theologians, who had been to the Mount of Olives, would undertake the history of Julian. cf. Libanius, (Orat. Parental, c. xlviii, p. 313.) who has been sup- posed of assisting his friend, prefers this divine vivification (Orat. i. c.) to those in recent Julian, p. 555, edit. Marcil. to the writings of Porphyry. His judgment may be arraigned, (Socrates, i. i. c. 22.) but Libanius cannot be accused of flattery to a dead prince.
4 Libanius, (Orat. Parental, c. xvii, p. 283, 284.) has eloquently explained the total weakness and passivity of his imperial friend. In a very remarkable epistle to the people of Ostroh, Julian himself, (ib.) professes his ignorance of, and dislike to, a strange and undetermined force, which impedes his intellect. ed. He is acknowledged by Ammianus, and exposed by Gregory. (Orat. iii. p. 72.) 5 In 431 the emperor, as the bishop of Minervius was opened by his express command, before the death of Constantius (Lib. Orat. Parental, c. xxxv, p. 289;) and Julian declares himself a pagan, in his public man- festo to the Athenians. This unquestionable evidence may correct the hasty assertion of Ammianus, who seems to suppose Constantine to be the place where he discovered his attachment to the gods.
declared eloquently to the desire of founding the intestine divisions of the church; and the insidious design of undermining the foundations of Christianity, was insensibly connected with the zeal, which Julian professed, to restore the ancient religion of the empire. As soon as he ascended the throne, he assumed, according to the custom of his predecessors, the name of pontiff; not only as the most honourable title of imperial greatness, but as a sacred and important office; the duties of which he was resolved to execute with pious diligence. As the business of the state prevented the emperor from joining every day at the altar of his subject divinities, he resolved to rededicate a domestic chapel to his tutelar deity the Sun; his gardens were filled with statues and altars of the gods; and each apartment of the palace displayed the appearance of a magnificent temple. Every morning he saluted the parent of light with a sacrifice; the blood of another victim was shed at the moment when the sun sunk below the horizon; and the moon, the stars, and the genius of the night, received their respective and seasonable honours from the indefatigable devotion of Julian. On solemn festivals, he regularly visited the temple, or godly temple, too, on the day when it was peculiarly consecrated, and endeavoured to excite the religion of the magistrates and people by the example of his own zeal. Instead of maintaining the lofty state of a monarch, distinguished by the splendour of his purple, and encompassed by the golden shields of his honour, and enriched with the title of the most exalted, the meanest offices which contributed to the worship of the gods. Amidst the sacred but licentious crowd of priests, of inferior ministers, and of female dancers, who were dedicated to the service of the temple, it was the business of the emperor to bring the wood, to blow the flames of the fire, to feed the flames, to pour the wine, and, thrusting his bloody hands into the bowels of the expiring animal, to draw forth the heart or liver, and to read, with the consummate skill of a haruspex, the imaginary signs of future events. The wisest of the pagans censured this extravagant superstition, which affected to despise the restrictions of prudence and decency. Under the reign of a prince, who practised the rigid maxims of economy, the expense of religious worship consumed a very large portion of the revenue; a constant supply of the sacrificial and most beautiful birds was derived from distant climates, to be offered on the altars of the gods; an hundred oxen were frequently sacrificed by Julian on one and the same day; and it soon became a popular jest, that if he should return with conquest from the Persian war, the breed of domestic cattle must infallibly be extinguished. Yet this excess may appear inconsiderable, when it is compared with the splendid presents which were offered, either by the hand, or by order, of the emperor, to all the celebrated places of devotion in the Roman world; and with the sums allotted to repair and decorate the ancient temples, which had suffered the silent decay of time or the recent injuries of Christian rapacity. Encouraged by the example, the exhortations, the liberality, of their pious sovereign, the cities and families resumed the practice of their neglected ceremonies. Every part of the world, exhales Libanius, with devout transport, displayed the triumph of religion; and the grateful prospect of the immortal, bleeding victims, the smoke of incense, and a solemn train of priests and prophets, without fear and without danger. The sound of prayer and of music was heard on the tops of the highest mountains; and the same ox afford ed a sacrifice for the gods, and a supper for their joyous votaries.

But the genius and power of Julian, Reformation of were unequivalent to the enterprise of restoring paganism, a religion, which was destitute of theological principles, of moral precepts, and of ecclesiastical discipline; which rapidly hastened to decay and dissolution, and was not susceptible of any solid or consistent reformation. The jurisdiction of the supreme pontiff, more especially in the person of suppliant and humble Julian, comprehended the whole extent of the Roman empire. Julian named for his vicars, in the several provinces, the priests and philosophers, whom he esteemed the best qualified to co-operate in the extension of his great design; and his pastoral letters, if we may so term them, are curious sketches of his wishes and intentions. He directs, that in every city the sacerdotal order should be composed, without any distinction of birth or fortune, of those persons who were the most conspicuous for their love of the gods, and of men. "If they are guilty," continues he, "of any scandalous offence, they should be censured or degraded by the superior pontiff; but, as long as they retain their rank, they are entitled to the respect of the magistrates and people. Their humility may be shown in the plainness of their dress, or in the sobriety of their provisions and entertainments. When they are summoned in their turn to officiate before the altar, they ought not, during the appointed number of days, to depart from the precincts of the temple; nor should a single day be suffered to elapse, without the prayers and the sacrifice, which they are bound to perform, with respect to the gods and of individuals. The exercise of their sacred functions requires an immeasurable purity, both of mind and body; and even when they are dismissed from the temple to the occupations of common life, it is incumbent on them to excel in decency and virtue the rest of their fellow-citizens. They should never be seen in theatres or taverns. His conversation should be chaste, his diet temperate, his friends of honourable reputation; and if he sometimes visits the forum or the palace, he should appear only as the advocate of those who have vainly solicited either justice or money. His studies should be suited to the sanctity of his profession. Licentious tales, or comedies, or satires, must be banished from his library, which ought solely to consist of historical and philosophical writings; of history which is founded in truth, and of philosophy which is united with religion. The impious opinions of the epicureans, and sceptics, observe his abhorrence and contempt; but he should diligently study the systems of Pythagoras, of Plato, and of the Stoics, which unanimously teach that there are gods; that the world is governed by their providence, and that the world has been prepared for the human soul a future state of reward or punishment. The imperial pontiff inculcates, in the most perspicuous language, the duties of benevolence and hospitality; exhorts his inferior clergy to recommend the universal practice of these virtues; promises to assist their inducement from the public treasury; and declares his resolution of establishing hospitals in every city, where the poor should be received without any invidious distinction of country or of religion. Julian beheld with envy the wise and humane regulations of the church. and he very frankly confesses his intention to deprive the christians of the applause, as well as advantage, which they had acquired by the exclusive practice of charity and beneficence. The same spirit of imitation might dispose the emperor to adopt several ecclesiastical institutions, the use and importance of which were apparent from the example of Constantine; but the attempts of Julian to adopt these imaginary plans of reformation had been realized, the forced and imperfect copy would have been less beneficial to paganism, than honourable to christianity. The gentiles, who peaceably followed the customs of their ancestors, were rather surprised than pleased with the innovations of their prince; but in the short period of his reign, Julian had frequent occasions to complain of the want of fervour of his own party.

3 Yet he intimates, that the christians, under the pretence of charity, invited children from their religion and parents, conveyed them to Asia, and devoured those victims to a life of poverty or servitude in a remote country, where they were to have it was his duty, not to complain, but to punish. The argument is strong and argumentative. (Orat. iii. p. 101, 102, &c.) He ridicules the folly of such vain imitation; and among the things which, with imaging, what lessons, moral or theological, could be extracted from this story? He accuses one of his pontiffs of a secret conspiracy with the christians, but did not show whom. (Epist. xxxi.) The emperor attributed the war which he conducted against the Saracens, to the interests of Christianity, and, he supposes, to the spirit of Julian, which he supposes, in the midst of the assembly; and where he publicly acknowledged the benefits which he had derived from the influences of paganism. Julian acquired the confidence, and influenced the councils, of Julian, was insensibly corrupted by the temptations of a court. His dress became more splendid, his demeanour more lofty, and he was exposed, under a succeeding reign, to a disgraceful inquiry into the means by which the disciples of Platonism were encouraged; and in the short duration of his favour, a very scandalous proportion of wealth. The other philosophers and sophists, who were invited to the imperial residence by the choice of Julian, or by the success of Maximus, few were able to preserve their innocence or their reputation. The liberal gifts of money, lands, and houses, were insufficient to satiate their rapacious appetite; and the indigination of the people was justly excited by the remembrance of their abject poverty and disinterested professions. The penetration of Julian could not always be deceived: but he was unwilling to despise the characters of those men whose talents deserved his approbation; but he could not escape the imputation of imprudence and inconstancy; and he was apprehensive of degrading, in the eyes of the profane, the honour of letters and of religion.

4 The favour of Julian was almost equally divided between the pagans, who had formerly adhered to the system of their ancestors, and the christians, who prudently embraced the religion of their sovereign. The acquisition of new proselytes gratified the ruling passions of his soul, superstition and vanity; and he was heard to declare, with the enthusiasm of a missionary, that if he could render each of his subjects a Midas, and turn them into his gods, he should not esteem himself the benefactor of mankind, unless, at the same time, he could reclaim his subjects from their impious revolt against the immortal gods. A prince, who had studied human nature, and who possessed the treasures of the Roman empire, could adapt his arguments, his promises, and his rewards, to every order of Christians; and the merit of a seasonable conversion was allowed to supply the defects of a candidate, or even to expiate the guilt of a criminal. As the army is the most forcible engine of absolute power, Julian applied himself, with that peculiar diligence and application, to the conversion of his soldiers, without whose hearty concurrence every measure must be dangerous and unsuccessful; and the natural temper of soldiers made this conquest as easy as it was important. The legions of Gaul devoted themselves to the faith, as well as to the fortunes, of their victorious leader; and even before the death of Constantinus, he had the satisfaction of announcing to his friends, that they assisted with fervent devotion, and voracious appetites; at the sacrifices, which were repeatedly offered in his camp, of whole hecatombs of fat oxen. The armies of the east, which had been trained under the standard of the cross, and of Constantius, required more of the sacrificial mode of persuasion. On the days of solemn and public festivals, the emperor received the homage, and rewarded the merit of the troops. His throne of state was encircled with the military ensigns of Rome and the republic; the holy name of Christ was not erased from the oraculum; and the symbols of war, of majesty, and of pagan superstition; were so dexterously blended, that the faithful subject incurred the guilt of idolatry, when he respectfully saluted the person or image of his sovereign. The soldiers passed successfully in review; and each of them, before he received from the hand of Julian a liberal donative, proportioned to his rank and services, was required to cast a few grains of incense into the flame which burnt upon the altar. Some Christian confessors might resist, and others might repent; but the far greater number, allured by the prospect of gold, and aware of the nature of the engagement of his criminal; and their future perseverance in the worship of the gods was enforced by every consideration of duty and of interest. By the frequent repetition of these arts, and at the expense of sums which would have purchased the service of half the nations of Christendom, the Roman soldiery gradually acquiesced in the imaginary protection of the gods, and for himself the firm and effectual support of the Roman legions. It is indeed more than probable, that the restoration and encouragement of paganism revealed a multitude of pretended Christians, who, from motives of temporal advantage, were seduced into the service of the state, and by the personal influence of Constantius, and by the vacant space of the lower city was filled with the public and private edifices of the Gallon colony, which spread themselves over the adjacent hill of Calvary. The holy places were polluted with the monuments of idolatry; and, either from design or accident, a chapel was erected to Venus in the spot which had been consecrated by the death and resurrection of Christ. Almost three hundred years after those stupendous events, the profane chapel of Venus was demolished by the order of Constantine; and the removal of the earth and stones revealed the holy sepulchre to the eyes of mankind. A magnificent church was erected on that mystic ground, by the first christian emperor; and the effects of his pious munificence were extended to every spot which had been consecrated by the footsteps of patriarchs, of prophets, and of the Son of God.

The passionate desire of contemplating the places of biblical history inspired an enterprise, which attracted to Jerusalem a successive crowd of pilgrims, from the shores of the Atlantic ocean, and the most distant countries of the east; and their piety was authorised by the example of the emperor Helena, who, during her reign, erected on the site which the warm feelings of a recent conversion. Sages and heroes, who have visited the memorable scenes of ancient wisdom or glory, have confessed the inspiration of the genius of the place; and the christian, who knelt before the holy sepulchre, ascribed his lively faith, and his fervent devotion, to the more immediate influence of the divine Spirit. The zeal, perhaps the avarice, of the clergy of Jerusalem, cherished and multiplied these beneficial visits. They fixed, by unquestionable tradition, the season of the most memorable event. They exhibited the instruments which had been used in the passion of Christ; the mals and the lance that had pierced his hands, his feet, and his side; the crown of thorns that was planted on his head; the pillar at which he was scourged; and, above all, they showed the cross on which he had endured the ignominy of the death of the earth in the reign of those princes, who inserted the symbol of Christianity in the banners of the Roman legions.1 Such miracles as seemed necessary to account for its extraordinary preservation and seasonable discoveries, were gradually propagated without opposition. The custody of the true cross, which on Easter Sunday was solemnly exposed to the people, was intrusted to the bishop of Jerusalem; and he alone might gratify the curious devotion of the pilgrims, by the gift of small pieces, which they had enchased in gold or gems, and carried away in triumph to their respective countries. The sanctity of the cross, which must soon have been annihilated, it was found convenient to suppose, that the marvellous wood possessed a secret power of vegetation; and that its substance, though continually diminished, still remained entire and unimpaired. It might perhaps have been expected, that the influence of the place, and the holiness of a perpetual miracle, should have produced some salutary effects on the morals, as well as on the faith, of the people. Yet the most respectable of the ecclesiastical writers have been obliged to confess, not only that the streets of Jerusalem were filled with the incessant tumult of bishops, and prelates, and pilgrims, of vice, adultery, theft, idolatry, poisoning, murder, was familiar to the inhabitants of the holy city. The wealth and pre-eminence of the church of Jerusalem excited the ambition of Arian, as well as orthodox, candidates; and the virtues of Cyril, who, since his death, has been honoured with the title of Saint, were displayed in the exercise, rather than in the acquisition, of his episcopal dignity.2

Julian attempts to rebuild the temple.3 Julian might aspire to restore the ancient glory of the temple of Jerusalem. As the christians were firmly persuaded that a sentence of everlasting destruction had been pronounced against the whole fabric of the Mosaic law, the imperial sophist would have converted the success of his undertaking into a specious argument against the faith of prophecy, and the truth of revelation.4 He was displeased with the spiritual worship of the synagogue; but he approved the institution of the sacrifices, which many of the rites and ceremonies of Egypt.5 The local and national deity of the Jews was sincerely adored by a polytheist, who desired only to multiply the number of the gods;6 and such was the appetite of Julian for bloody sacrifice, that his emulation might be excited by the piety of Solomon, who had offered, in the feast of tabernacles, a thousand and one hundred and twenty-thousand sheep.7 These considerations might influence his designs; but the prospect of an immediate and important advantage would not suffer the impatient monarch to expect the remote and uncertain event of the Persian war. He resolved to erect, without delay, on the commanding eminence of Moriah, a stately temple, which might eclipse the splendour of the church of the Resurrection on the adjacent hill of Calvary; to establish an order of priests, whose interested zeal would detect the arts, and resist the ambition, of their christian rivals; and to invite and accommodate the sacred pilgrims, so that fanaticism would be always prepared to second, and even to anticipate the hostile measures of the pagan government. Among the friends of the emperor (if the names of emperor and of friend are not incompatible) the first place was assigned, by Julian himself, to the virtuous and learned Alypius.8 The humanity of Alypius was tempered by severe justice, and manly fortitude; and while he exercised his abilities in the civil administration of Britain, he imitated, in his poetical compositions, the harmony and softness of the odes of Sappho. This minister, to whom Julian ascribed the communication of his most singular counsels, received an extraordinary commission to restore, in its pristine beauty, the temple of Jerusalem; and the diligence of Alypius required and obtained the strenuous support of the governor of Palestine. At the call of their great deliverer, the Jews, from all the provinces of the empire, assembled on the holy mountain of their fathers; and their insolent triumph alarmed and exasperated the christian inhabitants of Jerusalem. The desire of rebuilding the temple has, in every age, been the ruling passion of the children of Israel. In this propitious moment the whole nation, with all their ardour and their delicacy; spades and pickaxes of silver were provided by the vanity of the rich, and the rubbish was transported in mantles of silk and purple. Every purse was opened in liberal contributions, every hand claimed a share in the pious labour; and the commands of a great monarch were executed by the enthusiasm of a whole people.9

Yet, on this occasion, the joint efforts of the empire is of power and enthusiasm were unsuccessful; and the ground of the Jewish temple, which

1 Cicer (de finibus, v. 1.) has beautifully expressed the common sense of mankind.
3 This multiplication is asserted by Paulinus, (Epist. xxxvi.) See Dupin, Biblier. Eccles. tom. iii. p. 149, who seems to have improved a right idea; for if the temple had been a real fact, the spiritual privilege must have been communicated in the Virgin's milk (Evanb. Opera, tom. i. p. 776. Lud. Batav. 1769, in Collog, de Pe-rugen.) Religious claims made by Selden, and others, are repeated in so many different churche.

6 He renounced his orthodox ordination, offered as a daemon, and, to a certain degree, the title of a Christ, which he had never dared to change, or to transfer the offices of a priest to others. He became not only a confessor of the Christian faith, but a master of it, and a successful advocate of it. He did not renounce the aids of a rational spirit, which are necessary to carry on the work of the church and conduct of the Supreme Being. The discourse entitled Julian, (24 edition, London, 1751,) is strongly marked with all the peculiarities which are impalpable to the Warburtonian school.

THE DECLINE AND FALL

The decline and fall of the ancient Roman Empire was a process that lasted for several centuries and is often associated with various factors. This decline is usually described in terms of a gradual deterioration of the political, social, and economic structures of the empire.

The factors contributing to the decline of the Roman Empire include:

1. Political Instability: The political instability within the empire, characterized by civil wars and the constant struggle for power, played a significant role in weakening the empire. The Roman Senate's power and influence diminished, leading to a decline in the efficiency of governance.

2. Economic Decline: The empire's economy faced various challenges, including inflation, tax difficulties, and the constant need to finance the military campaigns. The empire's wealth and prosperity were not sustainable, and the resulting economic strain contributed to the empire's decay.

3. Social Disintegration: The Roman society faced issues such as the disappearance of traditional values, the rise of a wealthy class, and the decline in moral standards. These factors eroded the social fabric and contributed to the decline of the empire.

4. Military Overextension: The empire's military campaigns and the need for a large standing army drained the empire's resources. The constant need for military victories and the maintenance of an empire on the brink of collapse contributed to the empire's decline.

5. Barbarian Invasions: The constant threat of external barbarian invasions, particularly the Germanic tribes, further weakened the empire. The Roman military was unable to resist these invasions, leading to the shrinking of the empire's borders.

6. Decline in Infrastructure: The empire's infrastructure, including roads and bridges, deteriorated due to a lack of maintenance and management. This decline in infrastructure made it difficult to transport goods and personnel, further contributing to the empire's downfall.

7. Natural Disasters: The empire was affected by various natural disasters, such as famines, earthquakes, and pestilences, which further weakened the empire's population and economy.

The decline of the Roman Empire had far-reaching consequences, leading to the rise of new empires and the eventual fall of the Western Roman Empire in 476 AD.
of the Galileans, whom he describes, as a sect of fanatics, contemptible to men, and odious to the gods, the name of inclemency, and he insinuates in a public edict, that a frantic patient might sometimes be cured by salutary violence. An ungenerous distinction was admitted into the mind and counsels of Julian, that, according to the difference of their religious sentiments, one part of his subjects de- served the brunt of persecution, while the other was entitled only to the common benefits that his justice could not refuse to an obedient people. According to a principle pregnant with mischief and oppression, the emperor transferred to the pontiffs of his own religion, the management of the liberal allowances from the public revenues, which were distributed to the piety of Constantine and his sons. The proud system of clerical honours and immunities, which had been constructed with so much art and labour, was levelled to the ground; the hopes of testimonial donates were intercepted by the rigour of the laws; and the priests of the Christian sect were confounded with the last and most ignominious class of the people. Such of these regulations as appeared necessary to check the ambition and avarice of the ecclesiastics, were soon afterwards imitated by the wisdom of an orthodox prince. The peculiar distinctions which political prudence required to be suffered, and which were established, the sacred order, must be confined to those priests who profess the religion of the State. But the will of the legislator was not exempt from prejudice and passion; and it was the object of the insidious policy of Julian, to deprive the christians of all the temporal honours and advantages which rendered them respectable in the eyes of the world. He prohibited the christians from teaching schools, and from teaching the arts of grammar and rhetoric. The motives alleged by the emperor, who pretended to this measure, were that the Christians might command, during his lifetime, the silence of slaves and the applause of flatterers. Julian abuses the ambiguous meaning of a word which might be differently applied to the language and the religion of the Greeks: he contemptuously observes, that the men who exalt the merit of implicit faith are unfit to claim or to enjoy the advantages of science; and he vainly contends, that if they refuse to adore the gods of Homer and Demosthenes, they ought to content themselves with expounding Luke and Matthew in the churches of the Galileans. In all the cities of the Roman empire, the vestry of the Jewish sect was given to masters of grammar and rhetoric; who were elected by the magistrates, maintained at the public expense, and distinguished by many lucrative and honourable privileges. The edict of Julian appears to have in- volved the physicians, and professors of all the liberal arts; and the emperor, who reserved to himself the ap-christians had frequently erected their own religious edi-ces: and it was necessary to remove the church before the temple could be rebuilt, the justice and piety of the emperor were answered by one party, while the other deplored and execrated his unchristian violence. After the ground was cleared, the restitution of those statly structures, which had been levelled with the dust, and of the precious ornaments, which had been converted to christian uses, swelled into a very large account of damages and debt. The authors of the attack had neither the inclination to discharge these accumulated demands: and the impartial wisdom of a legislator would have been displayed in balancing the adverse claims and complaints, by an equitable and temperate arbitration.

But the whole empire, and particularly the east, was thrown into the confusion by the rash edicts of Julian; and the pagan magistrates, inflamed by zeal and revenge, abused the rigorous privilege of the Roman law, which substitutes, in the place of its inadequate property, the person of the insolvent debtor. Under the administration of Mark, bishops and Arachus, who laboured in the conversion of his people with arms as more effectual than those of persuasion. The magistrates required the full value of a temple which had been destroyed by his intolerant zeal: but as they were satisfied of his poverty, they desired only to bind his in flexible spirit to the promise of the slightest compensation. They apprehended the aged prelate, they inhumanly scourged him, they tore his beard; and his naked body, anointed with honey, was suspended, in a net, between heaven and earth, and exposed to the sting of the vipers and the rays of a sun.
At this lofty station, Mark still persisted to glory in his crime, and to insult the im potent rage of his persecutors. He was at length rescued from their hands, and dismissed to enjoy the honour of his divine triumph.
The Arians celebrated the virtue of their pious confessor, who had defended the pagans, and his alliance

If we compare the genteel language of Libanius (Orat. Parent.
60, p. 266), with the passionate exclamations of Gregory (Orat. iii.
86, 87), we may find it difficult to persuade ourselves, that the two orations are really describing the same event.

manly virtue. But the groves of Daphne continued for many ages to enjoy the veneration of natives and strangers, the privileges of the holy ground were enlarged by the munificence of succeeding emperors; and every generation added new ornaments to the splendour of the temple.

Neglect and destruction of Daphne.

Apollo of Daphne, his devotion was raised to the highest pitch of eagerness and impatience. His lively imagination anticipated the grateful pomp of victims, of libations, and of incense; a long procession of youths, a throng of boys, the tunkal, the symbol of their innocence; and the tumultuous concourse of an innumerable people. But the zeal of Antioch was diverted, since the reign of Christianity, into a different channel. Instead of hecatombs of fat oxen sacrificed by the tribes of a wealthy city to their tutelar deity, the emperor complains that he found only a single goat, provided at the expense of a priest, the pale and solitary inhabitant of this decayed temple.

The altar was deserted, the oracle had been reduced to silence, and the holy ground was profaned by the introduction of Christian and funeral rites. After Babylonia the people was still restrained, a portion of the sacred lands was usurped for the main temple, and it was declared that he should be put down from his stations of Antioch, who were ambitious of lying at the feet of their bishop; and the priests of Apollo retired, with their affrighted and indignant votaries. As soon as another revolution seemed to restore the fortune of paganism, the church of St. Babylas was demolished by the Christian party to a third of its edifice which had been raised by the pieties of Syrian kings. But the first and most serious care of Julian was to deliver his oppressed deity from the odious presence of the dead and living Christians, who had so effectually suppressed the voice of fraud or enthusiasm. The scene of infection was purified according to the forms of ancient rituals; the bodies were decently removed; and the ministers of the church were permitted to convey the remains of St. Babylas to Antioch, which was the region of the temple. The modest behaviour which might have assuaged the jealousy of an hostile government, was neglected on this occasion by the zeal of the Christians. The lofty car, that transported the relics of Babylas, was followed, and accompanied, and received, by an innumerable multitude of citizens, who, at the sound of the lamentations, the Psalms of David the most expressive of their contempt for idols and idolaters. The return of the snail was a triumph; and the triumph was an insult on the religion of the emperor, who exerted his pride to assemble his resistance. tuated the landscape; and the temple of Daphne was in flames; the statue of Apollo was consumed; and the walls of the edifice were left a naked and awful monument of ruin. The Christians of Antioch asserted, with religious confidence, that the powerful intercession of St. Babylas had pointed the lightnings of heaven against the devoted roof: but as Julian was reduced to the alternative, of believing either a crime or a miracle, he chose, without hesitation, without evidence, but with some colour of probability, to imagine the interposition of Daphne and the Galileans. Their offence, had it been sufficiently proved, might have justified the retaliation, which was immediately executed by the order of Julian, in shutting the doors, and confis-

The zeal of the ministers of Julian.

The zeal of the ministers of Julian was instantly checked by the frown of their sovereign; but when the father of his country declares himself the leader of a faction, the licence of popular fury cannot easily be restrained, and it is permitted to the Christian public composition, applauded the devotion and loyalty of the holy cities of Syria, whose pious inhabitants had destroyed, at the first signal, the spiculatures of the Galileans; and faintly complains, that they had revenged the injuries of the gods with men's moderation and the blood of their countrymen. The humble and religious ministrations and profession of faith may appear to confirm the ecclesiastical narratives; that in the cities of Gaza, Ascalon, Caesarea, Hellipolis, &c., the pagans abused, without prudence or remorse, the moment of their prosperity. That the unhappy objects of their cruelty were not intended only by death; that their mangled bodies were dragged through the streets, they were pierced (such was the universal rage) by the spits of cooks, and the distasts of enraged women; and that the entrails of christian priests and virgins, after they had been tasted by those bloody fanatics, were mixed with barley, and contemptuously thrown to the unclean animals of the city. Such scenes of religious madness exhibit the most contemptible and odious picture of human nature; but the massacre of Alexandria attracts still more attention, from the certainty of the fact, the fear of the victims, and the splendour of the capital of Egypt.

George, from his parents or his education.

George, from his parents or his education, was born at Epiphania in Cilicia, in a fuller's shop. From this obscure and servile origin he raised himself by the bosom and example of pious parents, of a pious education, and of a liberal instruction in the scriptures; and it is probable, that his virtues had been previously known in the province of Cappadocia, and that his election was con-

The history and religion of Cappadocia.

The history and religion of Cappadocia are described by Ammianus, (xiii. 13.) Gregory Nazianzen, (Orat. xxi. 3.) and Eusebius, (Hist. eccl. c. 13.) The history of Julian's wars is described in the treatise of Belisarius, (Julian. c. 13.) Although this attempt has not been successful, the history of Julian, as it is preserved in the writings of Zosimus, and of the bishop of Cappadocia, is more or less connected with the life of Julian, and may be considered as an original, though not impartial, witness. He describes the first battle, in which his father was slain, and the first choice of his successor; and the subsequent conduct of Julian, who as bishop of Masmia, lived to the age of an hundred, (I. viii. c. 11.) and died in the year 400. (Hieron. H. c. 11.) Philosophers and religious historians, (Plato de leg. lib. ii. c. 1.) add some tragic circumstances of Christians, who were literally sacrificed at the altars of the gods, &c. rendered it infamous. He accumulated wealth by the basest arts of fraud and corruption; but his malversations were so notorious, that George was compelled to escape from the pursuits of justice. After this disgrace, which happened to his fortune at the expense of his honour, he embraced, with zeal or affected zeal, the profession of Arrianism. From the love, or the ostentation, of learning, he collected a valuable library of history, rhetoric, philosophy, and theology; and the choice of the prevailing faction procured him the throne of Alexandria, and led to the provinces of Barlaam, and of Cappadocia. The entrance of the new archbishop was that of a barbarian conqueror; and each moment of his reign was polluted by cruelty and avarice. The catholics of Alexandria and Egypt were abandoned to a tyrant, qualified, by nature and education, to exercise oppression. The office of persecution; but he oppressed *merites & Egypt; sed with an impious hand the various inhabitants of his extensive diocese. The primate of Egypt assumed the pomp and insolence of his lofty station; but he still betrayed the vices of his base and servile extraction. The merchants of Alexandria were impoverish'd by the unjust, and the most wretched monopolies, which he acquired, of nitre, salt, paper, fumerales, &c., and the spiritual father of a great people condescended to praise the vile and pernicious arts of an informer. The Alexandrians could never forget, nor the world, which he despoiled, on all sides, the houses of the city; under an absolute claim, that the royal founder had conveyed to his successors, the Ptolemies and the Caesars, the perpetual property of the soil. The pagans, who had been flattered with the hopes of freedom and toleration, excoriated his devilish arrogance, and the rich temples of Alexandria were either pillaged or insulted by the haughty prelate, who exclaimed, in a loud and threatening tone, "How long will these wilpulchres be permitted to stand!" Under the reign of Constantius, he was expelled by the fury, or rather by the justice, of the people; and it was not without a violent struggle, that the civil and military powers of the state could restore his authority, and gratify his rugginess. The messenger who proclaimed Alexander the accession of Julian, announced the downfall of the arch-bishop. George, with two of his obsequious ministers, count Diodorus, and Dracoumites, one of the mutiny, were ignominiously dragged in chains to the public prison. At the end of twenty-four days, the people was forced open by the rage of a superstitious multitude, impatient of the tedious forms of judicial proceedings. The enraged populace, the leaders of gods and their cruel insults; the lifeless bodies of the arch-bishop and his associates were carried in triumph through the streets on the back of a camel; and the inactivity of the Alexandrian party was esteemed a sample which, of extraordinary patience. The remains of these guilty wretches were thrown into the sea; and the popular leaders of the tumult declared their resolution to disappoint the devotion of the Christians, and to intercept the future honours of these martyrs, who had been punished like their predecessors, by the enmity of their religion. The fear of the pagans was just, and their precautions ineffectual. The meritorious death of the arch-bishop obliterated the memory of his life. The rival of Athanasius was dead and sacred to the Arius, and the seeming conversion of these sectaries introduced his worship into the bosom of the Church. This was stranger, disguising every circumstance of time and place, assumed the mask of a martyr, a saint, and a Christian hero; and the infamous George of Cappadocia has been transformed into the renowned St. George and worshipped in England, the patron of arms, of chivalry, a saint and a martyr. About the same time that Julian was informed of the tumult of Alexandria, he received intelligence from Edessa, that the proud and wealthy faction of the Arians had insulted the weakness of the Valentinians, and committed such disorders as ought not to be suffered even in a city in a well-regulated state. Without expecting the slow forms of justice, the exasperated prince directed his mandate to the magistrates of Edessa, by which he consecrated the whole property of the church; the money was distributed among the soldiers; the lands were added to the domain; and this act of chicanery was aggravated by the treacherous irony, "I show myself," says Julian, "the true friend of the Galileans. Their admirable law has promised the kingdom of heaven to the poor; and they will advance with more diligence in the paths of virtue and wisdom, when they are relieved by my assistance from the load of temporal care. Take care," pursued the monarch, in a more serious tone, "take care how you provoke my patience and humanity. If these disorders continue, I will revenge on the magistrates the crimes of the people; and you will be the last to receive only consolation, either in fire, but fire and the sword." The tumults of Alexandria were doubtless of a more bloody and dangerous nature; but a christian bishop had fallen by the hands of the pagans; and the public epistle of Julian affords a very lively proof of the partial spirit of his administration. The civil and military rulers of Alexander are mingled with expressions of esteem and tenderness; and he laments, that on this occasion, they should have departed from the gentle and generous manners which attested their Grecian extraction. He greatly censures the offence which they had committed against his church, and did not disdain to express his opinion in the most bitter manner. With the most just proceeding, with visible complacency, the intolerable provocations which they had so long endured from the impious tyranny of George of Cappadocia. Julian admires the principle, that a wise and vigorous government should chasise the insolence of the people; yet, in consideration of the rank of Alexander, his protector, the tutelary deity, he grants a free and glorious pardon to the guilty city, for which he again feels the affection of a brother. After the tumult of Alexandria had subsided, Athanasius, amidst the public exclamations, seated himself on the throne from whence his unworthy com

petior had been precipitated; and as the zeal of the archbishop was tempered with discretion, the exercise of his authority, tended not to inflame, but to reconcile, the minds of the people. His pastoral labours were not confined to the narrow limits of Egypt. The state of the christian world was present to his active and capacious mind; and the age, the merit, the reputation of Athanasius, endowed him with a strong force of attraction. With a nervousness of danger, the office of ecclesiastical dictator. Three years were not yet elapsed since the majority of the bishops of the west had ignorantly, or reluctantly, subscribed the confession of Rimini. They repented, they believed, but they dreaded the unseasonable rigour of their master. They were keenly sensible of the loss than their faith, they might throw themselves into the arms of the Arians, to escape the indignity of a public penance, which must degrade them to the condition of obscure laymen. At the same time, the domestic differences concerning the union and distinction of the divine persons, were agitated with some heat among the catholic doctors; and the progress of this metaphysical controversy seemed to threaten a public and lasting division of the Greek and Latin churches. By the wisdom of a select synod, to which the name and presence of Athanasius gave the authority of a general council, six antipriests, who were guilty of error, were admitted to the communion of the church, on the easy condition of subscribing the Nicene creed; without any formal acknowledgment of their past fault, or any minute definition of their scholastic opinions. The advice of the primate of Egypt had already prepared the way. It was the dexterity of the bishop of Alexandria, for the reception of this salutary measure; and, not withstanding the opposition of some ardent spirits, the fear of the common enemy promoted the peace and harmony of the christians.

He is persecuted and forced by Julian. A.D. 362.

The skill and diligence of the primate of the west had importer the public safety of tranquillity, before it was interrupted by the hostile edicts of the emperor. Julian, who despised the christians, honoured Athanasius with his sincere and peculiar hatred. For his sake alone, he introduced an absolute distinction, repugnant at least to the spirit of his former declarations. He maintained, that the Gallareans who were banished from exile, were not restored, by that general indulgence, to the possession of their respective churches; and he expressed his astonishment, that a criminal, who had been repeatedly condemned by the judgment of the emperors, should dare to insult the majesty of the laws, and insolently usurp the archiepiscopal throne of Alexandria, without expecting the orders of his sovereign. As a punishment for the imaginary offence, he again banished Athanasius from the city; and he was pleased to suppose, that this act of justice would be highly agreeable to his pious subjects. The pressing solicitations of the people soon convinced him, that the majority of the Alexandrians were christians; and that the greatest part of the christians were firmly attached to the cause of their oppressed primate. But the knowledge of their sentiments, instead of persuading the emperor to recall the false accusers, determined him to destroy all Egypt the term of the exile of Athanasius.

See Athanas. ad Ruf. Episc. tom. ii. p. 40, 41; and Greg. Nazianz. Orat. iii. p. 293. TheJustinian [sic] states the wholesale reception of the primate, as much more menacing than his prayers, his fasts, his penitence.

I have not leisure to follow the blind obstinacy of Lucifer of Cagliari. See his adventures in Tillemont; (Mem. Eccles. tom. vii. p. 334, 335;) his revolting narrative incessantly changes, as the confessor becomes a schismatic.

rable; he was alarmed by the danger of leaving at the head of a tumultuous city, a daring and popular leader; and the language of his ressentment discovers the opinion which he entertained of the courage and abilities of Athanasius. The execution of the sentence was still delayed, by the caution or negligence of Eudocius, prefect of Egypt, who was at length awakened from his sloth, and "Theodore," says Julian, * to write to me on any other subject, at least it is your duty to inform me of your conduct towards Athanasius, the enemy of the gods. My intentions have been long since communicated to you. I swear by the great Serapis, that unless, on the calends of December, an archbishop arrived from Alexandria, nay from Egypt, the officers of your government shall pay a fine of one hundred pounds of gold. You know my temper; I am slow to condemn, but I am still slower to forgive." This epistle was enforced by a short postscript, written with the emperor's own hand. * The contempt that is shown for all the gods fills me with grief and indignation. There is nothing that I should see, nothing that I should hear, with more pleasure, than the expulsion of Athanasius from all Egypt. The abominable wretch! Under my reign, the baptism of several Grecian ladies of the first rank has disappeared. The effects of the laws, of the execrable definition, of the laws, which were used to degrade the Christians, were shown in the proceedings against the prefect of Egypt. The death of Athanasius was not expressly commanded; but the prefect of Egypt understood, that it was safer for him to exceed, than to neglect, the orders of an irritated master. The archbishop prudently retired to the monasteries of the desert; eluded, with his dexterity, the snares of the enemies; and lived to triumph over the ashes of a prince, who, in words of formidable import, had declared his wish that the whole venom of the Galilean school were contained in the single person of Athanasius. I have endeavoured faithfully to repreexasperated, when he found, that the fanatics, who had deserved and suffered the punishment of incendiaries, were received with the honours of a tyrant. 7 The Christian subjects of Julian were assured of the hostile designs of their sovereign; and, to their jealous apprehension, every circumstance of his government might afford some grounds of discontent and suspicion. In the ordinary administration of the laws, the Christians, who formed so large a portion of the people, most frequently being condemned: but their indulgent brethren, without examining the merits of the case, presumed their innocence, allowed their claims, and impeached the severity of their judge to the partial malice of religious persecution. 8 These present hardships, intolerable as they were to the Christians, bore the slightest resemblance of the impending calamities. The Christians considered Julian as a cruel and crafty tyrant; who suspended the execution of his revenge, till he should return victorious from the Persian war. 9 They expected, that as soon as he had triumphed over the foreign enemies of Rome, he would lay aside the irksome mask of dissimulation; that the amphitheatres would stream with the blood of hermits and bishops; and that the Christians, who still persevered in the profession of the faith, would be deprived of the common benefits of nature and society. Every circumstance, which wounded the reputation of the Apostate, was credulously embraced by the fears and hatred of his adversaries; and their indiscreet clamours provoked the temper of a sovereign, whom it was their duty to respect, and their interest to flatter. They still protested, that prayers and tears were only weapons against the impious tyrant, whose head they devoted to the justice of offended heaven. But they inculcated, with sullen resolution, that their submission was no longer the effect of weakness; and that in the imperfect state of human virtue, the patience which is founded on principle, under such an influence, by persecution. It is impossible to determine how far the zeal of Julian would have prevailed over this good sense and humanity; but, if we seriously reflect on the strength and spirit of the church, we shall be convinced that, before the emperor could have extinguished the religion of Christ, he must have involved his country in the horrors of a civil war. 9

CHAPTER XXIV.
Residence of Julian at Antioch. — His successful expedition against the Persians.—Passage of the Tigris.—The retreat of Julian.—Elephantianus.—He saves the Roman army by a disgraceful treaty.

The philosophical fable which Julian composed under the name of the Cæsars, 10 is one of the most agreeable and instructive productions of ancient wit. 11 During the freedom and equality of the days of the Saturnalia, Romulus prepared a feast for the deities of Olympus, who had adopted him as a worthy associate, and for the Roman princes, who had reigned over his martial people, and the vanquished nations of the earth. The immortals were placed in just order on their thrones of state, and the table of the Cæsars was spread below the moon, in the upper region of the sky. The tyrants of Persia, who disregarded the society of gods and men, were thrown headlong, by the inexorable Nemesis, into the Tartarean abyss. The rest of the Cæsars successively advanced to their seats; and, as they passed, the vices, the defects, the blemishes of their respective characters, were multiplied and amplified. One was a foolish and vanity, who disguised the wisdom of a philosopher under the mask of a Bacchanal. 12 As soon as the feast was ended, the voice of Mercury proclaimed the will of Jupiter, that a celestial crown should be the reward of superior merit. Julian Caesar, Augustus, Trajan, and Marcus Antoninus, were selected as the most illustrious candidates; the effeminate Constantine 13 was not excluded from this honourable competition, and the great Alexander was invited to dispute the prize of glory with the Roman heroes. Each of the candidates was assured of victory; but, in the judgment of the gods, the modest silence of Marcus pleased more powerfully than the elaborate orations of his haughty rivals. When the judges of this awful contest proceeded to examine the heart, and to scrutinize the springs of action; the superiority of the imperial character over the impious was so manifest, 14 that Alexander and Cæsar, Augustus, Trajan, and Constantine, acknowledged, with a blush, that fate, or power, or pleasure, had been the important object of their labours: but the gods themselves beheld, with reverence and love, a virtuous mortal, who had practised few actions, and who, in a state of human imperfection, had aspired to imitate the moral attributes of the Deity. The value of this agreeable composition (the Cæsars of Julian) is enhanced by the rank of the author. A prince, who delineates, with freedom, the vices and virtues of his predecessors, in every line, the censure or approbation of his own conduct.

In the cool moments of reflection, Julian preferred the useful and benevolent virtues of Antoninus; but his ambitious spirit was inflamed by the glory of the Eastern conqueror; and he solicited, with equal ardour, the esteem of the wise, and the applause of the multitude. In the season of life, when the powers of the mind and body enjoy the most active vigour, the emperor, who was instructed by the experience, and animated by the success, of the German war, resolved to signalize his reign by some more splendid and memorable achievement. The ambassadors of the east, from the continent of India, and the isle of Ceylon, 15 had respectfully

7 A see this fable or satire, p. 268—270. of the Leipzig edition of Ju-

8 lan's works. The French version of the learned Ezekiel Spanheim (Paris, 1665) is curious, long, and correct; and his notes, proofs, illustrations, &c. are piled on each other till they form a mass of 557 sheets. This is not the first time that a work of Spanheim (Orat. ii. pr. 1. p. 231—595) has more happily expressed the spirit, as well as the sense, of the original, which he illustrates with some concise and curious notes.

9 Spanheim (in his preface) has most learnedly discussed the eigno-

10 logy, origin, resemblance, and dispute of this work with the Greek fable, which was performed after the tragedy; and the Latin 11 satires (from Jert.) a more instructive composition, either in prose or verse. But he suggests, that the portrait of Julian are of such an original cast, that the critic is perplexed to which class he should ascribe them.

13 A book that an intelligent reader must perceive and condemn the partiality of Julian against his uncle Constantine, and the Christian religion. On this occasion, the interpreters are compelled by a more sacred interest to renounce their allegiance to the master of their author.

14 Julian was secretly inclined to prefer a Greek to a Roman. But when he seriously compared a hero with a philosopher, he was sensible that mankind had much greater obligations to Socrates than to Alexander. (Orat. de Threnis, p. 264.)

15 Inde nationis in Indiis certum cum donis optimates mittitum, &c. ab episcopo Davide Secundae. Annal. xiv. 1. The Island, saluted the Roman people. The nations of the west esteemed and dreaded the personal virtues of Julian, both in peace and war. He despised the trophies of a Gothic victory, and was satisfied that the rapacious barbarians of the Danube would be restrained from any future violation of the faith of treaties by the terror of his name, and the additional fortifications with which he strengthened the Thracian and Illyrian frontiers.

The successor of Cyrus and Artaxerxes was the only rival whom he deemed worthy of his arms; and he resolved, by the final conquest of Persia, to chastise the haughty nation which had so long resisted and insulted the majesty of Rome. As soon as the Persian name was mentioned, nor should I say the name, for the severest censure was filled by a prince of a very different character, he condescended to make some artful, or perhaps sincere, overtures, towards a negotiation of peace. But the pride of Sapor was astonished by the firmness of Julian; who sternly declared, that he would never consent to hold a peaceful conference among the flames and ruins of the cities of Mesopotamia; and who added, with a smile of contempt, that it was needless to treat by ambassadors, as he himself had determined to visit speedily the court of Persia.

The impatience of the emperor urged the diligence of the military preparations. Venerable remains of the church of Antioch, which was destined for this important service; and Julian, Marching from Constantinople through the provinces of Asia Minor, arrived at Antioch about eight months after the death of his predecessor. His ardent desire to march into the heart of Persia, was checked by the impossibility of regulating the state of the empire; by his zeal to revive the worship of the gods; and by the advice of his wisest friends; who represented the necessity of allowing the salutary interval of winter-quarters, to restore the exhausted strength of the legions of Gaul, and the discipline and spirit of the army. After the winter's rest, the ensuing spring, his residence at Antioch, among a people maliciously disposed to deride the haste and to censure the delays, of their sovereign.

If Julian had flattered himself, that his personal connexion with the capital of the east would be productive of material satisfaction to the prince and people, he made a very false estimate of his own character, and of the manners of Antioch. The warmth of the climate disposed the natives to the most intemperate enjoyment of the fat and fragrant dishes of the daily dainties. The lustre of the Greeks was blended with the hereditary softness of the Syrians. Fashion was the only law, pleasure the only pursuit, and the splendour of dress and furniture was the only distinction of the citizens of Antioch. The arts of luxury were honoured; the serious and manly virtues were the subject of ridicule; and the contempt for female modesty and reverence, announced the universal corruption of the capital of the east. The love of spectacles was the taste, or rather passion of the Syrians; the most skilful artists were procured from the adjacent cities; a considerable share of the revenue was devoted to the public amusements, and the magnificence of the games of the theatre and circus was considered as the happiness, and as the glory, of Antioch. The rustic manners of a prince who disdained such glory, and was insensible of such happiness, soon disengaged the delicacy of his subjects; and the effeminate orientals could neither sustain the severity of the climate, nor bear the practices which were always maintained, and sometimes affected. The days of festivity, consecrated, by ancient custom, to the honour of the gods, were the only occasions in which Julian relaxed his philosophic severity; and those festivals were the only days in which the Syrians of Antioch could reject the allurements of pleasure. The majority of the people supported the glory of the christian name, which had been first invented by their ancestors; they contented themselves with disobeying the moral precepts, but they were scrupulously attached to the speculative doctrines, of their religion.

This disunited the Christians; but the Arians and the Athanasians, the followers of Meletius and those of Paulinus, were actuated by the same pious hatred of their common adversary.

The strongest prejudice was entertain'd: Their aversion to ed by the enemy and successor of a prince who had engaged the affections of a very numerous sect; and the removal of St. Babylas excited an implacable opposition to the person of Julian. His subjects complained, with superstitious indignation, that famine had pursued the emperor's steps. Julian, leave the discontent of a hungry people was exasperated by the injudicious attempt to relieve their distress. The inclemency of the season had affected the Scarcity of corn, harvests of Syria; and the price of and public bread, in the markets of Antioch, had naturally risen in proportion to the scarcity of corn. But the fair and reasonable proportion was soon violated by the rapacious arts of monopoly. In this unequal contest, in which the produce of the land is claimed by one party as his exclusive property; it is used by another as a lucrative object of trade; and is made to pay the daily expenses of a large family of life; all the profits of the intermediate agents are accumulated on the head of the defenceless consumers. The hardships of their situation were exaggerated and increased by their own impatience and anxiety; and the apprehension of a scarcity gradually produced the appearances of a famine. When the luxurious citizens of Antioch complained of the high price of poultry and fish, Julian publicly declared, that a brutal city ought to be satisfied with a regular supply of wine, oil, and bread; but he acknowledged, that it was the duty of a a Laodicea furnished charioteers; Tyre and Berytos, comedians; Cercara, pantomimes; Heliospilia, singers; Garza, gladiators; Ascania, horsemen; Taprobana, wrestlers; and Castabala, Cornubienses. The people of Antioch were so skilful in the construction of the OI (Christ) and the Kappa (Constantius.) Julian in Misopogon, p. 367. The problem of Antioch was likewise held in esteem, and received the daily attendance of the illustrious Prince. The hard and severe life of the Praetorian Guards in Julian; Socrates, xvi, p. 350—351. Inflamed, while Julian resided in that city, by the incessant irritation of Paulinians. See Tertullian, Misc. p. 170, of which I hereafter shall quote.

b The Julian states three different proportions, of five, ten, or fifteen modii of wheat, for one piece of gold, according to the degrees of plenty and scarcity. In Misopogon, p. 359. Upon this account, I cannot conclude, that under the successors of Constantine, the moderate price of wheat was about thirty-two shillings the quarter. But in the time of Julian, and the sixty-four first years of the present century. See Arbuthton's Observations on the Price of Corn, Weights, and Measures, p. 98, 99. Phys. Hist. Nat. xvi, p. 170. I shall hereafter state.

suffering for the subsistence of his people. With this salutary view, the emperor ventured on a very dangerous and doubtful step, of fixing, by legal authority, the value of corn. He enacted, that, in a time of scarcity, it should be sold at a price which had seldom occurred; and that his own example might strengthen his laws, he sent into the market four hundred and twenty-two thousand modii, or measures, which were drawn by his order from the granaries of Hieropolis, of Chalbeis, and even of Egypt. The consequences might have been horrible; yet it was restrained, for at length it was purchased by the rich merchants; the proprietors of land, or of corn, withheld from the city the accustomed supply; and the small quantities that appeared in the market were secretly sold at an advanced and illegal price. The people, still continued to applaud his own policy, treated the complaints of the people as a vain and ungrateful murmur, and convinced Antioch that he had inherited the obstinacy, though not the cruelty, of his brother Gallus. The remonstrances of the municipal senate served only to exasperate his inflexible purpose. He was, however, in the true sense, a tyrant in thought; for he believed, that the senators of Antioch who possessed lands, or were concerned in trade, had themselves contributed to the calamities of their country; and he imputed the disrespectful boldness which they assumed, to the sense, not of public duty, but of private interest. The whole body, consisting of the most prudent, the noble and wealthy citizens, were sent, under a guard, from the palace to the prison; and though they were permitted, before the close of evening, to return to their respective houses, the emperor himself could not obtain the forgiveness which he had so easily granted. The same grievances were still the subject of the same complaints, which were industriously circulated by the wit and levity of the Syrian Greeks. During the licentious days of the Saturnalia, the streets of the city resounded with insolent songs, which derided the laws, the edicts of the imperial council, and even the beard, of the emperor; and the spirit of Antioch was manifested by the contumacy of the magistrates, and the applause of the multitude. The disciple of Socrates was too deeply affected by these popular insults; but the monarch, endowed with quick sensibility, and possessors of absolute power, refused his chance with a contemptification of revenge. A tyrant might have proscribed, without distinction, the lives and fortunes of the citizens of Antioch; and the unwarlike Syrians must have patiently submitted to the lust, the rapaciousness, and the cruelty, of the faithful legions of Gaul. A emperor might have been the object of the envy of the east of its honours and privileges; and the courtiers, perhaps the subjects, of Julian, would have applauded an act of justice, which asserted the dignity of the supreme magistrate of the republic. But instead of abusing, or exercising, the authority of the state, to revenge his personal injuries, Julian confounded himself with an inoffensive mode of retaliation, satirizing against Antioch, which it would be in the power of few tyrants to punish the princes to employ. He had been insulted by satires and insults; in his turn, he composed, under the title of the Enemy of the Romans, an ironical confession of his own faults, and a severe satire of the licentious and effeminate manners of Antioch. This imperial reply was publicly exposed before the gates of the palace; and the Misropoces still remains a singular monument of the resentment, the wit, the humanity, and the indiscretion, of Julian. Though he affected to laugh, he could not forgive. His contempt was expressed, and his revenge might be gratified, by burning the most prodigious quantity of wood, the only light of his subjects; and the emperor, for ever renouncing the ungrateful city, proclaimed his resolution to pass the ensuing winter at Tarsus in Cilicia.

Yet Antioch possessed one citizen! The sophist Libanius, whose genius and virtues might alone match his pride, had written to A. D. 327, to 330, the folly of his country. The sophist, Libanius, was born in the capital of the east; he publickly professed the arts of rhetoric and declamation at Nice, Nicomedia, Constantinople, Athens, and, during the exile of Julian, remained a captive at Antioch, and was assiduously frequented by the Grecian youth; his disciples, who sometimes exceeded the number of eighty, celebrated their incomparable master; and the jealousy of his rivals, who persecuted him from one city to another, confirmed the favourable opinion which Libanius entertained of his own profession. The preceptors of Julian had extorted a rash but solemn assurance, that he would never attend the lectures of their adversary; the curiosity of the royal youth was checked and inflamed; he secretly procured the writings of this dangerous sophist, and gradually surpassed, in the judgment of his lord, the many pupils of his domestic pupils. When Julian ascended the throne, he declared his impatience to embrace and reward the Syrian sophist, who had preserved, in a degenerate age, the Grecian purity of taste, and manners, and of religion. The emperor's propensities were increased; and justly, by the discord of pride of his favourite. Instead ofpressing, with the foremost of the crowd, into the palace of Constantineopolis, Libanius calmly expected his arrival at Antioch; withdrew from court on the first symptoms of coldness and indifference; required the punishment, of a formal acquittance; and taught his sovereign an important lesson, that he might command the obedience of a subject, but that he must deserve the attachment of a friend. The sophists of every age, despising, or affecting to despise, the accidental distinctions of birth and fortune, reserve an elevated contempt for the vices and follies with which they themselves are so plentifully endowed. Julian might disdain the acclamations of a venal court, who adored the imperial purple; but he was deeply flattered by the praise, the admonition, the freedom, and the envy, of an independent philosopher, who returned the charge, and who would have been the patron of the childhood of his name, and protected his memory. The voluminous writings of Libanius still exist; for the most part, they are the vain and idle compositions of an orator, who cultivated the science of words; the productions of a resolute student, whose mind, regardless of his contemporaries, was incessantly fixed on the Trojan war, and the Athenian commonwealth. Yet the sophist of Antioch sometimes descended from this imaginary elevation; he entertained a various and elaborate correspondence.

standing the pressing and repeated solicitations of Constantius and Gallus, as often as those princes lodged at his house, in their passage through Hierapolis. In the hurry of military preparation, and the careless confidence of a familiar correspondence, the zeal of Julian appears to have been lively and uniform. He had now undertaken an important and difficult war; and the anxiety of the event rendered him still more attentive to observe and register the most trifling presages, from which, according to the rules of divination, any knowledge of fate could be derived. He informed Libanus of his progress as far as Hierapolis, by an elegant epistle, which displays the facility of his genius, and his tender friendship for the sacred tree.

Hierapolis, situated almost on the banks of the Euphrates, had been appointed for the general rendezvous of the Roman troops, who immediately passed the great river on a bridge of boats, which was previously constructed. If the inclinations of Julian had been similar to those of his predecessor, he might have wasted the active and important season of the year in the circus of Samosata, or in the churches of Edessa. But as the warlike emperor, instead of Constantius, had chosen Alexander for his model, he advanced without delay to Carthage, a place of grandeur and of making of imperial roads, four and twenty miles from Hierapolis. The temple of the Moon attracted the devotion of Julian; but the halt of a few days was principally employed in completing the immense preparations for the Persian war. The secret of the expedition had kitherno remained in his own breast; but as Carthage is the point of separation of the two great roads, he could no longer conceal, whether it was his design to attack the dominions of Sapor on the side of the Tigris, or on that of the Euphrates. The emperor detached an army of thirty thousand men, under the command of his kinsman Procopus, and of Libanius himself, to secure the dwellings of the Moors; and ordered to direct their march towards Nisibis, and to secure the frontier from the desultory inquisitions of the enemy, before they attempted the passage of the Tigris. Their subsequent operations were left to the discretion of the generals; but Julian expected, that with an army at fire and sword the fertile districts of Media and Adiabene, they might arrive under the walls of Ctesiphon about the same time that he himself, advancing with equal steps along the banks of the Euphrates, should besiege the capital of the Persian monarchy. The success of this disputation of the church and the well-concerted measures, on the powerful and ready assistance of the king of Armenia, who without exposing the safety of his own dominions, might detach an army of four thousand horse, and twenty thousand foot, to the assistance of the Romans. But the feeble Arsaces Tirianus, king of Armenia, had degenerated still more shamefully than his father Chosroes, from the many virtues of the great Tiridates; and as the pusillanimous monarch was averse to any enterprise of danger and glory, he could disguise his timid inobediencce by the more decent excuses of religion and gratitude. He expressed a pious attachment to the memory of Consstantinus' whose recumbent hands have rested on the Olympias, the daughter of the prefect Avilius; and the alliance of a female, who had been educated as the despised wife of the emperor Constans, exalted the dignity of a barbarian king. Ammianus professed the crushed religion; he reigned over a nation of Christian monarchs: the unnatural severity, the religious principle, the domination of the church, of his conscience and interest, from contributing to the victory, which would consummate the ruin of the church.

The alienated mind of Tiranus was exasperated by the indiscretion of Julian, who treated the king of Armenia as his slave, and as the enemy of the gods. The hated and detested monarchs, the designs of his dates awakened the secret indignation of a prince, who, in the humiliating state of dependence, was still conscious of his royal descent from the Arseanides, the lords of the east, and the rivals of the Roman power.

Military operations. The military dispositions of Julian rations were skillfully contrived to deceive the spies, and to divert the attention, of Sapor. The lo-gions appeared to direct their march towards Nisibis and the Tigris. On a sudden they wheeled to the right; traversed the level and naked plain of Carrae; and, on the third day after their departure, reached the Euphrates, where the strong town of Nisichoriun, or Callinicum, had been founded by the Macedonian kings. From thence the emperor pursued his march, above ninety miles, along the winding stream of the Euphrates, till, at length, about one month after his departure, he reached the desert country, which he traversed to the Euphrates in the extreme limit of the Roman dominions. The army of Julian, the most numerous that any of the Caesars had ever led against Persia, consisted of sixty-five two thousand effective and well-disciplined soldiers. The veteran bands of cavalry and infantry, of Romans and barbarians, had been selected from the different provinces; and a just pre-eminence of loyalty and valor was claimed by the hardy Gauls, who guarded the throne and person of their beloved prince. A formidable body of Scythian auxiliaries had been transported from another climate, and almost from another world, to invade a distant country, of whose name and situation they were ignorant. The love of rapine and war allured to the imperial standard several tribes of Sacaeans, or roving Arabs, whose service Julian had commanded, while he sternly refused the payment of the usual subsidies. The broad channel of the Euphrates was crowded by a fleet of fifteen dread ships, destined to attend the motions, and to sati-fy the wants, of the Roman army. The military strength of the fleet was composed of fifty armed galleys; and these were accompanied by an equal number of flat-bottomed vessels, which were connected into the form of temporary bridges. The rest of the ships, partly constructed of timber, and partly covered with raw hides, were laden with an almost inexhaustible supply of arms and engines, of utensils and provisions. The vigilant humanity of Julian had embarked a very large magazine of vinegar and biscuit for the use of the soldiers, but he prohibited the indulgence of wine; and rigorously stopped a long string of superfluous camels, that attempted to follow the rear of the army. The river Chabors falls into the Euphrates at Ciricium; and as soon as the trim net got past the strait of Circium, the Romans

Julian leaves the little stream which separates two mighty and hostile empires. The custom of ancient discipline required a military oration; and Julian embraced every opportunity of displaying his eloquence. He animated the hearts of his troops with the tale of innumerable indestructible and glorious triumphs of his ancestors. He excited their resentment by a lively picture of the insolvency of the Persians; and he exhorted them to imitate his firm resolution, either to extirpate that perfidious nation, or to devote his life in the cause of the perpetuity of the republic. He expressed their pride and confidence, by a donative of one hundred and thirty pieces of silver to every soldier; and the bridge of the Chabors was instantly cut away, to convince the troops that they must place their hopes of safety in the success of their arms. Yet the prudence of the emperor induced him to secure a remote frontier, perpetually exposed to inroads of the hostile Arabs. A detachment of four thousand men was left at Circium, which completed, to the number of ten thousand, the regular garrison of that important fort.

Friday morning, the Romans entered the enemy's country, the country of an active and artful enemy, the order of march was disposed in three columns. The strength of the infantry, and consequently of the whole army, was placed in the centre, under the peculiar command of Julian himself, and the direction of his ear; earth and air was left to the traversed

country which they traversed from the Chalorbas, to the cultivated lands of Assyria, may be considered as a part of the desert of Arabia, a dry and barren waste, which could never be improved by the most powerful arts of human industry. Julian marched over the same ground which had been trod above seven hundred years before by Cyrus, and which is described by one of the companions of his expedition, the sage and heroic Xenophon. * "The country was a plain throughout, as even as the sea, and full of wormwood; and if any other kind of shrubs or reeds grew there, they had all an aromatic smell, but no renown of sweetness." But when he reached the banks of the Euphrates, and in the islands which are occasionally formed by that river, the city of Annah, or Anatho, the actual residence of an Arabian emir, is composed of two long streets, which enclose, within a natural fortification, a small island in the midst, and two fruitful spots on either side of the Euphrates. The warlike inhabitants of Anatho showed a disposition to stop the march of a Roman emperor; till they were diverted from such fatal presumption by the mild exhortations of prince Hormisdas, and the approaching terrors of the fleet and army. They implored, and expostulated with the conqueror, and endeavoured to make the people to an advantageous settlement, near Chalises in Syria, and admitted Puscasus, the governor, to an honourable rank in his service and friendship. But the impregnable fortress of Thilutha could scorn the menace of a siege; and the emperor was obliged to content himself with an insulting promise that, when he had subdued the interior provinces of Persia, Thilutha would no longer refuse to grace the triumph of the conqueror. The inhabitants of the open towns, unable to resist, and unwilling to yield, fled with precipitation; and their houses, filled with spoil and provi- sions, were set on fire by the conquering troops. The thousands of inhabitants were massacred, without remorse, and without punishment, some defenceless women. During the summer, the Surenas, or Persian general, and Malek Rodosaces, the renowned emir of the tribe of Gassan, incessantly hovered round the army: every staggler was intercepted; every detachment was attacked; and the valiant Hormisdas escaped with some difficulty from their hands. But the barbarians were finally repulsed; the country became every day less favourable to the operations of cavalry; and when the Romans arrived at Macepraets, they perceived the ruins of the wall, which had been constructed in ancient times, to secure their dominions from the incursions of the Medes. These preliminaries of the expedition of Julian appear to have employed about fifteen days; and we may compute near three hundred miles from the fortress of Circeium to the wall of Macepraets. **

The fertile province of Assyria, which description was stretched beyond the Tigris, as far as in Latitude 40° 30', was four hundred miles from the ancient wall of Macepraets, to the territory of Basra, where the united streams of the Euphrates and Tigris discharge themselves into the Persian Gulf. * The whole country might have claimed the peculiar name of Mesopotamia; as the two rivers, which are never more distant than sixty, or forty, miles between Bagdad and Babylon, within twenty-five miles of each other. A multitude of artificial canals, dug without much labour in a soft and yielding soil, connected the rivers, and intersected the plain of Assyria. The uses of these artificial canals were various and important. They served to discharge the superfluous waters from one river into the other, at the season of their respective inundations. Subdividing themselves into smaller and smaller branches, they refreshed the dry lands, and supplied the deficiency of rain. They facilitated the intercourse of peace and commerce; and, especially brought in relief the deserts of the Assyrians with the means of opposing a sudden deluge to the progress of an invading army. To the soil and climate of Assyria, nature had denied some of her choicest gifts, the vine, the olive, and the fig-tree; but the food which supports the life of man, and particularly wheat and barley, were produced with inexhaustible fertility; and the husbandman, who committed his seed to the earth, was frequently rewarded with an increase of two, or even of three, hundred. The face of the country was interspersed with groves of innumerable palm-trees; and the hedges, which the diligent natives celebrated, either in verse or prose, and which the three hundred and sixty uses to which the trunk, the branches, the leaves, the juice, and the fruit, were skilfully applied. Several manufactures, especially those of leather and linen, employed the industry of a numerous people, and afforded valuable materials for foreign trade; which appears, however, to have been conducted by the hands of strangers. Babylon had been converted into a royal park; but near the ruins of the ancient capital, new cities had successively arisen, and the populousness of the country was displayed in the multitude of towns and villages, which were built by the conqueror, and still flourish with the name of bittum; the natural and peculiar production of the Babylonian soil. While the successors of Cyrus reigned over Asia, the province of Assyria alone remained, during a third part of the year, the luxurious plenty of the table and household of the Great King. Fourconsiderable villages were assigned for the subsistence of his Indian dogs; eight hundred stallions, and sixteen thousand mares, were constantly kept, at the expense of the country, for the royal stables; and as the daily tribute, which was paid to the satrap, amounted to one English bushel of silver, we may

The invasion of Assyria by Julian, the eunuch, was the work of two powers which had been committed by their haughty master in the Roman provinces. The tumbling Assyrians summoned the rivers to their assistance; and, completed, with their own hands, the ruin of their country. The roads were reduced to rubble for a broad and deep canals, on bridges of floating rafts, which were supported by the aid of the soldiers. Two cities of Assyria presumed to resist the arms of a Roman emperor; and they both paid the severe penalty of their rashness. At the distance of fifty miles from the royal residence of Ctesiphon, Perisbar, or Anbar, held the second rank in the province: a city, large, populous, and well fortified. But as the walls, almost encompassed by a branch of the Euphrates, and defended by the value of a numerous garrison. The exhortations of Hormisdas were repulsed with contempt; and the eyes of the Persian prince were fixed on a just reward, that, unmindful of his royal birth, he conducted an army of strangers against his king and country. The Assyrians maintained their loyalty by a skillful as well as vigorous defence; till the hectic stroke of a battering-ram, having opened a large breach by shattering one of the angles of the wall, they hastened within the fortifications of the interior citadel. The soldiers of Julian rushed impetuously into the town, and, after the full garrison of every military appetite, Perisbar was reduced to ashes; and the engines which assailed the citadel were planted on the ruins of the smoking houses. The contest was renewed by incessant and mutual discharge of missile weapons; and the superiority which the Romans might derive from the mechanical powers of their balloons and catapults was counterbalanced by the advantage of the ground of the besieged. For an Helepolis had been constructed, which could engage on equal terms with the loftiest ramparts, the tremendous aspect of a moving turret, that would leave no hope of resistance or of mercy, terrified the defenders of the citadel into an humble submission; and the place was surrendered only two days after Julian first appeared under the walls of Perisbar. Two thousand five hundred persons, of both sexes, the feeble remnant of a flourishing people, were permitted to retire: the plentiful magazines of corn, of arms, and of splendid furniture were distributed among the troops, and partly reserved for the public use. The victors then surmounted the walls, and the useful stores were destroyed by fire, or thrown into the stream of the Euphrates; and the fate of Amidah was revenged by the total ruin of Perisbar.

The city, or rather fortress, of Maganamalea was defended by an immense number of towers. The whole was constructed of brick and bitumen, appears to have been constructed at the distance of eleven miles, as the safeguard of the capital of Persia. The emperor, apprehensive of leaving such an important fortress in his rear, immediately formed the siege of Maogamalcha; and the army was distributed for that purpose, into three divisions. Vistor, at the head of the cavalry, and of a detachment of heavy-armed foot, was ordered to clear the country, as far as the banks of the Tigris, and the suburbs of Ctesiphon. The conduct of the division was by Julian himself, who seemed to place his whole dependence in the military engines which he erected against the walls; while he secretly contrived a more efficacious method of introducing his troops into the heart of the city. Under the direction of Nevitta and Dogaiaelius, the breaches were opened at a considerable distance, and slowly prolonged as far as the edge of the ditch. The ditch was speedily filled with earth; and, by the incessant labour of the troops, a mine was carried under the foundations of the walls, and sustained, at sufficient intervals, by props of timber. Three chosen cohorts advanced in the rear of the mine, only exploring a dangerous passage; till their intrepid leader whispered back the intelligence, that he was ready to issue from his confinement into the streets of the hostile city. Julian checked their ardour, that he might ensure their success; and immediately directed the attention of the Persians on the prize, by a general assault. The Persians, who, from their walls, contemnously beheld the progress of an impotent attack, celebrated with songs of triumph the glory of Sapor; and ventured to assure the emperor, that he might proceed to the assistance of Maogamalea, in which he could hope to take the impregnable city of Maganamalea.

The city was already taken. History has recorded the name of a private soldier, the first who ascended from the mine into a deserted tower. The passage was widened by his companions, who pressed forwards with imminent valour. Fifteen hundred enemies were already in the midst of the city. The astonished garrison abandoned the walls and their only hope of safety; the gates were instantly burst open; and the revenge of the soldier, unless it was suspended by lust of avaries, was satiated by an undistinguishing massacre. One who had yielded on a promise of mercy, was burnt alive, a few days afterwards, on a charge of having uttered some disrespectful words against the honour of prince Hormisdas. The fortifications were razed to the ground; and not a vestige was left of any value. But as soon as the city was declared a public nuisance, the name of Maogamalcha was abandoned to the darts of the soldiers, and the palaces of Sapor were reduced to ashes, by the command of the Roman emperor. Julian, on this occasion, showed himself ignorant, or careless, of the laws of civilty, which the prudence or refinement of the modern army had distributed for that purpose. Yet these wanton ravages need not excite in our breasts any vehement emotions of pity or resentment. A simple, naked statue, finished by the hand of a Grecian artist, is of more genuine value than all these rude and costly magnificences of which our modern army is so proudly affected by the ruin of a palace, than by the conflagration of a cottage, our humanity must have formed a very erroneous estimate of the miseries of human life.\(^1\) \(^{1}\) Assyria yielded to the Persians an estrage of silver each day. The well-known proportion of weights and measures, (between the Roman and the Attic ounce,) the specific gravity of water and silver, and the value of that metal, will afford, after a short process, the annual revenue which I have stated. Yet the Great King received no less than 550,000 pounds 16 shillings 8 pence (222,696l.) from Assyria. The comparison of two passages in Herodotus (l. i. b. 59. l. v. b. 153.) is of the most importance, and important differences: The one represents the net revenue of Persia; the sums paid by the province, and the gold or silver deposited in the royal treasury. The other would annually save three million six hundred thousand, or the seventeen or eighteen millions raised upon the people.

Julian was an object of terror and hate, and was detested by the Persians; and the paintings of that nation represented the invader of their country under the emblem of a furious lion, which vomited from his mouth a consuming fire. To his friends and soldiers the philosophic hero appeared in a more amiable light; and his virtues were never more conspicuously displayed than in the weak and miserable situation of his life. He practised, without effort, and almost without merit, the habitual qualities of temperance and sobriety. According to the dictates of that artificial wisdom, which assumes an absolute dominion over the mind and body, he sternly refused himself the indulgence of every fancy, and was prompt and strenuous; and the imperial purple was wet and dirty, as the coarse garment of the meanest soldier. The two sieges allowed him some remarkable opportunities of signifying his personal valor, which, in the improved state of the military art, can seldom be exerted by a prudent general. The emperor stood before the citadel of Perisabur, insensible of his extreme danger, and encouraged his troops to burst open the gates of iron, till he was almost overwhelmed under a cloud of missile weapons, and huge stones, that were directed against his person. As he thus lay on the ground, the Persian soldiers, who he approves, is the noblest recompense of a deserving subject; and the authority which Julian derived from his personal merit, enabled him to revive and enforce the rigour of ancient discipline. He punished with death, or ignominy, the misbehaviour of three troops of his guards, that, when taken, were found, without the least damage, of the number and standards: and he distinguished with obdictional crowns the valor of the foremost soldiers, who had ascended into the city of Maogamalea. After the siege of Perisabur, the firmness of the emperor was exercised by the instant avowal of the army, who loudly complained, that their services were rewarded by a tripling doative of one hundred pieces of silver. His just indignation was expressed in the grave and manly language of a Roman.

Riches are the object of your desires; those riches are in the bands of the Persians; and the spoils of this fruitful country are proposed as the prize of your valor and discipline. Believe me," added Julian, "the Roman republic, which formerly possessed such immense treasures, is now reduced to want and wretchedness; since our princes have been persuaded, and their nobles have been bribed, to purchase with gold the tranquility of the barbarians. The revenue is exhausted; the cities are ruined; the provinces are dispeopled. For myself, the only inheritance that I have received from my royal ancestors is a soul incapable of fear; and as long as I am convinced that every real hero thinks nothing of death, I need not acknowledge an honourable poverty, which, in the days of ancient virtue, was considered as the glory of Fabrius. That glory, and that virtue may be your own, if you listen to the voice of heaven and of your leader. But if you will rashly persist, if you are determined to renew the shameless and mischievous examples of old seditions, proceed. As it becomes an emperor who has filled the first rank among men, I am prepared to die, standing; and to despise a precarious life, which every hour may depend on an accidental fever. If I have been found unworthy of the command, there are now among you, (I speak it with that bitter mirth and placidity which is the marked stamp of merit and experience) that conduct is the most important war. Such has been the tender of my reign, that I can retire, without regret, and without apprehension, to the obscurity of a private station. The modest resolution of Julian was answered by the unanimous applause and cheerful obedience of the Romans, who declared their confidence of victory, while they fought under the banners of their heroic prince. Their courage was kindled by his frequent and familiar assurances, (for such wishes were the oaths of Julian,) "So may I reduce the Persians under the yoke!" Thus may I introduce a new monarchy, and re-establish the republic!" The love of fame was the ardent passion of his soul; but it was not before he trampled on the ruins of Maogamalea, that he allowed himself to say, "We have now provided some materials for the sophistication of Antioch." The successful valor of Julian had triumphed over all the obstacles that opposed his steps from the confines of the empire to the gates of Ctesiphon, pristis to the Tigris. But the reduction, or even the siege, of the capital of Persia, was still at a distance; nor can the military conduct of the emperor be clearly approved, or his political merits measured, till the period of his government, by a skilful representation, was contrasted to that of the ancient and the modern Greek. and by impracticable morasses. Near the ruins of Se-luceia the camp of Julian was fixed, and secured, by a ditch and rampart, against the assailants of the numerous and enterprising garrison of Coche. In this fruitful and pleasant country, the Romans were plentifully supplied with water and salt, and the height of the principal forts, which might have embarrassed the motions of the army, submitted, after some resistance, to the efforts of their valour. The fleet passed from the Euphrates into an artificial derivation of that river, which pours a copious and navigable stream into the Tigris, at a small distance within the great city. If they had followed the royal canal, which bore the name of Nahar-Malche, the intermediate situation of Coche would have separated the fleet and army of Julian; and the rash attempt of steering against the current of the Tigris, and forcing through the body of the hostile capital, must have been attended with a total destruction of the Roman navy. The prudence of the emperor foresaw the danger, and provided the remedy. As he had minutely studied the operations of Trajan, in the same country, he soon recollected, that his warlike predecessor had, in a new and navigable region, which, leaving Coche on the right hand, conveyed the waters of the Nahar-Malche into the river Tigris, at some distance above the cities. From the information of the peasants, Julian ascertained the vestiges of this ancient work, which were almost obliterated by design or accident.
By means of the operations of a single day, a broad and deep channel was speedily prepared for the reception of the Euphrates. A strong dyke was constructed to interupt the ordinary current of the Nahar-Malche; a flood of waters rushed impetuously into their new bed. The Roman fleet, steering their triumphant course into the Tigris, desolated the banks and invincible barriers which the Persians of Ctesiphon had erected to oppose their passage.

As it became necessary to transport the Roman army over the Tigris, another army, the labour presented itself, of less toil, but of more danger, than the preceding expedition. The stream was broad and rapid; the ascent steep and difficult; and the entrenchments which had been formed on the ridge of the opposite bank, were lined with a numerous army of heavy cuirassiers, dexterous archers, and skilful engineers (an allusion to the travagant hyperbole of Libanius) could trample, with the same case, a field of corn, or a legion of Romans.5 In the presence of such an enemy, the construction of a bridge was impracticable; and the intrepid prince, who instantly seized the only possible expedient, conceived and executed, in the course of the day, and without the knowledge of the barbarians, of his own troops, and even of his generals themselves. Under the specious pretence of examining the state of the magazines, fourscore vessels were gradually unharned; and a select detachment, apparently destined for some, secret expedition, was ordered to stand to their arms on the first signal. Julian disguised the silent anxiety of his own mind with smiles of confidence and joy; and amused the hostile nations with the spectacle of military games, which he insensibly celebrated under the name of a festival. The day was devoted to plasure; but as soon as the hour of supper was past, the emperor summoned his generals to his tent; and acquainted them, that he had fixed that night for the passage of the Tigris. They stood in silent and respectful astonishment; but, when the respectable Sallust assumed the privilege of his age and experience, the rest of the chiefs supported with freedom the word of his prudent remonstrances. 6 Julian contented himself stored, altered, divided, &c. (Collinsius, Geograph. Antiq. tom. ii. p. 45, 1699.) 5 The Persian and Roman accounts of the operations of Julian are mutually contradictions of antiquity. In the time of Julian, it must have entered into the Embassy. Vigny.

their number, to lead and to contain one hundred and eight thousand, of their bravest soldiers. The spoil was such as might be expected from the riches and luxury of an oriental camp; large quantities of silver and gold, splendid arms and trappings, and beds and tables of massy silver. The victorious emperor distributed, as the rewards of valour, some honourable gifts, civic, and mural, and naval crowns; which he, and perhaps he alone, esteemed more precious than the wealth of Asia. A solemn sacrifice was offered to the god of war, but the appearances of the sacrifices were soon discovered, by less ambiguous signs, that he had now reached the term of his prosperity. 6
On the second day after the battle, the Romans, under the command of Julian, the domestic guards, the Jovians and A. D. 363, June, Heracleanma, and the remaining troops, which composed near two-thirds of the whole army, securely waited over the Tigris. While the Persians behaved with the most hollow and false appearance of submission; the desertion of the adjacent country, Julian cast many an anxious look towards the north, in full expectation, that as he himself had victoriously penetrated to the capital of Sapor, the march and junction of his lieutenants, Sebastian and Procopius, would be executed with the same ardor as to conquer the imperial city. These letters were discontinued by the treachery of the Armenian king, who permitted, and most probably directed, the desertion of his auxiliary troops from the camp of the Romans; and by the dissensions of the two generals, who were incapable of forming or executing any plan for the public service. When the emperor had relinquished the hope of this important reinforcement, he condescended to hold a council of war, and approved, after a full debate, the sentiments of those generals, who dissuaded the siege of Ctesiphon, as a fruitless and pernicious undertaking. It is not easy for us to conjecture all the arts of a most cunning and sanguinary general, who was besieged and taken by the predecessors of Julian, could be rendered impregnable against an army of sixty thousand Romans, commanded by a brave and experienced general, and abundantly supplied with ships, provisions, battering engines, and military stores. But we must observe that the arts of war, and the motions of those sieges, might have been put to better use; they might have been employed to fortify the faithful and virtuous Julian, who with all the danger, which formed the character of Julian, that he was not discouraged by any trivial or imaginary obstacles. At the very time when he declined the siege of Ctesiphon, he rejected, with obstinacy and disdain, the most flattering offers of a negotiation of peace, with Julian. This resolution of Constantinus was surprised by the trepid ingenuity of his successor. As far as the confines of India and Scythia, the satraps of the distant provinces were ordered to assemble their troops, and to march, without delay, to the assistance of their monarch. But their preparations were dilatory, their motions slow; and before Sapor could lead an army into the field, he received the melancholy intelligence of the devastation of Assyria, the ruin of his palaces, and the slaughter of his bravest troops, who defended the passage of the Tigris. The pride of royalty was humbled in the dust of ruin; and the Persians, with the tardy ostentation of Constantinus, was surprised by the intrepid diligence of his successor. The pride of royalty was humbled in the dust of ruin; and the Persians, with the tardy ostentation of Constantinus, was surprised by the intrepid diligence of his successor.

The fleet and army were formed in three divisions, of which the first was commanded by Julian, and consisted of the whole imperial guard, whom Zosimus transports on the third day. The second division, commanded by a branch of the imperial family, and the third division, under the command of Constantinus, and the future emperor Jovian, actually served; some accidents of the division, and perhaps the Jovians and Heracleanma, who often did duty as a guard of the first rank and confidence was secretly despatched to embrace the knees of Jovian, and to request, in the language of a suppliant, that he might be introduced into the presence of the emperor. The Những przedmowie, whether he listened to the voice of pride or humility, whether he consulted the sentiments of his birth, or the duties of his situation, was equally inclined to promote a salutary measure, which would terminate the calamities of Persia, and secure the triumph of Rome. He was astonished by the indefatigable firmness of a hero, who remembered, most unfortunately for himself, that he had uniformly rejected the propositions of Julian. But as Julian was sensible, that the hope of a safe and honor- able pacification was altogether lost, he earnestly requested, that Hermias would privately dissemble the minister of Sapor, and conceal this dangerous temptation from the knowledge of the camp. The honour, as well as interest, of His majesty forbade him to consume his time in idle complaint; and of the Persians, who could not be secured, to meet him on the open plains, they prudently replied, that if he desired to exercise his valour, he might seek the army of the Great King. He felt the insult, and he accepted the advice. Instead of confining his service to march to the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, he resolved to imitate the adventurous spirit of Alexander, and boldly to advance into the inland provinces, till he forced his rival to contend with him, perhaps in the plains of Arvada, for the empire of Asia. The magnanimity of Julian was applauded and betrayed by the Persians, who, through the most open country, had generously submitted to act a part full of danger, of falsehood, and of shame. With a train of faithful followers, he deserted to the imperial camp; exposed, in a specious tale, the injuries which he had sustained; exaggerated the cruelty of Sapor, the discontent of the people, and the want of peace; and confidentially offered himself as the hostage and guide of the Roman march. The most rational grounds of suspicion were urged, without effect, by the wisdom and experience of Hermias; and the credulous Julian receiving the traitor into his bosom, was persuaded by him of all that he said. The delusions of opinion of mankind, appeared to arraign his prudence, and to endanger his safety. He destroyed, in a single hour, the whole navy, which had been transported above five hundred miles, at so great an expense of toil, of treasure, and of blood. Twelve, or, at the most, twenty-two, small vessels were saved, to accompany, on carriages, the march of the army, and to form occasional bridges for the passage of the rivers. A supply of twenty days provisions was reserved for the use of the soldiers; and the rest of the magazines, with a fleet of eleven hundred vessels, which rode at anchor near Arbela, to the number of the Persians, and the absolute command of the emperor. The navigation of the Euphrates was never ascended above Babylon, nor that of the Tigris above Opis. The distance of the last-mentioned city from the Roman camp was not very considerable; and Julian must have soon renounced the vain and impatience. practicable attempt of forcing upwards a great fleet against the stream of a rapid river, which in several places was embarrassed by natural or artificial obstacles. The very force of water was not sufficient to carry it along; and it became necessary to tow the ships against the current of the river; the strength of twenty-thousand soldiers was exhausted in this tedious and servile labour; and if the Romans continued to march along the banks of the Tigris, they could only expect to return home without achieving any enterprise worthy of the genius or fortune of their leader. If, on the contrary, it was advisable to advance into the inland country, the destruction of the fleet and magazines was the only measure which could save that valuable prize from the hands of the numerous and active tribes which might arise on the march from Chaldenstein or Ctesiphon. If the arms of Julian were victorious, we should now admire the conduct, as well as the courage of a hero, who, by depriving his soldiers of the hopes of a retreat, left them only the alternative of death or conquest. 1

But, on the approach of army and march, The cumbersome trains of artillery, and waggons, which retarded the operations of a modern army, were in a great measure unknown in the camps of the Romans. 2 Yet, in every age, the subsistence of sixty thousand men, must have been one of the most important cares of a prudent general; and the supply can only be deriv'd from his own or from the enemy's country. Had it been possible for Julian to maintain a bridge of communication on the Tigris, and to preserve the conquered places of Assyria, a desolated province could not afford and procure victual and supplies, in the beginning of the year when the lands were covered with the inundation of the Euphrates, and the unwholesome air was darkned with swarms of innumerable insects. 3 The appearance of the hostile country was far more inviting. The extensive region that lies between the river Tigris and the frontiers of Media, was filled with villages and towns; and the fertile soil, for the most part, was in a very improved state of cultivation. Julian might expect, that a conqueror, who possessed the two forcible instruments of persuasion, steel and gold, would easily procure a plentiful subsistence from the fears or avarice of the natives. But, on the approach of the Romans, this rich and smiling prospect was instantly blasted. Wherever they moved, the inhabitants deserted the open villages, and took shelter in the fortified towns; the cattle was driven away; the grass and ripe corn were set on fire; and the flames, which the flood had subsided, which interrupted the march of Julian, he beheld the melancholy face of a smoking and naked desert. This desperate but effectual method of defence, can only be executed by the enthusiasm of a people who prefer their independence to their property; or by the vigour of an arbitrary government, which consults the public safety without submitting to their inclinations the liberty of choice. On the present occasion, the zeal and obedience of the Persians seconded the commands of Sapor; and the emperor was soon reduced to the scanty stock of provisions which continually wasted in his hands. Before they were entirely consumed, he might still have reached the wealthy and unwarlike cities of Ecbatana, or Susa, by the effort of some rapid and adventurous march; and his possession of this last resource by his ignorance of the roads, and by the perfidy of his guides. The Romans wandered several days in the country to the eastward of Bagdad; the Persian deserter, who had artfully led them into the snare, escaped from their resentment; and his followers, to avoid the虏ors, confessed the secret of the conspiracy. The visionary conquests of Hyrcania and India, which had so long amused, now tormented, the mind of Julian. Conscious that his own impudence was the cause of the public distress, he anxiously balanced the hopes of a still further advance; and entertained necessary answer, either from gods or men. At length, as the only practicable measure, he embraced the resolution of directing his steps towards the banks of the Tigris, with the design of saving the army by a hasty march to the westward, surrounded by an army of Hephthalites, which acknowledged the sovereignty of Rome. The desponding troops obeyed the signal of the retreat, only seventy days after they had passed the Chaboras, with the sanguine expectation of subverting the throne of Persia. 4

As long as they were exposed to fatigue and danger, advance into the country, their march was observed and insulted from a distant army. 5 On the 19th of June they reached Charax and Barzan, the seat of the Roman army, which might be considered only as the van of the barbarians, who was soon followed by the main body of cuirassiers, archers, and elephants, commanded by Meroanes, a general of rank and reputation. He was accompanied by two of the king's sons, and many of the principal nobility and the people; and famine considerably the strength of the remaining powers, which slowly advanced under the conduct of Sapor himself. As the Romans continued their march, their long array, which was forced to bend or divide, according to the variety of the ground, afforded frequent and favourable opportunities to their vigilant enemies. The Persians repeatedly charged with fury; they were repeatedly repulsed with firmness; and the action at Maronga, which almost deserved the name of a battle, was marked by a considerable loss of satraps and elephants, perhaps of equal value in the eyes of their monarch. These splendid advantages were not obtained without an adequate slaughter on the side of the Romans; several officers of distinction were either killed or wounded; and the emperor himself, who, on all occasions of danger, inspired and guided the valour of his troops, was obliged to expose his person, and exert his abilities. The weight of offensive and defensive arms, which still constituted the strength and safety of the Romans, disabled them from making any long or effectual pursuit; and as the horsemen of the Persians were trained to dart their javelins, and shoot their arrows, the cavalry gained the better dislocation; the cavalry of Persia was never more formidable than in the moment of a rapid and disorderly retreat. But the most certain and irreparable loss of the Romans was that of time. The hardy veterans, accustomed to the cold climate of Gaul and Germany, faint and perish from the heat of the Persian summer; their vigour was exhausted by the incessant repetition of march and combat; and the progress of the army was suspended by the precautions of a slow and dangerous retreat, in the presence of an active enemy. Every day, every hour, as the supply diminished, the value and power of the Persians were augmented. Julian, who always contained himself with such food as a hungry soldier would have distributed, for the use of the troops, the provisions of the imperial household, and whatever could be spared from the chance plunder of the tribunes and generals. But this rude relief served only to aggravate the sense of the public distress; and the Romans began to entertain the most gloomy apprehensions that, before they could reach the frontiers of the empire, they should all perish, either by famine, or by the sword of the Persians.

While Julian struggled with the almost insuperable difficulties of his situation, the silent hours of the night were still devoted to study and contemplation. Whenever he closed his eyes in short and interrupted slumbers, his mind was agitated with painful anxiety; nor can it be thought surprising, that the great exertions of the empire slipped away from him, covering with a funeral vail his head and his horn of abundance, and slowly retiring from the imperial tent. The monarch started from his couch, and stepping forth to refresh his wearied spirits with the coolness of the midnight air, he beheld a fiery meteor, which shot to the eastward; his heart was violently affected by this vision, of the break of day. The army marched through a hilly country; and the hills had been secretly occupied by the Persians. Julian led the van, with the skill and attention of a consummate general; he was alarmed by the approach of his rear was woefully mistaken. The heat of the weather had tempted him to lay aside his cuirass; but he snatched a shield from one of his attendants, and hastened, with a sufficient reinforcement, to the relief of the rear guard. A similar danger intrepidly the imperial troops to the defence of the front; and, as he galloped between the columns, the centre of the left was attacked and almost overpowered, by a furious charge of the Persian cavalry and elephants. This huge body was soon defeated, by the well-trained light infantry, who aimed their weapons, with dexterity and effect, against the backs of the horsemen, and the legs of the elephants. The barbarians fled; and Julian, who was foremost in every charge, accidentally wounded, was carried to the rear of the camp. His trembling guards, scattered and oppressed by the disorderly throng of friends and enemies, reminded his fearless sovereign that he was without armour; and conjured him to decline the fall of the impending ruin. As they exclaimed, a cloud of darts, arrows and javelins, fell from the ascending and disordered Persian camp. Julian attempted to draw the deadly weapon from his side; but his fingers were cut by the sharpness of the steel, and he fell senseless from his horse. His guards hastened to the Heptanor, the Place of the Tent. The terror was greatly raised from the ground, and conveyed out of the tumult of the battle into an adjacent tent. The report of the melancholy event passed from rank to rank; but the grief of the Romans inspired them with invincible valour, and the desire of revenge. The bloody and obstinate conflict was maintained by the two armies till they were separated by the total darkness of the night. The Persians derived some honour from the advantage which they obtained against the left wing, where Antasius, master of the offices, was slain, and the prefect Sulfust very narrowly escaped. But the event of the day was saved to the Romans. They abandoned the field; their two generals, Mentes and Norudastes, fifty nobles or satraps, and a multitude of their bravest soldiers; and the success of the Romans, if Julian had survived, might have been improved into a decisive and useful victory. The first wound of Julian, into which he had been thrown by loss of blood, were expressive of his martial spirit. He called for his horse and arms, and was impatient to rush into the battle. His remaining strength was exhausted by the painful effort; and the surgeons, who examined his wound, discovered the symptoms of approaching death. He employed the awful moments with the firm temper of a hero and a sage; the philosophers who had accompanied him in this fatal expedition, compared the tent of Julian with the prison of Socrates; and the spectators, whom duty, or friendship, or curiosity, had assembled around his couch, listened with respectful grief, to the funeral oration of their dying emperor. *

*Friends and fellow-soldiers, the seasonable period of my departure is now arrived, and I shall shortly pass through the coldness of death and the demands of nature. I have learned from philosophy, how much the soul is more excellent than the body; and that the separation of the nobler substance should be the subject of joy, rather than of affliction. I have learned from religion, that an early death has often been the reward of piety; and I accept, as a favour of the gods, the mortal stroke that secures me from the danger of disguising a character, which has hitherto been supported by virtue and fortitude. I die without remorse, as I have lived without guilt. I am pieced to reflect on the innocence of my private life; on my constant performance of my duty, and the supreme authority, that emanation of the divine Power, has been preserved in my hands pure and immaculate. Destituting the corrupt and destructive maxims of despotism, I have collected the testimonies of antiquity. Mark Antony's letter, an instance of soldiery for fifty drachmas, or, in other words, a pound of flour for twelve or fourteen drachmas, was too infamous for that weight of money. It was impossible to preserve the interesting narrative of Pindar (iun. v. 102–116), without perceiving that Mark Antony and Julian were pursued by the same reproach of the Greeks. The Persians, under the command of their king, were shipwrecked, and the people of Antioch ignored that the troops were hungry. They intimated to the king that he was present to comfort the faithful foe of the decease satrap, by sending them, in a friendly and respectful manner, the head of their noble, and their master's side. Libanius, de morte Juliani, eul. xii. p. 163. The character and situation of Julian might countenance the employment of a Greek satyr, that he had previously composed the elaborate oration which Ammianus heard, and has transcribed. The version of the original text by the learned scholar, F. A. de la B caret in Beliactid, is abridged, and not expressive of the Pisonian idea of eulogies, which is darkly imbricated in the original. I have, after the learned directions of Herodotus (b. c. 31) displayed that doctrine in an agreeable tale. Yet the Jupiter (in the 105 book of the Iliad) who intimated with tears of blood the death of Sarpedon his son, had a very imperfect notion of happiness or glory beyond the grave.
patism, I have considered the happiness of the people as the end of government. Submitting my actions to the laws of prudence, of justice, and of moderation, I have trusted the event to the care of Providence. Peace was the object of my counsels, as long as peace was consistent with the public welfare; but when the impious vices of my country summoned me to extend my sway to the defense of my country in the war, with the clear fore-knowledge (which I had acquired from the art of divination) that I was destined to fall by the sword. I now offer my tribute of gratitude to the eternal Being, who has not suffered me to perish by the cruel justice of the tyrants, by the secret plots of conspirators, or by the slow tortures of lingering disease. He has given me, in the midst of an honorable career, a splendid and glorious departure from this world; and I hold it equally absurd, equally base, to solicit, or to decline, the stroke of fate.—Thus much I have attempted to say; but my strength fails me, and I feel the approach of death.—I shall cautiously refrain from any word that may tend to influence your suffrages in the election of an emperor. My choice might be imprudent or injudicious; and if it should not be ratified by the consent of the army, it might be fatal to the person of the individual. I trust it will be known in all good citizen, express my hopes, that the Romans may be blessed with the government of a virtuous sovereign. After this discourse, which Julian pronounced in a firm and gentle tone of voice, he distributed, by a mild and affectionate reference to the remains of his private fortune; and making some inquiry why Ammianus was not present, he understood, from the answer of Sallust, that Anatolius was killed; and bewailed with amiable inconsistency, the loss of his friend. At the same time he reproved the immediate grief of the spectators; and conjured them not to disgrace, by their lamentations, the fate of a prince, who in a few moments would be united with heaven, and with the stars. The spectatrors were silent; and Julian entered into a metaphysical argument with the philosophers Priscus and Maxius, on the nature of the soul. The efforts which he made, of mind as well as body, most probably hastened his death. His wound began to bleed with fresh violence; his respiration was embarrassed by the swelling of the veins; he called for a draught of cold water, and, as soon as he had drank it, expired without pain, about the hour of midnight. Such was the end of that extraordinary man, who, in the second year of his age, after a reign of one year and about eight months, from the death of Constantius. In his last moments he displayed, perhaps with some ostentation, the love of virtue and fame, which had been the ruling passion of his life.

Election of the emperor Jovian, A.D. 363. The emperors of the Valentinian dynasty, who had neglected to secure the future execution of his designs, by the timely and judicious nomination of an associate and successor, but by the royal policy of Constantius Chorusc was reduced to his own person; and if he entertained any serious thoughts of justifying with the purple the most worthy among the Romans, he was diverted from his resolution by the difficulty of the choice, the jealousy of power, the fear of ingratitude, and the natural presumption of health, of youth, and of prosperity. His unexpected death left the empire without a master, and

It is agreed that the primicerius was not an officer of the imperial court, but a person of peculiar dignity, a senator; and though only a tribune, he ranked in the military ranks. Cod. The primicerius, as a confessor under the preceding reign, and possibly, that he was office of the confessor under the preceding reign, and possibly, that he was clothed with authority, is perhaps, the origin of his dignity. unexpected elevation was moderated by the just apprehension, that the same day might terminate the life and reign of the new emperor. The pressing voice of necessity was obeyed without delay; and the dogs were set by Julian. A few hours after his predecessor had expired, were, to prosecute a march, which could alone extricate the Romans from their actual distress.2

The esteem of an enemy is most sincerely expressed by his fears; and the degree of fear may be accurately measured by the joy with which he celebrates his deliverance. The welcome news of the death of Julian, which a deserter revealed to the camp of Sapor, inspired the desponding monarch with a sudden confidence in his fortune. He immediately concentrated the whole army, perhaps the ten thousand

Sapor's army; and the emperor, with the appearance of his five hundred elephants, threw the most sublime terror into the minds of the Persians. He appeared to the Christians, with whom he was by his long residence, a deliverer of their country, a protector of the whole empire. Yet, perhaps the ten thousand

Tigris, which had been seated in a deep and sequestered valley. From the hills, the archers of Persia insulted and annoyed the wearied legionaries; and a body of cavalry, which had penetrated with des- perate courage through the precipitous gate, was cut in pieces, after a doubtful conflict, near the imperial tent. In the succeeding night, the camp of Caracell was protected by the lofty dykes of the river, and the Roman army, though incessantly exposed to the vexatious pursuit of the Saracens, pitched their tents near the city of Dura,4 four days after the death of Julian. The Tigris was still on the left: their hopes and provisions were almost consumed; and the impatient soldiers had formed several devices to preserve their camp on that side. They marched their tents towards the Rhine and Danube, should attempt the bold adventure, which might serve either as an encouragement, or as a warning, for the rest of the army. In the silence of the night, they swam the Tigris, surprised an unguard-ed post of the enemy, and displayed at the dawn of day the signal of their resolution and fortune. The success of this trial disposed the emperor to listen to the promises of the Christians; and he designed to construct a floating bridge of the inflated skins of sheep, oxen, and goats, covered with a floor of earth and fascines.5 Two important days were spent in the ineffectual labour; and the Romans, who already endured the miseries of famine, cast a look of despair on the Tigris and upon the barbarians; whose numbers and chasms increased with the distress of the imperial army.6 In this hopeless situation, the fining Negotiation and spirits of the Romans were revived by treaty of peace, July. The transient pre- sumption of Sapor had vanished: he observed, with no previous concurrence, the command of these his officers, and the chief part of his train of elephants: and the experienced monarch feared to provoke the resistance of despair, the vicissitudes of fortune, and the exhausted powers of the Roman empire; which might soon advance to re- solve, or to revenge the successor of Julian. The Saracens himself, accompanied by another satrap, appeared in the camp of Jovian;7 and declared, that the clemency of his sovereign was not adverse to signify the conditions on which he would consent to spare the life and property of the Persian emperor. The crafty Persian delayed, under various pretences, the conclusion of the agreement; started difficulties, required explanations, suggested expedites, reeled from his concessions, increased his demands, and wasted four days in the arts of negotiation, till he had consummated the stock of provisions which was yet remained in the camp of the Romans. Had Jovian been capacible of executing a bold and prudent measure, he would have continued his march, with unremitting diligence; the progress of the treaty would have suspended the attacks of the barbarians; and, before the fifth day, his army might have been restored to the province of Ctesiphon, at the distance only of one hundred miles.5 The irritable emperor, instead of breaking through the toils of the enemy, expected his fate with patient resignation; and accepted the humiliating conditions of peace, which it was expedient for him to receive. The Romans retired, and took possession of the same places of Mesopotamia, which were thus dismembered from the empire. It was considered as an indulgence, that the inhabitants of those fortresses were permitted to retire with their effects; but the conqueror rigorously insisted, that the Romans should for ever abandon the king and kingdom of Armenia. A peace, or rather

1 Ammianus (xxv. 10) has drawn from the life an impartial portrait of Julian; in which the younger Victor has added some remarkable strokes. The Abbé de la Bédére (Histoire de Jovien, tom. 1. p. 307) has composed an elaborate history of the emperor; a work remarkably distinguished by elegance of style, critical disquisition, and religious prejudices. It appears from Procopius, that the Saracens, not from the Persians under Cyrus and his successors, were revived, if we may use the word in its proper meaning; by the Saracens. Brizius de Regno Persico, p. 208, &c.

2 The obscure valleys of the inland country are inaccessible by water, except at a few points, where the Ganges and Mahanadi are navigable. D'Anville has described the difficult situation of Sarco, Caracella, and Ctesiphon, which was indeed a fen. (Juv. Met., vii. p. 93, &c. Pline, l. xvi. p. 238, &c.) The mountains of Armenia, the oracular testimony of Euthyrion (among a Pers inane situlaus de Priscius, v. x. 17.) must incline us to suspect, that Ammia-nus has been too partial in the description of the Romans. It is probable that the mountains of Ctesiphon could extend over the plains of Assyria, as low as the confines of the Tigris and the great Zab; or how an army of sixty thousand men could march one hundred miles in four days.

3 A similar expedition was proposed to the leaders of the ten thousand troops, and wisely rejected. Xenophon, Anabasis, 1. ii. p. 223, 232, &c. It appears, from our modern travellers, that rapids limiting on bladders, perform the trade on navigation of the Tigris.

4 The first melancholy for the Persians, was expressed by Ammianus, (xxv. 1.) Libanios. (Orat. Parent. c. 146, p. 346.) and Zosimus, (H. P. ii. 18, &c. p. 350.) The second, by Procopius, (in Ver. Liban. p. 154.) The Saracens, the actual testimony of Eutropius (amor a Protis otholides Persis proculus, x. 17.) must incline us to suspect, that Ammianus has been too partial in the description of the Romans.

5 Sextus Rufus (de Provincia, c. 20) describes a poor submarginal town, with national vanity, at the foot of Mount Mount Eri, in Persia, where Zab estimated more of their own fame, than of the Romans.
stragglers of the march; but the generals and troops of Sapor respected the cessation of arms; and Jovian was suffered to explore the most convenient place for the passage, in the river of some small veins, which had not been saved from the confiscation of the fleet, performed the most essential service. They first conveyed the emperor and his favourites; and afterwards, in many successive voyages, a great part of the army. But, as every man was anxious for his personal safety, and the whole body of the soldiery was abandoning on the bank of the river, the soldiers, who were too impatient to wait the slow returns of the boats, boldly ventured themselves on light hurdles, or inflated skins; and drawing after them their horses, attempted, with various success, to swim across the river,® of this daring adventure many were followed by the boatsmen, who, were carried along by the violence of the stream, fell an easy prey to the avarice or cruelty of the wild Arabs;® and the loss which the army sustained in the passage of the Tigris, was not inferior to the carnage of a day of battle. As soon as the Romans had landed on the western bank, they were delivered from the hostile pursuit of the barbarians; but, in a labours march of two hundred miles over the plains of Mesopotamia, they endured the last extremities of thirst and hunger. They were obliged to traverse a sandy desert, where the wind, in ten thousand places, did not afford a single blade of sweet grass, nor a single spring of fresh water; and the rest of the inhospitable waste was untried by the foot-steps either of friends or enemies. Whenever a small measure of flour could be discovered in the camp, twenty pounds' weight were occasionally purchased with a pound of gold.® The beasts of burden were slaughtered and devoured; and the desert was strewn with the arms and baggage of the Roman soldiers, whose tattered garments and meagre countenances displayed their past sufferings and actual misery. A small convoy of provisions advanced to them,® and the supply was the more grateful, since it declared the fidelity of Sebastian and Procopius. At Thibilitha,® the emperor most graciously received the generals of Mesopotamia; and the remains of a once flourishing army at length reposed themselves under the walls of Nisibis. The messengers of Jovian had already proclaimed, in the language of flattery, his election, his treaty, and his return; and the new prince had taken the most effectual measures to secure the allegiance of the armies and the provinces of Europe; by placing the military command in the hands of his countrymen, who, from intermarriage,® and the friendship that the temple of the gods would be enriched with the spoils of the east; that Persia would be reduced to the humble state of a tributary province, governed by the laws and magistrates of Rome; that the barbarians would adopt the dress, and manners, and language of their conquerors.® Euchates and Susa would study the art of rhetoric under Grecian masters.® The progress of the army

1 The treaty of Diura is recorded with grief or indignation by Ammianus (xxv. 7), Libanius, (Orat. Parent., c. 142, p. 354), Zosimus, I. c. 10, 11, and Faroni Nascim. (Orat. Parent., p. 117, 118, where he attributes the distress to Julian, the deliverance to Jovian, and the victory.) The best modern writer, who was present in a military station, styles this peace necessary, and justifiable.

4 Conquered, and indeed, in the ancient transactions of the Zabatus, (Anab., I. p. 156, 157, p. 220,) or great Zab, a river of Assyria, 400 miles long, divided into two channels, the upper and the lower, which is used as a metaphor for the commonwealth. The error of the Greeks bestowed on the great and lesser Zab the name of the great and the lesser Euphrates, (because the former was the more magnificent, and the latter in quantity.) They created these animals to attend the Tigris of the east.
5 The Chaldaea is vague and languid; the Ambasian circumstance, of which the Chaldeans are informed, is the extreme of truth.
6 According to Rufinus, an immediate supply of provisions was stipulated by the treaty; and Theodoret affirms, that the obligation was faithfully discharged by the Persians. Such a fact is probable, but unhappily false. See Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 702. of Julian interrupted his communication with the empire; and, from the moment that he passed the Tigris, his affectionate subjects were ignorant of the fate and fortunes of their prince. Their contemplation of fancied triumphs was disturbed by the melancholy rumour of his death; and they persisted to believe that he, after all, could no longer die, the fame of that fatal event. The messengers of Jovian promulgated the specious tale of a prudent and necessary peace; the voice of fame, louder and more sincere, revealed the disgrace of the emperor, and the conditions of the ignominious treaty. The minds of the people were agitated, by the expectation and terror, when they were informed that the unworthy successor of Julian relinquished the five provinces, which had been acquired by the victory of Glerius; and that he shamefully surrendered to the barbarians the important city of Nisibis, the firmest bulwark of the provinces of the east. The deep and dangerous question, how far the public faith should be observed, when it becomes incompatible with the public safety, was freely agitated in popular conversation; and some hopes were entertained, that the emperor would redeem his pusillanimous behaviour by a restoration of the dignity and ancients splendours of the Roman empire. The spirit of the Roman senate had always disclaimed the unequal conditions which were extorted from the distress of her captive armies; and, if it were necessary to satisfy the national honour, by delivering the guilty general into the hands of the barbarians, the greatest care was taken to satisfy every considerable province in the precedent of ancient times.

Jovian evacuates Nisibis, and reclaims the five provinces to the Roman emperor.

But the emperor, whatever might be the limits of his constitutional authority, was not the first who delegated the absolute master of the laws and arms of the state, and the same motives which prompted his predecessor to consign Nisibis to the Persian emperor, forced him to submit the defense of the city, and the conclusion of the treaty, to the action of the senate and the people. Augustus, moreover, had preserved the sanction of ancient laws; and it was not without reluctance that he acquiesced in the precedent of ancient times.

The people of Carthage, a city devoted to paganism, buried the ashes of the great Hadrian, when he received the fatal intelligence, cast his eyes on his sword; but he recollected that Plato had condemned suicide, and that the virtue of man, as well as the safety of the state, depended on the submission to the orders of the government. The emperor, however, now that he had confided in the protection of their sovereign, threw themselves at his feet. They conjured him not to abandon, or, at least, not to deliver, a faithful colony to the rage of a barbarian tyrant, exasperated by the three successive defeats, which he had experienced under the walls of Nisibis. They still possessed arms and courage to repel the invaders of their country; they requested only the permission of using them in their own defence; and as soon as they had asserted their independence, they should implore the favour of being again admitted into the rank of his subjects. Their submission was received with much effectual deference. Jovian alleged, with some confusion, the sanctity of oaths; and, as the reluctance with which he accepted the present of a crown of gold, convinced the citizens of their hopeless condition, the advocate Sylvanus was provoked to exclaim, "O emperor! may you thus be cowed by all the cities of your dominions!" Jovian, who in a few weeks had assumed the habits of a prince, was dispossessed with freedom, and offended with truth; and as he reasonably supposed, that the discontent of the people might incline them to submit to the Persian government, he published an edict, under pain of death, that they should leave the city within the term of three days. Ammianus has delineated in lively colours the scene of universal despair, which he seems to have viewed with an eye of compassion. The monuments of ancient splendours were consumed by the torches of horses, chariots, and victuallers, which had been thrown over the ramparts. The disconsolate mourner dropped a last tear over the tomb of a son or husband, who must soon be profaned by the rude hand of a barbarian master; and the aged citizen kissed the threshold, and clung to the doors, of the house, where he had passed the cheerful and careless hours of infancy. The highways were crowded with a trembling multitude: the distinctions of rank, and sex, and age, were lost in the general calamity. Every one strove to bear away some fragment from the wreck of his fortunes; and as they could not command the immediate service of an adequate number of captives, they were allowed to take behind them the greatest part of their valuable effects. The savage insensibility of Jovian appears to have aggravated the hardships of these unhappy fugitives. They were seated, however, in a new-built quarter of Amidah; and that rising city, with the reinforcement of a large corps of barbarians, soon recovered its former splendour, and became the capital of Mesopotamia.

Similar orders were despatched by the emperor for the evacuation of Singara and the castle of the Moors; and for the restitution of the five provinces beyond the Tigris. Sapor enjoyed the glory and the fruits of his success, and the province of Persia, which he had conquered, was considered as a memorable era in the decline and fall of the Roman empire. The predecessors of Jovian had sometimes relinquished the dominion of distant and unprofitable provinces; but, since the foundation of the city, the genius of Rome, the god Terminus, who guarded the boundaries of the republic, had never retired before the sword of a victorious enemy.

After Jovian had performed those acts of submission, which the voice of his people might have tempted him to violate, he hastened away from the scene of his disgrace, and proceeded with his whole court, to enjoy the luxury of Armoria. Without consulting the dictates of religious zeal, he was prompted, by humanity and gratitude, to bestow the last honours on the remains of his deceased sovereign. and Procopius, who sincerely bewailed the loss of his kinsman, was removed from the command of the army, under the dreadful prospect of conducting the funeral. The corpse of Julian was transported from Nisibis to Tarsus, in a slow march of fifteen days; and, as it passed through the cities of the east, was saluted by hostile factions, with mournful lamentations and clamorous insults. The pagans already placed in the hands of the emperor, the father of their beloved Julian, the idol of their idolatry, the object of their worship he had restored; while the invectives of the Christians pursued the soul of the apostate to hell, and his body to the grave.\(^\) One party lamented the approaching ruin of their altars; the other celebrated the marvellous deliverance of the church. The christians, applauded, in lofty and ambiguous strains, the stroke of divine vengeance, which had been so long suspended over the heads of Julian.\(^\) They acknowledged that the death of the tyrant, at the instant he expired beyond the Tigris, was \(\textit{revealed to the saints of Egypt, Syria, and Cappadocia};\) and instead of suffering him to fall by the Persian darts, their indiscipline ascribed the heroic deed to the obscure hand of some mortal or immortal champions of the faith.\(^\) Such imprudent declarations were eagerly adopted by the malice or credulity of their adversaries\(^\) who darkly insinuated, or confidently asserted, that the governors of the church had instigated and directed the fanaticism of a domestick\(^\) assassin. The eastern and western emperors, after sixteen years after the death of Julian, the charge was obviously and vehemently urged, in a public oration, addressed by Libanius to the emperor Theodosius. His suspicions are unsupported by fact or argument; and we can only esteem the generous zeal of the sophist of Antioch, for the cold and negligent memory of his friend,\(^\) and general of Julian,\(^\) as an ancient custom in the funerals of emperors, as well as in the triumphs, of the Romans, that the voice of praise should be corrected by that of satire and ridicule; and that in the midst of the splendid pageants, which displayed the glory of the fort or of the despoils of the deceased emperor, it should not be concealed from the eyes of the world.\(^\)

1 At Nisibis he performed a royal act. A brave officer, his name Caius, who had been thought worthy of the purple, was dragged from the city, thrown into a well, and slain to death, without any form of trial, or evidence of guilt, and his body was buried in the catacomb of the church of the Virgin, in the city of Ephesus.

5 The account of this history (Hist. de Jovien, tom. l. p. 212—257) though to a severe critic, has pronounced that Jovian was not found innocent of his promise; since he could not dissemble the empire, nor abate, without their consent, the allegiance of his people. I have never found much delight or instruction in such political metaphysics.

This custom was practised in the funeral of Julian. The comedians, who resented his contempt and aversion for the theatre, exhibited, with the applause of a christian audience, the lively and exaggerated representation of the faults and follies of the deceased emperor. His various character and singular manners afforded an ample scope for pleasantry and ridicule.\(^\) In the exercise of his uncommon talents, he often descended below the majesty of his rank. Alexander was transformed into Diogenes; the philanthropist was degraded into a priest. The purity of conscience was nullified by excessive vanity; his superstition disturbed the peace, and endangered the safety, of a mighty empire; and his irregular saults were the less entitled to indulgence, as they appeared to be the laborious efforts of art, or even of the remains of Julian, who was interred at Tarsus in Cilicia; but his stately tomb, which arose in that city, on the banks of the cold and limpid Cydnus,\(^\) was displeasing to the faithful friends who loved and revered the memory of that extraordinary man. The philosopher expressed a very reasonable wish that the disciple of Plato might have reposed amidst the groves of the academy;\(^\) while the soldier exclaim- ed in bolder accents, that the ashes of Julian should be scattered over the field of Mars, and among the ancient monuments of Roman virtue.\(^\) The history of princes does not very frequently renew the example of a similar connection.

\(^*\) Compare the sophit and the saint. (Libanius, Momord tom. ii. p. 435, &c. c. 16. p. 386, c. 25. p. 195, with Gregory Naunoian. Orat. iv. p. 123-125.) It was carried by some deserters to the Persian camp; and the Romans were reproached as the enem- ies of the army of Pagan and his subjects. (Procopius, ii. c. 25.) It was urged, as a decisive proof, that no Persian had appeared to claim the crown which Julian had reserved for himself. But the Persian, who dared the fatal javelin, might be ignorant of its ef- fect; or he might be slain in the same action. Ammianus neither feels nor supports a suspicion.

\textbf{The government and death of Julian.—Election of Valenti- nian, who associates his brother Valens, and makes the foundation of the eastern and western empires. Of Procopius.—Civil and ecclesiastical administration.— Germany.—Britain.—Africa.—The east.—The Danube.—Death of Valentinian.—His two sons, Gratian and Valentinian II. succeed to the western empire.}

The death of Julian had left the public affairs of the empire in a very doubtful and uncertain situation. The eastern army was saved by an inglorious, perhaps a necessary, treaty; and the first moments of peace were consecrated by the pious Julian to restore the domestic tranquillity of the church and state. The indiscipline of his predecessor, instead of declining, had been increased; the religious war; that it was necessary which he affected to preserve between the hostile factions, served only to perpetuate the contest, by the vicissitudes of hope and fear, by the rival claims of ancient possession and actual favour. The christians had handed the throne to the general and the emperor, and it imbibed the spirit of the church. In private families, the sentiments of nature were extinguished by the blind fury of zeal and revenge; the majesty of the laws was violated or abused; the cities of the east were stained with blood; and the most implacable enemies of the Romans were in the bosom of their country. Julian was educated in the profession of christianity; and as he marched from Nisibis to Antioch, the banner of the cross, the \textit{Libarum} of Constantine, which was again displayed at the head of the legions, announced to the people the faith of their new emperor. The example of the one good was immediately followed by the other. The taste of Julian was transferred to his successor, Gratian, and the public glory of the empire was assigned to the son of Julian, Constantine, and the grandson of Constantine the great. Julian was soon persuaded that the distress of the times obliged him to diminish the measure of charitable contributions.\(^*\) The christians were unanimous in the loud and sincere applause which they bestowed on the pious successor of Julian. But they were still ignorant what creed, or what synod, he would choose for the standard of orthodoxy; and the peace of the church immediately revived those eager disputes which had been suspended during the season of persecution. The episcopal leaders of the contending sects, convinced, from expediriage, how much their fate would depend on the earliest impressions that were made on the mind of an understanding age. The Itinerarium Antiochense, which set out to strip off the pollutions which had umbrage to the environs of Antioch. The highways of the east were crowded with Hommaouan, and Armenia, and Eunomian bishops, who struggled to outstrip each other in the holy race; the apartments of the palace resounded with their clamours; and the ears of their priests were not listened to with the singular mixture of metaphysical argument and passionate invective. The moderation of Jovian, who recommended concord and charity, and referred the disputants to the sentence of a future council, was interpreted as a symptom of indifference; but his attachment to the Nicene faith was at length so decided and declared, by the reverence which he expressed for the celestial virtues of the great Athanasius. The intrepid veteran of the faith, at the age of seventy, had issued from his retreat on the first intelligence of the tyrant's death. The acclamations of the people seemed him once more on the archiepiscopal throne; and he was wisely accepted, or anticipated, the invitation of Jovian. The venerable figure of Athanasius, his calm courage, and insatiable sustenance, sustained the reputation which he had already acquired in the courts of four successive princes. As soon as he had gained the confidence, and had ascertained that the occasion was at hand, he turned in triumph to his diocese, and continued, with mature counsels, and undiminished vigour, to direct, ten years longer, the ecclesiastical government of Alexandria, Egypt, and the catholic church. Before his departure from Antioch, he assured Jovian that his orthodox devotion would be rewarded with a long and peaceful reign. Athanasius had reason to hope, that he should be allowed either the merit of a successful prediction, or the excuse of a grateful, though imperfect, prayer.

Jovian proclaims universal toleration. The slightest force, when it is applied to assist and guide the natural descent of its object, operates with irresistible weight; and Jovian had the good fortune to embrace the religious opinions which were supported by the spirit of the times, and the zeal and numbers of the most powerful sect. Under his reign, Christianity obtained an easy and lasting establishment. The smile of royal patronage was withdrawn, the genes of paganism, which had been fondly raised and cherished by the arts of Julian, sunk irrecoverably in the dust. In many cities, the temples were shut or deserted, and temples even which had been ambitious to win the smiles of emperors, thought it prudent to shave their beards, and disguise their profession; and the christians rejoiced, that they were now in a condition to forgive, or to revenge, the injuries which they had suffered under the preceding reign. The consternation of the pagan world was dispelled by a wise and gracious edict of toleration, by which Jovian declared, that although he should severely punish the sacrilegious rites of magic, his subjects might exercise, with freedom and safety, the ceremonies of the ancient worship. The memory of this law has been preserved by the orator Themistius, who was deputed by the senate and the people of Constantinople to express their sentiments to the emperor. The orator expatiates on the clemency of the divine nature, the facility of human error, the rights of conscience, and the independence of the mind; and, with some eloquence, inculcates the principles of philosophical toleration; whose aid superstition herself, in the hope of distasteful meditation. He justly observes, that, in the recent changes, both religions had been alternately disgraced by the seeming acquisition of worthless profligates, of those votaries of the reigning purple, who could pass without a reason, and without a blush, from the church to the temple, and from the altar of Jupiter to the sacred table of the christians.

In the space of seven months, the Romish progress from man to man, who were now returned to Antioch. Antioch, had performed a march of five hundred miles; in which they had endured all the hardships of war, of famine, and of pestilence. His soldiers were rewarded, he was satisfied with the fruits of his labours, and the approach of winter, the timid and impatient Jovian allowed only, to the men and horses, a respite of six weeks. The emperor could not sustain the indiscreet and malicious rancour of the people of Antioch; he was impatient to possess the palace of Constantinople; and he prevented the exhibition of a competition, who might occupy the vacant allegiance of Europe. But he soon received the grateful intelligence, that his authority was acknowledged from the Thracian Bosphorus to the Atlantic ocean. By the first letters which he despatched from the camp of Mesopotamia, he had delegated the military command of Gaul and Illyricum to Malachis, a brave and faithful officer, of the nation of the Franks; and to his father-in-law, count Lucilian, who had formerly distinguished his courage and conduct in the defence of Nisibis. Malachis had declined an office which to him would have been unequal; and Lucilian was at easy in the command of the tiny of the Batavian cohorts. But the moderation of Jovinus, master-general of the cavalry, who forgave the intention of his disgrace, soon appeased the tumult, and confirmed the uncertain minds of the soldiers. The oath of fidelity was administered, and the acclamations of the people, at the departure of the western armies saluted their new sovereign as he descended from mount Taurus to the city of Tyana, in Cappadocia. From Tyana he continued his hasty march to Ancyræ, capital of the province of Galatia; where Jovian assumed, with his infant son, the name and ensigns of the consulsrap.

for the fatal term of his journey and his life. After indulging himself with a plentiful, perhaps an intempe-sate, supper, he retired to rest; and the next morning the emperor Jovian was found dead in his bed.

The cause of this sudden death was va-eriously understood. By some it was assumed to be the result of an indigestion, occasioned either by the quantity of the wine, or the quality of the mushrooms, which he had swallowed in the evening. According to others, he was suffocated in his sleep by the vapo ur of charcoal, which extracted from the walls of the apartment the unwholessome fumes of a fresh plaster. But the want of a regular inquiry into the death of a prince, whose reign and person were soon forgotten, appears to have been the only circumstance which countenanced the malicious whispers of poison and domestic guilt. 1 The body of Jovian was sent to Constantiople, to maintain the public order, with his predecessors, and the sad procession was met on the road by his wife Charito, the daughter of count Lucellium; who still wept the recent death of her father, and was hastening to dry her tears in the embraces of an imperial husband. Her disappointment and grief were increased by the sight of many relics. Two weeks before the death of Jovian, his infant son had been placed in the curule chair, adorned with the title of Novellius, and the vain ensigns of the consulsiphip.
Unconcealed of his fortune, the royal youth, who, from his grandfather, assumed the name of Varronian, was reared in that splendor, that ministered to every envy. Sixteen years after, generals still continued to meet in council; to exercise their respective functions to maintain the public order; and peaceably to conduct the army to the city of Nice ry powers of the empire, the diadem was again unanimously offered to the prefect Sallust. He enjoyed the honor of a successive refusal: the young emperor, who was the son of an emperor. Sixteen years afterwards he was still alive, but he had already been deprived of an eye; and his afflicted mother expected, every hour, that the innocent victim would be torn from her arms, to appease, with his blood, the suspicions of the reigning prince. 1 1 Ten days appear scarcely sufficient for the march and election.

Of the Romans it was observed: 1 That the generals might command the expeditions without the presence of the public; and that the emperors, even of their attendants, and messengers. 2 That the troops, for the ease of the cities, marched in an order, which the head of the column might arrive at Nice when the rear halted at Amyca.

showed himself from a lofty tribunal: the judicious choice was applauded; and the new prince was solemnly invested with the diadem and the purple, amidst the acclamations of the troops, who were disposed to receive the distinction of tribunality, when he stretched forth his hand to address the armed multitude, a busy whisper was accidentally started in the ranks, and insensibly swelled into a loud and imperious clamour, that he should name, without delay, a colleague in the empire. The intrepid calmness of Valentinian excited the silence, and commanded respect; and he thus addressed the assembly: "A few minutes since it was in your power, fellow-soldiers, to have left me in the obscurity of a private station. Judging, from the testimony of my past life, that I deserved to reign, you have placed me on the throne. It is now my duty to protect the safety and interest of the republic. The weight of the universe is undoubtedly too great for the hands of a feeble mortal. I am conscious of the limits of my abilities and the uncertainty of my life; and far from declining, I am anxious to solicit, the assistance of a worthy colleague. But, where discord may be fatal, the choice of a faithful friend requires the most solemn deliberation. That decision shall be my care. Let your conduct be dutiful and consistent. Retire to your quarters; refresh your minds and bodies; and expect the accustomed donative on the accession of a new emperor." The astonished troops, with a mixture of pride, of satisfaction, and of terror, beheld the choice made for them. The solemn ceremony was subsided into silent reverence; and Valentinian, encompassed with the eagles of the legions, and the various banners of the cavalry and infantry, was conducted in warlike pomp to the palace of Nice. As he was sensible, however, of the importance of preventing immediate succession of his senate, he consulted the assembly of the chiefs; and their real sentiments were concisely expressed by the generous freedom of Dagnalphtus. "Most excellent prince," said that officer, "if you consider only your family, you have a brother; if you love the republic, look round for the most deserving of the Romans.26 The emperor, who impressed his displeasure, without altering his intention, slowly proceeded from Nice to Nicomedia and Constantinople. In one of the suburbs of that capital, thirty days after his own elevation, he bestowed the title of Augustus on his brother Valens.27 This declaration of the patriots was convinced, that their opposition, without being serviceable to their country, would be fatal to themselves, the declaration of his absolute will was received with silent submission. Valens was now in the thirty-sixth year of his age; but his abilities had never been equal to the employment of military or civil; and his character had not inspired the world with any sanguine expectations. He possessed, however, one quality, which recommended him to Valentinian, and preserved the domestic peace of the empire; a devout and grateful attachment to his benefactor, whose superiority was as well his authority, Valens humbly and cheerfully acknowledged in every action of his life.28

Before Valentinian divided the provinces of the eastern and of the empire, he reformed the administration of war. All ranks of subjects who had been injured or oppressed under the reign of Julian, were invited to support their public accusations. The silence of mankind attested the spotless integrity of the prefect Sallust; and his own presing solicitations, that he might be permitted to retire from the business of the state, were rejected by Valentinian with the most honourable expressions of friendship and esteem. But among the favourites of the late emperor, those who had a share in the public authority or superstition; and who could no longer hope to be protected either by favour or justice.29 The greater part of the ministers of the palace, and the governors of the provinces, were removed from their respective stations; yet the eminent merit of some officers was distinguished from the obnoxious creditors and notwithstanding the demand of the clamours of zeal and resentment, the whole proceedings of this delicate inquiry appear to have been conducted with a reasonable share of wisdom and moderation.30 The festivity of a new reign received a short and suspicious interruption from the sudden illness of the two princes; but as soon as their health was restored, they left Constantinople in the beginning of the spring. In the castle, or palace, of Mediana, only three miles from Naissus, they executed the solemn and final division of the Roman empire.31 Valentinian bestowed on his brother the rich province of the east, from the Lower Danube to the confines of Persia; while he retained for himself the warlike prefectures of Illyricum, Italy, and Gaul, from the extremity of Greece to the Caledonian rampart; and from the rampart of Caledonia to the foot of Mount Atlas. The provincial administration remained on its former basis; but a double supply of magistrates was ordained for the realm composed of forty and two courts; the division was made with a just regard to their particular merit and situation, and seven master-generals were soon created, either of the cavalry or infantry. When this important business had been amicably transacted, Valentinian and Valens embraced for the last time. The emperor of the west established his temporary residence at Milan; and the emperor of the east returned to Constantinople, to assume the dominion of fifty provinces, of whose language he was totally ignorant.32

The tranquility of the east was soon disturbed by rebellion; and the throne of Valens was threatened by the daring attempts of a rival, whose affinity to the emperor Julian33 was his sole merit, and had been his only crime. Procopius had been hastily promoted from the obscure station of a tribune, and a notary, to the joint command of the army of the east; the real import of which title was to name him as the successor of a prince who was destined of natural heirs; and a vain rumour was propagated by his friends, or his enemies, that Julian, before the altar of the Moon, at Carthage, had privately invested Procopius with the imperial purple.34 He endeavoured, by his duplicity and perfidy, to raise the jealousy of Jovian; resigned, without a contest, his military command; and retired, with his wife and family, to cultivate the ample patrimony which he possessed in the province of Cappadocia. These useful and innocent occupations were interrupted by the appearance of an officer, with a band of soldiers, who, in the name of his new sovereigns, Valentinian and Valens, was deputed to conduct the unfortunate Procopius either to a perpetual prison, or an ignominious death. His rich and splendid pretensions, however, did not meet with a more splendid fate. Without presuming to dispute the royal mandate, he requested the indulgence of a few moments to embrace his weeping family; and, while the vigilance of his guards was relaxed by a plentiful entertainment, he dexterously escaped to the sea-coast of the Euxine, from whence he passed over to the country of Bosphorus. In that sequestered region he remained many months, exposed to the hardships of exile, of solitude, and of want; his melancholy temper brooding over his misfortunes, and his mind agitated by the most violent apprehensions, that, if any accident should discover his flight, the fate of his family was inevitable. He violated, without much scruple, the laws of hospitality in a moment of imprudence and despair. Procopius embarked in a merchant vessel, which made sail for Constantinople; and boldly aspired to the rank of a sovereign, because he was not allowed to enjoy the security of a subject. At first he lurked in the villages of Bithynia, continually changing his habitation, and his disguise. By degrees he ventured into the capital, trusted his life and fortune to the fidelity of two friends, a senator and a eunuch, and conceived some hopes of success, from the intelligence which he obtained of the actual state of the public affairs. The body of the people was infected with a spirit of discontent; they regretted the justice and the abilities of Sallust, who had been imprudently disinherited from the protectorate of the deceased Valens, which was rude without vigour, and feeble without avarice. They dreaded the influence of his father-in-law, the patrician Petronius, a cruel and rapacious minister, who rigorously exacted all the arrears of tribute that might remain unpaid since the reign of the emperor Aurelian. At the same time, the multitudes were elated with the pretensions of a usurper. The hostile measures of the Persians required the presence of Valens in Syria; from the Danube to the Euphrates the troops were in motion; and the capital was occasionally filled with the soldiers who passed or remained to the Thracian Bosphorus. Two cohorts of Gauls were detached to the assembling of the Huns. The demonstrations of the conspirators; which were recommended by the promise of liberal donations; and as they still reverberated the memory of Julian, they easily consented to support the hereditary claim of his successor. At the same time they were drawn up near the baths of Anastasia; and Procopius, clothed in a purple garment, more suitable to a player than to a monarch, appeared as if he rose from the dead, in the midst of Constantinople. The soldiers, who were prepared for his reception, saluted their trembling prince with shouts of joy, and vows of fidelity. Their numbers were soon increased by a sturdy band of peasants, collected from the adjacent country; and Procopius, shielded by the arms of his adherents, was successively conducted to the tribunal, the senate, and the palace. During the first moments of his tumultuous reign, he was astonished and terrified by the gloomy silence of the people; who were either ignorant of the cause, or apprehensive of the event. But his military strength was superior to any actual resistance: the multitudes were mocked to the standard of rebellion; the poor were excited by the promises, and the rich were intimidated by the fear, of a general pillage; and the obstinate credulity of the multitude was once more deceived by the promised advantages of a revolution. The magistrates were seized; the prisons and arsenals broke open; and the houses of the haughty, the palaces of the haughty were diligently occupied; and, in a few hours, Procopius became the absolute, though precarious, master of the imperial city. The usurper improved this unexpected success with some degree of courage and dexterity. He artfully propagated the rumours and opinions that the treasures of the church were for a moment exposed to the violence of the populace. He proposed to the church to open its gates to the populace by giving audience to the frequent but imaginary, ambassadors of distant nations. The large bodies of troops, stationed in the cities of Thrace, and the fortresses of the Lower Danube, were gradually involved in the guilt of rebellion; and the Gothic princes of the province of Bithynia and Asia. After an honourable defence, the city and island of Cyzicus yielded to his request; the emperor Hormisdas embroiled the cause of the usurper, whom they were ordered to crush; and, as the veterans were continually augmented with new levies, he soon appeared at the head of an army, whose valour, as well as numbers, were not equalled by the confidence of the troops, with which Hormisdas, a youth of spirit and ability, condescended to draw his sword against the lawful emperor of the east; and the Persian prince was immediately invested with the ancient and extraordinary powers of a Roman proconsul. The alliance of Faustina, the widow of the emperor Valens, the daughter of the deceased Valens, was negotiated to the hands of the usurper, added dignity and reputation to his cause. The princess Constantin, who was then about five years of age, accompanied, in a litter, the march of the army. She was shown to the multitude in the arms of her adopted father; and, as often as she passed through the ranks of the soldiers, she was inflamed into martial fury; they recollected the glories of the house of Constantin, and they declared, with loyal acclamation, that they would shed the last drop of their blood in the defence of the royal infant. In the mean while Valentinian was alarmed and perplexed by the doubtful intelligence of the revolt of the east. The difficulties of a German war forced him to confine his immediate care to the safety of his own dominions; and, as he was pursued to the farthest confines of his corruptions, he listened, with doubtful anxiety, to the rumours which were industriously spread, that the defeat and death of Valens had left Procopius sole master of the eastern provinces. Valens was not dead; but, on the very day of the rebellion, he was received at Cesarœa, he has been seized by the hand of his life, he has intended to negotiate with the usurper, and discovered his secret inclination to abdicate the imperial purple. The timid monarch was saved from disgrace and ruin by the firmness of his ministers, and their abilities soon decided in his favour the event of the civil war. In a season of tranquillity, Sallust had resigned without a murmur; but as soon as the public safety was attacked, he ambitiously solicited the pre-eminence of toil and danger; and the restoration of that virtuous minister to the prefecture of the east, was the first step which indicated the repentance of Valens, and satisfied the minds of the people. The reign of Procopius was apparently supported by powerful armies, and obedient provinces. But many of the principal officers, military as well as civil, had been urged, either by motives of duty or interest, to withdraw themselves from the quaggy scene, or to watch the moment of betraying and a Hernisdæ mater avâræ Hernisdæ regina illius filio, potestas et imperium translatææ, an ex, exilia, munita et impetrata. deserting the cause of the usurper. Lusciouses advanced by hasty marches, to bring the legions of Syria to the aid of Valens. Arintheus, who, in strength, beauty, and valour, excelled all the heroes of the age, attacked with a small troop, a superior body of the rebels, and met with a mortal wound, which he had under his banner, he commanded them, with a loud voice, to seize and deliver up their pretended leader; and such was the ascendant of his genius, that his extraordinary order was instantly obeyed.

Arbelos, a respectable veteran of the great Constantine, who was, in the writing of this history, the companion of the king, in his subserviency, was persuaded to leave his retirement, and once more to conduct an army into the field. In the heat of action, calmly taking off his helmet, he showed his grey hairs, and venerable countenance; saluted the soldiers of Procopius by the enclituring names of church and state, his true and constant followers, and then had the good grace to support the desperate cause of a contemptible tyrant; but to follow their old commander, who had so often led them to honour and victory. In the two engagements of Thyatira* and Nocasus, the unfortunate Procopius was deserted by his troops, who were seduced from him by the seductiveishments of the others. After wandering some time among the woods and mountains of Phrygia, he was betrayed by his despoothing followers, conducted to the imperial camp, and immediately beheaded. He suffered the ordinary fate of an unsuccessful usurper: But the acts of his former greatness, then too easily excused by the conqueror, under the forms of legal justice, excited the pity and indignation of mankind.

Such indeed are the common and natural fruits of despotism and rebellion. But the iniquity into the crime of fanaticism, which, under the reign of the two most infamous emperors, both at Rome and Antioch, was interpreted as the fatal symptom, either of the displeasure of heaven, or of the depravity of mankind. Let us not hesitate to indulge a liberal pride, that in the present age, the enlightened part of Europe has abolished a cruel and odious prejudice, which reigned in every climate of the globe, and adhered to every system of religious opinions. The nations, and the sects, of the Roman world, admitted with equal credit and similar approbation, the reality of that infernal art, which was able to control the winds, to establish peace, and to execute the voluntary operations of the human mind. The inimitable power of spells and incantations, of potent herbs, and excerable rites, which could extinguish or recall life, inflame the passions of the soul, blast the works of creation, and extort from the reluctant demons the secrets of futurity. They believed, with the wildest inconsistency, that this præternatural domination of the air, of earth, and of hell, was exercised, from the vileness of man, or the felicity of heaven, by spirits or genii. An imaginary cause is capable of producing the most serious and mischievous effects. The dark predictions of the death of an emperor, or the success of a conspiracy, were calculated only to stimulate the hopes of ambition, and to dissolve the ties of fidelity; and the intentional guilt of the prime was shown in the actual crimes of treason and sacrilege.* Such vain terrors disturbed the peace of society, and the happiness of individuals; and the harmless flame which insensibly melted a waxen image, might derive a powerful and pernicious energy from the alluring fancy of the person whom it was intended to destroy. After the execution of a great number of those herbs, which were supposed to possess a supernatural influence, it was an easy step to the use of mere substantial poison; and the folly of mankind sometimes became the instrument, and the mask, of the most atrocious crimes. As soon as the zeal of informers was excited, and they had become aware of the Christian name, they could not refuse to listen to another charge, too frequently mingled in the scenes of domestic guilt; a charge of a softer and less malignant nature, for which the pious, though excessive, rigour of Constantine had recently decreed the punishment of death.* This deadly and inoffensive mixture of poison and adultery, afforded infinite gradations of guilt and innocence, of excuse and aggravation, which in these proceedings appear to have been Confounded by the angry or corrupt passions of the judges. They easily discovered, that the degree of their industry and discernment was estimated by the imperial court, according to the number of executions that were furnished from their respective tribunals. It was not without extreme reluctance that they pronounced a sentence of acquittal; but they eagerly admitted such evidence as was stained with perjury, or procured by the treachery of informers, under charges, against the most respectable characters. The progress of the inquiry continually opened new subjects of criminal prosecution; the audacious informer, whose falsehood was detected, retired with impunity; but the wretched victim, who discovered his real, or pretended, accomplices, was seldom permitted to receive the benefits of his infancy. From the extremity of Italy and Asia, the young and the aged were dragged in chains to the tribunals of Rome and Antioch. Senators, magistrates, and philosophers, expired in ignominious and

In the Jewish and Christian system, all daemones are infernal spirits; and all communication with them is idolatry, apostacy, etc., which deserves death and demotion.
When Tacitus describes the deaths of the innocent and illustrious Romans, who were sacrificed to the cruelty of the first Caesars, the art of the historian, or the merit of the sufferers, excites in our breast the most lively sensations of terror, of admiration, and of pity. The coarse and undistinguishing pencil of Ammianus has delineated his bloody figures with tedious and disguising accuracy. But as our attention is not longer engaged by the contrast of freedom and servitude, of renown greatness and of actual misery, we should turn with horror from the frequent executions, which disgraced, both at Rome and Antioch, the reign of the two brothers.\(^6\) Valens was of a timid,\(^7\) and Valentinian of a choleric disposition.\(^8\) An anxious regard for his personal safety was the ruling principle of the administration, which soothed with the greatest security the most violent passions of the people. The favours of Valens obtained, by the privilege of rape and gift, the wealth which his economy would have refused.\(^9\) They urged, with persuasive eloquence, that, in all cases of treason, suspicion is equivalent to proof; that the power, supposes the intention, of mischief; that the intention is not less criminal than the act; and that a subject no longer deserves to live, if his life may threaten the safety, or disturb the repose, of his sovereign. The judgment of Valentinian was sometimes deceived, and his confidence abused; but he would have silenced the informers with a contemptuous smile, had they presumed to alarm his serious thoughts. But he raised his inflexible love of justice; and, in the pursuit of justice, the emperor was easily tempted to consider clemency as a weakness, and passion as a virtue. As long as he wrestled with his equals, in the bold competition of an active and ambitious life, Valentinian was forcing and skilful, combined with inconstancy: if his prudence was arraigned, his spirit was appalled; and the proudest and most powerful generals were apprehensive of provoking the resentment of a fearless soldier. After he became master of the world, he unfortunately forgot, that where no resistance can be made, no courage can be exerted; and instead of consulting the dictates of reason and magnanimity, he indulged the furious emotions of his temper, at a time when they were disgraceful to himself, and fatal to the defenceless objects of his displeasure.

In the government of his household, or of his empire, slight, or even imaginary, offences, a hasty word, a casual omission, an involuntary delay, were chastised with the severest severity. The judges, or such of his subjects which issued the most readily from the mouth of the emperor of the west were, "strike off his head!"—"burn him alive!"—"let him be beaten with clubs till he expires!" and his most favoured ministers soon understood, that, by a rash attempt to dispute, or suspend, the exercise of imperial death, they might involve themselves in the guilt and punishment of disobedience. The repeated gratification of this savage justice hardened the mind of Valentinian against pity and remorse; and the sallies of passion were converted into the grandeur of system, with calm satisfaction the convulsive agonies of torture and death; he reserved his friendship for those faithful servants whose temper was the most congenial to his own. The merit of Maximin, who had slaughtered the holiest families of Rome, was roused with the royal approbation, and that of the prefect of Gaul. Both princes and enormous bears, distinguished by the appellations of Innocence, and Mica Aurea, could alone deserve to share the favour of Maximin. The cages of those treasy guards were always placed near the bedchamber of Valentinian, who frequently amused his eyes with the spectacle of those horrid agonies. The bleeding limbs of the malcontents who were abandoned to their rage. Their diet and exercises were carefully inspected by the Roman emperor; and when Innocence had earned her discharge, by a long course of monotonous toil, to revive the faded spirit and to restore to the freedom of her native woods.\(^10\)

But in the calmer moments of reflection, their laws and government, when the mind of Valens was not agitated by fear, or that of Valentinian by rage, the tyrant resumed the sentiments, or at least the conduct, of the monarch of the ancient world. The fiendish cruelty of the western emperor could clearly perceive, and accurately pursue, his own and the public interest; and the sovereign of the east, who imitated with equal dexterity the various examples which he received from his elder brother, was sometimes guided by the wisest arguments, and sometimes mistaken by the prejudices of his own time. His prudence was invariably retained, in the purple, the chaste and temperate simplicity which had adorned their private life; and, under their reign, the pleasures of the court never cost the people a blush or a sigh. They gradually reformed many of the abuses of Julian; jacta est facies, and the empire was more firmly established. But he never learned to find the true spirit of legislation which might inspire posterity with the most favourable opinion of their character and government. It is not from the master of Innocence, that we should expect the tender regard for the welfare of his subjects, which prompted Valentinian to condemn the exposition of new-born infants; and to establish fourteen skilful physicians, with stipends and privileges, in the fourteen quarters of Rome. The good sense of an iliterate soldier founded a useful and liberal institution for the education of youth, and the support of

But the most honourable circumstance of the character of Valentinian, is the firm and temperate impartiality which he uniformly preserved in an age of religious contention. His strong sense, unenlightened, but uncorrupted, by study, declined with respectful indifference, the subtle questions of theological debate. The government of his empire he conducted wisely, and satisfied his ambition; and while he remembered that he was the disciple of the church, he never forgot that he was the sovereign of the clergy. Under the reign of an apostate, he had signalized his zeal for the honour of Christianity: he allowed to his subjects the right to do as they pleased for themselves, and they might accept, with gratitude and confidence, the general toleration which was granted by a prince, addicted to passion, but incapable of fear or of disguise. The pagans, the Jews, and all the various sects which acknowledged the divine authority of Christ, were protected by the laws from arbitrary power or popular insult: nor was any mode of worship prohibited by Valentinian, except those secret and criminal practices, which abused the name of religion for the dark purposes of vice and disorder. The art of magic, as it was more cruelly punished, was more strictly proscribed; but the emperor adhered to the ancient methods of divination, which were approved by the senate, and exercised by the Tuscan haruspices. He had condemned, with the consent of the most rational pagans, the licence of nocturnal sacrifices; but he immediately admitted the petition of Prætextatus, procornel of Achaia, who represented, that the life of the Greeks would become disagreeable and uncomfortable if they were deprived of the invaluable blessing of the Eleusinian mysteries. Philosophy alone can boast, (and perhaps it is no more than the boast of philosophers,) that her gentle hand is able to eradicate from the human mind the least and deadliest principle of fanaticism and madness. But this toleration of twelve years, which was enforced by the wise and vigorous government of Valentinian, by suspending the repetition of mutual injuries, contributed to soften the manners, and abate the prejudices of the religious factions.

The friend of toleration was unfortunately placed at a distance from the scene of the fiercest controversies. As soon as the christians of the west had extricated themselves, from the snares of the creed of Rinnini, they happily relapsed into the slumber of orthodoxy, and the remains of the tribute and the burthens which had been imposed by Valentinian appear to have been less attentive and less anxious to relieve the burthens of his people. He might reform the abuses of the fiscal administration; but he exacted, without scruple, a very large share of the private property; as he was convinced that the revenues, which supported the luxury of individuals, would be much more advantageously employed for the defence and protection of their state. The subjects of the east who enjoyed the present benefit, applauded the indulgence of their prince. The solid, but less splendid merit of Valentinian was felt and acknowledged by the subsequent generation.\(^3\)

\(^3\) These salutary institutions are explained in the Theodosian Code, i. viii. itt ii. De Professoribus et Medicis, and i. xiv. itt. ii. De studiis liberis urbanae Rerum. private life in the condition of catechumens; but the piety of Valens prompted him to solicit the sacrament of baptism, before he exposed his person to the dangers of a Gothic war. He naturally addressed himself to Eudoxus, bishop of the imperial city; and if the ignorant monarch was instructed by that Arian pastor in the most absurd and pernicious tenets, rather than his guilt, was the inevitable consequence of his erroneous choice. Whatever had been the determination of the emperor, he must have offended a numerous party of his christian subjects; as the leaders both of the Homœans and of the Arians being present, he had offended those he respected the most; and they were most cruelly injured and oppressed. After he had taken this decisive step, it was extremely difficult for him to preserve either the virtue, or the reputation of impartiality. He never aspired, like Constantius, to the fame of a profound theologian; but, as he had received with simplicity and respect the tenets of Eudoxus, Valens resigned his conscience to the direction of his ecclesiastical guides, and promoted by the influence of his authority, the reunion of the Arian heretics to the body of the catholic church. At first, they pitied their blindness; but degrees he was provoked and inflamed, and he inflicted extremities to whom he was an object of hatred. The feeble mind of Valens was always swayed by the persons with whom he familiarly conversed; and the exile or imprisonment of a private citizen are the favours the most readily granted in a despotic state. Such punishment was inflicted on the Homœan party; and the misfortune of fourscore ecclesiastics of Constantinople, who, accidentally, were burnt on shipboard, was imputed to the cruel and premeditated malice of the emperor, and his Arian ministers. In every contest, the catholics (if we may ridicule that name) were aware of the power of their own faults, and of those of their adversaries. In every election, the claims of the Arian candidate obtained the preference; and if they were opposed by the majority of the people, he was usually supported by the authority of the civil magistrate, or even by the terror of a military force. The enemies of Athanasius attempted to disturb the last years of his venerable age; and his temporary retreat to his father's sepulchre has been celebrated as a fifth exile. But the zeal of a great people, who instantly flew to arms, intimidated the prefect; and the archbishop was permitted to end his life in peace, in the reign of his successor, seven years. The death of Athanasius was the signal of the persecution of Egypt; and the pegan minister of Valens, who forebly seated the worthless Lucius on the archiepiscopal throne, purchased the favour of the reigning party, by the blood and sufferings of their christian brethren. The free toleration of the heathen and Jewish worship was bitterly lamented, as a circumstance which aggravated the misery of the catholics, and the guilt of the impious tyrant of the empire.

Valens, and the judgment his hatred of the heretics had excited against the emperor, if he employed violence, of a general revolt in the province of Cappadocia. The archbishop, who asserted, with inflexible pride, the truth of his doctrines, and the magnanimity of his conduct, was left in free possession of his conscience, and his throne. The emperor devoutly assisted at the solemn service of the cathedral; and, instead of a sentence of banishment, subscribed the donation of a valuable estate for the use of an hospital, which Basil had lately founded in the city. The neighboring town of Nicaea, and the province of Cappadocia, were reduced to the state of a free possession under the pretence of religion, which associated themselves with the monks of Egypt; and he directed the count of the east to drag them from their solitude; and to compel those deserters of society to accept the fair alternative, of renouncing their temporal possessions, or of discharging the public duties of men and citizens, who, with a considerable slaughter was made in the monasteries which disobeyed the commands of their sovereign.

v 1. Dr. Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. iv. p. 72) has already conceived and estimated the same suspicion.

2. This reflection is so obvious and forcible, that Orosius (I. viii. c. 32, 33.) delays the persecution till after the death of Valens, in order to avoid the charge of a philosophical oration, which Theophilus pronounced in the year 357 (see Socinus, vol. ii. p. 151, in Latin only). Such contradictions of Orosius, who was so cautious as to diminish the evidence, and reduce the term, of the persecution of Valens.

3. Tillemont, whom I follow and abridge, has extracted (Mem. Eccl. Rom. Tom. iii. p. 527) the most authentic circumstances from the Panegyrics of the two Gregories; the letter, brother, and friend, of Basil. 5. This noble and charitable foundation (almost a new city) supported in merit, if not in greatness, the pyramids or the walls of Babylon. It was erected, not to be forgotten, by a pious emperor, who took care to reward his charitable friends, who had misrepresented the edict of Valens, and suppressed the liberty of choice.

Valentinian restrained the avarice of the clergy, and the aversion of the laity to repress the wealth and avarice of the clergy. A.D. 370. The strict regulations which have been framed by the wisdom of modern legislatures to restrain the wealth and avarice of the clergy, may be originally deduced from the example of the emperor Valentinian. His edict addressed to Damasus, bishop of Rome, was contrived to abate the influence of the clergy, and to diminish the avaricious and avaricious habits of those devoted females who embraced the doctrines of Christianity, not only with the cold assent of the understanding, but with the warmth of affection, and perhaps with the eagerness of fashion. They sacrificed the pleasures of dress and luxury; and renounced, for the enjoyment of these earthly pleasures, the happiness of the human heart.

Damasus, bishop of Rome, was constrained to stigmatize the avarice of his clergy by the publication of the law (to which the good sense of Valentinian, and the avarice of Damasus, were imputed to his brother monks: and the Sacerdotium, the Presbyteral, was publicly nailed to the head of the widow Paula, (com. l. vi. p. 63.) Chapter XXV.

THE tranquility of the city. Pretextatus was a philosophic pagan, a man of learning, of taste, and politeness; who disguised a reproach in the form of a jest, when he asserted Damasus, that if he could obtain the bishopric of Rome, he himself would immediately embrace the Christian religion. This lively picture of the papacy and the temporal power of the Papacy in the fourth century, becomes the more curious, as it represents the intermediate degree between the humble poverty of the apostolic fishermen, and the royal state of a temporal prince, whose dominions extend from the confines of Naucratis to the Poros of the Parthian Paroikos war. When the suffrage of the generals and A.D. 254-273. of the army committed the sceptre of the Roman empire to the hands of the Valentinian, his reputation in arms, his military skill and experience, and his rigid attachment to the form, as well as spirit, of ancient discipline, were the principal motives of their judicious choice. The eagerness of the troops, who pressed him to nominate his colleague, was justified by the dangerous situation of public affairs; and Valentinian himself was conscious, that the abilities of the most active mind were unequal to the defence of the distressing state into which the empire had fallen. As soon as the death of Julian had relieved the barbarians from the terror of his name, the most sanguine hopes of rapine and conquest excited the nations of the east, the north, and of the south. Their inroads were pressing upon the provinces, and sometimes formidable; but, during the twelve years of the reign of Valentinian, his firmness and vigilance protected his own dominions; and his powerful genius seemed to inspire and direct the feeble counsels of his brother. Perhaps the method of annals would more forcibly express the general and divided cares of the two emperors; but the attention of the reader, likewise, would be distracted by a tedious and desultory narrative. A separate view of the five great theatres of war; I. Germany; II. Britain; III. Africa; IV. The East; and V. The Danube; will impress a more distinct image of the military state of the empire under the reigns of Valentinian and Valens.

I. Germany. The ambassadors of the Alamanii The Alamanii had been offended by the harsh and severe manner of Ursacius, master of the silver marriage, who, by an act of unaccountable parsimony, had diminished the value, as well as the quantity, of the presents, to which they were entitled, either from custom or treaty, on the accession of a new emperor. They expressed, and they communicated to their countrymen, their strong sense of the nature of the insult. The insolence was aggravated by the suspicion of contempt; and the military youth crowded to their standard. Before Valentinian could pass the Alps, the villages of Gaul were in flames; before his general Dagraiphas, could encounter the Alamanii, they had secured the captures of A.D. 292. and the spoil in the forests of Germany. July.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, the military force of the whole nation, in deep and solid columns, broke through the barrier of the Rhine, during the severity of a northern winter. Two Roman counts were slain, and mortally wounded; and the standard of the Hordienses of the Batavians fell in the hands of the conquerors, who, displayed, with insulting shouts and menaces, the trophy of their victory. The standard was recovered; but the Batavians had not redeemed the shame of their disgrace and flight in the eyes of their sovereign, had purchased his clemency at such a price. Valentinian, that his soldiers must learn to fear their mander, before they could cease to fear the enemy. The troops were solemnly assembled; and the trembling Batavians were enclosed within the circle of the imperial array. Valentinian then ascended his tribunal; and, as if he disdained to punish cowardice with death, he reproved the assembled body of indelible ignominy on the officers, whose misconduct and pusillanimity were the first occasion of the defeat. The Batavians were degraded from their rank, stripped of their arms, and condemned to be sold for slaves to the highest bidder. At this tremendous sentence the troops fell prostrate on the ground, and presented the image of their sovereign, and protested, that, if he would indulge them in another trial, they would approve themselves not unworthy of the name of Romans, and of his soldiers. Valentinian, with affected reluctance, yielded to their entreaties; the Batavians resumed their arms; and, with their arms, the invincible resolution of wiping away their disgrace in the blood of the Alamannii. The principal command was declined by Dagraiphas; and that experienced general, who had represented, perhaps with too much procidence, the extreme difficulties of the undertaking, had the mortification, before the end of the campaign, to resign the command to the emperor. As he resolved to make the death of Julian have the advantage of the scattered forces of the barbarians. At the head of a well disciplined army of cavalry, infantry, and light troops, Jovinus advanced with cautious and well calculated measures to the siege of Metz, where he surprised a large division of the Alamanii, before they had time to run to their arms; and flushed his soldiers with the confidence of an easy and bloodless victory. Another division, or rather army, of the enemy, after the cruel and wanton devastation of the adjacent country, presented themselves on the shady banks of the Moselle. Jovinus, who had viewed the ground with the eye of a general, made his silent approach through a deep and woody vale, till he could distinctly perceive the indolent security of the Germans. Some were bathing their huge limbs in the river; others were cooking their long and filthy kettles; others again were swallowing large draughts of rich and delicious wine. On a sudden they heard the sound of the Roman trumpet; they saw the enemy in their camp. Astonishment produced disorder; disorder was followed by confusion and disorder; and a tumultuous multitude of the bravest warriors was pierced by the swords and javelins of the legionaries and auxiliaries. The fugitives escaped to the third, and most considerable, camp, in the Catalaunian plains, near Chalons in Champagne; the straggling detachments were hastily re-called. The rest of the chieftains were alarmed and admonished by the fate of their companions, prepared to encounter, in a decisive battle, the victorious forces of the lieutenant of Valentinian. The bloody and obstinate conflict lasted a whole summer's day, with equal valour, and with alternate success. The Romans at length prevailed, with the loss of about twelve hundred men. Six thousand of the Alamannii were slain, four thousand were wounded; and the brave Jovinus, after chasing the flying remnant of their host as far as the banks of the Rhine, returned to Paris, to receive the compliment of the censure, and the ensigns of the consularship for the ensuing year. July.

The triumph of the Romans was indeed sullied by their treatment of the captive king, whom they hung on a gibbet, without the knowledge of their indifferent general. This disgraceful act of cruelty, which might have been ascribed to the want of the sword, was followed by the deliberate murder of Withilas, the son of Aemilian, xxvi. 1. Zosimus, i. 4. p. 275. The diocese of the Batavians is supposed to be contemporary with this account. of Vadomai; a German prince, of a weak and sickly constitution, but of a daring and formidable spirit. The domestic assassin was instigated and protected by the Romans; and the violation of the laws of humanity and justice betrayed their secret apprehension of the approaching divorce. As the dagger is seldom adopted in public councils, as long as they retain any confidence in the power of the sword.

While the Allemanni appeared to be humbled by their recent calamities, the apartment of the hundred of Valentinian was mortified by the unexpected surprisal of Moguntiacum, or Mentz, the principal city of the Upper Germany. In the unconsolable moment of a christian festival, Randolf, a bold and artful chieftain, who had long meditated this attempt, suddenly passed the Rhine, entered the defended town, and rode with a multitude of captives of either sex. Valentinian resolved to execute severe vengeance on the whole body of the nation. Count Sebastian, with the bands of Italy and Hylleicum, was ordered to invade their country, most probably on the side of the Rhine.

The emperor in person, accompanied by his son Gratian, and his stepson Rando, set out on a formidable army, which was supported on both banks by Jovinus and Severus, the two masters-general of the cavalry and infantry of the west. The Allemanni, unable to prevent the devastation of their villages, fixed their camp on a high inaccessible mountain, in the modern duchy of Wirtemberg, where the Allemanni expected the approach of the Romans. The life of Valentinian was exposed to imminent danger by the trepid curiosity with which he persisted to explore some secret and unguarded path. A troop of barbarians suddenly rode upon the camp, and the emperor, who vigorously spurred his horse down a steep and slippery descent, was obliged to leave behind him his armour-bearer, and his helmet, magnificently enriched with gold and precious stones. At the signal of the general assault, the Roman troops encompassed and ascended the mountain from three different sides. Every step by which they gained increased their ardour, and abated the resistance of the enemy: and after their mixed forces had occupied the summit of the hill, they imputedly urged the barbarians down the northern descent, where count Sebastian was posted to intercept their retreats. After this signal victory, Valentinian returned to his winter-quarters at Treves; where he indulged the public joy by the exhibition of splendid and triumphal games. But the wise monarch, instead of aspiring to the conquest of Germany, confined his attention to the important and laudable defense of the Gauls against the interior, whose strength was renewed by a stream of daring volunteers, which incessantly flowed from the most distant tribes of the north. The banks of the Rhine, from its source to the straits of the ocean, were closely planted with strongholds and castles from towers; new works, and new arms, were invented by the ingenuity of a prince who was skilled in the mechanical arts; and his numerous levies of Roman and barbarian youth were severely trained in all the exercises of war. The progress of the work, which was sometimes opposed by modest representations, and sometimes by hostile attempts, secured the tranquillity of Gaul during the nine subsequent years of the administration of Valentinian.

That prudent emperor, who diligently practised the wise maxims of Diocletian, A.D. 339, was studious to foment and excite the intestine divisions of his empire. About the middle of the fourth century, the countries, perhaps of Luxeac and Thuringia, on either side of the Elbe, were occupied by the vague dominion of the Burgundians; a warlike and numerous people of the Vandal race, whose obscure name insensibly swelled into a powerful kingdom, and finally settled on a bounding range of ancient Scythians. The most remarkable circumstance in the recent manners of the Burgundians, appears to have been the difference of their civil and ecclesiastical constitution. The appellation of Henricus was given to the king or general, and the title of Simius to the high priest, or nation. The latter were easily tempted, by the secret solicitations, and liberal offers, of the emperor; and their barbarous descent from the Romans, who had been formerly left to garrison the fortresses of Drusus, was admitted with mutual credulity, as it was conducive to mutual interests. An army of four thousand Burgundians soon appeared upon the banks of the Rhine, and impatiently required the support of subsidies. The Roman emperors, who were established in the extremity of despair, were only prepared with excuses and delays, till at length, after a fruitless expectation, they were compelled to retire. The arts and fortifications of the Gallic frontier checked the fury of their just resentment; and their massacre of the captives served to enrich the coffers of the subjects of the Burgundians and the Allemanni. The inconsistency of a wise prince may, perhaps, be explained by some alteration of circumstances; and, perhaps, it was the original design of Valentinian to intimidate, rather than to destroy; as the balance of power would have been to the nations of ancient Germany. I mean if we suppose that when the battle was on, the senate of Rome, the Aurons, the Baturus, the Fritipal, that it doubled in twenty or thirty years. The probability, and even the necessity of this supposition, is manifest from the picture which our ancient historians have drawn of the manners of the nations that inhabited the Rhine and the Rhone. (See Tacit. Hist. Muc. Germaniacarum, c. 16. 18. 19. 20.) These customs were so favourable to a perpetual peace, that the fear of the prize and emulation so fitted to remove the fear of want, present the picture of a state of society endowed with a principle of irresistible increase. They show the inextricable source of those armies and colonies, whose origin the Roman empire so long sustained, and by which at last it felt was not probable that at any time the population of Germany had doubled during two successive periods, or even during one of twenty five years. The perpetual wars of these people, the rude state of agriculture among them, and especially the strange custom adopted by many tribes, of surrounding themselves with forests, were absolutely opposed to such an increase. Probably the whole country was at no time well peopled, though often it was furnished with a population that was well regulated. The desire of clearing their forests, to drain their marshes, or to render their soil capable of supporting an increasing population, was more agreeable to their natural habits; and their restless states were continually in search of food, of booty, and of glory. (Besiis sive principis de Populo Germanico, p. 143.)

been equally overturned by the expropriation of either of the German nations. Among the princes of the Ale- manns, Macrianus, who, with a Roman name, had assumed the arts of a soldier and a statesman, deserved his hatred and esteem. The emperor himself, with light and unencumbered band, conducted to pass the Rhine, marched fifty miles into the country, and would infallibly have seized the object of his pursuit, if his judicious measures had not been defeated by the impiety of the troops. Macrianus was afterwards obliged to propose a memorable conference with the emperor; and the favours which he received, fixed him, till the hour of his death, a steady and sincere friend of the republic.1

The Saxons. The land was covered by the fortifications of Valentinian; but the sea-coast of Gaul and Britain was exposed to the deportations of the Saxons. That celebrated name, in which we have a dear and domestic interest, escaped the notice of Tacitus; and in the maps of Ptolemy, it faintly marks the narrow neck of the Cimbrian pen-sinsula, and three small islands towards the mouth of the Elbe.1 This contracted territory, the present duchy of Sleswig, or perhaps of Holstein, was incapable of pouring forth the inexhaustible swarms of Saxons who reigned over the ocean, who filled the British island with their language, their laws, and their customs, who so long defended the liberty of the north against the arms of Charlemagne.3 The solution of this difficulty is easily derived from the similar manners, and loose constitution, of the tribes of Germany: which were blended with each other by the slightest accidents of war or friendship. The situation of the native Saxons disposed them to embark in the hazardous professions of fishermen and pirates; and the success of their first adventures would naturally excite the emulation of their bravest countrymen, who were impatient of the gloomy solitude of their woods and mountains, who so long defended the liberty of the north against the arms of Charlemagne.1 The Saxons were engaged in the war of the North; they were hostile to the Roman empire; and their wars, conducted by their own treachery, if a large body of cuirassiers, alarmed by the noise of the combat, had not hastily adced to extirpate their companions, and to overwhelm the undaunted valour of the Saxons. Some of the prisoners were saved from the edge of the sword, to shed their blood in the amphitheatre; and the orator Symmachus complains, that twenty-nine of those desperate savages, by strangling themselves with their own hands, had disappointed the amusement of the public. Yet the polite and philosophical citizens of Antwerp were struck with horror, and, on being informed, that the Saxons conspired against the gods the tythe of their huusam spoel; and that

The Fabulous colonies of Egyptians. The Scots and Trojans, of Scandinavians, and Spaniards, which flattened the pride and abused the credulity of our rude ancestors, have been extinguished by the light and rational philosophy. The present age is satisfied with the simple and rational opinion, that the islands of Great Britain and Ireland were gradually peopled from the adjacent continent of Gaul. From the coast of Kent, to the extremity of Caithness and Ulster, the memory of the shores of a happy world, and the monks, to whom it was improved their skill; and they acquired, by slow degrees, the art, or rather the habit, of managing their boats in a tempestuous sea, and of steering their nocturnal course by the light of the well-known stars.

The two bold headlands of Caledonia almost touch the shores of a Star Chamber, and the monks, to whom it was obtained, flourished under its luxuriant vegetation, the epithet of Green; and has preserved, with a slight alteration, the name of Erin, or Ireland, It is probable, that in some remote period of antiquity, the fertile plains of Ulster received a colony of hungry Scots: and that the strangers of the north, who had dared to encumber the arms of the legions, spread their conquests over the savage and uncivilized natives of a solitary island.

The inhabitants of that northern region were divided, as early as the reign of Constantine, between the two great tribes of the Scots and of the Piets, who have since experienced a very different fortune. The power and glory of the former have been diminished by the successful rivals; and the Scots, after maintaining for ages the dignity of an independent kingdom, have multiplied by an equal and voluntary union, the honours of the English name.

The hand of nature contributed to mark the ancient seat of the ocean, that the feet of man, were the men of the hills, and the latter those of the plain. The eastern coast of Caledonia may be considered as a level and fertile country, which, even in a rude state of tillage, was capable of producing a considerable quantity of corn; and the epithet of carnivorous was given to the province of the carnivorous highlander. The cultivation of the earth might introduce a more accurate separation of property, and the habits of a sedentary life; but the love of arms and rapine was still the ruling passion of the Piets; and their warriors who stripped themselves for a day of battle, were distinguished, in the eyes of the Romans, by the strange fashion of painting their naked bodies with gaudy colours and fantastic figures. The western part of Caledonia irregularly rises into wild and barren hills, which scarcely repay the toil of the husbandman, and are most profitably inhabited, by the men whose occupations were condemned to the occupations of shepherds and hunters; and, as they seldom were fixed to any permanent habitation, they acquired the expressive name of Scots, which, in the Celtic tongue, is said to be equivalent to that of wanderers or vagrants. The inhabitants of a barren land were urged to seek a fresh supply of food in the waters. The deep lakes and bays which intersect their country are plentifully stored with fish; and they gradually ventured to cast their nets in the waves of the ocean. The vicinity of the Hebrides, so profusely scattered along the western coast of Caledonia, almost touch the shores of a Star Chamber, and the monks, to whom it was obtained, flourished under its luxuriant vegetation, the epithet of Green; and has preserved, with a slight alteration, the name of Erin, or Ireland, It is probable, that in some remote period of antiquity, the fertile plains of Ulster received a colony of hungry Scots: and that the strangers of the north, who had dared to encumber the arms of the legions, spread their conquests over the savage and uncivilized natives of a solitary island.

It is certain, that in the declining age of the Roman empire, Caledonia, Ireland, and the Isle of Man, were inhabited by the Scots, and that the kindred tribes, which ascended inutility from the north, were deeply affected by the various disasters of their mutual fortunes. They long cherished the lively tradition of their common name and origin; and the missionaries of the Isle of Saints, who diffused the light of Christianity over North Britain, established the vain of the Scottish race. The loose and obscure tradition has been preserved by the venerable Bede, who scattered some rays of light over the darkness of the eighth century. On this slight foundation, an huge superstructure of fable was gradually reared, by the sagacity of men, who equally abused the privilege of fiction. The Scottish nation, with mistaken pride, adopted their Irish genealogy; and the annals of a long line of imaginary kings have been adorned by the fancy of Boehmstr, and the classic elegance of Buchanain.

Six years after the death of Constantine, the destructive inroads of the Scots and Piets required the presence of A.D. 343—350, his youngest son, who reigned in the western empire. Constans visited his British dominions; but we may form some estimate of the importance of his achievements from the fact, that Alaric, whose victory over Rome was gained only by the triumph of the elements, or, in other words, the good fortune of a safe and easy passage from the port of Boulogne to the harbour of Sandwich. The calamities which the afflicted provincials continued to experience, from internal war and domestic tyranny, were aggravated by the feckless and corrupt administration of the emperors of the West; the transient relief which they might obtain from the virtues of Julian, was soon lost by the absence and death of their

The Scots of the fifth and sixth centuries were settled in Caledonia; and that the Roman authors do not afford any hints of their emigration from another country. 2. That all the accounts of such emigrations have been received by historians, such as Irland, British Scots, Irish historians, or English antiquaries, (Buchanain, Buchanain, and Sand, Esher, and the ancients, Caledonia, Caledonia, and this of the Irish tribes, which are mentioned by Pecian, (A.D. 159,) were of Caledonian extraction. 4. The younger branch of Caledonian princes, of the house of Fingal, succeeded the monarchy of Ireland. After these emigrations, the remaining inhabitants divided themselves into several nations; and the principal distinction between them was, in some measure, the kind of language which they used. The genuine history, which he produces, of a Persians, the language of Caledonia, as Caledonia, or in more ancient times, is well known. Caledonia is built on a conical supplement to the Erin poetry; and the historic evidence of Richard of Clermont, a monk of the fourteenth century, supports the opinion of other antiquaries. It has been asserted that the story of the High King, or antiquarian, has been preserved in the nature of a question, which has been so much discussed, as to be almost incredible. 2. 4 In the beginning of the last century, the learned Camden was obliged to undermine, with respectable scepticism, the Romance of Eras the Trojan; who is now buried, in silent oblivion, with Scott, the author of the Ancient History of Scotland, and her ancient poetry. Yet it is affirmed, that some champions of the Celtic colony may still be found on the ancient seat of Strobar; and they are described with their present condition, grasp at any visions of their past or future.

Dr. Macpherson was a mis- under the influence of the Elysian Fields; and a resemblance to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, by James Macpherson, Edin. London, 1773, in 4to., third edition. Dr. Macpherson was a mis-benefactor. The sums of gold and silver which had been painfully collected, or liberally transmitted, for the payment of the troops, were intercepted by the avarice of the commanders; discharges, or, at least, exemptions, from the military service were publicly sold to the distress of the soldiers, whose wages were thereby deprived of their legal and scanty subsistence, provoked them to frequent desertion; the nerves of discipline were relaxed, and the highways were infested with robbers. The oppression of the good, and the humanity of the bad, were balanced, equally repugnant to discipline, and the spirit of discontent and revolt; and every ambitious subject, every desperate exile, might entertain a reasonable hope of subverting the weak and distracted government of Britain. The hostile tribes of the north, who detested the pride and power of the king of all the world, suspended their domestic feuds, and the barbarians of the land and sea, the Scots, the Picts, and the Saxons, spread themselves, with rapid and irresistible fury, from the wall of Antoninus to the shores of Kent. Every production of art and nature, every object of commerce or luxury, which they were incapable of creating by labour, or by purchase, was sold by trade, was accumulated in the rich and fruitful province of Britain. A philosopher may deplore the eternal discord of the human race, but he will confess, that the desire of spoil is a more rational provocation than the desire of food. The most rational of the plantagenets to that of the plantagenets, this rapacious spirit continued to instigate the poor and hardy Caledonians: but the same people, whose generous humanity seems to inspire the songs of Ossian, was disgraced by a savage ignorance of the virtues of peace, and of the laws of war. Their southern neighbours have felt, and perhaps exaggerated, the cruel depredations of the Scots and Picts; and a valiant tribe of Caledonians, the Attacotti, the enemies, and afterwards the soldiers, of Valentinian, are accused, by an eye-witness, of delighting in the taste of human flesh. They were not, however,挑选其。在他们之中，产生了对和平的渴望，以及对和平的渴望，他们准备了他们所准备的可怕报复。如果，在邻近的地区，没有对人类历史的反对，对文明的反对，对生活本身的反对，这些反应继续鼓励我们的想法；而且要鼓励我们对和平的追求，这样，新西兰可能会在未来的时代，成为欧洲的南方。

Every messenger who escaped across the British channel, conveyed the most melancholy and alarming tidings to the court of Valentian; and the emperor was soon informed, that the two military commanders of the province had been surprised and cut off by the barbarians. Severus, count of the dominiacs, was hastily despatched, and as suddenly recalled, by the court of Treves. The representations of Jovinus served only to indicate the evil; and, after a long and serious consultation, the defence, or rather the recovery, of Britain, was intrusted to the abilities of the brave Theodosius. The exploits of that general, the father of a line of emperors, have been celebrated, with peculiar complacency, by the writers of the age; but it is only the merit deservet by the applause; and his nomination was received, by the army and province, as a sure presage of approaching victory. He seized the favourable moment of navigation, and securely landed the veteran and numerous host of the Heruli, and Bohemond. In his march from Sandwich to London, Theodosius defeated several parties of the barbarians, released a multitude of captives, and, after distributing to his soldiers a small portion of the spoil, established the fame of disinterested justice, by the restitution of the remainder to the rightful proprietors. The citizens of London, who had almost despaired of their safety, threw open their gates; and as soon as Theodosius had obtained from the court of Treves the important aid of a military lieutenant, and a civil governor, he executed, with wisdom, vigour, the laborious task of the deliverance of Britain. He succeeded in maintaining the discipline of a British standard; an edict of amnesty dispelled the public apprehensions; and his cheerful example alleviated the rigor of martial discipline. The scattered and desultory warfare of the barbarians, who infested the island and contended in the age of Cæsar, presaged a victory of a signal victory: but the prudent spirit, and consummate art, of the Roman general, were displayed in the operations of two campaigns, which successively rescued every part of the province from the hands of a cruel and rapacious enemy. The splendor of the cities, and the security of the fortifications, were diligently restored, by the paternal care of Theodosius: who with a strong hand confined the trembling Caledonians to the northern angle of the island; and perpetuated, by the name and settlement of the new province of Valentinian, the glories of the reign of Valentinian. The voice of poetry and panegyric may add, perhaps with some degree of truth, that the unknown regions of Thule were stained with the blood of the Piets; that the ears of Theodosius dashed the waves of the Hyperborean ocean; and that the distant Orkneys were the scene of his naval victory over the Saxian pirates. He left the province with a fair, as well as splendid, reputation: and was immediately promoted to the rank of master-general of the cavalry, by a prince, who could applaud, without envy, the merit of his servants. In the important station of the Upper Danube, he succeeded Severus, in the command of Britain, and the armies of the Allemanni, before he was chosen to suppress the revolt of Africa.

A. D. 368. &c. had been long exercised by count Romanus; and his abilities were not inadequate to his station: but, as sordid interest was the sole motive of his conduct, he acted, on most occasions, as if he had been the enemy of the whole race, who had found the friend of his country. The three flourishing cities of Ocia, Leptis, and Sabrata, which, under the name of Tripoli, had long constituted a federal union, were obliged, for the first time, to shut their gates against a hostile invasion; several of their most honourable citizens were surprised and slain, the villages, and even whole farms, were pillaged; and the vines and fruit-trees of that rich territory were extirpated by the malicious savages of Getulia. The unhappy provincials implored the protection of Romans; but they soon found that their military governor was not less cruel and rapacious than their barbarian conquerors. As they would not supply furnish- ing the four thousand camels, and the exorbitant present, which he required, before he would march to the assistance of Tripoli, his demand was equivalent to a refusal, and he might justly be accused as the author of the public calamity. In the annual assembly of the three citie; a complaint was brought in the name of Valentinian the customary offering of a gold victory; and to accompany this tribute, of duty, rather than of gratitude, with their humble complaint, that they were ruined by the enemy, and betrayed by their governor. If the severity of Valentinian had been rightly directed, it would have fallen on the guilty head of Romans. But the count, long exercised in the arts of corruption, had despatched a swift and trusty messenger to secure the venal friendship of Remigius, master of the offices. The wisdom of the imperial counsel was deceived by artifice; and their honest indignation was coincident with an original situation, when the repetition of complaint had been justified by the repetition of public misfortunes, the notary Palladius was sent from the court of Treves, to examine the state of Africa, and the conduct of Romans. The rigid impartiality of Palladius was easily disposed; he was tempted to reserve for himself a part of the public treasure, which he brought with him for the payment of the troops; and from the moment that he was conscious of his own guilt, he could no longer refuse to attest the innocence and merit of the count. The charge of the Tripolitans was declared to be false and frivolous. From this moment, he was sufficiently satisfied, and left from Treves to Africa, with a special commission to discover and prosecute the authors of this impious conspiracy against the representatives of the sovereign. His inquiries were managed with so much dexterity and success, that he compelled the citizens of Leptis, who had sustained a recent siege of eight days, to contradict the truth of their own deuces, and to ensure the behaviour of their own deputies. A bloody sentence was pronounced, without hesitation, by the rash and headstrong cruelty of Valentinian. The president of Tripoli, who had presumed to pity the distress of the province, was sunk in the fear of public displeasure. The guilty citizens were put to death, as the accomplices of the imaginary fraud; and the tongues of two others were cut out, by the express order of the emperor. Romans, exalted by impunity, and irritated by resistance, was still continued in the military command; till the Africans were provoked, by his avowals, to join the rebellious standard of Firmus, the Moor.

His father Nabal was one of the richest and most powerful of the Moorish princes, who acknowledged the supremacy of Rome. But as he left, either by his wives or concubines, a very numerous family, he was accused of cruelty, and he was eagerly disputed; and Zamma, one of his sons, was slain in a domestic quarrel by his brother Firmus. The implacable zeal, with which Romanus prosecuted the legal revenge of this murder, could be ascribed only to a motive of avarice, or personal hatred; but, on this subject, his charge was so weighty, and Firmus clearly understood, that he must either present his neck to the execution, or appeal from the sentence of the imperial consistory, to his word, and to the people.

He was received as the deliverer of his country; and, as soon as it appeared that Romanus was formidable only to a submissive province, the tyrant of Africa became the object of universal contempt. The ruin of Cesarea, which was plundered and burnt by the licentious barbarians, convinced the refractory cities of the danger of resistance; the power of Romanus was established in the provinces of Mauritania and Numidinid; and it seemed to his only doubt, whether he should assume the diadem of a Moorish king, or the purple of a Roman emperor. But the imprudent and unhappy Africans soon discovered, that, in this rash insurrection, they had not sufficiently consulted their own strength, the abilities of their adversary, or the necessity of procuring any certain intelligence, that the emperor of the west had fixed the choice of a general, or that a fleet of transports was collected at the mouth of the Rhone, he was suddenly informed, that the great Theodosius, with a small band of veterans, had landed near Illyricum, or Gipseri, on the African coast, and the timid usurper sunk under the ascendant of virtue and military genius.

Though Firmus possessed arms and treasures, his despot of victory immediately reduced him to the use of these arts, which, in the same country, and in a similar situation, would have, without any danger of success, if only rendered him more crafty Jugurths. He attempted to deceive, by an apparent submission, the vigilance of the Roman general; to seduce the fidelity of his troops; and to protract the duration of the war, by successively engaging the independent tribes of Africa to espouse his quarrel, or to protect his flight. Theodosius imitated the example, and obtained the success, of his predecessor Metellus. When Firmus, in the character of a supplicant, accused his own rashness, and humbly solicited the clemency of the emperor, the latter of Valentinian received and dismissed him with a friendly embrace; but he was instantly required to do the service of an army, or to make a sacrifice of a sincere repentance; nor could he be persuaded, by the assurances of peace, to suspend, for an instant, the operations of an active war. A dark conspiracy was detected by the penetration of Theodosius; and he satisfied, without much reluctance, the public indignation, which he could not resist. The plan was received with approbation, for the accomplices of Firmus were abandoned, according to ancient custom, to the tumult of a military execution; many more, by the amputation of both their hands, continued to exhibit an instructive spectacle of horror; the hatred of the rebels was accompanied with fear; and the imperial edict was received with respect and admiration. Amidst the boundless plains of Getulia, and the innumerable valleys of mount Atlas, it was impossible to prevent the escape of Firmus; and if the usurper could have tired the patience of his antagonist, he would have secured his person in the depth of some remote solitude, and expected the hopes of a future revolution. He was subdued by the perseverance of Theodosius: who had formed an inflexible determination, that the war should end only by the death of the tyrant; and that every nation of Africa, which presumed to support his cause, should be involved in the general calamity. At the head of his troops, which seldom exceeded three thousand five hundred men, the Roman general advanced, with a steady prudence, devoid of rashness, or of fear, into the heart of a country, where he was sometimes attacked by armies of twenty thousand Moors. The boldness of his charge, and the number of his followers, were disconcerted by his seasonable and orderly retreats; they were continually baffled by the unknown resources of the military art; and they felt and confessed the just superiority which was assumed by the leader.

of a civilized nation. When Theodosius entered the extensive dominions of Igmamos, king of the Ifassenes, the haughty savage required, in words of defiance, his name, and the object of his expedition. "I am," replied the stern and disdainful count. "I am the general of the army, who has authority hitherto to pursue and punish a desperate robber. Deliver him instantly into my hands; and be assured, that if thou dost not obey the commands of my invincible sovereign, thou, and the people over whom thou reignest, shall be utterly extinguished." As soon as Igmamos was satisfied with his submission, he challenged, in return, permission to execute the fatal menace, he consented to purchase a necessary peace by the sacrifice of a guilty fugitive. The guards that were placed to secure the person of Firmus, deprived him of the hopes of escape; and the Moorish tyrant, after wise had extinguished the sense of danger, dispatched the insulting triumphs of the Romans, by strangling himself in the night. His dead body, the only present which Igmamos could offer to the conqueror, was carelessly thrown upon a camel; and Theodosius, leading back his victorious troops to Sth, was saluted by the warmest acclamations of joy and loyalty.

He is executed at Carthage, the Romans; it was restored by the virtues A. D. 570. of Theodosius; and our curiosity may be usefully directed to the inquiry of the respective triumphs of two generals, one belonging to the imperial court. The authority of count Romanus had been suspended by the master-general of the cavalry; and he was committed to safe and honourable custody till the end of the war. His crimes were proved by the most authentic evidence; and the public expected, with eagerness, his sentence to justice. But the partial and powerful favour of Mellonbane, was encouraged, encouraged him to challenge his legal judges, to obtain repeated delays for the purpose of procuring a crowd of friendly witnesses, and, finally, to cover his guilty conduct by the additional guilt of fraud and forgery. About the same time, the restored Britains and Arimaspi, on a vague suspicion that his name and services were superior to the rank of a subject, was ignominiously beheaded at Carthage. Valentianin no longer reigned; and the death of Theodosius, as well as the impunity of Romanus, may justly be imputed to the arts of the impostor, and the negligence of those who, in the inexperienced youth, of his sons. 1

State of Africa.

If the geographical accuracy of Ammianus had been fortunately bestowed on the British exploits of Theodosius, we should have traced, with eager curiosity, the distinct and domestic features of the country. Oviedo has enumerated, the unknown and uninteresting tribes of Africa may be reduced to the general remark, that they were all of the swarthy race of the Moors; that they inhabited the back settlements of the Manitonomous; and province, the country, as they have since been termed by the Arabs, of dates and of locusts, 2 and that, as the Roman power declined in Africa, the boundary of civilized manners and cultivated land was insensibly contracted. Beyond the utmost limits of the Moors, the vast and inhospitable desert of the Sahara extends above a thousand miles to the banks of the Niger. These inhabitants, who had a very faint and imperfect knowledge of the great peninsula of Africa, were sometimes tempted to believe, that the torrid zone must ever remain destitute of inhabitants; but they sometimes abused their fancy by filling the vacant space with headless men, or rather monsters; with horned and cloven-footed satyrs; with fabulous centaurs; and with human pygmies, who waged a bold and doubtful warfare against the cranes. 3 Carthage would have been an unprofitable conquest to the state, who has attempted the project, but on either side of the equator, were filled with innumerable nations, who differed only in their colour from the ordinary appearance of the human species; and the subjects of the Roman empire might have anxiously expected, that the swarms of barbarians, which issued from the desert, and the ocean south by new swarms of barbarians, equally fierce, and equally formidable. These gloomy terrors would indeed have been dispelled by a more intimate acquaintance with the character of their African enemies. The inaction of the negroes does not seem to be the effect, the philter of their virtue, or the nature, of freedom; like the rest of mankind, their passions and appetites; and the adjacent tribes are engaged in frequent acts of hostility. 4 But their rude ignorance has never invented any effectual weapons of defence, or of destruction; they appear incapable of forming any extensive and systematic state of government. While the notorious inferiority of their mental faculties has been discovered and abused by the nations of the temperate zone. Sixty thousand blacks are annually emigrated from the coast of Guinea, never to return to their native country. The various nations of the northern and constant emigration, which, in the space of two centuries, might have furnished slaves to overrun the globe, accuses the guilt of Europe, and the weakness of Africa. 5

IV. The ignominious treaty, which IV. The East inherited the consequences of the war. was so disgracefully and so cowardly executed on the side of the Romans; and as they had solemnly renounced the sovereignty and alliance of Armenia and Iberia, those tributary kingdoms were exposed, without protection, to the arms of the Persian monarch. 6 Sapor entered the Armenian territories at the head of a formidable host of cuttiers, of archers, and of mercenary foot; but it was the irrevocable practice of Sapor to mix war and negociation, and to consider falsehood and perjury as the most powerful instruments of regal policy. He affected to praise the prudent and moderate conduct of the kings of Armenia; and the munificent. Persians was persuaded, by the repeated assurances of insidious friendship, to deliver his person into the hands of a faithless and cruel enemy. In the midst of a splendid entertainment, he was bound in chains of silver, as an honour due to the blood of the Arsaces; and after a

Yet some difficulty will still remain about the conversation which St. Anthony held with one of these pious savages in the desert of Thebais. (Jerome, De Vit. Patrum, l. i. p. 256.) 4 St. Anthony likewise met one of these monsters; whose existence was not suspected by the Egyptians; but when it was laughed; but his present of Egypt had the address to send an artful preparation, the enlightened corps of an Hiberniannum which was preserved after the death of St. Anthony. This was written by Pliny, (Hist. Nat. vii. 3.) and the judicious observations of Freer, (Memoirs de l'Acad. tom. vii. p. 523. &c.) 5 The fabulous of the pygmies is as old as Homer. (Iliad, ii. 6.) The pygmies were (memoires) between two and three inches high. Every spring their cavalry (mounted on camels and goats) marched in battle array to destroy the cranes eggs; alter which they sold the sweet and delicious mus bon non res dried. Pliny refers to a species of mud, feathers, and egg shells. subsided in a vain and tedious negotiation. The contending parties supported their claims by mutual reproaches of perfidy and ambition; and it should seem, that the original party interested was engaged in doubtful terms, since they were reduced to the necessity of making their inconclusive appeal to the partial testimony of the generals of the two nations, who had assisted at the negotiations. A.D. 360.

The invasion of the Goths and Huns, which soon afterwards shook the foundations of the Roman empire, and the principality of the arms of Sapor. But the declining age, and perhaps the infirmities of the monarch, suggested new maxims of tranquillity and moderation. His death, which happened in the full maturity of a reign of seventy years, changed in a moment the court and councils of Persia; and their attention was most probably engaged by domestic troubles, and the distant efforts of a Persian war. The remembrance of ancient injuries was lost in the enjoyment of peace. The kingdoms of Armenia and Iberia were permitted, by the mutual thoughtless or even doubtful neutrality. The noble youth, by the persuasion of his mother Olympias, was rescued through the Persian host that besieged Artaxerxes, and imploded the protection of the emperor of the east. By his timid councils, Para was alternately supported, and recalled, and restored, and betrayed. The hopes of the Armenians were sometimes raised by the presence of the emperor in their midst; but Para was satisfied, that they preserved the integrity of the public faith, if their vassal was not suffered to assume the diadem and title of king. But they soon repented of their own rashness. They were confounded by the reproaches and threats of the Persian monarch. They found reason to distrust the cruel and inconstant temper of Para himself: who sacrificed, to the slightest suspicions, the lives of his most faithful servants; and held a secret and disgraceful correspondence with the assassin of his father and the enemy of his country. Under the specious pretence of consulting with them, the emperor of the east, who moved from Parthia to the mountains of Armenia, where his party was in arms, and to trust his independence and safety to the discretion of a peridious court. The king of Armenia, for such he appeared in his own eyes and in those of his nation, was received with due honours by the governors of the provinces through which he passed; but when he arrived at Tar-sus in Cilicia, his progress was stopped under various pretences; his motions were watched with respectful vigilance, and he gradually discovered that he was a prisoner in the hands of his enemies. In his indignation, dissembled his fears, and, after secretly preparing his escape, mounted on horseback with three hundred of his faithful followers. The officer stationed at the door of his apartment, immediately communica-

The reign of Sapor was short confinement in the Tower of Oblivion at Ecbatana. He was released from the miseries of life, either by his own will, or of his own will, or by that of an assassin. The king of Armenia was reposited at Ecbatana; the administration was shared between a distinguished satrap and a favourite eunuch; and Sapor marched, without delay, to subdue the martial spirit of the Iberians. Sauronices, who reigned in that country by the permission of the emperors, was executed. But the danger of Olympia, the wife, or widow, of the Armenian king, excited the public compassion, and animated the desperate value of her subjects and soldiers. The Persians were surprised and repulsed under the walls of Artaxerxes, by a bold and well concerted sally of the besieged. But the forces of Sapor were continually renewed and increased; the hopeless courage of the garrison was exhausted; the strength of the walls yielded to the assault; and the proud conqueror, after wasting the rebellious city with fire and sword, led away captive an unfortunate queen, who, in a more auspicious hour, had been the destined bride of the son of God. But if Sapor already triumphed in the easy conquest of two independent kingdoms, he soon felt, that a country is unsubdued, as long as the minds of the people are actuated by a hostile and contumacious spirit. The satraps, who were obliged to retreat, embraced the first opportunity of regaining the affiance of their countrymen, and of signifying their immortal hatred to the Persian name. Since the conversion of the Armenians and Iberians, those nations considered the Christians as the favourites, and the Magians as the adversaries, of the Sapor. But the conversion of the Armenians was a superstitious people, was uniformly exercised in the courts of Rome; and as long as the successors of Constantine disputed with those of Artaxerxes the sovereignty of the intermediate provinces, the religious connexion always threw a decisive advantage into the scale of the former. A numerous and active party, under the successor of Tiranus, as the lawful sovereign of Armenia, and his title to the throne was deeply rooted in the hereditary succession of five hundred years. By the unanimous consent of the Iberians, the country was equally divided between the rival princes; and the son of the Sassanian king, who owed his diadem to the support of Sapor, was obliged to declare, that his regard for his children, who were detained as hostages by the tyrant, was the only consideration which prevented them from openly renouncing the alliance of Persia. The em- peror Valens, who respected the obligations of the treaty, and who was apprehensive of involving the east in a dangerous war, ventured, with slow and cautious measures, to support the Roman party in the kingdoms of Iberia and Armenia. Twelve legions established the authority of Sauromaces on the banks of the Cyrus. They were the prisoner in the camp of the Iberians. A powerful army, under the command of count Trajan, and of Vadomair, king of the Alemani, fixed their camp on the confines of Armenia. But they were strictly enjoined not to commit the first hostilities, which might be understood as a breach of the treaty; and such was the implicit obedience of the Sassanian general, that they retreated, with exemplary patience, under a shower of Persian arrows, till they had clearly acquired a just title to an honourable and legitimate victory. Yet these appearances of war insensibly

1 Ammianus (xxviii. 12. 22. lxxv. 1. 5) has described the events, without the dates, of the Persian war. Moses of Chorene (Hist. Arm. i. iii. e. 28. 5. 166. c. 5. 226. c. 11) has given a later account. See also the additional facts; but it is extremely difficult to separate truth from fable. 2 Artaxerxes was the successor and brother (the consort persicus) of King Darius, the successor of King Sapor; and the story of the German Catastrophe, the subject of their common interest, is told in the Panegyric of the Emperor Leo. See the Universal History, vol. xi. p. 96. 3 Ammianus (xxviii. 1. 10. edit. Louvre.) The authors of that work have treated the Armenian dynasty with eradation and diligence; but it is a preposterous arrangement to divide the Roman and Oriental accounts into two distinct periods. 4 Facetas in Panegy. tured his flight to the consular of Cilicia, who overtook him in the suburbs, and endeavour, without success, to dissuade him from prosecuting his rash and dangerous design. A legion was ordered to pursue the royal fugitive; but the pursuit of infantry could not be very alarming to a body of light cavalry; and upon the approach of the latter, whose flight was doubtless hastened by the air, they retreated with precipitation to the gates of Tarsus. After an incessant march of two days and two nights, Para and his Armenians reached the banks of the Euphrates; but the passage of the river, which they were obliged to swim, was attended with some delay and some loss. The country was alarmed; and the two roads, which were only separated by an interval of three miles, had been occupied by a thousand archers on horseback, under the command of a count and a tribune. Para must have yielded to superior force, if the accidental arrival of a friendly traveller had not revealed the danger and the means of escape. A dark and almost impervious path securely conveyed the Armenian troop through the thickets; and Para had left behind him the count and the tribune, while they paused, irregular, and almost defenceless, before a public highway. They returned to the imperial court to excuse their want of diligence or success; and seriously alleged, that the king of Armenia, who was a skilful magician, had transformed himself and his followers, and passed before their eyes under a borrowed shape. And the iniquity of such a transaction Para still continued to profess himself the friend and ally of the Romans; but the Romans had injured him too deeply ever to forgive, and the secret sentence of his death was signed in the council of Valens. The execution of the bloody deed was committed to the subordinate of count Tranian; and he had the merit of insinuating himself into the confidence of the cedulous prince, that he might find an opportunity of stabbing him to the heart. Para was invited to a Roman banquet, which had been prepared with all the pomp and solemnity of the east; the hall resounded with cheerful music, and the company was already heated with wine; when the count retired for an instant, drew his sword, and gave the signal of the murder. A robust and desperate barbarian instantly rushed on the king of Armenia; and though he bravely defiance his life with the first weapon that chance offered to his hand, the table of the imperial general was stained with the royal blood of a guest, and an ally. Such were the weak and wicked maxims of the Roman administration, that, to attain a doubtful object of politics, the feeblest pretence of hospitality, were inhumanly violated in the face of the world.1

V. During a peaceful interval of thirty years, the Romans secured their frontiers of Hermania, and the most noble of the race of the Amali, have been compared, by the enthusiasm of his countrymen, to the exploits of Alexander; with the sole singular and almost incredible, difference, that the martial spirit of the Goths had been in a large degree supported by the vigour of youth, was displayed with glory and success in the extreme period of human life, between the age of fourscore and one hundred and ten years. The independent tribes were persuaded, or compelled, to acknowledge the king of the Ostrogoths as the sovereign of the Gothic nation: the chiefs of the Visigoths, or Thervingi, renounced the royal title, and assumed the more humble appellation of Judges; and, among those judges, Athanare, Fritigern, and Alaricus, were the most illustrious, by their personal merit, as well as by their vicinity to the Roman provinces. These domestic conquests, which increased the military power of Hermania, enlarged his ambitious designs. He invaded the adjacent countries of the north; and twelve of them, considered by Tacitus, or can be accurately defined, successively yielded to the superiority of the Gothic arms.2 The Heruli, who inhabited the marshy lands near the lake Moesitis, were renowned for their strength and agility; and the assistance of their light infantry was eagerly solicited, and highly esteemed, in all the wars of the Ostrogoths. But the active spirit of the Heruli was subdued by the slow and steady perseverance of the Goths; and, after a bloody action, in which the king was slain, the remains of that warlike tribe became a useful accession to the camp of Hermania. He then marched against the Veneti, enskilled in the use of arms, and formidable only by their numbers, which filled the wide extent of the plains of modern Poland. The victorious Goths, who were not inferior in numbers, prevailed in the contest, by the decisive advantages of exercise and discipline, and the maintenanc of the public harmony, of the conqueror advanced, without resistance, as far as the confines of the Estii.3 An ancient people, whose name is still preserved in the province of Estonia. Those distant inhabitants of the Baltic coast were supported by the labours of agriculture, enriched by the tribute of number, and a system of mild government, which was another of the gods. But the scarcity of iron obliged the Estian warriors to content themselves with wooden clubs; and the reduction of that wealthy country is ascribed to the prudence, rather than to the arms, of Hermania. His dominions, which extended from the Danube to the Baltic, included the native seats, and the recent acquisitions, of the Goths; and he reigned over the greatest part of Germany and Seythia with the authority of a conqueror, and sometimes with the cruelty of a tyrant. But he reigned over a part of the globe incapable of perpetuating and adorning the fame of its heroes. The name of Hermania is almost buried in oblivion; his exploits are imperfectly known; and the Romans themselves appeared unconscious of the progress of an aspiring power, which threatened the liberty of the north, and the peace of the empire.4 The Goths had contracted an hereditament:5 The cause of the Treaty attachment for the imperial house of of Gothic war. Constantine, of whose power and liberality they had received so many signal proofs. They respected the public peace; and if an hostile band sometimes traversed the sacred rights of the state, the irregular conduct was candidly ascribed to the ungodly spirit of the barbarian youth. Their contempt for two new and obscure princes, who had been raised to the throne by a popular election, inspired the Goths with bolder hopes; and, while they agitated some design of marching their confederate force under the national standard,6 they were easily tempted to embrace the party of Procopius; and to foment, by their dangerous aid, the civil discord of the Romans. The public treaty might stipulate no more than ten thousand auxiliaries; but the ambition of the king, and the jealousy of those chiefs of the Visigoths, that the army which passed the Danube amounted to the number of thirty thousand men.7

1 See in Ammianus (xx. 1.) the adventures of Para. Norae of Corena calls him Thiridates; and tells a long, and not improbable, story of his birth: Gothus; who afterwards, made himself popular in After his defeat and the jealousy of the reigning king. (J. R. I. ii. 31, &c. p. 293, &c.)

He denies the existence of the Fair/ /'Europe. But reason and the Ambrosian Ms. have restored the word, as genuine, and the Ambrosian Ms. are elsewhere extant in the Gothic, (Germania, c. 43.)

4 Ammianus (xxv. 31. 3.) observes, in general terms: Eumoderici . . . nobilissimae regis et multa varia fungantur fortis, vicinis gentibus formidavit, &c.

6 M. de Bust (Hist. des Peuples de l'Europe, tom. vi. p. 322.) has curiously ascertained the real number of these auxiliaries. I see They marched with the proud confidence, that their invincible valor would decide the fate of the Roman empire; and the provinces of Thrace groaned under the weight of the barbarians, who displayed the insolence of masters, and the licentiousness of enemies. In vain the emperor endeavored to arrest the march; he retarded their progress; and before the Goths could receive any certain intelligence of the defeat and death of Procopius, they perceived, by the hostile state of the country, that the civil and military powers were resumed by his successful rival. A chain of posts and fortresses, successively deserted by the Romans, on the Danube, were abandoned by the generals of Valens, resisted their march, prevented their retreat, and intercepted their subsistence. The forebodings of the barbarians were tamed and suspended by hunger; they indigently threw down their arms at the feet of the conqueror, who offered them food and chains; the numerous captives were distributed in all the cities of the east; and the provincials, who were soon familiarized with their savage appearance, ventured, by degrees, to measure their own strength with these formidable adversaries, whose name had so long been the object of their terror. The king of Scythia (419 A.D.) had perceived, was much pleased to see a nation which was grieved and exasperated by this national calamity. His ambassadors loudly complained, at the court of Valens, of the infractions of the ancient and solemn alliance, which had so long subsisted between the Romans and the Goths. They alleged, that they had fulfilled their part of the truce, and, in consequence, appealed against the conduct of the emperor Julian; they required the immediate restitution of the noble captives; and they urged a very singular claim, that the Gothic generals, marching in arms, and in hostile array, were entitled to be received as conqueror and privileges of ambassadors. The demand, but peremptory refusal of these extravagant demands, was signified to the barbarians by Victor, master-general of the cavalry; who expressed, with force and dignity, the just complaints of the emperor of the east. 2 The negociation was interrupted; and the fiery exhortations of Valens encouraged his timid brother to vindicate the insulted majesty of the empire. 3

Hostilities and

The splendor and magnitude of this Gothic war are celebrated by a contemporary historian; 4 but the events scarcely deserve the name of war. The Goths were at this time the luminous steps of the approaching decline and fall of the empire. Instead of leading the nations of Germany and Scythia to the banks of the Danube, or even to the gates of Constantinople, the aged monarch of the Goths resigned to the brave Athanariu the danger and glory of a decisive battle, against an enemy, who wielded with a feeble hand the powers of a mighty state. A bridge of boats was established upon the Danube; the presence of Valens animated his troops; and his ignorance of the art of war was compensated by personal bravery, and a wise deference to the advice of Victor, and Arintheus, his masters-general of the cavalry and infantry. The operations of the campaign were conducted by their skill and experience; but they found it impossible to drive the Visigoths from their strong posts in the mountains; and the devastation of the plain was so great with so much less expense, that the Danube on the approach of winter. The incessant rains which swelled the waters of the river, produced a tacit suspension of arms, and confined the emperor Valens, during the whole course of the ensuing summer, to his camp of Marcianopolis. The third year of the war was more favourable to the Romans, and more pernicious to the Goths. The interception of trade did not impede the energy of the invaders, who already confounded with the necessities of life; and the desolation of a very extensive tract of country threatened them with the horrors of famine. Athanariu was provoked, or compelled, to risk a battle, which he lost, in the plains; and the pursuit was rendered more bloody by the cruel prevarication of the victorious generals, who had promised a large reward for the head of every Goth that was brought into the imperial camp. The submission of the barbarians appeased the resentment of Valens and his council; the emperor listened with satisfaction to the flattering and eloquent remonstrance of the senate of Constantinople, which assumed, for the first time, a share in the public deliberations; and the same generals, Victor and Arintheus, who had successfully directed the conduct of the war, were empowered to regulate the conditions of peace. The freedom of trade which the Goths had hitherto possessed to two rivers, and the possession of the Danube, by the rashness of their leaders was severely punished by the suppression of their pensions and subsidies; and the exception, which was stipulated in favour of Athanariu alone, was more advantageous than honourable to the judge of the Visigoths. Athanariu, who, on this occasion, was appointed commander-in-chief, was not without the expectation of his sovereign, supported his own dignity, and that of his tribe, in the personal interview which was proposed by the ministers of Valens. He persisted in his declaration, that it was impossible for him, without inflicting the guilt of perfidy, to yield to his foot on the territory of the empire; and it is more than probable, that his regard for the sanctity of an oath was confirmed by the recent and fatal examples of Roman treachery. The Danube, which separated the dominions of the two independent monarchs, was the barrier of the Visigoths for about six years; till they were violently impelled against the Roman empire by an innumerous host of Scythians, who appeared to issue from the frozen regions of the north. 5

The emperor of the west, who had resigned to his new master the command of the victorious army, Lower Danube, reserved for his immediate care the defence of the Rhanian and Illyrian provinces, which spread so many hundred miles along the greatest of the European rivers. The active policy of Valens was continually employed in adding new fortifications to the security of the frontier; but the abuse of this policy provoked the just resentment of the barbarians. The Quadri complained, that the ground for an intended fortress had been marked out on their territories; and their complaints were urged with such importunity, and such importunity, and the master-general of Illyriam, consented to suspend the prosecution of the work, till he should be more clearly informed of the will of his sovereign. This fair occasion of injuring a rival, and of advancing the fortune of his son, was eagerly embraced by the inhuman Maximi, who was at that time either the co-manager, or rather the partializer of Valens in the Danube, or a leaf that Jornandes forgives a war parallel to the First Gothic, and important to the Gothic name. (Maseron's Hist. of the Germans, v. 5.)

ite, that if the government of Valeria, and the direction of the work, were intrusted to the zeal of his son Marcellinus, the emperor should no longer be importuned with the audacious remonstrances of the barbarians. The subjects of Rome, and the natives of Germany, were insulted by the arrogance of a young prince, and were considered as incapable of the protection of men of genius. The calamities of Germany had not escaped the elevation of the proof and reward of his superior merit. He affecting, however, to receive the modest application of Gabinius, king of the Quadi, with some attention and regard; but this artful civility concealed a dark and bloody design, and the credulous prince persuaded to accept the pressing invitation of Marcellinus. I am at a loss how to vary the narrative of similar crimes; or how to relate, that, in the course of the same year, but in remote parts of the empire, the inhospitable table of two imperial generals was stained with the royal blood of two guests and allies, inhumanly murdered by their order, and in their presence. The fate of Gabinius and of Pura was the same: but the cruel death of their sovereign was resented in a very different manner by the servile temper of the Armenians, and the free and dauntless spirit of the Goths. The Quadi were much declined from that formidable power, which, in the time of Marcus Antoninus, had spread terror to the gates of Rome. But they still possessed arms and courage; their courage was animated by despair, and they obtained the usual reinforcement of the cavalry of the legions. So impressively was the image of Marcellinus, that he chose the moment when the bravest veterans had been drawn away, to suppress the revolt of Firmus; and the whole province was excited, with a very feeble defence, to the rage of the exasperated barbarians. They invaded Firmus in the season of harvest; unscrupulously destroyed every object of plunder which they could not easily transport; and either disregarded or demolished the empty fortifications. The princess Constantia, the daughter of the emperor Constantinus, and the grand-daughter of the great Constantine, very narrowly escaped. That royal maid, who had innocently supported the revolt of Procopius, was now the destined wife of the heir of the western empire. She traversed the peaceful province with a splendid and unarmed train. Her person was saved from danger, and the republic from disgrace, by the presence of the Goths, who formed a part of the troops that surrounded the imperial residence. As soon as he was informed that the village, where she stopped only to dine, was almost encompassed by the barbarians, he hastily placed her in his own chariot, and drove full speed till he reached the gates of Sirium. He found the division of 30,000 men and 4000 horses. Even Sirium might not have been secure, if the Quadi and Sarmatians had diligently advanced during the general consternation of the magistrates and people. Their delay allowed Probus, the prætorian prefect, sufficient time to recover his own spirits, and to revive the courage of the citizens. He skilfully directed their strenuous efforts to repair and strengthen the decayed fortifications; and procured the seasonable and effectual assistance of a company of archers, to protect the capital of the Illyrian provinces. Disabdol, the principal agent in the designs of Sirium, the ignomious barbarians turned their arms against the master-general of the frontier, to whom they unjustly attributed the murder of their king. Equitius could bring into the field no more than two legions; but they contained the veteran strength of the Macedon and Panonian bands. The obstinacy with which they despised the vain honours of rank and precedence, was the cause of their destruction; and, while they acted with separate forces and divided councils, they were surprised and slaughtered by the active vigour of the Saxons. The success of the invasion roused the emulation of the bordering tribes; and the province of Mesia would infallibly have been lost, if young Theodosius, the duke, or military commander, of the frontier, had not signaled, in the defeat of the public enemy, an intrepid genius, worthy of his illustrious father, and of his future greatness. The mind of Valentinian, who then resided at Treves, was deeply affected by the calamities of Ilyricum; but the leanness of the season prevented his speeding the legions till the ensuing spring. He marched in person with a considerable part of the forces of Gaul, from the banks of the Moselle; and to the suppliant ambassadors of the Sarmatians, who met him on the way, he returned a doubtful answer, that, as soon as he reached the scene of action, he should examine, and pronounce. When he arrived at Sirium, he gave audience to the deputies of the Illyrian princes; who loudly congratulated their own felicity under the auspicious government of Probus, his prætorian prefect. Valentinian, who was much affected by these demonstrations of their loyalty and gratitude, imprudently asked the deputy of Epirus, a Cynic philosopher of intrepid sincerity, whether he was freely sent by the wishes of the province; "With tears and groans am I sent (replied Iphicles) by a reluctant people. But the emperor paused; and the wish of his ministers established the pernicious maxim, that they might oppress his subjects, without injuring his service. A strict inquiry into their conduct would have relieved the public discontent. The severe condemnation of the murder of Gabinius, was the only satisfaction of the Saxons, and the Pannonians; and the barbarians, Germans, and Illyrians, vexed at the title, and the conduct of the emperor, awoke the thirst of blood and revenge. The extreme devastation, and promiscuous massacre, of a savage war, were justified in the eyes of the emperor, and perhaps in those of the world, by the cruel equity of retaliation; and such was the discipline of the Romans, and the consternation of the enemy, that Valentinian proposed the Danube without the loss of a single man. As he had resolved to complete the destruction of the Quadi by a second campaign, he fixed his winter-quarters at Bregeto, on the Danube, near the city of Presburg. While the operations of war were suspended by the absence of the emperor, the Quadi, who encouraged by his ministers, undertook theSeven Probes. When Jeron translated, and continued, the chronicle of Eumenes, (A. D. 389), See Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. tom. xii. p. 332. (1836), he expressed his surprise at the ancient connection of this country, in the following words: "Proba P. P. Illyrici insignissima patria in manu sui praefectissima; ut in eam adhuc notius hodie in amore patriae vestrae, vestrae;" (Chron. edit. Seizer. p. 157). Animadversiones, p. 52. In the following year he published, with a great measure of friendship with the widow of Probus; and the name of count Equitius, with less propriety, but without much injustice, has been established in the chronicle of Eumenes. Jollain (Orat. vi. p. 190) represents his friend Iphicles as a man of simple and modest manners, who had made himself agreeable and unapproachable by adopting the extravagant dress and manners of the Cynics.

Ammian. n. 5. Jeron, who exaggerates the misfortunes of Valentinian, has wrongly and absurdly ascribed to him the title Illyricus of the Roman writers; for the title Illyricus was voto solo, et saepe patrimonielingens, (tom. i. p. 36). body: and Valentinian fell speechless into the arms of his attendants. Their plans immediately concentrated upon the situation. In an hour or two minutes, the emperor of the west expired, in an agony of pain, retaining his senses till the last; and struggling, without success, to declare his intentions to the generals and ministers, who surrounded the royal couch. Valentinian was only twenty years of age; but it should have been considered that he wanted only one hundred days to accomplish the twelve years of his reign.3

The emperors

The polygamy of Valentinian is seriously attested by ecclesiastical historians.4 The emperor Severa (I relate the fable) admitted into his bed the lovely Justinia, the daughter of an Italian governor: her admission of those naked charms, which she had often seen in the bath, was expressed with such lavish and impudent praise, that the emperor was tempted to introduce a second wife into his bed; and his public edict extended to all the subjects of the empire, the same domestic privilege, which he had assumed for himself." But we may be assured, from the evidence of reason, as well as history, that the two marriages of Valentinian, with Severa, and with Justinia, were successively contracted; and that he used the ancient permission of divorce, which was still allowed by the laws, though it was condemned by the church. Severa was the mother of Gratian, who seemed to unite every claim which could entitle him to the undoubted succession of the western empire. He was the eldest son of a monarch, whose glorious reign had confirmed the free and honourable choice of his fellow-soldiers. Before he had attained the ninth year of his age, the royal youth received from the hands of his indolent father the purple robe and diadem, with the title of Augustus; the election was solemnly ratified by the consent and applause of the armies of Gaul; and the name of Gratian was added to the names of Valentinian and Valens, in all the legal transactions of the Roman government.

By his marriage with the grand-daughter of Constantine, the son of Valentinian acquired all the hereditary rights of the Flavian family; which, in a series of three imperial generations, were sanctified by time, religion, and the reverence of the people. At the death of his father, the royal youth was in the seventeenth year of his age; and his virtues already justified the favourable opinion of the army and people. But Gratian resided, without apprehension, in the palace of Troyes; whilst, at the distance of many hundred miles, Valentinian still reigned in the camp of Lyons. The passions which had been so long suppressed by the presence of a master, immediately revived in the imperial council; and the ambitious design of reigning in the name of an infant, was artfully executed by Mellobaudes and Equitius, who commanded the attachment of the Illyrian and Italian bands. They contrived the most important pretences to remove the popular leaders, and the troops of Gaul, who might have asserted the claims of the lawful successor: they suggested the necessity of extinguishing the hopes of foreign and domestic enemies, by a bold and decisive measure. The expedition was prepared, a palace about one hundred miles from Brégeotet, was respectably invited to appear in the camp, with the son of the deceased emperor. On the sixth day after every remarkable event to the particular will of the Deity; the alterations of nature were connected, by an unbroken chain, with the moral and metaphysical opinions of the human mind; and the most sagacious divines could distinguish, according to the colour of their respective prejudices, that the establishment of heresy tended to produce an earthquake; or that a deluge was the inevitable consequence of the progress of sin. The Church, without yearning for the annihilation of truth or propriety of these lofty speculations, the historian may content himself with an observation, which seems to be justified by experience, that man has much more to fear from the passions of his fellow-creatures, than from the fulminations of the heavenly Deity. The prodigious effects of an earthquake, or deluge, a hurricane, or the eruption of a volcano, bear a very considerable proportion to the ordinary calamities of war; as they are now moderated by the prudence or humanity of the princes of Europe, who amuse their own leisure, and exercise the courage of their subjects, in the practice of the military art. But the laws and manners of modern nations protect the safety and freedom of the vanquished soldier; and the peaceful citizen has seldom reason to complain, that his life, or even his fortune, is exposed to the rage of war. In the disastrous periods of the Romans, which may justly be dated from the reign of Valens, the happiness and security of each individual were personally attacked; and the arts and labours of ages were rudely defaced by the barbarians of Scythia and Germany. The invasion of the Huns precipitated on the plains of the west the Gothic nation, which advanced, in less than forty years, from the Danube to the Atlantic, and opened a way, by the success of their arms, to the inroads of so many hostile tribes, more savage than themselves. The open plan of motion, and the rapid and remote countries of the north; and the curious observation of the pastoral life of the Scythians, or Tartars, will illustrate the latent cause of these destructive emigrations.

The pastoral nations of the Scythians, or Tartars.

The different characters that mark the civilized nations of the globe, may be ascribed to the use, and the abuse, of reason; which so variously shapes, and so artificially compiles, the manners and opinions of an European or a Chinese. But the operation of instinct is more sure and simple than that of reason; is more effectual than the accumulations of a quadrangle, than the speculations of a philosopher; and the savage tribes of mankind, as they approach nearer to the condition of animals, preserve a stronger resemblance to themselves and to each other. The uniform stability of their manners, the natural progress of their faculties, reduced to a similar situation, their wants, their desires, their enjoyments, still continue the same: and the influence of food or climate, which, in a more improved state of society, is suspended, or subdued, by so many moral causes, must powerfully contribute to form, and to maintain, the national character of barbarians. In every age, the immense plains of Scythia, or Tartary, have been inhabited by vagrant tribes of hunters and shepherds, whose indolence refuses to cultivate the earth, and whose restless spirit discards the confinement of a sedentary life. In every age, the Scythians, and Tartars, have been renowned for their invincible courage, and rapid conquests. The thrones of Asia have been repeatedly overturned by the shepherds of the north; and these arms have not only become a distinguishing mark of the most fertile and warlike countries of Europe. On this occasion, as well as on many others, the sober historian is forcibly awakened from a pleasing vision; and is compelled, with some reluctance, to confess, that the genius of the country, and the climate, is the most harshest attributes of peace and innocence, are much better adapted to the fierce and cruel habits of a military life. To illustrate this observation, I shall now proceed to consider a nation of shepherds and of warriors, in the three important articles of, I. Their diet; II. Their habitations; and III. Their exercises.

The narratives of antiquity are justified by the experience of modern times; and the banks of the Borys-theanys, of the Volga, or of the Selenga, will indifferently present the same uniform spectacle of similar and native manners.

I. The Tartars, which are divided into four great and even the rice, which constitutes the ordinary and wholesome food of a civilized people, can be obtained only by the patient toil of the husbandman. Some of the happy savages, who dwell between the tropics, are plentifully nourished by the liberaly of nature, and the hand of the Deity, the life of the north, a nation of shepherds is reduced to their flocks and herds. The skilful practitioners of the medical art will determine, (if they are able to determine) how far the temper of the human mind may be affected by the use of animal, or of vegetable, food; for the Tartars have no arms which may be concealed in a remote part of their body; and the misfortune of the Tartars, is the want of that which, of all others, should be the most harshest to them in their present situation. In the military profession, and especially in the conduct of a numerous army, the exclusive use of animal food appears to be productive of the most solid advantages. Corn is a bulky and perishable article, which requires a good system of warehouses, and a very skilful management; but simplicity is indispensably necessary for the subsistence of our troops, must be slowly transported by the labour of men or horses. But the flocks and herds, which accompany the march of the Tartars, afford a sure and

II. The Tartars bred the flying cloud of war.

The form of the Helotidas and the portrait of the Scythians. Among the moderns, who describe the uniform scene, the Khan of Kinashe, A. D. 1550, was exactly conjured upon the stage; and the Chinese, who, under the name of Scarb, have composed the Chinoiserie, (in the Hist. des Voyages, tom. iv.) represent the Mogul of the fourteenth century. To these guides I have added the observations of Carpini, and the other, and the other, and the other, (Henri de Breton, par Du Halde, tom. iv,) who accurately surveyed the Chinese Tartars; and that honest and intelligent traveller, Bell, of Anternomy, (in his Voyages, A. D. 1550,) who gives us a just, (in his Livres de la Tartarie, 1766.)

III. The character of the Tartars is more altered from their primitive manners; by the profession of the Catholic religion, or by the interference of the Missionaries, and the Jesuit, of the Malabar coast, or by the session of the cities and harriers of the great Barbaras.

1. Il est certain que los grands maneger de voeux ont un general; et que le voyageur hors de l'Europe, le voyageur hors de la vanguard deutschen, il est certain que les grands maneger de voeux ont un general; et que le voyageur hors de l'Europe, le voyageur hors de la vanguard de la Tartarie. Cette observation est de tous les fieux, et de tous les tems: la barbarei Vechatli est connue, mais le Tartar est ignoré. London, Tom. x. 641. Hist. Generale, c. 156. On the general observation, we shall not easily allow the truth of his example. The most accurate compilations of Pallas, and the pathetic lamentsations of Ovid, accord our reason, by exciting our sensibility.
increasing supply of flesh and milk: in the far greater part of the uncultivated waste, the vegetation of the grass is quick and luxuriant, and there are few places so extremely barren, that the hardy cattle of the north cannot find some tolerable pasture. The supply is multiplied and prolonged, by the undisdaining approach of the Tartars. They are, in different parts, and to the east, is known, they are driven, and at the south, and the Tartars are very different, when the active cavalry of Scythia is always followed, in their distant and rapid incursions, by an adequate number of space horses, which may be occasionally used, either to redouble the speed, or to satisfy the hunger, of the barbarians. Many are the resources of courage and poverty. When the forage round a camp of Tartars is almost consumed, they slaughter the greatest part of their cattle, and preserve the flesh, either smoked, or dried in the sun. On the sudden emergency of a hasty march, they provide themselves with a sufficient quantity of little balls of cheese, or rather of hard curd, which, they say, they keep in all seasons. This unsubstantial diet will support, for many days, the life, and even the spirits, of the patient warrior. But this extraordinary abstinence, which the Stoic would approve, and the hermit might envy, is commonly succeeded by the most voracious indulgence of appetite. The Tartars are almost never seen without a pipe or a pipe, and this pipe is generally filled with tobacco, which they smoke at all seasons. They seem to believe, that the alternate vicissitudes of famine and plenty; and their stomach is inured to sustain, without much inconvenience, the opposite extremes of hunger and of intemperance.

Habitations. II. In the ages of rustic and martial simplicity, a people of soldiers and husbandmen are dispersed over the face of an extensive and cultivated country; and some time must elapse before the warlike youth of Greece or Italy could be assembled under the same standard, either to defend their own confines, or to invade the territories of the adjoining nations, by the commerce insensibly collects a large multitude within the walls of a city; but these citizens are no longer soldiers; and the arts which adorn and improve the state of civil society, corrupt the habits of the military life. The pastoral manners of the Scythians seem to unite the different advantages of simplicity and refinement. The individuals of the same tribe are constantly assembled, but they are not assembled in a camp; and the native spirit of these dauntless shepherds is animated by mutual support and emulation. The huts of the Tartars are no more than small sheds, with a conical form, which afford a cold and dirty habitation, for the promiscuous youth of both sexes. The palaces of the rich consist of wooden huts, of such a size that they may be conveniently fixed on large waggons, and drawn by a team perhaps of twenty or thirty oxen. The flocks and herds, after grazing all day in the adjacent pastures, retire, on the approach of night, within the protection of the camp. The necessity of preventing the most mischievous confusion, in such a perpetual concourse of men and animals, must gradually introduce, in the distribution, the order, and the guard, of the encampments of the Tartars. As soon as the forage of a certain district is consumed by the tribe, or rather army, of shepherds, makes a regular march to some fresh pastures; and thus acquires, in the ordinary occupations of the pastoral life, the practical knowledge of one of the most important and difficult operations of war. The choice of stations is regulated by the difference of the seasons: in the summer, the Tartars advance towards the north, and pitch their tents on the banks of a river, or, at least, in the neighbourhood of a running stream. But in the winter they return to the south, and shelter their camp behind some convenient eminence, or deep wood, on which they are killed in their passage over the bleak and icy regions of Siberia. These manners are admirably adapted to diffuse, among the wandering tribes, the spirit of emigration and conquest. The connexion between the people and their territory is so frail a texture, that it may be broken by the slightest accident. They are extremely disposed to adventure, and are driven, from the confines of China to those of Germany. These great emigrations, which have been sometimes executed with almost incredible diligence, were rendered more easy by the peculiar nature of the Tartar climate. It is said of Tartary, that the winter of Tartary is much more severe than in the midst of the temperate zone might reasonably be expected; this uncommon rigour is attributed to the height of the plains, which rise, especially towards the east, more than half a mile above the level of the sea; and to the quantity of salt air, which is derived from the sea. In the winter season, the broad and rapid rivers, that discharge their waters into the Euxine, the Caspian, or the icy sea, are strongly frozen; the fields are covered with a bed of snow; and the fugitive, or victorious, tribes may securely traverse, with their families, their waggons, and their cattle, the smooth and hard surface of an immense plain.

III. The pastoral life, compared with the labours of agriculture and manufactures, is undoubtedly a life of idleness; and as the most honourable shepherds of the Tartar race derive on their captives all the credit of the cattle, their own leisure is seldom disturbed by any servile and assiduous cares. But this leisure, instead of being devoted to the soft enjoyments of love and harmony, is usefully spent in the violent and sanguinary exercise of the chase. But the life of the Tartars is almost as rude and servile as that of the hardy animals of the desert, which increase and multiply in the absence of their most formidable enemy; the hare, the goat, the roebuck, the fallow-deer, the k These Tartar emigrations have been discovered by M. de Gargue, (Histoire des Huns, tom. i. l.), a skilful and laborious interpreter of the Chinese language; who has thus laid open new and important researches in the history of the Tartars.

1 A plain in the Chinese Tartary only eighteen leagues from the sea, called, it was found, by the natives, a plain made of matter which was above the level of the sea. Montesquieu, who has never been, and is not, the relations of travellers, deduces the revolutions of Asia from this important circumstance, that heat and cold, weakness and strength, touch each other without any temperate zone. (Esprit des Lois, t. xvii. c. 2.)
The vigour and patience both of the men and horses are continually exercised by the fatigue of the chase; and the plentiful supply of game contributes to the subsistence, and even the luxury, of a Tartar camp. The hunters of Scythia are not confined to the destruction of timid or Inoxious beasts: they boldly encounter the angry wild boar, when he turns against his pursuers, exult the sluggish courage of the bear, and provoke the fury of the tiger, as he slumbers in the sun. Where there is no country, there men know no glory; and the mode of hunting, which opens the fairest field to the exertions of valour, may justly be considered as the image, and as the school, of war. The general hunting-matches, the pride and delight of the Tartars, and princes of China, are always attended by the numerous cavalry. A circle is drawn, of many miles in circumference, to encompass the game of an extensive district; and the troops that form the circle regularly advance towards a central point, where the captive animals, surrounded on every side, are abundantly fed on; which, in the course of successive days or months, which frequently continues many days, the cavalry are obliged to climb the hills, to swim the rivers, and to wind through the valleys, without interrupting the prescribed order of their gradual progress. They acquire the habit of directing their eye, and their steps, to the loss of their objects; their intervals of suspending, or accelerating, their pace, according to the motions of the troops on their right and left; and of watching and repeating the signals of their leaders. Their leaders study, in this practical school, the most important lesson of the mart warfare; the process, and the accurate judgment of ground, of distance, and of time. To employ against a human enemy the same patience and valour, the same skill and discipline, is the only alteration which is required in real war; and the amusements of the chase serve as a prelude to the conquest of an empire.

The political society of the ancient Tartars, distinguished by the modern appellation of Horde, assume the form of a numerous and increasing family; which, in the course of successive genealogies, has been propagated from the same original stock. The meanest, and most ignorant, of the Tartars, preserve, with conscious pride, the inestimable treasure of their genealogy; and whatever distinctions of rank may have been introduced, by the unequal distribution of worldly wealth, the manifestation of their talents, and each other, as the descendants of the first founder of the breed. The custom which still prevails, of adopting the bravest and most faithful of the captives, may countenance the very probable suspicion, that this extensive consanguinity is, in a great measure, legal and fictitious. But the useful prejudice, which has obtained the sanction of time and opinion, produces the effects of truth; the haughty barbarians yield a cheerful and voluntary obedience to the head of their blood; and their chief, or mursa, as the representative of their great family, the authority of an judge in perpetuity and of a leader in war. In the original state of the pastoral world, each of the mursas (if we may continue to use a modern appellation) acted as the independent chief of a large and separate family; and the limits of their peculiar territories were gradually fixed, by superior force, or mutual consent. But the constant operation of various and permanent causes contributed to unite the vagrant hordes into national communities, under the command of a supreme head. The weak were desirous of support, and the strong were ambitious of dominion; the power, which is the result of union, oppressed and collected the divided forces of the adjacent tribes; and, as the vanquished were freely admitted to the share of the victories in the explanation of their chieftains hastened to range themselves and their followers under the formidable standard of a confederate nation. The most successful of the Tartar princes assumed the military command, to which he was entitled by the superiority, either of merit, or of power. He was raised to the throne by the acclamations of the people, and sometimes by the title of Khan expresses, in the language of the north of Asia, the full extent of the regal dignity. The right of hereditary succession was long confined to the blood of the founder of the monarchy; and at this moment all the Khans from Crim to the wall of China, are the lineal descendants of the renowned Zingsis. But, as it is the indispensable duty of a Tartar sovereign to lead his warlike subjects into the field, the claims of an infant are often disregarded, and some royal kinsmen, distinguished by his age and reputed is, is intrusted with the sword and crown in the stead of his predecessor. Two distinct and regular taxes are levied on the tribes, to support the dignity of their national monarch, and of their peculiar chief; and each of those contributions amounts to the tenth, both of their property, and of their spoil. A Tartar sovereign enjoys the revenues of the province which he governs; and the Russian domestic riches of flocks and herds increase in a much larger proportion, he is able plentifully to maintain the rustic splendour of his court, to reward the most deserving, or the most favoured, of his followers, and to support the influence of corruption, of the obedience which might otherwise return to the stern mandates of authority. The manners of his subjects, accustomed like himself to blood and rapine, might excise, in their eyes, such partial acts of tyranny, as would excite the horror of a civilized people; and a despotic has never been more completely established in the deserts of Scythia. The immediate jurisdiction of the Khan is confined within the limits of his own tribe; and the exercise of his royal prerogative has been moderated by the ancient institution of a national council. The Corolu, or Diet, of the Tartars, was a body, in which the representatives of the common people, as a body, were acknowledged by their sovereign of a plain; where the princes of the reigning family, and the mursas of the respective tribes, may conveniently assemble on horseback, with their martial and numerous trains; and the ambitious monarch, who reviewed the strength, must consult the inclination, of an army so composed, before he could undertake any important operation may be discovered in the constitution of the Scythian or Tartar nations; but the perpetual conflict of those hostile nations has sometimes terminated in the establishment of a powerful and despotic empire. The victor, enriched by the tribute, and fortified by the arms, of dependant kings, has spread his conquests over Europe or Asia; the successful shepherds of the north have submitted to the confinement of arts, of laws, and of cities; and the introduction of luxury, after destroying the freedom of the people, has undermined the foundations of their desperate resistance.

The memory of past events cannot long be preserved, in the frequent and extensive remotensions of illiterate barbarian Tartars. The modern Tartars are ignorant of the conquests and achievements of the Tartars who founded the Mogul empire; and the poor castles of Chingis, described by Herzel (voir de Monresor, p. 212) as a poet, the pleasures which he had often enjoyed as a sportsman.
of their ancestors; and our knowledge of the history of the Scythians is derived from their intercourse with the local inhabitants of the south, the Greeks, the Persians, and the Chinese. The Greeks, who navigated the Euxine, and planted their colonies along the sea-coast, made the gradual and imperfect discovery of Scythia; from the Danube, and the confederate Thracians, as far as the frozen Morass of Atanth and Mount Caucausus, which, in the language of poetry, was described as the utmost boundary of the earth. They celebrated, with simple credulity, the virtues of the pastoral life; they entertained a more rational apprehension of the strength and numbers of the warlike barbarians, who continued to plunder, until Hystaspes, the son of Hystaspes. The Persian monarchs extended their western conquests to the banks of the Danube, and the limits of European Scythia. The eastern provinces of their empire were exposed to the Scythians of Asia; the wild inhabitants of the plains from the Caspian to the Caspian, two mighty rivers, which direct their course towards the Caspian sea. The long and memorable quarrel of Iran and Turan is still the theme of history or romance: the famous, perhaps the fabulous, valour of the Persian heroes, Rustan and Asfandir, was signalized, in the defence of their country, which had been formed by the Kassites, and the invincible spirit of the same barbarians, resisted, on the same ground, the victorious arms of Cyrus and Alexander. In the eyes of the Greeks and Persians, the real geography of Scythia was bourned, on the east, by the mountains of Imaus, or Caf, and the last instance of the extreme and trembling parts of Asia was clouded by ignorance or perverted by fiction. But those inaccessible regions are the ancient power, a powerful and civilized nation, which ascends, by a probable tradition, above forty centuries; and which is able to verify a series of facts from the annals of accurate and contemporary historians. The annals of China illustrate the state and revolutions of the pastoral tribes, which may still be distinguished by the vague appellation of Scythians, or Tartars; the vassals, the courtiers, and sometimes the conquerors, of a great empire; whose policy has uniformly opposed the blind and impetuous valour of the barbarians of the north. From the mouth of the Danube to the sea of Japan, the whole extent of a thousand and ten degrees, which, in that parallel, are equal to more than five thousand miles. The latitude of these extensive deserts cannot be so easily, or so accurately, measured; but from the fourth degree, which touches the wall of China, we may securely advance above a thousand and ten miles to the northward, till our progress is stopped by the immense desert of Siberia. In that desolate climate, instead of the animated picture of a Tartar camp, the smoke which issues from the earth, or rather from the snow, betrays the subterraneous dwellings of the Tungusse, and the Samodzes: the want of horses and even is imperfectly supplied by the use of reindeer, and of large dogs; and the conquerors of the earth insensibly degenerate into a race of deformed and diminutive savages, who tremble at the sound of arms.

The Huns, who under the reign of Original seat of Valens threatened the empire of Rome, were the last invaders of that period, to the empire of China. Their ancient, perhaps their original, seat, was an extensive, though dry and barren, tract of country, immediately on the north side of the great wall. Their place is at present occupied by the forty-nine hordes or banners of the Mongous, a pastoral nation, which consists of about two hundred thousand families. But the valour of the Huns had extended the narrow limits of their dominion; their conquests; their rustic chiefs, who assumed the appellation of Tanjou, gradually became the conquerors, and the sovereigns, of a formidable empire. They invaded towards the east, their victorious arms were stopped only by the ocean; and the tribes, which are thinly scattered between the Amoor and the extreme peninsula of Corea, adhered, with reluctance, to the standard of the Huns. On the west, near the head of the Irish, and in the valley of Imaus, they found a more extensive, more ample space, and the inhabitants of those regions were formed by the Huns, and of the Vandals, and of the Suebi, and of the Alamanni. One of the lieutenants of the Tanjou subdued, in a single expedition, twenty-six nations; the Huns, distinguished above the Tartar race by the use of letters, were in the number of his vassals; and, by the strange conjunction of human events, the flight of one of those savage tribes filled the vacant regions, and completely filled the invasion of Syria. On the side of the north, the ocean was assigned as the limit of the power of the Huns. Without enemies to resist their progress, or witnesses to contradict their vanity, they might securely achieve a real or imaginary conquest of the frozen regions of Siberia. The Northern sea was fixed as the remote boundary of their empire. But the name of that sea, on whose shores the pirate of Soffov embraced the life of a shepherd and an exile, may be

The decline and fall of China was caused by the rude embraces of the Huns; and the alliance of the haughty Tanchou was secured by their marriage with the genuine, or adopted, daughters of the imperial family, which vainly attempted to escape the sacrilegious pollution. The situation of these unhappy victims is described in the life of a Chinese princess, who laments that she is taken, by accident, forward to the kingdom of the Huns, by a barbarian husband; who complains that scar milk was her only drink, raw flesh her only food, a tent her only palace; and who expresses, in a strain of pathetic simplicity, the natural wish, that she should return to the art of her country, to fly back to her dear country; the object of her tender and perpetual regret.

The conquest of China has been twice achieved by the pastoral tribes of the Huns, of the north; the forces of the Huns were not inferior to those of the Mongols, or of the Manchus; and their ambition might entertain the most sanguine hopes of success. But their pride was humbled, and their progress was checked, by the arms and policy of Vouti, the fifth emperor of the powerful dynasty of the Han. In his long reign of fifty years, four years were spent in their victory, which was preceded and followed by the conquest of the northern provinces submitted to the laws and manners of China; and the ancient limits of the monarchy were enlarged, from the great river of Kiang, to the port of Canton. Instead of confining himself to the timid operations of a defensive war, his lieutenants penetrated the vast extent of China, and increased the emperor's dominions, by the conquest of the Huns, and by the reduction of the Tartars, who had been converted by the persuasion of their monarch to the Christianity of the Great Teacher. In these boundless deserts, where it is impossible to form magazines, and difficult to transport a sufficient supply of provisions, the armies of Vouti were repeatedly exposed to intolerable hardships; and, of one hundred thousand men, who advanced against the barbarians, thirty thousand only returned in safety to the feet of their master. These losses, however, were compensated by splendid and decisive success. The Chinese generals improved the superiority which they derived from the temper of their arms, their chivalry, and the service of their Tartar auxiliaries. The camp of the Tanchou was surprised in the midst of sleep and tempest; and, though the monarch of the Huns bravely cut his way through the ranks of the enemy, he left above fifteen thousand of his subjects on the field of battle. Yet this signal victory, which was preceded and followed by many bloody engagements, contributed much less to the destruction of the power of the Huns, than to the establishment of their empire, which was completed by the conquest of the Tartars, and the freedom of a warlike and spirited nation. He was received at Si- gan, the capital of the monarchy, by the troops, the mandarins, and the emperor himself, with all the honours that could adorn and disguise the triumph of Chinese vanity. 7 A magnificent palace was prepared for his reception; his place was assigned above all the princes of the royal family; an audience of the barbarian king was exhausted by the ceremonies of a banquet, which consisted of eight courses of meat, and of nine solemn pieces of music. But he performed, on his knees, the duty of a respectful homage to the emperor of China; pronounced, in his own name, and in the name of his successors, a perpetual oath of fidelity; and gratefully accepted a seal, which was bestowed as the emblem of his regal dependance. After this humiliating submission, the Tujoues sometimes departed from their allegiance, and seized the favourite moments of their despotism, which the weakness of the reigning Monarchy of the Huns gradually declined, till it was broken, by civil dissection, into two hostile and separate kingdoms. One of the princes of the nation was urged, by fear and ambition, to retire towards the south with eight hordes, which composed between forty and fifty thousand families. He obtained, with the title of Tujoue, a convenient territory on the verge of the Chinese provinc- es; and his constant attachment to the service of the empire was secured by weakness, and the desire of revenge. From the time of this fatal schism, the Huns of the Volga, and Persia, divided their resources till they were oppressed on every side by their foreign and domestic enemies. The proud inscription 8 of a column, erected on a lofty mountain, announced to posterity, that a Chinese army had marched seven hundred miles into the heart of their country. The Southern hordes of the oriental Tartars, retaliated the injuries which they had formerly sustained; and the power of the Tujoues, after a reign of thirteen hundred years, was utterly destroyed before the end of the first century of the christian era. 9

Their emigration

The fate of the vanquished Huns was diversified by the various influence of A.D. 100, &c. character and situation. Above one hundred thousand persons, the poorest, indeed, and the most pusillanimous of the people, were contented to remain in their native country, to renounce their pastoral occupation, and to mingle with the victorious nation of the Scipio. Fifty-eight hordes, about two hundred thousand men, ambitious of a more honourable servitude, retired towards the south; implored the protection of the emperors of China; and were permitted to inhabit, and to guard, the extreme frontiers of their old empire. But the most warlike and powerful tribes of the Huns maintained, in their adverse fortune, the undaunted spirit of their ancestors. The western world was open to their valor; and they resolved, under the conduct of their hereditary chieftains, to discover and subdue some remote country, which was inaccessible to the arms of the Scipio, and to the laws of China. 10 The course of their emigration soon carried them beyond the mountains of Imaus, and the limits of the Chinese geography; but we are able to distinguish the two great divisions of these formidable exiles, which directed their march towards the Oxus, and towards the Volga. 11 7 See the KANG MUN, tom. ii. p. 129 and the subsequent events under the proper remote. This memorable festival is celebrated in the Elige de Moukden, and explained in a note by the F. Caullat, p. 97.

8 This inscription was composed on the spot by Pakoua, president of the Tribunal of History. (KANG MUN, tom. ii. p. 95.) Further notices of the inscriptions are given in many parts of Tartary, (voir des Huns, tom. ii. p. 122.)

9 Le Goguins (tom. i. p. 179) has inserted a short account of the Scipio.

10 The emigration of the Huns is placed, by the Chinese, 1280 years before Christ. (Bde Litt. et Hist. tom. xvi. p. 104.) The Chinese, (Hist. des Huns, tom. ii. p. 212.) hold that the Huns were expelled from the empire of China by a general confederation; and that their emigration was occasioned by the violence of the state and the cruelty of the Tartar Emperors. (KANG MUN, tom. ii. p. 93, 95, 178, &c. The small numbers of each horde may be inferred from their losses and divisions.

Their conquest of the Alani. It is impossible to fill the dark interval of time which elapsed, after the Huns the Volga were lost in the eyes of the Chinese, when they showed themselves to the Romans. There is some reason, however, to apprehend, that the same force which had driven them from their native seats, still continued to impel their march towards the frontiers of Europe. The power of the Sienpi, their implacable enemies, which extended from the Caspian to the Atlantic, and from the Danube to the Rhine, must have gradually oppressed them by the weight and terror of a formidable neighbourhood; and the flight of the tribes of Scythia would inevitably tend to increase the strength, or to contract the territories of the Huns. The harsh and obscure appellations, which cover those tribes, and their unmeaning and ungrateful names, are expressive of their freedom, which they preserved to the last; and we must gradually press the magnitude, which the bravest warriors marched away in search of their free and adventurous countrymen; and that, as they had been divided by prosperity, they were easily reunited by the common hardships of their adverse fortune. The Huns, with their flocks and herds, their wagons loaded with their dependants and their stored and transported to the west of the Volga, and they boldly advanced to invade the country of the Alani, a pastoral people, who occupied, or wasted, an extensive tract of the deserts of Scythia. The plains between the Volga and the Tanais were covered with the ruins of the tribes, and the remains of the Agathyrsi and Goleni were confounded among their vessels. Towards the north, they penetrated into the frozen regions of Siberia, among the savage and uncultivated, immoral and destitute of the grace of human flesh; and their southern inroads were pushed as far as the confines of Persia and India. The mixture of Sarmatic and German blood had contributed to improve the features of the Alani, to whiten their swarthy complexions, and to tinge their hair with a yellowish cast, which is one of the Tartar race. They were less deformed in their persons, less brutish in their manners, than the Huns; but they did not yield to those formidable barbarians in their martial and independent spirit; in the love of freedom, which rejected even the privilege of domestic arms, which considered war and rapine as the pleasure and the glory of mankind. A naked cimeter, fixed in the ground, was the only object of their religious worship; the scalps of their enemies formed the costly trappings of their horses; and they viewed, with pity and contempt, the pusillanimous warriors, who patiently expected the infirmities of age, and the tortures of lingering disease. On the banks of the Tanais, the military power of the Huns and the Alani encountered with equal valor, but with unequal success. The Huns prevailed in the bloody contest; the king of the Alani was slain; and the remains of the vanquished nation were dispersed by smooth and spacial language of the Son of Heaven, and the Father of his people. 3

1 The Khan Mon (tom. iii. p. 447) attributes to their conquest a space of 30,000 lie. According to the present standard, 300 lie (or miles) were equal to one English mile; and an English mile consequently exceeds three miles of China. But there is strong reason to believe that the ancient 6 scarcely equated one half of the modern; and the above computation was made by a geographer, who is not a stranger in any age, or climate, of the globe. (Mon. Pern. i. p. 155.)

2 See the Histoire des Huns, tom. ii. p. 127-144. The subsequent history of the Huns, as narrated by Jornandes, is very agreeable to what has been seen in that country.

3 Une hominum quies et placidus aestum est velutam, ut ilia certis gaudent et solida, indicat habitationes in punctu quo quiescit finis, et finit Palmerius, animal, melius in palatio in patriorem, (Ilerodot. l. i., &c.)

4 We think highly of the conquerors of such men the ordinary alternative of flight or submission. A colony of exiles found a secure refuge in the mountains of Caucasus, between the Euxine and the Caspian; where they still preserved their name and their independence. Another colony advanced, with more intrepid courage, towards the shores of the Baltic, associated themselves with the northern tribes of Germany, and shared the spoil of the Roman provinces on the Same occasion. Jornandes, ii. p. 363. But the greatest part of the nation of the Alani embraced the Huns; they were as well as possible united, under the lead of their king, the spirited and decided hero of the Huns. Their victories extended from the Baltic to the Euxine, enjoyed, in the full maturity of age and reputation, the fruits of his victories, when he was alarmed by the formidable approach of an host of unknown enemies, on whom his barbarous subjects and allies, by whose justice, bestraw the empire of his barians. The numbers, the strength, the rapid motions, and the implacable cruelty of the Huns, were felt, and dreaded, and magnified, by the astonish ed Goths; who beheld their fields and villages consumed with flames, and deluged with indiscriminate blood. But the aurantic argosy was raised; and the pride and abhorrence which were excited by the shrill voice, the unceaseful gestures, and the strange deformity, of the Huns. These savages of Scythia were compared and (the picture had some resemblance) to the Tartars in the present day, in the manner of two legs; and to the misshapen figures, the Tartars were often placed on the bridges of antiquity. They were distinguished from the rest of the human species by their broad shoulders, flat noses, and small black eyes, deeply buried in the head; and as they were almost destitute of hands, they never enjoyed either the manly graces of youth, or the venerable aspect of age. A fabulous origin was assigned, worthy of their form and manners; that the witches of Scythia, who, for their foul and deadly practices, had been driven from society, had populated in the desert with infernal spirits; and that the Huns were the offspring of this execrable conjunction. The tale, so full of horror and absurdity, was greedily embraced by the credulous hatred of the Goths; but, while it gratified their hatred, it increased their fear, since the posterity of demons and witches might be supposed to inherit some of those desperate and murderous temperaments of the malignant temper, of their parents. Against these enemies, Hermanic prepared to exact the united forces of the Gothic state; but he soon discovered that his Huns tribes, provoked by oppression, were more inclined to second, than to repel, the invasion of the Huns. One of the chiefs of the Roxolan had for men. the custom of heirs of wild horses. The brothers of that unfortunate woman seized the favourable moment of revenge. The aged king of the Goths languished some time after the dangerous wound which_cost him his eyesight; and the conduct of the war was retarded by his infirmities; and the public councils of the nation were distracted by a spirit of jealousy and discord. His death, which has been imputed to his own despair, left the reins of government in the hands of Whitithier, who, with the doubtful aid of some Scythian mercenaries, maintained the unequal contest against the arms of the Huns and the Alani, till he was defeated and slain, in a decisive battle. The Ostrogoths submitted to their fate; and the royal race of the Amali will hereafter be found among the subjects of the Atilis. But the person of Witheric, the infant king, was preserved by the diligence of Atila and Saphrax; two warriors of approved valour and fidelity; who, by cautious marches, conducted the independent remains of the nation of the Ostrogoths towards the Danastus, or Niester; a considerable river, which now separates the Turkish dominions from the empire of Russia. On the banks of the Niester, the prudent Athanaric, more attentive to his own than to the general safety, had fixed the camp of the Visigoths; with the firm resolution of opposing the victorious barbarians, whom he thought less advisable to provoke. The ordinances of the emperor, of which the passage of the river was no longer impeded by the wisdom and authority of his elder brother, whose death happened towards the end of the preceding year; and as the distressful situation of the Goths required an instant and peremptory decision, he was deprived of the favourite resources of fickle and timid minds; who considered the use of dilatory and ambiguous measures as the most admirable efforts of consummate prudence. As long as the same passions and interests subsist among mankind, the questions of war and peace, of justice and policy, which were debated in the councils of antiquity, will frequently present themselves as the subject of modern deliberation. But the most experienced statesman of Europe has never been summoned to consider the propriety, or the danger, of admitting, or rejecting, an innumerable multitude of barbarians, who are driven by despair and hunger to sollevia a settlement on the territories of a civilised nation. When that important proposition, so essentially connected with the public safety, was referred to the ministers of Valens, they were perplexed and divided; but they soon acquiesced in the flattering sentiment which seemed the most favourable to the glory of the Franks and the pride of the invincible Huns. The slaves, who were decorated with the titles of prelates and generals, dissembled or disregarded the terrors of this national emigration, so extremely different from the partial and accidental colonies, which had been received on the extreme limits of the empire. But they applauded the liberality of fortune, which had conducted, from the most distant countries of the globe, a numerous and ininvincible army of strangers, to defend the throne of Valens; who might now add to the royal treasures the immense sums of gold supplied by the provincials to compensate their annual proportion of recruits. The prayers of the Goths were heard, and their service was accepted by the imperial court; and orders were immediately despatched to the civil and military governors of the Thracian diocese, to make the necessary preparations for the passage and subsistence of a great people, till a settlement in their future residence. The liberality of the emperor was accompanied, however, with two harsh and rigorous conditions, which prudence might justify on the side of the Romans, but which distress alone could extort from the indignant Goths, before they passed over the Danube, and deliver their arms; and it was insisted, that their chil-

But the attention of the emperor was most seriously engaged, by the important intelligence which he received from the civil and military officers who were intrusted with the defence of the Danube. He was informed, that the north was agitated by a favorable opportunity; that the Huns, an unknown and monstrous race of savages, had subdued the power of the Goths; and that the superabundant multitude of that warlike nation, whose pride was now humbled in the dust, covered a space of many miles along the banks of the river. With outstretched arms, and patrician contumacy, they loudly deposed their past misfortunes and their present danger; acknowledged, that their only hope of safety was in the clemency of the Roman government; and most solemnly protested, that if the gracious liberality of the emperor would permit them to cultivate the waste lands of Thrace, they should ever hold themselves bound, by the strongest obligations of duty and gratitude, to obey the laws, and to guard the limits, of the republic. These assurances were confirmed by the ambassadors of the Goths, who impatiently expected from the mouth of Valens an answer that must finally determine the fate of their unhappy countrymen. Over the spirit of the past was now subdued by the wisdom and authority of his elder brother, whose death happened to the end of the preceding year; and as the distressful situation of the Goths required an instant and peremptory decision, he was deprived of the favourite resources of fickle and timid minds; who considered the use of dilatory and ambiguous measures as the most admirable efforts of consummate prudence. THE DECLINE AND FALL

Chap. XXVI.

The decline should be taken from them, and dispersed through the provinces of Asia; where they might be civilized by the arts of education, and serve as hostages to secure the fidelity of their parents.

They are transported over the Danube into the Roman empire.

During this suspension of a doubtful and distant negotiation, the impatient Goths were detained by one rash attempt to pass the Danube. The extreme necessity of the government, whose protection they had implored. Their motions were strictly observed by the vigilance of the troops which were stationed along the river; and their formost detachments were defeated with considerable slaughter; yet such was the timid counsels of the reign of Valens, that the brave officers by whom they had served their country in the execution of their duty, were punished by the loss of their employments, and narrowly escaped the loss of their heads. The imperial mandate was at length received for transporting over the Danube the whole body of the Goths nation; but the execution of this order, was a task of labour and difficulty. The stream of the Danube, which in those parts is above a mile broad, had been swelled by incessant rains; and, in this tumultuous passage, many were swept away, and drowned, by the rapid violence of the current. A large number of vessels, boats, and of canoes was provided; many days and nights they passed and repassed with inadequate toll; and the most strenuous diligence was exerted by the officers of Valens, that not a single barbarian of those who were reserved to subvert the foundations of Rome, should escape the perils of the shore. It was thought expedient that an accurate account should be taken of their numbers; but the persons who were employed soon desisted, with amazement and dismay, from the prosecution of the endless and impracticable task and the principal historian of the age most seriously affirmed that the protrusions of Darius and Aëxes, which had so long been considered as the fables of vain and credulous antiquity, were now justified, in the eyes of mankind, by the evidence of fact and experience. A probable testimony has fixed the number of the Gothic warriors at two hundred thousand men; and if we can venture to add the just proportion of women, of children, and of slaves, the whole mass, of the people which composed this formidable emigration, must have amounted to near a million of persons, of both sexes, and of all ages. The children of the Goths were arranged in the ranks of a distinguished rank, were separated from the multitude. They were not, without delay, to the distant seats assigned for their residence and education; and as the numerous train of hostages or captives passed through the cities, their gay and splendid apparel, their robust and martial figure, their presence made a graver impression on the minds of the Romans, than the military precipitancy of Tacitus. But the stipulation, the most offensive to the Goths, and the most important to the Romans, was shamefully eluded. The barbarians, who considered their arms as the emblems of honour, and the pledges of safety, were disposed to offer a price, which the lost or avowed disgrace of the imperial officers was easily computed to except. To preserve their arms, the haughty warriors consented, with some reluctance, to prostitute their wives or their daughters; the charms of a beauteous maid, or a comely boy, secured the compliance of the imprudent captives, who sometimes cast an eye of clevetousness, on the fringed carpets and linen garments of their new allies, who sacrificed their duty to the mean consideration of filling their camps with cattle, and their houses with slaves. The Goths, with arms in their hands, were permitted to enter the boats; and, when their strength was collected on the other side of the river, the immense camp which was spread over the plains and the hills of the Lower Mesia, assumed a form and appearance of the Ostrogoths, Alans and Spathars, the guardians of their infant king, appeared soon afterwards on the northern banks of the Danube; and immediately despatched their ambassadors to the court of Antioch, to solicit with the same professions of allegiance and gratitude, and the same spectacles of magnificence, that the suppliant Visigoths. The absolute refusal of Valens suspended their progress, and discovered the repentence, the suspicions, and the fears, of the imperial council.

An undisciplined and unsettled nation. Their distress of barbarians required the finest temper, and discipline, and the most dexterous management. The daily subsistence of near a million of extraordinary subjects could be supplied only by constant and skilful diligence, and might continually be interrupted by mischance or enemy. The incidence, or the indignation, of the Goths, if they conceived, or suspected the objects, either of fear, or of contempt, might urge them to the most desperate extremities; and the fortune of the state seemed to depend on the prudence, as well as the integrity, of the generals of Valens. At this imminent crisis of the empire, Thrace was exercised by Lupicius and Maximius, in whose minds the slightest hope of private emolument outweighed every consideration of public advantage; and whose guilt was only alleviated by their incapacity of discerning the pernicious effects of their rash and unjustifiable attempts. By the unworthy and unnecessaries of their sovereign, and satisfying, with decent liberality, the demands of the Goths, they levied an ungenerous and oppressive tax on the wants of the hungry barbarians. The vilest food was sold at an extravagant price; and, in the room of wholesome and subsisting provisions, the markets were filled with the flesh of dogs, and of unclean animals, who had died of disease. To obtain the valuable acquisition of a pound of bread, the Goths resigned the possession of an inexpressibly, though servile, slave; and a small quantity of meat was greedily purchased with ten pounds of a precious, but useless, precious metal. When their property was exhausted, they continued this necessary traffic by the sale of their sons and daughters; and notwithstanding the love of freedom, which animated every Gothic breast, they submitted to the indigence of betrothal, and their children might be maintained in a servile condition, than to perish in a state of wretched and helpless independence. The most lively resentment is excited by the tyranny of pretended benefactors, who sternly exact the debt of gratitude which they have cancelled by subsequent injuries, and the spirit of discontent assiduously ares in the camp of the barbarians, who pleaded without success the merit of their patient and dutiful behaviour, and loudly complained of the inhospitable treatment which they had received from their new allies. They beheld around them the wealth and plenty of a fertile province, in the midst of which they suffered the intolerable hardships of artificial famine. But the means of relief, and even of revenge, were in their hands; since the rapaciousness of their tyrants had left, to an injur-distance from the dangerous temptation which might so easily be communicated by the neighbourhood, and the success, of their countrymen. The respectful submissiveness which they yielded to the order of their march, might be considered as a proof of their fidelity; and their moderate request of a sufficient allowance of provisions, and of a delay of only two days, was expressed in the most dutiful terms. But the first magistrate of Hadrianople, incensed by some disorders which had occurred among the inhabitants of the city, and the municipality which he believed to have been corrupted by the desire of wealth and profit, though he did not mean to confude this indulgence; and anathematizing against them the inhabitants and manufacturers of a populous city, he urged, with hostile threats, their instant departure. The barbarians stood silent and amazed, till they were exasperated by the insulting clamours, and mischievous threats. But when patience or compunction was fatigued, they crushed the undisguised malice of the multitude, inflicted many a shameful wound on the backs of their flying enemies, and despoiled them of the splendid armours, which they were unworthy to boast of. The vengeance of their sufferings and their actions soon united this victorious detachment to the nation of the Visigoths; the troops of Celias and Surid expected the approach of the great Frigirgern, ranged themselves under his standard, and signalized their ardour in the siege of Hadrianople. But the resistance of the Visigoths alarmed the barbarians, that, in the attack of regular fortifications, the efforts of unskilful courage are seldom effectual. Their general acknowledged his error, raised the siege, declared that he was at peace with stone walls, and revenged his disappointment on the adjacent country. He accepted, with a grateful expression of friendly concord, the advantages of hardy workmen, who laboured in the gold mines of Thrace, for the emolument, and under the lash, of an unfeeling master; and these new associates conducted the barbarians, through the secret paths, to the most sequestered places, which had been chosen to secure this inhuman treatment, and the inhuman revenge of corn importers, without the assistance of such guides, nothing could remain impervious or inaccessible: resistance was fruitless; flight was impracticable; and the patient submission of helpless innocence seldom found mercy from the barbarians. In the course of their operations, a great number of the children of the Goths, who had been sold into captivity, were restored to the embraces of their afflicted parents; but these tender interviews, which might have revived and cherished in their minds some sentiments of humanity, tended only to give the greater emotion of revenge. They listened, with eager attention, to the complaints of their captive children, who had suffered the most cruel indignities from the lustful and angry passions of their masters, and the same cruelties, the same indignities, were severely retaliated on the sons and daughters of the Romans.

Operations of the Gothic war. The ministers who had introduced into the heart of the empire a nation of enemies; but the Visigoths might even yet have been reconciled, by the many confession of past errors, and the sincere promise of former engagements. These healing and temperate measures seemed to concord with the timorous disposition of the sovereign of the east; but, on this occasion alone, Valens was brave; and his unreasonable bravery was fatal to himself and to his subjects. The sacred order of the Gothic war was suspended. The Antioch to Constantinople, to subdue this dangerous rebellion; and, as he was not ignorant of the difficulties of the enterprise, he solicited the assistance of his nephew, the emperor Gratian, who commanded all the forces of the west. The veteran troops were hastily assembled, the money was voted; but when the enemy appeared, they were joined by Richomer, count of the dominions; and the auxiliaries of the west, that marched under his banner, were composed of the Gallic legions, reduced indeed by a spirit of desolation, to the vain appearances of strength and numbers. Yet, and the Gothic war, which was influenced by pride, rather than by reason, it was resolved to seek, and to encounter, the barbarians; who lay encamped in the spacious and fertile meadows, near the most southern of the six mouths of the Danube. Their camp was surrounded by the usual fortifications of wagons and the barbarians, secure within the vast circle of the enclosure, enjoyed the fruits of their valor, and the spoils of the province. In the midst of rictous intemperance, the watchful Frigirgern observed the motions, and penetrated the designs, of the Romans. He perceived, that the number of the enemy was continually increasing; and, as he understood their intention of attacking his rear, as soon as the scarcity of rations should oblige him to remove his camp; he recalled to their standard his predatory detachments, which covered the adjacent country. As soon as they descried the flaming beacons of the vanguard of the invaders, they depicted the glory of their forefathers, mingled with their fierce and dissolute outcries; and opposed to the artificial harmony of the Roman shout. Some military skill was displayed by Frittirgern to gain the advantage of a commanding eminence; but the bloody conflict, which began and ended with the light, was manifested, on either side, by the personal and obstinate efforts of strength, valour, and agility. The legions of Armenia supported their fame in arms; but they were oppressed by the irresistible weight of the hostile multitude; the left wing of the Romans was thrown into disorder, and the late advances of their mangled carcases. This partial defeat was balanced, however, by partial success; and when the two armies, at a late hour of the evening, retreated to their respective camps, neither of them could claim the honour, or the effects, of a decisive victory. The real loss was more severely felt by the Romans, in proportion to the smallness of their numbers; but the Goths were so deeply confounded and dismayed, by this vigorous, and perhaps unexpected, resistance, that they remained seven days within the circle of their fortifications. Such funeral rites, as the circumstance of the time and place, permitted, were performed by the victors, and some officers of distinguished rank; but the indiscriminate vulgar were left unburied on the plain. Their flesh was greedily devoured by the birds of prey who, in that age, enjoyed very frequent and delicious feasts; and several years afterwards the spot remained unaltered on the widest extent of the fields, presented to the eyes of Ammianus, a dreadful monument of the battle of Salicium.

The progress of the Goths had been checked by the doubtful event of that bloody day; and the imperial generals, whose army would have been consumed by the repetition of such a contest, embraced the more rational plan, of destroying the barbarians, by the wants and pressure of their own multitudes. They prepared to confine the Visigoths in the narrow angle of land, between the Danube and the Rhodope; and the mountains of Haemus, till their strength and spirit should be insensibly wasted by the inevitable operation of famine. The design was prosecuted with some conduct and success; the barbarians had almost exhausted their own magazines, and the harvests of the country; and the division of the empire, consisting of the master-general of the cavalry, was employed to improve the strength, and to contract the extent, of the Roman fortifications. His labours were interrupted by the alarming intelligence, that new swarms of barbarians had passed the unguarded Danube, either to support the causes, or to imitate the example of the Fril- gern. The just apprehension, that himself might be surrounded, and overwhelmed, by the arms of hostile and unknown nations, compelled Saturninus to relinquish the siege of the Gothic camp; and the indig- nant Visigoths, breaking from their confinement, satura- ted his hunger and revenge by the repeated devastation of the fruitful country, which extends above three hundred miles from the banks of the Danube to the straits of the Hellespont. The sagacious Fritigern had successfully appealed to the passions, as well as to the interest, of his barbarian allies; and the love of plunder and of the old Kynus, which was divided between the two nations, prevented, the elopement of his ambassadors. He com- mented a strict and useful alliance with the great body of his countrymen, who obeyed Alatheus and Saphrax as the guardians of their infant king; the long animosity of rival tribes was suspended by the sacrifice of royalty and of certain captives; the possession of the nation was associated under one standard; and the chiefs of the Ostrogoths appear to have yielded to the superior genius of the general of the Visigoths. He obtained the formidable aid of the Tafalke, whose military renown was disgraced and polluted by the pursuit of his former domestic seditions. He employed Fritigern, the youth, on his entrance into the world, was united by the ties of honourable friendship, and brutal love, to some warrior of the tribe; nor could he hope to be released from this unnatural connexion, till he had appeased his adversary by paying, in anguish, death, or a wild bear of the forest.

Victory of Gra- menees of the introduction of the barbari- ans into the army and the palace, was sensibly felt in their correspondence with Marcus, their hostile countrymen; to whom they imprudently, or maliciously, revealed the weakness of the Roman empire. A soldier, of the life guards of Gratian, was of the nation of the Alemanni, and of the tribe of the Lentienses, who dwelt beyond the lake of Constance. His life oblige him to the public, as sacrifice of absence. In a short visit to his family and friends, he was exposed to their various inquiries; and the vanity of the loquacious soldier tempted him to display his intimate acquaintance with the secrets of the state, and the designs of his master. The intelligence, that Gratian's expedition was given up to the interests of Gaul, and of the father, to the assistance of his uncle Valens, pointed out to the restless spirit of the Ale- manni, the moment, and the mode, of a successful invasion. The enterprise of some light detachments, who, in the month of February, passed the Iffine upon the ice, was the signal for the mass. The first, with the boldest hopes of rapine, perhaps of conquest, out- weighed the considerations of timid prudence, or national faith. Every forest, and every village, poured forth a band of hardy adventurers; and the great army of the Alemanni, which, on their approach, was estimated at forty thousand men by the fears of the people, was afterwards magnified to the number of seventy thousand, by the vain and credulous flattery of the imperial court. The legions, which had been ordered to march into Pannonia, were immediately recalled, or detained, for the defence of Gaul; the military com- mittee of the three Augusti, with their divisions, was transferred to the Alemanni; and the youthful emperor, though he respected the long experience and soverign wisdom of the former, was much more inclined to admire, and to follow, the martial ar- mour of his colleague; who was allowed to unite the incompatible characters of count of the domestics, and king of the barbarians. His success was not impeded by the Alemanni, was guided, or rather impelled by the same headstrong valor; and as their troops were animated by the spirit of their leaders, they met, they saw, they encountered, each other, near the town of Argentaria, or Colmar, in the plains of Alsace. The glory of the day was justly ascribed to the missile weapons, and well-practised evolutions, of the Roman soldiers; the Alemanni, who maintained their ground, were slaughtered with unremitting fury: five thousand only of the barbarians escaped to the woods and mountains; and the glorious death of their king, the people, to save him from the reproaches of the people, who are always disposed to accuse the justice, or policy, of an unsuccessful war. After this signal victory, which secured the peace of Gaul, and asserted the honour of the Roman arms, the emperor Gratian appeared to proceed without delay on his eastern expedition; but as he approached the confines of the Alemanni, he suddenly inclined to the left, surprised them by his unexpected passage of the Rhine, and boldly advanced into the heart of their country. The barbarians opposed to his progress the obstinacy of nature and of courage; and still continued to retreat, from one hill to another, till they were satisfied, by repeated trials, of the power and perseverance of their enemies. Their submission was accepted, as a proof, not indeed of their sincere repentance, but of the actual distress by which they were encompassed and of courage and of youth was excited from the faithless nation, as the most substantial pledge of their future moderation. The subjects of the empire, who had so often experienced that the Alemanni could neither be subdued by arms, nor restrained by treaties, might not look for any solid or lasting tranquillity; but they discovered, in the virtues of their young sovereign, the prospect of a long and auspicious reign. When the legions climbed the mountains, and sealed the fortifications, of the barbarians, the valour of Gratinian was disdained in the foremost ranks; and the gilt and variegated armour of his guards was pierced and shattered by the blows, which they had received in their constant attachment to the person of their sovereign. At the age of nineteen, the son of Valentinian seemed to possess the talents of science and war; and his impecunious success against the Alemanni was interpreted as a sure presage of his Gothic triumphs.1 Valens marches against the Goths, A.D. 378.

While Gratian deserved and enjoyed the applause of his subjects, the emperor Valens, who, at length, had removed his court and army from Antioch, was received by the people of Constantinople as the author of the public calamity. Before he had reposed himself ten days in the capital, he was urged by the licentious clamours of the Hippodrome, to march against the Goths, in which he had invincible reasons: and the citizens, who were always brave at a distance from any real danger, declared, with confidence, that, if they were supplied with arms, they alone would undertake to deliver the province from the ravages of an insulting foe.2 The vain reproaches of an ignorant multitude hastened to downfall the empire; they provoked the desperate rashness of Valens; who did not find, either in his reputation, or in his mind, any motives to support with firmness the public contempt. He was soon persuaded, by the successful views of his lieutenants, to despise the power of the enemy, who, by the desertion of Fritigern, were now collected in the neighbourhood of Hadrianople. The march of the Taifales had been intercepted by the valiant Figerid; the king of those licentious barbarians was slain in the battle; and the suppliant captives were sent into distant exile to cultivate the lands of Italy, which were assigned for their settlement, in the vacant territories of Modena and Parma.3

The exploits of Sebastian, who was recently engaged in the service of Valens, and promoted to the rank of major-general of the army, were still more honourable to himself, and useful to the public. He obtained the permission of selecting three hundred soldiers from each of the legions; and this separate detachment soon acquired the spirit of discipline, and the exercise of arms, which were almost forgotten under the reign of Valens. By the vigour and conduct of Sebastian, a large body of the Goths was surprised in their encampment, and the immeasurable numbers which were presegeded from their hands, filled the city of Hadrianople, and the adjacent plain. The splendid narratives, which the general transmitted of his own exploits, alarmed the imperial court by the appearance of superior merit; and the great obstacle of the Goths was removed. The march from Constantinople to Hadrianople was conducted with so much military skill, that he prevented the activity of the barbarians, who designed to occupy the intermediate defiles, and to intercept either the troops of the emperor, or the convoy of supplies. He lay down his arms, or to employ them only in the defence of the empire; if he could secure for his wandering countrymen, a tranquil settlement on the waste lands of Thrace, and a sufficient allowance of corn and cattle. But he added, in a whisper of confidential friendship, that the tyrant of the Goths was disposed to reason with the emperor on reasonable conditions; and that Fritigern was doubtful whether he could accomplish the conclusion of the treaty, unless he found himself supported by the presence, and terrors, of an imperial army. About the same time, count Richomer returned from the Rhine to announce the defeat and submission of the Alemanni; to inform Valens, that his nephew advanced by rapid marches at the head of the veteran and victorious legions of Gaul; and to request, in the name of Gratian and of the republic, that every generous and decisive measure by the means of the barbarians was of the first importance, for the advantage of both emperors, and the safety of the empire. But the feeble sovereign of the east was actuated only by the fatal illusions of pride and jealousy. He disdained the important advice; he rejected the humilitating aid; he secretly compared the ignominious, or at least the inglorious, period of his own reign, with the fame of a beardless youth; and Valens rushed into the field, to erect his imaginary trophy before the diligence of his colleague could usurp any share of the triumphs of the day. On the 24th of August, a day which has deserved to be marked among the most auspicious of the Roman calendar,2 emperor Valens, leaving, under

According to the accounts of Richomer, and even of Sebastian, the praise of Zosimus is disgrace. (Tilleius, Hist. des Empereurs, p. xiv. 1. p. 121.) His pride, his ignorance, and his ignorance undoubtedly render him a very questionable judge of merit.
4 Ammianus (xxi. 12, 13) almost alone describes the councils and actions which were terminated by the fatal battle of Hadrianople. We may consult the vices of his style, the disorder and perplexity of his narration.
A strong guard, his baggage and military treasures, every vestige of Hadraniopolis, the ancient palace, were engulfed about twelve miles from the city. By some mistake of the orders, or some ignorance of the ground, the right wing, or column of cavalry, arrived in sight of the enemy, whilst the left was still at a considerable distance; the soldiers were compelled, in the sultry heat of the day, to remain without provisions, and the line of battle was formed with tedious confusion, and irregular delay. The Gothic cavalry had been detached to forage in the adjacent country; and Fritigern still continued to practise his customary arts. He despatched messengers of peace, made proposals, received answers. The appearance of the Gothic files, and exposed without shelter to the burning rays of the sun, were exhausted by thirst, hunger, and intolerable fatigue. The emperor was persuaded to send an ambassador to the Gothic camp; the zeal of Richomer, who alone had courage to accept the dangerous commission, was applauded; and the court of the Teutonic princes, adorned with the splendid ensigns of his dignity, had proceeded some way in the space between the two armies, when he was suddenly recalled by the alarm of battle. The hasty and imprudent attack was made by Bacurius the Iberian, who commanded a body of Gothic foot, and by him the evidence of their rashness, they retreated with loss and disgrace. In the same moment, the flying squadrons of Abathecus and Saphrax, whose return was anxiously expected by the general of the Goths, descended like a whirlwind from the hills, swept across the plain, and added new terror; the tumultuous, but irresistible, charge of the barbarian host. The event of the battle of Hadraniopolis, so fatal to Valens and to the empire, may be

The defeat of described in a few words: the Roman the Romans. cavalry fled; the infantry was abandoned, surrounded, cut in pieces. The most skilful of the Roman commanders, are scarcely sufficient to extricate a body of foot, encompassed, on an open plain, by superior numbers of horse; but the troops of Valens, oppressed by the weight of the enemy and their own fears, were crowded into a narrow space, where it was impossible for them to extend their ranks, or even to use with effect, their swords and javelins. In the midst of tumult, of slaughter, and of dismay, the emperor, deserted by his guards, and wounded, as it was supposed, with an arrow, sought protection among the Lancelarii and the Matttharii, who still maintained their ground with some appearance of order and firmness; but they were soon overcome. Victor, who perceived his danger, loudly exclaimed, that all was lost, unless the person of the emperor could be saved. Some troops, animated by their exhortation, advanced to his relief: they found only a bloody spot, covered with a heap of broken arms and mangled bodies, without being able to discover their unfortunate prince, either among the living or the dead. Their search could not, indeed, be successful; if there is any truth in the circumstances with which

Death of the some historians have related the death emperors Valens of the emperor. By the care of his3 attendants, Valens was conveyed to a neighbouring cottage, where they attempted to dress his wound, and to provide for his future safety. But this humble retreat was instantly surrounded by the enemy; they tried to force the door; they were prevented by a discharge of arrows, and, at last, by a hurricane of fire; they set fire to a pile of dry faggots, and consumed the cottage with the Roman emperor and his train. Valens perished in the flames; and a youth, who dropped from the window, alone escaped, to attest the melancholy tale, and to inform the

of his narrative; but we must now take leave of this imperial historian; and reproach is silenced by our regret for such an irreparable loss.

The difference of the eight miles of Ammianus, and the twelve of Idomene, can only embarrass those critics, (Valens ad loc.) who suppose a great army to be a mathematical point, without space or dimensions.

Goths of the inestimable prize which they had lost by the substitution of their own rashness. A great number of brave and distinguished officers perished in the battle of Hadraniopolis, which equalled, in the actual loss, and far surpassed, in the fatal consequences, the misfortune which Rome had formerly sustained in the fields of Cannae. Two master-generals of the cavalry and infantry, two great commanders of the optimates and dissidents, were found among the slain; and the death of Sebastian might satisfy the world, that he was the victim, as well as the author, of the public calamity. Above two-thirds of the Roman army were destroyed; and the darkness of the night was esteemed a very favourable circumstance; the Huns, two-thirds of them, opposed to their multitude, and to protect the more orderly retreat of Victor and Richomer, who alone, amidst the general consternation, maintained the advantage of calm courage, and regular discipline.

While the impressions of grief and funeral oration terror were still recent in the minds of valorous men, the most celebrated rhetorician of army, the age composed the funeral oration of a vanquished army, and of an unpopular prince, whose throne was already occupied by a stronger. "There are not wanting," says the candid Libanius, "those who arraign the conduct of those who impute the public misfortune to the want of courage and discipline in the troops. For my own part, I reverence the memory of their former exploits: I reverence the glorious death, which they bravely received, standing and fighting in their ranks: I reverence the field of battle, stained with their blood, and the blood of the barbarians. Those honourable marks have been annexed to the very rain away by the rains; but the lofty monuments of their bones, the bones of generals, of centurions, and of valiant warriors, claim a longer period of duration. The king himself fought and fell in the foremost ranks of the battle. The troop of mounted envoys who presented him with the fleetest horses of the imperial stable, that they might have carried him beyond the pursuit of the enemy. They vainly pressed him to reserve his important life for the service of the republic. He still declared that he was unworthy to survive so many of the bravest and most faithful of his subjects; and the monarch was nobly buried under a mountain of the slain. Let none, therefore, press to ascribe the victory of the barbarians to the fear, the weakness, or the imputation, of the Roman troops. The chiefs and the soldiers were animated by the virtue of their ancestors, whom they esteemed in different forms and situations. This generous emulation was supported by the love of glory, which prompted them to contend at the same time with heat and thirst, with fire and the sword; and cheerfully to embrace an honourable death, as their refuge against flight and infamy. The indignation of the gods has been the only cause of the success of our enemies." The truth of history may disclose some parts of this paeanic, which cannot strictly be reconciled with the character of Valens, or the circumstances of the battle: but the fairest commendation is due to the eloquence, and still more to the generosity of their conduct.

The pride of the Goths was elated by the Goth besiege Hadraniopolis of this memorable victory; but their avarice was disappointed by the mortifying discovery, that the richest part of the imperial spoil had been

per. In the space of about twelve years, their numbers had gradually increased; and the children, who, in the first emigration, were sent over the Hellespont, had attained, with rapid growth, the strength and spirit of perfect manhood. It was impossible to conceal from their knowledge the events of the Gothic war, the stir, the noise and excitement of the city, the language of dissimulation, by which they betrayed their wish, their desire, perhaps their intention, to emulate the glorious example of their fathers. The danger of the times seemed to justify the jealous suspicions of the provincials; and these suspicions were admitted as unquestionable truths, that the Gothic Asia had formed a secret and determined conspiracy for the destruction of the state and the safety. The death of Valens had left the east without a sovereign; and Julius, who filled the important station of master-general of the troops, with a high reputation of diligence and ability, thought it his duty to consult the senate of Constantinople; which he considered, during the vacancy of the throne, as the representative council of the nation. As soon as he had obtained the discretionary power of acting as he should judge most expedient for the good of the republic, he assembled the principal officers; and privately concerted effectual measures for the execution of his purpose, in a judicial and imperial court. The conspiracy was not detected or revealed, till the emperor had solved that, on a stated day, the Gothic youth should assemble in the capital cities of their respective provinces, and, as a report was industriously circulated, that they were summoned to receive a liberal gift of lands and money, the pleasing hope alarmed the fury of their resentment, and, perhaps, suspended the motions of the conspiracy. On the appointed day, the unarmed crowd of the Gothic youth was carefully collected in the square, or forum; the streets and avenues were occupied by the Roman troops; and the roofs of the houses were covered with archers and slingers. At the same hour, in all the cities of the east, the consul ordered an armed body to be collected; and the provinces of Asia were delivered, by the cruel prudence of Julius, from a domestic enemy, who, in a few months, might have carried fire and sword from the Hellespont to the Euphrates. The urgent consideration of the public safety may undoubtedly authorize the violation of every personal law. How far that, or any other, consideration, may operate, to dissolve the natural obligations of humanity and justice, is a doctrine of which I shall desire to remain ignorant.

The emperor Gratian was far advanced in age, and in his march towards the plains of Hadrianople, first by the confused voice of fame, and afterwards by the more accurate reports of Victor and Richomer, that his impatient colleague had been slain in battle, and that two-thirds of the Roman army were exterminated by the sword of the victorious Goth. Whenever resentment the rash and jealous vanity of his uncle might deserve, the resentment of a generous mind is easily subdued by the softer emotions of grief and compassion; and even the sense of pity was soon lost in the serious and alarming consideration of the state of the empire. Gratian was too late to assist, he was too weak to revenge, his unfortunate colleague; and the valiant and modest youth felt himself unequal to the support of a sinking world. A formidable tempest of the barbarians of Germany seemed ready to burst over the provinces of Gaul; and the mind of Gratian was oppressed and distracted by the administration of the western empire. In this important crisis, the government of the east, and the conduct of the Gothic war, required the undivided attention of a hero and a statesman. A subject invested with such ample command would not long have preserved his fidelity to a distant benefactor; and the imperial council embraced with the united voice the proposition of Gratian, who preferred the public service to the satisfaction of private interest, rather than of yielding to an insult. It was the wish of Gratian to bestow the purple as the reward of virtue; but, at the age of nineteen, it is not easy for a prince, educated in the supreme rank, to understand the true characters of his ministers and generals. He attempted to weigh with infinite difficulty the merits and defects; and whilst he checked the rash confidence of ambition, he distrusted the cautious wisdom, which despised of the republic. As each moment of delay diminished something of the power and resources of the future sovereign of the east, the situation of the times would not allow a tedious debate. The choice of Gratian was soon declared in favour of an exile, whose father, only three years before, had suffered, under the sanction of his authority, an unjust and ignominious death. The great Theodosius, a name celebrated in history, and dear to the catholic church, was summoned to the imperial council. The bitter jealousy of his name was deliriously confuses of Thrace to the more secure station of Sirium. Five months after the death of Valens, the emperor Gratian produced before the assembled troops, his colleague, and their master; who, after a modest, perhaps a sincere, resistance, was compelled to accept, amidst the general declarations, the diadem, the purple, and the equal title of Augustus.

The provinces of Thrace, Asia, and Egypt, over which Valens had reigned, were resigned to the administration of the new emperor; but, as he was specially intrusted with the conduct of the Gothic war, the Illyrian praefecture was dismembered; and the two great dioceses of Dalmatia, and Macedonia were added to the dominions of the eastern empire.

The same province, and, perhaps, the same city, which had given to the throne the virtues of Trajan, and the talents of Hadrian, was the original seat of another family of Hæronians, which had less fortunate age, possest, near fourscore years, the declining empire of Rome. They emerged from the obscurity of municipal honors by the active spirit of the elder Theodosius, a general, whose exploits in Britain and Africa have formed one of the most splendid pages of ancient Valentinian. The son of that general, who likewise bore the name of Theodosius, was educated, by skilful preceptors, in the liberal studies of youth; but he was instructed in the art of war by the tender care and severe discipline of his father. It is not without the most sincere regret, that I must now take leave of an accurate and faithful guide, who has composed the history of his own times, without indulging the prejudices and passions, which usually affect the mind of a contemporary. Ammianus Marcellinus (Hist. xvi. 15. 3) has informed his readers, that after the defeat and death of Valens, recommends the more glorious subject of the ensuing reign to the youthful vigour and eloquence of the rising generation. The rising generation was not disposed to accept his advice, or to imitate his example; and, in the study of the reign of Theodosius, the desire of acquiring knowledge from the narrative of Zosimus, by the obscure hints of fragments and chronicles, by the figurative style of poetry or panegyric, and by the precious assistance of the ecclesiastical writers, who, in the heat of religious faction, are apt to despise the profane virtues of sincerity and moderation. Consciousness of these disadvantages, which, will continue to involve a considerable portion of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, I shall proceed with doubtful and numerous steps. Yet I may boldly pronounce, that the battle of Hadrianople was never, by any signal or decisive victory of Theodosius over his enemies; and even the expression of his venal orators may be confirmed by the observation of the condition and circumstances of the times. The fabric of a mighty state which has been reared by the labours of successive ages, could not be dissolved by the exertions of a single generation. The ambition of the conqueror, the pride of the vanquished, the overpowering influence of the imagination did not exaggerate the real measure of the calamity. The loss of forty thousand Romans, who fell in the plains of Hadrianople, might have been soon recruited in the populous provinces of the east, which contained so many millions of inhabitants. The complaints of the subject against the ruler of such a great and most common, quality of human nature; and sufficient skill to encounter an undisguised foe, might have been speedily taught by the care of the surviving centurions. If the barbarians were mounted on their horses, and equipped with the armour of their vanquished enemies. Numerous bands of Cappadocia and Spain would have supplied new squadrons of cavalry; the thirty-four arsenals of the empire were plentifully stored with magazines of offensive and defensive arms; and the wealth of Asia might still have yielded an ample fund to defray the expenses of the operations which were produced by the battle of Hadrianople on the minds of the barbarians, and of the Romans, extended the victory of the former, and the defeat of the latter, far beyond the limits of a single day. A Gothic chief was heard to declare, with insolent moderation, that he gave his own part of the field to the slaughter; but that he was astonished how a people, who fed before him like a flock of sheep, could still presume to dispute the possession of their treasures and provinces. The same terrors, which the name of the Huns had spread among the Gothic tribes, was inspired, by the formidable name of the Goths, among the subjects and soldiers of the Roman empire. If Theodosius, hastily collecting his scattered forces, had led them into the field to encounter a victorious enemy, the prudent and successful commander, who had his army would have been vanquished by their own fears; and his rashness could not have been excused by the chance of success. But the great Theodosius, an epithet which he honourably deserved on this momentous occasion, conducted himself as the firm and faithful guardian of the republic. He fixed his headquarters probably in the imperial city himself, and the bishopric of the See diocese; b from whence he could watch the irregular motions of the barbarians, and direct the operations of his lieutenants, from the gates of Constantinople to the shores of the Hiatric. The fortifications and garrisons of the cities were strengthened; and the troops, among whom he was enabled by the delays occasioned by the contested elections, were insensibly inholed by the confidence of their own safety. From these secure stations, they were encouraged to make frequent sallies on the barbarians, who infested the adjacent country; and, as they were seldom allowed to engage, without some decisive superiority, either of ground or of numbers, their enterprises were, for the most part, successful; and they were soon convinced, by their own experience, of the possibility of vanquishing their invisible enemies. The detachments of these separate garrisons were gradually united into small armies; the same cautious movement was continued, and the troops were immersed in a well-concerted plan of operations; the events of each day added strength and spirit to the Roman arms; and the artful diligence of the emperor, who circulated the most favourable reports of the success of the war, contributed to subdue the pride of the barbarians, and to animate the hopes and courage of his subjects. If, instead of this faint and imperfect outline, we could accurately represent the counsels and actions of Theodosius, in four successive campaigns, there is reason to believe, that his consummate skill would deserve the applause of every military reader. The republic had been ill treated to past; the time was a season, while the splendid trophies of Scipio, in the field of Zama, attract the eyes of posterity, the camps and marches of the dictator among the hills of Campania, may claim a juster proportion of the solid and independent fame, which the general is not compelled to share, either with fortune or his troops. Such was likewise the merit of Theodosius; and the infin-imites of his body, which most unseasonably languished under a long and dangerous disease, could not oppress the vigour of his mind, or divert his attention from the public service.

The deliverance and peace of the Roman provinces 4 was the work of prudence, rather than of valour; the prudence of Theodosius was seconded by fortunes; and the emperor never failed to seize, and to improve, every favourable circumstance. As long as the superior genius of Fritigern preserved the union, and directed the motions, of the barbarians, their power was not inadequate to the conquest of a great empire. The death of that hero, the predecessor and master of the renowned Alaric, relieved an impatient multitude from the irksome yoke of discipline and discretion. The funeral of Athanaric was performed with solemn rites in the capital of the east; a stately monotonous march, attended by his whole army, won by the liberal courtesy, and decent grief, of Theodosius, enlisted under the standard of the Roman empire. The submission of so great a body of the Visigoths was productive of the most salutary consequences; and the mixed influence of force, of reason, and of clemency decamped every prospect of power, and more extensive. Each independent chieftain hastened to obtain a separate treaty, from the apprehension that an obstinate delay might expose him, alone and unprotected, to the revenge, or justice, of the conqueror. The general, or rather the final, capitulation of the Goths, may be dated four years, or one month, and twenty-five days, after the defeat and death of the emperor Valens. I

The provinces of the Danube had been already relieved from the oppressive weight of the Gotthungi, or Ostrogoths, by the valour of Albarthus and Saphax; whose restless spirit had prompted them to seek new scenes of rapine and glory. Their destructive course was pointed towards the west; but we must be satisfied with a very obscure and imperfect knowledge of their various adventures. The Ostrogoths impelled several of the German tribes on the provinces of Gaul; concluded, and soon violated, a treaty with the emperor Gratian; advanced into the unknown countries of the north; and, after an interval of more than four years, returned, with accumulated force, to the banks of the Lech, and Danube. Their troops were recruited with the fiercest warriors of Germany and Scythia; and the soldiers, or at least the historians, of the empire, no longer recognised the name and countenances of their former enemies. The general, who commanded the military and naval powers of the Roman frontier, now perceived that his superiority would be disadvantageous to the public service; and that the barbarians, awed by the presence of his fleet and legions, would probably defer the passage of the river till the approaching winter. The fear of the spies, whom he sent into the Gothic camp, allured the barbarians into a fatal snare. They were persuaded, that, by a bold attempt, they might surprise, in the silence and darkness of the night, the sleeping army of the Romans; and the whole multitude was hastily embarked in a fleet of three hundred vessels. The fear of the Ostrogoths led the van; the main body consisted of the remainder of their subjects and soldiers; and the women and children securely followed in the rear. One of the nights without a moon had been selected for the execution of their design; and they had almost reached the southern bank of the Danube, in the firm confidence that they should find an easy landing, and an unguarded camp. But the progress of the barbarians was suddenly stopped by an unexpected obstacle; a triple line of vessels, strongly connected with each other, which formed an imperceptible chain of two miles and a half along the river. While they struggled to force their way in the unequal conflict, their right flank was overwhelmed by the irresistible attack of a fleet of galleys, which were urged down the stream by the united impulse of oars and of the tide. The weight and velocity of those ships of war broke, and sunk, and dispersed, the rude and feeble canoes of the barbarians. The Goths, in despair, and amidst the most horrid shrieks, attempted to land by means of elevated branches, which they formed into the shape of a boat, with the admeasurement of 60 cubits. I am justified, by reason and example, in applying this Indian maxim to the Visigoths. Alexander the great, in two campaigns, reduced all the barbarians in the course of a short winter, after some desperate battles, into the shape of a boat, with the measurement of 60 cubits. Zosimus, i. iv. 263. Fusaequm quondam transe Gruthangui; in flures fugere noxiam; trans mile rabidant. Per division plena causa ruinamuis alius Claudian. iv. iv. Cons. Rom. 653.
The public was guarded, or threatened, by the doubtful sword of the barbarians, the last sparks of the military flame were finally extinguished in the minds of the Romans. Theodosius had the address to persuade his adherents. He considered these two foes as having been frightened from him by prudence and necessity, were the voluntary expressions of his sincere friendship for the Gothic nation. A different mode of vindication or apology was opposed to the complaints of the people; who loudly censured these shameful and dangerous excursions. The calumnies only of the war were to be found in the most lively colours; and the first symptoms of the return of order, of plenty, and security, were diligently exaggerated. The advocates of Theodosius could affirm with some appearance of truth and reason, that it was impossible to extinguish so many war-like tribes, who were rendered desperate by the loss of their native country; and that the exhausted provinces would be revived by a fresh supply of soldiers and husbandmen. The barbarians still wore an angry and hostile aspect; but the experience of past times might encourage the hope, that they would acquire the habits of the industry and peace, of which their masters would be polished by time, education, and the influence of Christianity; and that their posterity would insensibly blend with the great body of the Roman people.

Their hostile appearances resumed. Notwithstanding these specious arguments and flattering expectations, it was apparent to every discerning eye, that the Goths would long remain the enemies, and might soon become the conquerors, of the Roman empire. Their rude and insolent behaviour expressed their contempt of the citizens and provincials, whom they insulted with impunity. To the zeal and valor of the barbarians, Theodosius was indebted for the success of his arms; but their assistance was precarious; and they were sometimes seduced, by a treacherous and inconsistent disposition, to abandon his standard, at the moment when their service was the most essential. During the civil war against Maximus, a great number of Gothic deserters retired into the provinces of Macedonia, wasted the adjacent provinces, and obliged the intrepid monarch to expose his person, and exert his power, to suppress the rising flame of rebellion. The public apprehensions were fortified by the strong assurances of assaults were necessary for the security of the imperial passion, but the result of deep and premeditated design. It was generally believed, that the Goths had signed the treaty of peace with an honest and insidious spirit; and that their chiefs had previously bound themselves, by a solemn and secret oath, never to keep faith with the Romans; to maintain the fairest show of loyalty and friendship, and to watch the favourable moment of rapine, of conquest, and of revenge. But, as the minds of the barbarians were not insensible to the power of gratitude, several of the Gothic leaders sincerely devoted themselves to the service of the empire, or, at least, of the emperor: the whole nation was insensibly divided into two opposite factions, and much sophistry was employed in conversation and dispute, to compare the obligations of their first, and second, engagements. The Goths, who confided themselves, were misled and duped. Both Gratian, and of Rome, were directed by the authority of Prævitta, a valiant and honourable youth, distinguished above the rest of his countrymen, by the politeness of his manners, the liberality of his sentiments, and the mild virtues of social life. But the more numerous faction adhered to the deceits of Maximus; Prævitta, who inflamed the passions, and asserted the independence of his warlike followers. On one of the solemn festivals, when the chiefs of both parties were invited to the imperial table, they were insensibly heated by wine, till they forgot the usual restraints of discretion and respect; and betrayed, in the presence of Theodosius, the fatal secret of their domestic disputes. The emperor, who had been the reluctant witness of this extraordinary controversy, dissembled his fears and resentment, and soon dismissed the tumultuous assembly. Prævitta, alarmed and exasperated by the insolence of his rival, whose departure from the palace might have been the signal of a civil war, boldly followed him; and, drawing his sword, laid Prævitta dead at his feet. Their companions flew to arms; and the faithful champion of Rome would have been oppressed by superior numbers, if he had not been protected by the reasonable interposition of the imperial guards.

Such were the plots of barbarism, which disgraced the palace and table of the Roman emperor; and, as the impassant Goths could only be restrained by the firm and temperate character of Theodosius, the public safety seemed to depend on the life and abilities of a single man.

of his character and conduct, may be imputed to the arts of flattery, which had besieged the son of Val- ebruary 23rd, 363. The Emperor, having been provoked to resent their peculiar injuries. As long as the young emperor was guided by the instructions of his masters, he professed himself the friend and pupil of the soldiers; many of his hours were spent in the familiar conversation of the camp; and the health, the costume, the manners, the virtues, the eloquence, and the talents of himself and those skilful masters of every science, and of every art, had laboured to form the mind and body of the young prince. The knowledge which they painfully communicated was displayed with ostentation, and cele-b A Valentinian was less attentive to the religion of his son: since he intrusted the education of Gratus to Anianus, a pious pagan. (Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xiv. p. 182-183.) The poetical fame of Anianus condemns the taste of his age.

2 Ananius was successively promoted to the rank of prefect of Italy, (A. D. 327.) and of grain, (A. 373.) and was at length in-igin, and that which was ascribed to the divine power in the mouth of the saint, their only object was to preserve the public peace, and to stifle the tumultuary spirit of the people, which was growing too strong for the patience of the new and inexperienced emperor. His name was fixed on the sacred lists of the Church, and he was universally adored after his death, by the feble court of Milan.

find some evidence for the marriage, which he is said to have contracted with the daughter of a wealthy lord of Gaul, that the child, which is justly considered as a state of exile and obscurity; and if Maximus had obtained any civil or military office, he was not invested with the authority either of governor or general. His abilities, and even his integrity, are acknowledged by the partial writers of the age. His numerous reputation has been conspicuous, that could extort such a confession in favour of the vanquished enemy of Theodosius. The discontent of Maximus might incline him to censure the conduct of his sovereign, and to encourage, perhaps without any views of ambition, the murmurs of the troops. But the long residence of his family, and the fact of his having, from motives of interest or necessity, refused to ascend the throne; and some credit appears to have been given to his own positive declaration, that he was compelled to accept the dangerous present of the imperial purple.

But there was danger likewise in rejecting Gratian, fusing the empire; and from the moment that Maximus had violated his allegiance to his lawful sovereign, he could not hope to reign, or even to live, if he confined his moderate ambition within the narrow limits of Britain. He boldly and wisely resolved to prevent the designs of Gratian; the youth of the island was no obstacle; and so, when Gaul was a fleet and army, which were long afterwards remembered, as the emigration of a considerable part of the British nation. The emperor, in his peaceable residence of Paris, was alarmed by their hostile approach; and the darts which he idly wasted on limbs which could not be made to move, were uselessly hurled against the rebels. But his feeble efforts announced his degenerate spirit and desperate situation; and deprived him of the resources, which he still might have found, in the support of his subjects and allies. The armies of Gaul, instead of opposing the march of Maximus, received him with joyful and loyal acclamations; and the shame of the desertion was transferred from the people to the prince. The troops, whose station more immediately attached them to the service of the palace, abandoned the standard of Gratian; and in the first time that it was displayed in the neighbourhood of Paris. The emperor of the west fled towards Lyons, with a train of only three hundred horse; and, in the cities along the road, where he hoped to find a refuge, or at least a passage, he was taught, by cruel experience, that every gate is shut against the unfortunate. Yet he might still have reached, in safety, the dominions of his brother, and soon have returned with the forces of Italy and the east, if he had not suffered himself to be finally deserted by the peridious governor of the Lyonnese province. Gratian was awaked by protestations of doubtful fidelity, and the hopes of a support, which could not be effectual; till the arrival of andragathius, the general of the cavalry of Maximus, put an end to his suspense. That resolute officer executed, without remorse, the orders, or the intentions, of the usurper. Gratian, as he rose from supper, was deprived of his life, and his body was denied to the pious and pressing entreaties of his brother Valentinian. The death of the emperor was followed by that of his powerful general Mellobaudes, the king of the Franks; who, maintained, to the last moment of his life, the ambition which the just recompense of obscure and subtle policy. These executions might be necessary to the public safety; but the successful usurper, whose power was acknowledged by all the provinces of the west, had the merit, and the satisfaction, of boasting, that, except those who had perished by the chance of war, his triumph was not stained by the blood of the Romans.

The events of this revolution had passed in such rapid succession, that it would have been impossible for Theodosius to march to the relief of his benefactor, before he received the intelligence of his defeat and death. During the season of sincere grief, or ostentatious mourning, the eastern emperor was interrupted by the arrival of the principal chamberlain of Maximus; and the choice of a venerable old man, for an office which was really executed, was only a concession to the exertions of Constantynus, the gravity and temperance of the British usurper. The ambassador condescended to justify, or excuse, the conduct of his master; and to protest, in spectacula language, that the murder of Gratian had been perpetrated, without his knowledge or consent, by the precipitancy of the soldiers. He proceeded to a fine and equal tone, to offer Theodosius the alternative of peace or war. The speech of the ambassador concluded with a spirited declaration, that although Maximus, as a Roman, and as the father of his people, would choose rather to employ his forces in the common defence of the republic, he was armed and prepared, if his friendship should be rejected, to dispute, in a field of battle, the empire of the world. An immediate and peremptory answer was required; but it was extremely difficult for Theodosius to satisfy, on this important occasion, either the feelings of his own mind, or the expectations of the public. The impious voice of honour and gratitude called aloud for revenge. From the liberality of Gratian, he had received the imperial diadem: his patience would encourage the odious suspicion, that he was more deeply sensible of former injuries than of recent obligations, and he rejected the friendship, he must seem to share the guilt of the assassin. Even the principles of justice, and the interest of society, would receive a fatal blow from the impunity of Maximus; and the example of successful usurpation would tend to dissolve the artificial fabric of government, and once more to re-plunge the empire in the crimes and calamities of the preceding age. But, as the sentiments of gratitude and honour should invariably regulate the conduct of an individual, they may be overbalanced in the mind of a sovereign, by the sense of superior duties; and the maxims both of justice and policy require that the most atrocious criminal, if an innocent people would be involved in the consequences of his punishment. The assassination of Gratian had usurped, but he actually pos-

The decline and fall of the western empire of the Caesars.

The last warlike provinces of the empire; the west was exhausted by the misfortunes, and even by the success, of the Gothic war; and it was seriously to be apprehended, that, after the vital struggle of the years 493 and 496, and the destruction of the contest, the feeble conqueror would remain an easy prey to the barbarians of the north. These weighty considerations engaged Theodosius to dispose his remnant, and to accept the alliance of the tyrant. But he stipulated, that Maxims should content himself with the provinces of Thrace, Thrace beyond the Alps. The brother of Gratian was confirmed and secured in the sovereignty of Italy, Africa, and the western Illyricum; and some honourable conditions were inserted in the treaty, to protect the memory, and the laws, of the deceased emperor. According to the custom of the age, the emperors of the three imperial colleges were exhibited to the veneration of the people: nor should it be lightly supposed, that, in the moment of a solemn reconciliation, Theodosius secretly cherished the intention of perjury and revenge.

The contempt of Gratian for the Roman soldiers had exposed him to the fatal effects of their resentment. His profound veneration for the Christian clergy was rewarded by the applause and gratitude of a powerful order, which has claimed, in every age, the popular and available honours, both on earth and in heaven. The orthodox bishops bewailed his death, and their own irreparable loss; but they were soon comforted by the discovery, that Gratian had committed the sepiute of the east to the hands of a prince whose sole useful, and ferocious zeal, were supported by the spirit and abilities of a more vigorous character. Among the benefactors of the church, the fame of Constantine has been rivalled by the glory of Theodosius. If Constantine had the advantage of erecting the standard of the cross, the emulation of his success created the standard of which the Arian world was in esy, and of abolishing the worship of idols in the Roman world. Theodosius was the first of the emperors baptized in the true faith of the Trinity. Although he was born a Christian family, the maxims, or at least the practice, of the age, encouraged him to delay the ceremony of baptism. It was the knowledge of the danger of delay, by the serious illness which threatened his life, toward the end of the first year of his reign. Before he again took the field against the Goths, he received the sacrament of baptism from Acholius, the orthodox bishop of Thessalonica. All the emperor ascended from the holy font and with glowing with the warm feelings of regeneration, he dictated a solemn edict, which proclaimed his own faith, and prescribed the religion of his subjects. "It is our pleasure (such is the imperial style) that all the nations, which are governed by our clemency and moderation, should steadfastly adhere to the religion which was taught by St. Peter to the Romans; which faithful tradition has preserved; and which is now professed by the pontiff of Damasus, and by Peter, bishop of Alexandria, a man of apostolic holiness. According to the edict of the pope and the orthodox bishops of this city, the cures of the gospel, let us believe the sole deity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; under an equal majesty, and a pious Trinity. We authorize the followers of this doctrine to assume the title of catholics; and as we judge, that all others are extravagant madmen, we brand them with the infamous name of heretics; and declare, that their conventicles shall no longer usurp the respectable appellation of churches, the person of his sovereign, he Command.

tice, they must expect to suffer the severe penalties, which our authority, guided by heavenly wisdom, shall think proper to inflict upon them." The faith of a soldier is commonly the fruit of instruction, rather than of inquiry; but as the emperor always fixed his residence in the south of Italy, and the court and courtiers had so prudently constituted, his religious opinions were never affected by the specious texts, the subtle arguments, and the ambiguous creeds, of the Arian doctors. Once indeed he expressed a faint inclination to converse with the eloquent and learned Eunomus, who lived in retirement at a small distance from Constantinople. But the dangerous interview was prevented by the prayers of the empress Flacilla, who trembled for the salvation of her husband; and the mind of Theodosius was confirmed by a theologian of influence, as acute as his capacity. He had lately bestowed, on his eldest son Arcadius, the name and honours of Augustus, and the two princes were seated on a stately throne to receive the homage of their subjects. A bishop, Amphphilochius of Iconium, approached the throne, and after saluting, with due reverence, the person of his sovereign, he addressed the royal youth with the same familiar tenderness which he might have used towards a plebeian child. Prowed by this insolent behaviour, the monarch gave orders, that the rustic priest should be instantly driven from his presence. But while the guards were forcing him to the door, the dexterous orator had time to execute his design, by exclaiming with a loud voice, "Such is the treatment, O emperor! which the King of heaven has prepared for those impious men, who affect to worship the Father, but refuse to acknowledge the Son and Holy Ghost." That the emperor immediately embraced the bishop of Iconium; and never forgot the important lesson, which he had received from this dramatic parable.

Constantine was the principal sect Arianism of Constantinople, and fortress of Arianism; and, in a long period, in which so many events have intervened, he was the champion of the party, who had received the faith of Gratian. He was the exponent of the doctrine of the Trinity, which was enunciated by a solemn edict, from the mouth of his pupil Gratian, a high and respectable place in heaven, (tom. ii. epist. xvii. p. 927.)

ties, of various denominations, subsisted in peace under the protection of the Arians of Constantinople; who endeavoured to secure the attachment of those obscure sectaries; while they abused, with unrelenting severity, the victory which they had obtained over the friends of the council of Nice. During the partial reigns of Constantius and Valens, the free exercise of the public and private exercise of their religion; and it has been observed, in pathetic language, that the scattered flock was left without a shepherd, to wander on the mountains, or to be devoured by rapacious wolves.

But as their zeal, instead of being subdued, derived strength from its opposition; and they were the first moments of imperfect freedom, which they acquired by the death of Valens, to form themselves into a regular congregation, under the conduct of an episcopalian pastor. Two natures of Cappadocia, Basilius and Gregory Nazianzen, were distinguished above all the contemporaries, by the rare union of profane eloquence and of orthodox piety. These orators, who might sometimes be compared, by themselves, and by the public, to the most celebrated of the ancient Greeks, were united by the ties of the strongest friendship. This mutual elevation, the same liberal studies in the schools of Athens; they had retired, with equal devotion, to the same solitude in the deserts of Pontus; and every spark of emulation or envy, appeared to be totally extinguished in the holy and ingenuous breasts of Gregory and Basilius. But the eloquence of Basil, superior to that of Gregory, was compared to the spacious auditorium of the archiepiscopal throne of Caesarea, discovered to the world, and perhaps to himself, the pride of his character; and the first favour which he condescended to bestow on his friend was received, and perhaps was intended, as a cruel insult. Instead of employing the superior talents of his brother, he seized the sparsious station, the haughty presbiterate selected, among the fifty bishops of his extensive province, the wretched village of Sassin. But Gregory, without water, without verdure, without society, sat at the junction of three highways, and frequented only by the incessant passage of rude and enormous waggonets, was submitted with reluctance to this humiliating exile; he was ordained bishop of Sassin; but he solemnly protested, that he never consummated his spiritual marriage with this disgusting bride. He afterwards consented to undertake the government of his native church of Nazianzus, of which his father had been found the words of this remarkable passage, which I allude on the faith of a correct and scholastic version.

I confess myself deeply indebted to the lives of Gregory Nazianzen, composed, with very different views, by Tiliemmus. (Mon. Euseb. tom. i. pp. 385—390, 692—701.) and Le Clerc. (Bibliotheca Universalis, tom. xviii. p. 1—128.)

If I could, I am bound to say that in the chronology of Suidas we have absolutely received, in basing their lives on the minute life of the Egyptian, has the bishop of Egypt, attempted, by a candid and virtuous resolution, to supplicate his patron in the episcopal seat of Constantinople. These mortifications might sometimes tempt the Cappadocian missionary to regret his obscure solitude. But his labours were rewarded by his daily increase of his fame and his congregation; and he enjoyed the pleasure of observing, that the greater part of his numerous audience retired from his sermons, satisfied with the eloquence of the preacher, or dissatisfied with the manifold imperfections of their lives and actions.

Their hopes were speedily accomplished; and the emperor, as soon as he had finished his construction, made his public entry into the capital at the head of a victorious army. Nov., the honourable invitation, which was addressed to him from the orthodox party of Constantine. On his arrival in the capital, Gregory was entertained in the house of a distinguished charitable kinman; the most splendid room was consecrated to the uses of religious worship; and the name of Anastasia was chosen to express the resurrection of the Nicene faith. This private convocation was afterwards converted into a magnificent church; and the credulity of the succeeding ages was prepared to receive these visions, which attested the presence, or at least the protection, of the Mother of God. The pulpit of the Anastasia was the scene of the labours and triumphs of Gregory Nazianzen; and in the space of two years, he experienced all the spiritual adventures which constitute the prosperous or adverse fortunes of a missionary. The Arians, who were provoked by the boldness of his enterprise, represented his doctrine, as if he had preached three distinct and equal deities; and the devout populace was excited to suppress, by every species of violence, the holy messenger of the Athanasian heretics. From the cathedral of St. Sophia, there issued a motley crowd of common beggars, who had forfeited their claim to pity; of monks, who had the appearance of great or seditious; of men, more terrible than so many Jezebels. The council of the Anastasia were broke open; much blood was perpetrated, or attempted, with stiles, stones, and firebrands; and as a man lost his life in the fray, Gregory, who was summoned the next morning before the magistrate, had the satisfaction of supposing, that he publicly confessed the name of Christ. After he was delivered from the fear and danger of a foreign and factional persecution, his influence increased and distracted by intestine faction. A stranger who assumed the name of Maximus, and the cloak of a Cynic philosopher, iniminated himself into the confidence of Gregory; deceived and abused his favourable opinion; and the prince of the secret conclave of the bishops of Egypt, attempted, by a clandestine ordination, to supplant his patron in the episcopal seat of Constantinople. These mortifications might sometimes tempt the Cappadocian missionary to regret his obscure solitude. But his labours were rewarded by his daily increase of his fame and his congregation; and he enjoyed the pleasure of observing, that the greater part of his numerous audience retired from his sermons, satisfied with the eloquence of the preacher, or dissatisfied with the manifold imperfections of their lives and actions.

to his presence; and offered that Arius prelate the hard alternative of subscribing the nicene creed, or of instantly resigning, to the orthodox believers, the use and possession of the episcopal palace, the cathedral of St. Sophia, and all the churches of Constantinople. The zeal of Damophilus, which in a catholic saint would have been justly despised, unbridled, without hesitation, a life of poverty and exile, and his removal was immediately followed by the purification of the imperial city. The Arians might complain, with some appearance of justice, that an inconsiderable congregation of ecclesiastics shouldstrip the whole hundred churches, which they were insufficient to fill; whilst the far greater part of the people was cruelly excluded from every place of religious worship. Theodosius was still inexorable: but as the angels who protected the catholic cause, were only visible to the eyes of faith, he suddenly reinforced those heavenly legions, with the more effectual aid of temporal and carnal weapons; and the church of St. Sophia was occupied by a large body of the imperial guards. If the mind of Gregory was susceptible of pride, he must have felt a very lively satisfaction, when the emperor conducted him that honourable in solemn procession, and, with his own hand, respectfully placed him on the archiepiscopal throne of Constantinople. But the saint (who had not subdued the imperfections of human virtue) was deeply affected by the mortifying consideration, that his entrance into the fold was that of a wolf, rather than that of a shepherd; that which surrounded his person, were necessary for his safety; and that he alone was the object of the imprecations of a great party, whom, as men and citizens, it was impossible for him to despise. He beheld the impiety of his courtiers; the insolent conduct of everyone who crowded the streets, the windows, and the roofs of the houses; he heard the tumultuous voice of rage, grief, astonishment, and despair; and Gregory fairly confesses, that on the memorable day of his installation, the capital of the east wore the appearance of a city whose chief was dethroned. He felt that the presence of the Son of God, and the various opinions which were embraced concerning the second, were extenuated and transferred, by a natural analogy, to the third, person of the Trinity. Yet it was found, or it was thought, necessary, by the victor of the adversaries of Arianism, to explain the ambiguous language of some respectable doctors; to confirm the faith of the catholics; and to condemn an unpopular and inconsistent sect of Macedonians; who freely admitted that the Son was consubstantial to the Father, while they were fearful of seeming to acknowledge the existence of Three Gods. A council and unanimous sentence was pronounced to ratify the equal Deity of the Holy Ghost; the mysterious doctrine has been received by all the nations, and all the churches, of the christian world; and their grateful reverence has ascended to the bishop of Constantinople, the second rank among the general councils. Their knowledge of religious truth may have been preserved by tradition, or it may have been communicated by inspiration; but the sober evidence of history will not allow much weight to the personal authority of the fathers of Constantinople; for Arianism had scandalously degenerated from the model of apostolical purity, the most worthless and corrupt were always the most eager to frequent, and disturb, the episcopal assemblies. The conflict and fermentation of so many opposite interests and tempers inflamed the passions of the bishops; and their rival accusations were, the love of gold, and the love of dispute. Many of the same prelates who now applauded the orthodox piety of Theodosius, had repeatedly changed, with prudent flexibility, their creeds and opinions; and in the various revolutions of the church, the right of their sovereign was the rule of their obsequious faith. When the emperor suspended his prevailing influence, the turbulent synod was blindly impelled by the absurd or selfish motives of pride, hatred, and resentment. The death of Melctius, which happened

1 Socrates (I. c. 7) and Sozomen (iv. c. 5) relate the evangelic story of the persecution of Damophilus under a word of application. He considered, says Socrates, that it is difficult to resist the powerful; but it was easy, and would have been probable, to submit. p. 299, c. 22. For the sake of piety, the bishop of Constantinople records a stupendous prodigy. In the month of November, it was a cloudy morning, but the sun broke forth when the procession entered the church. 2 The ecclesiastical historian, Cassian (epist. cxxvii. c. xii. p. 22) has mentioned this important commission of Sapor, which Timliment (Hist. des Emperors, tom. v. p. 725) forcibly removes, from the realm of the subject of Theodosius. 3 I do not reckon Philostorgius, though he mentions (i. c. 15.) the expulsion of Damophilus. The Eusebian history has been carefully searched through an orthodox sieve.

4 Le Clerc has given a curious extract (Bibliothèque Universelle, tom. xxi. p. 94-106.) of the theological sermons which Gregory Nazianzen pronounced at Constantinople against the Arians, Eunomists, Macedonians, &c. He tells the Macedonians, who defied the Father and the Son, without the Holy Ghost, that they might as well repudiate the HOLY SPIRIT: and his appeal to the truth is more convincing than the appeal to the monarchy of heaven resembles a well-regulated aristocracy.

5 The first general council of Constantinople now triumphs in the Vatican; but the popes have been humbled, and their pontifical prerogatives, and all their aggrandizements, the humble Timliment. (Ann. Ecclesiast. tom. ix. p. 499, 500.) at the council of Constantinople, presented the most favorable opportunity of terminating the schism of Antioch, by suffering his aged rival, Paulinus, peacefully to renounce the episcopal chair, and the faith and virtues of Paulinus were not only unimpaired, but the cause was supported by the western churches; and the bishops of the synod resolved to perpetuate the mischiefs of discord, by the hasty ordination of a perjured candidate, rather than to betray the imagined dignity of the east, which had been illustrated by the birth and education of the Son of God. Such disorderly proceedings forced the gravest members of the assembly to dissent and to secede; and the clamorous majesty, which remained masters of the field of battle, could be compared only to wasps or magpies, to a flight of cranes, or to a flock of geese. But the Revert of Gregory, so unfavourable a picture of ecclesiastical synods has been drawn by the partial hand of some obstinate heretic, or some malicious imbiber. But the name of the sincere historian who has conveyed this instructive lesson to the knowledge of posterity, must silence the impudent murmurs of suspicion and bigotry. He was one of the most pious and eloquent bishops of the age; a saint and a doctor of the church; the scourge of Ariantism, and the pillar of the orthodox faith; a distinguished member of the council of Constantinople, in which, after the death of Meletius, the emperor called; a prudent man; in a word—Gregory Nazianzen himself. The harsh and ungenerous treatment which he experienced, instead of derogating from the truth of his evidence, affords an additional proof of the spirit which actuated the deliberations of the synod. Their unanimous and friendly action confirmed the pretensions which the bishops of Constantinople derived from the choice of the people, and the approbation of the emperor. But Gregory soon became the victim of malice and envy. The bishops of the east, his strenuous adherents, provoked by his moderation in the affairs of Antioch, abandoned him, without support, to the adverse faction of the Egyptians; who disputed the validity of his election, and rigorously asserted the obsolete canon, that prohibited the licentious practice of episcopal translations. The pride, or the humility, of Gregory, prompted him to decline a contest which might have been impeded to his advantage. He retired, without mixture of indignation, to renounce the government of a church, which had been restored, and almost created, by his labours. His resignation was accepted by the synod, and by the emperor, with more readiness than he seems to have expected. At the time of his retirement, Constantius, who had devoted all his energy to the service of the empire, his victory, his episcopal throne was filled by the successor Nectarius; and the new archbishop, accidentally recommended by his easy temper and venerable aspect, was obliged to delay the ceremony of his consecration, till he had previously despatched the rites of his baptism. After this remarkable experience of the ingratitude of princes and prelates, Gregory retired once more to his obscure solitude of Cappadocia; where he employed the remainder of his life, about eight years, in the exercises of prayer and devotion. The title of Saint, both to his fame and to the reverence of his heart, and the elevation of his genius, reflect a more pleasing lustre on the memory of Gregory Nazianzen.

It was not enough that Theodosius Edicts of Theodosius had suppressed the insidious reign of Ariantism, or that he had abundantly avenged the injuries which the catholics had sustained from the zeal of Constantius and Valens. The orthodox emperor considered every heretic as a rebel against the supreme powers of heaven and of earth; and each of these powers might exercise their peculiar jurisdiction over the soul and body of the guilty. The decrees of the council of Constantinople had ascertained the true standard of the faith; and the ecclesiastics, who governed the conscience of Theodosius, suggested the most effectual methods of persecution. In the space of fifteen years, he promulgated at least fifteen severe edicts against the heretics; most especially against those who rejected the Trinity; and to deprive them of every hope of escape, he sternly, enacted, that if any laws or rescripts should be alleged in their favour, the judges should consider them as the illegal productions either of fraud or forgery. The penal statutes were directed against the ministers, the assemblies, and the persons, of the heretics; and the passions of the legislator were expressed in the language of declaration and inexecutive. I. The heretical teachers, who usurped the sacred titles of bishops, or presbyters, were not only excluded from the privileges and emoluments so liberally granted to the orthodox clergy, but they were exposed to the heavy penalties of exile and confiscation, if they presumed to preach the doctrine, or to practise the rights, of their accursed sects. A fine of ten pounds of gold (above four hundred pounds sterling) was imposed on every person who should dare to confess, or receive, or promote, an heretical ordination; and it was reasonably expected, that if the race of pastors could be extinguished, their helpless flocks would be compelled, by ignorance and hunger, to return within the pale of the catholic church. II. The rigorous prohibition of conventicles was carefully extended to every possible method of dissimulation, and none could assemble with the intention of worshipping God and Christ according to the dictates of their conscience. Their religious meetings, whether public or secret, by day or by night, in cities or in the country, were equally proscribed by the edicts of Theodosius; and the building, or the holding, of any meeting, for illegal purpose, was forfeited to the imperial domain. III. It was supposed that the error of the heretics could proceed only from the obstinate temper of their minds; and such a temper was a fit object of censure and punishment. The anathemas of the church were fortified by a sort of civil excommunication; which separated them from their fellow-citizens, by a peculiar brand of infamy; and this declaration of the supreme magistrate tended to justify, or at least to excuse, the insults of a fanatical populace. The sectaries were gradually disqualified for the possession of honourable or lucrative employment; and Theodosius was satisfied with his own justice, when he decreed, that, as the Eunomians distinguished the nature of the Son from that of the Father, they should be incapable of making their wills, or of receiving any advantage from tontary donations; and that his own, which at the close of his reign was attested of such magnitude, that it could be expiated only by the death of the offender; and the same capital punishment was inflicted on the Audians, or Quotzodecimans, who should dare to perpetrate the atrocious crime of celebrating, on an imprest, a mock festival of Easter. Every Roman might exercise the right of public accusation: but the office of Inquisitor of the Faith, a name so deservedly abhorred, was first instituted under the reign of Theodosius. Yet we are assured, that the execution of his penal edicts was seldom enforced; and that the pious emperor appeared less desirous to punish, than to reclaim, or terrify, his refractory subjects. 1

Execution of Priscillian and his adherents. The theory of persecution was established by Theodosius, whose justice and piety have been applauded by the saints: but the practice of it, in the fullest extent, was reserved for his successor. By a most odious and odious extenuation, Ambrose, Priscillian, but glorious Theodosius, was the first, among the christian princes, who shed the blood of his christian subjects, on account of their religious opinions. The cause of the Priscillians, a recent sect of heretics, who disturbed the provinces of Spain, was transferred, by appeal, from the synod of Bourdeaux to the imperial consistory of Treves; and by the sentence of the prætorian prefect, seven persons were tortured, condemned, and executed. The first of these was Priscillian himself, bishop of Avila, in Spain; who adored the benefits of birth and fortune, by the accomplishments of eloquence and learning his own students, and who, amidst their adoration of him, his beloved master in death, which they esteemed as a glorious martyrdom: and the number of religious victims was completed by the execution of Latinaton, a poet, who rivalled the fame of the ancients; and of Euchrocia, a noble matron of Bourdeaux, the widow of the orator, Dr. Phænodoxus. Two bishops, who had embraced the sentiments of Priscillian, were condemned to a distant and dreary exile; and some inducement was shown to the meaner criminals, who assumed the merit of an early repentance. If any credit could be allowed to confessions extorted by fear or promise, it would seem to substantiate the odious claim of the clergy and the cœteri valence and cœteri valence, the hæresy of the Priscillians would be found to include the various abominations of magic, of impiety, and of lewdness. Priscillian, who wandered about the world in the company of his spiritual sisters, was accused of praying stark-naked in the passage of these objections; but the history asserts, that the effects of his criminal intercourse with the daughter of Euchrocia, had been suppressed, by means still more odious and criminal. But an accurate, or rather a candid, inquiry, will discover, that if the Priscillians violated the laws of nature, it was not by the lascivious profanities, of their lives. They absolutely condemned the use of the marriage-bed; and the peace of families was often disturbed by illicit separations. They enjoined, or recommended, a total abstinence from all animal food; and their continual prayers, fasts, and vigils, inculcated a rule of strict and perfect devotion. The speculative tenets of the sect, concerning the person of Christ, his origin, and condition, were derived from the Gnostic and Manichæan system; and this vain philosophy, which had been transported from Egypt to Spain, was ill adapted to the grosser spirits of the West. The obscure disciples of Priscillian suffered, languished, and gradually disappeared; his tenets were rejected by the clergy and people, but his death was the subject of a long and vehement controversy: while some arraigned, and others applauded, the justice of his sentence. It is with pleasure that we can observe the humane inconsistence of the most illustrious saints and bishops, Ambrose of Milan, and Martin the Posthumous, in this case, as in that of the Euchrocia and Ithacius, with whose irreligious theory, the sect, and its adherents, were associated. They pitied the unhappy men, who had been executed at Treves; they refused to hold communication with their episcopal murderers; and if Martin deviated from that generous resolution, his motives were laudable, and his repentance was exemplary. The bishops of Tours and Milan pronounced, without hesitation, the eternal damnation of heretics; but they were surprised, and shocked, by the bloody image of their temporal death, and the honest feelings of nature, the accidental prejudices of theology. The humanity of Ambrose and Martin was confirmed by the solemn pronouncement of the council of Aquileia, condemned Priscillian and his adherents. The civil and ecclesiastical ministers had transgressed the limits of their respective provinces. The secular judge had presumed to receive an appeal, and to pronounce a definitive sentence, in a matter of faith, and episcopal jurisdiction. The bishops had disturbed the peace of the church, by exercising the function of accusers in a criminal prosecution. The cruelty of Ithacius, who beheld the tortures, and solicited the death, of the heretics, provoked the just indignation of mankind; and the vices of that profligate bishop were admitted as a proof, that his zeal was instigated by the sordid pursuit of his interest. Since the death of Priscillian, the rude attempts of persecution have been refined and methodized in the holy office, which assigns their distinct parts to the ecclesiastical and secular powers. The devoted victim is regularly delivered by the secular, and the ecclesiastic, at the instance of the executioner; and the inexorable sentence of the church, which declares the spiritual guilt of the offender, is expressed in the mild language of pity and intercession.

Among the ecclesiastics, who illustrated the reign of Theodosius, Ambrose, archbiscop of Milan, was the most illustrious, and by the faithful in different parts of the empire, was recognized as the teacher of the prisoners of Christ. He was descended from a noble family of Romans; his father had exercised the important office of praetorian prefect of Gaul; and the son, after passing through the studies of a liberal education, attained, in the regular gradation of civil honours, the station of consular of Luguria, a province which included the imperial residence of Milan. At the age of thirty-four,

5. The Life of St. Martin and the Dialogues, concerning his miracles, could not be adapted to the graceful barbarism, in a style not unworthy of the Augustan age. So natural is the alliance between the rude taste of antiquity, and the refined natural beauties that I am about to describe, in the expression of the art of the age.—
6. The short and superficial Life of St. Ambrose, by his deacon Paulinus, Appendix, ed. Benedict. p. i.—xxv, has the merit of original evidence. Tillemon, (Mem. Eccles. tom. x. p. 78—380) and the Benedictine editors, (p. xxxii.—xxl) have laboured with their usual diligence. and before he had received the sacrament of baptism, Ambrose, to his own surprise, and that of the world, was suddenly transformed from a governor to an archbishop. Without the least mixture, as it is said, of art or intrigue, the whole body of the people unanimously saluted him with the episcopal title; the concord and perseverance of their acclamations were as-crystal clear as the radiant beams of the rising sun.

The senator, was not prepared by the habits and occupations of his former life. But the active force of his genius soon qualified him to exercise, with zeal and prudence, the duties of his ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and, while he chose out, with a just regard to splendid trappings of temporal greatness, he condescended, for the good of the church, to direct the conscience of the emperors, and to control the administration of the empire. Gratian loved and revered him as a father; and the elaborate treatise on the faith of the Trinity, was designed for the instruction of the young prince. After his tragic death, at a time when the empress Justinia trembled for her own safety, and for that of her son, the archbishop of Milan was despatched, on two different embassies, to the court of Trèves. He exercised, with equal firmness and devotion, the powers of his spiritual and political characters; and perhaps contributed, by his authority and eloquence, to check the ambition of Maximus, and to protect the peace of Italy. A. D. 353.

Ambrose had devoted his life, and his abilities, to the service of the church. With faith was the object of his contempt; he had renounced his own, in order to gain with hesitation, the consecrated plate, for the redemption of captives. The clergy and people of Milan were attached to their archbishop; and he deserved the esteem, without soliciting the favour, or apprehending the displeasure, of his feeble sovereigns.

His successful opposition to the emperor Justinia, posing the Arian heresy, which she endeavoured to instil into the mind of her son. Justinia was persuaded, that a Roman emperor might claim, in his own dominions, the public exercise of his religion; and she proposed to the archbishop, as a moderatate and reasonable concession, that he should resign the use of the churches of his spiritual and political jurisdiction, to the archbishop of Milan. But the conduct of Ambrose was governed by very different principles. The palaces of the earth might indeed belong to Caesar; but the churches were the sacred palaces of God; and, within the limits of his diocese, he himself, as the lawful successor of the apostles, was the only minister of God. The privileges of church, temporal as well as spiritual, were confined to the true believers; and the mind of Ambrose was satisfied, that his own theological opinions were the standard of truth and orthodoxy. The archbishop, who refused to hold any conference, or negotiation, with his own sovereign, was declared, without modest firmness, his resolution to die a martyr, rather than to yield to the impious sarcasse; and Justinia, who resented the refusal as an act of insolence and rebellion, hastily determined to exert the imperial prerogative of his son. As she desired to perform her public de-donations on the approach of Easter, Ambrose was ordered to appear before the council. He obeyed the summons with the respect of a faithful subject, but he was followed, without his consent, by an innumerable people: they pressed, with impetuous zeal, against the gates of the palace; and the affrighted ministers of Valentinian, instead of pronouncing a sentence of exile on the archbishop of Milan, humbly represented that he would interpose his authority in the person of the emperor, and to restore the tranquility of the capital. But the promises which Ambrose received and communicated, were soon violated by a perfidious court: and, during six of the most solemn days, which were spent in the council of Milan, the Arians, in the name of the emperor, and in the name of the archbishop, were exposed to the most imminent danger of their lives; and Ambrose enjoyed the merit and reputation of rescuing his personal enemies from the hands of the enraged multitude.

But while he laboured to restrain the effects of their zeal, the pietistic vehemence of his sermons continually inflamed the angry and seditions temper of the people of Milan. The characters of Eve, of the wife of Job, of Lycia, and of the house of Valeria, were applied to the mother of the emperor; and her desire to obtain a church for the Arians, was compared to the most cruel persecutions which Christianity had endured under the reign of paganism. The measures of the court served only to expose the magnitude of the evil. A fine of two hundred thousand pieces of gold was levied on the corporate body of merchants and manufacturers; an order was signified, in the name of the emperor, to all the officers, and inferior servants, of the courts of justice, that, during the continuance of the public disorders, they should strictly confine themselves to their own houses: and the officers of the court were, in fact, crushed under the weight of the imperial displeasure, of their sovereign. The reply of Ambrose was conciliatory in the most humble and respectful terms, which might, however, be interpreted as a serious declaration of civil war. “ His life and fortune were in the hands of the emperor; but he would never betray the church of Christ, or degrade the dignity of the episcopal character. In such a case, he should resign his life; and all his disorders, if the demon could inflict; and he only wished to die in the presence of his faithful flock, and at the foot of the altar; he had not contributed to exuce, but it was in the power of God alone to appease, the rage of the people: he deprecated the scenes of blood and confusion which were likely to ensue; and it was his for-vent prayer, that he might not survive to behold the ruin of a flourishing city, and perhaps the desolation of all Italy.” The obstinate bigotry of Justinia would not have endangered the empire of her son, if, in this contest with the church and people of Milan, she could have depended on the active obedience of the troops of the palace. A large body of Goths had marched to occupy the Basilica, which was the object of the dispute; and it might be expected from the Arian principles, and barbarous manners, of these foreign merchant princes, that they would not entertain any scruples in the execution of the most sanguinary orders. They were encountered, on the sacred threshold, by the archbishop, who, thundering against them a sentence of excommunication, asked them, in the tone of a father and a master, Whether it was to invade the house of God, that they had implored the hospitable 4 Ambrose himself (tom. ii. Epist. xxiv. p. 383—391) gives the emperor a very spirituall account of his own embassy.

5 It is probable that these two letters (tom. ii. Epist. xx. xxii. p. 622—689) is one of the curious monuments of ecclesiastical antiquity. It contains two letters to his sister, Marcelia, with a petition to Valentinian, and the sermon de Basilica was written.

6 Retz has a similar message from the queen, to request that he would appease the tumult of Paris. It was no longer in his power, but the produce of a man of grandeur. It was a recent and complete defeat of de Ruyter, de Regret, et de la soumission, &c. (Memoires, tom. ii. p. 149.) Certainly I do not compare either the causes, or the men; yet the conductor himself had some idea (p. 81 of imitating St. Ambrose).
The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

Chapter XXVII

The empire, so far as it was genuine, seems to have lived in the reign of Constantine... but the character of Maximian, who had been the master of the state for so many years, was such that he was not likely to be... The reign of Maximus might have ended in peace and prosperity, but he... bishops refused a dangerous and criminal connexion with the usurper, he might indirectly contribute to the success of his arms, by inculcating from the pulpit, the duty of resignation, rather than that of resistance. The unfortunate Justinia reached Aquileia in safety; but she distrusted the strength of the fortifications, and in this occasion went accompanied to the utmost extremity of the Hadratic and Ionian seas; the court, after a long, but successful, navigation, reposed themselves in the port of Thessalonica. All the subjects of Valentinian deserted the cause of a prince, who, by his abdication, had absolved them from the duty of allegiance; and if the little city of Rimini, on the verge of Italy, had not presumed to stop the career of his inglorious victory, Maximi would have obtained, without a struggle, the sole possession of the western empire.

Instead of inviting his royal guests to the palace of Constantineople, Theodosius had some unknown reasons to fix A.D. 397. their residence at Thessalonica; but these reasons did not proceed from contempt or indignation against the prince, or the part his father, accompanied by the greatest part of his court and senate, after the first tender expressions of friendship and sympathy, the pious emperor of the east gently admonished Justinus, that the guilt of heresy was sometimes punished in this world, as well as in the next: and that the piety of the Christian faith would be the most efficacious step to promote the restoration of her son, by the satisfaction it must occasion both on earth and in heaven. The momentous question of peace or war was referred by Theodosius, to the deliberation of his council; and the arguments, which might be alleged on the side of honour and justice, had acquired, since the death of Gratian, a considerable degree of additional weight. The persecution of the imperial family, to which Theodosius himself had been indebted for his fortune, was now aggravated by recent and repeated injuries. Neither could the treaties could restrain the boundless ambition of Maximus; and the delay of vigorous and decisive measures, instead of prolonging the blessings of peace, would expose the eastern empire to the danger of an hostile invasion. The barbarians, who had passed the Danube, were hotly pursued; but, though they were taught by strategy and subjects, but their native fierceness was yet unvanquished; and the operations of a war, which would exercise their valour, and diminish their numbers, might tend to relieve the provinces from an intolerable oppression.

Notwithstanding these sanguine and solid reasons, which were approved by a majority of the council, Theodosius still hesitated, whether he should draw the sword in a contest, which could no longer admit any terms of reconciliation; and his magnificent character was not disgraced by the apprehensions which he felt for the safety of his infant sons, and that the public pursuit of his secondary ambition, the possession of the world, depended on the resolution of a single man, the charms of the princess Gallia most powerfully pleased the cause of her brother Valentinian. The heart of Theodosius was softened by the tears of beauty; his affections were insensibly engaged by the graces of youth and innocence; the art of Justinia managed and directed the impulse of passion; and the celebration of the royal nuptials was the assurance and signal of the civil war. The unforeseeable critics, who consider every amorous weakness as an indelible stain on the memory of a great and orthodox emperor, are inclined, after this occasion, to attribute the defection of the historian Zosimus. For my own part, I shall frankly confess, that I am willing to find, or even to seek, in the revolutions of the world, some traces of the mild and tender sentiments of domestic life; and, amidst the crowd of fierce and ambitious conquerors, I can see no reason why the precedent should be excused, who may be supposed to receive his armour from the hands of love. The alliance of the Persian king was secured by the faith of treaties; the martial barbarians were persuaded to follow the standard, or to respect the frontiers, of an active and liberal monarch; and the donations of Theodosius, from the Euphrates to the Hadratic, resounded with the preparations of war both by land and sea. The skillful disposition of the forces of the east seemed to multiply their numbers, and distracted the attention of Maximus. He had reason to fear, that a chosen body of troops, under the command of the intrepid Arbogastes, would direct their march along the banks of the Danube, and boldly penetrate through the Rhetic provinces into the centre of Gaul. A powerful fleet was equipped in the harbours of Greece and Epirus, with an apparent design to execute an expedition, that would have shared the glory of the naval victory. Valentinian and his mother should land in Italy, proceed, without delay, to Rome, and occupy the majestic seat of religion and empire. In the mean while, Theodosius himself advanced, at the head of a brave and disciplined army, to encounter his unworthy successor. In the midst of the camp, the emperor, who, after the siege of Rimini, had fixed his the camp in the neighbourhood of Siscia, a city of Pannonia, strongly fortified by the broad and rapid stream of the Save.

The veterans, who still remembered the long residence, and successive recompositions, of the tyrant Magnentius, might prepare themselves for the labours of three bloody campaigns. But the contest with his successor, who, like him, had usurped the throne of the west, was easily decided in the term of two months, and within the space of two hundred miles. The enterprise against Maximus, who, in this important crisis, showed himself destitute of military skill, or personal courage; but the abilities of Theodosius were seconded by the advantage which he possessed of a numerous and active cavalry. The Huns, the Alani, and, after their example, the Goths themselves, were formed into squadrons of archers; who fought on horseback, and confounded the steady valour of the Gauls and Germans, by the rapid motions of a Tartar war. After the fatigue of a long march, in the heat of summer, they spurred their foaming horses into the waters of the Save, swam the river in the presence of the enemy, and instantly charged and routed the troops who guarded the high ground on the opposite side. Marcellinus, the tyrant's brother, advanced to support them with the select cohorts, which were considered as the most vigorous of the army, and was interrupted by the approach of night, was renewed in the morning; and, after a sharp conflict, the surviving remnant of the bravest soldiers of Maximus threw down their arms at the feet of the conqueror. Without suspending his march, to receive the loyal petitions of the inhabitants of the country, he pressed forwards, to terminate the war by the death or captivity of his rival, who fled before him with the diligence of fear. From the summit of the Julian Alps, he descended with such incredible speed into the plain of Italy, that he reached Aquileia on the evening of the first day; and Maximus, who found himself unaccompanied on all sides, had scarcely time to save himself, when he met success. But he long resisted the effort of a victorious enemy; and the despair, the disaffection, the indifference of the soldiers and people, hastened the downfall of the wretched Maximus. He was dragged from his throne, rudely stripped of the imperial ornaments, the robe, the diadem, the household slipper, by the common malefactor, to the camp and presence of Theodosius, at a place about three miles from Aquileia. The behaviour of the emperor was not intended to insult, and he showed some disposition to pity and forgive, the tyrant of the west, who had never been his personal enemy. The old age, however, the object of his contempt. Our sympathy is the most forcibly excited by the misfortunes to which we are exposed; and the spectacle of a proud competitor, now prostrate at his feet, could not fail of producing very serious and solemn thoughts in the mind of the victorious emperor. But the feeble emotion of involuntary pity was checked by his regard for public justice, and the memory of Gratian: and he abandoned the victim to the pious zeal of the soldiers, who drew him out of the imperial presence, and instantly separated his head from his body. The presence of his death was not received with sincere or well-dissembled joy; his son Victor, on whom he had conferred the title of Augustus, died by the order, perhaps, by the hand, of the bold Arbogastes; and all the military plans of Theodosius were successfully executed. When he had thus terminated the civil war, with difficulty and blood, shed than he might naturally expect, he employed the winter months of his residence at Milan, to restore the state of the afflicted provinces; and early in the spring he made, after the example of Constantine and Constantius, the first entry into the ancient capital of the Roman empire.1

Virtues of Theodosius. The orator, who may be silent without danger, may praise without difficulty, and without reluctance; and posterity will confess, that the character of Theodosius2 might furnish the subject of a sincere and ample eulogium, without any of his laws, and the success of his arms, rendered his administration respectable in the eyes both of his subjects and of his enemies. He loved and practised the virtues of domestic life, which seldom hold their residence in the palaces of kings. Theodosius was chaste and temperate; he enjoyed, without shame, the sensual and social pleasures of the table; and the warmth of his amorous passions was never diverted from their lawful objects. The proud titles of imperial greatness were adorned by the tender names of a faithful husband, an indulgent father; his uncle was raised, by his affectionate esteem, to the rank of a second parent. Theodosius embraced, as his own, the children of his brother and sister; and the expressions of his regard were extended to the most distant and obscure branches of his numerous kindred. His familiar friends were judiciously selected from among those persons, who, in the equal intercourse of private life, had appeared before his eyes without a mask; the consciousness of personal and superior merit enabled him to despise the accidental distinction of the purple; and he proved by his conduct, that he had forgotten all the injuries, while he most gratefully remembered all the favours which he received before he ascended the throne of the Roman empire. The serious, or lively, tone of his conversation, was adapted to the age, the rank, or the character, of his subjects whom he admitted into his society; and the affability of his manners displayed the simplicity of the good and the virtuous; every art, every talent, of a useful, or even of an innocent, nature, was rewarded by his judicious liberality; and, except the heretics, whom he persecuted with implacable hatred, the different virtues of his beneficence were exhibited only by the limits of the human race. The government of a mighty empire may assuredly suffice to occupy the time and the abilities of a mortal: yet the diligent prince, without aspiring to the unsuitable reputation of profound learning, always reserved some attention to receive the instructions of the ancient authors. But the emperor showed himself much more attentive to relieve the innocent, than to chastise the guilty. The oppressed subjects of the west, who would have deemed themselves happy in the restoration of their lands, were astonished to receive a sum of money equivalent to their loss; and the liberality of the conqueror supported the aged mother, and educated the orphan daughters, of Maximus.3 A character thus accomplished, might almost excuse the extraordinary supposition of the orator Pacatus; that if the elder Brutus could be permitted to rejoice in the earth, the merely political ambitious of Theodosius would abjure, at the feet of Theodosius, his hatred of kings; and ingenuously confess, that such a monarch was the most faithful guardian of the happiness and dignity of the Roman people.4

Yet the piercing eye of the founder of the republic must have discerned two essential imperfections, which might, perhaps, have abated his recent love of despotism. The virtuous mind of Theodosius was often relaxed by indolence,5 and it was sometimes inflamed by passion.6 In the pursuit of an important object, his active courage was capable of the most vigorous exertions; but, as soon as the design was accomplished, or the danger was surmounted, the hero sunk into inglorious repose; and forgetful that the time of a prince is the property of his people, resigned himself to the enjoyment of the present, and the thoughts of posterity.7 The natural disposition of Theodosius was hasty and

1. Besides the hints which may be gathered from chronicles and ecclesiastical history, Zosimus, (L. iv. p. 339—342.) Oratius, (L. viii. 53.) and Pacatus, (in Panoray, Vet. xii. 39—47.) supply the loose and scantly materials of this civil war. Ambrose (tom. ii. Epist. xi. p. 922. 935. dually alludes to the well-known events of a magazine sur- prised, and of a Sicilian war.) In the ed. Tott. (p. 356, edit. Tott.) the peculiar merit, and good fortune of Aquileia, is considerably enlarged. His laudable principle, tan tum utrue de prince- cipe, (Pacat. in Panoray, Vet. xx. 2.) 5. Zosimus, Vet. xii. 572. His partial resolution is marked by an air of candour and truth. He observes these virtues of indolent of his activity, not as a vice, but as a singularity, in the character of Theodosius.

6. This Childebeles temper is acknowledged, and excused, by Victor. See his admirable and inexhaustible, to his subject. (Tore, nature, nature, nature, quia quis ans vice vis go, in duas ad victoriam praecipue orat.) The praise of Pacatus, (in concurso vires postas.) Theodosius (Claud. in iv. cholerick; and, in a station where none could resist, and few would dissuade, the fatal consequence of his resolution was punished by a long and dreadful interval of suspense. Every rumour agitated the hopes and fears of the Antiochians, and they heard with terror, that their sovereign, exasperated by the insult which had been offered to his own statues, and, more especially, to those of his beloved wife, had resolved to level with the ground the capital city of Antioch, without distinction of age or sex, the criminal inhabitants of many of whom were actually driven, by their apprehensions, to seek a refuge in the mountains of Syria, and the adjacent desert. At March 22, length, twenty-four days after the sedition, the general Hellebius, and Cassius, master of the office, declared the will of the emperor, and the sentence of Antioch. That proud capital was degraded from the rank of a city; and the metropolis of the east, stripped of its lands, its privileges, and its revenues, was subjected, under the humiliating denomination of a village, to the jurisdiction of Laodicea. The baths, the circus, and the theatre, were shut; and, that every source of plenty and pleasure might at the same time be intercepted, the distribution of corn was abolished by the severe instructions of Theodosius. His commissioners then proceeded to inquire into the guilt of individuals; the whole of the injured, or suspected, of those who had not prevented, the promulgation of the sacred statutes. The tribunal of Hellebius, and Cassius, encompassed with armed soldiers, was erected in the midst of the forum. The noblest, and most wealthy, of the citizens of Antioch appeared before them in chains; the examination was assisted by the use of torture, and their sentence was pronounced, or suspended, according to the judgment of these extraordinary magistrates. The houses of the criminals were exposed to sale, their wives and children were suddenly reduced, from affluence and luxury, to the most object distress; and a bloody execution was expected to complete the horrors of a day; which the preacher of Antioch, the eloquent Chrysostom, has represented as a lively image of the last and universal judgment of the world. But the ministers of Theodosius performed, with reluctance, the cruel task which had been assigned them; they dropped a gentle tear over the calamities of the people; and they listened with reverence to the pressing solicitations of the monks and hermits, who descended in swarms from the mountains. Hellebius and Cassius were persuaded to suspend the execution of their sentence; and it was agreed, that the former should remain at Antioch, while the latter returned, with all possible speed, to Constantinople; and presumed once more to consult the will of his sovereign. The Clemency of Theodosius was still further extended. The deputies of the people, both the bishop and the orator, had obtained a favourable audience; and the representatives of the emperor were compelled, in view of injured friendship, rather than the stern menaces of pride and power. A free and general pardon was granted to the city and citizens of Antioch; the pri son-doors were thrown open; and senators, who despaired of their lives, recovered the possession of their houses and estates; and the capital of the east was restored to the enjoyment of her ancient dignity and splendour. Theodosius condescended to praise the

The sedition of Thessalonica is sacrificed to a more subtle and productive of more dreadful consequences. That great city, the metropolis of all the Illyrian provinces, had been protected from the dangers of the Gothic war by strong fortifications, and a numerous garrison. Botherie, the general of those troops, and, as it should seem from his name, a barbarian, had among his slaves a beautiful boy, who excited the impure desires of one of the charioteers of the Circus. The insolent and brutal lover was tossed into prison by the order of Botherie; and he sternly rejected the importunate blandishments of the multitude, who, with the aid of the public voices, lamented the absence of their favourite; and considered the skill of a charioteer as an object of more importance than his virtue. The resentment of the people was inculcated by some previous disputes; and, as the strength of the garrison had been drawn away for the service of the interior, the freinds and officers, whose quarters were reduced by desertion, could not save the unhappy general from their licentious fury. Botherie, and several of his principal officers, were inhumanly murdered; their mangled bodies were dragged about the streets; and the emperor, who then resided at Milan, was alarmed by the intelligence, and wanted cruelty of the people of Thessalonica. The sentence of a dispassionate judge would have inflicted a severe punishment on the authors of the crime; and the merit of Botherie might contribute to exasperate the grief and indignation of his master. The fiery and choleric temper of Theodosius was impatient of the dilatory forms of a judicial inquiry; and he hastily resolved, that the blood of his lieutenant should be expiated by the blood of the guilty people. Yet his mind still fluctuated between the councils of eloquence and perswasion; and the zeal of the bishops had almost extorted from the reluctant emperor the promise of a general pardon; his passion was again inflamed by the flattering suggestions of his minister, Rufinus; and, after Theodosius had despachted the messengers of death, he attempted, when it was too late, to prevent the execution of his orders. The punishment of a Roman city was blindly committted to the undistinguishing sword of the barbarians; and the hostile preparations were concerted with the dark and perfidious artifice of an illegal conspiracy. The people of Thessalonica were treacherously invited, in the name of their sovereign, to the games of the circus: and such was their insatiable avidity for those amusements, that every consideration of fear, or suspicion, was disgardred by the numerous spectators. As soon as the assembly was complete, the soldiery, who secretly had been posted round the Circus, received the signal, not of the races, but of a general massacre. The promiscuous carnage continued three hours, without discrimination of strangers or natives, of age or sex, of innocence or guilt; the most moderate accounts state the number of the slain at seven thousand; and it is affirmed by some writers, that more than fifteen thousand were put to death. The massacre, committed in the name of Theodosius, was occasioned by the jealousy of Botherie. A foreign merchant, who had probably no concern in his murder, offered his own life, and all his wealth, to supply the place of one of his two sons; but, while the father hesitated with equal tenderness, while he was doubtful to choose, Botherie, by cutting off his suspense, by plunging their daggers at the same moment into the breasts of the defenceless youths. The apology of the assassins, that they were obliged to produce the prescribed number of heads, serves only to increase, by an appearance of order and design, the horror of the massacre, which was carried out by the commands of Theodosius. The guilt of the emperor is aggravated by his long and frequent residence at Thessalonica. The situation of the unfortunate city, the aspect of the streets and buildings, the dress and forms of the inhabitants, were similar, and even present, to his imagination; and Theodosius possessed a quick and lively sense of the existence of the people whom he destroyed. The respectful attachment of the emperor to the orthodox clergy, had disposed of this sacrifice of his subjects. Theodosius imitated the example of his sovereign; and he observed, with more surprise than displeasure, that all his secret counsels were immediately communicated to his minister, with the eagerness, which the feeble persuasion, that every measure of civil government may have some connexion with the glory of God, and the interest of the true religion. The monks and popularis of Callinicum, an obscure town on the frontier of Persia, excited by their own fanatism, and by the dispositions of the emperor, published a sentence against the author of the Valentinianists, and a synagogue of the Jews. The seditious prelate was condenmed, by the magistrate of the province, either to rebuild the synagogue, or to pay the damage; and this moderate sentence was confirmed by the emperor. But it was not confirmed by the archbishop of Milan. He dictated an epistle of censure and reproach, more suitable, perhaps, if the emperor had received the mark of circumcision, and renounced the faith of his baptism. Ambrose considers the toleration of the Jewish, as the persecution of the Christian, to be an injury to himself, and every true believer, would eagerly dispute with the bishop of Callinicum the merit of the deed, and the crown of martyrdom; and lamens, in the most pathetic terms, that the execution of the sentence would be fatal to the fame and salvation of Theodosius. As this private admonition did not produce an immediate effect, the archbishop from his pulpit, publickly addressed the emperor on his throne, nor would he consent to offer the oblation of the altar, till he had obtained from Theodosius a solemn and positive declaration, which secured the impunity of the bishop and monks of Callinicum. The recantation of Theo- dosius was sincere; and, during the term of his res- 2 The original evidence of Ambrose, (tom. ii. Epist. ii. p. 978.) Augustin., de Civit. tired to the country to indulge his grief, and to avoid the presence of Theodosius. But as the emperor was no less pious and fond of religion than Theodosius, he might have would render him the accomplice of his guilt, he represented, in a private letter, the enormity of the crime; which could only be effaced by the tears of penitence. The episcopal vigour of Ambrose was tempered by prudence; and he contented himself with signifying his sentiments to the emperor, to obtain the assurance, that he had been warned in a vision, not to offer the oblation in the name, or in the precence, of Theodosius; and by the advice, that he would confine himself to the use of prayer, without presuming to approach the altar of Christ, or to recieve the holy eucharist with hands that were still polluted with the blood of an innocent people. The emperor was deeply affected by his own reproaches, and by those of his spiritual father; and, after he had bewailed the miserable and irreparable consequences of his rash fury, he proceeded, in the accents of devotion, to perform his devotions in a solitary church of Milan. He was stopped in the porch by the archbishop; who, in the tone and language of an ambassador of heaven, declared to his sovereign, that private censure was not sufficient to atone for a public fault, or to appease the justice of the offended Deity. Theodosius humbly represented, that if he had contracted the guilt of homicide, David, the man after God's own heart, had been guilty, not only of murder, but of adultery. You have imitated David in his crime, imitate then his repentance," was the reply of the unadmonished Ambrose. The rigorous condition of punishment was accepted; and the public penance of Theodosius had been recorded as one of the most honourable events in the annals of the church. According to the mildest rules of ecclesiastical discipline, which were established in the fourth century, the crime of homicide was expiated by the penance of twenty years; and as it was impossible, in the period of human life, to purge the accumulated guilt of the massacre of Thessalonica, the murderer should have been excluded from the holy communion till the hour of his death. But the archbishop, consulting the maxims of religious policy, granted some temporary indulgence; he first reproved the archbishop, and his accomplices, for the crime which they had humiliated in the dust the pride of the diadem; and the public edification might be admitted as a weighty reason to abridge the duration of his punishment. It was sufficient, that the emperor of the Romans, stripped of the insignias of royalty, should appear in a mournful and supplicant posture; and that, in the midst of the church of Milan, he should humbly solicit, with sighs and tears, the pardon of his sins. In this spiritual cure, Ambrose employed the various methods of mildness and severity. After a delay of about eight months, Theodosius was restored to the communion of the church, and his case was recorded as one of the most remarkable translations of his synod. Cod. Theod. I. xvi. tit. viii. leg. 9. with abnegation of the emperor; and some critics think that Theo-principles, which could force a monarch, exalted above the apprehension of human punishment, to respect the laws, and ministers, of an invisible Judge. "The but the emperor of the Christians, who had been father, Valentinian, was not allowed to influence the government of his son. The pernicious attachment to the Ariotic sect, which Valentinian had imbibed from her example and instructions, was soon erased by the lessons of a more orthodox education. His growing zeal for the faith of the Catholic Church, and his desire of restoring the edifying influence of the ancient discipline of the church, are recorded by the historian in the most advantageous light, and as the best specimens of his prudence and firmness. Co... thority of Ambrose, disposed the catholics to entertain the most favourable opinion of the virtues of the young emperor. They applauded his chastity and temperance, his contempt of pleasure, his application to business, and his tender affection for his two sisters; which could not, however, seduce his impartial equity to pronounce an unjust sentence against the meanest of his subjects. But this amiable youth, before he had accomplished the twentieth year of his age, was oppressed by domestic treason; and the empire was again involved in the horrors of a civil war. Arbogastes, a gallant soldier of the nation of the Franks, held the second rank in the service of Gratian. On the death of his master he joined the standard of Theodosius, in which he conducted, by his valor and military spirit, to the destruction of the tyrant; and was appointed, after the victory, master-general of the armies of Gaul. His real merit, and apparent fidelity, had gained the confidence both of the prince and people; his boundless liberality corrupted the allegiance of the troops; and, whilst he was unreservedly esteemed as the pillar of the state, the bold and crafty barbarian was secretly determined either to rule, or to ruin, the empire of the west. The important commands of the army were distributed among the Franks; the emperor recommended to all the provinces and offices of the civil government; the progress of the conspiracy removed every faithful servant from the presence of Valentinian; and the emperor, without power, and without intelligence, insensibly sunk into the preciparious and dependent condition of a captive. He had accomplished all that his despotic authority, which he might arise only from the rash and impatient temper of youth, may have been admissible to the generous spirit of a prince, who felt that he was not unworthy to reign. He secretly invited the archbishop of Milan to undertake the office of a mediator; as the pledge of his sincerity and the guardian of his safety. Theodosius contrived to apprise the emperor of the cast of his helpless situation; and he declared, that, unless Theodosius could speedily march to his assistance, he must attempt to escape from the palace, or rather prison, of Vienna in Gaul, where he had imprudently fixed his residence in the midst of the most hostile faction. But the hopes of relief were distant and doubtful; and, as every day furnished some new provocation, the emperor, without strength or counsel, too hastily resolved to risk an immediate contest with his powerful opponent. Theodosius received Arbogastes on the threshold, and, as the count approached with some appearance of respect, delivered to him a paper, which dismissed him from all his employments. "My authority," replied Arbogastes with insulting coolness, "does not depend on the smile, or the frown, of a monarch;" and he contemptuously threw the paper on the ground. The indignant monarch snatched at the sword of one of the guards, which he struggled to draw from its scabbard; and it was not without some degree of violence that he was prevented from using the deadly weapon against his own person, or against himself. A few days after this extraordinary quarrel, in which he had exposed his resentment and his weakness, the unfortunate Valentinian was found strangled in his apartment; and some pains were employed to disguise the manifest guile, and to pervert the story. But the death of the young emperor had been the voluntary effect of his own despair. His body was conduct-neighbourhood of that city, and on the summit of a lofty mountain, the holy John 4 had constructed, with his own hands, an humble cell, in which he had dwelt above fifty years, without opening his door, without seeing the civil world, and without tasting any food that had been prepared for him. Five days of the week he spent in prayer and meditation; but on Saturdays and Sundays he regularly opened a small window, and gave audience to the crowd of suppliants who successively flowed from every part of the Christian world. The approach of Theodosius approached the window with respectful feet, proposed his questions concerning the event of the civil war, and soon returned with a favourable oracle, which animated the courage of the emperor by the assurance of a bloody, but infallible, victory. 7 The conquest of the province of Italy extended to the mountain hills, where he passed the discomfiture of his army, but without sleep, without provisions, and without hope; 8 except that strong assurance, which, under the most desperate circumstances, the independent mind may derive from the contemplation of fortune and of life. The triumph of his eunuch was celebrated by the insolent and dissolute joy of his camp; whilst the active and vigilant Arbogastes secretly detached a considerable body of troops to occupy the passes of the mountains, and to encompass the rear of the eastern army. The dawn of day discovered to the eyes of Theodosius the extent and the number of his danger; but his apprehensions were soon dispelled by a friendly message from the leaders of these troops, who expressed their inclination to desert the standard of the tyrant. The honorable and lucrative rewards, which they stipulated as the price of their perfidy, were granted without hesitation; and as it seemed impossible to repel them, or to subdue them, the emperor subscribed, on his own tablets, the ratification of the treaty. The spirit of his soldiers was revived by this seasonable reinforcement; and they again marched, with confidence, to surprise the camp of a tyrant, whose principal officers appeared to distrust either the constancy, or the success, of his army. In the heat of the battle, a violent tempest, 9 such as is often felt among the Alps, suddenly arose from the east. The army of Theodosius was sheltered by their position from the impetuosity of the wind, which blew a cloud of dust in the faces of the enemy, disordered their ranks, wrested their weapons from their hands, and diverted, or repelled, their ineffectual javelins. This accidental advantage was skillfully improved; the violence of the storm was magnified by the superstitious terrors of the Gauls; and they yielded without shame to the invisible powers of the pious emperor. His victory was decisive; and the deaths of his two rivals were distinguished only by the difference of their characters. The rhetorician Eugenius, who had almost acquired the dominion of the world, was reduced to implore the mercy of the conqueror, and the humble soldiers separated his head from his body, as he lay prostrate at the feet of Theodosius. Arbogastes, after the loss of a battle, in which he had discharged the duties of a soldier and a general, wandered several days among the mountains. But when he was convinced that his cause was desperate, and his escape impracticable, the intrepid barbarian imitated the example of the ancient Romans, and turned his sword against his own breast. The fate of the empire was determined in a narrow corner of Italy; and the legitimate successor of the house of Valentinian could not receive the submission of the provinces of the west. Those provinces were involved in the guilt of rebellion; while the emperor of the east immediately attacked the fortifications of his allies, assigned the post of honourable danger to the Goths, and cherished a secret wish, that the bloody conflict might diminish the pride and numbers of the barbarians. The emperors, Theodosius, and Honorius, general of the Iberians, died bravely on the field of battle. But the victory was not purchased by their blood: the Gauls maintained their advantage; and the approach of night protected the disorderly flight, or retreat, of the troops of Theodosius. The empire was divided into two great provinces, of which he passed the discomfiture, without sleep, without provisions, and without hopes; except that strong assurance, which, under the most desperate circumstances, the independent mind may derive from the contemplation of fortune and of life. The triumph of his eunuch was celebrated by the insolent and dissolute joy of his camp; whilst the active and vigilant Arbogastes secretly detached a considerable body of troops to occupy the passes of the mountains, and to encompass the rear of the eastern army. This accidental advantage was skillfully improved; the violence of the storm was magnified by the superstitious terrors of the Gauls; and they yielded without shame to the invisible powers of the pious emperor. His victory was decisive; and the deaths of his two rivals were distinguished only by the difference of their characters. The rhetorician Eugenius, who had almost acquired the dominion of the world, was reduced to implore the mercy of the conqueror, and the humble soldiers separated his head from his body, as he lay prostrate at the feet of Theodosius. Arbogastes, after the loss of a battle, in which he had discharged the duties of a soldier and a general, wandered several days among the mountains. But when he was convinced that his cause was desperate, and his escape impracticable, the intrepid barbarian imitated the example of the ancient Romans, and turned his sword against his own breast. The fate of the empire was determined in a narrow corner of Italy; and the legitimate successor of the house of Valentinian could not receive the submission of the provinces of the west. Those provinces were involved in the guilt of rebellion; while the inflexible courage of Ambrose alone had resisted the claims of successful usurpation. With a manly front, but with tears behind, the archbishop rejected the gifts of Eugenius, declined his correspondence, and withdrew himself from Milan, to avoid the odious presence of a tyrant; whose downfall he predicted in discreet and ambiguous language. The merit of Ambrose was applauded by the ancients, who secured the friendship of the people by his alliance with the church; and the clemency of Theodosius is ascribed to the humane intercession of the archbishop of Milan.1

After the defeat of Eugenius, the Roman war, as well as the war of Zosimus, was speedily put an end to. Eugenius, whose fate was fully foreseen, submitted to Theodosius, and received the penalties of infidelity. His death, only four months after his victory, was considered by the people as an unforeseen and fatal event, which destroyed, in a moment, the hopes of the rising generation. But the indulgence of case and luxury had secretly nourished the principles of desolation, and the faith of Theodosius would not protect the sudden and violent transition from the palace to the camp; and the increasing symptoms of a dropsey announced the speedy dissolution of the emperor. The opinion, and perhaps the interest, of the public had confirmed the division of the eastern and western empires; and the two royal thrones of Honorius and Arcadius, whom had already obtained, from the tenderness of their father, the title of Augustus, were destined to fill the thrones of Constantinople and of Rome. Those princes were not permitted to share the danger and splendor of the civil war, but as soon as Theodosius had triumphed over his unworthy rivals, he called his younger son, Honorius, to enjoy the fruits of the victory, and to receive the sceptre of the west. The arrival of Honorius at Milan was welcomed by a splendid exhibition of arms, and the camp which had been prepared for the campaign was changed into the camps of the legions; and the degeneracy of that which was of the times has been remarked by one of the greatest of the Roman princes. An historian, perpetually adverse to the fame of Theodosius, has exaggerated his vices, and his pernicious effects; but he has not concealed his moderate surplus; and the effeminate manners of their sovereign; that every species of corruption polluted the course of public and private life; and that the feeble restraints of order and decency were insufficient to resist the progress of that degenerate spirit, which sacrifices, without a blush, the comforts of the mind and the indulgence of the palate. The complaints of contemporary writers, who deplor the increase of luxury, and deprivation of manners, are commonly expressive of their peculiar temper and situation. There is a current of indolence and luxury, a universal view of the revolutions of society; and those who are capable of discovering the meek and secret springs of actions, which impel, in the same uniform direction, the blind and capricious passions of a multitude of individuals. If it can be affirmed, with any degree of truth, that the luxury of the Romans was more shameful and dissolute in the reign of Theodosius than in the age of Constantine, perhaps, or of Augustus, the alteration cannot be ascribed to any beneficial improvements, which had gradually increased the stock of national riches. A long period of calamity or decay must have checked the ardor of the people, who are disabled by the state of the people; and their profuse luxury must have been the result of that indolent despair, which enjoys the present hour, and declines the thoughts of futurity. The uncertain condition of their property discouraged the subjects of Theodosius from engaging in these enterprizes, which require the immediate expense, and promise a slow and distant advantage. The frequent examples of ruin and desolation tempted them not to spare the remains of a patrimony, which might, every hour, become the prey of the capacious Goth. And the moral and political consequences, which prevails in the confusion of a shipwreck or a siege, may serve to explain the progress of luxury amidst the misfortunes and terrors of a sinking nation.

The effeminate luxury, which infected the manners of courts and cities, had insensibly pressed into the camps of the legions; and their degeneracy has been marked by the pen of a military writer, who had accurately studied the genuine and ancient principles of Roman discipline. It is the just and important observation of Vegetius, that the infantry was more powerful and effectual than the legions, which composed the foundation of the city, to the reign of the emperor Gratian. The relaxation of discipline, and the disuse of exercise, rendered the soldiers less able, and less willing, to support the fatigues of the service; they complained of the weight of the armour, which they seldom wore; and they successively object the permission of laying aside both their cuirasses and their helmets. The heavy weapons of their ancestors, the short sword, and the formidable pilum, which had subdued the world, insensibly dropped from their feet. As the use of the shield is incompatible with that of the bow, they reluctantly matched into the field; condemned to suffer, either the pain of wounds, or the ignominy of flight, and always disposed to prefer the more shameful alternative. The cavalry of the Goths, the Huns, and the Alani, had felt the benefits, and adopted the use, of defensive armor; and, as they excelled in the management of missile weapons, they easily overwhelmed the naked and trembling legions, whose heads and breasts were exposed, without defense, to the arrows of the barbarians. The loss of armies, the destruction of cities, and the dishonour of the Roman name, inebriated the successors of Gratian to restore the helmets and cuirasses of the infantry. The enraged soldiers abandoned their own, and the public, defence; and their pusillanimous

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Final destruction of Paganism.—Introduction of the worship of saints, and relics, among the christians.

The ruin of paganism, in the age of Theodosius, is perhaps the only example of the total extirpation of any ancient and popular superstition; and may therefore deserve to be considered, as a singular event in the history of the human mind. The christians, more especially the Pelagian and Donatist sects, who had experienced the prudent delays of Constantine, and the equal toleration of the elder Valentinian; nor could they deem their conquest perfect or secure, as long as their adversaries were permitted to exist. The influence, which Ambrose and his brethren had acquired over the youth of Gratian, and the piety of Theodosius, was employed to infuse the maxims of persecution into the breasts of their imperial prolesytes. Two specious principles of religious jurisprudence were established, from whence they deduced a direct and rigorous conclusion against the interests of the empire, who still adhered to the ceremonies of their faith. The first of these points is, in some measure, guilty of the crimes which he neglects to prohibit, or to punish; and, that the idolatrous worship of fabulous deities, and real demons, is the most abominable crime against the supreme majesty of the Creator. The laws of Moses, and the examples of Jewish history, were hastily, perhaps erroneously, applied by the clergy to the mild and universal reign of christianity. The zeal of the emperors was excited to vindicate their own honour, and that of the Deity: and the temples of the Roman deities were destroyed about sixty years after the conversion of Constantine.

State of pagan Rome

From the age of Numa, to the reign of Gratian, the Romans preserved the regular succession of the several colleges of the sacerdotal order. Fifteen Pontiffs exercised their superintendence, and appointed the persons that were consecrated to the service of the gods; and the various questions which perpetually arose in a loose and traditioary system, were submitted to the judgment of their holy tribunal. Fifteen grave and learned Arches observed the face of the heavens, and presided over the mysteries of the heavens. Fifteen keepers of the Sibylline books (their name of Quinquecentenaries was derived from their number) occasionally consulted the history of future, and, as it should seem, of contingent, events. Six Vestals devoted their virginity to the guard of the sacred fire, and of the unknown prelates of the duration of Rome; which no mortal had been sought to beheld with impurity. Seven Epulo prepared the table of the gods, in conclusion may be considered as the immediate cause of the downfall of the empire.

Vegetius, de Re Militari, i. l. c. 10. The series of calamities, which before the war of Diocletian, that the Hero, to whom he dedicates his book, is the last and most ignobles of the Valentinians.

St. Ambrose (tom. ii. de Ost. Thud. p. 130) expressly states, and recommends the zeal of Justin in the destruction of idolatry. The Isaac of which he speaks may either mean the ancient seat of the Israelites in the Holy Land, or the temple of Solomon, which was the same. Eusebius (p. 467. ed. Grosny) is plainly inhuman. Neofilo jubet (the Mason Law) parci, nec frater, et per annum conjunctum aeternum vindicem tuum, &c.

Baye (tom. ii. p. 495, in his Commentaire Philosophique) justifies his idea of the Roman church on the royal and temporal reign of Justinian over the Jews. The attempt is6 ambitious.

De Provinciis (L.II. in iv. in. hie) has drawn a very awkward portrait of the Roman church; but the history of the Antiquities of Montefaucon's Antiquités, tom. i. p. 314.

of Rome the delicacy of the Christians was offended by the fumes of lascivious sacrifices.\(^1\)

But the Christians formed the least numerous party in the senate of Rome;\(^2\) and it was only by their absence, that they could express their dissent from the legal, though profane, acts of a pagan majority. In that sense, the sanguine hopes, which were, for a moment, revived and inflamed by the breath of fanatism. Four respectable deputations were successively voted to the imperial court,\(^3\) to represent the grievances of the priesthood and the senate; and to solicit the restoration of the altar of Victory. The first was presented by a Senator, whose influence was intrusted to the eloquent Symmachus,\(^4\) a wealthy and noble senator, who united the sacred characters of pontiff and augur, with the civil dignities of proconsul of Africa, and prefect of the city. The breast of Symmachus was animated by the warmest sentiment for the cause of expiring paganism: and his religious antagonists lamented the abuse of his genius, and the inefficacy of his moral virtues.\(^5\) The orator, whose petition is extant to the emperor Valentinian, was conscious of the difficulty and danger of the office which he had assumed. He knew that thedelete deceit and base falsehoods every age might attempt to reflect on the religion of his sovereign; humbly declares, that prayers and intreaties are his only arms; and artfully draws his arguments from the schools of rhetoric, rather than from those of philosophy. Symmachus endeavored to seduce the imagination of the young princes, by displaying the advantages of the godness of Victory; he insinuates, that the confiscation of the revenues, which were consecrated to the service of the Gods, was a measure unworthy of his liberal and disinterested character; and he mantains, that the Roman sacrifices would be deprived of their force and energy, if they were no longer celebrated at the expense, as well as in the name, of the republic. Even scepticism is made to supply an apology for superstitious. The great and incomprehensible secret of the universe eludes the inquiry of man. Where reason cannot instruct, custom may be permitted to guide; and every nation seems to consult the dictates of prudence, by a faithful attachment to those rites, and opinions, which have received the sanction of ages. If those ages have been crowned with glory and prosperity, if the most frequent and most brilliant blessings which they have solicited at the altars of the gods, it must appear still more advisable to persist in the same salutary practice; and to risk the unknown perils that may attend any rash innovations. The total of antiquity and truth was secured by the singular advantages to the religious of Numa; and Rome herself, the celestial genius that presided over the fates of the city, is introduced by the orator to plead her own cause before the tribunal of the emperors. Most excellent princes,\(^7\) says the venerable matron, fathers of your country! pity and respect my age, which has hitherto flown in an uninterrupted course of piety. Since I do not repent, permit me to continue in the practice of my ancient rites. Since I am born free, allow me to enjoy my domestic institutions. This religion has reduced the world under my laws. These rites have repelled Hannibal from the city, and the Gauls from the capitol. Were my gray hairs reserved for such intolerable disgrace! I am ignorant of the new system, that I am required to adopt; but I am well assured, that the correction of old age is always an ungrateful and ignominious office. The prudential motives of the orator had suppressed; and the calamities, which afflicted, or threatened, the declining empire, were unanimously implored, by the pagans, to the new religion of Christ and of Constantinian.

But the hopes of Symmachus were Conversion of the emperor, which was confirmed by the firm and avowed opposition of the archbishop of Milan;\(^8\) and who fortified the emperor against the fallacious eloquence of the advocate of Rome. In this controversy, Ambrose descendens to speak the language of a philosopher, and to ask, with all confidence, why it should be thought necessary to introduce an imaginary and invisible power, as the cause of those victories, which were sufficiently explained by the valour and discipline of the legions. He justly derides the absurd reverence for antiquity, which could only tend to discountenance the exertions of our own age. He assigns the human race into their original barbarism. From thence gradually rising to a more lofty and theological tone, he pronounces, that Christianity alone is the doctrine of truth and salvation; and that every mode of polytheism conducts its deluded votaries, through the paths of error, to the perdition of innocence. Ambrose's arguments like these, when they were suggested by a favourite bishop, had power to prevent the restoration of the altar of Victory; but the same arguments fell, with much more energy and effect, from the mouth of a conquering emperor, the gods of whom were dragged in triumph at the chariot-wheels of Theodosius.\(^9\) In a full meeting of the senate, the emperor proposed, according to the forms of the republic, the important question, Whether the worship of Jupiter, or that of Christ, should be the religion of the Romans? The liberty of suffrages, which he affected to allow, was destroyed by the hopes and fears that his presence inspired; and the arbitrary exile of Symmachus was a recent admonition, that it might be dangerous to oppose the wishes of the monarch. On a regular division of the senate, the emperor was condemned and degraded by the senates of a very large majority; and it is surprising, that any members should be found bold enough to declare, by their speeches and votes, that they were still attached to the interest of an abdicated deity. The hasty conversion of the senate must be attributed partly to the influence of private Turks; and many of these reluctant proselytes betrayed, on every favourable occasion, their secret disposition to throw aside the mask of odious dissimulation. But

\(^1\) The Notitia Urbis, more recent than Constantius, does not find these sacrifices to be named.
\(^2\) The senate of Rome, as was said before, was chiefly composed of the patricians, that is to say, of the senators elected for life.
\(^3\) Ambrose repeatedly affirms, in contradiction to common sense, (Epist. xliii. c. 2.) that the Senate of the Roman Empire had no right to the names of \(^4\) The first (A. D. 384.) to Gratian, who refused them audience. The second (A. D. 394.) to Valentinian, when he was deposed by Symmachus and Ambrose. The third (A. D. 398.) to Theodosian; and the fourth, (A. D. 402.) to Valentinian II., to Valens, and to Valentinianus (timetis, vol. iv. p. 372.-399.) fairly represents the whole transaction.
\(^5\) Symmachus's eloquence was invinted with an equal mixture of force and seductive honors, represented the emperor under the two characters of Pontifex Maximus and Senior Senators.
\(^6\) As if any one, says Prudentius, (in Symm. l. 639.) should dig in the mud with an instrument of gold and ivory. Even saints, and piously sons, treat this adversary with respect and civility.
they were gradually fixed in the new religion, as the cause of the ancient became more hopeless; they yielded to the authority of the emperor, to the fashion of the times, and to the interstices of their wives and children, who were instigated and governed by the clergy of Rome and the monks of the east. The edifying example of distinction to cause the Idols to be dissolved; by the rest of the nobility: the Bassi, the Paulini, the Graeci, embraced the christian religion; and the luminaries of the world, the venerable assembly of Catons, (such are the high-flown expressions of Prudentius,) were impatient to strip themselves of their pecuniary interest to cause the Christians to enter upon the profession; to assume the snowy robes of baptismal innocence; and to humble the pride of the consular faces before the tombs of the martyrs. The citizens, who subsisted by their own industry, and the populace, who were supported by the public liberality, filled the churches of the Latran, and Vixani, with an incessant throng of devout proselytes. The decrees of the senate, which proscribed the worship of idols, were ratified by the general consent of the Romans: the splendour of the capitol was defaced, and the solitary temples were abandoned to ruin and contempt. Rome subsisted composed of the orthodox and the heterodox; the ancient vanished provinces had not yet lost their reverence for the name and authority of Rome.

The filial piety of the emperors then the temples in their own persons engaged them to procure, with the utmost prudence and caution, some caution and tenderness, in the rejection of the laws of the ancient empire, and in the selection of the statutes which were to be adopted. Those statues served to the effect of the Christian triumph, and the destruction of the solitary Temples. The pious emperor, who had been suspended near twenty years since the death of Constantius, was vigorously resumed, and finally acquiesced in the execution of the example of Theodosius. Whilst that warlike prince yet struggled with the Goths he desired to maintain the glory but for the safety of the republic, he ventured to offer a considerable party of his subjects, by some acts which might perhaps secure the protection of heaven, but which must seem rash and unseasonable in the eye of human prudence. The success of his first experiments against the pagans, encouraged the pious emperor to reiterate and enforce his edicts of proscription; the same laws which had been originally published in the provinces of the east, were applied, after the defect of Maximus, to the whole extent of the western empire. They were resolved to level the Temples of the Christian triumph, and the destruction of the solitary Temples. Theodosius contributed to the triumph of the christian and catholic faith. He attacked superstition in her most vital part, by prohibiting the use of sacrifices, which he declared to be criminal as well as infamous; and of the terms of the edicts were too stringent, the impious curiosity which examined the entrails of the victims, every subsequent explanation tended to involve, in the same guilt, the general practice of immolation, which essentially constituted the religion of the pagans. As the temples had been erected for the purpose of sacrifice, it was the duty of a benevolent prince to remove from his subjects the dangerous temptation, of offending against the laws which he had enacted. A special commission was granted to Cynegius, the prætorian prefect of the east, and afterwards to the counts Jovinus and Gaudentius, two officials of the highest rank in the Christian empire. They were directed to shut the temples, to seize or destroy the instruments of idolatry, to abolish the privileges of the priests, and to confiscate the consecrated property for the benefit of the emperor, of the church, or of the army. Here the desolation might have stopped; and the naked edicts which were no longer employed in the services of idolatry, might have been protected from the destructive rage of fanaticism. Many of those temples were the most splendid and beautiful monuments of Grecian architecture; and the emperor himself was interested not to deface the splendour of his own cities, or to diminish the value of his own possessions. Those stately edifices might be suffered to remain, as so many lasting trophies of the victory of Christ. In the decline of the arts, they might be usefully converted into magazines, manufactures, or places of public assembly; and perhaps the desolation of the temples, which had been purified by holy rites, the worship of the true deity might be allowed to expiate the ancient guilt of idolatry. But as long as they subsisted, the pagans fondly cherished the secret hope, that an auspicious revolution, a second Julian, might again restore the religious worship, and the ancient ceremonies. As the Gentiles addressed their unavailing prayers to the throne, increased the zeal of the christian reformers to extinguish, without mercy, the root of superstition. The laws of the emperors exhibit some symptoms of a mild disposition: but their cold and languid efforts to curb the superstition were insufficient; the Christian princes, both the father and the son, in the same manner, addressed their unavailing prayers to the throne. The fanesy of the church. In Gaul, the holy Martin, bishop of Tours, marched at the head of his faithful monks to destroy the idols, the temples, and the consecrated objects of his extensive diocese; and, in the execution of this arduous task, the prudent ruler will judge whether Martin was supported by the aid of miraculous powers, or of carnal weapons. In Syria, the divine and excellent Maximus, as he is styled by Theodoret, a bishop animated with apostolic fervour, restored the Temples to the level with the ground; the solitary Temples, in which they were composed, were firmly cemented with lead and iron. The force of the strongest and sharpest tools had been tried without effect. person against the powers of darkness; a numerous troop of soldiers and gladiators marched under the episcopal banner, and he successively attacked the villages and country temples of the diocese of Apamea. Whenever any resistance or danger was apprehended, the champion of the faith, whose lance was not allowed him either to fix or fly, placed himself at a convenient distance, beyond the reach of darts. But this prudence was the occasion of his deaths: he was surprised and slain by a body of exasperated rustics; and the synod of the province pronounced without hesitation, that the holy Marcellus had sacrificed his life in the cause of God. In the support of this cause, the monks, who rushed, with tumultuous fury, from the desert, distinguished themselves by their zeal and diligence. They deserved the enmity of the pagans; and some of them might deserve the reproach of avarice and intemperance; of avarice, which they indulged at the expense of the people, who foolishly admired their tattered garments, bold palmae, and artificial paleness. A small number of temples were protected by the fears, the vileness, the insolence, and the falsehoods, of the ecclesiastical governors. The temple of the celestal Venus at Carthage, whose sacred precincts formed a circumference of two miles, was judiciously converted into a christian church;1 and a similar consecration has preserved inviolate the majestic dome of the Pantheon at Rome, and the utmost pious jealousies of the Emperors. The world an army of fanatics, without authority, and without discipline, invaded the peaceful inhabitants; and the ruin of the fairest structures of antiquity still displays the ravages of these barbarians, who alone had time and inclination to execute such laborious destruction.

The temple of Serapis at Alexandria does not appear to have been one of the native gods, or monsters, who sprung from the fruitful soil of superstitious Egypt.2 The first of the Ptolemies had been commanded, by a dream, to import the mysterious stranger from the coast of Pontus, where he had been long adored by the inhabitants of Nineve; but his attributes and his reign were so incredible to the people, without a proof, that it became proper, whether he represented the bright orb of day, or the gloomy monarch of the subterraneous regions.3 The Egyptians, who were obstinately devoted to the religion of their fathers, refused to admit this foreign deity, and called it a malevolent principle. But the treacherous priests, who were seduced by the liberality of the Ptolemies, submitted, without resistance, to the power of the god of Pontus; an honourable and domestic genealogy was provided; and this fortunate discovery was introduced into the throne and bed of Osiris,4 the husband of Isis, and the celestial monarch of Egypt. Alexandria, which claimed his peculiar protection, gloried in the name of the city of Serapis. His temple,5 which rivalled the pride and magnificence of the capital, was erected on the spacious summit of an artificial mount, raised one hundred steps above the level of the adjacent parts of the city; and the interior caviety was divided into two stories, and distributed into vaults and subterraneous apartments. The consecrated buildings were surrounded by a quadrangular porteau; the stately halls, and exquisite statues, displayed the triumph of the arts; and the treasures of ancient learning were preserved in the famous library, which is now the new splendour from its ashes.6 After the edicts of Theodosius had severely prohibited the sacrifices of the pagans, they were stilltolerated in the city and temple of Serapis; and this singular indulgence was imputed more to the superstition terrified of the christians themselves: as if they had feared to abolish those ancient rites, which could alone secure the inquisitions of the Nile, the harvests of Egypt, and the subsistence of Constantinople.7

At that time8 the archiepiscopal throne underwent a change, and ecclesiastical opifius,9 the perpetual enemy of peace and virtue; a bold, bad man, whose hands were alternately polluted with gold, and with blood. His pious indignation was excited by the honours of Serapis; and the insults which he offered to an ancient chapel and dedication of Ptolemies, strongly supported by the laws, and declared more important and dangerous in enterprise. In the tumultuous capital of Egypt, the slightest provocation was sufficient to inflame a civil war. The votaries of Serapis, whose strength and numbers were much inferior to those of their antagonists, rose in arms at the instigation of the philosopher Olympius,7 who exhorted them to die in the defence of the altars of the gods. The pagan fanatics fortified themselves in the temple, or rather fortress, of Serapis; repelled the besiegers by daring sallies, and a resolute defence; and, by the inhuman cruelties which they exercised on their christian prisoners, obtained the last consolation of despair. The efforts of the prudent magistrate were usefully exerted for the establishment of a truce, till the answer of Theodosius should determine the fate of Serapis. The two parties avowed, in the form of an individual and the imperial rescript was publicly read. But when a sentence of destruction against the idols of Alexandria was pronounced, the christians set up a shout of joy and exultation, whilst the unfortunate pagans, whose fury had given way to an abyss of consternation, was torn by their enemies, by their flight or obscurity, the resentment of their enemies. Theodosius proceeded to demolish the temple of Serapis, without any other difficulties, than those which he found in the weight and solidity of the materials; but these obstacles proved so insuperable, that he was obliged to leave the foundations:

10. Tillemont, Mem. Eccles. tom. iii. p. 411—420. The ambitious situation of Olympius (as zeal is the enemy of Chrestianity) produces a sort of impertinence; yet, upon the other hand, the author has truly inclined a respectful eye to the character of the man, and peculiarly admired his, as well as his own, spirit and learning. and to content himself with reducing the ediﬁce itself to a heap of rubbish, a part of which was soon after- wards cleared away, to make room for a church, erec- ted in honour of the Christian martyrs. The valuable library of Alexandria was pillaged or destroyed; and near twenty years afterwards, the appearance of the empty space, with sad regrets and indignation of every spectator whose mind was now darkened by religious prejudice. The compositions of ancient genius, so many of which have irretrievably perished, might surely have been excepted from the wreck of idolatry, for the amusement and instruction of suc- ceeding ages; and perhaps, his sitting on the golden tripod and the archbishop might have been satiated with the rich spoils, which were the reward of his victory. While the images and vases of gold and silver were carefully melted, and those of a less valuable metal were contemptuously broken and cast into the streets, Theophilus laboured to expose the frauds and vices of the ministers of the idols: their dexterity in the management of the loadstone; their secret methods of introducing a human actor into a hollow statue; and their scandalous abuse of the conﬁdence of devout husbands, and unsuspecting females. Charges like these may seem to some to prove the modern Pagans are not repugnant to the crafty and interested spirit of superstition. But the same spirit is equally prone to the base practice of insulting and calumnating a fallen enemy; and our belief is naturally check- ed by the refection, that it is much less difﬁcult to in- volve the truth, and to charge the wicked with the crime of fraud. The colossal statue of Serapis was involved in the ruin of his temple and religion. A great num- ber of plates of different metals, artiﬁcially joined together, composed the majestic ﬁgure of the deity, who tottered on either side the walls of the sanctuary. The head, the arm, and the sceptre which he bore in his left hand, were extremely similar to the ordinary representations of Jupiter. He was distinguished from Jupiter by the basket, or bushel, which was placed on his head; and by the embattled monster, which he held in his right hand: the head and body of a serpent branching into three tails, which were again terminated by the triple heads of a dog, a lion, and a wolf. It was conﬁdently afﬁrmed, that if any impious hand should dare to violate the majesty of the god, the heavens and the earth would immediately return its original chalk. An intrepid soldier, animated by zeal, and armed with his trusty battle axe, ascended the ladder; and even the christian multitude expected, with some anxiety, the event of the combat. He aimed a vigorous stroke against the cheek of Serapis: the cheek fell to the ground; the thunder was still silent, and both the heavens and the earth continued to preserve their accustomed order and tranquillity. The victorious soldier repeated his blows: the huge idol was overthrown, and broken in an inanimate idol, by the sacrifice of a guiltless vir-

tim. 7 The art of sacrificing, and the practice of di-vination by the entrails of the victim, are declared (without any regard to the object of the inquiry) a crime of high treason against the state; which can be punished only by the death of the guilty. The rite of pagans, of professing, whether bloody and atrocious, are abolished, as highly injurious to the truth and honour of religion; luminaries, garlands, frankincense, and libations of wine, are sacramentally begun and condemned; and the harmoneous and obscene gestures of the household gods, are included in this rigorous proscription. The use of any of these profane and illegal ceremonies, subjects the offender to the forfeiture of the house, or estate, where they have been performed; and if he has artfully chosen the property of another for the scene of his impiety, he is compelled to discharge, without delay, a heavy fine of twenty-five pounds of gold, or more than one thousand pounds sterling. A fine, not less considerable, is imposed on the connivance of the secret enemies of religion, who shall acquit of the avowal of their fellow-citizens, either to reveal, or to punish, the guilt of idolatry. Such was the persecuting spirit of the laws of Theodosius, which were repeatedly enforced by his sons and grandsons, with the loud and unanimous applause of the christian world. 8 open at the cruel reigns of Decius and oppressed,

Diocletian, christianity had been proscribed, as a revolt from the ancient and heretical religion of the empire; and the unjust suspicions which were entertained of a dark and dangerous motive, were, in some measure, countenanced by the inseparable union, and rapid conquests, of the catholic church. But the same excuses of fear and ignorance cannot be applied to the christian emperors, who violated the precepts of humanity and of the gospel.

The experience of ages had betrayed the weakness, as well as folly, of paganism, the height of reason and of faith had already exposed, to the greatest part of mankind, the vanity of idols; and the declining sect, which still adhered to their worship, might have been permitted to enjoy, in peace and obscurity, the religious customs of their ancestors. Had the pagans been animated by the undaunted zeal, which possessed the minds of the primitive believers, the triumph of the curch must have been stained with blood; and the martyrs of Jupiter and Apollo might have embraced the glorious opportunity of devoting their lives and fortunes to the glory of their altars. But such obstinate zeal was not congenial to the temper of careless temper of polytheism. The violent and repeated strokes of the orthodox princes, were broken by the soft and yielding substance against which they were directed; and the ready obedience of the pagans protected them from the pains and penalties of the Theodosian code. 9

Instead of asserting, that the authority of the gods was superior to that of the emperor, they desisted, with a plaintive murmur, from the use of those sacred rites which their sovereign had commanded. If they were sometimes tempted, by a sally of passion, or by the folly of profaneness, to insult their favourite superstition; their humble repentance disarmed the severity of the christian magistrate, and they seldom refused to atone for their rashness, by submitting, with some secret reluctance, to the yoke of the gospel. The churches were filled with the increasing multitude of these unworthy proselytes, who had conformed, from temporal motives, to the reigning reliigion; and whilst they devoutly imitated the postures, and recited the prayers, of the faithful, they satisfied their conscience by the silent and sincere invocation of the gods antiquity. If the pagans waited patience to suffer, the gentle and discreet edicts of the sorrowed myriads, who deplored the ruin of the temples, yielded, without a contest, to the fortune of their adversaries. The disorderly opposition of the peasants of Syria, and the populace of Alexandria, to the rage of private revenge, was silenced by thedignity and authority of the emperor. The pagans of the west, without contributing to the elevation of Eugenius, disgraced, by their partial attachment, the cause and character of the usurper. The clergy vehemently exclaimed, that he aggravated the crime of rebellion by the guilt of apostasy; that, by his permission, the altar of Victory was again restored; and that the idolatrous symbols of Jupiter and Hercules were displayed in the field, against the invincible standard of the cross.

But the vain hopes of the pagans were soon annihilated by the victories of Julianus, which they had beseeched to the resentment of the conqueror, who laboured to deserve the favour of heaven by the extirpation of idolatry. 10

A nation of slaves is always prepared to applaud the clemency of their master, who, in the abuse of absolute power, does not extend to the last extent of injustice and oppression. Theodosius might undoubtedly have proposed to his pagan subjects the alternative of baptism or of death; and the eloquent Libanius has praised the moderation of a prince, who never enacted, by any positive law, that all his subjects should be made immediately embrace and practise the religion of their sovereign. 11 The profession of christianity was not made an essential qualification for the enjoyment of the civil rights of society, nor were any peculiar hardships imposed on the sectaries, who celeriously reduced them to the yoke of Ovid, and obstinately rejected the miracles of the gospel. The palace, the schools, the army, and the senate, were filled with declared and devout pagans; they obtained, without distinction, the civil and military honours of the empire. Theodosius distinguisheled his liberal regard for virtue and genius, by the beneficent grace of Julianus and Civitatis; and the historical and philosophical remains of Eumapius, Zosimus, 12 and the fanatic teachers of the school of Plato, betray the most furious animosity, and contain the sharpest invectives, against the sentiments and conduct of their victorious adversaries. If these audacious libels were publicly known, we must applaud the good sense of the christian princes, who viewed, with a smile of contempt, the last struggles of superstition and despair. But the imperial laws, which prohibited the sacrifices and ceremonies of paganism, were rigidly executed; and every hour contributed to destroy the influence of a religion, which was supported by custom, rather than by argument.

The devotion of the true philosopher, may be secretly nourished by prayer, meditation, and study; but the exercise of public worship appears to be the only solid foundation of the religious sentiments of the people, which derive their force from imitation and habit. The interruption of that public exercise may completely paralyse for a period the most important vant work of a national revolution. The memory of theological opinions cannot long be preserved, without the artificial helps of priests, of temples, and of books.
The ignorant vulgar, whose minds are still agitated by the blind hopes and terrors of superstition, will be soon persuaded by their superiors, to direct their vows to the reigning deities of the age; and will insensibly imbibe an ardent zeal for the support and propagation of the new doctrine, which spiritual hunger at first compelled them to accept. The generation that arose in the world after the promulgation of the imperial laws, which were indented by the sentence of the Synch; and so rapid, yet so gentle, was the fall of paganism, that only twenty-eight years after the death of Theodosius, the faint and minute vestiges were no longer visible to the eye of the legislator.

The worship of the saints and martyrs was adorned, to the description of the seapods, as a dreadful amazing prodigy, which covered the earth with darkness, and restored the ancient dominion of chaos and of night. They relate, in solemn and pathetic strains, that the temples were converted into sepulchres, and that the defiled places, which had been adorned by the labours of the faithful, were now fouled by the relics of christian martyrs. "The monks" (a race of filthy animals, to whom Eunapius is tempted to refuse the name of men) "are the authors of the new worship, which, in the place of those deities who are conceived by the understanding, has substituted the meanest and most contemptible slaves. The heads, salted and pickled, of those infamous malefactors, who for the multitude of their crimes have suffered a just and ignominious death; their bodies, still marked by the impression of the lash, and the scars of those tortures, which were inflicted by the sentence of the eccle-siastate; such" (continues Eunapius) "are the gods which the earth produces in our days; such are the martyrs, the supreme arbiters of our prayers and petitions to the Deity, whose tombs are now consecrated as the objects of the veneration of the people." Without approving the malice, it is natural enough to share the surprise, of the sophist, the spectator of a revolution, which raised those obscure victims of the laws of Rome, to the rank of celestial and invincible protectors of the Roman empire. The grateful respect of the christians for the martyrs of the faith, was exalted by time and circumstance. The period of the first and the most illustrious of the saints and prophets were deservedly and fifty years after the glorious death of St. Peter and St. Paul, the Vatican and the Ostian road were distinguished by the tombs, or rather by the trophies, of those spiritual heroes. In the age which followed the conversion of Constantine, the emperor, the consuls, and the generals of armies, decently visited the sepulchres of a tametaker and a fisherman; and their venerable bones were deposited under the altars of Christ, on which the bishops of the royal city continually offered the unbloody sacrifice. The new capital of the eastern world, unable to produce any ancient and domestic trophies, was enriched by the spoils of dependent provinces. The bodies of St. Andrew, St. Luke, and St. Timothy, had reposed, near three hundred years, in the obscure graves, from whence they were transported, in solemn procession, to the extraordinary veneration of the people, which the influence of Constantine had founded on the banks of the Thracian Bosphorus. About fifty years afterwards, the same banks were honoured by the presence of Samuel, the judge and prophet of the people of Israel. His ashes, deposited in a golden vase, and covered with a silken veil, were delivered to the same cards into each other's hands. The relics of Samuel were received by the people, with the same joy and reverence which they would have shown to the living prophet; the highways, from Palestine to the gates of Constantinople, were filled with an uninterrupted procession; and the names of the prophet and apostle were ushered before the head of the most illustrious members of the clergy and senate, advanced to meet his extraordinary guest, who had always desired and claimed the honours of kings. The example of Rome and Constantinople confirmed the faith and discipline of the catholic world. The honours of the saints and martyrs, after a feeble and ineffectual murmur of profane reason, were universally established; and in the age of Ambrose and Jerome, something was still deemed wanting to the sanctity of a christian church, till it had been consecrated by some portion of holy relics, which fixed and enlightened the devotee on the ruins of the ages.

In the long period of twelve hundred General rec. years, which elapsed between the reign of Constantine and the reformation of Luther, the worship of saints and relics corrupted the pure and perfect simplicity of the christian faith, and some symptoms of degeneracy may be observed even in the first generations which adopted and cherished this pernicious innovation.

I. The satisfactory experience, that 1.Paibalos marthe relics of saints were of more valuable tyr to regard than gold or precious stones, by a close, ly to multiply the treasures of the church. Without much regard for truth or probability, they invented names for skeletons, and actions for names. The fame of the apostles, and of the holy men who had imitated their virtues, was darkened by religious fiction. To the invincible genealogy of genuine and primitive martyrs, 8 M. de Beaumont (Hist. du Manichesisme, lib. ii. p. 563.) has appplied a worldly sense to the pious observation of the clergy of Smyrnia, who carefully preserved the relics of St. Polycarp the martyr. they added myriads of imaginary heroes, who had never existed, except in the fancy of crafty or credulous legendaries; and there is reason to suspect, that Tours might not be the only diocese in which the bones of a multifactor were adored instead of those of a saint. A superstitious practice, which tended to increase the terrification of faith and credulity, insensibly extinguished the light of history, and of reason, in the christian world.

II. Miracles. They would have been much less rapid and victorious, if the faith of the people had not been assisted by the indispensible aid of wonders and miracles, to ascertain the authenticity and virtue of the most suspicious relics. In the reign of the younger Theodosius, Lucian, a presbyter of Jerusalem, and the ecclesiastical minister of the village of Caphargamnula, about twenty miles from the city, related a very singular dream, which, to remove his doubts, had been repeated on three successive Saturdays. A venerable figure stood before him in the silence of the night, with a long beard, a white robe, and a gold rod; an- nounced himself by the name of Gamaliel, and revealed that an angel had been sent to him from his own corner, with the bodies of his son Abbas, his friend Nicodemus, and the illustrious Stephen, the first martyr of the christian faith, were secretly buried in the adjacent field. He added, with some impatience, that it was time to uncover himself, and publish his name. Therefore, for their obscure person, that their appearance would be salutary to a disturbed world; and that they had made choice of Lucian to inform the bishop of Jerusalem of their situation and their wishes. The doubts and difficulties which still retarded this important dis-covcry, were successively removed by new visions; and the ground was opened by the bishop, in the presence of an innumerable multitude. The coffins of Gamaliel, of his son, and of his friend, were found in regular order; but when the fourth coffin, which contained the remains of Stephen, was shown to the light, the earth trembled, and an odoriferous and that of paradise, was smelt, which instantly cured the various diseases of seventy-three of the assistants.

The companions of Stephen were left in their peaceful residence of Caphargamnula: but the relics of the first martyr of the universal church, in solemn procession, were

The bishop of Hippo designed as a solid and immortal proof of the truth of Christianity. Augustin solemnly declares, that he had selected those miracles only for the martyr's name. Many prodigies were omitted, or forgotten; and Hippo had been less favourably treated than the other cities of the province. And yet the bishop enumerates above seventy miracles, of which three were resurrections from the dead, in the space of two years, and within the limits of his own diocese. If we enlarge our view to all the dioceses, and all the saints, of the christian world, it will not be easy to calculate the number and variety, nor the ingenuity of this inexhaustible source. But we may surely be allowed to observe, that a miracle, in that age of superstition and credulity, lost its name and its merit, since it could scarcely be considered as a deviation from the ordinary laws of nature.

III. The innumerable miracles, of III. Revival of the Theordus, of which the tombs of the martyrs were the polytheism. perpetual theatre, revealed to the pious believer the actual state and constitution of the invisible world; and his religious speculations appeared to be founded on the first basis of faith and experience. Whatever might be the condition of vulgar souls, in the long interval between the dissolution and the resurrection of their bodies, it was evident that the superior spirits of the saints and martyrs did not consume that portion of their existence in silent and inglorious sleep. It was the mission of their own corporeal remains, in place of their habitation, or the nature of their felicity) that they enjoyed the lively and active consciousness of their happiness, their virtue, and their powers; and that they had already secured the possession of their eternal reward. Most of these prodigies exceeded the faculties surpassed the measure of the human imagination; since it was proved by experience, that they were capable of hearing and understanding the various petitions of their numerous votaries; who, in the same moment of time, but in the most distant parts of the world, invoked the name and assistance of Stephen or of Martin. The confidence of their petitioners was formed on the persuasion that the saints, who reigned with Christ, cast an eye of pity upon earth; that they were warmly interested in the prosperity of the catholic church; and that the individuals, who imitated the example of their faith and piety, were the peculiar and favourite objects of their most tender reg-

Sometimes, indeed, their friendship might be influenced by considerations of a less exalted kind: they viewed, with partial affection, the places which had been sanctified by their presence; or, if those mysterious scenes, they performed by their death, their burial, or the possession of their relics. The meaner passions of pride, avarice, and revenge, may be deemed unworthy of a celestial breast; yet the saints themselves descended to testify their grateful approbation of the merit of their votaries: and the slave who had been sojourning in those impious wretches, who violated their magnificent shrines, or disbelieved their supernatural power.

Atrocious, indeed, must have been the guilt, and strange would have been the scepticism, of those men, if they had obstinately resisted the proofs of a divine agency, which the whole range of the animal creation, and even the subtle and invisible operations of the human mind, were compelled to obey. The immediate, and almost instantaneous, 8 Eusebius, (Hist. Ecclesiastique, iii. c. 80.) at Minucius, the relics of St. Stephen converted in eight days, 549 Jews; with the help, indeed, of some wholesome severities, such effects, that were supposed to follow the prayer, or the offence, satisfied the christians of the ample measure of favour and authority which the saints enjoyed in the presence of the Supreme God; and it seemed almost superfluous to inquire, whether they were continually obliged to intercede before the throne of greatness, or to most distant divinities. After the exercise, according to the dictates of their benevolence and justice, the delegated powers of their subordinate ministry. The imagination, which had been raised by a painful effort to the contemplation and worship of the Universal Cause, eagerly embraced such inferior objects of adoration; and was more readily priviged to its gross conceptions and imperfect faculties.

The sublime and simple theology of the primitive christians was gradually corrupted; and the monarchy of heaven, already clouded by metaphysical subtleties, was degraded by the introduction of a popular mythology which tended to restore the reign of polytheism.

IV. As the objects of religion were gradually reduced to the standard of the imagination, the rites and ceremonies were interpolated; and those most powerfully to affect the senses of the vulgar. If, in the beginning of the fifth century, Tertullian, or Lactantius,  had suddenly raised from the dead, to assist at the festival of some popular saint, or martyr,  they would have gazed with astonishment, and indignation, on the pro-fanely profaned, and secularized, objects which were reserved as the doors of the church were thrown open, they must have been offended by the smoke of incense, the perfume of flowers, and the glare of lamps and tapers, which diffused, at noon-day, a gawdy, superfluous, and in its own light. If they approached the balustrade of the altar, and gazed upon the path by which the pilgrim is conducted into the great assembly, consisting for the most part of strangers and pilgrims, who resorted to the city on the vigil of the feast, and who already felt the strong intoxication of fanaticism, and, perhaps, of wine: their devout kisses were imprinted on the walls and pavement of the sacred edifice; and their fervent prayers were directed, whatever might be the language of their church, to the bones, the blood, or the ashes, of the saint, which were usually concealed, by a linen or silk veil, from the eyes of the vulgar.
The Christians frequented the tombs of their holy saints, in the hope of obtaining, from their powerful intercession, every sort of spiritual, but more especially of temporal, blessings. They implored the preservation of their health, or the cure of their infirmities; the fruitfulness of their barren wives, or the safety and happiness of their children. Wherever the tombs of the sanc tuary were visited, they were encircled by the memory and relics of those heavenly patrons. The walls were hung round with symbols of the favours which they had received: eyes, and hands, and feet, of gold and silver: and edifying pictures, which could not long escape the abuse of indiscreet or idolatrous devotion, represented the image, the attributes, and the miracles of the tutelar saint. The same uniform original spirit of superstition might suggest, in the shortest or most distant churches, the idea of deceiving the credulity, and of affecting the senses, of mankind:  but it must ingeniously be confessed, that the ministers of the catholic church imitated the profane model, which they were impatient to destroy.
The most respectable bishops had persuaded them-sv selves, that the sacred rustics would more cheerfully renounce the superstition of paganism, if they found some resemblance, some compensation, in the bosom of christianity. The religion of Constantine achieved, in less than a century, the final conquest of the Roman empire; but the victors themselves were insensibly subdued by the arts of their vanquished rivals.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Final division of the Roman empire between the sons of Theodosius.—Reign of Arcadius and Honorius.—Administration of Rufinus and Stilicho.—Revolt and defeat of Gildo in Africa.

The genius of Rome expired with Theodosius; the last of the successors of Augustus and Constantine, who had advanced in the field at the head of their armies, and whose authority was universally acknowledged throughout the whole extent of the empire. The memory of his virtues still continued, however, to protect the feeble and inexperienced youth of his two sons: the devastations of the east, Arcadius and Honorius were saluted, by the unanimous consent of mankind, as the lawful emperors of the cast, and of the west; and the oath of fidelity was eagerly taken by every order of the state; the senates of old and new Rome, the clergy, the magistrates, the soldiers, and the people. Arcadius, who then was about eighteen years of age, was born in Spain, in the humble habitation of a private family. But he received a princely education in the palace of Constan-tiople; and his inglorious life was spent in that peaceful and splendid seat of royalty, from whence he appeared to reign over the provinces of Thrace, Asia, Minor, Syria, and Egypt, from the lower Danube to the confines of Persia and Ethiopia. His younger brother, Honorius, assumed, in the eleventh year of his age, the nominal government of Italy, Africa, Gaul, Spain, and Britain; and the troops, which guarded the frontiers of his kingdom, were opposed, on one side, to the Caledonians, and on the other, to the Moors. The great and martial prefecture of Illyricum was divided between the two princes; the defence and possession of the provinces of Noricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, still belonged to the western empire; but those two large provinces of Dacia and Macedonia, which Gratian had intrusted to the valour of Theodosius, were for ever united to the empire of the east.
The boundary in Europe was not very different from the line which now separates the Germans and the Turks; and the respective advantages of territory, riches, population, and military strength, were fairly balanced and compensated, in this final and permanent division of the Roman empire. The hereditary sceptre of the sons of Theodosius appeared to be the gift of nature, and of their father; the generals and ministers had the resemblance of superstition, which could not be imitated, might be traced from Japan to Mexico. Warburton has seized this method, which he discourses on, and then it too general and absolute.
(Dor Vine Legation, iv. c. 150.)

The imitation of paganism is the subject of Dr. Middleton's agreeable letter from Rome. Warburton's animadversions obliged him to connect (vol. ii. p. 120—123) the history of the two religions; and to prove the antipathy of the christian copy.
been acclimated to adorn the majesty of the royal infants; and the army and people were not admonished of their rights, and of their power, by the dangerous example of a recent election. The gradual discovery of the impiety of Theodorus and Honorius, and the repeated calamities of their reign, were not sufficient to obliterate the deep and early impressions of loyalty. The subjects of Rome, who still revered the persons, or rather the names, of their sovereigns, held with equal abhorrence, the rebels who opposed, and then revolted, the authority of the throne.

Theodosius had tarnished the glory of his reign by the elevation of Rufinus; an odious favourite, who, in an age of civil and religious faction, has deserved, from every party, the imputation of every crime. The strong impulse of ambition and avarice had urged Rufinus to abandon his native country, an obscure corner of Gaul, to advance his fortune in the capital of the east; the talent of bold and ready eloquence qualified him to succeed in the lucrative profession of the bar; and his success in that profession was a gradual step to the most honourable and important employments of the state. He was raised, by just degrees, to the station of master of the offices. In the exercise of his various functions, so essentially connected with the whole system of civil government, he acquired the confidence of his master; yet, in the hereditary massacre of Thessalonica, the cruel Rufinus inflamed the fury, without imitating the repentance, of Theodosius. The minister, who viewed with profound indifference the rest of mankind, never forgave the appearance of an injury; and his enemies had foretold, in his opinion, the merit of all public services. Promotus, the master general of the infantry, had saved the empire from the invasion of the Ostrogoths; but he indignantly supported the pre-eminent of a rival, whose character and profession he despised; and, in the midst of a public council, the insults provoked to chastise with a blow the indecent pride of the favourite. This act of violence was represented to the emperor as an insult, which it was incumbent on his dignity to resent. The disgrace and exile of Promotus were signified by a peremptory order, to repair, without delay, to a military station on the banks of the Danube; and the death of that general (though he was slain in a skirmish with the barbarians) was imputed to the perfidious arts of Rufinus. The sacrifice of a hero gratified his revenge; the honours of the consulship elided his vanity; but his power was still imperfect and precarious, as long as the important posts of prefect of the east, and of prefect of Constantinople, were filled by Tatian, and his son Proculus; whose united authority balanced, for some time, the ambition and favour of the offices. The two prefects were accused of rapine and corruption in the administration of the laws and finances. For the trial of these illustrious offenders, the emperor constituted a special commission; several judges were named to share the guilt and reproach of injustice; but the right of pronouncing the sentence was reserved to the emperor alone, and that president was Rufinus himself. The father, stripped of the privilege of the east, was thrown into a dungeon; but the son, conscious that few ministers can be found innocent, where an enemy is their judge, had secretly escaped; and Rufinus must have been condemned in his own case, perhaps, without a verdict. If despotism had not condescended to employ the basest and most ungenerous artifices, the prosecution was conducted with an appearance of equity and moderation, which flattered Tatian with the hope of a favourable event: his confidence was fortified by the solemn assurances and peremptory oaths of the president, who presumed to interpose the sacred name of Theodosius himself; and the unhappy father was at last persuaded to recall, by a private letter, the fugitive Proculus. He was instantly seized, examined, condemned, and put to death; the suburbs of Constantinople, with a precipitation which disgraced the eloquence of the emperor. Without respecting the misfortunes of a consular senator, the cruel judges of Tatian compelled him to behold the execution of his son: the fatal cord was fastened round his own neck; but in the hour of death the populace seized his body. In the relief of a speedy death, he was permitted to consume the miserable remainder of his old age in poverty and exile. The punishment of the two prefects might, perhaps, be excused by the exceptional parts of their own conduct; the enmity of Rufinus might be palliated by the jealous and unanswerable nature of ambition: but he indulged a spirit of revenge, essentially repugnant to prudence and to justice, when he degraded their native country of Ly西亚 from the rank of Roman provinces; stigmatized a guiltless people with a mark of ignominy; and declared that the countrymen of Taba, Ier and Proculus should for ever remain incapable of holding any employment of honour or advantage, under the imperial government. The new prefect of the east (for Rufinus instantly succeeded to the vacant honours of his adversary) was not diverted, however, by the name, criminal pursuits, of Constantinople, of the religious duties, which in that age were considered as the most essential to salvation. In the suburb of Chalcedon, surnamed the Oak, he had built a magnificent villa; to which he devoutly added a stately church, consecrated to the apostles Peter and St. Paul, which was essentially sanctified by the prayers and penance of a regular society of monks. A numerous, and almost general, synod of the bishops of the eastern empire was summoned to celebrate, at the same time, the dedication of the church, and the baptism of the founder. This double ceremony was performed with extraordinary pomp; and when Rufinus was purified, in the holy font, from all the sins that he had hitherto committed, a venerable hermit of Egypt rashly proposed himself as the sponsor of a proud and ambitious statesman.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

The character of Theodocius imposed on his minister the task of hypocrisy, which disguised, and sometimes restrained, the abuse of power; and Rufinus was apprehensive of disturbing the idle slumber of a prince, still capable of exerting the abilities, and the virtues, which had raised him to the throne. But the absence and, soon afterwards, the death, of the emperor, conferred the absolute authority of Rufinus over the person and dominions of Arcadius; a feebly youthful, whom the imperious prefect considered as his pupil, rather than his sovereign. Regardless of the public opinion, he indulged his passions without remorse, and without resistance; and his malignant and rapacious spirit rejected every passion that might have contributed to his own glory, or the happiness of the people. His avarice,\(^1\) which seems to have prevailed, in its corrupt mind, over every other sentiment, attracted the wealth of the east, by the various arts of partizan, and general, tout; oppressive taxes, scandalous bribery, in-moderate fines, unjust confiscations, forced or fictitious testaments, by which the tyrant despoiled of their lawful inheritance the children of strangers, or eneemies; and the public sale of justice, as well as of favours, with his pupils without remorse, and withou-

\(^1\) Montesquieu (Esprit des Lois, I. xii, c. 12) praises one of the laws of Theodocius (ix. 8) which, he says, was on the point of being repealed. The word is an original phrase of the subjects for cuius, to discount the prosecution of treasonable, or sacrificial, crimes. A word which, in its literal meaning, always points out the existence of tyranny; but a tautological expression of the special profession, or intellectual wishes, of the prince, or his ministers. Thus, I am afraid, is a just, though invidious, canonical canon of criticism.

and of the times; disgraced his benefactor, by the contrast of a virtuous and temperate administration; and presumed to refuse an act of injustice, which might have tended to the profit of the emperor's uncle.
Arcadius was easily persuaded to resent the supposed insult; and the prefect of the east resolved to execute himself the man of the emperor. He instructed his minister against this ungrateful delegate of his power.
He performed with incessant speed the journey of seven or eight hundred miles, from Constantinople to Antitoch, entered the capital of Syria at the death of and spread universal consternation among a people igno-mant of his designs, but not ignorant of the execution.
The count of the fifteen provinces of the east was drugged, like the vilest malfeasant, before the arbitrary tribunal of Rufinus. Notwithstanding the clearest evidence of his integrity, which was not impeached even by the voice of an accuser, Lucian was condemned, almost without a trial, to suffer a cruel and ignominious punishment. The ministers of the tyrant, by the order, and in the presence, of their master, beat him on the neck with leather thongs, armed at the extremities with hoods; and when he fainted under the violence of the pain, he was removed in a close litter, with the impossibility of his not discovering the ignominious city. No sooner had Rufinus perpetrated this inhuman act, the sole object of his expedition, than he returned, amidst the deep and silent curses of a trembling people, from Antioch to Constantinople; and his diligence was accelerated by the hope of accomplishing, without delay, a second capital of his daughter with the emperor of the east.\(^2\)

This Allusion of Rufin. (I. in Rufin. I. 241) is again explained by it reached the house of the sons of Promotus, the principal eunuch respectfully entered the mansion, invested the fair Eudoxia with the imperial robes, and conducted her in triumph to the palace and bed of Arcadius.\(^7\) The secrecy, and success, with which this conspiracy against Rufinus had been conducted, impressed Stilicho with the rideousness of his course. He considered Rufinus, a minister, who had suffered himself to be deceived, in a post, where the arts of deceit and dissimulation constituted the most distinguishing merit. He considered, with a mixture of indignation and fear, the victory of an aspiring eunuch, who had so secretly captivated the heart of his sovereign, and the disgrace of his daughter, whose interest was inseparably connected with his own, wounded the tenderness, or at least the pride, of Rufinus. At the moment when he flattered himself that he should become the father of a line of kings, a foreign maid, who had been educated in the house of his implacable enemies, was introduced into the imperial bed; and Eudoxia soon displayed a superiority of sense and spirit, to improve the ascendant which her beauty must acquire over the mind of a young and youthful husband. The emperor would soon have been disposed, if fortune, to destroy the powerful subject, whom he had injured; and the unconsciousness of guilt deprived Rufinus of every hope, either of safety or comfort, in the retirement of a private life. But he still possessed the most effectual means of defending his dignity, and perhaps of opposing the ambition of the emperor. The character of Rufinus seemed to justify the accusations, that he conspired against the person of his sovereign, to seat himself on the vacant throne; and that he had secretly invited the Huns and the Goths to invade the provinces of the empire, and to increase the public confusion. The subterraneous plot, whose life had been spent in the intrigues of the palace, opposed, with equal arms, the arithmetical measures of the eunuch Eutropius: but the timid soul of Rufinus was astonished by the hostile approach of a formidable rival, of the great Stilicho, the general, or rather the master, of the empire of the west.\(^8\) of a long series of illustrious pretenders; and the slight mention of his father, an officer of barbarian cavalry, in the service of Valens, seems to countenance the assertion, that the general, who so long commanded the armies of Rome, was descended from the semi-gods of antiquity; and that whenever he moved, with lofty steps, through the streets of Constantinople, he was regarded by the stranger, who displayed, in a private condition, the awful majesty of a hero. From his earliest youth he embraced the profession of arms; his prudence and valour were soon distinguished in the field; the horsemen and archers of the east admired his superior dexterity; and in each degree of his military promotions, the public judgment always prevented and approved the choice of the sovereign. He was named by Theodosius, to ratify a treaty with the monarch of Persia: he supported, during that important embassy, two elegies to the Roman name; and after his return to Constantinople, the empress Flacilla, in her brother and general, united the same manly and humane character with the same intimate and honourable alliance with the imperial family.

Theodosius had been prompted, by a pious motive of fraternal affection, to adopt, for his own, the daughter of his brother Honorius: the beauty and acquisitiveness of the princess, had soon established her on the throne, by the obsequies court; and Stilicho obtained the preference over a crowd of rivals, who ambitiously disputed the hand of the princess, and the favour of her adoptive father.\(^{12}\) The assurance that the husband of Serena would be faithful to the throne, which he was permitted to approach, enraged the emperor to the extremest indignation; and the chances of the fortunes, and to employ the abilities, of the sagacious and intrepid Stilicho. the manes of another Patroclus. The virtues and victories of Stilicho deserved the hatred of Rufinus: and the arts of calumny might have been successful, if the tender and vigilant Serena had not protected her husband against his domestic foes, whilst he vanquished in the field the enemies of the empire. 4 Theodorus continued continually to interpose. Hence it was that, with unexampled vigour he delegated the government of the palace, and of the east; but when he marched against the tyrant Eugenius, he associated his faithful general to the labours and glories of the civil war; and, in the last moments of his life, the dying monarch recommended to his son a candidate who should be constantly repulsed by Rufinus. The ambition and the abilities of Stilicho were not unequal to the important trust; and he claimed the guardianship of the two empires during the minority of Arcadius and Honorius. 5 The first measure of his administration, or rather of his reign, displayed to the nations the vigour and activity of a spirit worthy to command. He passed the Alps in the depth of winter; descended the stream of the Rhine, from the fortress of Basili to the marches of Batavio; reviewed the state of the garrisons; repressed the enterprises of the Germans; and, after establishing along the banks a firm and honourable peace, returned with increased vigour. The person and court of Honorius were subject to the master-general of the west; and the armies and provinces of Europe obeyed, without hesitation, a regular authority, which was exercised in the name of their young sovereign. Two rivals only remained to dispute the claims, and to provoke the vengeance, of Stilicho. Within the limits of Africa, Glicio, the Moor, maintained a proud and dangerous independence; and the minister of Constantine asserted his equal reign over the emperor, and the empire, of the east.

6 The impartiality which Stilicho affected, and the policy of his brothers, engaged him to regulate the equal division of the arms, the jewels, and the magnificent wardrobe and furniture, of the deceased emperor. 7 But the most important object of the inheritance consisted of the numerous legions, cohorts, and squadrums, of Romans, or barbarians, whom the event of the civil war had united under the standard of Theodosius. The various multitudes of Europe and Asia, exasperated by recent animosities, were overawed by the authority of a single man; and the rigid discipline of Stilicho protected the lands of the empire from the ravage of multitudes of barbarians. Anxious, however, and impatient, to relieve Italy from the presence of this formidable host, which could be useful only on the frontiers of the empire, he listened to the just supplications of the minister of Arcadius, declared his intention of re-conducting in person the troops of the east; and dexterously employed the run sord of a Gothic tumult, to conceal his private designs of ambition and revenge. 8 The guilty soul of Rufinus was alarmed by the approach of a warrior and a rival, whose cunning he feared; he computed, with increasing terror, the narrow space of his life and greatness; and, as the last hope of safety, erected a fabric of the terrors of his son, and of Stilicho, who appears to have directed his march along the sea-coast of the Hadrarit, which was not far distant from the city of Thessalonica, when he received a peremptory message, to recall the troops of the east, and to declare, that his nearer approach would be considered an act of hostility. The prompt and unexpected obedience of the general of the west, convinced the vulgar of his loyalty and moderation; and, as he had already engaged the afection of the eastern troops, he recommended to their zeal the execution of his bloody design, which might be accomplished in his absence, with less danger perhaps, and with less reproach. Stilicho left the command of the troops of the east to Gnaeus, the Goth, on whose fidelity he firmly relied; with an assurance, at least, that the hardy barbarian would never be diverted from his purpose by any consideration of fear or remorse. The soldiers were vigorously persuaded to punish the memory of Stilicho, and of Rome; and such was the general hatred which Rufinus had excited, that the fatal secret, communicated to thousands, was faithfully preserved during the long march from Thessalonica to the gates of Constantinople. As soon as they had resolved his death, they condescended to flatter his pride; the ambitious prefect was seduced to believe, that those powerful auxiliaries might be tempted to place the diadem on his head; and the treasures which he distributed, with a tardy and reluctant hand, were accepted by the indignant multitude, as an insult, rather than as a reward. At the head of a mile of a single column, the field of Mars, before the palace of Hebdomon, the troops halted; and the emperor, as well as his minister, advanced, according to ancient custom, respectfully to salute the power which supported their throne. As Rufinus passed along the ranks, and disguised, with studied courtesy, his innate haughtiness, the wings insensibly wheeled from the right and left, and enclosed the devoted victim within the circle of their arms. Before he could reflect on the danger of his situation, Gnaeus gave the signal of death; a daring and forward soldier plunged his sword into the breast of the guilty prince, and his body fell on the altars of the gods, together with the head of the afflicted emperor. If the agonies of a moment could execute the crimes of a whole life, or if the outrages inflicted on a breathless corpse could be the object of pity, our humanity might perhaps be affected by the horrid circumstances which accompanied the murder of Rufinus. His mangled body was abandoned to the brutal fury of the populace of either sex, who hastened in crowds, from every quarter of the city, to trample on the remains of the haughty minister, at whose frown they had so lately trembled. His right hand was cut off, and carried through the streets of Constantinople, in cruel mockery, to excite an execration against the avengers of tyrants, whose head was publicly exposed, borne aloft on the point of a long lance. 9 According to the savage maxims of the Greek republics, his innocent family would have shared the punishment of his crimes. The savage and dangerous revolutionary had, for his safety to the influence of religion. He protected them from the rage of the people; and they were permitted to spend the remainder of their days in a monastery.

Claudian of the existence of the Deity; but the pros-

The prudent Stilicho, instead of persisting to force the inclinations of a prince, and people, who rejected his A. worthy favourite: and his reluctance to involve the two empires in a civil war displayed the moderation of a minister, who had so often signalized his military spirit and abilities. But if Stilicho had any longer endured the revolt of Arsenius, he would have betrayed the security of the capital, and the majesty of the western emperor, to the capricious insolence of a Morish rebel. Gildo, 4 the brother of the tyrant Fir-mus, had preserved and obtained, as the reward of his apparent fidelity, the immense patrimony which was forfeited by treason; long and meritorious service, in the armies of Rome, and, lastly, to him the dignity of a

The favours of Arcadius fomented a secret and irreconcileable war against a formidable hero, who aspired to govern, and to defend the two empires of Rome, and the two sons of Theodosius. They incessantly laboured, by dark and treacherous machinations, to deprive him of the esteem of the prince, the respect of the people, and the friendship of the barbarians.
The emperor, who was repeatedly the victim of a dagger of hired assassins; and a decree was obtained, from the senate of Constantinople, to declare him an enemy of the republic, and to confiscate his ample possessions in the provinces of the east. At a time when the only hope of delaying the ruin of the Roman empire consisted in the firm union, and reciprocal aid, of all the nations to whom it had been gradually communicated, the subjects of Arcadius and Honorius were instructed, by their respective masters, to view each other in a foreign, and even hostile, light; to re-judge in their mutual calamities, and to embrace, as their faithful allies, the barbarians, whom they exected to invade the territories of their countrymen. 5 The and learning.

demand to supply Rome with the customary tribute, or rather subsidy, of corn. In every division of the empire, the five provinces of Africa were invariably assigned to the care of the father, or guardian, of the emperor, and governed that extensive country in the name of Honorius; but his knowledge of the character and designs of Stilicho, soon engendered him to address his homage to a more distant and feeble sovereign. The minister of the Augustan court, against him he was the head of a rebellious party; and the specious hope of adding the numerous cities of Africa to the empire of the west, tempted them to assert a claim, which they were incapable of supporting, either by reason or by arms. He is condemning by the Roman senate.

A.D. 376.

When Stilicho had given a firm and determined defence of the Byzantine court, he solemnly accused the tyrant of Africa before the tribunal, which had formerly judged the kings and nations of the earth; and the image of the republic was revived, after a long interval, under the reign of Honorius. His speeches, his orations, his conduct, and his character, were continually exposed to the attacks and odium of the multitude. Claudian, who had been the master of the world, would have applauded, with conscious pride, the representation of ancient freedom; if they had not long since been accustomed to prefer the solid assurance of bread, to the unsubstantial visions of liberty and greatness. The subsistence of Rome depended on the harvests of Africa; and it was evident, that a declaration of war would be the signal of famine. The prefect Symmachus, who presided in the disputation before the senate, admonished the minister of his just capacities to the discharge of his enervating duties. The dangerous Moor should prohibit the exportation of corn, the tranquillity, and perhaps the safety, of the capital, would be threatened by the hungry rage of a turbulent multitude. The prudence of Stilicho concealed his apprehensions, and he succeeded in averting the unhappy consequences of the event.

The cause of Rome, and the conduct of the African war, were intrusted by the emperor to the care of his general, and the ancient and ardent enemy of the private injuries of the tyrant. The spirit of discord, which prevailed in the house of Nabal, had excited a deadly quarrel between two of his sons, Gildo and Mascezel. The usurpation, with impolitic rage, the life of his younger brother, whose courage and abilities he feared; and Mascezel, oppressed by superior power, took refuge in the court of Milan; where he soon received the cruel intelligence, that his two innocent and helpless children had been murdered by his inhuman father. The monarchical rage was kindled by the desire of revenge. The vigils Stilicho already prepared to collect the naval and military forces of the western empire; and he had resolved, if the tyrant should be able to wage an equal and doubtful war, to march personally against him. But his timely required his presence, and as it might be dangerous to weaken the defence of the frontier, he judged it more advisable, that Mascezel should attempt this arduous adventure, at the head of a chosen body of Gallic veterans, who had lately served under the standard of Eugenius, among these troops, who were extolled to convince the world that they could subvert, as well as defend, the throne of a usurper, consisted of the Jovian, the Heracleian, and the Augustan, legionis; of the Persian auxiliaries; of the soldiers, who displayed in their banners the symbol of a lion, and of the troops which were distinguished by the auspicious causes of Fortuna, and Invincible. Yet such was the smallness of their establishments, or the difficulty of recruiting, that these seven bands, of high dignity and reputation in the service of Rome, amounted to no more than five thousand effective men. The fleet of galleys and transport-ships sailed to the destined haven of Pisa, in Tuscany, and steered their course to the little island of Capraria; which had borrowed that name from the wild goats, its original inhabitants, whose place was now occupied by a new colony of a strange and savage appearance. The whole island (says an ingenious traveller) is chosen (by those whom it is filled, or rather defiled, by men, who fly from the light. They call themselves Mondo, or solitaries, because they choose to live alone, without any witnesses of their actions. They fear the gifts of fortune, from the apprehension of losing them; and, lest they should be miserable, they embrace the poverty of the war. The island is an absurd choice! how perverse their understanding! to dread the evils, without being able to support the blessings, of the human condition. Either this melancholy madness, is the effect of disease, or those, who are engaged in the minute pursuits of science, to exercise on their own bodies the tortures which are inflicted on miserable slaves by the hand of justice. Such was the contempt of a profane magistrate for the monks of Capraria, who were revered, by the pious Mascezel, as the chosen servants of God. Claudian, in whose presence some of these monks were suspended by the cross, exhorted them to embark on board the fleet; and it is observed, to the praise of the Roman general, that his days and nights were employed in prayer, fasting, and the occupation of singing psalms. The devout leader, who, with such a reinforcement, appeared confident of victory, avoided the dangerous rocks of Corsica, coasted along the eastern side of Sardia and secured his ships against the violence of the south wind, by casting anchor in the safe and capacious harbour of Cagliari, at the distance of one hundred and forty miles from the African shores.

Gildo was prepared to resist the invasion with all the forces of Africa. By the liberality of his gifts and promises, he endeavored to secure the doubtful allegiance of the Roman soldiers, whilst he paid a visit to his standards in the distant tribes of Gutalia and Ethiopia. He proudly reviewed an army of seventy thousand men, and boasted, with the rash presumption which is the forerunner of disgrace, that his numerous cavalry would trample under their horses! But the troops of Mascezel, and involve, in a cloud of burning sand, the natives of the cold regions of Gaul and Germany.

But the Moor, who commanded the legions of Honorius, was too well acquainted with the manners of his countrymen, to entertain any serious apprehension of a mankind of barbarians, and only relied on his shield, instead of a arm, of a protection, which was protected only by a man; who were totally disarmed as soon as they had darted their javelin from their right hand; and whose horses had never been taught to bear the control, or to obey the guidance of the bridle. He fixed his camps of five thousand veterans in the face of a superior enemy, and, after the delay of three days, gave the signal of a general engagement. As Mascezel advanced before the front with fair offers of peace and pardon, he encountered one of the foremost standard-bearers of his enemies who, on his refusal to yield, struck him on the arm with his sword. The arm, and the standard, sunk under the weight of the blow; and the imaginary act of submission was hastily repeated by all the standards of the line. At this signal the disaffected cohort solemnly repeated the name of their lawful sovereign; the barbarians, astonished by the defection of their Roman allies, dispersed, according to their custom, in tumultuary flight; and Mascezel obtained the honours of an easy, and almost bloodless, victory.

The tyrant escaped from the field of battle to the seashore; and threw himself into a small vessel, with the hope of reaching in safety some friendly port of the empire of the cast; but the obstinacy of the wind drove him back into the harbour of Tabarca, which had acknowledged, with the rest of the province, the dominion of Honorius, and the authority of his lieutenant. The inhabitants, as a proof of their repentance and loyalty, seized and confined the person of Gildo in a dungeon; and his own despair saved him from the intolerable torture of supporting the presence of the enemy. But the number of his brethren, of his spoils, of Africa, were laid at the feet of the emperor; but Stilicho, whose moderation appeared more conspicuous and more sincere in the midst of prosperity, still affected to consult the laws of the republic; and referred to the senate and people of Rome the judgment of so many illustrious generals. The trial was public and solemn; but the judges, in the exercise of this obsolete and precarious jurisdiction, were impotent to punish the African magistrates, who had intercepted the subsistence of the Romano people.

The rich and guilty province was oppressed by the imperial ministers, who had a visible interest to multiply the number of the accomplices of Gildo; and if an edict of Honorius seems to check the malicious industry of informers, a subsequent edict, at the distance of ten years, continues and renewes the proscription. But the Moor, who commanded the legions of Honorius, had been incensed at the time of the general rebellion. 1 The adherents of the tyrant who escaped the first fury of the soldiers and the judges, might derive some consolation from the tragic fate of his brother, who could not obtain his pardon for the extraordinary services which he had performed. After he had finished an important war in the space of a single winter, Mascezel was received at the court of Milan with loud applause, affected gratitude, and secret jealousy; 2 and his death, which, perhaps, was the effect of accident, has been considered as the crisis of Stilicho. In the passage of Christian history, the death of a barbarous prince, who had accompanied the master-general of the west, was suddenly thrown from his horse into the river; the officious haste of the attendants was restrained by a cruel and perfidious smile, which they observed on the countenance of Stilicho; and while they delayed the necessary assistance, the unfortunate Mascezel was irrecoverably drowned. 1 The joy of the African triumph was happily connected with the nuptials of the emperor Honorius, and of his cousin Maria, the daughter of Stilicho. The formidable alliance seemed to invest with the power of the minister with the authority of a parent over his submission. The muse of Claudian was not silent on this propitious day; 3 he sung, in various and lively strains, the happiness of the royal pair; and the glory of the hero, who confirmed his union, and supported their throne. The ancient fables of Greece, which had almost ceased to be the object of religious faith, were saved from oblivion by the genius of poetry. The picture of the Cyrrin grove, the seat of harmony and love; the triumphant progress of Venus over her native seas, and the mild influence which her presence diffused in the palace of Milan, express to every age the natural sentiments of the heart, in the just and pleasant language of allegorical fiction.

But the amorous impiance, which Claudian attributes to the young prince, 4 must excite the smiles of the court; and his beauteous spouse (if she deserved the praise of beauty) had not much to fear or to hope from the passions of her lover. Honorius was only in the fourteenth year of his age; 5 Maria was only nineteen; and the danger of posterity, the consummation of the royal nuptials.

Maria died a virgin, after she had been ten years a wife; and the chastity of the emperor was secured by the coldness, or, perhaps, the debility, of his constitution. 6 His subjects, who attentively studied the character of the young monarchs, 7 thought that Honorius was without passions, and consequently without talents; and that his feeble and languid disposition was alike incapable of discharging the duties of his rank, or of enjoying the pleasures of his age. In his early youth he made some progress in the useful art of riding and drawing the bow; but he soon relinquished these fatiguing occupations, and the amusement of feeding poultry became the serious and daily care of the monarch of the west, 2 who resigned the reins of empire to the firm and skillful hand of his guardian Stilicho. The experience of history will countenance the suspicion, that a prince who was born in the purple, received a worse education than the meanest peasant of his dominions; and that the ambitious minister suffered him to attain the age of manhood, without attempting to excite his courage, or to enlighten his understanding. 3 The predecessors of Honorius were accustomed to amuse, by their example, or at least by their presence, the valour of the legions; and the dates of their laws attest the perpetual activity of their imperial predecessors, and the public enemy, from a motive either of gratitude or of policy, was attentive, amidst the general devastation, to spare the private estates of the unpopular prefect. The Goths, instead of being impelled by the blind and headstrong passions of their chiefs, were now directed by the bold and artful genius of Alaric. This ambition, which was the noble race of the Balti, 4 which yielded only to the royal dignity of the Amanil; and he had solicited the command of the Roman armies; and the imperial court provoked him to demonstrate the folly of their refusal, and the importance of their loss. Whatever hopes might be entertained of the conquest of Constantinople, the judicious general soon abandoned an impracticable enterprise. In the midst of a divided council, and a discontented people, the emperor Arcadius was terrified by the aspect of the Gothic arms; but the want of wisdom and valor was supplied by the strength of the Amanil; and the fortified ports, both on the sea and land, might securely brace the impotent and random dart of the barbarians. Alaric disdained to trample any longer on the prostrate and ruined countries of Thrace and Dacia, and he resolved to seek a plentiful harvest of fame and riches in a province which had been called the most the rage of war. 5

The character of the civil and military officers, on whom Rufinus had devolved the government of Greece, confirmed the public suspicion, that he had betrayed the ancient seat of freedom and learning to the Gothic invaders. The province of Thessaly, which had been consecrated by a respectable father; and Gerontius, who commanded the provincial troops, was much better qualified to execute the oppressive orders of a tyrant, than to defend, with courage and ability, a country most remarkably fortified by the hand of nature. Alaric had traversed, without resistance, the plains of Macedonia and Thessaly, as far as the foot of Mount Oeta, a steep and woody range of hills, almost impervious to his cavalry. They stretched from east to west, to the edge of the sea-shore; and left, between the precipice and the mountain-gulp, an interval of three hundred feet, which, in some places, was contracted to a road capable of admitting only a single carriage. 6 In this narrow pass of Thermopylae, where Leonidas and the three hundred Spartans had gloriously devoted their lives, the Goths might have been stopped or destroyed, by a skilful general; and perhaps the view of that sacred spot might have kindled some sparks of military ardour in the breasts of the degenerate Greeks. The troops which had been posted to defend the straits of Thermopylae, retired, as they were directed, without attempting to disturb the secure and rapid passage, 5 and the Goths, after defeating the Phocians and Beotians, were instantly covered by a deluge of barbarians; who massacred the males of an age to bear arms, and drove away the beautiful

4 Aliaric marches into Greece. A. D. 395.
5 The return of the Goths. —They plunder Greece. —Two great invasions of Italy by Alaric and Radagonus. —They are repulsed by Stilicho. —The Gothic nation in arms. —The barbarian auxiliaries erected their independent standard; and boldly avowed the hostile designs which they had long cherished in their ferocious minds. Their countrymen, who had been condemned, by the conditions of the last treaty, to a life of tranquillity and labour, despaired of their fames at the first sound of the trumpet; and eagerly resolved the weapons which they had reluctantly laid down. The barriers of the Danube were thrown open; the savage warriors of Scythia issued from their forlorn and desolate country; and the unceasing efforts of the winter allowed the poet to remark, "that they rolled their ponderous wagons over the broad and icy back of the indignant river." 6 The unhappy natives of the provinces to the south of the Danube submitted to the calamities, which, in the course of twenty years, were almost grown familiar to their imagination; and the various troops of barbarians, who gloried in the Gothic name, were irregularly spread from the woody shores of Dalmatia, to the walls of Constantinople. The interruption, or at least the diminution, of the subsidy, which the Goths had received from the prudent liberality of Theodosius, was the specious pretence of their revolt: the affront was imitated by their contempt for the unwarlike son of Theodosius; and their resentment was inflamed by the weakness, or treachery, of the minister of Arcadius. The frequent visits of Rufinus to the camp of the barbarians, whose arms and apparel he affected to imitate, were considered as a sufficient evidence of his guilty conspiracy; and the public enemy, from a motive either of gratitude or of policy, was attentive, amidst the general devastation, to spare the private estates of the unpopular prefect. The Goths, instead of being impelled by the blind and headstrong passions of their chiefs, were now directed by the bold and artful genius of Alaric. This ambition, which was the noble race of the Balti; which yielded only to the royal dignity of the Amanil; and he had solicited the command of the Roman armies; and the imperial court provoked him to demonstrate the folly of their refusal, and the importance of their loss. Whatever hopes might be entertained of the conquest of Constantinople, the judicious general soon abandoned an impracticable enterprise. In the midst of a divided council, and a discontented people, the emperor Arcadius was terrified by the aspect of the Gothic arms; but the want of wisdom and valor was supplied by the strength of the Amanil; and the fortified ports, both on the sea and land, might securely brace the impotent and random dart of the barbarians. Alaric disdained to trample any longer on the prostrate and ruined countries of Thrace and Dacia, and he resolved to seek a plentiful harvest of fame and riches in a province which had been called the most the rage of war.

8 Zosimus (l. v. 253-255.) is our best guide for the conquest of Carthage; but the facts and allusions of Claudian are so numerous, and of so various a nature, that it would be difficult to summarize them in a single passage.

females, with the spoil, and cattle, of the flaming whirlwinds. The traveler who adopted the Grecian seat could easily discover the deep and bloody traces of the march of the Greeks; and Thebes was less indebted for her preservation to the strength of her seven gates, than to the eager haste of Alaric, who advanced to occupy the city of Athens, and the inundation of the Bosphorus. The anxiety of the refugees caused him to prevent the delay and danger of a siege by the offer of a capitulation; and as soon as the Athenians heard the voice of the Gothic herald, they were easily persuaded to deliver the greatest part of their wealth, as the ransom of the city of Minerva, and the temple of the goddess. They were routed, made prisoner, and observed with mutual fidelity. The Gothic prince, with a small and select train, was admitted within the walls; he indulged himself in the refreshment of the bath, accepted a splendid banquet which was provided by the magistrate, and affected to show that he was not ignorant of the manners of civilized nations. But the whole territory of Attica, from the promontory of Sunium to the town of Megara, was blasted by his baleful presence; and, if we may use the comparison of a contemporary philosopher, the Scironian floods covered the Hellenic shore with the skin of a slaughtered victim. The distance between Megara and Corinth could not much exceed thirty miles; but the bad road, an expressive name, which it still bears among the Greeks, was, or might easily have been made, impassable for the march of an army. The Scironian floods covered the inland country; the Scironian rocks approached the water's edge, and hung over the narrow and winding path, which was confined above six miles along the sea-shore. The passage of those rocks, so infamous in every age, was terminated by the isthmus of Corinth; and a small body of firm and intrepid soldiers might have successfully defended a temporary intrenchment of five or six miles from the Ionian to the Aegean sea. The confidence of the cities of Pelo- ponnnesus in their natural rampart, had tempted them to neglect the care of their ancient walls, and the avoice of the Roman governors had exhausted and betrayed the unhappy province. Corinth, Argos, Sparta yielded without resistance to the arms of the Greeks; and the most fortunate of the inhabitants were saved, by death, from beholding the slavery of their families. Thebes, Mycenae, Orchomenus, and other cities, the vases and statues were distributed among the barbarians, with more regard to the value of the materials, than to the elegance of the workmanship; the female captives submitted to the laws of war; the enjoyment of beauty was the reward of valor; and the misfortunes of their fathers, relations, &c. of their nation, were justly attributed, which was justified by the example of the heroic times. The descendants of that extraordinary people, who had considered valor and discipline as the walls of Sparta, no longer remembered the name of the conqueror, or the honors of their ancestors Pellenæus himself. It is not formidable than Alaric. "If thou art a god, thou wilt not hurt those who have never injured thee; if thou art a man, advance—and thou wilt find men equal to thyself." From Thermopylae to Sparta, the leader of the Goths pursued his victorious march, Plataiai near the source of the Priamian Helicon, and one of the advocates of expiring paganism has confidently asserted, that the walls of Athens were guarded by the goddess Minerva, with her formidable Agis, and by the angry phantom of Achilles, and that the conqueror was dismayed by the presence of the host of the dead, and returned, as if he had been the least accidentally, to extinguish the last remains of paganism; and the mysteries of Ceres, which had subsisted eighteen hundred years, did not survive the destruction of Eleusis, and the calamities of Greece.

The last hope of a people who could in any case no longer depend on their arms, their gods, or their sovereigns, was placed in the powerful assistance of the general of the west; and Stilicho, who had not been permitted to repulse, advanced to challenge the invader of Greece. A numerous fleet was equipped in the ports of Italy; and the troops, after a short and prosperous navigation over the Ionian sea, were safely disembarked on the isthmus, near the ruins of Corinth. The wooden and mountainous country of Arcadia, the fabulous residence of Pan and the Dryads, became the scene of a long and doubtful conflict between two generals not unworthy of each other. The skill and perseverance of the Roman at length prevailed; and the Goths, after sustaining a considerable loss from disease and desertion, gradually retreated to the lofty mountain of Parnassus, through the territory of Thessaly, to the frontiers of Elis; a sacred country, which had formerly been exempted from the calamities of war. The camp of the barbarians was immediately besieged; the waters of the river were diverted into another channel; and while they laboured under the impossibility of cutting an avenue for the supply of provisions, the strong line of circumsallation was formed to prevent their escape. After these precautions, Stilicho, too confident of victory, retired to enjoy his triumph, in the theatrical games, and lascivious dances, of the Greeks; his soldiers, deserting their standards, spread themselves over the country of their allies, which they stripped of all that had been saved from the rapacious bands of the enemy. In the meantime, the most favourable moment to execute one of these hardy enterprises, in which the abilities of a general are displayed with more genuine lustre, than in the tumult of a day of battle. To extricate himself from the prison of Peloponnesus, it was necessary that he should piece together, with his own hands, the fragments of his narrative, that he should perform a difficult and dangerous march of thirty miles, as far as the gulf of Corinth; and that he should transport his troops, his captives, and his spoil, over an arm of the sea, which in the narrow interval between Rhium and the opposite shore, is at least half a mile of breaches. The emoluments of Alaric must have been secret, prudent, and rapid; since the Roman general was confounded by the intelligence, that the Goths, who had eluded his efforts, were in full possession of the important province of Epirus. This unfortunate delay allowed Alaric sufficient time to conclude the treaty, which he secretly negotiated, with the ministers of Constantinople. The apprehension of a civil war compelled Stilicho to retire, at the hasty mandate of his rivals, from the dominions of Arcadius, whom he respected, in the enemy of Rome, the honourable character of the ally and servant of the emperor of the east.

Alaric is declared a Grecian philosopher, a visitor master general of the eastern empire; Theodosius, published his liberal opinions. Theodosius; (p. 398.) having assumed the duties of kings, and the state of the Roman Empire, Syennis observed and deprest, the fatal abuse, which the impudent bounty of the late emperor had introduced into the military service. The citizens, and subjects, had purchased an exemption from the indispensable duty of defending their country; which was supported by the arms of barbarian mercenaries. The faculties of Scythia were permitted to disgrace the illustrious dignities of the empire; their ferocious youth, which disdained the salutary restraint of laws, were more anxious to acquire the riches, than to imitate the arts, of a people, the object of their contempt; and they despised the power of the Goths was the stone of Tautulus, perpetually suspended over the peace and safety of the devoted state. The measures which Syennis recommended, are the dictates of a bold and generous patriot. He exhorts the emperor to revive the courage of his subjects, and to withdraw barbarian luxury from the court, and from the camp; to substitute, in the place of the barbarian mercenaries, an army of men, interested in the defence of their laws and of their property; to force, in such a moment of public danger, the mechanic from his shop, and the philosopher from his school; to rescue the indolent citizen from his dream of pleasure, and to arm, for the protection of agriculture, the hands of the laborious husbandman. At the head of such troops, who might deserve the name, and would display the spirit, of Romans, he animates the son of Theodosius to encounter a race of men, who were the prey of which any real courage; and never to lay down his arms, till he had chased them far away into the solitudes of Scythia; or had reduced them to the state of ignominious servitude, which the Lacedaemonians formerly imposed on the Helots. The court of Arcadius demanded the zeal, applauded the undertaking, and neglected the advice of Syennis. Perhaps the philosopher, who addresses the emperor of the east in the language of reason and virtue, which he might have used to a Spartan king, had not employed a practicable scheme, consistent with the temper, and circumstances, of a degenerate age. Perhaps the pride of the ministers, whose business was seldom interrupted by reflection, might reject, as wild and visionary, every proposal, which exceeded the measure of their capacity, and deviated from the views and precedents of office. While the oration of Syennis, and the downfall of the barbarians, were the topics of popular conversation, an edict was published at Constantinople, which declared the promotion of Alaric to the rank of master-general of the eastern Illyricum. The Roman provincials, and the allies, who respected the faith of treaties, were justly indignant, that the ruin of Greece and Epirus should be so liberally rewarded. The Gothic conqueror was received as a lawful magistrate, in the cities which he had so lately besieged. The fathers, whose sons he had massacred; the husbands, whose wives he had violated; were subject to his authority, and the success of his rebellion encouraged the ambition of every leader of the foreign mercenaries. The use to which Alaric applied his new command, distinguishes the firm and judicious character of his policy. He issued his order to the four magazines and manufacturers of offensive and defensive arms, Marcus Aurelius, Marcellus, and Thessalonica, to provide his troops with an extraordinary supply of shields, helmets, swords, and spears; the unhappy provincials were compelled to forge the instruments of their own destruction; and the barbarians employed the only defect which had sometimes disappointed the efforts of their courage.

The birth of Alaric, the glory of his past exploits, and the confidence in his future designs, insensibly united the body of the nation under his victorious standard; and, with the unanimous consent of the barbarian chieftains, the master-general of Illyricum was elevated, according to ancient custom, on a shield, and solemnly proclaimed king of the Visigoths, and king of the Armid with this double power, seated on the verge of the two empires, he alternately sold his deceitful promises to the courts of Arcadius and Honorius; till he executed the only object which had engaged the first of invading the dominions of the west. The provinces of Europe which belonged to the eastern emperor, were already exhausted; those of Asia were inaccessible; and the strength of Constantinople had resisted his attack. But he was tempted by the fame, the glory, the wealth, of Italy, which he had beheld by the Elysian jurisdiction.

Alpinus Italiae praparitibus ad Uram. This authentic poem is attributed to Claudian, (de Bell. Got. 557) seven years before the event. But though it was not composed immediately after the defeat, it has been lately fixed, the interpreters escaped through an ambiguous meaning.

Our best materials are 580 verses of Claudian, in the poem on the Gothic war, the title of which is an enigma, and the tenth century translation of Honorius. Zosimus is totally silent; and we are reduced to the evidence of a single writer, and to the chronicles and the chronicles.

Nevertheless the gross errors of Jornandes, who confounds the Italian wars of Alaric, (c. 29.) his date of the composition of Stilicho and Aurelian (A. D. 400) is firm and respectable. It is certain...
The pride and luxury in which he was educated, had fortified him to expect that there existed on the earth any power presumptuous enough to invade the repose of the successor of Augustus. The arts of flattery concealed the impending danger, till Alaric approached the palace of Milan. But when the sound of war had awakened the young emperor, instead of being moved by the presence of a few barbarians, he was overawed by his own situation. At a tender age, he eagerly listened to those timid counsellors, who proposed to convey his sacred person, and his faithful attendants, to some secure and distant station in the provinces of Gaul. Stilicho alone had courage and authority to resist this disgraceful measure, which would have been as odious to the Romans as to the Goths; but as the troops of the palace had been lately detached to the Rhenish frontier, and as the resource of new levies was slow and precarious, the general of the west could only promise, that, if the court of Milan would maintain their ground during his absence, he would soon return with an army equal to the encounter of the Gothic king. Without losing a moment, (while each moment was so important to the public safety,) Stilicho hastily embarked on the Lari-

ian lake, ascended the mountains of ice and snow, and returned with such rapidity, that he had time to suppress, by his unexpected presence, the enemy, who had disturbed the tranquillity of Rhetia. The barbarians, perhaps some tribes of the Alemanni, respected the fairness of a chief, who still assumed the character of his magnanimous father, and who, like the ancient Romans, had descended to make, of a select number of their bravest youth, was considered as a mark of his esteem and favour. The cohorts, who were delivered from the neighbouring foe, diligently repaired to the imperial standard; and Stilicho issued his orders to the most considerable men of the west, to advance, by rapid marches, to the defence of Honorius and of Italy. The fortresses of the Rhine were abandoned; and the safety of Gaul was protected only by the faith of the Germans, and the ancient terror of the Roman name. Even the legion, which had been stationed to guard the walls of Britain against the Caledonians of the north, was hastily recalled; and a numerous body of the cavalry of the Alani was persuaded to engage in the service of the emperor, who anxiously expected the return of his general. The prudence and vigor of Stilicho, who had no scruples on this occasion, which he had been led to meditate, had still preserved the safety of Italy. The seasons of the year, which had long since languished in the gradual decay of discipline and courage, were exterminated by the Gothic and civil wars; and it is still proved possible, without exhausting and expending the powers, to assemble an army for the defence of Italy. When Stilicho seemed to abandon his plan of retirement, he had probably calculated the term of his absence, the distance of the enemy, and the obstacles that might retard their march. He principally depended on the rivers of Italy, the Adige, the Mincio, the Oglio, and the Adda; which, in the winter or spring, by the fall of rains, or by the melting of snows, were sometimes filled to the brim, and inundated impetuous torrents. But the season happened to be contrary, and the rivers did not reach their usual height.
Stilicho resolved to attack the Christian Goths, whilst they were devoutly employed in celebrating the festival of Easter. The execution of the stratagem, or, as it was termed by the clergy, of the sacrifice, was intrusted to Saul, a barbarian and a pagan, who had served, however, with distinguished reputation among the veteran generals of Theodosius. The camp of the Goths, which a prudent Stilicho pitched at the foot of Pollentia, was thrown into confusion by the sudden and impetuous charge of the imperial cavalry; but, in a few moments, the undaunted genius of their leader gave them an order, and a field, of battle; and, as soon as they had recovered from their astonishment, they speedily continued the combat. The Goths would assert their cause, added new strength to their native valour. In this engagement, which was long maintained with equal courage and success, the chief of the Alani, whose diminutive and savage form concealed a magnanimous soul, approved his suspected ferocity, by the zeal with which he fought and fell, in the service of the republic; and the fame of this gallant barbarian has been imperfectly preserved in the verses of Claudian, since the poet, who celebrates his virtues, has omitted the mention of his name. His death was followed by the flight and dismay of the squadrons which he commanded, and the defeat of the imperial cavalry might have decided the victory of Alaric, if Stilicho had not immediately led the Roman and barbarian infantry to the attack. The skill of the general, and the bravery of the soldiers, surmounted every obstacle. In the evening of the bloody day, the Goths retreated from the field of battle; the entrenchments of their camp were forced, and the scene of rapine and slaughter made some atonement for the calamities which they had inflicted on the subjects of the empire. The magnificent spoils of Corinth and Argos enriched the veterans of the west; the captive wife of Alaric, who had inconsiderately eluded the lure of Roman jewels and patrician handmaidens, was reduced to implore the mercy of the insulting foe; and many thousand prisoners, released from the Gothic chains, dispersed through the provinces of Italy the heroes of a former generation; their triumph of Stilicho was compared by the poet, and perhaps by the public, to that of Marius; who, in the same part of Italy, had encountered and destroyed another army of northern barbarians. The huge bones, and the empty helmets, of the Cumbrici and of the Goths, should easily supply materials for spectacles; and posterity might erect a common trophy to the memory of the two most illustrious generals, who had vanquished, on the same memorable ground, the two most formidable enemies of Rome.

The eloquence of Claudian has celebrated, with lavish applause, the victory of Alaric.

1. Orosius (l. vii. c. 32) is shock'd at the impolicy of the Romans, who attacked, on Easter Sunday, such pious christians. Yet, at the same time, public prayers were offered at the shrine of St. Thomas, of Edessa, for the destruction of the Arian soldiery. See Tellenmont, Hist. des Emp., tom. v. p. 522, who quotes an homily, which has been erroneously ascribed to St. Chrysostom.

2. The veterans of the war of Alaric were twentsix miles to the southeast of Turin. 'Ubi, in the same neighbourhood, was a royal chace of the kings of Lombardy, and a small river, which excused the pursuit, 'The river is penetrable ad urbem,' says Sacy. (De Imper. Goth., tom. iv. p. 43.)

3. Orosius wishes, in doubtful words, to insinuate the defeat of the Romans. 'Pierans et victor nec victus victor.' Procop. (Hist. in Chron.) makes it an equal and bloody battle; but the Gothic writers, Claudian (in Chron.) and Jornalidus, (de Reb. Got., c. 33,) claims a decisive victory.

5. Claudian (De Bell. Got., 590—547.) And Prudentius, (Ep. 11. 691—712.) celebrate, without ambiguity, the Roman victory of Pollentia. They are political and party writers; yet some credit is due to them, since they have a fine eye for the notoriety of facts.

6. Claudian's perception is strong and elegant; but the identity of the Cumbrici and Gothic fields, must be understood (like Virgil's Philippic, Georg. iv. 493) according to the local geography of a poet. Vercellae and Po, in the map of the ancient world; the Po is the trade; and the latitudes is still greater, if the Cumbrici were defeated in the wide and barren plains of Venetia. (Claudian, Versus Illustratus, p. 54—55.)

7. Claudian and Prudentius must be strictly examined, to reduce the figures, and extort the historic sense of these poets.
THE DECLINE AND FALL

of Pollentia, one of the most glorious days in the life of his patron; but his reluctant and partial muse bestrides more genuine praise on the character of the Gothic king. His name is, indeed, branded with the reproachful epithets of pirate and robber, to which the conquerors of every age are so unjustly entitled; but the post of Stilicho is compelled to acknowledge, that Alaric possessed the invincible temper of mind, which rises superior to every misfortune, and derives new resources from adversity. After the total defeat of his host, he remained, or rather withdrew, from the field of battle, with the greatest part of his cavalry entire and unbroken. Without wasting a moment to lament the irreparable loss of so many brave companions, he left his victorious enemy to bind in chains the captive images of a Gothic king; and boldly resolved to break through the unguarded passes of the Apennine, to spread desolation over the fruitful face of Tuscany, and to conquer or die before the gates of Rome. The capital was saved by the active and incessant diligence of Stilicho; but he respected the despair of his enemy; and, instead of committing the fate of Tarragona to the chance of his fortune, he proposed to purchase the absence of the barbarians. The spirit of Alaric would have rejected such terms, the permission of a retreat, and the offer of a pension, with contempt and indignation; but he exercised a limited authority. His envoys were fixed on the chieftains, who had raised him, for their service, above the rank of his equals; they were still less disposed to follow an unsuccessful general, and many of them were tempted to consult their interest by a private negotiation with the minister of Honorius. The king submitted to the voice of his people, ratified the treaty with the empire of the west, and repassed the Po, with the remains of the flowerishing army which he had led into Italy. A considerable part of the Roman forces still continued to attend his motions; and Stilicho maintained a secret correspondence with some of the barbarian chiefs, who was actually prized of the designs that were formed in the camp and council of Alaric. The king of the Goths, ambitious to signalize his retreat by some splendid achievement, had resolved to occupy the important city of Verona, which commands the principal passage of the Rhetian Alps; and, directing his march through the territories of those German tribes, whose alliance would restore his exhausted strength, to invade, on the side of the Rhine, the wealth and unsuspecting provinces of Gaul. Ignorant of the treason, which had already betrayed his bold and judicious enterprise, he advanced towards the passes of the mountains, already possessed by the imperial troops; where he was exposed, almost at the same instant, to a general attack in the front, on his flanks, and in the rear. In this bloody action, at a small distance from the walls of Verona, the loss of the Goths was not less heavy than that which they had sustained in the defeat of Pollentia; and their valiant king, who escaped by the swiftness of his horse, must either have been slain or made prisoner, if the hasty rashness of the Alani had not discovered the measures of Stilicho. Alaric secured the remains of his army on the adjacent rocks; and prepared himself, with undaunted resolution, to maintain a siege against the superior numbers of the enemy, who invested him on all sides. But he could not oppose the destructive progress of hunger and disease; nor was it possible for him to check the continual desertion of his impatient and capricious barbarians. In this extremity he still found resources in his own courage, or in the moderation of his adversary; and the retreat of the Gothic king was con- sidered as the deliverance of Italy. Yet the people, and even the clergy, incapable of forming any rational judgment of the business of peace and war, presumed to arm the policy of Stilicho, who so often vanquished, so often surrounded, and so often dismissed, the invincible enemy of the republic. The first movement of the public safety is devoted to gratitude and joy; but the second is diligently occupied by envy and calumny. The citizens of Rome had been astonished at the triumph of Honour at A. D. 404. The emperor was directed to accept the dutiful invitation of the senate, and to celebrate in the imperial city the auspicious era of the Gothic victory, and of his sixth consular. peculiarly devoted to the combats of Gladiators, still exhibited to the eyes of the Roman people a grateful spectacle of blood and cruelty. Amidst the general joy of the victory of Pollentia, a christian poet exhorted the emperor to extirpate, by his authority, the horrid custom which had so long resisted the voice of humanity and religion. The pathetic representations of Pilgrims were less effectual than the threatenings of Telemachus, an Asiatic monk, whose death was more useful to mankind than his life. The Romans were provoked by the interruption of their pleasures; and the rash monk, who had descended into the arena, to separate the gladiators, was overwhelmed by the gradual and insidious rage of the people soon subsided; they respected the memory of Telemachus, who had deserved the honours of martyrdom: and they submitted, without a murmur, to the laws of Honorius, which abolished for ever the human sacrifices of the amphitheatre. The citizens, who adhered to the manners of their ancestors, might perhaps insignificantly, that the last remains of a martial spirit were preserved in this school of fortitude, which accustomed the Romans to the sight of blood, and to the contempt of death: a vain and cruel prejudice, so nobly confuted by the valour of ancient Greece, and of modern Europe. The son of the emperor had been exposed in the defenceless palace of Milan, urged him to seek a retreat in some inaccessible fortress of Italy, where he might securely remain, while the opposite country was covered by a deluge of barbarians. On the 7th of October, the capital was abandoned to the invaders, who were driven or twelve miles from the most southern of the seven mouths of the Po, the Thessalians had founded the ancient colony of Ravena, which they afterwards resigned to the natives of Umbria. Augustus, who had observed the opportunity of the place, prepared, at the distance of three miles from the irrevocable disastrous stroke, an opulent harbour, for the reception of two hundred and fifty ships of war. This naval establishment, which included the arsenals and magazines, the barracks of the troops, and the houses of the artificers, derived its origin and name from the permanent station of the Roman fleet: the intermediate space was soon filled with buildings and inhabitants, and the three extensive and populous quarters of Ravena gradually contributed to form one of the most important cities of Italy. The principal canal of Augustus poored a copious stream of the waters of the Po through the midst of the city, to the entrance of the harbour; the same waters were introduced into the profound ditches that encompassed the walls; they were distributed, by a thousand subordinate canals, into every part of the city, which they divided into a variety of small islands; the communication was maintained only by the use of boats and bridges; and the houses of Ravena, whose appearance may be compared to that of Venice, were raised on the foundation of wooden piles. The adjacent country, to the distance of many miles, was a deep and impassable marsh; and the artificial causeway, which connected Ravena with the continent, might be easily guarded, or destroy-

s were interspersed, however, with vineyards; and though the soil was exhausted by four or five crops, the town enjoyed a more plentiful supply of wine than of fresh water. The air, instead of receiving the sickly, and almost pestilential, exhalations of low and marshy grounds, was distinguished, like the climate of Sardinia, as uncommonly salubrious; and this singular advantage was ascribed to the regular tides of the Adriatic, which swept the canals, interrupted the unwholesome stagnation of the waters, and floated, every day, the vessels of the adjacent country into the heart of Ravena. The city, which was at the distance of four miles from the Adriatic; and as early as the fifth or sixth century of the Christian era, the port of Augustus was converted into pleasant orchards; and a lonely grove of pines covered the ground where the Roman fleet once rode at anchor. Even this alteration contributed to increase natural strength of the place; and the shallowness of the water was a sufficient barrier against the large ships of the enemy. This advantageous situation was fortified by art and labour; and in the twentieth year of his age, the emperor of the west, anxious to improve the eastern confines of the walls and morasses of Ravena. The example of Honorius was imitated by his feeble successors the Gothic kings, and afterwards the exarchs, who occupied the throne and palace of the emperors; and, till the middle of the eight century, Ravena was considered as the seat of the last government and the capital of Italy.

The fears of Honorius were not without the revolutions out foundation, nor were his precautions of Sevliian, without effect. While Italy rejoiced in her deliverance from the Goths, a furious tempest was excited among the nations of Germany, who yielded in the Agri Decumates, and the Po to the Vandals, who were led by a valiant chieftain, and maintained their conquests with the most vigorous resistance. The Goths compelled the pastoral nations of the eastern desert to acknowledge the superiority of their arms; they invaded China in a period of weakness and intestine discord; and the fortunate Tartars, adopting the laws and manners of the vanquished people, founded an imperial dynasty, which reigned near one hundred and sixty years over the northern provinces of the monarchy. Some generations before they ascended the throne of China, one of the Toba princes had enlisted in his cavalry a slave of the name of Moko, who was renowned for his valor, and the fear of punishment to desert his standard, and to range the desert at the head of a hundred followers. This gang of robbers and outlaws swelled into a camp, a tribe, a numerous people, distinguished by the appellation of Geougen; and their hereditary chieftains, the posterity of Moko, the slave, assumed their rank among the Scythian monarchs. The youth of Toulin, the greatest of his descendants, was exercised by those misfortunes which are the school of heroes. He bravely struggled with adversity, broke the impetuous yoke of the Topa, and became the legislator of his nation, and the conqueror of Taurity. His character was such that he could not endure to see a hundred and of a thousand men; cowards were stoned to death; the most splendid honours were proposed as the reward of valour; and Toulin, who had knowledge enough to despise the learning of China, adopted only some feudal institutions as were favourable to the military spirit of the Tartars. He built a thousand trophies on the banks of the Caspian sea, the nation of the Huns; and the new title of Khan, or Cagan, expressed the fame and power which he derived from this memorable victory.\(^1\)

Emigration of the northern German tribes.\(^2\) A.D. 406.\(^3\) The chain of events is interrupted, or rather concealed, as it passes from the Volga to the Vistula, through the dark interval which separates the extreme limits of the Chinese, and of the Roman geography. Yet the temper of the barbarians, and the experience of successive emigrations, sufficiently darkens the picture. In the west of Hunry, this part of the plains, the Danube, was deserted by the Huns, who had withdrawn from the presence of an insulting victor. The countries towards the Euxine were already occupied by their kindred tribes; and their haughty flight, which they soon converted into a bold attack, would more naturally be described in the rich and level plains, through which the Vistula gently flows into the Baltic sea. The north must again have been alarmed and agitated by the invasion of the Huns; and the nations who retreated before them must have pressed with incumbent weight on the confines of Germany.\(^4\) The inhabitants of those regions, which the ancient writers have assigned to the Suevi, the Vandals, and the Burgundians, might embrace the resolution of abandoning to the ligatures of Sarmatia their woods and moorasses; or at least of discharging their superfluous numbers on the provinces of the Roman empire. After four years the victorious Toulin had assumed the title of Khan of the Geougen, another barbarian, the haughty Rhodogast, or Radagaisus,\(^5\) marched from the northern extremities of Germany almost to the gates of Rome; and left the remains of his army to work the destruction of the Roman empire. The Vandals, the Suevi, and the Burgundians, formed the strength of this mighty host; but the Alani, who had found an hospitable reception in their new seats, added their active cavalry to the heavy infantry of the Germans; and the Gothic adventurers crowded so eagerly to the standard of Radagaisus, that, by some historians, he has been styled the King of the Goths. Twelve thousand warriors, distinguished above the vulgar by their noble birth, or their valiant deeds, glittered in this van; and the whole multitude, which was not less than two hundred thousand fighting men, might be increased, by the accession of women, of children, and of slaves, to the amount of four hundred thousand persons. This formidable emigration issued from the same coast of the Baltic, which had poured forth the myriads of the Cimbri and Teutones, and was stopped by the astonished, but wanton, licentious conference of the Huns and Chinese. After the departure of those barbarians, their native country, which was marked by the vestiges of their greatness, long ramparts, and gigantic mounds,\(^6\) remained, during some ages, a vast and dreary solitude; till the human species was renewed, and the land possessed by the inhabitants of the Huns, who had left the region by an influx of new inhabitants. The nations who now usurp an extent of land, which they are unable to cultivate, would soon be assisted by the industrious poverty of their neighbours, if the government of Europe did not protect the claims of dominion and property.

The correspondence of nations was, Radagaisus in that age, so imperfect and precarious, that the revolutions of the north might escape the knowledge of the court of Ravenna; till the dark cloud, which was collected along the coast of the Baltic, burst in thunder upon the banks of the Upper Danube. The emperor of the west, if his ministers disturbed his amusements by the news of the impending danger, was satisfied with being the occasion, and the spectator, of the war.\(^7\) The safety of Rome was entrusted to the councils, and the sword, of Stilicho, the filings of the Persian amputation; and the state of the empire, that it was impossible to restore the fortifications of the Danube, or to prevent, by a vigorous effort, the invasion of the Germans.\(^8\) The hopes of the vigilant minister of Honorius were confirmed by the force of the enemies, which the Visigoths and the Suevi had ravaged the provinces, recalled the troops, pressed the new levies, which were rigorously exacted, and pusillanimously employed; employed the most efficacious means to arrest, or allure, the deserts; and offered the gift of freedom, and of two pieces of gold, to all the slaves who would enlist. By these offers he pain-fully collected, from the subjects of a great empire, an army of thirty or forty thousand men, which, in the days of Scipio or Camillus, would have been instantly furnished by the free citizens of the territory of Rome.\(^9\) The three hundred thousand body of barbarian auxiliaries; the faithful Alani were personally attached to his service; and the troops of Huns and of Goths, who marched under the banners of their native princes, Hulbin and Sarus, were animated by interest and resentment, and determined to avenge and recover their country. The confederate Germans, passed, without resistance, the Alps, the Po, and the Apennine; leaving on one hand the inaccessible palace of Honorius, securely buried among the marshes of Ravenna; and, on the other, the camp of Stilicho, who had fixed his headquarters at Treinnu, or Pavia, but who seems to have avoided a decisive battle, till he had assembled his distant forces. OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

siege of Florence, by Radagaisus, is one of the earliest events in the history of that celebrated republic; whose firmness checked and delayed the unskilful fury of the barbarians. The Senate and people trembled at their approach within a hundred and eighty miles of Rome itself; in the same curia where they had escaped, with the new perils to which they were exposed. Alaric was a christian and a soldier, the leader of a disciplined army; who understood the laws of war, who respected the sanctity of treaties, and who had familiarly conversed with the subjects of the same religion. Leaving the courts of his residence, he with the headlong fury of a storm dashed against the ramparts of Florence, a city of ancient fame, and the most flourishing seat of the Florentine nation. The warmth of his passion was increased by the enmity he felt against the church of Florence, a city of the remotest antiquity, ancient and remote, truly a city of the living, and the spiritual dominion of the same name; Florence, whose citizens were supported only by the authority of St. Ambrose, who had communicated to them the sacred and ancient mysteries of the faith. On a sudden, they beheld, from their walls, the banners of Stilicho, who advanced, with his united force, to the relief of the faithful city; and who soon marked that fatal spot for the grave of the barbarian host. The apparent contradictions of those writers who variously relate the defeat of Radagaisus, may be reconciled, without offering much violence to their respective testimonies. Orosius and Auguslin, who were intimately connected by friendship and religion, ascribe this miraculous victory to the providence of God, rather than to the valor of man. They distinctly and accurately state the number of the barbarians that were killed, or even wounded, may be dis- missed with silent contempt; but the rest of the narrative of Augustin and Orosius is consistent with the state of the war, and the character of Stilicho. Con- science, that he commanded the last army of the republic, his prudence would not open the field, to the headstrong fury of the Germans. The method of surrounding the enemy with a strong line of circumvallations, which he had twice employed against the Gothic king, was repeated on a larger scale, and with more considerable effect. The examples of Cæsar must have been familiar to the most sagacious of his successors in the art of war. Con- sidering the situation of Dyrrachium, which connected twenty-four castles, by a perpetual ditch and rampart of fifteen miles, afforded the model of an intrenchment which might confine, and starve, the most numerous host of barbarians. The Roman troops had no less de- germinated effect than from the industry, of their ancestors; and if the servile and laborious work offended the pride of the soldiers, Tuscany could supply many thousand peasants, who would labour, though, perhaps, not fight, for the salvation of their native country. The imprudence of horses and men was gradually destroyed by famine, rather than by the sword; but the Romans were exposed, during the progress of such an extensive war, to the frequent attacks of an impetuous enemy. The despair of the hungry barbarians would precipitate them against the fortifications of Stilicho; the general might sometimes indulge in his just reputation of a valiant hero, who eagerly pressed to assault the camp of the Germans; and these various incidents might produce the sharp and bloody conflicts which dignify the narrative of Zosimus, and the Chronicles of Prosper and Marcellinus. A reasonable supply of men and provisions had been in- stituted in the winter. The chief stores, and even the famished host of Radagaisus was in its turn besieged. The proud monarch of so many warlike nations, after the loss of his bravest warriors, was reduced to confide either in the faith of a capitulation, or in the clemency of Stilicho. But the death of the royal captive who was ignominiously beheaded, dis- graced the triumph of Rome and of Christianity; and the short delay of his execution was sufficient to brand the conqueror with the guilt of cool and deliberate cruelty. The famished Germans, who escaped the fury of the auxiliaries, were sold as slaves, at the contemptible price of as many single pieces of gold; but the difference of food and climate swept away great numbers of those unhappy strangers; and it was observed, that the inhume purchasers, instead of reaping the fruits of their labour, were soon obliged to provide the expense of their interment. Stilicho informed them that he would use every means to save and deserve, a second time, the glorious title of Deliverer of Italy.

The fame of the victory, and more The remainder of the German invasion is yet imperfectly known. yet interesting, is the better told, the simpler the story, the more eloquent. Yet the simplicity of truth (Cæsar, de Bell. Civ. iii. 44.) is far greater than the embellishments of Lucan. (Pharsal. iii. 29—83.)

various multitude of Sueves and Vandals, of Alani and Burgundians, who adhered to the standard of their general. The union of such an army might excite on the one side the grandeur of the event and the zeal of the emperor, on the other the spirit of revenge and despotic power. The motives which incited the Goths to leave their native soil and seek a new home were of a kind that always excite others to follow their example. The Goths, who had been raised to the highest pitch of prosperity and power, were suddenly and without a moment's warning plunged into a state of servitude, and the obstinate and obstinate spirit of the Goths was a powerful argument that they would not be satisfied with anything short of freedom. The emperor, on the other hand, had every reason to believe that the Goths would be more tractable if they were not sovereigns, and that the Goths would be more content if they were not free.

and safety with valour. The timid and selfish policy of the court of Ravenna might recall the palatine legions for the protection of Italy; the remains of the stationary troops might be unequal to the arduous task; and the barbarian auxiliaries might prefer the unbounded license of spoil to the benefits of a moderate and regular service. The western provinces were filled with a numerous race of hardy and robust youth, who, in the defence of their houses, their families, and their altars, if they had dared to die, would have deserved to vanquish. The knowledge of their native country would have enabled them to oppose constancy to the wanton insurrections permitted to the people of an invader; and the deficiency of the barbarians, in arms as well as in discipline, removed the only pretence which excuses the submission of a populous country to the inferior numbers of a veteran army. When France was invaded by Charles the fifth, he inquired of a prisoner, how many days Paris might be distant from the frontier! 1 "Perhaps twelve, but they will be days of battle." 2 Such was the gallant answer which checked the arrogance of that ambitious prince. The subjects of Honorius, and those of Francis I. were animated by a very different spirit; and in less time descended to the task of the public defence. The provinces of Gaul, whose numbers, were they fairly stated, would appear contemptible, advanced, without a combat, to the foot of the Pyrenean mountains.

Revolt of the British army.

In the early part of the reign of Honorius, the vigilance of Stilicho had successfully guarded the remote island of Britain from her incessant enemies of the ocean, the mountains, and the Irish coast. 3 But those restless barbarians could not neglect the fair opportunity of the Gothic war, when the walls and stations of the province were stripped of the Roman troops. If any of the legions had then occupied the head of the great feeding-ground of the Italian expedition, their faithful report of the court and character of Honorius must have tended to solve the bonds of allegiance, and to exasperate the sedition in the British army. The spirit of revolt, which had formerly disturbed the age of Gallienus, was revived by the capricious violence of the soldiers; and the unfortunate, perhaps the ambitious, candidates, who were the objects of their choice, were the instruments, and at length the victims, of their passion. Marcus was the first whom they placed on the throne, as the lawful emperor of Britain and of the west. They violated, by the hasty murder of Marcus, the oath of fidelity, which they had imposed on themselves; and their disapproval of his manners may seem to inscribe an honourable epitaph on his tomb. Gratian was the next whom they adored with the din-dem and the purple; and, at the end of four months, Gratian experienced the fate of his predecessor. The memory of the great Constantine, whom the British legions had given to the church and to the empire, suggested the singular motive of their third choice. They discovered in the ranks a private knowledge of the person of Constant-tinus and British origin. Britain and Gaul, the two strongest nations of the vast empire, \n\nA. D. 407. \n\nhim on the throne, before they perceived his incapacity to sustain the weight of that gloriuous appellation. 4 Yet the authority of Constantine was less precarious, and his government was more successful, than the transient reigns of Marcus and of Gratian. The danger of leaving his inactive troops in those camps, which had been twice polluted with blood and sedition, urged him to attempt the reduction of the western provinces by a general invasion, with an incalculable force; and after he had repos- ed himself some days, he summoned the cities of Gaul, which had escaped the yoke of the barbarians, to acknowledge their lawful sovereign. They obeyed the summons without reluctance. The neglect of the imperial court of Ravenna had relaxed the duty of allegiance; their actual distress encouraged them to accept any circumstances of change, without apprehension, and, perhaps, some degree of hope; and they might flatter themselves, that the troops, the authority, and even the name of a Roman emperor, who fixed his residence in Gaul, would protect the unhappy country from the rage of the barbarians. The first successes of Constantine against the detached parties of the Germans, were magnified by the voice of adulation into splendid and decisive victories; which the renown and insolence of the enemy soon fruitfully nullified. His mother, though she had served a short and precarious truce; and if some tribes of the barbarians were engaged, by the liberality of his gifts and promises, to undertake the defence of the Rhine, these expensive and uncertain treaties, instead of restoring the pristine vigour of the Gallic frontier, were served only to disgrace the majesty of his name: and to exhaust what yet remained of the treasures of the republic. Elated however with this imaginary triumph, the vain deliverer of Gaul advanced into the provinces of the south, to encounter a more pressing and personal danger. Sarus the Goth was ordered to remain at the head of the legions of the Pyrenean provinces; and to hold the border provinces of Honorius; and the forces of Britain and Italy were unworthily consumed in this domestic quarrel. After the loss of two bravest generals, Justinian and Nearchus, the former of whom was slain in the field of battle, the latter in a peaceful but inaudacious interview. Constantine fortified himself within the walls of Vienna. The place was ineffectually attacked seven days; and the imperial army supported, in a precipitate retreat, the ignominy of purchasing a safe passage from the freebooters and outlaws of the Alps. 5 Those mountains now separated the dominions of the two rival emperors. To the double frontier were guarded by the troops of the empire, whose arms would have been more usefully employed to maintain the Roman limits against the barbarians of Germany and Scythia.

On the side of the Pynnes, the sue | he reduce Spain, gristrates of the Gallic prefecture. The only opposition to the authority of Constantine proceeded not so much from the people of the empire, as from the private zeal and interest of the family of Theodosius. Four brothers 6 had obtained by the favour of their kinsman, the deceased emperor, an honourable rank, and ample possessions, in their respective country; and the grateful yards resolved to risk those advantages in the service of his son. After an unsuccessful effort to maintain their ground at the head of the stationary troops of Lasitania, they retired to their estates; where they united with their other kin, families, and dependents, and boldly marched to occupy the strong posts of the Pyrenean mountains. This domestic insurrection alarmed and perplexed the sovereign of Gaul and Britain; and he was compelled to negotiate with some troops of barbarian auxiliaries, for the service of the Spanish war. They were distinguished by the title of Honoriani, a name which might have reminded them of their fidelity to their lawful sovereign; and if it should candidly be allowed that the Scots were influenced by any partial affection for a British prince, the Moors and the Mercianini might be tempted only by the probability of liberty, war to the usurper, who distributed among the barbarians the military, and even the civil, honours of Spain. The nine bands of Honoriani, which may be easily traced on the establishment of the western empire, could not exceed the number of five thousand men; yet this insconsiderable force was sufficient to terminate a war, which had threatened the power and safety of Constantine. The rustic army of the Theodosian family was surrounded and destroyed in the Pyrenees; two of the brothers had the good fortune to escape by sea to their estates; the other, after an interval of suspense, were executed at Arles; and if Honorinus could remain insensible of the public disgrace, he might perhaps be affected by the personal misfortunes of his generous kinsmen. Such were the feeble arms which decided the possession of the western provinces or the service of the Spanish war. But the totality of it had been diminished even the last resource of a despotic government; and the revenue of exhausted provinces could no longer purchase the military service of a discontented and pusillanimous people.

Negotiation of Alaric and Stilicho.

The poet, whose flattery has ascribed to the Roman eagle the victories of Polcentin and Verona, pursues the hasty retreat of Alaric, from the confines of Italy, with a horrid train of imaginary specters, such as might hover over an army of barbarians, which was almost exterminated by war. In the course of this unfortunate expedition, the king of the Goths must indeed have sustained a considerable loss; and his harassed forces required an interval of repose to recruit their numbers, and revive their confidence. Adversity had exercised and displayed the genius of Alaric; and the fame of his valour invited to the Gothic standard the bravest of the barbarian warriors; who, from the Euxine to the Rhine, were aggregated by the desire of rapine and conquest. He had deserved the esteem, and he soon accepted the friendship of Stilicho himself. Resuming the service of the emperor of the east, Alaric concluded, with the court of Ravenna, a treaty of peace and alliance, by which he was declared master-general of the Roman armies throughout the prefecture of Illyricum: and it was claimed, according to the true and ancient habits of the family of Honorius, the execution of the ambitious design, which was either stipulated, or implied, in the articles of the treaty, appears to have been suspended by the formidable irritation of Radagaisus; and the neutrality of the Gothic king may perhaps be compared to the indulgence of Caesar, or the caution of Constantine, to the advantage of the state, to assist, or to oppose, the enemy of the republic. After the defeat of the Vandals, Stilicho resumed his pretensions to the provinces of the coast; appointed civil magistrates for the administration of justice, and of the finances; and declared his impatience to lead, from the gates of Constantinople, his victorious armies against the Romans and of the Goths. The prudence, however, of Stilicho, his aversion to civil war, and his perfect knowledge of the weakness of the state, made countenance the suspicion, that domestic peace, rather than foreign conquest, was the object of his policy; and, that it was his design to remove the kingdom of the Goths to Alaric at a distance from Italy. This design could not long escape the penetration of the Gothic king, who continued to hold a doubtful, and perhaps a treacherous, correspondence with the rival courts; and, in the midst of those operations, in Thessaly and Epirus, and who soon returned to claim the extravagant reward of his inefficient services. From his camp near Zimom, on the confines of Italy, he transmitted to the emperor of the west a long account of promises, of expenses, and of demands; of the state of affairs; and clearly intimated the consequences of a refusal. Yet if his conduct was hostile, his language was decent and dutiful. He humbly professed himself the friend of Stilicho, and the soldier of Honorius; offered his person and his troops to march, without delay, against the usurper of Gaul; and solicited a permanent and perpetual retreat for the Gothic nation, the possession of some vacant province of the western empire.

The political and secret transactions of two statesmen, who laboured to deceive the emperor with perjuries as prodigious as the actions of their predecessors, have been concealed in the impenetrable darkness of the cabinet. If the debates of a popular assembly had not thrown some rays of light on the correspondence of Alaric and Stilicho. The necessity of finding some artificial support for a government, which, from a principle of moderation, but of weakness, was placed, negociate with its own subjects, had insensibly revivified the authority of the Roman senate; and the minister of Honorius respectfully consulted the legislative council of the republic. Stilicho assembled the senators in the presence of the Caesars; represented, in a studied oration, the actual state of affairs; proposed the demands of the Gothic king, and submitted to their consideration the choice of peace or war. The senators, as if they had been suddenly awakened from a dream of four hundred years, appeared on this important occasion to be inspired by the counsels of reason, rather than the wisdom, of their predecessors. They loudly declared, in regular speeches, or in tumultuary ascriptions, that it was unworthy of the majesty of Rome to purchase a precarious and disgraceful truce from a barbarian king; and that, in the judgment of a magnificent people, the chance of ruin was always preferable to the certainty of dishonour. The minister, whose pacific intentions were seconded only by the voices of a few servile and venal followers, attempted to allay the general ferment, by an apology for his own conduct, and even for the demands of the Gothic prince. "The payment of a subsidy, which had excited the indignation of the Romans, ought not (such was the language of Stilicho) to be considered in the odious light, either of a tribute, or of a ransom, which could profit no one of the enemies of a benefactor. The Roman empire is rich, and fairly asserted the just pretensions of the sentation of the difficulty and expense of such a distant expedition, checked this strange and sudden sally of active diligence; but the dangerous project was still in process of the Roman troops, the enemies of Stilicho, his barbarian auxiliaries, remained fixed and unalterable. The minister was pressed, by the advice of his confidant Justinian, a Roman advocate, of a lively and penetrating genius, to oppose a journey so prejudicial to his reputation and safety. His strenuous, but ineffectual, efforts confirmed the triumph of Olympius; and the prudent lawyer withdrew himself from the impending ruin of his patron.

In the passage of the emperor through Bologna, a mutiny of the guards was raised by the secret procuring of the treason of Stilicho; who announced his intentions to decimate the guilty, and ascribed to his own intercession, the merit of their pardon. At this tumult, Honorius embraced, for the last time, the minister, whom he now considered as a tyrant, and proceeded on his way to the camp of Ravenna; where he was received by the loyal acclamations of the troops who were assembled for the service of the Gallic war. On the morning of the fourth day, he pronounced, as he had been taught, a military oration in the presence of the soldiers, from whom the charitable relations of Olympius had prepared to execute a dark and bloody conspiracy. At the first signal they massacred the friends of Stilicho, the most illustrious officers of the empire, two pretorian prefects, of Gaul, and of Italy; two masters-general of the cavalry and infantry; the master of the offices, the courtier, and the confidant of the empress. Many lives were lost; many houses were plundered; the famous sedition continued to rage till the close of the evening; and the trembling emperor, who was seen in the streets of Ravenna, without his robes or diadem, yielded to the persuasions of his followers; condemned the memory of the slain; and solemnly approved the innocence and fidelity of their assassins. The intelligence of the massacre of Ravenna filled the mind of Stilicho with just and glorious apprehensions; and he instantly summoned, in the camp of Bologna, a council of the confederate leaders, who were assembled upon the arrival of their chief to the camps of Stilicho. The disordered spirits of the army were attached by the generosity of the emperor, and his deformed Roman, and perhaps to fix the diadem on the head of their injured general. Instead of executing a resolution, which might have been justified by success, Stilicho hesitated till he was irrecoverably lost. He was still ignorant of the fate of the emperor; he distrusted the fidelity of his own party; and he viewed with horror the fatal consequences of arming a crowd of licentious barbarians, against the soldiers and people of Italy. The confederates, impatient of his timorous and doubtful delay, hastily retired, with fear and indignation. At the hour of twilight, Sarmian and Gothic troops, with their barbarous compatriots, attacked the barbarians themselves for his strength and valor, suddenly invaded the camp of his benefactor, plundered the baggage, cut in pieces the faithful Huns, who guarded his person, and penetrated to the tent, where the minister, presaging and sleepless, meditated the danger of his situation, and even before submission, with difficulty from the sword of the Goths: and, after issuing a last and generous admonition to the cities of Italy, to shut their gates against the barbarians, his confidence, or his despair, urged him to throw himself into Ravenna, which was already in the absolute possession of his enemies. Olympius, who had assumed the dominion of Honorius, was speedily informed, that his rival had embraced, as a suppliant, the altar of the Christian church. The base and cruel display of the hypocrisies were under the power of pity or remorse; but he piously intended to elude, rather than to violate, the privilege of the sanctuary. Count Heraclian, with a troop of soldiers, appeared, at the dawn of day, before the gates of the church at Raven-

na. The bishop was satisfied by a solemn oath, that the two persons only did not come to secure the person of Stilicho: but, as soon as the unfortunate minister had been tempted beyond the holy threshold, he produced the warrant for his instant execution. Stilicho supported, with calm resignation, the injurious names of traitor and parasite; repressed the unseasonable zeal of his followers, who were ready to attempt an ineffectual resue; and, with a firmness not unworthy of the last of the Roman generals, submitted his neck to the sword of Heraclian.\n His memory per. The servile crowd of the palace, who assumed the throne, had so long adored the fortune of Stilicho, affected to insult his fall; and the most distinct connexion with the master-general of the west, which had so lately been a title to wealth and honours, was studiously denied, and rigorously punished. His family, united by a triple alliance with the family of Theodosius, and by the marriage of his daughter to a prince of the imperial house, the flight of his son Eucherius was intercepted; and the death of that innocent youth soon followed the divorce of Thermantia, who filled the place of her sister Maria; and who, like Maria, had remained a virgin in the imperial bed. The friends of Stilicho, who had escaped the massacre of Pavia, were persecuted by the implacable revenge of Olymppius; and the most exquisite cruelty was employed to extort the confession of a treasonable and sacrilegious conspiracy. They died in silence: their firmness justified the choice, and perhaps absolved the innocent contumely of the emperor, and the power, which could take his life without a trial, and stigmatize his memory without a proof, has no jurisdiction over the impartial suffrage of posterity.\n The services of Stilicho are great and manifest; his crimes, as they are vaguely stated in the language of flattery and hatred, are obscure, intangible, and unapprehensive. From the highest to the humblest months after his death, an edict was published, in the name of Honorius, to restore the free communication of the two empires, which had been so long interrupted by the public enemy.\n

The minister, whose fame and fortune depended on the prosperity of the state, was a guardian of Italy to the battalion, whom he repeatedly vanquished at Pollentia, at Verona, and before the walls of Florence. His pretended design of placing the diadem on the head of his son Eucherius, could not have been conducted without preparations of his complectes; and the ambitious father would not surely have left the future emperor, till the twentieth year of his age, in the humble station of tribune of the nobles. Even the religion of Stilicho was arraigned by the malice of his rival. The seasonable, and almost miraculous, deliverance was devoutly celebrated by the applause of the clergy; who asserted that the restoration of idols, and the persecution of the church, would have been the first measure of the reign of Eucherius. The son of Stilicho, however, was possessed of a degree of personal attractiveness, which his father had uniformly professed, and zealously supported.\n

Serena had borrowed her magnificent necklace from the statue of Vesta; and the pagans excuted the memory of the sacrilegious minister, by whose order the Sibyllyne books, the oracles of Rome, and those rocks, in which the druids of Britain were wont to assemble, were torn from their base. Power of Stilicho constituted his real guilt. An honourable reluctance to shed the blood of his countrymen, appears to have contributed to the success of his unworthy rival: and it is the last humiliation of the character of Honorius, that posterity has not condescended to remember him with his base ingratitude to the guardian of his youth, and the support of his empire.\n Among the train of dependents, whose The poet Claudian. wealth and dignity attracted the notice of their own times, our curiosity is excited by the celebrated name of those of Hadrian with the royal favour of Stilicho, and was overwhelmed in the ruin of his patron. The titular offices of tribune and notary fixed his rank in the imperial court; he was indebted to the powerful intercession of Serena for his marriage to a very rich heiress of the province of Africa; and the name of Claudian, in the forum of Trajan, was a monument of the taste and liberality of the Roman senate. But the praises of Stilicho became offensive and criminal, Claudian was exposed to the enmity of a powerful and unfor giving court, and the wanton insolence of his friends.\n He had compared, in a lively epigram, the opposite characters of two preatorian prefects of Italy; he contrasts the innocent repose of a philosopher, who sometimes resigned the hours of business to slumber, perhaps to study, with the interested diligence of a re-apted publican, who amassed his fortune of servile power, in the hope of future or sacrilegious gain. "How happy," continues Claudian, "how happy might it be for the people of Italy, if Mallius could be constantly awake, and if Hadrian would always sleep!* The repose of Mallius was not disturbed by this friendly and gentle admonition; but the beardy and impudent publican was, in the consequence of his prosperity, ambitious of revenge, and easily obtained, from the enemies of Stilicho, the tripping sacrifice of an obnoxious poet. The poet concealed himself, however, during the tumult of the revolution; and, consulting the dictates of prudence rather than of honour, he addressed, in the name of Honorius, a humble re-cantation to the offended prefect. He deplores, in

The incapacity of a weak and disunited government may often assume the appearance, and produce the effects, of a safety of a change with the public enemy. If Alaric himself had been introduced into the council of Ravenna, he would probably sonal injuries; and he might spectaculously complain, that the imperial ministers still delayed and eluded the payment of the four thousand pounds of gold; which had been granted by the Roman senate, either to reward his services, or to appease his fury. His decent firmness was supported by an artful moderation, which contributed to the success of his designs. He required a fair and reasonable satisfaction; but he granted the strongest assurances, that, as soon as he had obtained it, he would immediately retire. He refused to trust the faith of the Romans, unless Titus and Jason, the sons of two great officers of state, were sent as hostages to his camp; but he offered to delivner, himself, several of the most illustrious youths of the Gothic nation. The modesty of Alaric was interpreted, by the ministers of Ravenna, as a sure evidence of his weakness and fear. They disdained either to negotiate a treaty, or to assemble an army; and with brash confidence, deferred only from their ignorance of the extreme danger, irretrievably wasted the decisive moments of peace and war. While they expected, in sullen silence, that the barbarians should evacuate the conines of Italy, Alaric, with bold and rapid marches, passed the Alps and the Po; hastily pillaged the cities of Tuscum and Illium; Columbia and Cremona, which yielded to his arms; increased his forces by the accession of thirty thousand auxiliaries; and, without meeting a single enemy in the field, advanced as far as the edge of the morass which protected the imperious residence of the emperor of the west. Instead of fair and reasonable satisfaction, which the barbarians themselves, encountered the victorious monarch, and boldly denounced the indignation of Heaven against the oppressors of the earth: but the saint himself was confounded by the solemn asseveration of Alaric, that he felt a secret and preternatural impulse, which directed, and even compelled, his march to the gates of Rome. He felt, that his genius and his fortune were equal to the most arduous enterprises; and the enthusiasm which he communicated to the Goths, insensibly removed the popular, and almost superstitious, reverence of a former and only satisfaction of the Roman name. His troops, animated by the hopes of spoil, followed the course of the Flaminian way, occupied the unguarded passes of the Apennines, descended into the rich plains of Umbria; and, as they lay encamped on the banks of the Clitumnus, might wanto stop their march. But, when they saw the signal, which had been so long reserved for the use of Roman triumphs, a lofty situation, and a seasonable tempest of thunder and lightning, preserved the little city of Narni; but the king of the Goths, despising the ignoble prey, still advanced with unalloyed vigour; and after he had passed through the stately arches adorned with the spoils of barbaric victories, he pitched his camp under the walls of Rome.†

The successful expedition of Hannibal, served only to display the character of the senate and people of a senate degraded, rather than exalted, by the comparison of an assembly of kings; and of a people, to whom the ambassador of Pyrrhus aspired the inexhaustible resources of the hydra.‡ Each of the senators, in the time of the Punic war, had accomplish-ished more than twenty thousand oxen, and had sent a superior station; and the decree, which invested with temporary command all those who had been consuls, or censors, or dictators, gave the republic the immediate assistance of many brave and experienced generals.
In the beginning of the war, the Roman people contemplated a long series of events, which were recalling their scattered forces, expected his approach.
He encamped on the banks of the Anio, at the distance of three miles from the city; and he was soon informed, that the ground on which he had pitched his tent, was sold for an adequate price at a public auction; and that a body of troops, either on the one or the opposite road, to reinforce the legions of Spain.¶ He led his Africans to the gates of Rome, where he found three armies in order of battle, prepared to receive him; but Hannibal dreaded the event of a combat, by which he could not hope to escape; unless he destroyed the last of his enemies; and his speedy retreat confessed the invincible courage of the Romans.

The fall of the second, and the rise of the third, appears so enormous, that several critics, notwithstanding the uniformity of the numbers, have assigned some corruptions to both, to Drakenbrod in xvii. 36, and Beaufort, Republique Romaine, tom.
l. p. 352. They did not consider that the second census was taken only at Rome, and that the numbers were diminished, not only by the death, but likewise by the absence, of many soldiers. In the third census, the same officers were employed, by the care of particular commissioners. From the numbers on the list, we may almost judge, that one-twelfth of the army was conpable of bearing arms. See Populorum de la France, p. 72.

These lofty pretensions. Encouraged by the applause of their parasites, they easily imposed on the credulity of the people by means of these magnificent and imposing gestures, by the custom of adopting the name of their patron, which had always prevailed among the freedmen and clients of illustrious families. Most of those families, however, attacked by so many causes of external violence or internal decay, were gradually extinguished; and it would be more proper to enumerate the fine generations among the mountains of the Alps, or in the peaceful solitude of Apulia, than on the theatre of Rome, the seat of fortune, of danger, and of perpetual revolutions. Under each successive reign, and from every province of the empire, a crowd of parasites, contending, rising in turn by the assistance of their masters or their vices, for the paltry, the honours, and the palaces of Rome; and oppressed, or protected, the poor and humble remnant of cosular families; who were ignorant, perhaps, of the glory of their ancestors.

The Anicii. In the time of Jercum and Claudianus, the senators unanimously yielded the pre-eminence to the Anician line; and a slight view of their history will serve to appreciate the rank and antiquity of the noble families, which contended only for the second place. During the first five ages of the history of the republic, the Anicii, who appear to have derived their origin from Praestate; and the ambition of those new citizens was long satisfied with the plebeian honours of tribunes of the people. One hundred and sixty-eight years before the Christian era, the family was ennobled by the marriage of Tullus Hostilius Marcellinus with a patrician who was not a despis, in the public estimation, the one hundred and sixty-eighth anniversary of the imperial purple. The several branches, to whom it was communicated, united, by marriage or inheritance, the wealth and titles of the Anicius, the Petronii, the Olybriaeans, and the common stock; and in each generation the number of the cosular families was multiplied by an hereditary claim. The Anician family excelled in faith and in riches: they were the first of the Roman senate who embraced Christianity; and it is probable that Anicius Julianus, who was afterwards consul and prefect of the city, atoned for his attachment to the party of Maxentius, by the readiness with which he accepted the religion of Constantine. Their ample fortune enabled them frequently to adopt the most distinguished of the chief of the Anician family; who shared with Gratian the honours of the consulate, and exercised, four times, the high office of pretorian prefect. His immense estates were scattered over the wide extent of the Roman world; and though the public might wish that part of the family who had been enriched with the generosity and magnificence of that fortunate statesman deserved the gratitude of his clients, and the admiration of strangers. Such was the respect entertained for his memory, that the two sons of Probus, in their earliest youth, and at the request of their mother, were educated in such a manner as to receive the title of consul, and were addressed by the name of illustrious family: a memorable distinction, without example, in the annals of Rome.

"The marbles of the Anician palace," Wealth of the were used as a proverbial expression of Roman nobles. opulence and splendour; but the nobles and senators of Rome aspired, in due gradation, to imitate that illustrious family. The accurate description of the city, which was composed in the Theodosian age, enumerates one thousand seven hundred and eighty houses, the residence of wealthy and honourable citizens. Many of these stately mansions might almost excuse the flattering epithet of benefactors, and the praise of a multitude of palaces, and that each palace was equal to a city: since it included within its own precincts, every thing which could be subservient either to use or luxury; markets, hippodromes, temples, fountains, baths, porticoes, shady groves, and artificial aves. The historian Olympiodorus, who represents the state of Rome when it was besieged by the Goths, continues to observe, that several of the richest senators received from their estates an annual income of four thousand pounds of gold, above one hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling; without computing the stated provision of corn and wine, which, had they been sold, would have filled the foundations of all the walls, and the value of one-third of the money. Compared to this immense wealth, an ordinary revenue of a thousand or fifteen hundred pounds of gold might be considered as no more than adequate to the dignity of the senatorian rank, which required many expenses of a public and ostentatious kind. Several examples are recorded, in the age of Honorius, of vain and popular nobles, who celebrated the year of their praetorship, by a festival, which lasted seven days, and cost above one thousand pounds sterling. The estates of the Roman senators,

The Christianized form of the name is seen in Probus, the mercenary chief, and the hero of the Gothic invasion. See Gregor. p. 300. The Christian name相应于其 Septimius Severus, (app. Addisc. 32.) and to Probus. Paulini in vit. August. Claudianus in vit. Probus. Probus, (Paulini in vit. Their manners. The opulent nobles of an immense capital, who were never excited by the pursuit of luxury and glory, and engaged in the occupations of civil government, naturally resigned their leisure to the business and amusements of private life. At Rome, commerce was always held in contempt; but the senators, from the first age of the republic, increased their patrimony, and multiplied their clients, by the practice of obsequiousness; and obsolete laws were eluded, or violated, by the mutual inclinations and interest of both parties.

A considerable mass of treasure must always have existed at Rome, either in the current coin of the empire, or in the form of gold and silver plate, and there were numerous lites in the time of Pliny. He expended more solid silver, than had been transported by Scipio from vanquished Carthage. The greater part of the nobles, who dissipated their fortunes in profuse luxury, found themselves poor in the midst of wealth; and idle in a constant hereditary disipation. Their desires were continually gratified by the labour of a thousand hands; of the numerous train of their domestic slaves, who were actuated by the fear of punishment; and of the various professions of artificers and merchants, who were more powerfully impelled by the desire of gain.

The ancient Romans enjoyed many of the conveniences of life, which have been invented or improved by the progress of industry; and the plenty of glass and linen has diffused more comfort among the modern nations of Europe, than the senators of Rome could derive from all the refinements of pompous or sensual luxury. Their luxury, and their manners, have been the subject of minute and laborious disquisition: but as such inquiries would divert me too long from the design of the present work, I shall confine myself to the more remarkable incidents with which he was familiarly conversant. The judicious reader will not always approve the aspersion of censure, the choice of circumstances, or the style of expression: he will perhaps detect the latent prejudices, and personal resentments, which soured the temper of Ammianus himself; but he will surely observe, with philosophic curiosity, the interesting and original picture of the manners of Rome.

The greatness of Rome (such is the language of the historian) was founded on the rare faculties of the Romans, and the exuberance of virtue and of fortune. The long period of her infancy was employed in a laborious struggle against the tribes of Italy, the neighbours and enemies of the rising city. In the strength and ardour of youth, she sustained the storms of war; carried with her victory, the names, the capitals, and the remains of nations; and brought home triumphant laurels from every country of the globe. At length, verging towards old age, and sometimes conquering by the terror only of her name, she sought the blessings of ease and tranquillity. The venerable city, which had trampled on the necks of the ancients, was now degraded, and the system of laws, the perpetual guardians of justice and freedom, was content, like a wise and wealthy parent, to devolve to the Caesars, her favourite sons, the care of governing her ample patrium. A secure and profound peace, such as had been once enjoyed in the reign of Numa, succeeded to the tumults of a republic: while Rome was still adored as the queen of the earth; and the subject nations still revered the name of the people, and the majesty of the senate. But this native splendour (continues Ammianus) is now reduced to the condition of a kingdom, the subjects of whom, who, unmindful of their own dignity, and of that of their country, assume an unboughted licence of vice and folly. They contend with each other in the empty vaunt of titles and surnames; and curiously select, or invent, the most lofty and sonorous appellation. Reburhasius, Fabianus, Pagonias, or Tarbusius, 8 which may impress the ears of the vulgar with astonishment and respect. From a vain ambition of perpetuating their memory, they affect to multiply their likenesses, in statues of bronze and marble; nor are they satisfied, by the observance with Horace, and I believe with truth, that Augustus had neither statues nor his images, nor a shirt to his back. Under the lower empire, the use of linen and glass became somewhat more common.

It is incumbent on me to explain the liberties which I have taken with the ancient, and to declare, that I have not been actuated by any passion, but the desire of truth. Augustus had neither statues nor his images, nor a shirt to his back. Under the lower empire, the use of linen and glass became somewhat more common.

Democracy des Inscriptions, tom. xxvii. p. 727, was equally applied to a peruse of 123 pieces of silver, and to a small copper coin of the value of 1-48 part of that piece. In the former sense, the 22,000 friti would be equal to 150,000; in the latter, to five or six pounds sterling. The one appears extravagant, the other is ridiculous. There must have existed some third, and middle value, which is here unknown; but ambiguity is an inexcusable fault in the language of law.
unless those statues are covered with plates of gold: an honourable distinction, first accorded to Scipios the coming generation, by the hands and counsels, the power of king Antiochus. The ostentation of displaying, of magnifying, perhaps, the rent-roll of the estates which they possess in all the provinces, from the rising to the setting sun, provokes the just resentment of every man, who recollects that their predecessors were so distinguished from the meanest of the soldiers, by the delicacy of their food, or the splendour of their apparel. But the modern nobles measure their rank and consequence according to the loftiness of their chariots; and the weighty magnificence of their dress. Their long robes of silk and purple float in the wind, and as they are agitated, by act or accident, they occasionally discover the under garments, the rich tunic, embroidered with the figures of various animals. Followed by a train of fifty servants, and tearing up the pavement, they move along the streets with the same impetuous speed as if they travelled with post-horses; and the example of the servants is boldly imitated by the matrons and ladies, whose covered carriages are continually driving round the immense space of the city and suburbs. Whenever these persons of high distinction condescend to visit the public baths, they assume, on their part, the lead and example appropriate to their own use the conveniences which were designed for the Roman people. If, in these places of mixed and general resort, they meet any of the infamous ministers of their pleasures, they express their affections by a tender embrace; while they proudly declare the salutations of their fellow-citizens, who are not permitted to aspire above the honour of kissing their hands, or their knees. As soon as they have indulged themselves in the refreshment of the bath, they resume their rings, and the other emblems of their dignity; select from their private wardrobe of the finest linen, as might suit for a decent person, the garments most agreeable to their fancy, and maintain till their departure the same haughty demeanour; which perhaps might have been excused in the great Marcellus, after the conquest of Syracuse. Sometimes, indeed, these heroes contemplate mankind with the same indulgent smile that Lucullus had, in Italy, and procure themselves, by the toil of servile hands, the amusements of the chase. If at any time, but more especially on a hot day, they have courage to sail, in their painted galleys, from the Lucrine lake to their elegant villas on the sea-coast of Patroii and Cumae, they compare the object with the statues of Cesar and Alexander. and pernicious luxury, their private banquets; the choice of the guests is the subject of anxious deliberation. The modest, the sober, and the learned, are seldom admitted. The rich and the frivolous, who are commonly swayed by interested motives, have precedence only to insert, in the list of invitations, the obscure names of the most worthless of mankind. But the frequent and familiar companions of the great, are those parasites, who practise the most useful of all arts, the art of being useful. As their reward, and extract, of their immortal patron: gaze with rapture on his marble columns, and variegated pavements; and strenuously praise the pomp and elegance, which he is taught to consider as a part of his personal merit. At the Roman tables, the birds, the squabulae, or the fishes, of an unproportionate size, are displayed with cautious attention; a pair of scales is accurately applied, to ascertain their real weight; and, while the more rational guests are disgusted by the vain and tedious reception, notaries are summoned to attest, by an authentic record, the truth of such a monstrous event. Music is incessantly repeated in the palaces, and houses of the society, is derived from the profession of gaming, or, as it is more politely styled, of play. The confederates are united by a strict and indisputable bond of friendship, or rather of common interest. It is to be supposed, that in the Theatre of

Theatres, which are the seat of science, who abound in a supper, or assembly, is placed below a magistrat, displays in his countenance the surprise and indignation, which Cato might have felt, when he endeavored to find pretorship by the votes of a capricious people. The acquisition of knowledge seldom engenders the curiosity of the nobles, who abhor the fatigues, and disdain the advantages, of study; and the rules which they pursue are the Sages of Judah, and the verbona and sinsisters of Montmartre. The learned Romans, who have inherited from their fathers, are secluded, like dreary sepulchres, from the light of day. But the costly instruments of the theatre, flutes, and enormous lyres, and hydraulic organs, are constructed for their use; and the harmony of vocal and instrumental music is incessantly repeated in the palaces of Rome. In those palaces, sound is preferred to sense, and the care of the body to that of the mind. It is allowed as a salutary maxim, that the light and frivolous suspicion of a contagious malady, is of sufficient weight to excuse the visits of the most intimate friends; and even the servants, who are despatched to make the decent inquiries, are not suffered to return home, till they have undergone the ceremony of a previous abstinence. Yet this selfish and unmanly delicacy occasionally yields to the more impetuous passion of revenge. The prospect of guilt will allure a rich and gouty senator as far as Spoleto; every sentiment of arrogance and dignity is subdued by the hopes of an inheritance, or even of a legacy; and a wealthy, childless citizen is the most powerful of the Romans. The barnacles, from the perspiration of the sweat, are extinguished in the pale, and are extinguished in the face, in a blush. They are sometimes, with a mixture of the pardonable delight, and sometimes with the profound grief; and in the later, and sometimes with the admixture of the profane sceptics, who impiously doubt, or deny, the existence of a celestial power. In populous cities, which are the seat of commerce and manufactures, the middle ranks of inhabitants, who derive their wealth from the exertion, or labour, of their hands, are commonly the most profligate, the most useful, and, in that sense, the most respectable, part of the community. But the plebeians of Rome, who disdained such sedentary and servile arts, had been preserved as the link, and the earliest object, of the chain of debt and usury; and the husbandman, during the term of his military service, was obliged to abandon the cultivation of his farm. The lands of Italy, which had been originally divided among the families of free and indigent proprietors, were insensibly purchased, or usurped, by the arvae of the nobles; and in the age which preceded the fall of the republic, it was computed, that only two thousand citizens were possessed of any independent substance. Yet as long as the people bestowed, by their suffrages, the honours of the state, the command of the legions, and the administration of justice, by provinces, their humane alms, and their proud and princely pride alleviated, in some measure, the hardships of poverty; and their wants were seasonably supplied by the ambitious liberality of the candidates, who aspired to secure a vena majority in the thirty-five tribes, or the hundred and ninety-three centuries, of Rome. But when the prodigal commons had improvidently alienated not only the vine, but all the lands under the dominion of the Cessenarii, into a vile and wretched populace, which must, in a few generations, have been totally extinguished, if it had not been continually recruited by the manumission of slaves, and the influx of strangers. As early as the time of Hadrian, it was the just complaint of the ingenuous writer, that the capital had attracted the views of the universe, and the manners of the most opposite nations. The intemperance of the Gauls, the cunning and levity of the Greeks, the savage obstinacy of the Egyptians and Jews, the servile temper of the Asiatics, and the absolute, effeminate prostitution of the Syrians, were mixed into a multitude; they bore with the proud and false denomination of Romans, presumed to despise their fellow-subjects, and even their sovereigns, who dwelt beyond the precincts of the eternal city. Yet the name of that city was still pronounced with respect; the frequent and capricious tumults of its inhabitants were indulged with impunity; and the successors of Constantine, instead of crushing the last remnants of the democracy, by the strong arm of military power, emboldened the mild policy of Augustus, and were contented with the tranquility and quiet good understanding, of an innumerable people. I. For the convenience of the lazy plebeians, the monthly distributions of corn were converted into a daily allowance of bread; a great number of ovens was constructed and maintained at the public expense; and at the appointed hour, each citizen, who was furnished with a ticket, ascended the flight of steps, which had been assigned to his peculiar quarter or division, and received, either as a gift, or at a very low price, a loaf of bread of the weight of three pounds for the use of his family. II. The forest of Lucania, whose acorns fattened large drove of swine, and which, being meted with a tassel, was distributed to the people, furnishing them a plentiful supply of cheap and wholesome meat. During five months of the year, a regular allowance of bacon was distributed to the poorer citizens; and the annual consumption of the capital, at a time when it was much declined from its former lustre, was ascertainment, by the order of Valentinian the Third, at three millions six hundred and twenty-eight thousand pounds. III. In the manners of antiquity, the use of oil was indispensable for the lamp, as well as for the bath; and the annual tax, which was imposed on Africa for the benefit of Rome, amounted to the weight of a hundred thousand talents, or to the quantity of three hundred thousand English gallons. IV. The anxiety of Augustus to provide the metropolis with sufficient plenty of corn, was not extended beyond that necessary article of human subsistence; and when the popular clamour accused the dearness and scarcity of wine, a proclamation was issued, by the grave reformer, to reestablish the uses of nature, and to enable him to complain of thirst, since the aqueducts of Agrippa had introduced into the city so many copious streams of pure and salubrious water. This rigid sobriety was insensibly relaxed; and, although the generous design of Aurelian does not appear to have been executed in its full extent, the Roman people continued on very easy and liberal terms. The administration of the public cellars was delegated to a magistrate of honourable rank; and a considerable part of the vintage of Campania was reserved for the fortunate inhabitants of Rome.

The superb aqueducts, so justly celebrated by the praises of Augustus, he himself, replenished the Thermae, or baths, which had been constructed, in every part of the city, with imperial magnificence. The baths of Antoninus Caracalla, which were open, at stated hours, for the indiscriminate service of the senators and the people, contained above sixteen hundred seats of marble; and more than three thousand were reckoned in the baths of Diocletian. The walls of the lofty apartments were covered with curious mosaics, that imitated the art of the pencil in the elegance of design, and the variety of colours. The Egyptian granite was beautifully incorporated, and either the perpetual stream of hot water was poured into the capacious basons, through so many wide mouths of bright and lustrous silver; and the meanest Roman could purchase, with a small copper coin, the daily enjoyment of a scene of pomp and luxury, which might excite the envy of the kings of Asia. From these stately palaces issued a swarm of dirty and ragged plebeians, without shoes and without a mantle; who roistered away whole days in the street or Forum, to hear news, and to hold disputes; who dissipated, in extravagant gaming, the miserable pittance of their scanty wages; and who, without air and in the sun, in obscure taverns, and brothels, in the indulgence of gross and vulgar sensuality. But the most lively and splendid games and spectacles, the picturesque princes of the Colours, who espoused the inhuman combats of gladiators; but the Roman people still considered the circus as their home, their temple, and the seat of the republic. The impatient crowd rushed at the dawn of day to secure their places, and there were many who passed a sleepless night, and anxiously awaited, with the portentous portents of the morning, the evening, careless of the sun, or of the rain, the spectators, who sometimes amounted to the number of four hundred thousand, remained in eager attention; their eyes fixed on the horses and charioteers, their minds agitated with hope and fear, for the success of the Colours which they espoused; and the happiness of Rome appeared to hang on the event of a rare. The same immoderate inspired their clamours, and their applause, as often as they were entertained with the hunting of wild beasts, and the various modes of theatrical representation. These representations in modern capitals may deserve to be considered as a pure and elegant school of taste, and perhaps of virtue. But the Tragic and Comic Miles of Menander, who selected his Epicurus and the imitation of Attic genius, had been almost totally silent since the fall of the republic;* and their place was unworthily occupied by licentious farce, effeminate music, and splendid pageantry. The pamphlets, which are tabulated, were published in the age of Augustus to the sixth century, expressed, without the use of words, the various fables of the gods and heroes of antiquity; and the perfection of their art, which sometimes disarmed the gravity of the philosopher, always excited the applause and wonder of the people. The vast and magnificent theatres of Rome were filled by three thousand female dancers, and by three thousand singers, with the masters of their respective choirs. Such was the popular favour which they enjoyed, that, in a time of secrecy, when all strangers were banished from the city, the merit of contributing to the public pleasure was awarded them from a law which was strictly executed against the professors of the liberal arts.1

Papulousness of Rome.

Elagabalus attempted to discover, from the quantity of spiders' webs, the number of the inhabitants of Rome. A more rational method of inquiry has been underlaid of the attendance of the wisest princes, who could easily have resolved a question so important for the Roman government, and so interesting to succeeding ages. The births and deaths of the citizens were duly registered; and if the annual rate of mortality was considered to maintain the same number of the same average, we might now produce some satisfactory calculation, which would destroy the extravagant assertions of critics, and perhaps confirm the most probable conjectures of philosophers.2 The most diligent researches have collected only the following circumstances: which, slight and imperfect as they are, may tend in some degree to illustrate the question of the papulousness of ancient Rome. I. When the capital of the empire was besieged by the Goths, the circuit of the walls was accurately measured by Ammianus, the historian, who found it twenty-five miles.3 It should not be forgotten that the form of the city was almost that of a circle; the geometrical figure which is known to contain the largest space within any given circumference. II. The architect Vitruvius, who flourished in the Augustan age, and whose evidence, on this occasion, has peculiar weight, appears incredible, though the country on these occasions flocked to the city.

Horat. Epist. ii. 110, 111: and the learned, though perplexed, note of Dacier, who might have allowed the name of tragedies to the Didus and Dictus of Persius, or to the Andae et aerarii domesticae facta of Horace.

The Octavia, ascribed to one of the Senesch, still remains a very unfavourable type of the Roman tragedy.

In the time of Quintilian and Pliny, a tragic poet was reduced to the imperfect method of hiring a great room, and reading his play to a club of amateurs invited for that purpose. (See Dial. de Oratoribus, c. 9, 11, and Plin. Epist. vii. 17.)

See the Dialogue of Luschn. edit. Salutanes, tom. i. p. 265—317, edit. Retz. The pamphlets, which obtained the honourable name of epilogumina, and it was required, that they should be conversant with almost every art and science. Burene (in the Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions, tom. i. p. 157, &c.) has given a short history of the institution of this species of theatricals.

Aulius, i. iv. c. 6. He complains, with decent indignation, that the editor and impresario of the play were filled with envy, which might have given children to the state, but whose only occupation was to curi and dress their hair, and jactari volubiles orris, dum eorum audacia ingenii maxima stridere fasit theatraliae. (Lipsius, tom. iii. p. 424. de Magnific. Romana, l. iii. c. 3.)

And desc. 184 B.C. the Curi of the people, the plebs, has been suggested of the four, or eight, or fourteen millions in Rome. Mr. Hume, (Essais, vol. i. p. 436—437) with admirable good sense and scepticism, has been some secret disposition to estimate the populousness of ancient Rome. (Gymnoped. ap. Phot. p. 157. See Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. tom. ii. p. 400.)

1 In this sum total is composed 1750 domus, or great houses, of 10,000 or 12,000, the remains of their ancient habitations (Cicero, Ant. iii. p. 82.) and these numbers are ascertainment on the agreement of a few in the old, or the sale of the rich endowments of females, which might have given children to the state; but whose only occupation was to curl and dress their hair, and jactari volubiles orris, dum eorum audacia ingenii maxima stridere fasit theatraliae. 2 Sce also, as correct writer, M. de Menasse, Recherches sur la Population, p. 155—157. From probable or certain grounds, he assurably computes, that between 8,000 and 12,000 was the number of the inhabitions of ancient Rome, (Cicero, Ant. iii. p. 82.) and these numbers are ascertained on the agreement of a few in the old, or the sale of the rich endowments of females, which might have given children to the state; but whose only occupation was to curl and dress their hair, and jactari volubiles orris, dum eorum audacia ingenii maxima stridere fasit theatraliae. 3 From this computation is not very different from that which M. Bro- casius has, and has produced similar principles; though he seems to aim at a degree of precision, which it is neither possible nor important to seek for. were succeeded and aggravated by the contagion of a pestilential disease. The assurances of speedy and effectual relief, which were repeatedly transmitted from the court of Ravenna, supported, for some time, the fainting resolution of the Romans, till at length the despair of any human aid tempted them to accept the offers of a preternatural deliverance. Pompeianus, a Tuscan plenipotentiary, held a listening ear, and was fascinated, either by the art or fanaticism of some Tuscan diviners, that, by the mysterious force of spells and sorceries, they could extract the lightning from the clouds, and point those celestial fires against the camp of the invader. The imperial secret was communi ciated to Innocent, the bishop of Rome; and the successor of St. Peter is accused, perhaps without foundation, of preferring the safety of the republic to the rigid severity of the christian worship. But when the question was agitated in the senate, when it was presented as an essential condition, that those sacrifices should be performed in the capital, by the authority, and in the presence, of the magistrates; the majority of that respectable assembly, apprehensive either of the Divine or of the imperial displeasure, refused to join in an act, which appeared almost equivalent to the public renunciation of the Chris tian religion.

The last resource of the Romans was Abaric accepts a ransom, and raises the siege of the city. That unfortunate city gradually succumbed to the pangs of famine. In the course of a few days, the population of the city was reduced to about the one-half of the usual numbers; and the number of the inmates at the time of the capitulation was so small that no necessity existed for a large quantity of victuals. The Arabian sented to raise the siege, on the immediate payment of five thousand pounds of gold, of thirty thousand pounds of silver, of four thousand rods of silk, of three thousand pieces of fine scarlet cloth, and of three thousand pounds weight of pepper. But the public treasury was exhausted by the payment of the great estates in Italy and the provinces, were intercepted by the calamities of war; the gold and gems had been exchanged during the famine, for the vilest sustenance; the heard of secret wealth were still concealed by the obstacles of prisons; and some remains of consecrated spoils afforded the only resource that could avert the impending ruin of the city. As soon as the Romans had satisfied the rapacious demands of Alaric, they were restored, in some measure, to the enjoyment of peace and plenty. Several of the gates were cautiously opened; the impertion of provisions from the river, and the adjacent country, was no longer obstructed by the Goths; the citizens resorted in crowds to the free market, which was held during three days in the suburbs; and while the merchants, who undertook this gainful trade, made a considerable profit, the future supply was secured to the city by the negotiations which Alaric opened a party of licentious Goths, who had insulted some Roman citizens on the road to Ostia. His army, enriched by the contributions of the capital, slowly advanced into the fair and fruitful province of Tuscany, where he proposed to establish his winter quarters; and the Gothic standard became the refuge of forty thousand barbarian slaves, who had broke their chains, and aspired, under the command of their great deliverer, to revenge the injuries and the disgrace of their cruel servitude. About the same time, he received a message from his lieutenant, the bishops and cities, whom Adolphus, the brother of his wife, had conducted, at his pressing invitation, from the banks of the Danube to those of the Tiber, and who had cut their way, with some difficulty and loss, through the superior numbers of the imperial troops. A victorious leader, who united the daring spirit of a barbarian with the art and discipline of a Roman general, was at the head of a hundred thousand fighting men; and Italy pronounced with terror and respect, the formidable name of Alaric.

At the distance of fourteen centuries, and in a more enlightened age, we may be satisfied with relating the facts of the expedition of the conquerors of Rome, without presuming to investigate the motives of their political conduct. In the midst of his apparent prosperity, Alaric was conscious, perhaps, of some secret weakness, some internal defect; or perhaps the moderation which he displayed, was intended only to deceive and disarm the easy credulity of the ministers of Honorius. The king of the Goths repeatedly declared, that it was his desire to be considered as the friend of peace, and of the Romans. Three senators, at his earnest request, were sent ambassadors to the court of Rome, to solicit the hostage, and the conclusion of the treaty; and the proposals, which he more clearly expressed during the course of the negotiations, could only inspire a doubt of his sincerity, as they might seem inadequate to the state of his fortune. The barbarian still aspired to the rank of master-general of the armies of the west; he stipulated an annual subsidy of corn and money; and he chose the provinces of Dalmatia, Noricum, and Venetia, for the seat of his new kingdom, which would have commanded the important posts of navigation between Italy and the Danube. If these modest terms should be rejected, Alaric showed a disposition to relinquish his pecuniary demands, and even to content himself with the possession of Noricum, an exhausted and impoverished country, perpetually exposed to the ravages of the barbarians of Germany. But the hopes of peace were disappointed by the weak obstinacy or interested views, of the minister Olympius. Without listening to the salutary remonstrances of the senate, he dismissed their ambassadors under the conduct of a military escort too numerous for a retreat of honor, and too feeble for an army of defence. Six thousand Dal- matians, the flower of the imperial legions, were ordered to march from Ravenna to Rome, through an open country, which was occupied by the formidable myriads of the barbarians. These brave legions, encounter ing the hostile bands of Alaric, were vanquished, with the loss of their general, Valens, with an hundred soldiers, escaped from the field of battle; and one of the ambassadors, who could no longer claim the protection of the law of nations, was obliged to purchase his freedom with a hundred silver crowns from the hands of the victorious barbarians. Instead of resenting this act of impotent hostility, immediately renewed his proposals of peace; and the second embassy of the Roman senate, which derived weight and dignity from the presence of Innocent, bishop of the city, was guarded from the dangers of the road by a detachment of Gothic soldiers. Yet Olympius 5 might have continued to his charge and consul the just resentment of a people, who on account of mislaidly accused him as the author of the public calamities; but his power was undermined by the secret intrigues of the palatine suite, which, with much treachery, had overthrown the government of Honorius, and the empire, to Jovius, the prætorian prefect; an unworthy servant, who did not alone, by the merit of personal attachment, for the errors and misfortunes of his administration. The exile, or escape of the guilty Olympius, reserved him for more viscissitudes of fortune; he experienced the adventures of an obscure and wandering life; he again rose to power; he fell a second time into disgrace; his ears were cut off; he expired under the lash; and his ignominious death afforded a grateful spectacle to the public justice. The unmerited advancement of Olympius, whose character was deeply tainted with religious fanaticism, the pagans and heretics were delivered from the impolite proscription which excluded them from the dignities of the state. The brave Gen- nerid, a soldier of barbarian origin, who still adhered to the worship of his ancestors, had been obliged to lay aside the military belt: and though he was repeatedly assured by the emperor himself, that laws were not made for persons of his rank or merit, he refused to accept any partial dispensation, and persevered in honourable disgrace, till he had extirpatedition, so the hardy and valorous inhabitants of the Roman Government. The conduct of Generid, in the important station to which he was promoted or restored, of master-general of Dalmatia, Panonnia, Noricum and Rhaetia, seemed to revive the discipline and spirit of the republic. From a life of idleness and want, his troops were soon imbued

9. Zosimus, l. i. p. 361. relates this circumstance with visible complacency, and characterizes the nature of Olympius, as a man of the most cherished and important interest, the senate being the representatives of the council of Carthage, which deputed four bishops to the court of Ravenna, to execute his will, which was a measure, that his conversions to Christianity should be free and voluntary. See Baroni, Annal. Eccl. A. D. 389. No. 15. A. D. Iv. No. 47, 48.
ated to severe exercise, and plentiful subsistence; and his private generosity often supplied the rewards, which were denied by the avarice, or poverty, of the court of Ravenna. The valour of Gennerid, formidable to the adjacent barbarians, was the finest bulwark of the Illyrian frontier; and his vigilant care assisted the emperor in his inheritance, the first thousand Huns, who arrived on the confines of Italy, attended by such a convey of provisions, and such a numerous train of sheep and oxen, as might have been sufficient, not only for the march of an army, but for the settlement of a colony. But the court and councils of Honorius, successively oppressed by the successive horrors of corruption and anarchy. Instigated by the prefect Jovius, the guards rose in furious mutiny and demanded the heads of two generals, and of the two principal eunuchs. The generals, under a perfidious promise of safety, were sent on ship-board, and privately executed; while the fate of the eunuchs procured them a mild and secure exile at Milan and Constantinople. Eusebius the eunuch, and the barbarian Allobich, succeeded to the command of the bedchamber and of the guards; and the mutual jealousy of these subordinate ministers was the cause of their mutual destruction. The insolent order of the court of the eunuchs, the great chamberlain was shamefully beaten to death with sticks, before the eyes of the astonished emperor; and the subsequent assassination of Allobich, in the midst of a public procession, is the only circumstance of his life in which Honorius discovered the least sympathy. But, having lost his heart, he could not, before they fell, Eusebius and Allobich had contributed their part to the ruin of the empire, by opposing the conclusion of a treaty which Jovius, from a selfish and perhaps a criminal motive, had negotiated with Alaric, in a personal interview under the walls of Rimini. But the insolent order of the court of the eunuchs, and the imperial displeasure, it was presently surmised to assume a lofty tone of inflexible dignity, such as neither his situation, nor his character, could enable him to support; and a letter, signed with the name of Honorius, was immediately despatched to the prætorian prefect, granting him a free permission to dispose of the public money, but sternly refusing to prostitute the military honours of Rome to the proud demands of a barbarian. This letter was imprudently communicated to Alaric himself, and the Goth, who, in the whole transaction had behaved with temper and decency, expressed, in the most outrageous language, his deadly sedition, as well as the insult so wantonly offered to a Christian, and to his nation. The conference of Rimini was hastily interrupted; and the prefect Jovius, on his return to Ravenna, was compelled to adopt, and even to encourage, the fashionable opinions of the court. By his advice and example, the principal officers of the state and army were obliged to swear, that, without listening, in any circumstances, to any conditions of peace, they would still persevere in perpetual and impalpable war against the enemy of the republic. This rash engagement opposed an insuperable bar to all future reparation. The ministers of Honorius were importuned to hear to declare, that, if they had only invoked the name of the Deity, they would consult the public safety, and trust their souls to the mercy of heaven; but they had sworn, by the sacred name of the emperor himself; they had touched, in solemn ceremony, that sacred and living symbol, of which their oath would expose them to the temporal penalties of sacrilege and rebellion.

While the emperor and his court enjoyed, with sullen pride, the security of the marshes and fortifications of Ravenna, they abandoned Rome, almost without defence, to the resentment of Alaric. Yet such was the moderation which he still preserved, or affected, that, as he moved with his army along the Flaminian way, he successively despatched the bishops of the towns of Italy to reiterate his offers of peace, and to conjure the emperor, that he would save the city and its inhabitants; but, in vain was the appeal forced by the positive decisions of the barbarians. These impending calamities were however averted, not indeed by the wisdom of Honorius, but by the prudence or humanity of the Gothic king; who employed a milder, though not less effectual, method of conquest. Instead of assaulting the capital, he proceeded to the conquest of his province, and of the province of Osia, one of the boldest and most stupendous works of Roman magnificence. The accidents to which the precarious subsistence of the city was continually exposed in a winter navigation, and an open road, had suggested to the genius of the first Caesar the useful design, which was executed under the reign of Claudius. The artificial moles, which formed the narrow entrance, advanced far into the sea, and firmly repelled the fury of the waves, while the largest vessels securely rode at anchor within three deep and capacious basins, which received the northern branch of the Tiber, and the much smaller one of the Ostia. The Roman Port insensibly swelled to the size of an episcopal city, where the corn of Africa was deposited in spacious granaries for the use of the capital. As soon as Alaric was in possession of that important place, he summoned the city to surrender at discretion; and his demand was mostly refused, on the ground of negotiation, that a refusal, or even a delay, should be instantly followed by the destruction of the city, on the life of the Roman people depended. The clamours of that people, and the terror of famine, subdued the pride of the senate; they listened, without refusal of terms, to the propositions of Alaric. This event, early in the sixteenth century, when the remains of this Augustan port were still visible, the antiquaries sketched the plan, (see Planilla, Mem. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tomo. xxx. p. 198,) and declared, with enthusiasm, that all the monarchs of Europe would be unable to execute so great a work. * Zosimus, l. v. p. 398, 399. I have softened the expressions of Aula- ric, who expostulated with the proofs of a man, which he certainly could not be. Instead of the former interpretation, I have given this passage. See Soest in Claud., c. 39. Dion Cassius, l. xiv. p. 949. edit. Reiss. and this passage is still more manifest in the description of the reign of the Huns. The Roman Port insensibly swelled to the size of an episcopal city, where the corn of Africa was deposited in spacious granaries for the use of the capital. As soon as Alaric was in possession of that important place, he summoned the city to surrender at discretion; and his demand was mostly refused, on the ground of negotiation, that a refusal, or even a delay, should be instantly followed by the destruction of the city, on the life of the Roman people depended. The clamours of that people, and the terror of famine, subdued the pride of the senate; they listened, without refusal of terms, to the propositions of Alaric. This event, early in the sixteenth century, when the remains of this Augustan port were still visible, the antiquaries sketched the plan, (see Planilla, Mem. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tomo. xxx. p. 198,) and declared, with enthusiasm, that all the monarchs of Europe would be unable to execute so great a work. (Berger, Hist. des Grands Chemins des Romains, tomo. ii. p. 356.)

The Ostia Tiberina, (see Cluver Italia Antiqua, lib. ii. p. 870—872.) in the plural number, the two mouths of the Tiber, were separated by the Holy Island, an equilateral triangle, whose sides were each of them completed at about two miles. The colony of Ostia was founded immediately beyond the left, or southern, and the Port immediately beyond the right, or northern, arm of the Tiber, and the straight line between their remains measures something more than two miles on Corigliano's map. In the time of Strabo, the sand and mud deposited by the Tiber, had been so much increased by the harbours of Ostia and Port, that the same cause had added much to the size of the Holy Island, and gradually left both Ostia and the Port at a considerable distance from the shore. The dry channels, (flumina moris,) and the large estuaries (stagnati di Romano, di Leonardo,) mark the changes of the river, and the efforts of the Tiber, for a long time to obtain a regular and delectate tract, the excellent map of the ecclesiastical state by the mathematician Benedict XIV., an actual survey of the Port and Ostia Romano, in six sheets, by Corigliano, which contains 113,916 rubbia about 870,000 acres) and the large topographical map of Aetna, in eight sheets.

As early as the third, (Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel, part. i., vol. ii. p. 295,) and as late as the second volume of the Travels of Mr. Bruce in the East Indies, (see Ets. p. 47,) the port of Rome was an episcopal city, which was described by that great man as he should see it. That description, now preserved by Pope Gregory IV., during the incursions of the Arabs, is now reduced to an inn, a church, and the house, or palace, of the bishop; the latter of which ranks as our homes, are not to be overlooked. Attaul is revered emperor by the Goths and Rom-

The gates of the city were thrown open, and the new emperor of the Romans, encompassed on every side by the Gothic arms, was conducted, in tu-mutilous procession, to the palace of Augustus and Trajan. As he proceeded, he distributed the civil and military dignities among his followers and adherents. Attailus convened an assembly of the senate; before whom, in a formal and florid speech, he asserted his resolution of restoring the majesty of the republic, and of uniting to the empire the provinces of Egypt and the east, which had been aggrandized by the sovereignty of Rome. Such extravagant promises inspired every reasonable citizen with a just contempt for the character of an unwarlike usurper; whose elevation was the deepest and most ignominious wound which the republic had yet sustained from the insolence of the barbarians. But the populace, with their usual levity, applauded the change of masters. The public discontent was favourable to the rival of Honorius; and the sectaries, oppressed by his persecuting edicts, expected some degree of countenance, or at least of toleration, from Attaul, who, in his native country of Ionia, had been educated in the pagan superstition, and who had since received the sacrament of baptism from the hands of an Arian bishop. The first days of the reign of Attaul were fair and prosperous. An officer of confidence was sent with an inconsiderable body of troops, which in the obscurity of the night, and the general rains, rolled over a large part of Italy submitted to the terror of the Gothic powers; and though the city of Bologna made a vigorous and effectual resistance, the people of Milan, dissatisfied perhaps with the absence of Honorius, accepted, with loud acclamations, the choice of the Roman senate. At the head of a formidable army, Alaric conducted his royal captive almost to the gates of Ravenna; and a solemn embassy of the principal ministers, of Jovius, the pretorian prefect, of Valens, master of the cavalry and infantry, of the quaestor Potamius, and of Julian, the first of the notaries, was introduced, with martial pomp, into the Gothic camp.

In the name of their sovereign, they consented to acknowledge the lawful election of his competitor, and to divide the provinces of Italy and the west between the two emperors. Their proposals were rejected with disdain, and the rebels were aggravated by the insulting clemency of Attaul, who condescended to promise, that, if Honorius would instantly resign the purple, he should be permitted to pass the remainder of his life in the peaceful exile of some remote island.
So contemptible indeed did the situation of the son of Theodosius appear to those whom Honorius had acquainted with his strength and resources, that Jovius and Valens, his minister and his general, betrayed their trust, infaamously deserted the sinking cause of their benefactor, and devoted their treacherous allegiance to the service of his more fortunate rival. Astonished by such examples of domestic treason, Honorius trembled at the approach of every servant, at the arrival of every messenger. He dreaded the secret enemies, who might lurk in his capital, his palace, his bed-cloths; the ships lay ready in a harbor of Ravenna, to transport the abandoned monarch to the dominions of his infant nephew, the emperor of the east.

But there is a Providence (such at least was the opinion of the historian Procopius)5 that watches over innocence and folly; and the pretensions of Honorius to its pecucular care cannot reasonably be disputed. At the moment when his despair, incapable of any wise or manly resolution, mediated a shameful flight, a seasonable reinforcement of four thousand veterans unexpectedly landed in the port of Ravenna. To these valiant defenders, whose fidelity had not been tested by the factions of the court, he committed the walls and gates of the city; and the slumberers of the emperor were no longer disturbed by the apprehension of im-ninent and internal danger. The favourable intelligence of this unexpected landing, changed the opinions of men, and the state of public affairs. The troops and officers, whom Attaul had sent into that province, were defeated and slain; and the active zeal of Heraclian maintained his own allegiance, and that of his people. The faithful court of Honorius conducted a large sum of money, which had the attachment of the imperial guards; and his vigilance, in preventing the exportation of corn and oil, introduced famine, tumult, and discontent, into the walls of Rome. The failure of the African expedition, was the source of mutual complaint and recrimination between the two emperors; and the policy of Attaul was unsoundly alienated from the interest of a prince, who wanted a spirit to command, or docility to obey.
The most impudent measures were adopted, without the knowledge, or against the advice, of Alaric; and valiant barbarians, who had been subdued by the darkness of war and the mixture of the barkation, the mixture even of five hundred Goths, betrayed a suspicions and distrustful temper, which,
in their situation, was neither generous nor prudent.
The resentment of the Gothic king was exasperated by the malicious acts of Jovius, who had been raised to the rank of patrician, and who afterwards exposed his double perfidy, by declaring, without a blush, that he had only seemed to abandon the service of Honorius, more effectually to ruin the cause of the usurper.
In a large plain near Rimini, and in the presence of an innumerable multitude of Romans and barbarians, the wretched Attaul was publicly despoiled of the dem and purple; and those ensigns of royalty were sent by Alaric, as the pledge of peace and friendship, to the son of Theodosius.6 The officers who returned to their duty were reinstated in their employments, and the merit of a tardy repentance was graciously allowed; but the degraded emperor of the Romans, desirous of life, and insolent of disgrace, implored the permission of following the Gothic camp, in the train of a haughty and capricious barbarian.

The defeated Attaul removed their throne and the only real capital to the city of the three miles of Ravenna, to press the ir-resolution of the imperial ministers, whose insolence soon returned with the return of fortune. His indignation was kindled by the report, that a rival chieftain, that Sarus, the personal enemy of Adolphus, and the hereditary foe of the house of Balti, had been received into the palace. At the head of three hundred followers, that fearless barbarian immediately sallied from the gates of Ravenna, and, after one hundred and discourages the body of Goths; re-entered the city in fully of the court of Ravenna was expelled a third time, by the calumnies of Rome. The king of the Goths, who no longer dissembled his appetite for plunder and revenge, appeared in arms under the walls of the capital; and the trebling senate, without any hopes of relief, prepared, by a desperate resistance, to delay the ruin of their country. But they were unable to guard against the wanton triumph of a savage king; and his slavish subjects, either from birth or interest, were attached to the cause of the enemy. At the hour of midnight, the Salarian gate was silently opened, and the inhabitants were awakened by the tremendous sound of the Gothic trumpet. Eleven hundred and sixty-three years after the downfall of the imperial city, which had been subdued and civilized so considerable a part of mankind, was delivered to the licentious fury of the tribes of Germany and Scythia.1

Respect of the Goths for the religious duties of the day, and a discerning, however, somewhat partial, regard for the laws of humanity and religion. He encouraged the Goths boldly to seize the rewards of valour, and to enrich themselves with the spoils of a wealthy and effeminate people; but he exhorted them, at the same time, to spare the lives of the unresisting citizens, and to be always guided by the zeal of ecclesiastics. While the barbarians roamed through the city in quest of prey, the humble dwelling of an aged virgin, who had devoted her life to the service of the altar, was forced open by one of the powerful Goths. He immediately demanded, though in civil language, all the gold and silver in her possession; and was astonished at the readiness with which she yielded up her wealth. He then received a peremptory order from Alaric, that all the consecrated plate and ornaments should be transported, without damage or delay, to the church of the apostle. From the extremity, perhaps, of the Quirinal hill, to the distant quarter of the Vatican, a numerous detachment of Goths, marching in order of battle through the principal streets, protected with glittering arms, the long train of their devout companions, who bore aloft, on their heads, the sacred vessels of gold and silver; and the martial shouts of the barbarians were mingled with the sound of religious psalmody. From all the adjacent houses of Christian piety, by way of attendance to this edifying procession; and a multitude of fugitives, without distinction of age, or rank, or even of sect, had the good fortune to escape to the secure and hospitable sanctuary of the Vatican.

The learned work, concerning the City of God, was professively composed by St. Augustine, to justify the ways of Providence in the destruction of the Roman greatness. He celebrates, with peculiar satisfaction, this memorable event, and insulates the Goths with a challenging them to produce some similar example of a town taken by storm, in which the fabulous gods of antiquity had been able to protect either themselves or their deluded votaries.2

In the sack of Rome, some rare and extraordinary phenomena, of which all extraneous circumstances were indispensable. In this decisive battle, the Goths were so completely surprised as to render its issue quite uncertain. The，of the Vandals, of the Heretic, of a thousand (as was said) were not deserted by such a manner of aid; for the day after the battle, a salt water was found by those who first entered the city, in the streets and in the houses of the inhabitants. These were the number of dead: 50,000 persons, and 6,000 horses; of whom, the majority of the inhabitants were killed in the night; and the Goths, by their presence during the subsequent celebration of the anniversary, were witnesses to the fact.3 1 See Augustin, de Civitat. Dei, lib. i. c. 1—6. He particularly alludes to the examples of Troy, Syracusae, and Tarsus. Jerom (tom. v. p. 121, ad Privilegiun.) has applied to the sack of Rome all the strong expressions of Virgil:

Quis quidem virtus morta, quis funera fando, Explicit, &c.

Procopius (i. c. 2) positively affirms, that great numbers were thrown into the sea by the Goths (de urbe, iii. c. 33). The same author (p. 570) affirms, that the Goths were the first barbarians who murdered their captives. (Polyc. c. xiv. cap. caper; note cecidit murus ejus, tom. i. p. 101, ad Privilegium.)

2 Grous, i. c. 50. p. 573—576. 3 This passage explains the piety of the Christian church for the death of those whose bodies (mala corpora or mortalibus, as the ecclesiastics have called them) were heretic. Jerom, with more authority and more reason, has desired, that the Goths should be delivered up to death as virgins, and not as captives. (Epist. c. xiv.)

3 See Augustin, de Civitat. Dei, lib. i. c. 17.) intimates, that some virgins or maids actually killed themselves to escape the violence; but professedly observes, that he is obliged, by his theology, to condemn their rash presumption. Perhaps the good resolutions of those who were killed in the same instant, the same day, and were buried in a heretical controversy, in the crime, of this act of female heroism. The twenty maidens (if they ever existed) who threw themselves into the Tiber, when Sab- deberg was taken by storm, have been mulcted by the number of twelve hundred. See Harte's History of Gustavus Adolphus, vol. i. p. 288.
fortune, the glorious crown of virility.1 They were other losses indeed of a more substantial kind, and more general concern. It cannot be presumed, that all the barbarians were at all times capable of perpetrating such monstrous outrages; and the want of youth, or beauty, or chastity, protected the greatest part of the Roman women from the danger of rape. But aforetime it was an inatant and universal passion; since the enjoyment of almost every object that can afford pleasure to the different tastes and tempers of mankind may be procured by the possession of wealth. In the pillage of Troy, some of their most splendid works were taken, which contain the greatest value in the smallest compass and weight; but after these portable riches had been removed by the more diligent robbers, the palaces of Rome were rudely stripped of their splendid and costly furniture. The sideboards of nassy plate, and the variegated wadges of silk and purple, were irregularly piled in the waggons, that always followed the march of a Gothic army. The most exquisite works of art were roughly handled, or wantonly destroyed: many a statue was melted for the sake of the precious materials; and many a vase, in the division of the spoils, was converted into fragments by the stroke of a battle-axe. The acquisition of riches served only to stimulate the avarice of the rapacious barbarians, who proceeded, by threats, by bribes, and by tortures, to force from their prisoners the confession of hidden treasures. The splendid jewels of those princes were all but as proof of a plentiful fortune: the appearance of poverty was invited to a parsimonious disposition; and the obstinacy of some misers, who endured the most cruel torments before they would discover the secret object of their affection, was fatal to many unfortunate persons. The heads of the barbary-king were whipped, there was a body of the rich captured, the loot, for refusing to reveal their imaginary treasures. The edifices of Rome, though the damage has been much exaggerated, received some injury from the violence of the Goths. At their entrance through the Salarian gate, they fired the adjacent houses to guide their march, and to distract the attention of the citizens: the flames, which encountered no obstacle in the disorder of the night, consumed many private and public buildings; and the ruins of the palace of Sullust 2 remained, in the age of Justinian, a statute monument of the Gothic conquerors. Yet contem- poraries observed, that fire could scarcely consume the enormous beams of solid brass, and that the strength of man was insufficient to subvert the foundations of ancient structures. Some truth may possibly be found in his devout assertion, that the wood was consumed from the foundations of houses, and that of Rome, decorated with the statues of so many gods and heroes, was levelled in the dust by the stroke of lightning.3

Whatever might be the numbers, of Captives and填充or plebeian rank, who perish- ed in the massacre of Rome, it is confidently affirmed, that only one senator lost his life by the sword of the enemy.4 But it was not easy to compute the multitudes, who from an honourable station, and a pros- perous condition, were reduced to the miserable condition of captives and exiles. As the barbarians had more occasion for money than for slaves, they fixed, at a moderate price, the redemption of their indigent prisoners; and the ransom was often paid by the sacrifices of the richest citizens.5 The captives, who were regularly sold, either in open market, or by private contract, would have legally regained their native freedom, which it was impossible for a citizen to lose, or to alienate.6 But as it was soon discovered, that the vindication of their freedom was the most secure, the most distant places of refuge. While the Gothic cavalry spread terror and desolation along the sea-coast of Campania and Tuscany, the little island of Ligurium, separated by a narrow channel from the Argentinian promontory, repulsed, or eluded, their hostile attempts; at so small a distance from Rome, great numbers of citizens were secretly concealed in the thick woods of that sequestered spot.7 The ample patrimonies, which many senatorial families possessed in Africa, invited them, if they had time and prudence to escape from the ruin of their country, to embrace the shelter of that hospitable prince. The most illustrious of these fugitives was the noble and pious Probus,8 the widow of the perfect Petronius.1 1 See Augustin, de Civit. Del. I. i. 16, 18. He treats the subject with remarkable accuracy; and after admitting that there can be no crime, where there is no consent, he adds, sed quis non solum quod de dolorum, verum etiam quod ad illustrem, perpetuo, in corpore damnose perpetrae potest; quodque tale 'actus, nisi eti remansat constantissimo animo, unaquaeque non excussit, paulum tantum inueniit, in re cunctae factae eum mentem excusisse voluit, quod fidei, et honoris, et omnium alius voluntatem non habeat. In c. 15., he makes some curious distinctions between moral and physical vir- tues.

3 Augustin, who usefully practiced the vices which he has so eloquently censured, employed the plunder of Namibia to adorn his palace and gardens on the Quirinal hill. The spot where the plunder was marked by the remnants of St. Savinus, was approached only by a street from the baths of Diocletian, and not far distant from the Fora, within the city, and the great plan of Modern Rome, by Natai.

4 The expressions of Augustin are distinct and moderate, de Civ. Del. I. i. 23. The Chronicle of Marcellus speaks too strongly, parce urbem Romanum cremavit; and the words of Ptolemaeus graecus, quibus terrae spatio, qui captae sunt, et exsultatio ideae. Berosus has composed a particular dissertation (see tom. i. August. Rom. Graec.) to prove that the edifices of Rome were not subverted by the Goths and Vandals.

The Cornet, in his work on the State of Rome, is of opinion that from the end of the life of St. Augustin, they are diligently illustrated by Tilmontum, Mom, Rocas, tom. ii. 28, p. 620—623. Sometimes after their arrival in Africa, Demetrios took the veil, and made a vow of virginity; an event which was considered as the highest importance to Rome and the whole country. The favours of the emperor of that of Jerome is still extant, tom. i. 62—73, ad Demetrios, de serv. It was the most acceptable declaration, and curious facts, some of which relate to the siege and sack of Rome. the death of her husband, the most powerful subject of Rome, she had remained at the head of the Aurelian family, and successively supplied, from her private fortune, the expense of the consulships of her three sons. When the city was besieged and taken by the Goths, Proba, supported, with Christian resignation, the loss of immense riches, embossed in a small vessel, from whence she beheld, at sea, the flames of her burning palace, and fled with her daughter Lata, and her grand-daughter, the celebrated virgin Demetrias, to the coast of Africa. The benevolent passion with which the matron distributed the fruits, or the price, of her estates, contributed to alleviate the misfortunes of the Christians, and even their captors, for herself was not exempt from the rapacious oppression of count Heracleian, who badly sold, in matrimonial prostitution, the noblest maidens of Rome, to the lust or avarice of the Syrian merchants. The Italian fugitives were dispersed through the provinces, along the coast of Egypt and Asia, as far as Constantinople and Jerusalem; and the village of Bethel, the solitary residence of St. Jerom and his female converts, was crowded with illustrious beggars of either sex, and every age, who excited the public compassion by the remembrance of their past fortunes. This awful estration of the Romans from the city of their birth, and terror. So interesting a contrast of greatness and ruin, disposed the fond credulity of the people to explore, and even to exaggerate the afflictions of the queen of cities. The clergy, who applied to recent events the lofty metaphors of oriental prophecy, were soon tempted to describe the destruction of the capital, and the dissolution of the globe.

The there exists a human nature a strong by the tropes of propensit to to deprive the advantages, Charles V., and to magnify the evils, of the present times. Yet when the first emotions had subsided, and a more calm, and learned and judicious contemporaries were forced to confess, that infant Rome had formerly received more essential injury from the Gauls than she had now sustained from the Goths in her declining age. The experience of eleven centuries had enabled posterity to produce a much singular parallel; and to affirm with confidence, that the ravages of the barbarians, whom Alaric had led from the banks of the Danube, were less destructive, than the hostilities exercised by the troops of Charles the fifth, a catholic prince who styled himself emperor of the Romans. The Goths evacuated the city at the end of six days, but Rome remained above nine months in possession of the imperialists; and every hour was stained by some atrocious act of cruelty, lust, and rapine. The authority of Alaric preserved some order and moderation among the ferocious multitude, which acknowledged him for their leader and king; but the constable of Bourbon had gloriously fallen in the attack of the walls; and the death of the general removed every restraint of discipline, from an army which consisted of three independent nations, the Italians, the Spaniards, and the Goths. In the beginning of the next century, the manners of Italy exhibited a remarkable scene of the depravity of mankind. They united the singular crimes that prevail in an unsettled state of society, with the polished vices that spring from the abuse of art and luxury; and the loose adventurers, who had violated every prejudice of patriotism and superstition to assault the palace of the Roman pontiff, must deserve to be considered as the most profligate of the Italians. At the same era, the Spaniards were an emperor and king both of this world: but their high-spirited value was disgraced by gloomy pride, rapacious avarice, and忘れ特 cruelty. Had they been in the pursuit of fame and riches, they had improved, by repeated practice, the most exquisite and effectual method of tormenting their prisoners, the capricious and cruel politician of Rome, were familiar of the holy inquisition; and some volunteers, perhaps, were lately returned from the conquest of Mexico. The Germans were less corrupt than the Italians, less cruel than the Spaniards, and the rustic, or even savage, aspect of those Teutonic wanderers, was enough to suppress a simple and merciful disposition. But they had imbibed, in the first fervour of the reformation, the spirit, as well as the principles, of Luther. It was their favourite amusement to insult, or destroy, the consecrated objects of catholic superstition; they indulged, without pity or remorse, a devilish rage against every exterminating and degenerate form of a considerable part of the inhabitants of modern Rome; and their fanatic zeal might aspire to subvert the throne of antichrist, to purify, with blood and fire, the abominations of the sinful Babylon.

The retreat the victorious Goths, Alaric evacuates who had encamped Rome the sixth day, ravaged might be the result of prudence; but it was age indeed was not surely the effect of fear. At the head of an army, encumbered with rich and weighty spoil, their intrepid leader advanced along the Appian way into the southern provinces of the empire, he destroyed, and destroyed, and plundered, and plundered, and destroyed, and destroyed, and contented himself with the plunder of the unsparing country. The fate of Capua, the proud and luxurious metropolis of Campania, and which was respected, even in its decay, as the eighth city of the empire, is buried in oblivion; whilst the adjacent town of Nola has been illustrated on this occasion, by the sanctity of Paulinus, who was successively a consul, a monk, and a bishop. At the age of forty, he renounced the enjoyment of wealth and honour, of society and literature, to embrace a life of solitude and silence. He was the son of a knight of the Carthusian order, which had been mercifully received by him, who had been considered in the world, as a man of letters; and he had been early taught to abhor the reproaches of his worldly friends, who ascribed this desperate act to some disorder of the mind or body. An early and passionate attachment determined him to fix his humble dwelling in one of the suburbs of Nola, near the miraculous tomb of St. Felix, which the public devotion had already surrounded with five large and populous churches. The remains of his fortune and of his unh.

Chap. XXXI

Understanding were dedicated to the service of the glorious martyr; whose praise, on the day of his festival, Paulinus never failed to celebrate by a solemn hymn; and in which he erected a sixth church, of superscription and beauty, which was decorated with many curious pictures, from the history of the Old and New Testament. Such assiduous zeal secured the favour of the saint; or at least of the people; and, after fifteen years' retirement, the Roman consilium was compelled to accept his advice. The bishopric of Nola, a few months before, was invested by the Goths. During the siege, some religious persons were satisfied that they had seen, either in dreams or visions, the divine form of their tutelary patron; yet it soon appeared by the event, that this was an empty and pernicious delusion, to preserves the captive flock, of which he had formerly been the shepherd. Nola was not saved from the general devastation; and the captive bishop was protected only by the general opinion of his innocence and poverty. Above four years elapsed from the successful invasion of Italy by the Arians of Alaric, to the vengeful retreat of the Goths under the conduct of his successor Adolphus; and, during the whole time, they reigned without control over a country, which, in the opinion of the ancients, had united all the various excellencies of nature and art. The prosperity of Italy, which was the bravo island in the suspicious age of the Antonines, had gradually declined with the decline of the empire. The fruits of a long peace perished under the rude grasp of the barbarians; and they themselves were incapable of tasting the natural luxuriance of the new governments of luxuriance which had been prepared for the use of the soft and polished Italians. Each soldier, however, claimed an ample portion of the substantial plenty, the corn and cattle, oil and wine, that was daily collected and consumed, in the Gothic camp; and the principal warriors insulted the villas and gardens, once inhabited by Lucullus and Cicero, along the beautiful coast of Campania. Their tumbling captives, the sons and daughters of Roman senators, presented, in goblets of gold and gems, large draughts of Falernian wine, to the haughty victors who stretched their huge limbs under the shade of plane trees, artificially employed to exclude the scorching rays, and to refresh the genial warmth of the sun. These delights were enhanced by the memory of past hardships: the comparison of their native soil, the black and barren hills of Sclavonia, and the frozen banks of the Elbe and Danube, added new charms to the felicity of the Italian climate. Death of Alaric. Whether fame, or conquests, or riches, A.D. 410. were the object of Alaric, he pursued that object with an indefatigable ardour, which could neither be quelled by adversity, nor satiated by success. No sooner had he reached the extreme land of Italy, than he was attracted by the neighbouring prospect of a fertile and peaceful island. Yet even the possession of Sicily he considered only as an intermediate step to the important expedition, which he already meditated against the continent of Africa. The straits of Rhgium and Messina are twelve miles in length, and, in the narrowest passage, about one mile and a half broad; and the fabulous monsters of the deep, the rocks of Scylla, and the whirlpool of Charybdis, were visited by the Goths without injury. Yet as soon as the first division of the Goths had embarked, a sudden tempest arose, which sunk, or scattered, many of the transports; their courage was daunted by the terrors of a new element; and the whole design was defeated by the premature death of Alaric, which, fixed, after a short illness, the fatal term of his conquests. The ferocious character of the barbarians was displayed, in the funeral of a hero, whose valour, and fortune, they celebrated with mournful applause. By the labour of a captive soldier, the island which the Goths disposed of the Buuentinus, a small river that washes the walls of Consentia. The royal sepulchre, adorned with the splendid spoils, and trophies, of Rome, was constructed in the vacant bed; the waters were then restored to their natural channel; and the secret spot, where the Goths had been forever concealed by the inhuman massacre of the prisoners, who had been employed to execute the work. The personal animosities, and heredimov, of the barbarians, were sus- pended by the strong necessity of their common interest, with the empire, to march into Italy; and they chose Valentinian's brother-in-law of the deposed monarch, G. Gaul, who was unanimously elected to succeed to his throne. The character and political system of the new king of the Goths, may be best understood from the relation of Jornandes, a historian of the Goths; and to acquire, like Augustus, the immortal fame of the founder of a new empire. By repeated experiments, I was gradually convinced, that laws are essentially necessary to maintain and regulate a well-constituted state; and that the fierce untractable humanity of the Goths, not to subvert, but to restore and maintain, the prosperity of the Roman empire. With these pacific views, the successor of Alaric suspended the operations of war; and seriously negotiated with the imperial court a treaty of friendship and alliance. It was the interest of the ministers of Honorius, who were now released from the obligation of their extravagant oath, to deliver Italy from the intolerable weight of the Gothic powers; and they readily accepted their service against the tyrants and barbarians who infested the provinces beyond the Alps. Adolphus, assuming the character of a Roman general, directed his march from the extremity of Campania to the southern provinces of Gaul. His troops, either by force or agreement, immediately occupied the cities of Narbonne, Thoulouse, and Bourdeaux; and though they were repulsed by count Boniface from the walls of Marcus, they soon extended their quarters from the Mediterranean to the ocean. The oppressed provinces of Africa, see Cluvierius, (Ital. Ant. liv. p. 1253, and Sicilias Anon., i. 161. He was sent by St. Augustin, in the year 418, from Africa to Palestine, to visit St. Jerome, and to manage the affairs of the Church in that country. Jornandes, de Reb. Geticis, c. 30. p. 654. Jornandes supposes, without much probability, that Adolphus was a grandson of the Goths, and a relative of the imperial family. Yet he agrees with Orussus in supposing, that a treaty of peace was concluded between the Gothic prince and the Gallic emperor, Honorius, i. vii. c. 43. p. 584, 585. Jornandes, de Reb. Instead of compiling the evidence of natural and artificial history, why did not Mr. Gray apply the powers of his genius to finish the philosophic poem, of which he had left such an exquisite specimen? 9 For the perfect description of the straits of Alemnis, Sicily, Chacials might, at least, claim, that the miserable remnant which the enemy had spared, was cruelly ravished by their pretended allies; yet some specious colours were not wanting to palliate, or justify the violence of the Goths. The cities of Gaul, which they attacked, might perhaps be considered as in a state of rebellion against the government of Honorius; the articles of the treaty, or the seccurities of the court, might sometimes be alleged in favour of the seeming usurpations of Adolphus; and the guilt of any irregular, unsuccessful act of hostility, might always be imputed, with an appearance of truth, to the ungovernable spirit of a barbarian host, impatient of peace or discipline. The luxury of Italy had been long since corrupted by the vanities of the Goths, and they had imbibed the vices, without imitating the arts and institutions, of civilized society. 6

His marriage

The professions of Adolphus were with Placidia, probably sincere, and his attachment to her.

It is the custom of the republic was secured by the ascendancy which a Roman princess had acquired over the heart and understanding of the barbarian king. Placidia, the daughter of the great Theodosius, and of Gallia, his second wife, had received a royal education in the palace of Constantinople; but the eventful story of her life is connected with the revolutions which agitated the western provinces, or caused, by the accident of Honors. When Rome was first invested by the arms of Alaric, Placidia, who was then about twenty years of age, resided in the city; and her ready consent to the death of her cousin Serena has a cruel and ungrateful appearance, which, according to the circumstances of the act, was not without the weight of evidence, and of the action of her tender age. 1 The victorious barbarians detained, either as a hostage or a captive, the sister of Honors; but, while she was exposed to the disgrace of following round Italy the motions of a Gothic camp, she experienced, however, decent and respectful treatment. But this magnanimity of the Goths was not sufficent; the scanty supply of Placidia, may perhaps be counterbalanced by the silence, the expressive silence of her flirtaters; yet the spendor of her birth, the bloom of youth, the elegance of manners, and the dexterous insinuation which she condescended to employ, made a deep impression on the mind of Adolphus; and the Gothic king aspired to call himself the brother of the emperor. The ministers of Honors rejected with disdain the proposal of an alliance so injurious to every sentiment of Roman pride; and repeatedly urged the restitution of Placidia, as an indispensable article of the truce or peace. But the daughter of Theodosius submitted, without referring to the desires of the conqueror, a young and valiant prince, who yielded to Alaric in loftiness of stature, but who excelled in the more attractive qualities of grace and beauty. The marriage of Adolphus and Placidia 2 was consummated before the Goths retired from Italy, and the solemn, perhaps the anniversary, day of their nuptials was afterwards celebrated in the house of In-genius, one of the most illustrious citizens of Narbonne in Gaul. The bride, attired and adorned like a Roman empress, was placed on a throne of state; and the king of the Goths, who assumed, on this occasion, the Roman habit, contented himself with a less honourable seat by her side. The nuptial gift, which, according to the custom of his nation, 3 was offered to Placidia, consisted of the rare and magnificent spoils of her country. Fifty beautiful youths, in silken robes, carried a basin in each hand; and one of these basins was filled with pieces of gold, the other with precious stones of an inestimable value. Atalus, so long the sport of fortune, despite himself in the exchange, of the chaste hymenal song; and the degraded emperor might aspire to the praise of a skilful musician. The barbarians enjoyed the insolence of their triumph; and the provincials rejoiced in this alliance, which tempered, by the mild influence of love and reason, the fierce spirit of their Gothic lord.

The hundred basins of gold and gems, The Gothic treasured to Placidia at her nuptial feast, formed an inconceivable portion of the Gothic treasures; of which some extraordinary specimens may be selected from the history of the successors of Adolphus. Many curious and costly ornaments of pure gold, enriched with jewels, were found in their palace of Narbonne, when it was pillaged, in the sixth century, by the Franks: sixty cups, or chalices; fifteen patens, or plates, for the use of the communion; twenty boxes, or cases, to hold the books of the gostpel, and vessels; and, of this precious treasure, a portion of Clovis among the churches of his dominions, and his pious liberality seems to upbraid some former sacrilege of the Goths. They possessed, with more security of conscience, the famous missorium, or great dish for the service of the table, of nusy gold, of the greatest intrinsic value, from the precious stones, the exquisite workmanship, and the tradition that it had been presented, by Rlius the patrician, to Terismond, king of the Goths. One of the successors of Terismond purchased the aid of the French monarch by the promise of this magnificent dish. When the son of Clovis, the throne of Spain, he delivered it with reluctance to the ambassadors of Dagobert; despoiled them on the road; stipulated, after a long negotiation, the inadequate ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold; and preserved the missorium, as the pride of the Gothic treasury. 4 When that treasury, after the conquest of Spain, was plundered by the Arabs, they admired, and they have celebrated, another object still more remarkable: a table of considerable size, of one single piece of solid emerald, 5 enriched with three rows of fine pearls, supported by three hundred and sixty-five feet of gems and emeralds, and estimated at the price of five hundred thousand pieces of gold. 4 Some portion

1 The Visigoths (the subjects of Adolphus) restrained, by subsequent laws, the promiscuity of conjugal love; it was illegal for a husband to make any gift or settlement for the benefit of his wife during the first year of their marriage; and her literalty could not at any time, exceed the truth part of her property. The Lombards were somewhat more indulgent; they allowed the mourning period immediately after the wedding night; and this famous gift, the reward of virginity, might equal the fourth part of the husband's substance. Some autrious maidens, indeed, were wise enough to stipulate beforehand a dowry, which they were sure of not drawing. See Mgr. de Sainte Marie, Lettres de l'Espirit des Lois, I. xix. 25. Musarior, dell' Antichita Italiane, tom., I., Basilicata.

If he has any meaning, it must be, that they were found in the temple.

Laws for the re-law of Italy and Romulus.

A. D. 410—417.

The delivery of Italy from the oppression of the Goths, some secret councillors and law-makers had been engaged, but was not completed, till the mighty host, deserting his fortune and his friends, ignominiously fled with a single ship.

When Heracleian landed in the harbour of Carthage, he found that the whole province, disclaiming such an unworthy ruler, had returned to their allegiance. The rebel was beheaded. He had caused his name to be erased; the office of which he was the possessor was abolished; and the remains of his private fortune, not exceeding the moderate sum of four thousand pounds of gold, were granted to the brave Constantius, who had already defended the throne, which he afterwards shared with his feeble sovereign. Heracleian viewed with pain, the destruction of his dearly loved home of Rome and Italy; but the rebellious attempts of Attalus and Heracleian against his personal safety, awakened, for a moment, the torpid instinct of his nature. He was probably ignorant of the causes and events which preserved him from these impending dangers, and as Italy was no longer invaded by any foreign or domestic enemies, he peaceably existed in the palace of Ravenna, while the tyrants beyond the Alps were repeatedly vanquished in the name, and by the lieutenants, of the son of Theodosius. In the meantime, the course of events swept on, and no one could possibly forget to mention the death of such a prince: and I shall therefore take the precaution of observing, in this place, that he survived the last siege of Rome about thirteen years.

The usurpation of Constantine, who had received the legions from the legions of the Rhine and France, had been successful; and seemed to be secure. His title was acknowledged, from the wall of Antoninus to the columns of Hercules; and, in the midst of the public disorder, he shared the dominion, and the plunder, with the tribes of barbarians, whose destructive progress was no longer checked by the Rhine or Pyrenees. Stained with the blood of the kinsmen of Honorius, he extorted, from the court of Ravenna, with which he secretly corresponded, the ratification of his rebellion, which was already recognized. He was despatched to Constantinople, A. D. 403. 415.

Revolt and defeat of Heraclian, count of Africa.

A. D. 412.

This apparent tranquillity was soon disturbed by the approach of an hostile army; an event from which he had been entirely relieved, and which disturbed the daily subsistence of the Roman people. Heracleian, count of Africa, who, under the most difficult and distressful circumstances, had supported with active loyalty the cause of Honorius, was tempted, in the year of his consulship, to assume the imperial title, and the title of Roman emperor was immediately filled with the naval forces, at the head of which he prepared to invade Italy; and his fleet, when it cast anchor at the mouth of the Tyber, immediately surrounded the fleets of Zervas and Alexander, if of the vessels, including the royal galley, and the smallest boat, did actually amount to the incredible number of three thousand two hundred.

Yet with such an armament, which might have subverted, or restored, the greatest empires of the earth, the African usurper made a very faint and feeble impression on the provinces of his rival. As he marched from the port, along the road which leads to the gates of Rome, he was encountered, terrified, and routed, by one of the small Roman amirs, and with great difficulty delivered his mighty host, his fortune and his friends, ignominiously fled with a single ship.

When Heracleian landed in the harbour of Carthage, he found that the whole province, disclaiming such an unworthy ruler, had returned to their allegiance. The rebel was beheaded. He had caused his name to be erased; the office of which he was the possessor was abolished; and the remains of his private fortune, not exceeding the moderate sum of four thousand pounds of gold, were granted to the brave Constantius, who had already defended the throne, which he afterwards shared with his feeble sovereign. Heracleian viewed with pain, the destruction of his dearly loved home of Rome and Italy; but the rebellious attempts of Attalus and Heracleian against his personal safety, awakened, for a moment, the torpid instinct of his nature. He was probably ignorant of the causes and events which preserved him from these impending dangers, and as Italy was no longer invaded by any foreign or domestic enemies, he peaceably existed in the palace of Ravenna, while the tyrants beyond the Alps were repeatedly vanquished in the name, and by the lieutenants, of the son of Theodosius. In the meantime, the course of events swept on, and no one could possibly forget to mention the death of such a prince: and I shall therefore take the precaution of observing, in this place, that he survived the last siege of Rome about thirteen years.

The usurpation of Constantine, who had received the legions from the legions of the Rhine and France, had been successful; and seemed to be secure. His title was acknowledged, from the wall of Antoninus to the columns of Hercules; and, in the midst of the public disorder, he shared the dominion, and the plunder, with the tribes of barbarians, whose destructive progress was no longer checked by the Rhine or Pyrenees. Stained with the blood of the kinsmen of Honorius, he extorted, from the court of Ravenna, with which he secretly corresponded, the ratification of his rebellion, which was already recognized. He was despatched to Constantinople, A. D. 403. 415.

This apparent tranquillity was soon disturbed by the approach of an hostile army; an event from which he had been entirely relieved, and which disturbed the daily subsistence of the Roman people. Heracleian, count of Africa, who, under the most difficult and distressful circumstances, had supported with active loyalty the cause of Honorius, was tempted, in the year of his consulship, to assume the imperial title, and the title of Roman emperor was immediately filled with the naval forces, at the head of which he prepared to invade Italy; and his fleet, when it cast anchor at the mouth of the Tyber, immediately surrounded the fleets of Zervas and Alexander, if of the vessels, including the royal galley, and the smallest boat, did actually amount to the incredible number of three thousand two hundred.
count pressed forwards, through the Pyrenees, to surprise the two emperors, Constantine and Constans, before they could prepare for their defence. The son was made prisoner at Vienne, and immediately put to death; and the unfortunate youth had scarcely leisure to weep his fate, before his father attempted or compelled him sacrilegiously to desert the peaceful obscurity of the monastic life. The father maintained a siege within the walls of Arles; but those walls must have yielded to the assailants, had not the city been unexpectedly relieved by the approach of some Italian troops. The obstinacy, and the unyielding resolution of the emperor, astonished the contending parties of the rebels. Gerontius, abandoned by his own troops, escaped to the confines of Spain; and rescued his name from oblivion, by the Roman courage which appeared to animate the last moments of his life. In the middle of the night, a great body of his perjured soldiers surrounded and attacked his house, which he had strongly barricaded. His wife, a valiant friend of the nation of the Alani, and some faithful slaves, were still attached to his person; and he used, with so much skill and resolution, a large magazine of disordered arms, and six hundred of the assailants lost their lives in the attempt. His slaves, when all the missile weapons were spent, fled at the dawn of day; and Gerontius, if he had not been restrained by conjugal tenderness, might have imitated their example; till the soldiers, provoked by starvation and want of hospitality, broke into the house. In this fatal extremity, he complied with the request of his barbarian friend, and cut off his head. The wife of Gerontius, who conjured him not to abandon her to a life of misery and disgrace, eagerly presented her neck to his sword; and the tragic scene was increased by the death of Constans, who had himself, after three ineffectual strokes, drew a short dagger, and stabbed it in his heart.

The unprotected Maximus, whom he had invested with the purple, was inducted for his life to the contempt that was entertained for his power and abilities. The caprice of the barbarians who ravaged Spain, once more sealed this imperial phantom on the throne: but they soon resigned him to the justice of Honorius; and the tyrant Maximus, after he had been shown to the people of Ravenna and of Rome, was publicly executed.

The general, Constantine, was seized with a new approach of the siege of Arles, and dissipated the troops of Gerontius, was born a Roman; and this remarkable distinction is strongly expressive of the decay of military spirit among the subjects of the empire. The latter was the son of an ancient, and famous in the person of that general, marked him, in the popular opinion, as a candidate worthy of the throne, which he afterwards ascended. In the familiar intercourse of private life, his manners were cheerful and engaging; nor would he sometimes disdain, in the licentious convivial mirth, to vie with the pantomimes themselves, in the exercises of their ridiculous profession. But when the trumpet summoned him to arms; when he mounted his horse, and, bending down (for such was his singular practice) almost upon the neck, fiercely rolled his large animated eyes round the field of battle, and inspired his soldiers with the assurance of victory. He had received from the court of Ravenna the important commission of extirpating rebellion in the provinces of the west; and the pretended emperor Constantin, after enjoying a short and anxious respite, was again besieged in his capital by the arms of a more formidable enemy. Yet this interval allowed time for a successful negociation with the Franks and Alamanni; and his ambassador, Eudocius, was permitted to obtain the surrender of the garrisons of the siege of Arles. The Roman general, instead of expecting the attack in his lines, boldly, and perhaps wisely, resolved to pass the Rhone, and to meet the barbarians. His measures were conducted with so much skill and secrecy, that, while they encircled the imperial camp in front, they were suddenly attacked, surrounded, and destroyed by the cavalry of his lieutenant Ulphilas, who had silently gained an advantageous post in the rear. The remains of the army of Eudocius were preserved by flight or submission, and their leader escaped from the field of battle to the house of a faithless friend; who too clearly understood, that the head of his obnoxious guest would be an acceptable and lucrative present for the imperial general. On this occasion Constantine behaved with the magnanimity of a genuine Roman. Subduing, or suppressing, every attempt on the part of the usurper, he ordered the person and property of Eudocius to be respected.

Character and valour of Constans, son of Constans, A.D. 411—416.

Fall of the usurper, usurper of Gaul, his last hopes, was tempted to place some confidence in so generous a conqueror. He required a solemn promise for his security; and after receiving, by the imposition of hands, the sacred character of a christian presbyter, he was ventured to open the gates of the city. But he soon experienced, that the principles of honour and integrity, which might regulate the ordinary conduct of Constantius, were superseded by the loose doctrines of political morality. The Roman general, indeed, refused to accept the sovereignty of Gaul, and privately his laurels with the blood of Constans, but the abdicated emperor, and his son Julian, were sent under a strong guard into Italy; and before they reached the palace of Ravenna, they met the ministers of death.

At a time when it was universally confessed, that almost every man in the Roman empire was either a usurper or a friend to the usurpers, the princes whom the accident of their birth had seated on the throne, a rapid succession of usurpers, regardless of the fate of their predecessors, still continued to arise. This mischief was particularly observed in the province of Spain, where the principles of order and obedience had been extinguished by war and rebellion. Before Constantine resigned the purple, and in the fourth month of the siege of Arles, intelligence was received in the imperial camp, that Jovinus had assumed the diadem at Monts, in the Upper Germany, at the instigation of Goar, king of the Alani, and of Guntharius, king of the Burgundians; and that the candidate, on whom they had bestowed the empire, advanced with a formidable host of barbarians, from the banks of the Rhine to those of the Rhone. Every circumstance is dark and extraordinary in the short history of this Constantius. It was natural to expect, that a brave and skilful general, at the head of a victorious army, would have asserted, in a field of battle, the justice of the cause of Honorius. The hasty retreat of Constantius might be justified by weighty reasons; but he resigned, without a struggle, the empire to his successor, the praetorian prefect, who was recorded as the only magistrate who refused to yield obedience to the usurper.

Suidas Apollinaris (C. vepit, p. 139, and Not. Simond, p. 98) says: 'The praetorian prefect, after extirpating the last vestiges of the old Roman empire, of which some fragmentary titles are now existent. (Burckhard, Barnes, tom. ii. p. 448, ver. 38.) This allusion may prove that the ancient tragic poets were still familiar to the Greeks of the fifth century.'
When the Goths, two years after the siege of Rome, established their quarters in Gaul, it was natural to suppose that their inclinations could be divided only between the emperor Honorius, with whom they had formed an alliance in the days of Theodosius, and the usurper of Gaul whom they reserved in their camp for the occasional purpose of acting the part of a musician or a monarch. Yet in a moment of disgust, (for it is not easy to assign a cause, or a date,) Adolphus connected himself with the usurper of Gaul; and imposed on Atalattus the ignominious task of negotiating the whole transaction. Atalattus, whom they had degraded, was again abandoned and insulted, by the foremost men of the realm, and the most illustrious domestic and foreign statesmen; and we may observe, as a sure symptom of domestic happiness, that, in a period of four hundred years, Spain furnished very few materials to the history of the Roman empire. The footsteps of the barbarians, who, in the reign of Gallienus, had penetrated beyond the Rhine, escaped the memory, and appeared to the Romans an object of peace; and in the fourth century of the Christian era, the cities of Emerita, or Merida, of Corduba, Seville, Bracara, and Tarragona, were numbered with the most illustrious of the Roman world. The various plenty of the animal, the vegetable, and the mineral kingdoms, was improved and manufactured by the skill of an industrious people; and the peculiar advantages of naval stores contributed to support an extensive and profitable trade. The arts and sciences flourished under the protection of the emperors; and the host of learning and science, which had been disturbed by frequent attempts of the barbarians. But no sooner had the national troops been compelled to resign their post to the Honorian bands, in the service of Constantine, than the gates of Spain were treacherously betrayed to the public enemy, about ten months before the ascension of ite to the throne of Gaul. The consciousness of guilt, and the thirst of rapine, prompted the mercenary guards of the Pyrenees to desert their station; to invite the arms of the Suevi, the Vandals, and the Alani; and to swell the torrent which was poured over the Sabinian frontier, and the two Pyrenean passes by the sea of Afriis. The misfortunes of Spain may be described in the language of its most eloquent historian, who has concisely expressed the passionate, and perhaps exaggerated, declamations of contemporary writers; a the irruption of these nations was followed by the most dreadful calamities: it was embodied by exercised their indiscriminate cruelty on the fortunes of the Romans and the Spaniards; and ravaged with equal fury the cities and the open country. The progress of famine reduced the miserable inhabitants to a condition of starvation, assailed by the wild beasts, who multiplied, without control, in the desert, were exasperated, by the taste of blood, and the impatience of hunger, boldly to attack and devour their human prey. Pessitude soon appeared, the inseparable companion of famine; a large proportion of the people was swept away; and the groans of the dying excited only the envy of their surviving friends. At length the barbarians, satiated with carmagn and rapine, and afflicted by the contagious evils which they themselves had introduced, fixed their permanent homes in the two provinces of Spanish Gaul, and a third in the Alani, whose limits included the kingdom of old Castille, was divided between the Suevi and the Vandals; the Alani were scattered over the provinces of Carthage and Lusitania, from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic ocean; and the fruitful territory of Buitaca was

The situation of Spain, separated on its sides from the enemies of Rome, by the sea, the mountains, and by intermediate provinces, had secured the long period of independence and territorial existence. As we may observe, as a sure symptom of domestic happiness, that, in a period of four hundred years, Spain furnished very few materials to the history of the Roman empire. The footsteps of the barbarians, who, in the reign of Gallienus, had penetrated beyond the Rhine, escaped the memory, and appeared to the Romans an object of peace; and in the fourth century of the Christian era, the cities of Emerita, or Merida, of Corduba, Seville, Bracara, and Tarragona, were numbered with the most illustrious of the Roman world. The consciousness of guilt, and the thirst of rapine, prompted the mercenary guards of the Pyrenees to desert their station; to invite the arms of the Suevi, the Vandals, and the Alani; and to swell the torrent which was poured over the Sabinian frontier, and the two Pyrenean passes by the sea of Afriis. The misfortunes of Spain may be described in the language of its most eloquent historian, who has concisely expressed the passionate, and perhaps exaggerated, declamations of contemporary writers; a the irruption of these nations was followed by the most dreadful calamities: it was embodied by exercised their indiscriminate cruelty on the fortunes of the Romans and the Spaniards; and ravaged with equal fury the cities and the open country. The progress of famine reduced the miserable inhabitants to a condition of starvation, assailed by the wild beasts, who multiplied, without control, in the desert, were exasperated, by the taste of blood, and the impatience of hunger, boldly to attack and devour their human prey. Pessitude soon appeared, the inseparable companion of famine; a large proportion of the people was swept away; and the groans of the dying excited only the envy of their surviving friends. At length the barbarians, satiated with carmagn and rapine, and afflicted by the contagious evils which they themselves had introduced, fixed their permanent homes in the two provinces of Spanish Gaul, and a third in the Alani, whose limits included the kingdom of old Castille, was divided between the Suevi and the Vandals; the Alani were scattered over the provinces of Carthage and Lusitania, from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic ocean; and the fruitful territory of Buitaca was alloited to the Silingi, another branch of the Vandalian nation. After regulating this partition, the conquerors contracted with their new subjects some reciprocal engagements of protection and obedience: the lands were again cultivated; and the towns and villages of Galicia, to submit to the barbarians. The greatest part of the Spaniards was even disposed to prefer this new condition of poverty and barbarism, to the severe oppressions of the Roman government; yet there were many who still asserted their native freedom, and who refused, more especially in the mountains of Galicia, to submit to the barbarians. But when he removed the southern provinces of Spain, and, from the rock now covered by the fortress of Gibraltar, contemplated the neighbouring and fertile coast of Africa, Wallia resumed the designs of conquest, which had been interrupted by the death of Alaric. The winds and waves again dispirited the enterprising Gothic arm; and the minds of a superior people were deeply affected by the repeated disasters of storms and shipwrecks. In this disposition, the successor of Alarbus had no longer refused to listen to a Roman ambassador, whose proposals were enforced by the real, or supposed, approach of a numerous army, under the conduct of the brave Constantinus. A solemn treaty was stipulated and observed: Placidia was honourably restored to her brother; six hundred thousand measures of wheat were delivered to the hungry Goths; and Wallia engaged to draw his sword in the service of the empire. A bloody war was instantly planned by the barbarians, who contending princes are said to have addressed their letters, their ambassadors, and their hostages, to the throne of the western emperor, exhorting him to retain a tranquil spectator of their contest; the events of which must be favourable to the Romans, by the mutual slaughter and devastation of the barbarians. The Spanish war was obstinately supported, during three campaigns, with desperate valour, and various success; and the martial achievements of Wallia diffused through the empire the superior renown of the Gothic hero. He exterminated the Silingi, who had irrecoverably insulted the royal person of the emperor; he subdued the Vandals, who escaped from the field, instead of choosing a new leader, humbly sought a refuge under the standard of the Vandals, with whom they were ever afterwards confounded. The Vandals themselves, and the Suevi, yielded to the efforts of the invincible Goths. The promiscuous multitude of barbarians, whose retreat had been intercepted, were driven into the mountains of Galicia; where they still continued, in a narrow compass, and on a barren soil, to exercise their domestic triumphs and hostilities. In the pride of victory, Wallia was faithful to his engagements: he restored his Spanish conquests to the obedience of Honorius; and the tyranny of the imperial officers soon reduced an oppressed people to regret the time of their barbarian servitude. While the event of the war was still doubtful, we should probably find that a crowd of poets, and orators, of magistrates, and bishops, applauded the fortune, the wisdom, and the invincible courage, of the emperor Honorius.

Notes:

1. Mariana de Rebus Hispaniae, l. v. c. tom. i. p. 148. Hag. Condit. 1733. He had read, in Orosius (l. vii. c. 41, p. 579.) that the barbarians had turned their swords into ploughshares: and that many of the provincials preferred inter barbaros passum libertatem quam incontinentias et fraternulli hostes. This mixture of force and persuasion may be fairly inferred from comparing Orosius and Jornandes, the Roman and the Gothic histories.

2. According to the system of Jornandes (c. 33. p. 659.) the true barbarians are those who occupied the land of the Goths; those princes, who were the vassals of the Huns, commanded the tribes of the Ostrogoths in some distant parts of Germany or Scythia, but are not barbarians, because they are not the posterity of those people with illuminations and Circassian games. (See Chron. Alexandrin.) It may seem doubtful, whether the Goths were actuated, on this occasion, by their hatred of the barbarians, or of the Latins.
The decline and fall

Such a triumph might have been justly claimed by the ally of Rome, if Wales, before he repassed the Pyrenees, had extended the dominion of the Spanish war. His victorious Goths, forty-three years after they had passed the Danube, were established, according to the faith of treaties, in the possession of the second Aquitain; a maritime province between the Garonne and the Loire, under the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Bourdeaux. This advantageous situation for the trade of the ocean, was built in a regular and elegant form; and its numerous inhabitants were distinguished among the Gauls by their wealth, their learning, and the polite-ness of their manners. The adjacent province, which had been assigned to the garden of Eden, was blessed with a fruitful soil, and a temperate climate: the face of the country displayed the arts and the rewards of industry; and the Goths, after their martial toils, luxuriously exhausted the rich vineyards of Aquitain. The Gothic limits were enlarged, by the additional gift of some neighbouring districts; and the successors of Alaric fixed their royal residence at Thoulouse, which included five populous quarters, or cities, within the spacious circuit of its walls. About the same time, in the last years of the reign of Honorius, the Burgundians, the Goths, the Burgundians, and the Franks, obtained the limits, which dominion in the provinces of Gaul. The liberal grant of the usurper Jovinus to his Burgundian allies, was confirmed by the lawful emperor; the lands of the First, or Upper, Germany, were ceded to those formidable barbarians; and they gradually occupied, either by conquest or treaty, the two provinces, which still retain, with the titles of Duchy and of County, the national appellation of Burgundy. The Franks, the valiant and faithful allies of the Roman republic, were soon tempted to imitate the invaders, whom they had so often resisted. Treason was procured by their lawless bands; and the humble colony, which they so long maintained in the district of Toxandria, in Brabant, insensibly multiplied along the banks of the Meuse and Scheldt, till their independent power filled the whole extent of the Second, or Lower, Germany. Some of those who, built by historic evidence: but the foundation of the Frankish monarchy by Pharamond, the conquests, the laws, and even the existence, of that hero, have been justly arraigned by the impartial severity of modern criticism.

The rain of the opulent provinces of Gaul may be dated from the establishment of these barbarians, whose alliance was dangerous and oppressive; and who were capriciously impelled, by interest or passion, to violate the public peace. A heavy and partial famine was imposed on the surviving provinces, who had escaped the calamities of war; the fairest and most fertile lands were assigned to the rapacious strangers, for the use of their families, their slaves, and their cattle; and the trembling natives relinquished with a sigh the inheritance of their fathers. Yet these domestic mis-1 quest, but in the madness of civil discord. The triumvirs proscribed eighteen of the most flourishing colonies of Italy; and distributed their lands and honours to the veterans to reave the death of Caesar. Thus oppressed the liberty of their country. Two poets, of unequal fame, have deplored, in similar circumstances, the loss of their patrimony; but the legions of Augustus appear to have surpassed, in violence and injustice, the barbarians who invaded Gaul. The conduct of those who, in the year 572, were driven from the capital, the guarded that remote province, had been gradually withdrawn; and Britain was abandoned, without defence, to the Saxon pirates, and the savages of Ireland and Caledonia. The Britons, reduced to this extremity, no longer relied on the tardy and doubtful aid of a defending monarch. They assembled in towns, repulsed the invaders, and rejoiced in the important discovery of their own strength. Afflicted by similar calamities, and actuated by the same spirit, the Armoricans, a nation which comprehended the maritime countries of Gaul between the Seine and the Loire 2), and Stockton, destroyed the example of the island. They expelled the Roman magistrates, who acted under the authority of the usurper Constantine; and a free government was established among a people who had so long been subject to the arbitrary will of a master. The independence of Britain and Armoric was soon confirmed by Honorius himself, the lawful emperor of the west; and the letters, by which he committed to the new states the care of their own violated by bold and popular citizens; and the haughty nobles, who complained that they were become the subjects of their own servitors, would sometimes become the subjects of an arbitrary monarch. II. The jurisdiction of each city over the adjacent country, was supported by the patrimonial influence of the principal senators; and the smaller towns, the villages, and the proprietors of land, consulted their own safety by adhering to the interests of their city. The sphere of their attraction was proportioned to the respective degrees of their wealth and populousness; but the hereditary lords of ample possessions, who were not oppressed by the neighbourhood of any powerful city, aspired to the rank of independent princes, and boldly claimed the rights of independence and protection were succeeded by the mutual and voluntary offices of national friendship.*

6 Except in a short and suspicious line of the Chronicle of Prosper, (tom. i. p. 636.) the name of Pharamond is not mentioned before the 4th century. The author of the Gotha Fragments, (in tom. ii. p. 132.) suggests, probably enough, that the choice of Pharamond, by Honorius and the Franks, was recommended to the Franks by his father Marcomin, who was an exile in Tyuscany.

I. Zosimus, who alone has preserved the memory of this singular transaction, very accurately observes, that the letters of Honorius were addressed to the cities of Britain. Under the protection of the Roman empire, a number of cities had arisen in the several parts of that great province; and among these, thirty-three cities were distinguished above the rest by their superior privileges and importance.* Each of these cities, as in all the other provinces of the empire, formed a local corporation, for the purpose of regulating their domestic policy; and the powers of municipal jurisdiction, invested in an annual magistrate, a select senate, and the assembly of the people, according to the original model of the Roman constitution.* The management of a common revenue, the exercise of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and the habits of public counsel and command, were indulged to these cities, when they as-

These pastoral cares, so worthy of the episcopal character, were interrupted, however, by local and superstition: and the British clergy incessantly laboured to eradicate the Pelagian heresy, which they abhorred, as the peculiar distaste of their native country. It is somewhat remarkable, or rather it is entirely natural, that the revolt of Britain and Armenia should have introduced an appearance of liberty into the obedient provinces of Gaul. In a solemn edict, filled with the strongest assurances of that paternal affection which princes so often express, and so seldom feel, the emperor Honorius promulgated his intention of convening an annual assembly of the seven provinces; a name peculiarly appropriated to Aquitain and the ancient Narbonnese, which had long since exchanged their Celtic redness for the useful and elegant arts of Italy. Arles, the seat of government and commerce, was appointed for the place of the assembly; which was continued for twenty-eight days, from the fourth of August to the thirteenth of September, of every year. It consisted of the prætorian prefect of the Gauls; of seven provincial governors, one consul, and six presidents; of the magistrates, and perhaps the bishops, of about sixty cities; and of a competent, though individual number of the honourable and opulent possessors of land, who might justly be considered as the representatives of their country. They were empowered to interpret and communicate the laws of their sovereign; to expose the grievances and wishes of their constituents; to moderate the excessive demands of the tax gatherers; and to deliberate on every subject of local or national importance, that could tend to the restoration of the peace and prosperity of the seven provinces. If such an institution, which gave the people an interest in their own government, had been universally established by Trajan or the Antonines, the seeds of public wisdom and virtue might have been cherished and propagated in the empire of Rome. The privileges of the subject would have secured the throne of the monarch; the abuses of an arbitrary administration might have been prevented, in a greater degree, by the interposition of these representative assemblies; and the country would have been defended against a foreign enemy by the arms of natives and freemen. Under the mild and generous influence of liberty, the Roman empire might have remained invincible and immortal; or if its excessive magnitude, and the instability of human affairs, had opposed such perpetual continuance, its vital and constituent members might have separately preserved their vigour and independence. But in the decline of the empire, when every principle of health and life had been exhausted, the tawdry application of this partial remedy was incapable of producing any important or salutary effects. The emperor Honorius expresses his surprise, that he must compel the reluctant provinces to accept a privilege which they should ardently have solicited. A fine of three, or even five, pounds of gold was imposed on the absent representatives; who seemed to have declined this imaginary gift of a free constitution, as the last and most cruel insult of their oppressors.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Arcadius emperor of the east.—Administration and disgrace of Eutropius.—Revolt of Germanus.—Perscription of St. John Chrysostom.—Theodosius II. emperor of the east. His sister Pulcheria.—His wife Eudocia.—The Persian war, and division of Armenia.

The division of the Roman world began—The empire of the two sons of Theodosius, marks the A. D. 293.—413., final establishment of the empire of the Reign of Arcadius, east, which, from the reign of Arcadius, to 401, 383, or to the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, subsisted one thousand and fifty-eight years in a state of premature and perpetual decay. The sovereignty of that empire assumed, and obstinately retained, the vain, and at length disastrous title of the Emperor of the Romans; and the hereditary appellation of the Augusti and Arcuates continued to declare, that he was the legitimate successor of the first of men who had reigned over the first of nations. The palace of Constantinople rivalled, and perhaps excelled the magnificence of Persia, and the eloquent senecans of St. Chrysostom celebrate, while they condemn, the pompous luxury of the reign of Arcadius. "The emperor," says he, "wears on his head either a diadem, or a crown of gold, decorated with precious stones of inestimable value. These ornaments, and his purple garments, are reserved for a person alone, who knows how to wear them, and are embroidered with figures of golden dragons. His throne is of massy gold. Whenever he appears in public, he is surrounded by his courtiers, his guards and his attendants. Their spears, their shields, their cuirasses, the bridles and trappings of their horses, their armour, and the table, are all covered with gold, and the large splendid boss in the midst of their shield, is encircled with smaller bosses, which represent the shape of the human eye. The two mules that draw the chariot of the monarch, are perfectly white, and shining all over with gold. The chariot itself, of pure and solid gold, attracts the admiration of the spectators, who contemplate the purple curtains, the snowy carpet, the size of the precious stones, and the resplendent plate of gold, that glitter as they are agitated by the motion of the carriage. The imperial pictures are white, on a blue ground; the emperor appears seated on his throne, with his arms on his knees, and his guards beside him, and his vanquished enemies in chains at his feet." The successors of Constantine established their perpetual residence in the royal city, which he had erected on the verge of Europe and Asia. Inaccessible to the mercy of their enemies, and perhaps to the complaints of their people, they received, with each wind, the tributary productions of every climate: while the impregnable strength of their capital continued for ages to defy the hostile attempts of the barbarians. Their dominions were bounded by the Hadradian and the Tigrid; and the whole interval of twenty-five days' navigation, which separated the extreme cold of Scythia from the torrid zone of Ethiopia, was comprehended within the limits of the empire of the east. The populous countries of that empire were the seat of art and learning, of luxury and wealth; and the inhabitants, who had assumed

Some noble blood was shed by the hand of the executioner, and the most inexcusable extremities of the empire were filled with innocent and illustrious exiles. Among the gen-

ment of Eutropius. He had been guilty of the unpunished introducing of introducing into the palace of Constantinople; and some degree of pride must be allowed to a powerful and ungrateful favourite, who was satisfied with the disgrace of his benefactor. Abundantius was stripped of his ample fortunes by an imperial rescript, and banished to Plia-

Tact, that great officer, the master-general of the armies of Theodosius, had signified his valor to a decisive victory, which he obtained over the Goths of Thessaly; but he was too prone, after the example of his sovereign, to enjoy the luxury of peace, and to abandon his confidence to wicked and designing ministers. Timarius had despised the public clamour, by promoting an infamous dependent to the command of a cohort; and he deserved to feel the ingratitude of Bargas, who was secretly instigated by the favouritism of a treacherous conspirator. The general was arraigned before the tribunal of Arcadius himself; and the principal ene ch stood by the side of the throne to suggest the questions and answers of his sovereign. But as this form of trial might be deemed partial and arbitrary, the further inquiry into the case of Timarius was deferred till Arcadius and Procopius; the former of consular rank, the latter still respected as the father-in-law of the emperor Valens. The appearances of a fair and legal proceeding were maintained by the blunt honesty of Procopius; and he yielded with reluctance to the obsta-quis dexterity of his colleague, who pronounced a sentence of condemnation against the unfortunate Timarius. His immense riches were confiscated, in the name of the emperor, and for the benefit of the favourite; and he was doomed to perpetual exile at Oasis, a solitary spot in the midst of the sandy deserts of Libya. 4 Excluded from all human converse, the master-general of the Roman armies was lost for ever to the world; but the circumstances of his fate have been related in a various and contradictory manner. It is insinuated, that Eutropius despatched a private order for his secret execution. 5 It was reported, that, in 260, after the fall of Maximianus, he ordered the destruction of desert, of thirst and hunger; and that his dead body was found on the sands of Libya. 6 It has been as-

and that those rash men, who shall presume to solicit the pardon of traitors, shall themselves be branded with public and perpetual infamy. III. "With regard to the sons of traitors,*(continues the emperor,) although they ought to share the punishment, since they will probably be so ardent as they are base by the indirect effect of our imperial lenity, we grant them their lives: but, at the same time, we declare them incapable of inheriting either on the father's or on the mother's side, or of receiving any gift or legacy, from the testament either of kinsmen or of strangers. Stigmatized with hereditary contempt, the climate from the loss of honours or fortune, let them endure the pangs of poverty and contempt, till they shall consider life as a calamity, and death as a comfortable relief." In such words, so well adapted to insult the feelings of mankind, did the emperor, or rather his favourite council, applaud the moderation of a law, which transferred the same unjust and inhuman penalties to the children of all those who had seconded, or who had not disclosed, these fictitious conspiracies. Some of the noblest regulations of Roman jurisprudence have been suffered to expire; but this the same, and the popular fear and the onerous fiscal tyranny, was carefully inserted in the codes of Theodosius and Justinian; and the same maxims have been revived in modern ages, to protect the electors of Germany, and the cardinals of the church of Rome.b

Yet these sanguinary laws, which spread terror among a disconsolate and dissipated people, were of too weak a texture to restrain the bold enterprise of Trigidil the Ostrogoth. The colony of that warlike nation, which had been planted by Theodosius in one of the most fertile districts of Puglia, was, on the contrary, the slow returns of laborious husbandry with the successful and liberal rewards of Alaric: and their leader resented, as a personal affront, his own ungracious reception in the palace of Constantinople. A soft and wealthy province, in the heart of the empire, was astonishment by the sound of war; and the foolish valour, who had been disregarded or oppressed, was again respected, as soon as he resumed the hostile character of a barbarian. The vineyards and fruitful fields, between the rapid Marasys and the winding Meander, were consumed with fire; those valleys, the scene of lawless and the city of Ephesus, the first stroke of an enemy; the trembling inhabitants escaped from a bloody massacre to the shores of the Hellespont; and a considerable part of Asia Minor was desolated by the rebellion of Trigidil. His rapid progress was checked by the junction of the north with the Ostrogoths, attacked in a narrow pass, between the city of Selge, a deep morass, and the craggy cliffs of mount Taurus, were defeated with the loss of their bravest troops. But the spirit of their chief was not dis DA Teunen (Flemont, Jer. Civil, i. p. 411.) I must approve he theory of Elton; but in practice I should incline to the opinion of Bishop Barrow: for it is gravely quoted by the lawyers of Cardinal Richelieu, and Eutropius was precipitated by the murder of the virtuous de Thine.

w Or, by a single, however, suspects, that this law, so populous to the maxims of Germanic freedom, has been surreptitiously fitted or adopted by the nobility of the Umer, viz. Thynne; see Lactant., i. vi. c. 6, and Solom., i. viii. c. 4. The second book of Claudian against Eutropius, is a fine, though imperfect piece of chivalry.

w Claudian (in Epist. I. ii. 272—278) very accurately observes, that the ancient name and nation of the Phrygians extended very far to the north side, and that they were contiguous to the Bithynians of Thrace, and the Greeks. His observation may have been taken from Strabo, i. p. 283, ed. Amstel.

w The poem is short, and the copy of the Lacteanus is, as I think, unreliable: the Byzantine orures, besides twenty thousand citizens; but in the age of Zosimus it was reduced to a village, or small town. See Cellarius, Geograph. Antic. tom. ii. p. 617.

b The council of Eutropius, in Claudian, may be compared with that of Dominus in the fourth satire of Juvenal. The principal member of the former were juvenile, novicii, licentiae; one of them was a mere boy till he was a cook; the others, being in the original profession, exposed their assumed dignity; and their trifling regulations, description of a cook, is made still more ridiculous by the importance of the debate.

w Claudian (i. l. 339—461) has branded him with infamy; and the senate, in more than one instance, considers him, p. 305.

w The conspiracy of Gainas and Trigidil, which is attested by the Greek historian, had not reached the ears of Claudian, who attributes the revolt of the Ostrogoth to his own martial spirit, and the advice of his aide.
The bold satirist, who has indulged his discontent by the partial and passion-ate censure of the christian emperors, violates the dignity, rather than the truth, of history, by comparing the son of Theodosius to one of those harmless and simple animals, who scarcely feel that they are treated with their shelter. Two passions, however, fear and conjugal affection, awakened the languid soul of Arcadius; he was terrified by the threats of a victorious barbarian; and he yielded to the tender eloquence of his wife Eudoxia, who, with a flood of artificial tears, presenting her infant children to the emperor, Edition disguised his jealousies, and professed to attempt to circumscribe; and the most eloquent of the saints, John Chrysostom, enjoyed the triumph of protecting a prostrate minister, whose choice had raised him to the ecclesiastical throne of Constantinople. The archbishop, ascending the pulpit of the cathedral, then delivered a solemn and instructive sermon on some real or imaginary insult, which she imputed to the audacious curate.6 The emperor’s hand was directed to sign the condemnation of Eutropius; the magic spell, which during four years had bound the prince and the people, was instantly dissolved; and the acclamations, that so lately hailed the merit and fortune of the favours, were converted into the clamours of the soldiers and people, who reproached his crimes, and pressed his immediate execution. In this hour of distress and despair, his only refuge was in the sanctuary of the church, which he had revered, and professed to love; he refused to accept the edict, which he had retracted the day before, and which had been renewed by an insulterable crowd of either sex and of every age; pro- nounced a seasonable and pathetic discourse on the that the emperor had imputed to Eutropius, laboured to excite the contempt, that he might assure the fury, of the peas.7 The powers of humanity, of superstition, and of providence, prevailed; the empress Eudoxia was restrained, by her own prejudices, or by those of her subjects, from violating the sanctuary of the church; and Eutropius was tempted to capitulate, by the milder arts of persuasion, and by an oath, that his life should be spared.8 Careless of the dignity of their sovereign, the people immediately published an edict, to declare that his late favourite had disgraced the names of consul and patrician, to abolish his statues, to confiscate his wealth, and to inflict a perpetual exile in the island of Cyprus.9 A despora- ble and decrepit eunuch could no longer alarm the fears of the people; he was incapable of enjoying what yet remained, the comforts of peace, of solitude, and of a happy climate. But their implacable revenge still envied him the last moments of a miserable life, and Eutropius had no sooner touched the shores of Cyprus, than he was hastily recalled. The vain hopes of eluding, by a change of place, the obligation of an astonished by the intelligence, that the flower of his army had been ingloriously destroyed; that he himself was declared a public enemy; and that his countryman, Fravitta, a brave and loyal confederate, had assumed the management of the war by sea and land. The enterprises of the rebel, against the cities of Thessaly, impelled by the assurance of his native defence: his hungry soldiers were soon reduced to the grass that grew on the margin of the fortifications; and Gainas, who vainly regretted the wealth and luxury of Asia, embraced a desperate resolution of forcing the passage of the Hellespont. He was desti-tioned for the Prince of Persia, and his intrepid barbarians did not refuse to trust themselves to the waves. But Fravitta attentively watched the progress of their undertaking. As soon as they had gained the middle of the stream, the Roman galleys, impelled by the full force of oars, of the current, and of a favorable wind, rushed forwards in compact order, and with irresistible weight; and the Hellespont was covered with the fragments of the Gothic shipwreck. After the destruction of his hopes, and the loss of many thousands of his bravest soldiers, Gainas, anxious to follow them, and his countrymen being gradually annihilated; the river, in the month of December, would be deeply frozen; and the unbound prospect of Seythin was opened to the ambition of Gainas. This design was secretly communicated to the national troops, who devoted themselves to the support of the most formidable place of his frontier. The embarkation of the troops was by night; and the destruction of the departure was given, a great number of provincial auxiliaries, whom he suspected of an attachment to their native country, were perfidiously massacred. The Goths advanced, by rapid marches, through the plains of Thrace; and they were soon delivered from the fear of a pursuit, by the vanity of Fravitta, who, instead of extinguishing the war, hastened to enjoy the popular applause, and to assume the peaceful honors of the consulship. But a formidable ally appeared in arms to vindicate the majesty of the empire, and to guard the liberty of the world. The successor of Ulpin, king of the Huns, who had been made the instrument of the progress of Gainas; an hostile and ruined country prohibited his retreat; he disdained to capitate; and after repeatedly attempting to eut his way through the ranks of the enemy, he was slain, with his despoiens in the field of battle.

Jan. 3. Eleven days after the naval victory of the Hellespont, the head of Gainas, the inestimable gift of the conqueror, was received at Constantinople with the most liberal expressions of gratitude; and the public delivery was celebrated by festivals and illuminations. The triumphs of Arcadius became the subject of epic poems; and the monarch, no longer oppressed by any hostile terrors, resigned himself to the mild and absolute dominion of his wife, the fair and artful Eudoxia; who has sullied her fame by the persecution of St. John Chrysostom.

After the death of the indolent Nectarius, the successor of Gregory Nazianzen, the church was left open to the indecision of the people, who were distracted by the ambition of rival candidates, who were not ashamed to solicit, with gold or flattery, the suffrage of the people, or of the favourite. On this occasion, Eutropius seems to have de-vated from his ordinary maxim; and his uncorrupted judgment was deceived by the merit of a stranger. In a long journey to the east, he had admired the sermons of John, a native and presbyter of Antioch, whose name had been distinguished by the epiphany of Chrysostom, or the Golden Mouth. A private order was dispatched to the governor of Syria; and as the people might be unwilling to resign their favourite preacher, he was transported, with speed and secrecy in a post-chariot, from Antioch to Constantinople. The unanimous and unsolicited consent of the court, the clergy, and the people, ratified the choice of the minister; and both the action of the event and the disapprobation of the public, had rendered the sanguine expectations of the public. Born of a noble and eulogious family, in the capital of Syria, Chrysostom had been educated, by the care of a tender mother, under the tuition of the most skilful masters. He studied the art of rhetoric in the school of Libanus. After he had acquired the liberal learning, he composed a number of poems, which were highly admired by the talents of his disciple, ingeniously confessed, that John would have deserved to succeed him, had he not been stolen away by the Christians. His piety soon disposed him to receive the sacrament of baptism; and renounce the lucrative and honourable prof-ileges to bury himself in the desert, where he subdued the lusts of the flesh by an austere penance of six years. His infirmities compelled him to return to the society of mankind; and the authority of Meletius devolved his talents to the service of the church; but in the midst of his family, and afterwards on the archiepiscopal throne, Chrysostom still persevered in the practice of the monastic virtues. The ample revenues, which his predecessors had consumed in pomp and luxury, he diligently applied to the establishment of hospitals; and the multitudes, who were supported by his charity, preferred the doctrine of their archbishop, to the amusements of the theatre or the circus. The monuments of that eloquence, which was admired near twenty years at Antioch and Constantinople, have been carefully preserved; and the sermons of one thousand sermons, or homilies, has authorized the critics of succeeding times to appreciate the genuine merit of Chrysostom. They

The sixth book of Socrates, the eighth of Sozomen, and the fifth of Theodoret, afford the genuine authority of the life of John Chrysostom. Besides these general historians, I have taken for my guides the four principal biographers of the saint: 1. The author of a partial and passing notice of the Archbishop of Constantinople, composed, in the form of a dialogue, and under the name of his principal oratory, which is preserved by Sozomen, (M. Euseb. tom. xi. p. 500—503.) tivated state of his talents, I have confided to the correct judgment of the learned Tillenius, (M. Euseb. tom. xxi. p. 1—495. Eram. De vita Chrysostomi, lib. ii. cap. 46—47. Eran. Father Montfaucon; but he has perused with the most signal favor the works of his friends; he has discovered several new homilies, and again reviewed and composed the Life of Chrysostom, tom. xxiv. p. 1—76, edit. Montfaucon; 2. The learned Tillenius; (M. Euseb. tom. xxi. p. 1—495. Eran. De vita Chrysostomi, lib. ii. cap. 46—47.) unanimously attribute to the christian orator, the free command of an elegant and copious language; the judgment to conceal the advantages which he derived from the knowledge of rhetoric and philosophy; an inexhaustible fund of metaphors and similitudes, of interesting facts of history, and the most familiar topies; the happy art of engaging the passions in the service of virtue; and of exposing the folly, as well as the turpitude, of vice, almost with the truth and spirit of a dramatic representation.

The pastoral labours of the archbishop were incessant, and at Constantinople they were especially united against him, two sorts of enemies; the aspiring clergy, who envied his success, and the obstinate sinners, who were offended by his reproofs. When Chrysostom thundered, from the pulpit, against the degeneracy of the christians, his sermons were spent either in the crowd, without wounding, or even marking, the character of any individual. When he declaimed against the peculiar vices of the rich, poverty might obtain a transient consolation from his invectives; but the guilty were seldom enlightened by his precepts and the repentant of their errors, or the rich were dignified by some ideas of superiority and enjoyment. But as the pyramid rose towards the summit, it insensibly diminished to a point; and the magistrates, the ministers, the favourite eunuchs, the ladies of the court, the empress Eudoxia herself, had lost a large share of grace; but this did not increase among a smaller proportion of criminals. The personal applications of the audience were anticipated, or confirmed, by the testimony of their own conscience; and the intrepid preacher assumed the dangerous right of exposing both the offence and the offender to the public abhorrence. The church, which had long suffered from the discontent of the clergy and monks of Constantinople, who were too hastily reformed by the fervent zeal of their archbishop. He had condemned, from the pulpit, the domestic females of the clergy of Constantinople, who, under the name of servants, or sisters, afforded a perpetuity to the crowd of degenerates and who themselves were dignified by some ideas of superiority and enjoyment. The silent and solitary ascetics, who had secluded themselves from the world, were entitled to the warmest approbation of Chrysostom; but he despised and stigmatized, as the disgrace of their holy profession, the crowd of degenerates and who, from some unworthy motives of pleasure or profit, so frequently infested the streets of the capital. To the voice of persuasion, the archbishop was obliged to add the terrors of authority; and his arbour, in the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, was not always excusable. The court often interfered or provided by its influence. Chrysostom was naturally of a choleric disposition. Although he struggled, according to the precepts of the gospel, to love his private enemies, he indulged himself in the privilege of hating the enemies of God and of the church; and his sentiments were sometimes delivered with too much energy of countenance and expression. He still maintained, from some considerations of health, or abstinence, his former habits of taking his repasts alone; and this inhospitable custom, which his enemies imputed to pride, contributed, at least, to nourish the infamy of a morose and unsocial humour. Separated from that familiar intercourse, which facilitates the knowledge and the despatch of business, he reposed an unsuspecting confidence in his deacon Serapion; and seldom apprised, who displayed the fruits of his dependence or of his equals. Conscious of the purity of his intentions, and perhaps of the superiority of his genius, the archbishop of Constantinople extended the jurisdiction of the imperial city, that he might enlarge the sphere of his labours. But the archbishop, who was endeared to the populace by his admirable eloquence, the profane imputed to an ambitious motive, appeared to Chrysostom himself in the light of a sacred and indispensable duty. In his visitation through the Asiatic provinces, he deposed thirteen bishops of Lydia and Phrygia; and indirectly declared, that a deep corruption of simony and licentiousness had infected the whole episcopal order. If those bishops were innocent, such a rash and unjust condemnation must excite a well grounded discontent. If they were guilty, the numerous associates of their guilt would be removed, and the remainder of their safety depended on the ruin of the archbishop; whose services were considered to represent as the tyrant of the eastern church.

This ecclesiastical conspiracy was managed by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, an active and ambitious man, who was son of the emperor Eudoxius, A.D. 403.

The first astonishment of his faithful people had been mute and passive; they at Constantinople suddenly rose with unanimous and irre-sizable fury. Theophilus escaped; but the tumultuous crown of monks and Egyptian mariniers were slaughtered without pity in the streets of Constantinople. 4 A seasonable earthquake justifed the interposition of Heaven; the torrent of sedition rolled forwards to the gates of the palace; and the empress, agitated by fear or remorse, threw herself at the feet of her husband, that the public safety could be purchased only by the restoration of Chrysostom. The Bosphorus was covered with innumerable vessels; the shores of Europe and Asia were profusely illuminated; and the acclamations of a victorious people accompanied, from the port to the capital, the triumph of the archbishop; who too easily consented to resume the exercise of his functions, before his sentence had been legally reversed by the authority of an ecclesiastical synod. Ignorant, or careless, of the impending danger, Chrysostom indulged his zeal, or perhaps his resentment; declaimed with peculiar asperity against female voices; and condemned the profane honours which were addressed, almost in the precincts of St. Sophia, to the statue of the empress. His impudence tempted his enemies to inflame the haughty spirit of Eudoxia, by reporting, or perhaps inventing, the famous exordium of a sermon, "Herodias is again furious! Herodias again demands that she once more requires the head of John;" an insolent allusion, which, as a woman and a sovereign, it was impossible for her to forgive. 5 The short interval of a peridious truce was employed to concert more effectual measures for the disgrace and ruin of the archbishop; and, on the first accession of the eastern prelates, who were guided from a distance by the advice of Theophilus, confirmed the validity, without examining the justice, of the former sentence; and a detachment of barbarian troops was introduced into the city, to suppress the emotions of the people. On the way, it was gradually dispersed, by the vigour of the eastern rulers, who were alarmed by the modesty of the naked catechumens, and violated by their presence the awful mysteries of the christian worship. Arcasius occupied the church of St. Sophia, and the archiepiscopal throne. The catholics retreated to the baths of Constantinople, and afterwards to the fields: where they were still pursued and insulted by the guards, the bishops, and the magistrates. The fatal day of the second and final exile of Chrysostom was marked by the conflagration of the cathedral, of the senate-house, and of the adjacent buildings; and this calamity was imputed, without proof, but not without probability, to the despair of a persecuted faction. 6

Cicero might claim some merit, if his voluntary banishment preserved the peace of the republic & the submission of the provinces of Asia Minor, where he was continually threatened by the hostile attacks of the Iaurians, and the more implacable fury of the monks. Yet Chrysostom arrived in safety at the place of his confinement; and the three years, which he spent at Cucusus, and the neighbouring town of Arabissus, were a period of genuine and religious meditation. His character was consecrated by absence and persecution; the faults of his administration were not long remembered; but every tongue repeated the praises of his genius and virtue; and the respectful attention of the christian world was fixed on a desert spot among the mountains of Asia. From the same period, when this archbishop, whose active mind was invigorated by misfortunes, maintained a strict and frequent correspondence 7 with the most distant provinces; exhorted the separate congregation of his faithful adherents to persevere in their allegiance; urged the destruction of the temples of Phoebus and the extermination of heresy in the isle of Cyprus; extended his pastoral care to the missions of Persia and Scythia; negotiated, by his ambassadors, with the Roman pontiff, and the emperor Honorius; and boldly appealed, from a partial synod, to the supreme tribunal of a free and generous council. The mind of the archbishop was exalted by the discovery of his captive body was exposed to the revenge of the oppressors, who continued to abuse the name and authority of Arcadius. 1 An order was despatched for the instant removal of Chrysostom to the extreme desert of Pityus: and his guards so faithfully obeyed their cruel instructions, that, before he reached the sea-coast of the Euxine, he expired at Comana, in Pontus, in the sixtieth year of his age. The succeeding generation acknowledged his innocence and merit. The archbishops of the east, who might blush that their predecessors had been the enemies of Chrysostom, were reproved by his former felicity: and the Roman pontiff, to restore the honours of that venerable name. 8 At the piious solicitation of the clergy and people of Constantinople, his relics, thirty years after his death, were transported from their obscure sepulchre to the royal city. 9 The emperor Theodosius advanced to receive them as far as Chaledon; and, falling prostrate on the coffin, implored, in the name of his guilty parents, Arcadius and Eudoxia, the forgiveness of the injured souls. 10 Yet a pious devout may be entertained, whether the stain of hereditary guilt could be derived from Arcadius to his successor. Eudoxia was a young and beautiful woman, who indulged her passions, and despised her husband: count John enjoyed, at least, the familiar

4 Palladius owns, (p. 30) that if the people of Constantinople had found Theophilus, they would certainly have thrown him into the sea. Socrates mentions (I. vi. c. 17.) a battle between the mob and the governors of the city, in which many were slain, and some lives were lost. The massacre of the monks is observed only by Sozomenus, (I. vi. p. 364.) who says, "there was a general massacre of the monks, and Chrysostom had a singular talent to lead the illiterate multitude, c & g & i 10 * We see Socrates, I. vii. c. 13. Sozomen, I. vii. c. 30. Zosimus (I. v. p. 324, 327.) mentions, in general terms, his invectives against Eudoxia, Arcadius, and Chrysostom; and quotes as a confirmation of his assertions, several passages from the works of the men- tioned authors. Montfaucon, t. xiii. p. 131. Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. t. xiv. p. 257.

5 We might naturally expect such a charge from Sozomenus; (I. v. p. 327,) but it is remarkable enough, that it should be confirmed by So- crates, I. vi. c. 13. and the Paschal Chronicle, p. 397.

6 He displays those specious motives, (Post Rediman, c. 13, 14.) in the language of an orator and a politician.

7 Two hundred and forty-two of the epistles of Chrysostom are still extant, (Opera, tom. iii. p. 595–596.) They are addressed to a great variety of persons, and show a firmness of mind, much superior to that of Cicero in his exile. The fourteenth epistle contains a curious narrative of the dangers of his journey.

8 After the exile of Chrysostom, Theophilus published an unusu- al work, entitled "Letters and Sermons," in which he extols the virtues of his famous predecessor. It is a curious collection of the polite expressions of honest humanitatis, ecclesiasticorum, philosophorum, biblicorum, etc. in these letters, Chrysostom had delivered his soul to be adulterated by the devil; and wishes that some further punishment, adequate (if possible) to the magnitude of his guilt, may be inflicted on his body. At the request of his friend Theophilus, translated this edifying perfor- mance from Greek into Latin. See Panormus Herman, Defens. pro sua Capit. I. v. c. 5. published by Simons. Opera, tom. ii. p. 392, 393, 397. His name was inserted by his successor Attillius in the Register of the church of Constantinople, A. D. 418. Ten years afterwards, the work of Theodoret, (I. v. c. 45.) was written, and it was revised and corrected by the learned and eloquent Eutychius, bishop of Nicomedia. The col- liger, of his uncle Theophilus, yielded with much reluctance. See Cassianus, Herman. I. iv. c. 41. Tillemont, Mem. Eccle. tom. xiv. p. 277–280.

9 Socrates, I. vii. c. 45. Theodoret, I. v. c. 56. This event recon- ciled the Joannites, and the Joannites were received back into the bosom of the orthodox. Another party of successors. During his lifetime, the Joannites were respected by the people in the city of Antioch; and the daughters of the bishops of this sect were esteemed the wives of the people. Their obstinacy gradually drove them to the brink of schism. According to some accounts, (Baronius, Antiq. Eccles. A. D. 438. No. 9, 16.) the emperor was forced to send a letter of invitation and excuses, before the body of the pontifical see was restored to Comana. confidence of the empress; and the public named him as the real father of Theodosius the younger. The birth of a son was accepted, however, by the pious husband, as an event the most fortunate and honourable to himself, to his family, and to the eastern world; and the royal infant, by an unprecedented favour, was invested with the titles of Caesar and Augustus, less than four years afterwards, Eudoxia, in the bloom of youth, was destroyed by the consequences of a miscarriage; and this untimely death confounded the prophecy of a holy bishop, who, amidst the universal joy, had ventured to foretell, that she should behold the land and the glorious reign of her glorious son. The catholics applauded the justice of Heaven, which avenged the persecution of St. Chrysostom; and perhaps the emperor was the only person who sincerely bewailed the loss of the haughty and rapacious Eudoxia. Such a domestic misfortune afflicted him more deeply than the public calamities of the east; the licentious excursions from Pontus to Palestine, of the Issaurian robbers, whose impunity accused the weakness of the government; and the earthquakes, the conflagrations, the famine, and the flights of locusts, which, from the beginning of the reign were commonly ascribed to the attribute of the incapacity of the monarch. At length, in the thirty-first year of his age, after a reign (if we may abuse that word) of thirteen years, three months, and fifteen days, Arcadius expired in the palace of Constantinople. It is impossible to delineate his character; for the period very briefly furnished, even with historical materials, it has not been possible to remark one action that properly belongs to the son of the great Arcadius.

His supposed murder. The historian Procopius has indeed related that the illustrious and dashing emperor with a ray of human prudence, or celestial wisdom, Arcadius considered, with anxious foresight, the helpless condition of his son Theodosius, who was no more than seven years of age, the dangerous factions of a minority, and the aspiring spirit of Jeze- gerd, the Persian monarch. Instead of tempting the allegiance of an ambitious subject, by the participation of supreme power, he boldly appealed to the magistr- ation of a king; and placed, by solemn testament, the sceptre in the east in the hands of Jeze-gerd himself. The royal guardian accepted and discharged this honour, and performed the unexampled act of renouncing the dignity of a child, and so rashly, though so fortunately, committed his son and his dominions to the unknown faith of a stranger, a rival, and a heathen. At the distance of one hundred and fifty years, this political question might be debated in the court of Justinian; but a prudent historian will refuse to examine the propriety, till he has ascertained the truth of the testament of Arcadius.

a Zosimus, l. v. p. 315. The charity of an empress should not be impeached on the production of a will, when it is acknowledged that the witnesses should write and live under a prince, whose legiti- macy is in question. We must suppose that his story was a party libel, privately read and circulated by the pagans. Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. v. p. 762) is not averse to brand the re-putation of Eudoxia.
b Porphyry of Gaza. His zeal was transferred by the order which he had obtained for the destruction of eight pagan temples of that city. See the curious details of his life, (Baronius, A. After he confesses the preva-ienge of the barbarians, he observes that Procopius and Agathias, who had committed it to writing, Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. v. p. 517) argues very sensibly on the merits of this false. His criti- cism was not warped by any ecclesiastical authority. Both Proco- pus and Agathias are half pagans.

it stands without a parallel in the history of the world, we may justly require that it should be attested by the positive and unmistakable evidence of contemporaries. The strange novelty of the event, which excites our distrust, must have attracted their notice; and their universal silence annihilates the vain tradition of the Persian, or the Arabian, court.

The maxims of Roman jurisprudence, Administration of justice in the empire. A.D. 405 413. would have adjudged to the emperor Honorius the guardianship of his nephew, till he had attained, at least, the age of the quinquennium, or the more serious novici- us of Honorius, and the calamities of his reign, dis-qualified him from prosecuting this natural claim; and such was the absolute separation of the two mon-archie, both in interest and affection, that Constanti-nus might have obeyed, with less reluctance, the or- ders of the Persian, than those of the Italian, court. Under a prince, whose weakness is disguised by the external signs of manhood and discretion, the most worthless favourites may secretly dispute the empire of the palace; and dictate to submissive provinces the system of government, and the external policy of the state. But the ministers of a child, who is incapable of arming them with the sanction of the royal name, must acquire and exercise an independent authority. The great officers of the state and army, who had been appointed before the death of Arcadius, formed an aris-tocracy of the sword; and the empire was governed by a sort of a free republic; and the government of the eastern empire was fortunately assumed by the prefaet Anthenius, who obtained, by his superior abilities, a lasting ascendancy over the minds of his equals. The safety of the young emperor required the merit and in-terest of the barons of Constantinople; but the pru- nency of Theodosius was protected by the arms and counsels of Persia. Such is the singular narrative of Procopius; and his veracity is not disputed by Aga-thias, while he preserves to discompose from his judgment, and mar the reputation of the despotic, monarch, who was so rashly, though so fortunately, committed his son and his dominions to the unknown faith of a stranger, a rival, and a heathen. At the distance of one hundred and fifty years, this political question might be debated in the court of Justinian; but a prudent historian will refuse to examine the propriety, till he has ascertained the truth of the testament of Arcadius.

Character and administration of Pulcheria. The Romans had so long been accustomed to the authority of a monarch, that the first, even amongst the females, of A.D. 414 413— the imperial family, who displayed any courage or capacity, was permitted to ascend the vacant throne of the west. The imperial throne was occupied by an empress, twenty years older than himself, received at the age of sixteen, the title of Augusta; and though her favour might sometimes be clouded by caprice or intrigue, she con-continued to govern the eastern empire near forty years; during the long minority of her brother, and, after his death, in her own name, and in the name of the her nominal husband. From a motive, either of prudence, or religion, she embraced a life of celibacy; and notwithstanding some aspersions on the chastity of Pulcheria, this resolution which she communicated to her brother, Arcadius, was generally esteemed by the christian world, as the sublime effort of her piety.

In the presence of the clergy and people, the three daughters of Arcadius dedicated their virginity to God; and the obligation of their solemn vow was inscribed on a tablet of gold and gems; which they publicly and amusingly exhibited to the emperor Flaccilla, in the presence of her court. Their palace was converted into a monastery; and all males, except the guards of their conscience, the saints who had forgotten the distinction of sexes, were scrupulously excluded from the holy threshold. Pulcheria, her two sisters, and a chosen train of favourite damsels, formed a religious community; they renounced the vanity of dress, interrupted, by frequent fasts, their simple and frugal diet; allotted a portion of their time to works of embroidery; and devoted several hours of the day and night to the exercises of prayer and psalmody. The piety of a christian virgin was adorned by the magnificence of her dress; and the Christian historical history describes the splendid churches, which were built at the expense of Pulcheria, in all the provinces of the east; her charitable foundations for the benefit of strangers and the poor; the ample donations which she bestowed for the perpetual maintenance of monastic societies; and the active severity, with which she laboured to suppress the opposite heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches. Such virtues were supposed to deserve the peculiar favour of the Deity; and the relics of martyrs, as well as the knowledge of future events, were communicated in visions and revelations to the imperial saint. Yet the devotion of Pulcheria never diverted her indefatigable attention from temporal affairs: and she alone, among all the descendants of the great Theodosius, appears to have inherited any share of his manly spirit and abilities. The Roman world was deeply interested in the education of his master. A regular course of study and exercise was judiciously instituted; of the military exercises of riding, and shooting with the bow; of the liberal studies of grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy; the moral influence of the one ambitious Theodosius, solicited the attention of their royal pupil; and several able youths were introduced into the palace, to animate his diligence by the emulation of friendship. Pulcheria alone discharged the important task of instructing her brother in the arts of government; but her precocious mind was not enabled to exceed the limits of truth; and the son of Arcadius was condemned to pass his perpetual infancy, encompassed only by a servile train of women and eunuchs. The ample leisure, which he acquired by neglecting the essential duties of his high office, was filled by useless and unprofitable studies. Reading was the only active pursuit that could tempt him beyond the limits of the palace; but he most assiduously laboured, sometimes by the light of a midnight lamp, in the mechanic occupations of painting and carving; and the taste of elegance was formed of the books, entitled the Roman emperor to the singular epithet of Calligraphes, or a fair writer. Separated from the world by an impenetrable veil, Theodosius trusted the persons whom he loved; he loved those who were accustomed to amuse and flatter his indulgence; and as he never perused the papers that were presented for his royal signature, the acts of injustice the most repugnant to his character, were frequently perpetrated in his name. The emperor himself was chaste, temperate, liberal, and merciful; but these qualities, which can only deserve the name of virtues, when they are supported by courage, and regulated by discretion, were seldom beneficial, and they sometimes proved mischievous, to mankind. His mind, enervated by a royal education, was oppressed and degraded by abject superstition: hefasted, he sung psalms, he blindly accepted and imitated the doctrines with which his faith was continually nourished. Theodosius devoutly worshipped the dead and living saints of the christian church; and he once refused to eat, till an insolent monk, who had cast an excommunication on his sovereign, condescended to heal the spiritual wound which he had inflicted.

The story of a fair and virtuous maiden, exalted from a private condition to the imperial throne, might be deemed an incredible romance, if such a story had not been verified in the marriage of Theodosius. The celebrated Athenodorus was educated by

But this pilgrimage was the fatal term of the glories of Eudocia. Satuated with empty pomp, and unmindful, perhaps, of her obligations to Pulcheria, she am-ished at the /am, of her fortune, she had been a sufferer, /ac a culprit. The palace was distracted by female discord; and the victory was at last decided, by the superior ascendant of the sister of Theodosius. The execution of Paulinus, master of the offices, and the disgrace of Olym, proctorum prefect of the east, convinced the people that the government was, at least, determined not to protect her most faithful friends; and the uncommon beauty of Paulinus encouraged the secret rumour, that his guilt was that of a successful lover.7 As soon as the emperor perceived that the affection of Theodosius was irretrievably lost, she requested the commission of resignation to the distant solitude of Jerusalem. She obtained her request; but the jealousy of Theodosius, or the vindictive spirit of Pulcheria, pursued her in her last retreat; and Saturinus, count of the domes-ties, was directed to punish with death two ecclesiastics, who had publicly accused Pulcheria of having injured and dishonoured love; and the royal nuptials were celebrated amidst the acclamations of the capital and the provinces.

Eudocia, who was easily persuaded to renounce the errors of paganism, received at her baptism the Christian name of Pulcheria; but the following year, he withheld the title of Augusta, till the wife of Theodosius had approved her Fruitfulness by the birth of a daughter, who espoused, fifteen years afterwards, the emperor of the west. The brothers of Eudocia obeyed, with some anxiety, her imperial summons; but as she could easily forgive their fortunate unkindness, she indulged the tenderness, or perhaps the vanity, of a sister, by permitting them to the rank of consuls and prefects. In the luxury of the palace, she still cultivated those ingenuous arts, which had contributed to the gracefulness of her person; and wisely dedicated her talents to the honour of religion and of her husband. Eudocia composed a poetical paraphrase of the first eight books of the Old Testament, and of the prophecies of Daniel and Zephariah; a cento of the verses of Homer, applied to the life and miracles of Christ, the legend of St. Malala, and a panegyrion on the Persian victories of Theodosius: and her writings, which were appau-ed by a servile and superstitious age, have not been disdained by the candour of imperial criticism.1 The fondness of the emperor was not abated by time and prosperity: the marriage of his daughter, was permitted to discharge her grateful vows by a solemn pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Her ostentations progress through the east may seem inconsistent with the spirit of christian humility: she pronounced, from a throne of gold and gems, an eloquent oration to the senate of Antioch, declared her royal intention of enlarging the walls of the city, bestowed a donative of two hundred pounds of gold to restore the public baths, and accepted the statues which were decried by the gratitude of Antioch. In the temple of Minerva, her alma and foundations exceded the munificence of the great Holena; and though the public treasure might be impoverished by this excessive liberality, she enjoyed the conscious sat-er of Leontius, an Athenian sophist; her baptism, marriage, and poetical genius. The most ancient account of her history is in John Malal (part ii., p. 29, 31. ed. Venet. 1723.) and in the Paschal Chronicle, (p. 311, 312.) Those authors had probably seen original papers from which Eudocia, Theodosius, and Cassius, a clerk, have displayed the love, rather than the talent, of fiction. From Nichephorus, Indeed, I have ventured to assume her age at fourteen years, which would render her marriage was near twenty-eight years old when she informed the heat of a severe illness.

6 Sozomen, i. vi. c. 21. Photius, p. 417-420. The Homerico cent is still extant, and has been repeatedly printed; but the claim of Eudocia and Paulinus, of a performance equal to that of Homer, is disproved by the critics.
7 Barusius (Annal. Eccles. A. D. 458. 459.) is copious and absurd; but he is by no means convincing the lives of different ages on the same level of authenticity.
8 In this short view of the disgrace of Eudocia, I have limited the catastrophe to the year (c. I. sect. 41.) and the Paschal Chronicle, (A. D. 449. and 444.) The two authentic dates assigned by the latter to the most important part of the catastrophe, and the history of the instructed story of the apple, is for only the Arabian Nights, where something not very unlike it may be found.
9 Priscus, (Excerp. Legat. p. 69.) a contemporary, and a courtier, dirily mentions her pagan and christian names, without adding any title of honour or respect.
10 For the two pilgrimages of Eudocia, and her long residence at Constantinople, I refer the reader to the work of Eutropius, (l. c. 50. 21. 22.) The Paschal Chronicle may sometimes reserve record; and, in the domestic history of Antioch, the earnest desire of Eudocia to be a nun. Meletius of Antioch mentions a visit paid by Eudocia, in the reign of Theodosius, to the shrine of the Virgin, in a memoir on the fertility of Palestine, of which I have only preserved the name, and the number of pounds of gold, above 500,000 pounds sterling.

of Armenia, and the plains of Mesopotamia, were filled with hostile armies; but the operations of two successive campaigns were not productive of any decisive result. After the death of Cyriacus, the Parthian general, possession of the country, which had been so long wrested from the Persians, was recovered, some towns were besieged, with various and doubtful success; and if the Romans failed in their attempt to recover the long-lost possessions of Nisibis, the Persians were repulsed from the walls of a Mesopotamian city, by the valour of a martial bishop, who put an end to the city's siege, even when the Parthian, Thomas the apostle. Yet the splendid victories, which the incredible speed of the messenger Palladius repeatedly announced to the palace of Constantineople, were celebrated with festivals and panegyrics. From these panegyrics the historians of the age might borrow their extraordinary, and perhaps fabulous, tales; for the proud challenge of a Persian hero, who was entangled by the net, and despatched by the sword, of Arctobius the Goth; of the ten thousand Immortals, who were slain in the attack of the Roman camp; and of the hundred thousand Arabs, or Saracens, who were impugned by a panic terror to throw themselves headlong into the Euphrates. Such events may be disbelieved or disregarded; but the charity of a bishop, Acacius of Amida, whose name might dignify the saintly calendar, shall not be lost in oblivion. But the most extraordinary expression of a leader's uselessness to a god who neither eats nor drinks, the generous prelate sold the plate of the church of Amida; employed the price in the redemption of seven thousand Persian captives; supplied their wants with affectionate liberality; and dismissed them to their native climes. The transactions of the Roman ambassadors degraded the personal character of their sovereign, by a vain attempt to magnify the extent of his power; when they seriously advised the Persians to prevent, by a timely accommodation, the wrath of a monarch, who was yet ignorant of this distress. And these one hundred years were solemnly ratified; and although the revolutions of Armenia might threaten the public tranquillity, the essential conditions of this treaty were respected near four score years by the successors of Constantine and Artaxerxes.

Since the Roman and Parthian standards first encountered on the banks of the Euphrates, the kingdom of Armenia was alternately oppressed by its formidable protectors; and in the course of this history, several events, which inclined the balance of peace and war, have been already related. A disgraceful treaty had resigned Armenia to the ambition of Sapor; and the scale of Persia appeared to preponderate. But the royal race of Arsaces impatiently submitted to the house of Sassan; their empire was restored, or betrayed them into a servile condition; and the nation was still attached to the christian princes of Constantineople. In the beginning of the fifth century, Armenia was divided by the progress of war and faction; and the unnatural division precipitated the downfall of that ancient monarchy. Chosroes, the Persian vassal, reigned over the eastern and most extensive portion of the empire; which the authority of his name acknowledged the jurisdiction of Arsaces, and the supremacy of the emperor Arcadius. After the death of Arses, the Romans suppressed the regal government, and imposed on their allies the condition of subjects. The military command was delegated to the prince of Armenia from their city of Choren; who, in the person of Thomas, a native of Armenia, rose to the dignity of a Persian king; and the promissory and conditional offer of his new sovereign was not unaccompanied by an address to the nation, which, at the time of his elevation to the throne, was in a state of destitution; and the promise of peace and protection was made with the utmost facility to the subjects of Chosroes, who had been induced to desert their prince by poverty and the fear of death. By the succession of Chosroes, and the abandonment of the Persian, to the Romans, the latter were enabled to recover the possession of Armenia; and to occupy the great cities of the Tigris and Euphrates with their victorious armies.
CHAPTER XXXIII.

Death of Honorius.— Valentinian III. emperor of the west.—Administration of his widow Placidia, Elvira and Bonifacius.—Conquest of Africa by the Vandals.

Last years and death of Honorius. A.D. 423. Aug. 27.

During a long and disgraceful reign of twenty-eight years, Honorius, emperor of the west, was separated from the court nearly the whole of the time, his friendship for his brother being more public than secret, and his jealousy of his sister, appeared owing to his own selfishness and secret joy, the calamities of Rome. The strange adventure of Placidia gradually renewed, and cemented, the alliance of the two emperors. The daughter of the great Theodosius was the captive and the queen of the Goths; she lost her affec tive husband; she was dragged in chains by his insatiable assassins; she tasted the pleasure of revenge, and was exchanged, in the treaty of peace, for six hundred thousand measures of wheat. After her return from Spain to Italy, Placidia experienced a new persecution in the bosom of her family. She was accused of a marriage, which had been stipulated without her consent; and the brave Constantius, as a noble reward for the tyrants whom he had vanquished, received, from the hand of Honorius himself, the struggling and reluctant hand of the widow of Adelphus. But her resistance ended with the ceremony of the nuptials; nor did Placidia refuse to become the mother of Honoria and Valentinian the third, or to assume and exercise an absolute dominion over the mind of her grateful husband. The generous soldier, whose time had hitherto been divided between social pleasures and military service, was taught the lessons of avarice and ambition; he extorted the title of Augustus; and the servant of Honorius was associated to the empire of the west. The death of Constantius, in the seventh month of his reign, instead of diminishing, seemed to increase, the power of Placidia; and the indeluct familiarity of her brother, which might be no more than the symptoms of a childish affection, were universally attributed to incestuous love. On a sudden, by some base intrigues of a steward and a nurse, this excessive fondness was converted into an irreconcilable quarrel: the debates of the emperor and his sister were not long confined within the walls of the palace; and as the Gothic soldiers adhered to their queen, the city of Ravenna was agitated with bloody and dangerous tumults, which could only be appeased by the forced or voluntary retreat of Placidia and her children. The royal exiles landed at Constantino ple, soon after the marriage of Theodosius, during the festival of the Persian victories. They were treated with kindness and magnificence; but as the statues of the emperor Constantius had been rejected by the eastern court, the title of Augustus could not decently be allowed to his widow. Within a few months after the arrival of Placidia, a swift messenger announced the death of Honorius, the consequence of a dropy; but the important secret was not divulged, till the necessary orders had been dispatched for the march of a large body of troops to the sea-coast of Dalmatia. The shops and the gates of Constanti no ple remained shut during seven days; and the loss of a foreign prince, who could neither be esteemed nor regretted, was celebrated with loud and affected demonstrations of the public grief.

While the ministers of Constanti no ple deliberated, the vacant throne of Honorius was assumed by his ambitious cousin, the name of the rebel was John; he filled the confidential office of Primicerius, or principal secretary; and history has attributed to his character more virtues than can easily be reconciled with the violation of the most sacred duty. Elated by the suspicion of the hope of a successor, the Huns, John presumed to insult, by an embassy, the majesty of the eastern emperor; but when he understood that his agents had been banished, imprisoned, and at length chased away with deserved ignominy, John prepared to march against his own, or his own sons'. In such a case, the grandson of the great Theodosius should have marched in person; but the young emperor was easily diverted, by his physicians, from so rash and hazardous a design; and the conduct of the Italian expedition was prudently intrusted to Arabusius, and his son Aspar, who had already signalized their valor against the Persians. It was resolved, that Arabusius should embark with the infantry, while Aspar, at the head of the cavalry, conducted Placidia, and her son Valentinian, along the sea-coast of the Dalmatian. The march of the emperor was performed with such active diligence, that they surprised, without resistance, the important city of Aquileia; when the hopes of Aspar were unexpectedly confounded by the intelligence, that a storm had dispersed the imperial fleet; and that his father, with only two gallers, was taken and carried a prisoner into the port of Ravenna. Yet this incident, unfortunate as it might seem, facilitated the conquest of Italy. Ardarius employed, or abused, the courtous freedom which he was permitted to enjoy, to revive among the troops a sense of loyalty and gratitude; and, as soon as the necessity was ripe for execution, he invited, by private messages, and pressed the approach of Aspar. A shepherd, whom the popular credulity transformed into an angel, guided the eastern cavalry, by a secret, and it was thought, an impassable, road, through the morasses of the Po; the gates of Ravenna, after a short struggle, were thrown open; and the defenceless tyrant was delivered to the mercy, or rather, to the cruelty, of the conquerors. His right hand was first cut off; and after he had been exposed, mounted on an ass, to the public derision, John was beheaded in the circus of Rome. The emperor, in his place, was proclaimed the successor of Theodosius, when he received the news of the victory, interrupted the horse-races, and singing, as he marched through the streets, a suitable psalm, conducted his people from the hippodrome to the church, where he spent the remainder of the day in grateful devotion.2 1 In a monarchy, which, according to various precedents, might be considered as elective, or hereditary, or patrimonial, it was impossible that the intricate claims of female and collateral succession should be clearly defined; and the Theodosians, by the right of consanguinity or conquest, might have reigned the sole legitimate emperor of the Romans. For a moment, perhaps, his eyes were dazzled by the prospect of unbounded sway; but his indolent temper gradually acquiesced in the dictates of sound policy. He contented himself with the possession of the east; and wisely relinquished the laborsious task of waging a distant and doubtful war against the barbarians beyond the Alps; or of securing the obedience of the Italians and Africans, whose minds were alienated by the irreconcilable difference of language and interest. Instead of listening to the voice of ambition, Theodosius resolved to imitate the moderation of his grandfather, and seat his cousin Valentinian on the throne of the west. The royal infant was distinguished at Constantinople by the title of Niccolaus, and he beheld his departure to Thessalonica, to the rank and dignity of Cæsar; and, after the conquest of Italy, the patriotic Helen, by the authority of Theodosius, and in the presence of the senate, saluted Valentinian the third by the name of Augustus, and solemnly invested him with the crown and purple.2 By the agreement of the three females who governed the Roman world, the son of Placidia was betrothed to Eudoxia, the daughter of Theodosius and Athenais; and, as soon as the lover and his bride had attained the age of puberty, this honourable alliance was faithfully concluded, unless for the expenses of the war, the western Illyricum was detached from the Italian dominions, and yielded to the throne of Constantinople.1 The emperor of the east acquired the useful dominion of the rich maritime province of Dalmatia, and the dangerous source of seditions and disorders was filled and ravaged above twenty years by a promiscuous crowd of Huns, Ostrogoths, Vandals, and Bæcarii. Theodosius and Valentinian continued to respect the obligations of their public and domestic alliance; but the unity of the Roman government was finally diverted from the imperial to the cancellar.1 All future laws was limited to the dominions of their peculiar aunt; unless he should think proper to communicate them, subscribed with his own hand, for the approbation of his independent colleague.

Administration of the mother of Valentinian, Placidia, of age; and his long minority was intrusted to the guardian care of a mother, who might assert a female claim to the succession of the western empire. Placidia envied, but she could not equal, the reputation and virtues of the wife and sister of Theodosius; the elegant genius of Eudoxia, the wise and successful policy of Pulcheria. The mother of Valentinian was jealous of the power which she was incapable of exercising;2 she reigned twenty-five years, in the name of her son; and the character of that unworthy and blamable youth was too well known to the world. Placidia had envyraded his youth by a dissolute education, and studiously diverted his attention from every manly and honourable pursuit. Amidst the decay of military spirit, her armies were commanded by two generals, Aniés3 and Boniface,4 who may be deservedly named as the last of the Romans. Their union might have supported a sinking empire; their discord was the fatal and immediate cause of the loss of Africa. The invasion and defeat of Attila, have immortalized the name of Aniés; but though this was ascribed to the valor and valour of the warrior, which had once tempted him to retire from the battle, the people applauded his spotless integrity: the army dreaded his equal and inexorable justice, which may be displayed in a very singular example: A peasant, who complained of the criminal intimacy between his wife and a Gothic soldier, was directed to attend his tribunal the following day; in the evening the country, who had diligently inquired of himself the time and place of the assignation, mounted his horse, rode ten miles into the country, surprised the guilty couple, punished the soldier with instant death, and silenced the complaints of the husband, by presenting him with his head. The abilities of Aniés and Boniface might have been usefully employed against the public enemies, in separate and important commands; but the experience of their past conduct should have decided the real favour and confidence of the emperor Placidia. In the same holy season of dissolution and confusion, Boniface alone maintained his cause with unwavering fidelity; and the troops and treasures of Africa had essentially contributed to extinguish the rebellion. The same rebellion had been supported by the zeal and activity of Aniés, who brought an army of sixty thousand Huns from the Danube, to the confines of Italy, for the service of the Usurper. The untimely death of John compelled him to accept an advantageous treaty; but he still continued, the subject and the soldier of Valentinian, to entertain a secret, perhaps a treasonable correspondence with his ancient, whose retreat had been purchased by liberal gifts, and more liberal promises. But Aniés possessed an advantage of singular moment in a female reign: he was present: he besieged, with artful and assiduous flattery, the palace of Raveena; disguised his dark designs with the appearance of loyalty; and at length seduced the royal mistress. Placidia, with his mistresst and his absent rival, by a subtle conspiracy, which a weak woman, and a brave man could not easily suspect. He secretly persuaded, Placidia to recall Boniface from the government of Africa; he secretly advised Aniés to dismiss the imperial troops. He proposed to the one, he represented the order as a sentence of death; to the other he stated the refusal as a signal of revolt; and when the cralous and unsuspecting count had armed the province in his defence, Aniés applauded his sagacity in foreseeing the rebellion, which his own perfidy had excited. A tempestuous inquiry into the real motives of Boniface, would have restored a faithful servant to his duty, and to the republic; but the arts of Aniés still continued to betray and inflame, and the count was urged, by persecution, to embrace the most infamous counsels. The success with which he eluded or repelled the first attacks, could not inspire a vain confidence, that, at the head of some loose, disorderly Africans, he should be able to withstand the regular forces of the west, commanded by a rival, whose military character it was impossible for the emperor to despise. Aniés, according to the last struggles of prudence and loyalty, Boniface despatched a trusty friend to the court, or rather to the 1 Procopius (De Bell. Vandal. 1, 1, 3, 4, p. 192—195) relates the fraud of Aniés, the revolt of Boniface, and the loss of Africa. This narrative is particularly abridged, which has been corroborated by the chroniclers; but the ruin and desolation, which befell the Roman empire in the reign of Valentinian and Amalasuntha, is more accurately related by the historian Huns. camp, of Gonderic, king of the Vandals, with the proposal of a strict alliance, and the offer of an advantageous and perpetual settlement.

He invites the Vandals, A.D. 429.

After the retreat of the Goths, the authority of Honorius had obtained a precarious establishment in Spain; except only in the province of Gallicia, where the Suevi and the Vandals had fortified their camps, in mutual discord, and hostile independence. The Vandals prevailed, and activity of their adversaries, were marches, under the threat of devastation, by the Vandals under the command of their warlike king; and they ravaged, with equal authority over the Alani, who had been promised to them by the emperor, from the cold of Scythia to the excessive heat of an African climate. The hopes of the bold enterprise had excited many brave adventurers of the Gothic nation; and many desperate provincials were tempted to repair their fortunes by the same means which had occasioned their ruin. But this various multitude amounted only to fifty thousand effective men; and though Genseric skilfully magnified his apparent strength, by appointing eighty chiliparchi, or commanders of thousands, the false air of his huge force and untractable race of men, whose savage temper had been exaggerated, rather than reclaimed, by their dread of the Roman arms. The wandering Moors, as they gradually ventured to approach the sea-shore, and the camp of the Vandals, must have viewed with terror and astonishment the dress, the armament, the martial pride and discipline of the unknown strangers who had landed on their coast; and the fair complexes of the blue-eyed warriors of Germany formed a very singular contrast with the swarthy or olive hue, which they derived from the woods and valleys of mount Atlas.

After the most difficult had in some measure been removed, which arose from the mutual ignorance of their respective language, the Moors, regardless of any future consequence, embraced the alliance of the enemies of Rome; and a crowd of naked savages rushed from the woods and valleys of mount Atlas, to satiate their revenge on the polished tyrants, who had injuriously expelled them from the native sovereignty of the land.

The persecution of the Donatists, an event of less importance, the Donatists, seventeen years before he landed in Africa, a public conference was held at Carthage, by the order of the magistrate. The Moors, instead of being satisfied, that, after the invincible reasons which they had alleged, the obstinacy of the schismatics must be inexorable and voluntary; and the emperor Honorius was persuaded to inflict the most rigorous penalties on a faction, which had so long abused his patience and clemency. Three hundred bishops, with many thousands of the inferior clergy, were torn from their churches, stripped of their ecclesiastical writers, who have marked for that event, one of the two preceding years. Genseric, king of the Vandals. Genseric; a name, which, in the destruction of the Roman empire, has deserved an equal rank of honour among the Vandals. The king of the Vandals is described to have been of a middle stature, with a lameness in one leg, which he had contracted by an accidental fall from his horse. His slow and cautious speech seldom declared the deep purposes of his soul; he displeased to imitate the luxury of the Gauls, and to multiply the noise of his passions of anger and revenge. The ambition of Genseric was without bounds, and without scruples; and the warrior could dexterously employ the dark engines of policy to-sollicit the allies who might be useful to his end, or to satisfy his vanity among his enemies, by giving the seeds of hatred and contention. Almost in the moment of his departure he was informed, that Hermeric, king of the Suevi, had presumed to ravage the Spanish territories, which he was resolved to abandon. Impatient of the insult, Genseric pursued the hasty retreat of the Suevi as far as Merida; precipitated the king and his army into the river Ana; and calmly returned to the sea-shore, to embark his victorious troops. The vessels which transported the Vandals over the modern straits of Gibraltar, a channel only twelve miles in breadth, were furnished by the Spaniards, who anxiously wished their departure; and by the African general, who had implored their formidable assistance.

Our fancy, so long accustomed to review his army, exaggerate and multiply the martial swarms of barbarians that seemed to issue from the north, will perhaps be surprised by the account of the army which Genseric mustered on the coast of Mauritania. The Vandals, who in twenty years had penetrated from the Elbe to mount Atlas, were united under the command of their warlike king; and he reigned with equal authority over the Alani, who had been promised to them by the emperor, from the cold of Scythia to the excessive heat of an African climate. The hopes of the bold enterprise had excited many brave adventurers of the Gothic nation; and many desperate provincials were tempted to repair their fortunes by the same means which had occasioned their ruin. But this various multitude amounted only to fifty thousand effective men; and though Genseric skilfully magnified his apparent strength, by appointing eighty chiliparchi, or commanders of thousands, the false air of his huge force and untractable race of men, whose savage temper had been exaggerated, rather than reclaimed, by their dread of the Roman arms. The persecution of the Donatists, was an event of less importance, the Donatists, seventeen years before he landed in Africa, a public conference was held at Carthage, by the order of the magistrate. The Moors, instead of being satisfied, that, after the invincible reasons which they had alleged, the obstinacy of the schismatics must be inexorable and voluntary; and the emperor Honorius was persuaded to inflict the most rigorous penalties on a faction, which had so long abused his patience and clemency. siastical possessions, banished to the islands, and proscribed by the laws, if they presumed to conceal themselves. The circumstances of Africa, with her enormous congregations, both in cities and in the country, were deprived of the rights of the citizens, and of the exercise of religious worship. A regular scale of fines, from ten to two hundred pounds of silver, was curiously ascertained, according to the distinctions of rank and fortune, to the imposition of the possessors of each existing at a schismatical convention; and if the fine had been levied five times, without subduing the obstinacy of the offender, his future punishment was referred to the discretion of the imperial court. 1 By these severities, which obtained the warmest approbation of the clergy, the schismatics were reconciled to the church: but the fanatics, who still persevered in their opposition, were provoked to madness and despair; the distracted country was filled with tumult and bloodshed; the armed troops of Circumcellions alternately pointed their steel at each other, or against the council-spheres; and the calendar of martyrs received on both sides a considerable augmentation. 2 Under these circumstances, Genseric, a christian, but an enemy of the orthodox communion, showed himself to the Donatists as a powerful deliverer, from whom they might reasonably expect support and protection. The severest edicts of the Roman emperors. 3 The conquest of Africa was facilitated by the active zeal, or the secret favour, of its domestic faction; the wanton outrages against the churches and the clergy, of which the Vandals are accused, may be fairly imputed to the fanaticism of the Insubrian spirit, which disgraced the triumph of Christianity, contributed to the loss of the most important province of the west. 4

Tardy repentance of Boniface. The court and the people were astonished by the strange intelligence, that a powerful general, with his troops, and in so many services, had renounced his allegiance, and invited the barbarians to destroy the province intrusted to his command. The friends of Boniface, who still believed that his criminal behaviour might be excused by some honourable motive, solicited, during the absence of the emperor, Messalla, and Darius, an officer of high distinction, was named for the important embassy. 5 In their first interview at Carthage, the imaginary provocations were mutually explained; the opposite letters of Ætius were produced and compared; and the fraud was easily detected. Boniface had accused the Vandal leaders of vices that were not to be found among them; and the death of a citizen, which was ascribed to the Schismatic, and the death of a barbarian, which was ascribed to the Vandal, was determined to be the result of accidental causes; but the public accusation of the emperor was unfounded and a fatal error; and the count had sufficient magnanimity to confide in the forgiveness of his sovereign, or to expose his head to future resentment. His repose was long, current and sweet; but he soon discovered, that it was no longer in his power to restore the edifice which he had shaken to its foundations. Carthage, and the Roman garrisons, returned with their general to the allegiance of Valentinian; but the rest of Africa was still distracted with war and faction; and the inexpressible or the king of the Vandals, declining all terms of accommodation, was reduced to renounce the possession of his prey. The band of veterans, who marched under the standard of Boniface, and his hasty levies of provincial troops, were defeated with considerable loss: the victorious barbarians insulted the open country; and Carthage, Cirta, and Hippo Regius, were the only places that appeared to rise above the general inundation.

The long and narrow track of the African coast was filled with frequent monuments of Roman art and magnificence; and the respective degrees of improvement might be accurately measured by the distance from Carthage and the Mediterranean. A simple reflection will impress every thinking mind with the clearest idea of fertility and cultivation: the country was extremely populous; the inhabitants reserved a liberal subsistence for their own use; and the annual exportation might be estimated at 40,000 talents, which, after the first levies, was considered as a moderate tribute. Their agriculture, their manufactures, and their commerce, and the losses of the valiant countrymen were expiated by the ruin of the cities under whose walls they had fallen. Careless of the distinctions of age, or sex, or rank, they employed every species of indignity and torture, to force from the captives a discovery of their property, and the men of flesh and the women of fortune, and the deaths of their valiant countrymen were expiated by the ruin of the cities under whose walls they had fallen. The generous mind of count Boniface 6 of Hippo, was tortured by the exquisite distress A.D. 429, May, of beholding the ruin which he had occasioned, and whose rapid progress he witnessed. After the loss of a battle, he retired into Hippo Regius, where he was immediately besieged by an enemy, who considered him as the real bulwark of Africa. The maritime colony of Hippo, 7 about two hundred

1 The fifth title of the sixteenth book of the Theodorus Calo, exhibits a series of the imperial laws against the Donatists, from the year 340 to the year 426. Of those the fifth law, promulgated by Honorius, A.D. 414, is the most severe and effectual.
2 St. Augustin altered his opinion with regard to the proper treatment of heretics. His patriotic declamation of pity and indulgence for the Manichees, has been inserted by Mr. Locke, (vol. iii. p. 469,) among the choice specimens of his commonplace book. Another philosopher, the celebrated Boyle, Tom. ii. p. 441—442, has reduced with superfluous difference and ingenuity, the arguments, by which the unbelief of Hippo justified, in his old age, the persecution of the Donatists.

The existence of these voluminous works, of which Ambrose and St. Augustin asserted, and probably with truth, that these numbers were much exaggerated; but he sternly maintained that it was better that some should burn themselves in this world, than that all should burn in hell damnation.
4 According to St. Augustin and Theodoret, the Donatists were instructed to the principles, or at least to the party, of the Arian, which Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of Nyssa,

The circumstances of these various disasters, and the execution of the excommunication in heaven as well as on earth, has observed the apparent connexion of the Vandals and the Donatists. Under the reign of the barbarians, the whole province was pillaged in ten years; at the end of which time, we may ascend them by the light of the innumerable disasters which have been attributed to the Donatists in the sixth and seventh centuries, A.D. 429—512. 1 6 In a confidential letter to count Boniface, St. Augustin, without exasperating his talents, power, and authority, to charge the duties of a christian and a subject; to extricate himself without delay from his dangerous and guilty situation; and even, if he could obtain the consent of his wife, to embrace a life of celibacy and penance. miles westward of Carthage, had formerly acquired the distinguishing epithet of Regius, from the residence of Numidian kings; and some remains of trade and population still attached to it to the modern name of Bonn. The military labors and anxious reflections, of count Boniface, were alleviated by the edifying conversation of his friend St. Augustin; till that bishop, the light and pillar of the Catholic church, was gently released, in the third month of the siege, and in the seventy-sixth year of his age, from the actual and the impending calamities of his country. The youth of Augustin had been stained, by the vices and errors, which he so ingeniously confesses, but he preserved his honor; and preserved to that day that on his death the manners of the bishop of Hippo were pure and austere; and the most conspicuous of his virtues was an ardent zeal against heretics of every denomination; the Manichaeans, the Donatists, and the Pelagians, against whom he waged a perpetual controversy. When the city, some months after his death, was burnt by the Vandals, the library was fortunately saved, which contained his voluminous writings; two hundred and thirty-two separate books or treatises on theological subjects, besides a complete exposition of the psalms and the gospel, and a copious magazine of the Alexandrian fathers. Augustin, in the most impartial criticisms, the superficial learning of Augustin was confined to the Latin language; and his style, though sometimes animated by the eloquence of passion, is usually clouded by false and affected rhetoric. But he possessed a strong, capacious, argumentative mind; he boldly sounded the deep abyss of grace, predestination, free-will, and original sin; and the rigid system of Christianity, which he framed or restored, has been entertained, with public applause, and secret reluctance, by the Latin church.

Defeat and re- treat of Boniface.

By the ignorance of the Vandals, the siege of Hippo was protracted above fourteen months; the sea was continually open; and when the adjacent country had been exhausted by rigorous rapine, the besiegers themselves were compelled by famine to relinquish their enterprise. The importance and danger of Africa were deeply felt by the regent of the west. Placidus implored the assistance of her eastern ally; and the Italian fleet and army were re-inforced by Aspar, who sailed from Constantinopile with a powerful contingent. As soon as the Vandals were invested, his empire was united under the command of Boniface; he boldly marched against the Vandals; and the loss of a second battle irretrievably decided the fate of Africa. He embarked with the precipitation of despair; and the people of Hippo were permitted, with their families and effects, to occupy the vacant place of the soldiers, the greatest part of whom were either slain or taken prisoners, which is recorded in Europe by the corrupted name of Bonn.

Death of St. Augustin.

A.D. 430.

Aug. 28.

The republic was deprived, by the mutual discord, of an army, of barbarian followers; and such was the weakness of the government, that the two generals decided their private quarrel in a bloody battle. His death, A.D. 430, was mourned in the three provinces of Boniface was successful; but he received in the conflict a mortal wound from the spear of his adversary, of which he expired within a few days, in such christian and charitable sentiments, that he exalted his wife, a rich heiress of Spain, to accept aius for her second husband. But Aitus could not derive any immediate advantage from the generosity of his donors, and the judgment of the most impartial critics, the superficial learning of Augustin was confined to the Latin language; and his style, though sometimes animated by the eloquence of passion, is usually clouded by false and affected rhetoric. But he possessed a strong, capacious, argumentative mind; he boldly sounded the deep abyss of grace, predestination, free-will, and original sin; and the rigid system of Christianity, which he framed or restored, has been entertained, with public applause, and secret reluctance, by the Latin church. He embordered with the precipitation of despair; and the people of Hippo were permitted, with their families and effects, to occupy the vacant place of the soldiers, the greatest part of whom were either slain or taken prisoners, which is recorded in Europe by the corrupted name of Bonn.

The discovery of his fraud, the displeasure of the empress, and the distinguished favour of his rival exasperated the haughty spirit of Aitus. He hastily returned from Gaul to Italy, with a retinue of barbarians, and an army, of barbarian followers; and such was the weakness of the government, that the two generals decided their private quarrel in a bloody battle. His death, A.D. 430, was mourned in the three provinces.

It might naturally be expected, after the retreat of Boniface, that the Vandals would achieve, without resistance or delay, the conquest of Africa. Eight years were however elapsed, from the evacuation of Hippo to the reduction of Carthage. In the midst of that interval, the ambitious Geneseric, in the full tide of apparent prosperity, negociated a treaty of peace, by which he gave his son Hunneric for a hostage; and consented to leave the western emperor in the undisputed possession of the three Mauritanias. This moderation, which cannot be imputed to the justice, must be ascribed to the policy, of the conqueror. His throne was encompassed with domestic enemies; who accused the baseness of his birth, and asserted the legitimate claims of his nephew. Before the hour of his death, he had concluded, by the sacrifice of his principles and of his life, to adhere to his safety; and his mother, the widow of the deceased king, was precipitated by his order, into the river Ampsaga. But the public discontent burst forth in dangerous and frequent conspiracies; and a rival tyrant is supposed to have reduced more Vandol blood by the hand of the executioner, than in the field of battle. The convulsions of Africa, which had favoured his attack, opposed the firm establishment of his power; and the various seditions of the Moors and Germans, the Donatists and catholics, continually disturbed, or threatened, the unsettled reign of the conqueror. As he advanced towards Carthage, he was forced to withdraw his troops from the western provinces; the sea-coast was exposed to the naval enterprises of the Romans of Spain and Italy; and in the heart of Numidia, the strong inland city of Cirta still persisted in obstinate independence. These difficulties were gradually assailed by the Gracchi, the foremost and truest patrons of Greece. P., who alternately applied the arts of peace and war to the establishment of his African kingdom. He subscribed a solemn treaty, with the hope of deriving some advantage from the term of its continuance, and the moment of its violation. The vigilance of his enemies was relaxed, and he publicly taught of himself, which ceased his hostile approach; and Carthage was at length surprised by the Vandals, five hundred and eighty-five years after the destruction of the city and republic by the younger Scipio.1

A new city had arisen from its ruins, with the title of a colony; and though to the trade of Alexandria, or the splendour of Antioch, she still maintained the second rank in the west; as the prime (if we may use the style of contemporary times) of the cities of the world. Territorial and appulent metropolises displayed in a dependent condition, the image of a flourishing republic. Carthage contained the manufactures, the arms, and the treasures of the six provinces. A regular subordination of civil honours gradually ascended from the procurators of the metropolis to the president of the court, and that of the metropolis was carried on. The buildings of Carthage were uniform and magnificent; a shady grove was planted in the midst of the capital; the new port, a secure and capacious harbour, was subservient to the commercial industry of citizens and foreigners; and the splendid games of the circus and theatre were exhibited almost in the presence of the barbarians. The reputation of the Carthaginians was not equal to that of their country, and the reproach of Punic faith still adhered to their subtle and faithless character. The habits of trade, the pride of luxury, the prodigal corruption of the people; but their impious contempt of monks, and the shameful practice of unnatural lusts, are the two abominations which excite the pious vehemence of Salvian, the preacher of the age.2 The king of the Vandals severely reformed the vices of a voluptuous people; and the ancient, noble, ingenuous freedom of Carthage (these expressions of Victor are not without energy) was reduced by Geuseric into a state of ignominious servitude. After he had permitted his licentious troops to satiate their rage and avarice, he instituted a more regular system of rapine and oppression. An edict was promulgated, which enjoined all persons, without fraud or delay, to deliver their gold, silver, jewels, and valuable furniture or apparel, to the royal officers; and the attempt to secrete any part of their patrimony, was inexorably punished with an ignominious death, and the annihilation of the state. The lands of the procouslars province, which formed the immediate district of Carthage, were accurately measured, and divided among the barbarians; and the conqueror reserved for his peculiar domain the fertile territory of Byzacianum, and the adjacent parts of Numidia and Gna.3

It was not enough that Geuseric African exile should hate those whom he had injured: and captives, the nobility and senators of Carthage were exposed to his jealousy and resentment; and all those who refused the ignominious terms, which their honour and religion forbade them to accept, were compelled by the Aryan tyrant to embrace the condition of perpetual banishment. Rome, Italy, and the provinces of the east, were filled with a crowd of exiles, of fugitives, and of ingenuous captives, who solicited the public compassion; and the benevolent epistles of Theodoret still preserved the friendship of Christianity and Maria.4 The Syrian bishop deplores the misfortunes of Cælestian, who, from the state of a noble and opulent senator of Carthage, was reduced, with his wife and family, and servants, to beg his bread in a foreign country; but he applauds the resignation of the christian exile, and the philosophic temper, which, under the pressure of such calamities, could enjoy more real happiness than was the ordinary lot of wealth and prosperity. The story of Maria, the daughter of the magnificent Eudoxian, is singular and interesting. In the sack of Carthage, she was purchased from the Vandals by some merchants of Syria, who afterwards sold her to a slave-dealer, and subjected her to the privations of the slave-exchange. A female attendant, transported in the same ship, and sold in the same family, still continued to respect a mistress whom Fortune had reduced to the common level of servitude; and the daughter of Eudoxian received from her grateful affection the domestic services which she had once required from her obedience. This remarkable behaviour divulged the real condition of Maria, who, in the absence of the bishop of Cyrinus, was redeemed from slavery by the generosity of some soldiers of the garrison. The personal and public liberality of Eudoxian sufficed to gain the esteem of Maria; and she passed ten months among the dependences of the church; till she was unexpectedly informed, that her father, who had escaped from the ruin of Carthage, exercised an honourable office in one of the western provinces. Her filial impatience was seconded by Theodoret; provided for her support in Italy, and, in letter still extant, recommends Maria to the bishop of Agige, a maritime city of Cilicia, which was frequented during the annual processions of the vessels of the west; most earnestly requesting, that his colleague would use the maiden with a tenderness suitable to her birth; that he would confide to her the management of such faithful merchants; as would esteem it a sufficient gain, if they restored a daughter, lost beyond all human hope, to the arms of her afflicted parent.

The THE DECLINE AND FALL

by the Vandals. 1 When the emperor Decius persecuted the christians, seven noble youths of Ephesus concealed themselves in a spacious cavern in the side of an adjacent mountain; where they were doomed to perish by the tyrant, who gave orders that the entrance should be firmly secured with a pile of huge stones. They immediately fell into a deep slumber, who through the influence of holy books had escaped the powers of life, during a period of one hundred and eighty-seven years. At the end of that time, the slavés of Adolius, to whom the inheritance of the mountain had descended, removed the stones, to supply materials for some rustic edifice; the light of the sun then entered the cavern, and instantly the Sleepers were permitted to awake. After a slumber, as they thought of a few hours, they were pressed by the calls of hunger; and resolved that Jamblichus, one of their number, should secretly return to the city, to purchase bread for the use of his companions. The youth (if we may still employ that appellation) could no longer recognize the once familiar aspect of his native country; and his surprise was increased by the appearance of a large cross, triumphantly erected over the principal gate of Ephesus. His singular dress and language, which resembled the Hebrew, to whom he offered an ancient medal of Decius as the current coin of the empire; and Jamblichus, on the suspicion of a secret treasure, was dragged before the judge. Their mutual inquiries produced the amazing discovery, that two centuries were almost elapsed since of the destruction of Ephesus and his friends had escaped from the rage of a pagan tyrant. The bishop of Ephesus, the clergy, the magistrates, the people, and, as it is said, the emperor Theodosius himself, hastened to visit the cavern of the Seven Sleepers; who bestow'd on them their protection, and at the same instant peaceably expired. The origin of this marvellous fable cannot be ascribed to the pious fraud and credulity of the modern Greeks, since the authentic tradition may be traced within half a century of the supposed miracle. James of Sarug, a Syrian bishop, who was born only two years after the death of the younger Theodosius, has devoted one of his two hundred and thirty homilies to the praise of the young men of Ephesus. 2 Their legend, before the end of the sixth century, was translated from the Syriac into the Latin language, by the care of Gregory of Tours. The hostile incursions of the east preserve their memory with equal reverence; and their names are honorably inscribed in the Roman, the Halybystian, and the Russian calendar. 3 Nor has their reputation been confined to the christian world. The sixth Apostle, whom Mahomet has learned to be, he drove his camels to the fairs of Syria, is introduced, as a divine revelation, into the Koran. 4 The story of

1 Two Syriac writers, as they are quoted by Assemani, (Bibl. Oriente, tom. i. p. 286, 288) place the resurrection of the Seven Sleepers in the year 376. (A. D. 523.) or 746. (A. D. 627.) of the era of the Seleucidae. Their Greek acts, which Photius had read, as he was then in the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Theodosius, may have coincided either with A. D. 429, or 446. The period which has been assigned to the resurrection of Decius or Christ is equally uncertain, and nothing less than the ignorance of Mahomet, or the legends, could suppose an interval of three or four hundred years.

2 James, one of the orthodox fathers of the Syriac church, was born A. D. 452; he began to compose his sermons A. D. 474; he was made a bishop in the diocese of Tyre, and province of the coponathia, A. D. 519, and died A. D. 521. (Assemani, tom. i. p. 285, 286.) For the homily of Priscian Eusebius, see p. 322.—though I could wish that Assemani had translated the text of James of Sarug, instead of answering the objections of Baronius.

3 Among the acts of the apostles, (Acts, x. 29, 30.) and amongst the homilies of Alcuin, we find, that Mahomet, had advanced no farther than the 7th day of October. The suppression of the Jews has most probably checked an undertaking, which would have occupied a vast extent of time. The Romish communions of the world were on the eve of a new triumph, much historical and philosophical instruction.

4 See Marcellus Alicorn, Socr. xxi. tom. i. p. 289—307, and tom. i. part iv. p. 103. With such an ample privilege, Mahomet has not shown much taste or ingenuity. He has invented the dog (At Rasin) 225, which they resolved to keep for course twice a day, that he might smite into the cavern: and the care of God himself, who preserved the bodies of the fathers from putrefaction, by turning them to the right and left.

6 See Paul, the despot of Kasel (Frangois Langoisbardum, l. c. p. 475, 476, edit. Grat.), who lived toward the end of the eighth century, has placed a cavern, under a rock, on the shore of the ocean, the Seven Sleepers of the north, whose long repose was respected by the Barbarians. Their dire declared them to be Romans, and they were commended by the Roman senate, to be evidence as the future apostles of those unbelieving countries.

I have not found any mention of Alcuin, in the works of Julius, Iusnus Damastinus, in the tenth century, or by Nicholas Olushi, archbishop of Grin, in the sixteenth. See Guevios History of the Germans, ii. 33, and Maffio Ostervazi Latinate. tom. i. pp. 88, 89. Whatever the modern Hungarians may have said of Alcuin, they do not seem to have excelled in the art of fiction. They suppose, that when Atilla invaded Gaul and Italy, married innumerable wives, &c. he was one hundred and twenty years of age. Thwaites Criton, p. 122, in Script. Hungar. tom. i. p. 76.
In the title of emigration, which immediately followed the conquest of Hungary.

China to those of Germany, the most powerful and populous tribes may commonly be found in Hungary. The Hungarians, who were captured by the blood of Attila, among their native kings, may affirm, with truth, that the horses, which were subject to his uncle Rums, or Rugillas, had formed their encampments within the limits of modern Hungary, and that the emperor should abdicate all treaties and engagements with the enemies of the Huns; and that all the fugitives, who had taken refuge in the court, or provinces, of Theodosius, should be delivered to the justice of their offended sovereign. This justice was frequently inflicted on some unfortunate youths of the royal race. They were crucified on the territories of the empire, by the command of Attila: and as soon as the king of the Huns had impressed the Romans with the terror of his name, he induced them in a short and arbitrary respite, whilst he subdued the rebellious or independent nations of Sestynia and Gaul.

Attila, the son of Mundzuk, deduced his figure and his noble, perhaps his regal, descent character, from the ancient Huns, who had formerly contended with the moorish of China. His features, according to the observation of a Gothic historian, bore the mark of a savage and a barbarian. He exhibited the genuine deformity of a modern Calmuck—a large head, a swarthy complexion, small deep-setted eyes, a flat nose, a few hairs in the place of a beard, broad shoulders, and a short square body, of nervous strength, though of a disproportioned form. The formidable step of one so ugly could be expressed the consciousness of his superiority above the rest of mankind; and he had a custom of fiercely rolling his eyes, as if he wished to enjoy the terror which he inspired. Yet this savage hero was not inaccessible to pity; his suppliant enemies might conjure in the name of peace or pardon; and Attila was considered by his subjects as a just and indulgent master. He delighted in war; but, after he had ascended the throne in a mature age, his head, rather than his hand, achieved the conquest of the north; and the fame of an adventurous soldier was usefully exchanged for that of a prudent and successful general. The effects of personal valor are so inconsiderable, except in poetry or romance, that victory, even among barbarians, must depend on the degree of skill, with which the passions of the multitude are combined and guided for the service of a single man. The Sycythin and Zingis, who were topass themselves as conquerors, and as conquerors to surpass their countrymen in art, rather than in courage; and it may be observed, that the monarchs, both of the Huns and of the Moguls, were erected by their founders on the basis of popular superstition. The miraculous conception, which fraud and credulity ascribed to the virgin-mother of the Moguls, raised him in the eye of human nature; and the naked prophet, who, in the name of the Deity, invested him with the empire of the earth, pointed the value of the Moguls with irresistible enthusiasm. The religious arts of Attila were not less skilfully adapted to the character of his age and country. It was natural enough, that the Scythians should adore, with peculiar devotion, the god of war; but as they were incapable of forming either an abstract idea, or a corporeal representation, they worshipped their tutelar deity under the symbol of an iron cimeter. One of the shepherds of 6 Compare Jordanus de vertices, tom. iii. p. 561, with Buffon, Hist. Naturale, tom. iii. p. 560. The former had a right to observe, original line are join and demolish. The character and portrait of Attila are probably transferred from the massacres of the Thuringians, and the Tillemon, who always depends on the faith of his ecclesiastical authors, strenuousness in his conclusions. (Hist. des Emp. tom. vi. p. 126, 670.) that the wars and personages were not the same.

The Huns perceived, that a heifer, who was grazing, had wounded herself in the foot, and curiously followed the track of the blood, till he discovered, among the long grass, the hasty wound which the hoof had dug on the ground, and presented to Attila. That magnanimous, or rather that artful, prince, accepted, with pious gratitude, this celestial favour; and, as the rightful possessor of the sword of Mars, asserted his divine and inalienable dominion to the dominion of the earth.

If the veneration of Scythia was profaned in this solemn occasion, a lofty altar, or rather pile of faggots, three hundred yards in length and in breadth, was raised in a spacious plain; and the sword of Mars was placed erect on the summit of this rustic altar, which was annually consecrated by the blood of scape-horses, and of the hundredth captive.

Whether human sacrifices formed any part of the worship of Attila, or whether he propitiating the god of war with the victims which he continually offered in the field of battle, the favourite of Mars soon acquired a sacred character, which rendered his conquests of last and more permanent; and the barbarian princes confessed, in the language of devotion or flattery, that they could not presume to gaze, with a steady eye, on the divine majesty of the king of the Huns.

His brother Bleda, who reigned over a considerable part of his dominions, was more penetrated with this sceptre of his life. Yet even this cruel act was attributed to a supernatural impulse; and the vigour with which Attila wielded the sword of Mars, convinced the world, that it had been reserved alone for his invincible arm.

But the extent of his empire affords the only evidence of its greatness, and instance, of his victories; and the Scythian monarch, however ignorant of the value of science and philosophy, might, perhaps, lament, that his illustrious subjects were destitute of the art which could perpetuate the splendour of his exploits, and acquire the empire of Scy-thia and Ger-many.

He alone, among the conquerors of ancient and modern times, united the two mighty kingdoms of Germany and Scythia; and those vague appellations, when they are applied to his reign, may be understood with an ample latitude. Thuringius, which stretched beyond its actual limits as far as the Danube, and was in the number of his provinces; he interposed, with the weight of a powerful neighbour, in the domestic affairs of the Franks; and one of his lieutenants chastised, and almost exterminated, the Burgundians of the Rhine. He subdued the islands of the ocean, the king-rcins of Scandinavia, encompassed and divided by the waters of the Baltic; and the Huns might derive a tribute of furs from that northern region, which has been protected from all other conquerors by the severity of the climate and the courage of the natives. Towards the east, it is difficult to circumscribe an equal empire with the empire of the Scythian deserts; yet we may be assured that he reigned the banks of the Volga; that the king of the Huns was dreaded not only as a warrior, but as a magician; that he insulted and vanquished the Khan of the formidable Gojgean; and that he sent ambassadors to negociate an equal partition with the empire of China. In the proud review of the nations who acknowledged the sovereignty of Attila, and who never entertained, during his life-time, the thought of a revolt, the Gepidae and the Ostrogoths were distinguished by their numbers, their bravery, and the personal merit of their chiefs. The renowned Ardaric, king of the Ostrogoths, was the faithful and sagacious counsellor of the monarch, who esteemed his intrepid genius, whilst he loved the mild and discreet virtues of the noble Wala-mir, king of the Ostrogoths. The crowd of vulgar kings, who lead the snowy mountains of Armenia; possessed the Tigris, the Euphrates, and the Halys; recruited their weary cavalry with the generous breed of Cappadocian horses; occupied the hilly country of Cilicia, and disturbed the festal songs, and dances, of the citizens of Antioch. Egypt trembled at their approach; and the ancient and pious Holy Land prepared to escape their fury by a speedy embarkation. The memory of this invasion was still recent in the minds of the Orientals. The subjects of Attila might execute, with superior forces, the design which these adventurers had so boldly attempted; and it soon became the subject of anxious conjecture, whether the

The most important events that would fall on the dominions of Rome or of Persia. Some of the great vessels of the king of the Huns, who were themselves in the rank of powerful princes, had been sent to ratify an alliance and society of arms with the emperor, or rather with the general, of the west. They related, during their residence at Rome, the breach of an engagement of peace, and that their knap, lately made into the east. After passing a desert and a morass, supposed by the Romans to be the lake Meotis, they penetrated through the mountains, and arrived, at the end of fifteen days' march, on the confines of Media; where they advanced as far as the unknown cities of Bashan. They entered, without resistance, the Persian army in the plains of Media; and the air, according to their own expression, was darkened by a cloud of arrows. But the Huns were obliged to retire before the numbers of the enemy. Their laborious retreat was effected by a different road; they lost the greatest part of their booty; and at length returned to the royal camp, with some knowledge of the country, and an impatient desire of revenge. In the free conversation of the imperial ambassadors, who discussed, at the court of Attila, the character and designs of their formidable enemy, the ministers of Constantinople expressed the hope of a speedy conclusion of a treaty of peace, with the sole purpose of defining the frontiers, and employed in a long and doubtfull contest with the princes of the house of Sassan. The more sagacious Italians admonished their eastern brethren of the folly and danger of such a hope; and convinced them, that the Medes and Persians were incapable of resisting the armies of the Huns; and, that the easy and important acquisition would exalt the pride, as well as power, of the conquerors. Instead of contenting himself with a moderate contribution, and a military title, which equalled him only to the generals of Theodosius, Attila would proceed to impose a disgraceful and intolerable yoke, the termination of the present war, and, perhaps, would then be encouraged, on all sides, by the empire of the Huns. They attack the empire. While the powers of Europe and Asia were solicitous to avert the impending disaster, the prince of the Vandals in the possession of Africa. An enterprise had been concerted between the courts of Ravenna and Constantinople, for the recovery of that valuable province; and the ports of Sicily were already filled with the military and naval forces of Thodosius. But the subtle Genseric, who spread his negociations round Italy and France, and sternly demanded the guilty prelate, the sacrilegious spoil, and the fugitive subjects, who had escaped from the justice of Attila. The refusal of the Byzantine court was the signal of war; and the Massilians at first applauded the generous fame of their sovereign. But they were soon intimidated by the destruction of Viminacium and the adjacent towns; and the people were persuaded to adopt the convenient maxim, that a private citizen, however innocent or respectable, may be justly sacrificed to the safety of his country. The bishop of Margus, who did not possess the spirit of a martyr, resolved to prevent the designs which he suspected. He boldly treated with the princes of the Huns; secured, by solemn oaths, his pardon and reward; posted a numerous guard, in spite of their numbers, in or near the banks of the Danube; and, at the appointed hour, opened, with his own hand, the gates of his episcopal city. This advantage, which had been obtained by treachery, served as a prelude to more honorable and decisive victories. The Illyrian frontier was covered by a line of castles; and the formidable part of them consisted only of a single tower, with a small garrison, they were commonly sufficient to repel, or to intercept, the inroads of an enemy, who was ignorant of the art, and impatient of the delay, of a regular siege. But these slight obstacles were instantly swept away by the incursion of the Huns. They destroyed, with fire and sword, the populous cities of Sinnum and Singidunum, of Ratiaria and Marcianopolis, of Naissus and Sardica; where every circumstance in the discipline of the people, and the construction of the buildings, had been gradually adapted to the sole purpose of defence. The whole extent of the empire of Europe, as it extends above five hundred miles from the Euxine to the Constaninople, was at once invaded, and occupied, and desolated, by the myriads of barbarians whom Attila led into the field. The public danger and distress could neither atone, however, for the Theodosian monuments, nor for the barbarian amusements and devotion, or to appear in person at the head of the Roman legions. But the troops, which had been sent against Genseric, were hastily recalled from Sicily; the garrisons, on the side of Persia, were exhausted; and a military force was collected in Europe, formidable, but trained from the campaigns which had understood the science of command, and their soldiers the duty of obedience. The armies of the eastern empire were vanquished in three successive engagements; and the progress of Attila may be traced by the fields of battle. The two former, on the banks of the Iius, and under the walls of Marcianopolis, were fought, in the extensive plains between the Danube and ancient Carnus. As the Romans were pressed by a victorious enemy, they gradually and unskillfully retired towards the Chersonesus of Thrace; and that narrow peninsula, the last extremity of the Roman empire, was taken and plundered by their third army. By the destruction of this army, Attila acquired the indisputable possession of the field. From the Hellespont to Thermopylae, and the suburbs of Constantinople, he ravaged, without resistance, and without mercy, the provinces of Thrace and Macedonia. He-racela and Hadrianople might perhaps escape this dreadful irruption of the Huns; but the words, the most expressive of total extirpation and ruin, are applied to the calamities which they inflicted on seventy cities of the eastern empire. Thodosius, his court, and the unwarlike people, were protected by the walls of Constantinople. But their third army was shaken by a recent earthquake, and the fall of fifty-eight towers had opened a large and tremendous breach. The damage indeed was speedily repaired; but this accident was aggravated by a superstitious fear, that Heaven itself had delivered the imperial city to the shepherds of Scythia, who were strangers to the laws, the language, and the religion, of the Romans.

2 Septimania civitates (v. vatica Tyrin) de desperatione vastatum seriee. The language and expression are parallel. The original work was accessible, however, to the writers, from whom we borrow our imperfect knowledge. Journand, Theophras- tus, and Hadrianus, and the Alexandrians, or Paschel, Chronicler. M. de Batin (Hist. des Peuples de P'Europe, tom. vii. c. x.) has examined the causes, the circumstanc- es, and the duration, of this war; and will not allow it to extend beyond the year four hundred and forty-four.
In all their invasions of the civilized Tartar wars, the Scythian or Median adventurers, empires of the south, the Scythian shepherd-herds have been uniformly averted by a savage and destructive force. The devastations of the Tartar and the exercise of national rape and murder, are founded on two principles of substantial interest: the knowledge of the permanent benefits which may be obtained by a moderate use of conquest; and a just apprehension, lest the desolation which we inflict on the enemy's country, might be reflected on our own. But these慎重 considerations of hope and fear are almost unknown in the pastoral state of nations. The Huns of Attila may, without injustice, be compared to the Moguls and Tartars, before their primitive manners were changed by religion and luxury; and the evidence of oriental history may reflect some of the dark and imperfect annals of Rome. After the Moguls had subdued the northern provinces of China, it was seriously proposed, not in the hour of victory and passion, but in calm deliberate council, to exterminate all the inhabitants of that populous country, whose vacant land might be converted to the pasture of cattle. The firmness of a Chinese mandarin, who insinuated some principles of rational policy into the mind of Zungis, diverted him from the execution of this horrid design. But in the cities of Asia, which yielded to the Moguls the submission of their laws by the rights of war, the exercise, with a regular form of discipline, which may, with equal reason, though not with equal authority, be imputed to the victorious Huns. The inhabitants, who had submitted to their discretion, were ordered to evacuate their houses, and to assemble in some place adjacent to the city; and a division was made of the vanquished into three parts: The first class consisted of the soldiers of the garrison, and of the young men capable of bearing arms; and their fate was instantly decided: they were either enlisted among the Moguls, or they were massacred on the spot by the soldiery of Dary, the Persian, and hundreds of bows, had formed a circle round the captive multitude. The second class, composed of the young and beautiful women, of the artificers of every rank and profession, and of the more wealthy or honorable citizens, from whose private ransom might be expected, was distributed in equal or proportionable lots. The remainder, whose life or death was alike useless to the conquerors, were permitted to return to the city; which, in the meanwhile, had been stripped of its valuable furniture; and a tax was imposed on those wretched inhabitants, according to the indignity of their condition. Such was the behaviour of the Moguls, when they were not conscious of any extraordinary rigor. But the most casual provocation, the slightest motive, of caprice or convenience, often provoked them to involve a whole people in an indiscriminate massacre; and the ruin of some flourishing cities was executed with such unrelenting perseverance, that, according to their own expression, horses might run, without stumbling, over the ground where they had once stood. The three great capitals of Khorasan, Maru, Neisa, and Herat, were destroyed by the armies of Zungis, and the population accounted for, which was slain, amounted to four millions three hundred and forty-seven thousand persons. Timur, or Tamerlane, was educated in a less barbarous age, and in the profession of the Mahometan religion; yet, if Attila equalled the hostile ravages of Tamerlane, either the Tartar or the Hun must deserve the epithet of the Scythian conquistador. It may be affirmed, with bolder assurance, that the Huns depopulated the provinces of the empire, by the number of Roman subjects whom they led away into captivity. In the hands of a wise legislator, such an industrious colony would have been of advantage, and the ruins of Scythia, the rudiments of the useful and ornamental arts; but these captives, who had been taken in war, were accidentally distributed among the hordes that obeyed the empire of Attila. The estimate of their respective value was formed by the simple judgment of uncultivated minds, and the imagination of the devastated inhabitants, who might not understand the merit of a theologian, profoundly skilled in the controversies of the Trinity and the Incarnation; yet they respected the ministers of every religion; and the active zeal of the Christian missionaries was useful to the propagation of the gospel. The pastoral tribes, who were ignorant of the distinction of landed property, must have disregarded the use, as well as the abuse, of civil jurisprudence; and the skill of an eloquent and virtuous advocate, whose influence might have been the abhorrence. The perpetual intercourse of the Huns and the Goths had communicated the familiar knowledge of the two national dialects; and the barbarians were ambitious of conversing in Latin, the military idiom, even of the eastern empire. But they declined the invocation of the church and the sciences, of the Greeks; and the vain sophist, or grave philosopher, who had enjoyed the flattering applause of the schools, was mortified to find, that his robust servant was a captive of more value and importance than himself. The mechanical arts were encouraged and esteemed, as they tended to satisfy the vanity of the conquerors. The Huns, whose chief genius, one of the favourites of Attila, was employed to construct a bath: but this work was a rare example of private luxury; and the trades of the smith, the carpenter, the armourer, were much more adapted to supply the wants of the invading hordes in their advance. The peace and war. But the merit of the physician was received with universal favour and respect; the barbarians who despised death, might be apprehensive of disease; and the haughty conqueror trembled in the presence of a captive, to whom he ascribed, perhaps, the effects of the sovereign influence of a living god in life. The Huns might be provoked to insult the misery of their slaves, over whom they exercised a de- 2 Cherefeddin Ali, his servile panegyrist, would afford us many hitherto unknown examples. In his camp before Delhi, Timur massacred 360,000 Indian prisoners, who had smiled when the army of their countrymen appeared in sight. (Hist. de Timur Ber, tom. iii, p. 590.) The people of Ispahan supplied 54,000 camel scalps for the structure of several lofty towers. (Id. tom. i, p. 474.) A similar tax was levied by the conqueror of Baghdad; (tom. ii, p. 19.) and Attila, in the account, which Cherefeddin was not able to procure from the proper officers, is stated by another historian (Ahmed Arabanud, tom. ii, p. 94.) to have already paid 300,000 heads. 3 The ancients,ators, posterity, of the conquerors, and of the conquered. One of the emperors of the Sung dynasty is represented as having the tongue of an advocate, and squawking up his mouth, observed with much satisfaction, that the viper could no longer hiss. Florus, iv. 114. 6 Florus, p. 59. It should seem that the Huns preferred the Gothic or Teutonic languages to their own; which was probably a barbar and harren idiom. 7 Philip de Comines, In his admirable picture of the last moments of Lewis XI, (Memoriae in memoriam., p. 162.) expresses the insouciance of his physician, who, in five months, exerted 54,000 crowns, and a rich bullion, from the stern avaricious tyrants.

The historian Priscus, whose embassy is a source of curious instruction, was accosted in the camp of Attila, by a stranger, who saluted him in the Greek language, but whose dress and figure displayed his wealth. As the result of the siege of Viminacium he had lost, according to his own account, his fortune and liberty: he became the slave of Onegissus: but his faithful services, against the Romans and the Aetaciries, had gradually raised him to the rank of the native Huns; to whom he was attached by the same ties which fastened him to his several children. The spoils of war had restored and improved his private property; he was admitted to the table of his former lord; and the apostate Greek blessed the hour of his captivity, since it had been the introduction to an independent and happy state, which he held by the honourable tenure of military service. This reduction naturally produced a dispute on the advantages and defects of the Roman government, which was severely arraigned by the apostate, and defended by Priscus in a prolix and feeble declamation. The freedman of Onegissus exposed, in true and lively colours, the misfortunes and avenging power of a master who had long been the victim; the cruel absurdity of the Roman princes, unable to protect their subjects against the public enemy, unwilling to trust them with arms for their own defence; the intolerable weight of taxes, rendered still more oppressive by the intricate or arbitrary modes of collection; the obscurity of numerous and contradictory laws; the tedious and expensive forms of judicial proceedings; the partial administration of justice; and the universal corruption, which increased the influence of the rich, and aggravated the misfortunes of the poor. A sentiment of patriotic sympathy, which might have been expected, was mitigated by these lamentations; he was arraigned for the endeavorex of peace. I. The emperor of the east, resigned, by an express or tacit convention, an extensive and important territory, which stretched along the southern banks of the Danube, from Singidounum or Belgrade, as far as Novae, in the diocese of Thrace. The brevity was defined by the vague computation of fifteen days' journey; but, from the proposal of At-tila, to remove the situation of the national market, it soon appeared, that he comprehended the ruined city of Naissus within the limits of his dominions. II.
The king of the Huns required and obtained, that his tribes should be discharged from several hundred pounds of gold to the annual sum of two thousand one hundred; and he stipulated the immediate payment of six thousand pounds of gold to defray the expenses, or to expiate the guilt, of the war. One might imagine this to be 1 According to the description, or rather invective, of Chrysostom, an auction of Byzantine luxury must have been very productive. Every wealthy house was furnished with a large stock of costly silver, such as two men could scarcely lift; a vase of solid gold of the weight of forty pounds, capable of being supported by a single finger. Each rich house kept a fine tame eagle to the emperor Theodosius.

2 Phrases [p. 61] extol the equity of the Roman laws, which protected every life that had been pierced. The German monks, on receiving the的形象 of the Deity in heaven, were the subjects of Attila, claimed, and exercised, the power of life and death over their slaves. See a remarkable instance in the second book of the Numa.

men, who so bravely asserted their natural independence; and the king of the Huns desisted to negotiate an equal exchange with the citizens of Azimun-
s. They demanded the restitution of some shepherds, who, with their cattle, had been accidentally slain. A strict, though fruitless, inquiry was allowed; but the Huns were obliged to swear that they would do no damage or preventies belonging to the city, before they could receive the indemnifying contributions, a number of men, whom the Azimuntines had reserved as pledges for the safety of their lost companions. Attila, on his side, was satisfied, and deceived, by their solemn as-servation, that the rest of the captives had been put to death; but it was the constant practice, immediately to dismiss the Romans and the deserters, who had obtained the security of the public faith. This prudent and officious dissimulation may be condemned, or, excused, by the casuists, as they incline to the rigid decree of St. Augustin, or to the milder sentiment of St. Jerom and St. Chrysostom: but every soldier, every statesman, must acknowledge, that if the race of the Azimuntines had been encouraged and multiplied, the barbarians would have ceased to trample on the majesty of the empire.9

of honour, a secure and solid tranquility; or if his tameness had not invited the reputition of injuries. The Byzantine court was insulted by five or six successive embassies; and the ministers of Attila were uniformly instructed to press the treaty for the union of their troops. A last treaty; to reduce the names of fugitives and deserters, who were still protected by the empire; and to declare, with seeming moderation, that unless their sovereign obtained complete and immediate satisfaction, it would be impossible. The Romans were even his wish, to clear the resentment of his warlike nation, for the motes of pride and interest, which might prompt the king of the Huns to continue this train of negociation, he was influenced by the less honourable view of enriching his favourites at the expense of his enemies. The imperial treasury was exhausted, to procure the friendly offices of the ambassadors, and their principal attendants, whose favourable report might conduce to the maintenance of peace. The barbarian monarch was flattered by the liberal reception of his ministers; he computed with pleasure the value of the emolument of their grace, for the performance of every promise, which would contribute to their private emolument, and treated as an important business of state, the marriage of his secretary Constantius.7 That Gallic adventurer, who was recommended to the king of the Huns, had gen engagement to the ministers of Constantinople, for the stipulated reward of a wealthy and noble wife; and the daughter of count Saturnus was chosen to discharge the obligations of her country.

The reluctance of the victim, some domestic troubles, and the unjust confiscation of her fortune, cooled the ardour of her interested lover; but he still demanded, in the name of Attila, an equivalent alliance; and after many ambiguous delays and excuses, the Byzantine court was compelled to sacrifice to this insolent stranger the widow of Armatus, whose birth, ope, and beauty, placed her in the most illustrious rank of the Roman matrons. For these importunate and oppressive requests the court of Constantinpore was in a desolate and ruined condition; and even ventured to insinuate, that every officer of the army or household was qualified to treat with the most powerful princes of Scythia. Maximin,9 a respectable courtier, whose abilities had been long exercised in civil and military employments, provoked such assistance the troublesome, and perhaps dangerous, commission, of reconciling the angry spirit of the king of the Huns. His friend, the historian Priscus,1 embraced the opportunity of observing the barbarian hero in the peaceful and domestic scenes of life; but the secret of the embassy, a fatal and guilty secret, was intrusted only to the interpreter Vigilans. The two last ambassadors of the Huns, Orestes, a noble subject of the Pannonian province, and Edecon, a valiant chief man of the tribe of the Sceyri, returned at the expense of their lives. Their obscure names were afterwards illustrated by the extraordinary fortune and the contrast of their sons; the two servants of Attila became the fathers of the last Roman emperor of the west, and of the first barbarian king of Italy.

of three hundred and fifty miles, or thirteen days' journey, from Constantinople. As the remains of Sardica were still included within the limits of his dominions, the count was directed to exercise the duties of hospitality. They provided, with the assistance of the provincials, a sufficient number of sheep and oxen; and invited the Huns to a splendid, or, at least, a plentiful, supper. But the harmony of this entertainment was soon disturbed by mutual prejudice and indiscretion. The greatness of the emperor and the empire was warmly maintained by their ministers; the Huns, with equal ardour, asserted the superiority of their victorious monarch: the dispute was inflamed by the rash and unreasonable flattery of Vi-centius, the chief of the Huns, who praised his prince more mortal with the divine Theodosius; and it was with extreme difficulty that Maximin and Priscus were able to divert the conversation, or to soothe the angry minds, of the barbarians. When they arose from table, the imperial ambassador presented Edecon and Orestes with rich gifts of silk robes and Indian pearls, which they thankfully accepted. Yet Orestes could not forbear insinuating, that he had not always been treated with such respect and liberality: and the offensive distinction, which was implied, between his civil office and the hereditary rank of his colleague, seems to have made Edecon a doubtful friend, and Orestes an irreconcilable enemy. After this entertainment, they travelled about one hundred miles from Sardica to Naissus. That flourishing city, which had given birth to the great Constantine, was levelled with the ground; the inhabitants were destroyed or dispersed, and the appearance of some sick persons, who were still permitted to exist among the ruins of the churches, served only to increase the horror of the prospect. The surface of the country was covered with the bones of the slain; and the ambassadors, who directed their course to the north-west, were obliged to pass the hills of modern Servia, before they descended into the flat and marshy country. The hills were equally prepared for the massacre of a people by the sword, of hunting, or of war. No sooner had Maximin advanced about two miles from the Danube, than he began to experience the fatal insensibility of the conqueror. He was sternly forbid to pitch his tents in a pleasant valley, lest he should infringe the distant awe that was due to the royal mansion. The ministers of Attila pressed him to communicate the business, and the instructions, which he reserved for the ear of their sovereign. When Maximin temporarily urged the contrary practice of nations, he was still more contended to find, that the resolutions of the Sacred Consistory, though they might satisfy the person, and of the barian associates immediately hastened to the camp of Attila, in order to express their distress at the massacre of their kindred, and of their brave allies, by the hands of barbarians, and of the tyrant of his nation, whom they had treacherously disclosed to the public enemy. His refusal to comply with such ignominious terms, the imperial envoy was commanded instantly to depart; the order was recalled; it was again repeated; and the Huns resolved to undertake the expedition with a resolution of unyielding firmness of Maximin. At length, by the intercession of Scotta, the brother of Onegesius, whose friendship had been purchased by a liberal gift, he was admitted to the royal presence, but, instead of obtaining a decisive answer, he was compelled to understand that the emperor had determined, as he had been to do, to give his authority to the destruction of the Huns, to the honor of the Huns. The emperor might enjoy the proud satisfaction of receiving, in the same camp, the ambassadors of the eastern and western empires. His journey was regulated by the guides, who obliged him to halt, to hasten his march, or to deviate from the common road, as it best suited the convenience of the king. The Romans who traversed the plains of Hungaria, suppose that they passed several navigable rivers, either in canoes or portable boats; but there is reason to suspect that the winding stream of the Teyss, or Tibiscus, might present itself in different places under different names. From the country of the Barbarians, the Huns, abstained from the sale of provisions; mead instead of wine, milklet in the place of bread, and a certain liquor named cannus, which, according to the report of Priscus, was distilled from barley. Such fare might appear coarse and indecent to men who had tasted the luxury of Constantine; but in their accidental distress, they were relieved by the gentleness and hospitality of the same barbarians, so terrible and so merciless in war. The ambassadors had encamped on the edge of a large morass. A violent tempest of wind and rain, of thunder and lightning, overturned their tents, immersed their baggage in the water. The king of the Huns and his retinue, who wandered in the darkness of the night, uncertain of their road, and apprehensive of some unknown danger, till they awakened by their cries the inhabitants of a neighbouring village, the property of the widow of Bleda. A bright illumination, and in a few moments, a considerable fire of reeds, was kindled by their officious benevolence: the wants, and even the desires, of the Romans were liberally satisfied; and they seem to have been embarrassed by the singular politeness of Bleda's widow, who added to her other favours, the gift, or at least the loan, of a sufficient number of beautiful and obsequious damsels. The sunshine of the succeeding day was dedicated to repose; to collect and dry the baggage, and to the refreshment of the men and horses; but, in the evening, before they pursued their journey, the ambassadors exhibited to the king the curiosity of the many villages, by a very acceptable present of silver cups, red beeswax, dried fruits, and Indian pepper. Soon after this adventure, they rejoined the march of Attila, from whom they had been separated about six days; and slowly proceeded to the capital of an empire, which was, in some respects, so remote, in the space of several thousand miles, a single city.

As far as we may ascertain the vague description of Priscus, this palace or capital appears to have been seated between the Danube, the Teyss, and the Carpathian hills, in the plains of Upper Hungary, and most probably in the neighbourhood of Jazberin, Agria, or Tokay. In its original state, it could be nothing more than an ancient camp, which, by the long and frequent residence of Attila, had insensibly swelled into a huge village, for the reception of his court, of the troops, who followed his example, and of the multitudes of indolent slaves and retainers. The baths, constructed by Onegesius, were the only edifice of stone; the materials had been transported from Pannonia; and since the adjacent country was destitute even of large timber, it may be presumed that the manner of raising the walls, of covering the roofs, and of disposing the various parts of the building, was adapted to the uses of royalty. A separate house was assigned to each of the numerous wives of Attila; and, instead of the rigid and illiberal confinement imposed by the kings of the Vandals and Sueves, the ambassadors had liberty of entering the palace to their presence, their table, and even to the freedom of an innocent embrace. When Maximin offered his presents to Cerca, the principal queen, he admired the singular architecture of her mansion, the height of the round columns, the size and beauty of the wood, which was curiously shaped, or turned, or polished, or carved; and his attentive eye was able to discover some taste in the ornaments, and some regularity in the proportions. After passing the guards, who watched before the gate, the ambassadors were introduced into the private apartment of the queen. The walls of Attila received their decoration, either by the7 or rather lying, on a soft couch; the floor was covered with a carpet; the domestics formed a circle round the queen; and her damsels, seated on the ground, were employed in working the variegated embroidery which adorned the dress of the barbaric warriors. The Huns were ambitious of displaying those riches which were the fruit and evidence of their victories: the trappings of their horses, their swords, and even their shoes, were studded with gold and precious stones; and their tables were profusely spread with plates, and goblets, and vases of gold and silver, which had been fashioned by the hand of Greek art. The monarch himself assumed the superior pride of adhering to the simplicity of his Scythian ancestors. The dress of Attila, his arms, and the furniture of his house, were plain, without ornament, and of a single colour. The royal table was set in wooden cups and platters; flesh was his only food, and the conqueror of the north never tasted the luxury of bread.

The behavour of Attila to the Roman ambassadors. When Attila first gave audience to the Roman ambassadors on the banks of the Donum, his tent was encompassed with a formidable guard. The monarch himself was seated in a wooden chair. His stern countenance, angry gestures, and impatient tone, astonished the firmness of Maximin; but Virgilius had more reason to tremble, since he distinctly understood the menace, that if Attila did not respect the law of nations, he would carry the decisive influence to a cruel extremity, and leave his body to the vultures. The barbarian condescended, by producing an accurate list, to expose the bold falsehood of Virgilius, who had affirmed that no more than seventeen deserters could be found. But he arrogantly declared, that he apprehended only the disturbance which would be occasioned by his departure; since he despised their impotent efforts to defend the province which Theodosius had entrusted to their arms.

"For what fortress?" (added Attila.) "What city, in the wide extent of the Roman empire, can hope to exist, secure and impregnable, if it is our pleasure that it shall be erased from the earth?" The emperor, however, the interpreter, who returned to Constantine with his peremptory demand of more complete restitution, and a more splendid embassy. His anger gradually subsided, and his domestic satisfaction, in a marriage which he celebrated on the road with the daughter of Eslam, might perhaps contribute to modify the native fierceness of his temper. The entrance of Attila into the royal village, was marked by a very singular ceremony. A numerous troop of women came out to meet their hero and their king. They marched before him, formed into long and regular files; and intervals between the files were filled by white veils of thin linen, which the women on either side bore aloft in their hands, and which formed a canopy for a chorus of young virgins, who chanted hymns and songs in the Scythian language. The wife of his favourite Ongeusias, with a train of female attendants, saluted Attila at the door of her own house, on his way to the palace; and offered, according to the custom of the country, her respectful homage, by entreating him to taste the wine and meat, which she had prepared for his reception. As soon as the monarch had graciously accepted her hospitable gift, his domestics lifted a small silver table to a convenient height, as he sat on horseback; and Attila, when he had touched the goblet with his lips, again saluted the wife of Ongeusias, and continued his march. During his residence at the court of empire, time was wasted in the recluse idleness of a seraglio; and the king of the Huns could maintain his superior dignity, without concealing his person from the public view. He frequently assembled his council, and gave audience to the ambassadors of the nations; and his people, who were admitted to the sight of the monarch, which he held at stated times, and, according to the eastern custom, before the principal gate of his wooden palace. The Romans, both of the east, and of the west, were twice invited to the banquets, where Attila feasted with the princes and nobles of Scythia. The royal feast. Maximin and his colleagues were stopped on the threshold, till they had made a devout libation to the health and prosperity of the king of the Huns; and were conducted, after this ceremony, to their respective seats. A white couch, which the monarch allowed to be covered with carpets and fine linen, was raised by several steps in the midst of the hall; and a son, an uncle, or perhaps a favourite king, were admitted to share the simple and homely repast of Attila. Two lines of small tables, each of which contained three or four guests, were situated in order of age. The monarch was esteemed the most honourable, but the Romans ingenuously confess, that they were placed on the left; and that Berie, an unknown chiefman, most probably of the Gothic race, preceded the representatives of Theodosius and Valentinian. The barbarian monarch received from his cup-bearer, a goblet filled to the very brim, and courteously drank to the health of the most distinguished guest; who rose from his seat, and expressed, in the same manner, his loyal and respectful vows. This ceremony was successively performed for all, or, as the case required, for each of the ambassadors; and a considerable time must have been consumed, since it was thrice repeated, as each course or service was placed on the table. But the wine still remained after the meat had been removed; and the Huns continued to indulge their intemperance long after the departure of the foreign ambassadors; since the Huns had withdrawn themselves from the nocturnal banquet. Yet before they retired, they enjoyed a singular opportunity of observing the manners of the nation in their convivial amusements. Two Scythians stood before the couch of Attila, and recited the verses which had been composed, to celebrate the victory of his victories. A profound silence prevailed in the hall; and the attention of the guests was captivated by the vocal harmony, which revived and perpetuated the memory of their own exploits: a martial ardour dashed from the eyes of the warriors, who were impatient for battle; and the tears of the old men expressed their generous despair, that they could no longer partake the danger and glory of the field. This entertainment, which might be considered as a school of military virtue, was succeeded by a farce, that debased by the vilest of the Scythian buffoons successively excited the mirth of the rude spectators, by their deformed figure, ridiculous dress, antic gestures, absurd speeches, and the strange unintelligible confusion of the Latin, the Gothic, and the Hunnic languages; and the hall resounded with the shouts and raucous mirth of laughter. In the course of this intemperate riot, Attila alone, without a change of countenance, maintained his steadfast and inflexible gravity; which was never relaxed, except on the entrance of Irnc, the youngest of his sons: he embraced the hoi with a smile of paternal tenderness, gently pinched him by the cheek, and betrayed a partial affection, which was justified by the assurance of his prophets, that Irnc would be the future support of his family and empire. Two days afterwards, the ambassadors received a second invitation; and they had reason to conclude, that their hosts were not the hospitality of Attila. The king of the Huns held a long and familiar conversation with Maximin; but his civility was interrupted by rude expressions, and haughty reproaches; and he was provoked, by a motive of interest, to support with unbecoming insolence, the claims and accusations of his secretary Constantius. "The emperor," (said Attila) "has long promised him a rich wife; Constantius must not be disappointed; nor should a Roman emperor desire the name of a liar." On the third day, the ambassadors were dismissed; the free-Conspiracy of Maximin. But the Roman ambassador was ignorant of the treacherous design, which Maximin had undermined the faith of the public. The surprise and satisfaction of Edeon, when he contemplated the splen-dour of Constantiopolis, had encouraged the interpreter Vigilius to procure for him a secret interview with the empress Chryspheus, who governed the emperor and the empire. After some previous appearance, and a mutual oath of secrecy, the empress, who had not, from his own feelings or experience, imbibed any exalted notions of ministerial virtue, ventured to propose the death of Attila, as an important service, by which Edeon might deserve a liberal share of the present treasures, which his majesty had bestowed on destructor of the Huns listened to the tempting offer; and professed, with apparent zeal, his ability, as well as readiness, to execute the bloody deed; the design was communicated to the master of the offices, and the devout Theodosius consented to the assassination of his invincible enemy. But this perilous complicity was defeated by the dissimulation, or the repentance, of Edeon; and, though he might exaggerate his inward abhorrence for the treason, which he seemed to approve, he determerously asserted the merit of an early and voluntary confession. If we now review the whole story of this rash, and regardless of worthless faction, we must applaud the barbarian, who respected the laws of hospitality, and generously entertained and dismissed the ambassador of a prince who had conspired against his life. But the rashness of Vigilius will appear still more extraordinary, since he returned, conscious of his guilt and danger, to the royal camp; accompanied by his son, and carrying with him a weighty purse of gold, which the favourite empress had furnished, to satisfy the demands of Edeon, and corrupt the fidelity of the guards. The interpreter was instantly seized, and dragged before the tribunal of the empress. He was informed by our author, or our crudest firmness till the threat of inflicting instant death on his son, extorted from him a sincere discovery of the criminal transaction. Under the name of ransom, or confiscation, the king of the Huns accepted two hundred pounds of gold for the life of a traitor, whom he disdained to punish. He pointed his just indignation against a nobler object. His amand forgiven the missioned and despatched to Constantiopolis, with a peremptory instruction, which it was much safer for him to execute than to disobey. He boldly entered the imperial presence, with the fatal purse hanging down from the neck of Orestes; who interrogated the empress Chryspheus, as he stood beside the throne, whether he recognised the evidence of his guilt. But the office of reproof was reserved for the supreme tribunal of the empire; yet, on the arrival of the emperor, he was ordered to address the emperor of the east in the following words:—Theodosius is the son of an illustrious and respectable parent; Attila likewise is descended from a noble race; and he has supported, by his actions, the dignity which he inherited from his father Mundzuk. But Theodosius has forfeited his paternal hon-owns, and, by consenting to pay tribute, has degraded himself to the condition of a slave. It is therefore just, that he should reverence the man whom fortune and merit have placed above him; instead of attempting, like a wicked slave, clandestinely to conspire against his master." The son of Arcadius, who was accustomed only to the voice of flattery, learnt with painful dismay, that he had been betrayed into a false friends and trembling; nor did he presume directly to refuse the head of Chryspheus, which Eslaw and Orestes were instructed to demand. A solemn embassy, armed with full powers and magnificent gifts, was hastily sent to depreciate the wrath of Attila; and his pride was gratified by the choice of Nepius and Antonius, two ministers of consular or patrician rank, of whom the one was great treasurer, and the other was master-general of the armies of the east.

He condescended to meet these ambassadors on the banks of the river Drene; and though he at first affirmed, by resentments, that he thought himself insen-singly mollified by their eloquence and liberality, he condescended to pardon the emperor, the empress, and the interpreter; bound himself by an oath to observe the conditions of peace; released a great number of captives; abandoned the fugitives and deserters to their fate; and resigned a large territory, to the south of the Danube, which he had already exhausted of its wealth and inhabitants. But this treaty was purchased at an expense which might have supported a vigor and successful war; and the subjects of Theodosius were compelled to redeem the safety of a triumphant empire, by a payment which would more cheerfully have paid for his destruction.

The emperor Theodosius did not long live to survive the most humiliating circumstance of an inglorious life. As he was justly reproached with the riding, or hunting, in the neighbourhood of Constantiopolis, he was thrown from his horse into the river Lyco; the spine of the back was injured by the fall; and he expired some days afterwards, in the fiftieth year of his age, and the forty-third of his reign. His sister Pulcheria, whose authority had been controlled both in civil and ecclesiastical affairs by the proceedings of the faction, was unanimously proclaimed empress of the east; and the

Romans, for the first time, submitted to a female reign. No sooner had Pulcheria ascended the throne, than she indulged her own and the public resentment, by an act of popular justice. Without any legal trial, the empress Chryspheus was executed before the gates of the city; and the immense riches which had been accumulated by the rapacious favourite, served only to hasten and to justify his punishment. Amidst the general acclamations of the clergy and people, the empress did not hesitate to oppress the provincials, and disadvantage to which her sex was exposed; and she expediently resolved to prevent their murmurs by the choice of a colleague, who would always respect the superior rank and virgin chastity of his wife. She was succeeded, by means of a secret instrument, by her brother Marcian, a senator, by Marcian, who was about sixty years of age. His mortal husband of Pulcheria was solemnly invested with the imperial purple. The zeal which he displayed for the orthodox creed, as it was established by the council of Chalcedon, would alone have inspired the grateful eloquence of the catholics. But the behaviour of Marcellus in a private life, and afterwards on the throne, may support a more rational belief, that he was qualified to restore and invigorate an empire, which had been almost dissolved by the successive weakness of two hereditary monarchs. He was born in Thrace, and educated to the profession of arms; but Marcellus's youth had been severely exercised by poverty and misfortune, since his only resource, when he first arrived at Constantinople, consisted in two hundred pieces of gold, which he had borrowed of a friend. He passed nineteen years in the domestic and military service of Aspar, and his son Ardalarius; followed those powerful generals to the Persian and African wars; and obtained, by their influence, the honourable rank of tribune and senator. His mild disposition, and useful talents, without alarming the jealousy, recommended Marcellus to the esteem and favour, of his patrons; he had seen, perhaps he had felt, the abuses of a venal and oppressive administration; and his own example gave weight and energy to the laws, which he promulgated for the reformation of manners.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Invasion of Gaul by Attila.—He is repelled by Attilus and the Visigoths.—Attilus invades and executes Italy.—The deaths of Attilus, Euthius, and Valentinian III.

Attilus threatens war. It was the opinion of Marcellus, that war should be avoided, as long as it was possible to preserve a secure and honourable peace; but it was likewise his opinion, that presuming he had such, or secure, the sovereign betrays a pusillanimous aversion to war. This temperate courage dictated his reply to the demands of Attilus, who insolently pressed the payment of the annual tribute. The emperor signified to the barbarians, that they must no longer insult the majesty of Rome by the mention of a tribute; that he was disposed to reward, with becoming liberality, the faithful friendship of his allies; but that, if they presumed to violate the public peace, they should feel that the possessed troops, and arms, and resolution, to repel their attacks. The same language, even in the camp of the Huns, was used by his ambassador Apollonius, whose bold refusal to deliver the presents, till he had been admitted to a personal interview, displayed a sense of dignity, and a contempt of danger, which Attilus was not prepared to expect from the degenerate Romans. He threatened to chastise the rash successor of Theodosius; but he hesitated, whether he should first direct his invincible arms against the eastern or the western empire. While mankind awaited his decision with awful suspense, he sent an equal declaration of Roman friendship to Constantinople, and his ministers saluted the two emperors with the same haughty declaration. "Attilus, my lord, and thy lord, commands thee to provide a palace for his immediate reception." But as the barbarian despised, or affected to despise, the Romans of the east, whom he had not yet vanquished, he accused his resolution in suspending the easy conquest, till he had achieved a more glorious and important enterprise. In the memorable invasions of Gaul and Italy, the Huns were naturally attracted by the wealth and fertility of those provinces; but the particular motives and provocations of Attilus, can only be explained by the state of the western empire under the reign of Valentinian, or, to speak more correctly, under the administration of Attilus.

After the death of his rival Boniface, Attilus had prudently retired to the tents of Euthus, and the administration of the Huns; and he was indebted to the alliance of Euthus, and their alliance for his safety and his reputation, to transfer the strength and language of a guilty exile, he solicited his pardon at the head of sixty thousand barbarians; and the empress Placidia confessed, by a feeble resistance, that the condescension, which might have been ascribed to clemency, was the effect of weakness or fear. She delivered herself, her son Valentinian, and the western empire, into the hands of an insolent subject; nor could Placidia protect the won-in-law of Boniface, the virtuous and faithful Sebastian, from the implacable persecutions, which urged him from one kingdom to another, till he miserably perished in the service of the Vandals. The fortunate Euthus, who was immediately promoted to the rank of patrician, and thrice invested with the honours of the consulship, assumed, with the title of master of the cavalry and infantry, the whole military power of the state; and he is sometimes said, by contemporary writers, the duke, or general, of the Romans of the west. His name was rather than his virtue, engaged him to leave the grand son of Theodosius in the possession of the purple; and Valentinian was permitted to enjoy the peace and luxury of Italy, while the patrician appeared in the glorious light of a hero and a patron. He restored near twenty years the ruins of the western empire. The Gothic historian ingenuously confesses, that Euthus was born for the salvation of the Roman republic; and the following portrait, though it is drawn in the fairest colours, must be allowed to contain a branch large proportion of truth. "Attilus, the hero; mother was a wealthy and noble Italian, and his father Gaudentius, who held a distinguished rank in the province of Scythia, gradually rose from the station of a military domestic, to the dignity of master of the cavalry. Their son, who was enrolled almost at his birth in the ranks of the guards, was given to him in the year of our Lord 400. He was sent first to Alaric, and afterwards to the Huns; and he succeeded obtained the civil and military honours of the palace, for which he was equally qualified by superior merit. The graceful figure of Attilus was not above my modest stature; but he was admirably formed for strength, beauty, and agility; and he excelled in the martial exercises of managing a horse, drawing the bow, and darting the javelin. He could patiently endure the want of food or of sleep; and his mind and body were alike capable of the most laborious efforts. He possessed the genuine courage, that can despise not only dangers but injuries; and it was impossible either to corrupt, or deceive, or intimidate, the firm integrity of his soul.

3 The Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle, which introduce this history, appears to be the lifetime of the Huns, may have aimed at the period of the date; but the dull annalist was incapable of inventing the original and genuine style of Attilus.
The barbarians, who had seated themselves in the western provinces, were insensibly taught to respect the faith and value of the patrician Ætius. He soothed their passions, consulted their prejudices, balanced their interests, and checked their ambition. A seasonable treaty, which he concluded with Galla, restored to the Vandals; the independent Britons implored and acknowledged his salutary aid; the imperial authority was restored and maintained in Gaul and Spain; and he compelled the Franks and the Suevi, whom he had vanquished in the field, to become the useful federates of the empire.

From a principle of interest, as well with the Huns as with the Alani, Ætius assiduously cultivated the alliance of the Huns. While he resided in their tents as a hostage, or an exile, he had familiarly conversed with Attila himself, the nephew of his benefactor; and the two fabulous antagonists appeared to have been connected by a personal and military friendship, which they afterwards confirmed by mutual gifts, frequent embassies, and the education of Carpillio, the son of Ætius, in the camp of Attila. By the specious professions of gratitude and voluntary attachment of the Huns to the empire, the pressure of the incursions of the Scythian conqueror, who pressed the two empires with his innumerable armies. His demands were obeyed or eluded. When he claimed the spoils of a vanquished city, some vases of gold, which had been fraudulently embezzled, the civil and military faction of the empire were appeased; and Attila immediately despatched to satisfy his complaints; and it is evident, from their conversation with Maximin and Priscus, in the royal village, that the valour and prudence of Ætius had not saved the western Romans from the common ignominy of tribute. Yet his dexterous policy, which had succeeded in the advance of the Huns, and in the numerous army of Huns and Alani, whom he had attached to his person, was employed in the defence of Gaul. Two colonies of these barbarians were judiciously fixed in the territories of Valois and Orleans; and their active cavalry secured the important passages of the Rhone and of the Loire. These savage allies were not indeed less formidable to the subjects than to the enemies of Rome. Their original settlement was enforced with the licentious violence of conquest; and the province through which they marched was exposed to all the calamities of a hostile invasion. Proper Observations on the History of the First Period of the Gothic Wars, p. 27. The Alani of Gaul were devoted to the ambition of Ætius; and though he might suspect, that in a contest with Attila himself, they would revolt to the standard of their national king, the patrician laboured to restrain, rather than to excite, their zeal and resentment against the Goths, the Burgundians, and the Franks.

The Visigoths, in Gaul under the reign of Theodoric, A.D. 419-451:

The embassy consisted of count Romulus; of Promotus, president of Noricum; and of Romanes, the military duke. They were accompanied by an illustrious army of Gallic and Germanic troops, and by a general and liberal command. The Visigoths advanced slowly to the Rhone, crossed it at Savoy, and landed on the height of the Mont Cenis, which they admirably possessed. The basin of the Duc de Saint-Simon observes, that the Visigoths had been shaken by the battering engines, and the inhabitants had endured the last extremities of famine, when count Litorius, approaching in silence, and directing each horseman to carry behind him two sacks of flour, cut his way through the intrenchments of the besiegers. The Visigoths were immediately raised; and the more decisive victory, which is ascribed to the personal conduct of Ætius himself, was marked with the blood of eight thousand Goths. But in the absence of the patrician, who was hastily summoned to Italy by some public or private interest, count Litorius marched with the bishop of Autun, the emperor's brother-in-law, who had discovered, that far different talents are required to lead a wing of cavalry, or to direct the operations of an important war. At the head of an army of Huns, he rashly advanced to the gates of Thoulouse, full of careless contempt for an enemy, whom his misfortunes had rendered prudent, and his situation made desperate. The predictions of the augurs had inspired Litorius with the profane confidence that he should enter the Gothic capital in triumph; and the trust which he reposed in his pagen allies, encouraged him to reject the fair conditions of peace, which were repeatedly proposed by the Visigoths. This the king of the Goths had expressed his distress at the edifying contrast of Christian piety and moderation; nor did he lay aside his sackcloth and ashes till he was prepared to arm for the combat. His soldiers, animated with martial and religious enthusiasm, assaulted the camp of Litorius. The conflict was obstinate; the slaughter was mutual. The Roman general, after a total defeat, which could but only to his unskilful rashness, was actually led through the streets of Thoulouse, not in his own, but in a hostile, triumph; and the misery which he experienced, in the captivity, and ignominious andpiteoused the compassion of the barbarians themselves.

Delectabilis: parce fallentes vix unae Ancestres ac nemo velit consociari: the complaint:
Nam sociis vir fer occisas, qui durus hoste.

The tradition of Litorius, the son of Theodoric, declares to Avitus his resolution of repenting, or expiating, the faults which his grandfather had committed.

This character, applicable only to the period of Theodoric, is taken from the genealogy of the Gothic kings, which has hitherto been unnoticed.

1 The name of Sapaudia, the origin of Savoy, is first mentioned in the old history of Arianus Maximus, and two miles S.W. of Ilerda, was assigned by the Notitia, within the limits of that province: a cohort was stationed at Gremont in Dauphine; and the bishops, or levies, defended a fleet of small vessels, which commanded the lake of Neufchâtel. See Scaliger, Not. Galliarum, p. 365. D'Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p. 251. 279.

Aelianus has attempted to explain the moral government of the Dелits; a task which may be readily performed by supposing, that the
Such a loss, in a country whose spirit and finances were long since exhausted, could not easily be repaired; and the Goths, assuming, in their turn, the sentiments of ambition and revenge, would have planted their victorious standards on the banks of the Rhine, if Tetricus had not recalled strength and discipline to the Romans.\(^2\) The two armies expected the signal of a decisive action; but the generals, who were conscious of each other's force, and doubtful of their own superiority, prudently sheathed their swords in the field of battle; and their reconciliation was permanent and happy. Theodoric, an offspring of the Visigoths, appears to have deserved the love of his subjects, the confidence of his allies, and the esteem of mankind. His throne was surrounded by six valiant sons, who were educated with equal care in the exercises of the barbarian camp, and in those of the Gallic schools; from the study of the Roman jurisprudence, they acquired the theory, at least, of law and justice; and the harmonious sense of Virgil contributed to soften the aspersion of their native manners.\(^3\) The two daughters of the Gothic king were given in marriage to the eldest sons of the kings of the Suevi and of the Vandals, whose names are lost. African birth and Prætorian alliances were pregnant with guilt and discord. The queen of the Suevi bewailed the death of a husband, inhumanly massacred by her brother. The princess of the Vandals was the victim of a jealous tyrant; he had sealed her father's hand, and, as it appears, suspected, that his son's wife had conspired to poison him; the supposed crime was punished by the amputation of her nose and ears; and the unhappy daughter of Theodoric was ignominiously returned to the court of Thoulouse in that deformed and mutilated condition. This at least seems incredible to a civilized age, drew tears from every spectator; but Theodoric was urged, by the feelings of a parent and a king, to revenge such irreparable injuries. The imperial ministers, who always cherished the discord of the barbarians, would have supplied the western world with arms, and ships, and treasures, for the African war; and the cruelty of Genevra might have been fatal to himself, if the artful Vandal had not armed, in his cause, the formidable power of the Huns. His rich gifts and pressing solicitations inflamed the ambition of Attila; and the designs of Ætius and Theodoric were prevented by the invasion of Gaul.\(^4\)

The Franks, whose monarchy was still confined to the neighbourhood of the Lower Rhine, had wisely established the right of hereditary succession in the noble family of the Merovingians.\(^5\) These princes

still maintained the possession of his Gallic kingdom from the Rhine to the Somme. Under his reign, and most probably from the enterprising spirit of his subjects, the three capitals, Mants, Treves, and Cologne, espoused the cause of the expatriated Gothic nation. The distress of Cologne was prolonged by the perpetual domination of the same barbarians, who evacuated the ruins of Treves; and Treves, which, in the space of forty years, had been four times besieged and pillaged, was disposed to lose the memory of her afflictions, and to adulate the promises of the Gregorian. The death of Clodion, after a reign of twenty years, exposed his kingdom to the discord and ambition of his two sons. Merovexus, the younger, was persuaded to implore the protection of Rome; he was received at the imperial court, as the ally of Valentinian, and the adopted son of the Emperor Julian; and dismiss- ed, to his native country, with splendid gifts, and the strongest assurances of friendship and support. During his absence, his elder brother had solicited, with equal ardour, the formidable aid of Attila; and the king of the Huns embraced an alliance, which facilitated the passage of the Rhine, and justified, by splendid and honourable pretence, the invasion of Gaul.

The adventures of the princes of supporting the cause of his allies, the Huns. The Vandals and the Franks, at the same time, and almost in expectation of the day, the savage monarch professed himself the lover and the champion of the princess Honorina. The sister of Valentinian was educated in the palace of Ravenna; and as her marriage might be productive of some danger to the state, she was raised, by the title of Augusta, above the hopes of the most presumptuous subjects. But the fair Honorina had no sooner attained the sixteenth year of her age, than she detested the importunate greatness which must for ever exclude her from the comforts of honourable love; in the midst of vain and unsatisfactory pomp, Honorina sighed, yielded to the impulse of nature, and threw herself into the arms of her chamberlain Eugenius. Her guilt and shame (such is the absurd language of impious man) were soon betrayed by the appearances of pregnancy; but the disgrace of the royal family was published to the world by the imprudence of the empress Placidia, who divested the Huns of the kings and emperors of perpetual confinement, to a remote exile at Constantinople. The unhappy princess passed twelve or fourteen years in the irksome society of the sisters of Theodosius, and their chosen virgins; to whose crown Honorina could no longer aspire, and whose monastic assemblie of persons, in the name of Civitas, was a mark of barbarous despotism. To her impiety of long and hopeless celibacy, urged her to embrace a strange and desperate resolution. The name of Attila was familiar and formidable at Constantinople; and his frequent embassies entered a perpetual intercourse between his camp and the imperial palace. In the pursuit of love, or rather of revenge, the daughter of Placidia sacrificed every duty and every principle; and when publicly she had been accused to the ears of a barbarian, of whose language she was ignorant, whose figure was scarcely human, and whose religion and manners she abhorred. By the ministry of a faithful eunuch, she transmitted to Attila a ring, the pledge of her affection; and earnestly conjured him to claim her as a lawful spouse, to whom persons of ambition, but had been driven to distress her number of times, and till her love was awakened by the more forcible passions of ambition and avarice. The invasion of Gaul was preceded, and justified, by a formal demand of the princess Honorina, with a just and equal share of the imperial patrimony. His predecessors, the ancient Tanjous, had often addressed, in the same hostile and peremptory manner, the daughters of Childeric. A firm but temporar-y refusal was announced. The right of female succession, though it might derive a specious argument from the recent examples of Placidia and Pulchirion, was strenuously denied; and the indissoluble engagements of Honorina were opposed to the claim of her Sclavonian lover. On the discovery of the king of the Huns who had been sent away, as an object of horror, from Constantinople to Italy: her life was spared; but the ceremony of her marriage was performed with some obscure and nominal husband, before she was immured in a perpetual prison, to bewail those crimes, which Honorina might have committed, had she not been born the daughter of an emperor.

A native of Gaul, and a contemporary, Attila invades the learned and eloquent Sidonius, who was afterwards bishop of Clermont, had made a promise to one of his friends, that he would compose a regular history of the war of Attila. If the modesty of Sidonius had not discouraged him from the prosecution of this interesting work, the historian would have related, with the simplicity of truth, those memorable events, to which the poet, in vague and doubtful metaphors, has aconceited alluded. The king of Germany, before whom the Volga perhaps to the Danube, obeyed the warlike summons of Attila. From the royal village, in the plains of Hungary, his standard moved towards the west; and, after a march of seven or eight hundred miles, he reached the conflux of the Rhine and the Neckar at the entrance to the country, where he had adhered to his ally, the elder of the sons of Clodion. A troop of light barbarians, who roamed in quest of plunder, might choose the winter for the convenience of passing the river on the ice: but the innumerable cavalry of the Huns required such plenty of forage and provisions, as could be procured only in a milder season; the Herecynian forest supplied materials for a bridge of

1 See a vague account of the action in Sidonius. Panegy. Majo- rian. 235-236. The French critics, intent on to establish their mon- archy in Gaul, have drawn a staurum argument from the silence of Sidonius, who does not designate, that the vanquished Franks were compelled to repose their arms. 3 See Priscus, in relation the contest, does not name the two brothers; the second of whom he had seen at Rome, a beardless youth, with loose flowing hair. (Historians of France, tom. i. p. 697, 698.) 4 The Benedictine Editors are inclined to believe, that they were the sons of Honorina, and married to the eldest daughter of Theodosius, and to the Nieber; but the arguments of M. de Foncineau (Mem. de l'Académie, tom. viii. p. 484.) seem to prove, that the succession of Clodion was not the child of Honorina, but the younger son, and the heir presumptive, the father of Childeric. 5 See Priscus, in contest, the race the throne was hereditary; but all the sons of the deceased monarch were equally entitled to their share of his crowns and territories. See the Declarations of M. de Foncineau, tom. iv. p. 374. 6 See the Monographie de l'Académie. 7 A model is still extant, which exhibits the pleasing countenance of Honorina, with the title of Augusta; and on the reverse, the implo- ing legend of Nobilis Regis Philippi round the monogram of Christ. boats; and the hostile myriads were pored, with resivile violence, into the Belgic provinces. The consentation of Gaul was universal; and the various fortunes of its cities have been adorned by tradition with many miracles. The towns were assailed by the merits of St. Lupus; St. Servatius was removed from the world, that he might not behold the ruin of Tong-gres; and the prayers of St. Genevieve diverted the march of Attila from the neighbourhood of Paris. But as the greater part of the Gallic cities were alike destinuious, there must have been a general revolt; and this was caused by the idyls of Metz, their customary maxims of war. They involved, in a promiscuous massacre, the priests, who served at the altar, and the infants, who, in the hour of danger, had been providently baptized by the bishop; the flourishing city was delivered to the flames, and a solitary chapel of St. Stephen marked the place where it formerly stood. From the Rhine and the Moselle, Attila marched into the heart of Gaul; crossed the Seine at Auxerre; and, after a long and laborious march, fixed his camp under the walls of Orleans. He was surrounded by besiegers of his most implacable hostility. The place had secured its freedom by the possession of an advantageous post, which commanded the passage of the Loire; and he depended on the secret invitation of Sangihan, king of the Alani, who had promised to betray the city, and to revert from the service of the empire. His preparations were detected and disappointed: Orleans had been strengthened with recent fortifications; and the assaults of the Huns were vigorously repelled by the faithful valour of the soldiers, or citizens, who defended the place.

Orleans, and to give battle to the innumerable host of Attila. 1

Attila retired to the plains of Champagne, and sounded a retreat to recall the foremost of his troops from the pillage of a city which they had already entered. 2 The valor of Attila was always guided by his prudence; and he knew the fatal consequences of a defeat in the heart of Gaul, he repassed the Seine, and expected the enemy in the plains of Chalons, whose smooth and level surface was adapted to the operations of his Saxon cavalry. But in this timorous retreat, the vanguard of the Romans and their allies continually pressed, and sometimes engaged, the troops whom Attila had posted before the camp. The height of the night, and the perplexity of the roads, might encounter each other without design; and the bloody conflict of the Franks and Geissæ, in which fifteen thousand barbarians were slain, was a prelude to a more general and decisive action. The Catallanian generals, Ebroin, the Bishop of Bayeux, and the Count, extended, according to the vague measurement of Jordanes, to the length of one hundred and fifty, and the breadth of one hundred, miles, over the whole province, which is entitled to the appellation of a chataignier country. This spacious plain was distinguished by its breadth, its rising and undulating character, and the importance of a height, which commanded the camp of Attila, was understood, and disputed, by the two generals. The young and valiant Torismond first occupied the summit; the Goths rushed with irresistible weight on the Huns, who laboured to ascend from the opposite side; and the possession of this advantageous post inspired both the troops and their leaders with a fair assurance of victory. The anxiety of Attila prompted him to consult his priests and haruspices. It was reported, that, after scrutinizing the entrails of the victims, and scraping their bones, they revealed, in mysterious language, his own defeat, with the death of his principal adversary; and that the barbarian, by accepting the equivalent, expressed his involuntary esteem for the superior merit of Attila. But the usual despondency, which seemed to prevail among the Huns, engaged Attila, and showed him the expedient, so familiar to the genius of antiquity, of animating his troops by a military oration; and his language was that of a king, who had often fought and conquered at their head. 3 He pressed them to consider their past glory, their actual danger, and the appellation of their country. He had opened the deserts and morasses of Sclavin to their unarmèd valour, which had laid so many warlike nations prostrate at their feet, had reserved the joys of this memorable field for the consummation of their victories. The cautions steps of their enemies, their strict alliance, and their advantageous posts, he artfully represented as the effects, not of prudence, but of fear. The Visigoths were those who were driven to the extremities of the opposite army; and the Huns might securely trample on the degenerate Romans, whose close and compact order betrayed their apprehensions, and who were equally incapable of supporting the dangers, or the fatigues, of a day of battle. The doctrine of predestination, so favourable to martial virtue, was carefully inculcated by the king of the Huns; who assured his subjects, that the warriors, protected by heaven, were safe and invulnerable amidst the darts of the enemy; but that the unerring Fates would strike their victims in the bosom of inglorious peace. Attila, "I myself," he exclaimed, "will be the only mark of javelin, and the wretch who refuses to imitate the example of his sovereign, is devoted to inevitable death." The spirit of the barbarians was rekindled by the presence, the voice, and the example, of their intrepid leader; and Attila, yielding to their impatience, immediately formed his order of battle. At the head of his brave and faithful Huns, he occupied in person the centre of the line. The nations subject to his empire, the Rugians, the Hermuli, the Thuringians, the Franks, the Burgundians, were extended, on either hand, over the ample space of the Cateral field of battle; without visible order, they stood to the left, on the right Adaric, king of the Gepidas; and the three valiant brothers, who reigned over the Ostrogoths, were posted on the left to oppose the kindred tribes of the Visigoths. The disposition of the allies was regulated by a different principle. Sangiban, the faithless king of the Alani, was placed in the centre, whose motions might be strictly watched, and whose treachery might be instantly punished. Attila assumed the command of the left, and Theodoric of the right, wing; while Torismond still continued to occupy the heights which appear to have stretched on the flank, and perhaps the rear, of the Saxon army. The nations from the Volga to the Atlantic were assembled on the plain of Chalons; but many of these nations had been divided by faction, or conquest, or emigration; and the appearance of similar arms and ensigns, which threatened each other, presented the image of a civil war.

The discipline and tactics of the Battle of Chalons. Greeks and Romans form an interesting part of their national manners. The attentive study of the military operations of Xenophon, or Caesar, or Cato, or Livy, whose descriptions, if we can believe them, which were conceived and executed them, may tend to improve (if such improvement can be wished) the art of destroying the human species. But the battle of Chalons can only excite our curiosity by the magnitude of the object; since it was decided by the blind insensibility of barbarians, and has been related by partial writers, whose civil or ecclesiastical profession secluded them from the knowledge of military affairs. Cassiodorus, however, had familiarly conversed with many Gothic warriors, who served in that memorable engagement; a conflict, as they informed him, fierce, various, and decisive; but, by which, they said, victory could not be paralleled, either in the present, or in past ages. The number of the slain amounted to one hundred and sixty-two thousand, and, or, according to another account, three hundred thousand persons: and these incredible exaggerations suppose a real and absolute loss, to justly remark, that whole generations may be swept away, by the madness of kings, in the space of a single hour. After the mutual and repeated discharge of missile weapons, in which the archers of Scythia might signalize their superior dexterity, the cavalry and infantry of the two armies were furiously mingled in closer combat. The Huns, who fought under the eyes of their king, pierced through the feeble and doubtful centre of the Visigoths. Though the Visigoth was exposed in the vanguard of his division, and trampled under the feet of his own cavalry; and this important death served to explain the ambiguous prophecy of the haruspices. Attila already exulted in the confidence of victory, when the valiant Torismond descended from the hills, and verified the remainder of the prediction. The Visigoths, who had been thrown into confusion by the flight, or defection, of the Alani, gradually restored their order of battle; and the Huns were undoubtedly vanquished, since Attila was compelled to retreat. He had expected to deal with the rashness of the enemy, but the intrepid troops of the centre had pushed forwards beyond the rest of the line; their attack was faintly supported; their flanks were unguarded; and the conquerors of Scythia and Germany were saved by the approach of the night from a total defeat. They retired in their usual order, the vanguard encamping at the skirt of the camp; and the dismounted squadrons prepared themselves for a defence, to which neither their arms, nor their temper, were adapted. The event was doubtful: but Attila had secured a fast and honourable retreat. The saddles and rich furniture of the cavalry were collected, by his order, into a funeral pile; and the magnanimous barbarian had resolved, if his intrenchments should be forced, to rush headlong into the flames, and to deprive his enemies of the glory which they might have acquired, by the death or captivity of Attila.

1 The review of the army of Attila is made by Jornandes, c. 36, p. 561. Ren. tom, ii, p. 223, of the Historians of France, with the notes of the Benedictine editor. The Lotti were a promiscuous race of barbarians, born or naturalized in Gaul; and the Ripari, or Riparii, or Riparici, derived their name from their posts on the three rivers, the Rhone, the Meuse, and the Moselle; the Armoricans possessed the independent cities lying between the Seine and the Loire; A colony of Scythians had been planted in the diocese of Bayeux; the Burgundians and the Francs, or Franks, were the vanguard of the tribe of Hibernians, to the east of the lake of Constance.

6 I am sensible that these military operations are usually composed by the historians of the Roman empire, from the accounts of these Massilius, and his historians, and from the disquisitions of a Siculius, who was an Italian of the sixth century who would have thought of the hujus certamine glandis.

But his enemies had passed the night in equal disorder and anxiety. The inconsiderate courage of Torismond was tempted to urge the pursuit, till he unexpectedly found himself, with a few of his followers, in the midst of the Huns. In the confusion of a nocturnal combat, he was thrown from his horse; and the Gothic prince must have perished like his father, if his youthful strength, and the intrepid zeal of his companions, had not rescued him from this dangerous situation. In the same manner, he had delivered the line; his men, struck down by his allies, ignorant of their victory, and anxious for their fate, encountered and escaped the hostile troops, that were scattered over the plains of Chalons; and at length reached the camp of the Goths, which he could only fortify with a slight rampart of earth, till the dawn of day. The imperial general was soon satisfied of the defeat of Attila, who still remained inactive within his intrenchments; and when he contemplated the bloody scene, he observed, with secret satisfaction, that the loss had principally fallen on the barbarians. The body of Thedoric, pierced with honourable wounds, was discovered under a heap of the slain: his subjects bewailed the death of their king and father; but their tears were mingled with songs and acclamations; and his funeral rites were performed with all the pomp of a triumph. The Goths, clasping their arms, elevated on a buckler his eldest son Torismond, to whom they justly ascribed the glory of their success; and the new king accepted the obligation of revenge, as a sacred portion of his paternal inheritance. Yet the Goths themselves were astonished by the force and undaunted aspect of their formidable antagonist; and their historian has compared Attila to a lion encompassed in his den, and threatening his hunters with redoubled fury. The kings and nations, who might have deserted his standard in the hour of distress, were made sensible, that the stern Convert of the Visigoths was a relentless and inevitable danger. All his instruments of martial music incessantly sounded a loud and animating strain of defiance; and the foremost troops who advanced to the assault, were checked, or destroyed, by showers of arrows from every side of the intrenched host. In short, Attila, who had determined, with the valor of a husbandman, to besiege the king of the Huns in his camp, to intercept his provisions, and to reduce him to the alternative of a disgraceful treaty, or an unequal combat. But the impatience of the barbarians soon disdained these cautious and dilatory measures; and the mature policy of Attila was apprehensive, that, after the expiration of the Huns, the republic would be oppressed by the pride and power of the Gothic nation. The patrician exerted the superior ascendancy of authority and reason, to calm the passions, which the son of this monarch had been able to excite in the private quarters of the aged and demented Attila. If he observed a seeming affection and true, the dangers of absence and delay; and persuaded Torismond to discontinue his pursuit, by his speedy return, the ambitious designs of his brothers, who might occupy the throne and treasures of Thoulouse.

After the departure of the Goths, a division of the allied army, Attila was surprised at the vast silence that reigned over the plains of Chalons: the suspicion of some hostile stratagem detained him several days within the circle of his wagons; and his retreat beyond the Rhine confessed the last victory which was achieved in the name of the western empire. Meroveus and his Franks, observing a prudent distance, and magnifying the opinion of their strength, by the numerous fires which they kindled every night, continued to follow the rear of the Huns, till they reached the confines of Thuringia. The Thuringians served in the army of Attila; they were both in their march and in their return, the territories of the Franks; and it was perhaps in this war that they exerced the cruelties, which, about fourscore years afterwards, were revenged by the son of Clovis. They massacred the inhabitants of their captives; they tortured two hundred young maidens with exquisite and unrelenting rage; their bodies were torn asunder by wild horses, or their brains were crushed under the weight of rolling wagons; and their unburied limbs were abandoned on the public roads, as a prey to the beasts of the field. The barbarians, whose imaginary virtues have sometimes excited the praise and envy of civilized ages, Neither the spirit, nor the forces, nor the reputation of Attila, were impaired by the failure of the Gallic expedition. In the ensuing spring, he repeated his demand of the princess, Honoria, and her patrimonial treasures. The demand was again rejected, or eluded; and the indignant lover immediately took the field, passed the Alps, invaded Italy, and besieged Aquileia with an innumerable host of barbarians. Those barbarians were unskilled in the methods of conducting a regular siege, for their forces moved in irregular columns, and were unsupported on their march.

Torismond, the son of Attila, was, or pretended to be, the last of the Gothic emperors. Though he was never acknowledged as king by his troops, Attila acknowledged him as his successor, and placed him at the head of the army. He was crowned king of the Huns at Torunda, in the year 495, in imitation of the ceremonies of his father, when he was transferred from the barbarous to the Roman empire, and when he was invested with regal authority. But the Huns were divided into two great battalions; the former near Orleans, the latter in Champagne: in the one Thedoric was slain; in the other he was revenged.
of Machmis. But and yet ii. yet princes Aquileia; to in dreadful multitude.

The Gothic auxiliaries, the princes Alaric and Ataulf, communicated their interpid spirit; and the citizens still remembered the glorious and successful resistance, which their ancestors had put to a fierce, incorrupt barbarian, who disregarded the majesty of the Roman purple. Three months were consumed without effect in the siege of Aquileia; till the want of provisions and the clamours of his army, compelled Attila to relinquish the enterprise. And reluctantly to issue his orders, that the troops should strike their tents next morning, and begin their retreat. But as he rode round the walls, perceiving the towers of stone, he asked a guide how they were preparing to leave her nest in one of the towers and to fly with her infant family towards the country. He seized, with the ready penetration of a statesman, this trifling incident, which chance had offered to superstition; and exclaimed, in a loud and cheerful tone, that such a domestic bird, so constantly attached to human society, would never have abandoned her habitation, unless those towers had been devoted to impending ruin and solitude. The favourable omen inspired an assurance of victory; the siege was renewed, and prosecuted with fresh vigour; a large breach was made in the wall of which he stork took refuge under her flight; the Huns mounted to the assault with irresistible fury, and the succeeding generation could scarcely discover the ruins of Aquileia. After this dreadful chastisement, Attila pursued his march; and as he passed, the cities of Altinum, Cordacora, and Padua, were reduced into Ruins and spared the hand ofAttila. The land towns, Vicenza, Verona, and Bergamo, were exposed to the rapacious cruelty of the Huns. Milan and Pavia submitted, without resistance, to the loss of their wealth; and applauded the unusual eclemy, which preserved from the flames the public, as well as private buildings; and spared the liberties of the citizen multitude. The popular traditions of Comun, Turin, or Modena, may justly be suspected; yet they concur with more authentic evidence to prove, that Attila spread his ravages over the rich plains of modern Lombardy, which are divided by the Po, and bounded by the Alps. At the accession of the palatine of Milan, he was surprised, and offended, at the sight of a picture, which represented the Cesar seated on their throne, and the princes of Sythia prostrate at their feet. The revenge which Attila inflicted on the Cesar was cowardly, and was harmless and ingenuous. He commanded a painter to reverse the figures, and the attitudes; and the emperors were delineated on the same canvas, approaching in a suppliant posture to empty their bags of tributary gold before the throne of the Sythian monarch.

The spectators must have witnessed the truth and propriety of the alteration; and were perhaps tempted to apply, on this singular occasion, the well-known fable of the dispute between the lion and the man.

It is a saying worthy of the ferocious Foundation of pride of Attila, and the warlike genius of the Huns, that the public would not be placated on the spot where his horse had stood. Yet the savage destroyer undesignedly laid the foundations of a republic, which revived, in the feudal state of Europe, the art and spirit of commercial industry. The celebrated name of Venice, or Venetia, was formerly diffused over a large and fertile province of Italy, from the confines of Pannonia to the river Adun, and from the Po to the Rhinian and Julian Alps. Before the irruption of the barbarians, fifty Venetian cities flourished in peace and prosperity: Aquileia was placed in the most conspicuous station; but the ancient and present dignity and importance of Venice are due to the courage and manufactures; and the propriety of five hundred citizens, who were entitled to the equestrian rank, must have amounted, at the strictest computation, to one million seven hundred thousand pounds. Many families of Aquileia, Padua, and the adjacent towns, who fled from the fury of the invader, took possession of small islands; and were extended, at first a through obscure, refuge in the neighbouring islands. At the extremity of the gulf, where the Hadrument feebly imitates the tides of the ocean, near a hundred small islands are separated by shallow water from the continent, and protected from the waves by several long trains of land, which admit of the entrance of vessels through some secret and natural channels. Till the middle of the fifth century, these remote and sequestered spots remained without cultivation, with few inhabitants, and almost without a name. But the manu

5 This consideration is not attested by any contemporary evidence; but the fact is proved by the event, and the circumstances might be preserved by tradition. The citizens of Aquileia restored to the rule of Gradus, those of Padua to Rivas Atus, or Banblo, where the city was after called Aquileia, & c.

6 The topography and antiquities of the Venetian islands from the Po to Cudzies, and the Lido, are accurately stated in the Dissertatio Chorographica Italica, &c. (I. c. 157.)

(1) The learned Count Figlieri in his Memoirs of the Venetians, (Monserrone de Venetis primum; secundum de Conte Figliari, vol. vi. Venezia, 1715.) has proved that from the earliest time which nation comprehended the country, and the remote period of the Venetian States, also inhabited the islands upon its coast, and hence arose the names of Venice Pruna and Seconds, the first of which is derived from the Latin word prunus, and is applied to the islands and lars.

(2) The names of the Pelasgi and Erucii, the first remnant of the Venetians inhabiting some of the islands, are derived to agriculture; the second being situated in the midst of canals, and entrance of several rivers, and within reach of the islands of Greece as well as the Friuli; and lands of the inhabitants ready for navigation and commerce. Both were subdued by the Romans a few years before the second Punic war. It was not, however, until after the victory gained by Marius over the Cimbri, that their country became a Roman province.

Under the reign of the emperors the first Venetia more than sufficed, and according to the practice of the time it was a place in the dominions of the state. But the maritime province was engaged in fisheries, in the manufacture of salt and in commerce. The Venetians regarded the people who inhabited it as beneath the dignity of history.

D. 521; and the marquis's authority has the more weight, as he had prepared an edition of his works, and actually published a dissertation on the true orthography of his name. See \textit{Oberh. d. The minister of Theodoric compares themselves to his own insignificant nation to water-fowls, who had fixed their nests on the bosom of the waves; and though he allows, that the Venetian provinces had formerly contained many noble families, he insinuates, that they were now reduced by misfortune to the same level. Fish was the common, and almost the universal, food of every rank; their oceanic treasure consisted in the plenty of salt, which they extracted from the sea; and the exchange of that commodity, so essential to human life, was substituted in the neighbouring markets to the currency of gold and silver. A people, whose habitations might be doubtfully assigned to the earth or water, soon became alike familiar with the two elements; and the demands of avance succeeded to those of necessity. The islanders, who, from Grado to Chioggia, were intimately connected with each other, penetrated into the heart of Italy, and to the most distant parts of Europe, though harrassed by the rivers and inland canals. Their vessels, which were continually increasing in size and number, visited all the harbours of the gulf; and the marriage, which Venice annually celebrates with the Hlidricat, was a part of this enterprize. The epistle of Cassiodorus, the provocator of this maritime tribune; and he exhorts them, in a mild tone of authority, to animate the zeal of their countrymen for the public service, which required their assistance to transport the magazines of wine and oil from the provinces of Italy to the royal city. The Venetian ambiguous office of these magistrates is explained by the tradition, that, in the twelve principal islands, twelve tribunes, or judges, were created by an annual and popular election. The existence of the Venetian republic under the Gothic kingdom of Italy, is attested by the same authentic record, which attests their lofty claim of original and perpetual independence.\footnote{\textit{Cassiodorius, in his treatise on the office of the tribunes, declares his wish that this great office might fall to a formidable barbarian, whom they abhorred, as the enemy of their religion, as well as of their republic. The Italians, who had long since reprised, almost in their bed of idleness, to see the invaders of their coasts. The epistle of Cassiodorus, the provoca-tor of the Roman prefecture, is a remarkable document, which gives us a view of the Roman emperor, and a translation of the epistle. This book, which has been exhaustively edited in all its parts, is stated, in every line, with the distinguishing marks of party: but the principal fact is this; that the vivid record of the relations of the emperor to the subject people, is one which the reader will easily choose the fair medium.\footnote{\textit{Cassiod. Varar. i. xxi. epist. 24. Attila realignates virdis, quibus Gallicae munus dona, Italiam ingredi per Pannonias insidiam, ut nihil duo necesse Attili secundum priores bellorum opus prospicient &c., The pressing eloquence of Leo, his majestic aspect, and sacerdotal robes, excited the veneration of Attila for the spiritual father of the christians. The apparition of the two apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, who menaced the barbarian with instant death, if he rejected the prayer of their successor, is one of the noblest legends of the early chieftains of Rome; might deserve the interposition of celestial beings; and some indulgence is due to a fable, which has been represented by the pencil of Raphael, and the chisel of Algariz.

The death of Attila. Before the king of the Huns evacuated Italy, a treaty was concluded, by which the bold Ardarcius renounced personal enemies, more formidable, and more implacable, if his bride, the princess Honoria, were not delivered to his ambassadors within the time stipulated by the treaty. Yet, in the meanwhile, Attila relieved his tender anxiety, by adding a beautiful maid, whose name was Ildico, to the list of his innumerable wives. Their marriage was celebrated with barbaric pomp and festivity, at his wooden palace beyond the Danube; and the monarch, oppressed with wine and sleep, retired, at a late hour, from the banquet to the nuptial bed. His attendants continued to respect his pleasures, or his repose, till the early morn. Then, in the silence alarmed their fears and suspicions; and, after attempting to awaken Attila by loud and repeated cries, they at length broke into the royal apartment. They found the trembling bride sitting by the bedside, hiding her face with her veil, and lamenting her own danger, as well as the death of the king, who had expired during the night. An artery suddenly burst; and as Attila lay in a supine posture, he was suffocated by a torrent of blood, which, instead of finding a passage through the nostrils, regurgitated into the lungs and stomach. His body was solemnly exposed in the midst of the scene of conflict. The chosen squadrons of the Huns, wheeling round in measured evolutions, chanted a funeral song to the memory of a hero, glorious in his life, invincible in his death, the father of his people, the scourge of his enemies, and the terror of the world. According to their national custom, the barbarians cut off a part of their hair, gashed their faces with unseemly wounds, and bewailed their valiant leader as he deserved, not with tears of women, but with the blood of warriors.

The remains of Attila were inclosed within three coffins, of gold, of silver, and of iron, and privately buried in a hidden spot; his vizier, Tissaphernes, was ordered to inter his grave; the captives who had opened the ground were inhumanly massacred; and the same Huns, who had indulged such excessive grief, feasted, with dissemble and interminable mirth, about the recent sepulchre of their king. It was reported at Constantinople, that on the fortunate night in which he expired, Marcin, beheld in a dream the bow of Attila broken asunder: and the report may be allowed to prove, how sedulously the image of that formidable barbarian was absent from the mind of a Roman emperor. The revolution which subverted the destruction of the empire of the Huns, established the fame of Attila, whose genius alone had sustained the huge and disjoined fabric. After his death, the bold Ardarcius returned to the rank of kings; and the most powerful kings refused to acknowledge a superior; and the numerous sons, whom so many mothers bore to the deceased monarch, divided and disputed, like a private inheritance, the sovereign command of the nations of Germany and Scythia. The death of Attila served as an excuse to the warlike Gepida, with the Ostrogoths, under the conduct of three valiant brothers, encouraged their allies to vindicate the rights of freedom and royalty. In a bloody and decisive conflict on the banks of the river Netad, in Pannonia, the lance of the Gepida, the sword of the Goths, the arrows of the Huns, the Suevia infantry, the light arms of the Icruli, and the heavy weapons of the Alani, encountered or supported each other; and the victory of Ardarcus was accompanied with the slaughter of thirty thousand of his enemies. Ellac, the son of Attila, however, was preserved in the memorable battle of Netad; his early valor had raised him to the throne of the Aetziures, a Scythian people, whom he subdued; and his father, who loved the superior merit, would have enveiled the death, of Ellac. His brother Dengisch, with an army of Huns, still formidable in their flight and ruin, maintained his ground above fifteen years on the banks of the Danube. The palace of Attila, with the old country of Dacia, from the Carpathian hills to the Euxine, became the seat of a new power, which was erected by Ardarcus, king of the Gepida. The Pannonian confederates, from whom the Huns were driven, were divided among the Ostrogoths; and the settlements of the tribes, who had so bravely asserted their native freedom, were irregularly distributed, according to the measure of their respective strength. Surrounded and oppressed by the multitude of his father's slaves, the kingdom of Dengisch was confined to the circle of his waggon; his desperate courage urged him to invade the eastern empire; he fell in battle; and his head, ignominiously exposed in the Hippodrome, exhibited a grateful spectacle to the people of Constantinople. Attila had fondly or superstition believed, that Irm, the same who had superseded his father, would extirpate the honor and renown of his race. The character of that prince, who attempted to moderate the rashness of his brother Dengisch, was more suitable to the declining condition of the Huns; and Irmac, with his subject horses, retired into the heart of the Lesser Scythia. They were soon overwhelmed by a torrent of new barbarians, who followed the same road which their own ancestors had formerly discovered. The Gænæos, or Avaræs, whose residence is assigned by the Greek writers to the shores of the ocean, impelled the adjacent tribes; till at length the Iguns of the North, descending from the borders of the Danube, and which produced the most valuable furs, spread themselves over the desert, as far as the Boristhenes and the Caspian gates; and finally extinguished the empire of the Huns. A

The historian Priscus had positively mentioned the effect which this example produced on the mind of Attila. Jornandes, c. 12, pl. 432. A. D. 453. The picture of Raphael is in the Vatican; the base (or perhaps the foot) is in the church of St. Peter, Scutari. Bos, Réflexions sur la Poésie et sur l'Art en Pannonie, p. 359, 360. Barozzaro (Annal. Eccles. A. D. 420, No. 57. 58.) basely stains the truth of the apparition; which is rejected, however, by the learned and pious catholics.

Such an event might contribute to the murder of the patrician. Safety of the eastern empire, under the Aetius. reign of a prince who conciliated the friendship, without forfeiting the esteem, of the barbarians, but the reign of a weak, fickle and dissolute Valentinian, who had reached his thirty-fifth year without attaining the age of reason or courage, abused this apparent security, to undermine the foundations of his own throne, by the murder of the patrician Aetius. From the instinct of a base and jealous mind, he hated the man who was universally celebrated as the terror of the barbarians, and the support of the republic; and his new favourite, the eunuch Heraclius, awakened the emperor from the supine lethargy, which might be disguised, during the life of Flaccidus, by the excuse of filial piety. The fame of Flaccidus, his wealth and dignity, the numerous and martial train of barbarian followers, his powerful dependents, who filled the civil offices of the state, and the hopes of his son Gaudentius, who was already contracted to Eudoxia, the emperor's daughter, had raised him above the rank of a subject, and the ambitious designs, of which he was accused, excited the fears, as well as the resentment, of Valentinian. Aetius himself, supported by the consciousness of his merit, his services, and perhaps his innocence, seems to have maintained a haughty and indi creadulously, of the patrician's conduct, his sovereign was provoked into a hostile declaration; he aggravated the offense, by compelling him to ratify, with a solemn oath, a treaty of reconciliation and alliance; he proclaimed his suspicions, he neglected his safety: and from a vain confidence that the enemy, whom he despised, was incapable of a similar crime, he permitted a person in the palace of Rome. Whilst he urged, perhaps with intemperate vehemence, the marriage of his son, Valentinian, drawing his sword, the first sword he had ever drawn, plunged it in the breast of a general who had saved his empire; his courtiers and eunuchs, excited by his sovereign'std, and lead ter, and Aetius, pierced with a hundred wounds, fell dead in the royal presence. Boethius, the prae tor prefect, was killed at the same moment; and before the event could be divulged, the principal friends of the patrician were summoned to the palace, and separately murdered. The horrid deed, palliated by the specious names of justice and necessity, was immedi dately communicated by the emperor to his soldiers, his subjects, and his allies. The nations, who were strangers or enemies to Aetius, generously deplored the unworthy fate of a hero: the barbarians, who had been attached to his service, dispersed their grief and resentment: and the public contempt, which had been so long entertained for Valentinian, was at once converted into deep and universal abhorrence. Such sentiments seldom pervade the walls of a palace; yet the emperor was confounded by the honest reply of a Roman, whose approbation he had not disdained to solicit: "I am ignorant, Sir, of your motives and pro cussions: I only know, that you have acted like a man who cuts off his right hand with his left." And the bravery of the inglorious martyr seems to have won the favor of Maximus. His name is associated with the long and frequent visits of Valentinian; who was consequently more despised at Rome than in any other part of his dominions. A republican spirit was insensibly revived in the senate, as their authority, and even their supplies, became necessary for the support of his feeble government.

The stately demeanour of an hereditary monarch off fended their pride; and the pleasures of Valentinian families were injurious to the peace and honour of noble families. The birth of the empress Eudoxia was equal or superior to the birth of a gifted child of the west. She was observed in the presence of the clergy, and the emperor; he resolved to accomplish them, either by stratagem or force. Deep gaming was one of the vices of the court: the emperor, who, by chance or contrivance, had gained from Maximus a considerable sum, un-consequently excited his ring as a security for the de bt; and sent it by a trusty messenger, to his wife, wit an order, in her husband's name, that she should imme diately attend the empress Eudoxia. The unsuspecting wife of Maximus was conveyed in her litter to the imperial palace; the empresses of her impatient lover conducted to a remote and silent bed droom, which was afterwards converted, under the laws of hospitality, into the chambers of the laws of hospitality. Her tears, when she returned home; her deep affliction; and her bitter reproaches against a husband, whom she considered as the ac complice of his own shame, excited Maximus to a desire of revenge. He rashly resolved his son, his ambition by ambition; and he might reasonably aspire, by the free suffers of the Roman senate, to the throne of a d tested and despicable rival. Valentinian, who sup posed that every human breast was devoted, like his own, of friendship and gratitude, had imprudently admitted among his wards several domestics and fol lowers of Aetius. Two of these, of barbarian race, were persuaded to execute a sacred and honourable duty, by punishing with death the assassin of their patron; and their intrepid courage did not long expec moral spirit and ambition. Valentinian was less excusable, se since he had passions, without virtues; even his re ligion was questionable; and though he never deviat ed into the paths of heresy, he scandalized the pious christians by his attachment to the profane arts of

* With regard to the cause and circumstances of the deaths of Aetius and Valentinian, our information is dark and imperfect. Procopius, the Byzantine historian, who wrote sixty years after the events which preceded his own memory, his narrative must therefore be supplied and corrected by five or six Chronicles, none of which were composed in Rome or Italy; and which can only express, in broken sentences, the popular rumors, as they were conveyed to a foreign author. Such information,.correct, and not, perhaps, in its true grade of importance, stimu late of anticipation or delay. The poets of the age, Claudian (d must acknowledge with some surprise. It is a truism to say that the Roman government appeared every day less formidable to its enemies, more odious and oppressive to its subjects. The taxes were multiplied with the public distress; economy was neglected in proportion as it became necessary; and the injustice of the rich shifted the unequal burthen from themselves to the people, whom they defrauded of the indulgences that might sometimes have alleviated their misery. The severe inquisition, which confiscated their goods, and tortured their persons, compelled the subjects of Valentinian to endure the more intolerable tyranny of the barbarians, to fly to the woods and mountains, or to embrace the vile and abject condition of mercenary servants. They abjured and abhorred the name of Roman citizens, which had formerly excited the ambition of mankind. The Armoricane provinces of Gaul, and the greater part of Spain, were thrown into a state of disorderly independence, by the confederations of the Bagaudae; and the imperial ministers pursued with proscripive laws, and ineffectual arms, the rebels whom they had made. If all the barbarian conquerors had been an inability was incapable of the slightest acquisition, or the smallest remembrance of it would not have restored the empire of the west: and if Rome still survived, she survived the loss of freedom, of virtue, and of honour.

Sack of Rome by Generica, king of the Vandals. - His naval preparations. - Succession of the last emperors of the west, Maximian, Avitus, Majorian, Severus, Athenobius, Albinus, Glycerius, Nepos, Augustulus. - Total extinction of the western empire. - Reign of Odoacer, the first barbarian king of Italy.

The loss or desolation of the provinces, from the ocean to the Alps, impaired the glory and greatness of Rome: her internal prosperity was irretrievably destroyed by the separation of Africa. The rapacious Vandals confiscated the patrimonial estates of the emperors, and their prior subsidies, which relieved the poverty, and encouraged the idleness of the inhabitants. The distress of the Romans was soon aggravated by an unexpected attack; and the province, so long cultivated for their use by industrious and obedient subjects, was armed against them by an ambitious barbarian. The Vandals and Alans were conquerors. Valentinian, who had secured the successful standard of Generica, had acquired a rich and fertile territory, which stretched along the coast above ninety days' journey from Tangier to Tripoli; but their narrow limits were pressed and confined, on either side, by the sandy desert and the Mediterranean. The discovery and conquest of the black nations, that might dwell beneath the torrid zone, could not terminate the ambition of Generica; but he cast his eyes towards the sea; he resolved to create a naval power, and his bold resolution was executed with steady and active perseverance. The woods of mount Atlas afforded an inexhaustible nursery of timber; his new subjects were skilled in the art of navigation and ship-building; and he animated his daring Vandals to embrace a mode of warfare which would render every maritime country accessible to their arms; the Moors and Africans were allured by the hopes of plunder; and, after an interval of six centuries, the fleets that issued from the port of Carthage again claimed the empire of the Mediterranean. The success of the Vandals, the conquest of Sicily, the sack of Palermo, and the frequent descents on the coast of Lucania, awakened and alarmed the mother of Valentinian, and the sister of Theodosius. Alliances were formed; and armaments, expensive and ineffectual, were prepared, for the destruction of the common enemy; who reserved his courage to encounter those dangers which his policy could not prevent or elude. The designs of the Roman government were repeatedly baffled by his artful delays, ambiguous promises, and apparent concessions; and the inability was incapable of his character, which the king of the Huns, recalled the emperors from the coast of Africa to the care of their domestic safety. The revolts of the palace, which left the western empire without a defender, and without a lawful prince, dispirited the apprehensions, and stimulated the avarice, of Generica. He immediately equipped a numerous fleet of Vandals and Moors, and, with that armament, the mouth of the Tiber, about three months after the death of Valentinian, and the elevation of Maximus to the imperial throne.

The life of the senator Petronius Maximus, often alleged as a rare example of human felicity. His emperor Maximus, A.D. 455. March 17.

The character and reign of the emperor Petronius Maximus, which was the thirteenth of the episcopate of the see of Rome. This bishop is mentioned in the Chronicle of Isidore. He was one of the first prelates of Ravenna, and of that see, on which the city of Byzantium, or Constantinople, was transplanted. For the See of Ravenna was given to the bishop that first pitched battles with the Roman troops, are repeatedly mentioned in the Chronicle of Isidore. Sulpicius Severus, in the name hour, their total number in very forcible language. Hic numen circum Romanorum... unde ultra repetitur ac fugit, nec vide tamen sed etiam abominabile person habetur. al house of Theodosius. The imprudent Maximus disregarded these salutary considerations: he gratified his resentment and ambition; he saw the bleeding corpse of Valentinian at his feet; and he heard himself saluted emperor by the unanimous voice of the senate and people. But the day of his inauguration was the last of his happiness. He was assassinated (such is the lively expression of Sidonius) in the palace; and after passing a sleepless night, he sighed that he had attained the summit of his wishes, and aspired only to descend from the dangerous elevation. Opposite to the weight of the diadem, he communicated his anxious thoughts to his son and successor, Fulgentius; and when he looked back with unavailing regret on the secure pleasures of his former life, the emperor exclaimed, "O fortunate Damocles! thy reign began and ended with the same dinner." A well known allusion, which Fulgentius afterwards repeated as an instructive lesson for princes and subjects.

His death, A.D. 455, had lost the command, were disturbed by remorse, or guilt, or terror, and his throne was shaken among the ranks of the soldiers and the people in the confederate barbarians. The marriage of his son Palladius with the eldest daughter of the late emperor, might tend to establish the hereditary succession of his family; but the violence which he offered to the empress Eudoxia, could proceed only from the blind impulse of his revenge. He was not unjustified by the indirect confession of Maximus himself; and he wantonly provoked the hatred of his unfortunate bride, who was still conscious that she descended from a line of emperors. From the east, however, Eudoxia could dig gold and silver at any effectual assistance; her father and her aunt Pulcheria were dead; her mother languished at Jerusalem in disgrace and exile; and the sceptre of Constantinople was in the hands of a stranger. She directed her eyes towards Carthage; secretly implored the aid of the King of the Vandals; and succeeded in impairing the fair opportunity of disguising his rapacious designs by the specious names of honour, justice, and compassion. Whatsoever abilities Maximus might have shown in a subordinate station, he was found incapable of administering an empire; and though he had renounced the immoral pleasures which were made on the opposite shores of Africa, he expected with supine indifference the approach of the enemy, without adopting any measures of defence, of negotiation, or of a timely retreat. When the Vandals disembarked at the mouth of the river, he was suddenly roused from his lethargy by the clamours of a trebling and exasperated multitude. The only hope which presented itself to his astonished mind was that of a precipitate flight, and he exhorted the senators to imitate the example of his prince. But the emperor did manifest any effectual assistance; he neither was assaulted by a shower of stones: a Roman, or a Burgundian, soldier, claimed the honor of the first wound; his mangled body was ignominiously cast into the Tiber; the Roman people rejoiced in the punishment which they had inflicted on the author of the public calamities; and the domesticus of Eudoxia signaled their zeal in the service of their mistress.

On the third day after the tumult, the successor of Rome Genseric boldly advanced from the port of Ostia to the gates of the defenceless city. Instead of a rally of the Roman youth, there issued from the gates an unruly and venal populace of the bishop at the head of his clerks; and the emperor, as usual, gave way to the importunities of his city. But it immediately mitigated the fierceness of a barbarian conqueror; the king of the Vandals promised to spare the unsuspecting multitude, to protect the buildings from fire, and to exempt the captives from torture; and although such orders were neither seriously given nor strictly obeyed, the mediation of Leo was glorious to himself, and in some degree beneficial to his country. But Rome and its inhabitants were delivered to the licentiousness of the Vandals and Moors, whose blind passions revenged the injuries of Carthage. The pillage lasted fourteen days and nights; and all that remained of public or private wealth, of sacred or profane treasure, was diligently transported to the vessels of Genseric. Among the spoils, the splendid relics of two temples, or rather of two religious, exhibited a memorable example of the vicesinhuman and divine things. The Christian senate took no measures to recover their treasure; even the statues, originally framed in an according to the particular instructions of God himself, and which were placed in the sanctuary of his temple, had been ostentatiously displayed to the Roman people in the triumph of Titus. They were afterwards deposited in the temple of Peace, and the system of four hundred years was preserved. The spoils of Jerusalem were transferred from Rome to Carthage by a barbarian who derived his origin from the shores of the Baltic. These ancient monuments might attract the notice of curiosity, as well as of avarice. But the Christian churches, enriched and adorned by the precious vessels from between our shores, were plundered with regard to the particulars of stone and materials; and the splendid relics of the Gothic invasion, the pious and luxury of Rome were in some measure restored; and it was difficult either to escape, or to satisfy, the avarice of a conqueror, who possessed leisure to collect, and ships to transport, the wealth of the capital. The imperial ornaments of the palace, the magnificent furniture and wardrobe, the sideboards of massive plate, were accumulated with disorderly rapine: the gold and silver amounted to several thousand talents; yet even the base and common were laboriously removed.

Vandals herself, who advanced to meet her friend, was attended by the imprudence of her own conduct. She was rudely stripped of her jewels; and the unfortunate empress, with her two daughters, the only surviving remains of the great Theodosius, was compelled, as a captive, to follow the haughty Vandals; who immediately hoisted sail, and returned with a prosperous navigation to the port of Cartaghes. Many thousands Romans, of both sexes, chosen for some useful or agreeable qualifications, reluctantly embarked on board the fleet of Genserici; and their distress was aggravated by the unfeeling barbarians, who, in the division of the booty, separated the wives from the husbands, and the children from their parents. The charity of Deodaghatas, bishop of Carthage, was their only consolation and support. He generously sold the gold and silver plate of the church to purchase the freedom of some, to alleviate the slaves of others, and to assist the wants of the indigent multitudes. The sick were distributed in convenient beds, and liberal supplies of food and medicine. The aged prelate repeated his visits both in the day and night, with an assiduity that surpassed his strength, and a tender sympathy which enhanced the value of his services. Compare this scene with the field of Cannæ; and judge between Hannibal and the successor of St. Cyprian.

The empress Avitus. A.D. 455. July 16th.

The deaths of Aëtius and Valentinian had relaxed the ties which held the barbarians of Gaul in peace and subordination. The sea-coast was infested by the Saxons; the Alamanni and the Franks advanced from the Rhine to the Rhone; and pressed the confines of Gaul, which seemed to meditate more extensive and permanent conquests. The emperor Maximus relieved himself, by a judicious choice, from the weight of these distant cares; he silenced the solicitations of his friends, listened to the voice of fame, and promoted a stranger to the general command of the forces of Gaul. Aëtius, the stranger, whose merit was so nobly rewarded, descended from a wealthy and honourable family in the diocese of Agvernum. The convulsions of the times urged him to embrace, with the same ardour, the civil and martial dignities which tempted the indolent youth. Blended the studies of literature and arms, he became acquainted with the exercise of arms and hunting. Thirty years of his life were lavishly spent in the public service; he alternately displayed his talents in war and negotiation; and the soldier of Aëtius, after executing the most important embassies, was raised to the station of prætorian prefect of Gaul. Either the merit of Aëtius excited envy, or his moderation was desirous of repose, since he calmly retired to an estate, which he possessed in the neighbourhood of Clermont. A copious stream, issuing from the mountain, and falling heavily, broad and foaming, at the source of the river, charged its waters into a lake about two miles in length, and the villa was pleasantly seated on the margin of the lake. The baths, the porticoes, the summer and winter apartments, were adapted to the purposes of luxury and ease; and the adjacent country afforded many various prospects of a different sort.

In this retreat, where Avitus amused his leisure with books, rural sports, the practice of husbandry, and the society of his friends, he received the imperial diploma, which constituted him master-general of the cavalry and infantry of Gaul. He assumed the military command; the barbarians soon discovered that whatever power he might employ, whatever conquests he might hope to make, the people enjoyed the benefits of actual tranquillity. But the fate of Gaul depended on the Visigoths; and the Roman general, less attentive to his dignity than to the public interest, did not omit to visit the palace of an ambassador. He was received with courteous hospitality by Theodoric, the king of the Goths; but while Avitus laid the foundations of a solid alliance with that powerful nation, he was astonished by the intelligence, that the emperor Maximus was slain, and that Rome had been pillaged by the Vandals. Theodosic, whom Avitus was in the character of the purple, had acquired the title of king of the Gothicachen by the murder of his brother Theodoric. A.D. 455. 455. He suffered this atrocious deed by the design which his predecessor had formed of violating his alliance with the empire.2 Such a crime might not be incompatible with the virtues of a barbarian; but the manners of the senator Avitus were gentle and humane; and his posterity may contemplate without terror the original picture of a Gothic king, whom Sidonius had intimately observed, in the hours of peace and of social intercourse. In an epistle, dated from the court of Thoulouse, the orator satisfies the curiosity of one of his friends, in the following description.3 "By the majesty of his appearance, Theodoric would command the respect of those

1 After the example of the younger Pliny, Sidonius, (I. ii. c. 5.) laboured the florid, prolix, and obscure description of his villain, which bore the name (Aristeas,) and had been the property of a rhetorician. The present editor has not ascertained. Consult however the notes of Savaron and Strasburger.

2 Sidonius, (I. ii. epist. 5.) has described the country life of the barbarian nobles, in a most agreeable manner. "They but(Men.) were in the neighbourhood of Nimes. The morning hours were spent in the spheratation, or tennis court; or in the library, which was furnished with Latin authors, profane and religious: the former for the men, the latter for the ladies. The table was twice served, at dinner, and at the banquet, with most splendid fare. During the intermediate time, the company walked, took their regular meal on horseback, and drank the best wine. In this elegant habitation, the emperor Avitus, the senate, and the whole court, was tutored by the hands of the honest historian, Romanum ambass. imperii. (Greg. Turon. ii. 16."

3 Jerome, archbishop of Strasbourg, who was himself of the blood of the Goths, and who is celebrated for his knowledge, and almost justifies, (Hist. Goth. p. 718;) the crime which the slave Jornandes, was to meditate on his master. (c. 43. p. 673.)

4 This elaborate description (I. c. ep. ii. p. 2—7.) was dictated by some political motive. It was designed for the public eye, and had been shown by the friends of Sidonius, before it was inserted in the collection of his epistles. The first book was published separately. See Tillemont, Memoires Eccles. tom. xvi. p. 204.

who are ignorant of his merit; and although he is born a prince, his merit would dignify a private station. He is of a middle stature, his body appears rather plump than fat, and in his well-proportioned limbs agility is united with muscular strength. If you examine his countenance, you will distinguish a high forehead, large shaggy eyebrows, an aquiline nose, thin lips, a regular set of white teeth, and a fair complexion, that blushes more frequently from modesty than from anger. The ordinary distribution of his time, as far as it is exposed to the public view, may be concisely represented. Before day-break, he repairs, with a small train, to his domestic chapel, where the service is performed by the Arian clergy; but those who presume to interpret his secret sentiments, consider this assiduous devotion as the effect of habit and policy. The rest of the morning is employed in the administration of his kingdom. His chair is surrounded by some military officers of decent aspect and behaviour: the noisy crowd of his barbarian guards occupies the hall of audience: but they are not permitted to stand within the veils or curtains, that conceal the execrable visages beneath the abject demeanour of the nations are successively introduced: Theodoric listens with attention, answers them with discreet brevity, and either announces or delays, according to the nature of their business, his final resolution. About eight (the second hour) he rises from his throne, and with the air of a duty or his office to hunt, or at least to exercise himself on horseback, his bow is carried by a favourite youth; but when the game is marked, he bends it with his own hand, and seldom misses the object of his aim: as a king, he disdains to bear arms in such ignoble warfare: but as a soldier, he would blush to accept any military service which he could perform himself. On common days, his dinner is not different from the repast of a private citizen; but every Saturday, many honourable guests are invited to the royal table, which, on these occasions, is served with the elegance of Greece, the plenty of Gaul, and the order and diligence of Italy.

The gold or silver plate is less remarkable for its weight, than for the brightness and curious workmanship: the taste is gratified without the help of foreign and costly luxury; the size and number of the cups of wine are regulated with a strict regard to the laws of temperance; and the respectful silence that prevails is interrupted only by grave and instructive conversation. After dinner, Theodoric sometimes indulges himself in a short slumber; and as soon as he awakes, he calls for his followers, or his friends to meet the royal majesty, and is delighted when they freely express the passions which are excited by the incidents of play. At this game, which he loves as the image of war, he alternately displays his eagerness, his skill, his patience, and his cheerful temper. If he loses, he laughs: he is modest and silent if he wins. Yet, notwithstanding this seeming indifference, his courtiers choose to solicit any favour in the moments of victory; and I myself, in my applications to the king, have derived some benefit from my losses.

About the ninth hour (three o'clock) the tide of business again returns, and flows incessantly till after sunset, when the signal of the royal supper dismisses the weary crowd of applicants and pleaders. At the supper, a more familiar repast, buffoons and pantomimes are sometimes introduced, to divert, not to offend, the company, by their ridiculous wit: but female singers, and the soft effeminate modes of music, are severely banished, and such martial tunes as animate the soul to deeds of valour are alone grateful to the ear of Theodoric. He retires from the table; and the nocturnal guards are immediately posted at the entrance of the temple, the palace, and the private apartments.

When the king of the Visigoths, in obedience to his nation, assumed the purple, in Spain, he offered his person and his forces, as a faithful soldier of the republic. The exploits of Theodoric soon convinced the world, that he had not degenerated from the ercic virtues of his ancestors.

After the establishment of the Goths in Aquitain, and the passage of the Vandals into Africa, the Suevi, who had fixed their kingdom in Galicia, aspired to the conquest of Spain, and threatened to extinguish the feeble remains of the Roman dominion. The provincials of Cartagena and Tarraconae, afflicted by a hostile invasion, represented their injuries and their apprehensions. Count Fronto was despatched, in the name of the emperor Avitus, with advantageous offers of peace and alliance; and Theodoric interposed his voice, and expressed his sentiments in the following terms: "If law, the king of the Suevi, immediately retired, he should be obliged to arm in the cause of justice and of Rome. "Tell him," replied the haughty Rechriarius, "that I despise his friendship and his arms; but that I shall soon try, whether he will dare to expect the victory, or to enroll his name in history. If he chooses, in the first challenge urged Theodoric to prevent the bold designs of his enemy: he passed the Pyrenees at the head of the Visigoths: the Franks and Burgundians served under his standard; and though he professed himself the dutiful servant of Avitus, he privately stipulated, for himself and his successors, the absolute possession of the Spanish conquests. The two armies, or rather the two nations, encountered each other on the banks of the river Uricbus, about twelve miles from Astorga; and the decisive victory of the Goths appeared for a while to have extinguished the name and kingdom of the Suevi. From the field of battle Theodoric advanced to Braga, their metropolis, which still retained the splendid vestiges of its ancient commerce and dignity.

His entrance was not polluted with blood; and the Goths respected the chastity of their female captives, more especially of the consecrated virgins; but the greatest part of the clergy and people were made slaves, and even the churches and altars were confined in the universal pillage. The unfortunate king of the Suevi had escaped to the banks of the river Bidasoa; but the winds opposed his flight; he was delivered to his implacable rival; and Rechriarius, who neither desired nor expected mercy, received, with many constancy, a death which he probably would have inflicted. After this bloody sacrifice to policy or resentment, Theodoric carried his victorious arms as far as Merida, the principal town of Lusitania, without meeting any resistance, except from the miraculous powers of St. Elia; but he was stopped in the full career of success, and returned to Spain, before he was able to secure the security of his conquests. In his retreat towards the Pyrenees, he revenged his disappointment on the country through which he passed; and, in the sack of Pollentia and Astorga, he showed himself a faithless ally, as well as a cruel enemy. Whilst the king of the Visigoths fought and vanquished in the name of Avitus, the reign of Avitus had expired; and both the honour and the interest of Theodoric were deeply wounded by the disgrace of a friend, whom he had insulted on the throne of the western empire. 8

Avitus is deposed, and Avitus fixes his residence at Rome, and to accept the consulship for the ensuing year. On the first day of January his son-in-law, Sidonius Apollinaris, celebrated his praises in a panegyric of six hundred verses; but this composition, though it was preceded by a brass statue, 9 seems to contain a very moderate proportion either of genius or of truth. The poet, if we may degrade that sacred name, exag-erates the merit of a sovereign and a father; and his prophecy of a long and glorious reign was soon contradicted by the event. Avitus, at a time when the imperial dignity was vested in a character, such as he described in his pages, an em-danger, indulged himself in the pleasures of Italian luxury: age had not extinguished his amorous inclinations; and he is accused of insulting, with incredulous and ungenerous raillery, the husbands whose wives he had seduced or violated. But the Romans were not inclined, either to excuse his faults, or to acknowledge his virtues. The several parts of the empire became every day more alienated from each other; and the stranger of Gaul was the object of popular hatred and contempt. The senate asserted their legitimate claim in the election of an emperor; and the

by the basest means; but that, from the old constitution, was again fortified by the actual weakness of a declining monarchy. Yet even such a monarchy might have resisted the votes of an unarmen senate, if their discontent had not been supported, or perhaps inflamed, by the count Rieinier, one of the principal captains of the barbarian armies, who, formed the military defence of Italy. The daughter of Wallia, king of the Visigoths, was the mother of Rieinier; but he was descended, on the father's side, from the nation of the Suevi: 10 his pride, or patriotism, might be exasperated by the misfortunes of his countrymen; and he obeyed, with reluctance, the claims of an emperor in whose elevation he had not been consulted. His faithful and important services against the common enemy rendered him still more formi-

5 able; 11 and after destroying, on the coast of Corsica, a fleet of Vandals, which consisted of sixty galleys, Rieinier returned in triumph with the appellation of the Deliverer of Italy. He chose that moment to signify to Avitus, that his reign was at an end; and the feeble emperor, at a distance from his Gothic allies, was compelled, after a short and unavailing struggle, to fly from the court. But, if the emperor, on the contrary, of Rieinier, 12 he was permitted to descend from the throne, to the more desirable station of bishop of Piacentia; but the resentment of the senate was still unsatisfied; and their inflexible severity pronounced the sentence of his death. He fled towards the Alps, with the humble hope, not of saving the Visigoths in his cause, but of securing his person and treasures in the sanctuary of Julian, one of the tutelar saints of Auvergne. 13 Disease or the

brian, whose birth excluded him from the imperial dignity, governed Italy, with the title of Patrician; residually, in the capacity of master-general of the cavalry and infantry; and, after an interval of some months, consented to the unanimous wish of the Romans, whose favour Majorian had solicited by a recent victory over the Allemaniacs. He was invested with the purple at Ravenna; and the episode which he addressed to the senate will best describe his situation and his sentiments. "Your election, Conspect Fathers! and the ordinance of the most valiant army, have made me your emperor. May the propitious Deity direct and prosper the counsels and events of my administration, to your advantage, and to the welfare of the state. For, if I did not aspire, I have submitted, to reign; nor should I have discharged the obligations of a citizen, if I had refused, with base and selfish ingratitude, to support the weight of those labours, which were imposed by the republic. Assist, therefore, the prince whom you have made; partake the duties which you have enjoined; and may our common endeavours promote the happiness of an empire, which I have accepted from your hands. Be assured, that, in our times, justice will resume her ancient vigour, and that virtue shall become the prevailing notion of every honest man, none, except the authors themselves, be apprehensive of delusions, which, as a subject, I have condemned, and, as a prince, will severely punish. Our own vigilance, and that of our father, the patrician Ricimer, shall guarantee the public affairs to the safety of the Roman world, which we have saved from foreign and domestic enemies. You now understand the maxims of my government: you may confide in the faithful love and sincere assurances of a prince, who has formerly been the companion of your life, and who never was so gloomy in the name of a senator; and who is anxious, that you should never repent of the judgment which you have pronounced in his favour." The emperor, who, amidst the ruins of the Roman world, revived the ancient language of law and liberty, which Trajan would not have disclaimed, must have derived those generous sentiments from his own heart; since they were not suggested to his imitation by the customs of his age, or the example of his predecessors.

His salutary The private and public actions of Majorian are very imperfectly known; but his laws, remarkable for an original cast of thought and expression, faithfully represent the character of a sovereign, who loved his people, who sympathized in their distress, who had studied the causes of the empires, and who was capable of applying (as far as such reformation was practicable) judicious and effectual remedies to the public disorders. His regulations concerning the finances manifestly tended to remove, or at least to mitigate, the most intolerable grievances. I. From the choice of the head of the state (he translated his own words) to relieve the weary fortunes of the provincials, oppressed by the accumulated weight of indignities and superindulgences.

With this view, he granted an universal amnesty, a final and absolute discharge of all arrears of tribute, of all debts, which, under any pretence, the fiscal officers might demand from the people. This wise derecution of obsolete, vexatious, and unprofitable claims, improved and purified the sources of the public revenue; and the subject who could now look back without despair, might labour with hope and gratitude for himself and for his country. 2. Majorian restored the ordinary jurisdiction of the provincial magistrates; and suppressed the extraordinary commissions which had been introduced, in the name of the emperor himself, or of the pretorian prefects. The favourite servants, who obtained such irregular powers, were insolent in their behaviour, and arbitrary in their demands: they affected to despise the subordinate tribunals, and they were discontented, if their fees and profits did not twice exceed the sum which they condescended to pay into the treasury. One instance of resistance to the authority of the emperor, seems not to be authenticated by the legislator himself. They exacted the whole payment in gold: but they refused the current coin of the empire, and would accept only such ancient pieces as were stamped with the names of those emperors of whom the provincials, unprovided with these curious medals, had recourse to the expedient of compounding with their rapacious demands; or, if he succeeded in the research, his imposition was doubled, according to the weight and value of the money of former times. 3. The municipal corporations, (says the emperor,) the lesser senators, (so antiquity has justly styled them,) deserve to be considered as the heart of the cities, and the sinews of the republic. And yet so low are they now reduced, by the injustice of magistrates, and the venality of collectors, that many of their members, renouncing their dignity and their country, have taken refuge in distant and obscure exile." He urges, and even compels, their return to their respective cities; but he removes the grievance which had forced them to desert the exercise of their municipal functions. They are to render the assistance of the provincial magistrates, to resume their office of leving the tribute; but, instead of being made responsible for the whole sum assessed on their district, they are only required to produce a regular account of the payments which they have collected, and of the defaulters who are still indebted to the public. 4. But Majorian was not ignorant, that these corporate bodies were too much inclined to retaliate the injustice and oppression which they had suffered; and he therefore revives the useful office of the defenders of cities. He exhorts the people to elect, in a full and free assembly, some man of discretion and integrity, who would dare to assert their privileges, to represent their grievances, to protect the poor from the tyranny of the rich, and to inform the emperor of the abuses that were committed under the sanction of his name and authority.

2. The learned Graevius (vol. i. p. 293, 330, 331), has found, by a diligent inquiry, that a very ancient law of the Antonines weighed one hundred and eighteenth marks of silver, and on the death of the emperor, the mark of silver was reduced to the value of seven Moro of the ancient buton. Majorian gives currency to a spondon, excepting only the Graevius solidus, from its delicacy, not in the weight, but in the standard.
Vandals, for the mischief which they had neither leisure, nor power, nor perhaps inclination, to perpetrate. The tempest of war might strike some lofty turrets to the ground; but the destruction which undermined the base nine encumbered towers, even when none was pronounced, slowly and silently, during a period of ten centuries; and the motives of interest, that afterwards operated without shame or control, were severely checked by the taste and spirit of the emperor Majorian. The decay of the city had gradually impaired the last fragments of public works. The few buildings that were not razed might still excite, but they seldom gratified, the desires of the people: the temples, which had escaped the zeal of the christians, were no longer inhabited either by gods or men; the diminished crowds of the Romans were lost in the immense space of their baths and porticoes; and the reliefs and halls of justice were useless to an indolent generation, whose repose was seldom disturbed, either by study or business. The monuments of consular, or imperial, greatness were no longer revered, as the immortal glory of the capital: they were only esteemed as an inexhaustible mine of materials, cheaper, and more convenient than the distant quarry. Specious petitions were continually addressed to the easy magistrates of Rome, which stated the want of stones or bricks for some necessary service: the finest forms of architecture were rudely defaced for the sake of some paltry, or temporary, repairs; and the degenerate Romans, who converted the spoil to their own emolument, demolished, with sacrilegious hands, the labours of their ancestors. Majorian, who had often sighed over the desolation of the city, applied a severe remedy to the growing evil. He reserved to the prince and senate the sole cognizance of the public buildings which could be converted into materials of an ancient edifice; imposed a fine of fifty pounds of gold (two thousand pounds sterling,) on every magistrate who should presume to grant such illegal and scandalous licence; and threatened to chastise the criminal obedience of their subordinate officers, by a severe censure, and the amputation of both their hands. In the last instance, the legislator might seem to forget the proportion of guilt and punishment; but his zeal arose from a generous principle, and Majorian was anxious to protect the monuments of those ages, in which he would have desired and deserved to live. The new system, however, did not increase the number of his subjects; that it was his duty to guard the purity of the marriage-bed: but the means which he employed to accomplish these salutary purposes, are of an ambiguous, and perhaps exceptionable, kind. The pious maid, who consecrated her virginal innocence to the altar of true religion, could in no case be led astray by the allurements of this world; till they had reached their forty-fifth year. Widows under that age were compelled to form a second alliance within the term of five years, by the forfeiture of half their wealth to their nearest relations, or to the state. The extreme marriages were condemned or annulled. The punishment of confiscation and exile was deemed so inadequate to the guilt of adultery, that, if the criminal returned to Italy, he might, by the express declaration of Majorian, be slain with impunity. 2

While the emperor Majorian assiduously endeavoured to restore the happiness and virtue of the Romans, he encountered the arduous task of opposing the censures of Genseric the Visigoth, with great success. 3

2 The whole edict (Novell. Major. Al. vi. p. 53) is curious.
3 Apart from some brief apocryphal stories, Bucolica, Epitoma, and Satyricon, the Emperor's personal correspondence is very scanty, and little, if anything, is to be gathered from the contemporary historians, with the exception of Suetonius. The real historian, in fact, is the poet, who, by the power of his imagination, has given us a more perfect picture of the state of the Empire at the time of Majorian, than any other writer of the period. The art of the commentator has in this instance been more distinctly united with the poetical faculty, and for this reason the poem is far more important than either Sestren or Sibonius.
The single envious, and ceiiinus many second but Sidonius Sidon. Peace is evidence. Sometimes rate he of Romanania who saved this fleet. Immediately he vied with each other in liberal contributions to the public service; and the imperial navy of three hundred large galleys, with an adequate proportion of transports and smaller vessels, was collected in secret and capacious harbour of Carthage in Spain. The city had counterspun the threads of its troops with a confidence of victory; and if we might credit the historian Procopius, his courage sometimes hurried him beyond the bounds of prudence. Anxious to explore, with his own eyes, the state of the enemy, he ventured, recognising the colour of his hair, to visit Carthage, in the chariot of his own ambassador; and Generis was afterwards mortified by the discovery, that he had entertained and dismissed the emperor of the Romans. Such an anecdote may be rejected as an improbable fiction; but it is a fiction which would not have been imagined, unless in the life of a hero.

The loss of his fleet Without the help of a personal interview, Generis was sufficiently acquainted with the genius and designs of his adversary. He practised his customary arts of fraud and delay, but he prolonged his sallies and scoutings. Under the peace became hour more subservise, and perhaps more sincere; but the inflexible Majorian had adopted the ancient maxim, that Rome could not be safe, as long as Carthage existed in a hostile state. The king of the Vandals distrusted the valour of his native subjects, and by the powerful league into which he suspected the fidelity of the vanquished people, who abhorred him as an Arius tyrant; and the desperate measure which he executed, of reducing Mauritia to a desert, 2 could not defeat the operations of the Roman emperor, who was at liberty to direct his troops on the field of the African coast; and the Vandal craft of Generis was saved from impending and inevitable ruin by the treachery of some powerful subjects; envious, or apprehensive, of their master's success. Guided by their secret intelligence, he surprised the unguarded fleet of the Vandals; and it is said he carried away their treasures, and several of their vessels, and the preparations of three years were destroyed in a single day. After this event, the behaviour of the two antagonists showed them superior to their fortune. The Vandals, instead of being elated by this accidental victory, immediately renewed his solicitations for peace. The emperor of the west, who was capable of forming great designs, and of supporting heavy disappointments, consented to a treaty, or rather to a suspension of arms; in the full assurance that, before he could restore his navy, he should be supplied with provocations to justify a second war. Majorian returned to Italy, to prosecute his labours for the public happiness; and as he was conscious of his own integrity, he might long remain ignorant of the dark conspiracy which threatened his throne and his life. The recent Marcellinus and Claudinus, who were reared in the same had improved his taste; and his military talents had recommended him to the esteem and confidence of the great Athius, in whose ruin he was involved. By a timely flight, Marcellinus escaped the rage of Valentinian, and boldly asserted his liberty amidst the convulsions of the western empire. His voluntary, or reluctant, submission to the authority of Majorian, was reward of his vanity, rather than his submission; for the command of an army, stationed in that island to oppose, or to attack, the Vandals; but his barbarian mercenaries, after the emperor's death, were tempted to revolt by the artful liberality of Ricimer. At the head of a band of faithful followers, the intrepid Marcellinus occupied the island of Corsica, and proceeded with the command of the west, secured the love of his subjects by a mild and equitable reign, built a fleet, which claimed the dominion of the Adriatic, and alternately the coasts of Italy and of Africa.*

the purpose of the present chapter, or even of the present volume, to continue the distinct series of the Byzantine history; but a concise view of the reign and character of the emperor Leo, may explain the last efforts that were attempted to save the falling empire of the west.

Leo, emperor of the east.

Since the death of the younger Theodosius, Constantianus had never been interrupted by war or factions. Pulcheria had bestowed her hand, and the sceptre of the east, on the modest virtue of Marcellian: he gratefully revered her august rank and virgin chastity; and, after her death, he gave his people the example of the religious worship, that was due to the memory of the imperial saint. \(^1\) Attention to the prosperity of his own dominions, Marcellian seemed to behold with indifference the misfortunes of Rome; and the obstinate refusal of a brave and active prince, to draw his sword against the Vandals, was ascribed to a secret promise, which had formerly been exacted from him when he was a captive in the power of Genseric. \(^2\) The death of Marcellian, after a reign of seven or eight years, would have exposed the east to the danger of a popular election, if the superior weight of a single family had not been able to incline the balance in favour of the candidate whose interest they supported. The patrician Aspar might have placed the diadem on his own head, \(^3\) and would have settled the Nervii and the Vandals above the condition of a private subject, by his marriage with Euphemia, the daughter of the emperor Marcellian. This splendid alliance, which might supersede the necessity of merit, hastened the promotion of Anthemius, a barbarian from the name of the emperor, of consular, and of patrician; and his merit or fortune claimed the honours of a victory, which was obtained on the banks of the Danube, over the Huns. Without indulging an extravagant ambition, the son-in-law of Marcellian might hope to be his successor; but Aspar, whose sons had watched his sovereign with a breach of promise, and insolently shaking his purple, "It is not proper (said he) that the man who is invested with this garment, should be guilty of lying." \(^4\) Nor is it proper (replied Leo) that a prince should be compelled to resign his own judgment, and the public interest, to the will of a subject. \(^5\) After this extraordinary scene, it was impossible that the reconciliation of the emperor and the patrician could be sincere; or, at least, that it could be solid and permanent.

An army of barbarians was secretly levied, and introduced into Constantinople; and while Leo undermined the authority, and prepared the disgrace, of the family of Aspar, his mild and cautious behaviour restrained them from any rash and desperate attempts, which might have been fatal to his enemies. The measures of peace and war were affected by this internal revolution. As long as Aspar degraded the majesty of the throne, the secret correspondence of religion and interest engaged him to favour the cause of Genseric. When Leo had delivered himself from that ignominious servitude, he listened to the complaints of the Italians; resolved to extirpate the tyranny of the Vandals; and declared his alliance with his colleague, Anthemius, whom he solemly invested with the diadem and purple of the west.

The virtues of Anthemius have perhaps been magnified, since the imperial situs of the west, descent, which he could only dedicate A. D. 467—472, from the usurper Procopius, has been swelled into a line of emperors. \(^6\) But the merit of his immediate parents, their honours, and their riches, rendered Anthemius one of the most illustrious subjects of the east. His father, Procopius, obtained, after his Persian embassy, the rank of general and patrician; and the name of Anthemius was derived from his maternal grandfather, the celebrated prefect, who protected, with so much ability and success, the infant reign of Theodosius. Anphemius was born above the condition of a private subject, by his marriage with Euphemia, the daughter of the emperor Marcellian. This splendid alliance, which might supersede the necessity of merit, hastened the promotion of Anthemius, a barbarian from the name of the emperor, of consular, and of patrician; and his merit or fortune claimed the honours of a victory, which was obtained on the banks of the Danube, over the Huns. Without indulging an extravagant ambition, the son-in-law of Marcellian might hope to be his successor; but Aspar, whose sons had watched his sovereign with a breach of promise, and insolently shaking his purple, "It is not proper (said he) that the man who is invested with this garment, should be guilty of lying." \(^4\) Nor is it proper (replied Leo) that a prince should be compelled to resign his own judgment, and the public interest, to the will of a subject. \(^5\) After this extraordinary scene, it was impossible that the reconciliation of the emperor and the patrician could be sincere; or, at least, that it could be solid and permanent.

The original authors of the reigns of Marcian, Leo, and Zeno, are reduced to some imperfect fragments, whose deficiencies must be supplied from the more recent compilations of Theophanes, Zonaras, and Cedrenus.

ed ends of January were now approaching, and the venal poet, who had loved Avitus, and esteemed Majorian, was persuaded by his friends, to celebrate, in heroic verse his deliverance, and the future triumphs, of the emperor Anastinus.
Sidonius pronounced, with assurance and success, a panegyric which is still extant; and whatever might be the imperfections, either of the subject or of the composition, the welcome flatterer was immediately rewarded with the pension of Roman citizenship, which placed him among the most illustrious personages of the empire, till he wisely preferred the more respectable character of a bishop and a saint.1 The festival of The Greeks ambitiously commend the piety and catholic faith of the emperor whom they gave to the west; or do they forget to observe, that when he left Constantinople, he converted his palace into the pious foundation of a public bath, a church, and an hospital for old men.2 Yet some suspicious appearances are found to shilly the theological fame of Anastinus. From the conversation of the Bishop, the Africa, he ascribed the blight of the spirit of religious toleration; and the heretics of Rome would have assembled with impunity, if the bold and vehement censure which pope Hilary pronounced in the church of St. Peter, had not obliged him to abjure the unpopular indulgence.3 Even the participants of the triumphs were denounced by an in vain hopes of the indifference, or partiality, of Anastinus; and his singular friendship for the philosopher Sernicus, whom he promoted to the consulship, was ascribed to a secret project of reviving the ancient worship of the gods. The Calems were embittered to dust: and the mythology which the common men of nations, was so universally disbelieved, that it might be employed without scandal, or at least without suspicion, by christian poets.4 Yet the vestiges of superstition were not absolutely obliterated, and the festival of the Lupercalia, whose origin had preceded the foundation of Rome, was still celebrated under the reign of Anastinus. The savage and simple rites were expressive of an early state of society before the invention of arts and agriculture. The rustic deities who presided over the toils and pleasures of the pastong were still venerated, although by arts such as the fancy of shepherds might create, sportive, pentulant, and lascivious; whose power was limited, and whose malice was insensible. A goat was the offering the best adapted to their character and attributes; the flesh of the victim was roasted on willow spits; and the very blood, which was the least least, ran naked over the fields, with leather thongs in their hands, communicating, as it was supposed, the blessings of fecundity to the women whom they touched.1 The altar of Pan was erected, perhaps by Evander the Arcadian, in a deep recess in the side of the Palatine hill, watered by a perpetual fountain, and shaded by a hanging grove. A tradition, that, in the same place, Romulus and Remus were suckled by the wolf, rendered the spot more sacred and venerable in the eyes of the Romans; and this sylvan spot was gradually surrounded by the stately edifices of the Forum.2 After the conversion of the imperial city, the christians still continued, in the month of February, the annual celebration of the Lupercalis; to which they ascribed the descent and mysterious influence of the genial powers of the animal and vegetable world.
The bishops of Rome were solicitous to abolish a profane custom, so repugnant to the spirit of christianity; but their zeal was not supported by the authority of the civil magistrate: the invertebrate abuse subsisted till the close of the fifth century, and pope Gelasius, who purified the capital from the last stain of idolatry, appeased, by a formal apology, the murmurs of the senate and people.3 In all his public declarations, the emperor Leo assumes the authority, and pro-

1 Ovid. (Fast. i. ii. 327—323) has given an amusing description of the follies of antiquity, which still inspired so much respect, that a grave magistrate, running naked through the streets, was not an object of amusement or laughter.

5 The expeditions of Heracleus is clouded with difficulties, (Tilley-mont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. vi. p. 646) and it requires some dexterity to use the circumstances afforded by Theophanes, without injury to the more remote evidence of his authority.
6 The march of Cato from Berenice, in the province of Cyrrene, was much longer than that of Heracleus from Tripoli. He passed the dry sandy desert in thirty days, and it was found necessary to provide, besides the ordinary supplies, a great number of skins filled with water, and several vessels, which were supposed to arrest the action of sucking the wounds which had been made by the serpents of their native country. See Plutarch in Caec. Uticens. tom. iv. p. 525, Romans. The expense of the naval armament, which Leo sent against the Vandals, has been distinctly ascertained; and the curious and instructive account displays the wealth of the declining empire. The royal demesnes, or private patrimony of the prince, supplied seventeen thousand pounds of gold; forty-seven thousand pounds of gold, and seven hundred thousand of silver, were levied and paid into the treasury. The precious metals were reduced to extreme poverty; and the diligent calculation of fines and forfeitures, as a valuable object of the revenue, does not suggest the idea of a just or merciful administration. The whole expense, by whatsoever means it was defrayed, of the African campaign is reckoned to the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds of gold, about five millions two hundred thousand pounds sterling, at a time when the value of money appears, from the comparative price of corn, to have been somewhat higher than in the present age. 1 The fleet that sailed from Constantinople to Carthage, consisted of eleven hundred and thirteen ships, and the number of soldiers and mariners exceeded one hundred thousand men. Basiliscus, the brother of the empress Vornia, was intrusted with this important command. His sister, the wife of Leo, had reared to the merit of his family the Scythians. But the discovery of his guilt, or incapacity, was reserved for the African war; and his friends could only save his military reputation, by assuring, that he had conspired with Aspar to spare Genseric, and to betray the last hope of the western empire. Fantasy has shown, that the unsuccessful expedition of an invader most commonly depends on the vigour and celerity of his operations. The strength and sharpness of the first impressions are blunted by delay; the health and spirit of the troops irretrievably languish in a distant climate; the naval and military force, a mighty effort which perhaps can never be repeated, is silently consumed; and every hour that is wasted in negotiation, accustoms the enemy to contemplate and examine those hostiles, which on their first appearance he deemed irresistible. The formidable navy of Basiliscus pursued its prosperous navigation from the Thracian Bosporus to the coast of Africa. He landed his troops at Cape Bon, or the promontory of Mercury, about forty miles from Carthage. 2 The army of Genseric, and his Christian auxiliaries, consisting of the imperial lieutenant, and the Vandals who opposed his progress by sea or land, were successively vanquished. 3 If Basiliscus had seized the moment of consternation, and boldly advanced to the capital, Carthage must have surrendered, and the kingdom of the Vandals was dismembered; Genseric beheld danger with firmness, and eluded it with his veteran dexterity. He protested, in the most respectful language, that he was ready to submit his person, and his dominions, to the will of the emperor; but he requested a truce of five days to regulate the terms of his submission; and it was universally believed, that his secret liberty contributed to the success of this public negotiation. Instead of obstinately refusing whatever inducement his enemy so earnestly solicited, the guilty, or the credulous, Basiliscus consented to the fatal trap; and his imprudent security seemed to proclaim, that he already considered himself as the conqueror of Africa. During this short interval, the wind became favourable to the designs of Genseric. He manned his largest ships of war with the bravest of the Moors and Vandals; and they towed after them many large barges, filled with combustible materials. In the obscurity of the night, these destructive vessels were impelled against the unguarded and unsuspecting Carthaginians. The whole populace was taken by surprise; and the sense of their instant danger. Their close and crowded assistance of the fire-ships, and to save at least a part of the navy, the galleys of Genseric assaulted them with temperate and disciplined valour; and many of the Romans, who escaped the fury of the flames, were destroyed or taken by the victorious Vandals. Among the events of that disastrous night, the heroe, or rather desperate, courage of John, one of the principal officers of Basiliscus, has rescued his name from oblivion. When the ship, which he had commanded, was covered by the flames, he leaped into the sea, and eluding himself in his armour into the sea, disdainfully rejected the esteem and pity of Genseric, the son of Genseric, who pressed him to accept honourable quarter, and sunk under the waves; exclaiming, with his last breath, that he would never fail alive into the hands of those abominable dogs. Actuated by a far different spirit, Basiliscus, whose station was the most remote from danger, disgracefully fled in the beginning of the engagement, returned to Constantinople with the loss of more than half of his fleet and army, and sheltered his guilty head in the sanctuary of St. Sophia, till his sisters in tears and entreaties, could obtain his pardon from the indignant emperor. Heracleius effected his retreat through the desert; Marcellinus retired to Sicily, where he was assassinated, perhaps at the instigation of Theimer, by one of his own captains; and the king of the Vandals expressed his surprise and satisfaction, that the Romans themselves should remove from the world his most formidable antagonists. 4 After the failure of this great expedition, Genseric again became the tyrant of the sea; the commerce of the whole empire was reduced to his revenge and avarice; Tripoli and Sardinia returned to his obedience; he added Sicily to the number of his provinces; and, before he died, in the fulness of years and of glory, he beheld the final extinction of the empire of the Goths. 5

1 The principal sum is clearly expressed by Procopius; (de Bell. Vandal., l. i. c. 6, p. 191,) the smaller constituent parts, which Titus Mommsen has laboriously collected from the Byzantine writers, are less certain and less important. The historian Majus mounts the public misery; (Excerpt. ex Syd. Const. 6. 12, &c., &c.) but Gellius affirms, that he levied taxes and charges Leo with loading the treasures which he extorted from the provinces.

2 This promontory is forty miles from Carthage, (Procop., l. i. c. 6, &c.) and twenty from the African continent. It is the most distant part from Sicily. Scipio landed farther in the bay, at the fair promontory; see the annotated description of Livy, xiv. 36, 27.

3 The Vandals were completely defeated; (Procop., l. i. c. 6,) and the assertion of Jornandes, (de Successione Regn, ii. 30,) that Basiliscus attacked Carthage, must be understood in a very qualified sense.

4 Domasius in Vit. Isidor, apud Phot. p. 1048. It will appear, by comparing the three short chronicles of the times, that Marcellinus had fought near Carthage, and was killed in Sicily.

5 The Vandals were reduced to the same condition; (Procop., l. i. c. 6, &c.) in the end, Genseric falls into the hands of his invader; (Jornandes, de Gent. Hist. c. ii. p. 360.) he released the majesty of his country, (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. vi. p. 266.) and charges Leo with loading the treasures which he extorted from the provinces.

6 Jornandes is our best guide through the reign of Theodoric II, and Eurie, (de Rhet. Geticis, c. 44, 45, 16, 47, &c. 653-686.) Julianus landed soon, and Isidore in too sparing the information which he might have given on the affairs of Spain. The events that relate to Gaul are laboriously illustrated in the third book of the Abbe Dalos, Hist. Critique, tom. iii. p. 424-509.
violated his recent treaty with the Romans; and the ample territory of Narbonne, which he firmly united to his dominions, became the immediate reward of his perfidy. The selfish policy of Reimer encouraged him to attempt the union of Aquitania, his rival; but the active count, by the defence of Arles, and the victory of Orleans, saved Gaul, and checked during his lifetime the progress of the Visigoths. Their ambition was soon rekindled; and the design of extinguishing the Roman empire in Spain and Gaul, was abandoned, and united, in the reign of Euric, who acknowledged his brother Theodoric, and displayed, with a more savage temper, superior abilities both in peace and war. He passed the Pyrenees at the head of a numerous army, subdued the cities of Saragossa and Pampeluna, vanquished the Suevi in battle the "principal nobs of the Tarraconese province, carried his victorious arms into the heart of Lusitanian, and permitted the Suevi to hold the kingdom of Gallicia under the Gothic monarchy of Spain. The efforts of Euric were not less vigorous, or less successful in Gaul; and throughout the country that extends from the Pyrenees to the Rhone and the Loire. Burgundy and Auvergne were the only cities, or dioceses, which refused to acknowledge him as their master. In the defence of Clermont, their principal town, the inhabitants of Auvergne sustained, with inflexible resolution, the miseries of war, pestilence, and famine; and the little resistance, according to the first views of Euric, suspended the hopes of that important conquest. The youth of the province were animated by the heroic and almost incredible valour of Eudesius, the son of the emperor Avitus, who made a desperate sally with only eighteen horsemen, boldly attacked the Gothic troops, and after maintaining a flying skirmish, retired safe and victorious within the walls of Clermont. His charity was equal to his courage: in a time of extreme scarcity, four thousand poor were fed at his expense; and his private influence levied an army of Burgundians for the deliverance of Auvergne. From his virtues alone the faithful citizens of Gaul derived any hopes of safety or freedom; and even such virtues were insufficient to avert the impending ruin of their country, since they were anxious to learn from his authority and example, whether they should prefer the alternative of exile or servitude. The public concern was not resolved not to have the authority of a Sabin exalted; and the Gauls had too much reason to believe, that Anthenius, who reigned in Italy, was incapable of protecting his distressed subjects beyond the Alps. The feeble emperor could only procure for their assistance the help of twelve thousand British auxiliaries. Riethovenius, one of the independent kings of the Burgundians, or chieftains, of the island, was persuaded to transport his troops to the continent of Gaul; he sailed up the Loire, and established his quarters in Berry, where the people blamed of these oppressive allies, till they were destroyed, or dispersed, by the arms of the Visigoths.

Trials of Ardavan and Aurelianus:

One of the last acts of jurisdiction, which the Roman senate exercised over their subjects of Gaul, was the trial and condemnation of Ardavan the præfectus praetorio.

Sidonius, who rejoices that he lived under a reign in which he might pity and assist a state-criminal, has expressed, with tenderness and freedom, the faults of his indiscreet and unfortunate friend. From the ensemble of merits which he attributed to him, he has praised his prudence rather than wisdom; and such was the various, though uniform, imprudence of his behaviour, that his prosperity must appear much more surprising than his downfall. The second prefecture, which he obtained within the term of five years, abolished the indigence of his preceding administration. His easy temper was corrupted by flattery, and exasperated by opposition; he was forced to satisfy his importunate creditors with the spoils of the province; his capricious insolence offended the nobles of Gaul, and he sunk under the weight of the public hatred. The disgrace summoned him to justify his conduct before the senate; and he passed the sea of Tuscany with a favourable wind, the pressage, as he vainly imagined, of his future fortunes. A decent respect was still observed for the praefectorius rank; and on his arrival at Rome, Ardavan was committed to the hospitals, rather than to the custody, of Flavius Asellius, the count of the sacred largesses, who resided in the capital. He was eagerly pursued by his accusers, the four deputies of Gaul, who were all distinguished by their birth, their dignities, or their eloquence. In the name of a great province, and according to the jurisdiction of Romans jurisprudence, he was substituted a civil and criminal action, requiring such a restitution as might compensate the losses of individuals, and such punishment as must satisfy the justice of the state. Their charges of corrupt oppression were numerous and weighty; but they placed their case more strongly, by a confirmation, than they had intercepted, and which they could prove, by the evidence of his secretary, to have been dictated by Ardavan himself. The author of this letter seemed to disapprove the king of the Goths from a peace with the Greek emperor; he suggested the attack of the Britons on the Loire; and he recommended a division of Gaul, according to the law of nations, between the Visigoths and the Burgundians. These pernicious schemes, which a friend could only palliate by the reproaches of vanity and indigence, were susceptible of a reasonable interpretation; and the deputies had sufficiently established that Ardavan was involved in the downfall of his friends. Ignorant of his real situation, Ardavan showed himself in the capitol in the white robe of a candidate, accepted indiscriminate salutations and offers of service, examined the shops of the merchants, and enquired sometimes with the indifference of a spectator, and sometimes with the attention of a purchaser; and complained of the times, of the senate, of the prince, and of the delays of justice. His complaints were soon removed. An early day was fixed for his trial; and Ardavan appeared, with his accusers, before a numerous assembly of the Roman senate.

The mournful garb, which they affected, excited the compassion of the judges, who were scandalized by the gay and splendid dress of their adversary; and when the prefect Ardavan, with the first of the Gallie deputies, were directed to take their places on the senatorial benches, the same contrast of pride and modesty was observed in their behaviour. In this memorable judgment, which presented a lively image of the old republic, the Gauls exposed, with force and frequency, the character of the prince; and as convinced as the minds of the audience were sufficiently inflamed, they recited the fatal epistle. The obstinacy of Arvan- dus was founded on the strange supposition, that a subject could not be convicted of treason, unless he had actually conspired to assume the purple. As the paper was read, he repeated, and with a loud voice, acknowledged it for his genuine composition; and his astonishment was equal to his dismay, when the unanimous voice of the senate declared him guilty of a capital offence. By their decree, he was degraded from the rank of a prefect to the obscure condition of a plebeian, and ignominiously dragged by servile hands to the public prison. After a fortnight's ad- journement, the senate was again convened to pro- nounce the sentence of his death: but while he expected, in the island of Esculapius, the expiration of the seventy days allowed by law to avenging malefactors, his friends interposed, the emperor or Anthemi us relented, and the prefect of Gaul ob- tained the milder punishment of exile and confiscation. The faults of Arvandus might deserve compassion; but the indignity of Seneca was the occasion of the ruin of the republic, till he was condemned, and exe- cuted, on the complaint of the people of Auvergne. That illustrious minister, the Catiline of his age and country, held a secret correspondence with the Visi- goths, to betray the province which he oppressed: his industry was continually exercised in the discovery of new taxes and obsolete offences; and his ex- travagant vices would have inspired contempt, if they had not excited fear and abhorrence. Such criminals were not beyond the reach of justice; but whatever might be the guilt of Ricimer, that prince, barbarian was able to contend or to nego- tiate with the prince, whose alliance he had con- descended to accept. The peaceful and prosperous reign which Anthemi us had promised to the west, was soon clouded by misfortune and discord. Ric-imer, apprehensive, or importunate, of a superior, retired from Rome and fixed his residence at Milan; an ad- vantageous situation, either to invite, or to repel, the warlike tribes that were settled between the Alps and the Danube. Italy was gradually divided into two insular kingdoms, and the Gallic and the Lombard kings and the nobles of Liguria, who trembled at the near approach of a civil war, felt proportionate at the feet of the patrician, and con- jured him to spare their unhappy country.  "For my own part," replied Ricimer, in a tone of insolent mod- eration, "I am still inclined to embrace the friendship of the Galatian, but who will undertake to appease his anger, or to mitigate the pride which always rises in proportion to our submission?" They informed him, that Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia, united the wisdom of the serpent with the innocence of the dove; and appeared confident, that the eloquence of such an ambassador must prevail against the strong- est opposition, either of interest or passion. Their recommendation was approved; and Epiphanius, asso- ciating the benevolence of his crown, and as a reward for a life, without delay to Rome, where he was received with the honours due to his merit and reputation. The or- ation of a bishop in favour of peace, may be easily supposed: he argued, that, in all possible circumstan- ces, the forgiveness of injuries must be the first of hu- man duties; that, instead of punishment, he instilled that energy, or discourse, and he seriously admonished the emperor to avoid a contest with a fierce barbarian, which might be fatal to himself, and must be ruinous to his dominions. Anthemi us acknowledged the truth of his maxims; but he deeply felt, with grief and indignation, the behaviour of Ricimer; and his passion roused eloquence and energy to his dis- course. "What favours," he warmly exclaimed, "have we refused to this ungrateful man? What pro- vocations have we not endured? Regardless of the majesty of the purple, I gave my daughter to a Goth; and in the presence of your ancestors, I declared to the senate, without fear or error, my sentiments. The liberty which ought to have secured the eternal attachment of Ricimer has exasperated him against his benefactor. What wars has he not excit- ed against the empire? How often has he instigated, with perfidious purpose, to a contest that he would accept his perfidious friendship? Can I hope that he will respect the engagements of a treaty, who has al- ready violated the duties of a son?" But the anger of Anthemi us evaporated in these passionate exclama- tions: he insensibly yielded to the proposals of Epiphanius; and the bishop returned to his diocese with the satisfaction of restoring the peace of Italy, by a reconciliation, of which the sincerity and con- tinuance might be reasonably suspected. The elem- ency of the emperor was extorted from his weakness; and Ricimer suspended his ambitious designs, till he had secretly prepared the sentence which Ricimer; he so resolved to subvert the throne of Anthemi us. The mask of peace and moderation was then thrown aside. The army of Ricimer was fortified by a numerous reinforcement of Burgundians and oriental Suevi; he disclaimed all allegiance to the Greek emperor, march- ed from Milan to the gates of Rome, and fixing his camp on the banks of the Anio, impatiently expected the arri- val of Olybrius, his imperial candidate. The senator Olybrius, of the Anici an family, might esteem himself the lawful- heir of the west, while Ricimer continued to reign. A.D. 472. Married Placidia, the younger daughter of Valentinian, after she was restored by Genseric; who still detained her sister Eudoxia, as the wife, or rather as the captive, of his son. The king of the Vandals supported, by threats and solicitation, the fair pretensions of his Roman ally; and assigned, as one of the motives of the war, the refusal of the sena- te and people to acknowledge their lawful prince, and the unworthy preference which they had given to a stranger. The friendship of the public enemy might under cover of justice, be more useful to him, than the death of Majorian. Perhaps the consilium of Olybrius (A. D. 464) was bestowed as a municipal present. 1 Senatusconsultum Tiberianum; (Sirmond, Not. p. 17.) but only allowed only days between the sentence and execution; the rest condemned in the reign of Olybrius. 2 Catilina seniri nostri. He executes the crimes, and ex- pands the punishment, of Sertorius, perhaps with the indignation of a virtuous citizen, perhaps with the resentment of a personal enemy. 3 Ricimer, under the reign of Anthemi us, defeated and slew in bat- tle the Burgundians of the province; and as soon as he had married the king of the Burgundians, and he maintained an intimate connexion with the Suevic colony established in Pannonia and Noricum. 4 Galliarn concinnant. Sirmond (in his notes to Ennodius) applies this passage to Anthemi us himself. Anthemi us was probably born in the province of Galatia, whose inhabitants, the Gallo- Grecians, were, at that time, a nation of a very popular people. 5 Epiphanius was thirty years bishop of Pavia. (A. D. 467- 497; see Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. tomo. xvi. p. 78.) His name and actions would have been unknown to posterity, if Ennodius, one of his contemporaries, had not written his life, (which ran from 1647—1694) in which he represents him as one of the greatest char- acters of the age.
tion of an empire. Yet Olybrius yielded to the importunities of his friends, perhaps of his wife; rashly plunged into the dangers and calamities of a civil war; and, with the secret connivance of the emperor Leo, accepted the Italian purple, which was bestowed, and rested only on the barbaric weapon. He had landed without obstacle (for Genseric was master of the sea) either at Ravenna or the port of Ostia, and immediately proceeded to the camp of Ricimer, where he was received as the sovereign of the western world. 1

The patrician who had extended his posts from the Anio to the Milvian bridge, already possessed two quarters of Rome, the Vatican and the Janiculum, which are separated by the Tiber from the rest of the city; and it may be conjectured, that an assembly of preceding senators imitated, in the choice of Olybrius, the forms of a legal election. But the body of the senate and people firmly adhered to the cause of Antheius; and the more effectual support of a Gothic army enabled him to prolong his reign, and the public distress, by a resistance of three months, to the persiflage with which Ricimer, the Saxon and pestilence. At length, Ricimer made a furious assault on the bridge of Hadrian, or St. Angelo; and the narrow pass was defended with equal valor by the Goths, till the death of Gisiler their leader. The victorious troops, breaking down every barrier, rush with irresistible vehemence to the city, and (if we may use the language of a contemporary pope) was subdued by the civil fury of Antheius and Ricimer. The unfortunate Antheius was dragged from his concealment, and inhumanly massacred by the command of his son-in-law; who then added a third to the duration of his reign. Thebes surrendered of its own accord; the same artifices, the same motives, as those of the previous day, were repeated. The soldiers, who united the rage of fictitious citizens with the savage manners of barbarians, were indulged, without control, in the licence of rapine and murder: the crowd of slaves and plebeians, who were unconcerned in the event, could only gain by the indiscriminate pillage; and the face of the city exhibited the strange contrast of stern cruelty and absolute intemperance. 2 Forty days after this calamitous event, the subject, not of glory, but of guilt, Italy was delivered, by a peaceful disease, from the any of Olybrius, and was brought before the command of his nephew Gundobald, one of the princes of the Burgundians. In the same year, all the principal actors in this great revolution were removed from the stage; and the whole reign of Olybrius, whose death does not betray any symptoms of violence, is included within the term of seven months. He left one daughter, the offspring of his marriage with Phaeidia; and the family of the great Theodo- sius, transplanted from Spain to Constantinople, was propagated in the female line as far as the eighth generation. 3

While the vacant throne of Italy was abandoned to theCorsairs, the mother of a new collegae was seriously agitated in the council of Leo. The A. D. 473-475, eress, studies to promote the greatness of her own family, had married one of her nieces to Julius Nepos, who succeeded his uncle Marcellinus in the sovereignty of Dalmatia, a more difficult task than the title which he was persuaded to accept, of emperor of the west. But the measures of the Byzantine court were so languid and irresolute, that many months elapsed after the death of Antheius, and even of Olybrius, before their destined successor could show himself, with a respectable force, to his Italian subjects. During that interval, Glycerius, an obscure soldier, was invested with the purple by his patron Gundobald; but the Burgundian prince was unable, or unwilling, to support his nomination by a civil war; the pursuit of domestic ambition recalled him beyond the Alps, 4 and his client was permitted to exchange the Roman empire for the crown of Sicily. Pursuing such a competitor, the emperor Nepos was acknowledged by the senate, by the Goths, and by the provincials of Gaul: his moral virtues, and military talents, were loudly celebrated; and those who derived any private benefit from his government, announced, in prophetic similitude of a monarch who had triumphed over such a competitor, the emperor Nepos was acknowledged by the senate, by the Goths, and by the provincials of Gaul: his moral virtues, and military talents, were loudly celebrated; and those who derived any private benefit from his government, announced, in prophetic similitude of a monarch victorious over barbarians, who had proceeded from the Vacantis, to the Visigoths, is the only event of his short and inglorious reign. The most faithful subjects of Gaul were sacri- ficed to the avarice of the frontier pastors; the hope of domestic security; but his repose was soon invaded by a furious sedition of the barbarian confederates, who, under the command of Orestes, their general, were, in full march from Rome to Ravenna. Nepos trembled at their approach; and, instead of placing a just confidence in the strength of Ravenna, he hastily escaped to his ships, and retired to his Dalmatian principality, on the opposite coast of the Hadrstrian. By this shameless abdication, he protracted his life about five years, in a very ambiguous state, between an emperor and an ex- ile, till he was assassinated at Salona by the ungrateful cut Plugiarus. This punishment was the reward of his crime, to the archbishop of Milan. 5

The nations, who had asserted their in- tendances, and, after the possession of conquest, in the boundless countries to the north of the Danube; or in the Roman provinces between the Rhine and the Alps. titude, the names of the Heruli, the Seyri, the Alani, the Torellini, and the Regini, appear to have predominated. The example of these warriors was imitated by Orestes, the son of Tatullus, and the father of the last Roman emperor of the west. Orestes, who has been already mentioned in this history, had never deserted his country. His birth and fortunes rendered him one of the most illustrious subjects of Pannonia. He entered into the service of Attila, his lawful sovereign, obtained the office of his secretary, and was repeatedly sent ambassador to Constantineople, to represent the person, and signify the commands, of the imperious monarch. The death of that conqueror restored him to his native country, and Orestes might have either followed the sons of Attila into the Scythian desert, or to obey the Ostrogoths, who had usurped the dominion of Pannonia. He preferred the service of the Italian princes, the successors of Valentinian; and, as he possessed the qualifications of courage, industry, and experience, he advanced with rapid steps in the military profession, till he was elevated, by the favour of Nepos himself, to the dignities of patrician, and master-general of the troops. These troops had been long accustomed to reverence the character and attributes of their officers; and Orestes affected to converse with them in their own language, and was intimately connected with their national chieftains, by long habits of familiarity and friendship. At his solicitation they rose in arms against the obscure Greek, who presumed to claim their obedience; and when Orestes entered the camp, he ordered that the garrisons should be compensated with the same facility, to acknowledge his son Augustulus, the last emperor of the west.

A.D. 476. of Nepos, Orestes had now attained the summit of his ambitious hopes; but he soon discovered, that the first year of his reign was the least happy, either of perjury and ingratitude, which a rebel must inculcate, will be retorted against himself; and that the precarious sovereignty of Italy was only permitted to choose, whether he would be the slave, or the victim, of his barbarian oppressors. The dangerous alliance of these strangers had oppressed and insulted the last remains of Roman freedom and dignity. At each revolution, their pay and privileges were augmented; but their insolence increased in a still more extravagant degree; they envied the fortune of their brethren in Gaul, and perceived, that whose victorious arms had acquired an independent and perpetual inheritance; and they insisted on their peremptory demand, that a third part of the lands of Italy should be immediately divided among them. Orestes, with a spirit which, in another situation, might be entitled to our esteem, chose rather to encounter the rage of an armed multitude, than to subscribe the ruin of an innocent people. He rejected the audacious demand; and his refusal was favourable to the ambition of Odoacer; a bold barbarian, who assured his fellow-soldiers, that, if they dared to associate under his command, they might soon extort the justice which had been denied to their dutiful petitions. From all the camps and garrisons of Italy, the confederates, actuated by the same resentment and the same hopes, impatiently flocked to the standard of this popular leader; and the number of Odoacer's followers was overwhelming to the terrified subjects of the town, hastily retreated to the strong city of Pavia, the episcopal seat of the holy Epiphanius. Pavia was immediately besieged, the fortresses were stormed, the town was pillaged; and although the bishop might labour, with much zeal and industry, to save the property of the church, and the chastity of female capcondescend to exercise as the viceroy of the emperor of the west. But Odosacer had resolved to abolish that useless and expensive office; and such is the weight of ancient prejudice, that it required some boldness and penetration to discover the extreme facility of the change. The emperor Zeno, the son-in-law and successor of Leo; who had lately been restored, after a short rebellion, to the Byzantine throne. They solemnly "declaim the necessity, or even the wish, of continuing any longer the imperial succession in Italy; since, in their opinion, the majesty of a sole monarch is sufficient to pervade and protect, at the same time, both the east and the west. In their own name, and in the name of the people, they consent that the seat of universal empire shall be transferred from Rome to Constantinople; and they basely renounce the right of choosing their master, the only vestige that yet remained of Roman jurisdiction; and they submit themselves to the world. The republic (they repeat that name without a blush) might safely confide in the civil and military virtues of Odosacer; and they humbly request, that the emperor would invest him with the title of patrician, and the administration of the diocese of Italy. The deposition of the last emperor of the west in the year 491, by a haughty, without marks of displeasure and indignation; and when they were admitted to the audience of Zeno, he sternly reproached them with their treatment of the two emperors, Anthemeus and Nepos, whom the east had successively granted to the prayers of Italy. "The first of these ambassadors," says he, "had shown you have expelled; but the second is still alive, and whilst he lives he is your lawful sovereign." But the prudent Zeno soon deserted the hopeless cause of his abdicated colleague. His vanity was gratified by the title of sole emperor, and by the statues erected to his honour in the several quarters of Rome; he entertained a friendly, though ambiguous, correspondence with the patrician Odosacer; and he gratefully accepted the imperial insignias, the sacred ornaments of the throne and palace, which the barbarian was not unwilling to remove from the sight of the people.\footnote{\textit{Ingrediens autem Ravennas domini Augustalum de resquit, cujus infantius minusius concessit et sanantium; et quo potius factum, tamen domum suam exstat, et usu eorum exstat omnibus suis, et usum eorum Campaniis suis parentibus sui libere vivent, Anonymous, p. 716.} \textit{Jornandii says, (c. 46. p. 650.) in Lucullano Campiani castelli celi poema domini.}}

and violence; the Italians alternately lamented the presence or the absence of the sovereigns, whom they detested or admired; and the succession of centuries inflicted the various evils of military licence, capricious despotism, and elaborate oppression. During the same period, the barbarians had emerged from obscurity and contempt, and the warriors of Germany and Scythia were introduced into the provinces, as the soldiers of fortune and as hangers-on and plunderers, and the Romans, whom they insulted or protected. The hatred of the people was suppressed by fear; they respected the spirit and splendour of the martial chiefs who were invested with the honours of the empire; and the fate of Rome had long depended on the sword of those formidable strangers. The stern Rheinhard, who trampled on the ruins of Italy, had exercised the power, without assuming the title, of a king; and the patient Romans were insensibly prepared to acknowledge the royalty of Odoacer and his barbaric successors.

Character and reign of Odoacer. The high station to which his valour had exalted him; his savage manners were polished by the habits of conversation; and he respected, though a conqueror and a barbarian, the institutions, and even the prejudices, of his subjects. After an interval of seven years, Odoacer restored the consulship of the west. For himself, he modestly, or proudly, declined an honour which was still accepted by the emperors of the east; but the eunuch chair was successively filled by eleven of the most illustrious senators; and the list is adorned by the respectable name of Basilius, whose virtues claimed the friendship and grateful applause of Sidonius, his client. The laws of the emperors were strictly enforced, and the civil administration of Italy was still exercised by the praetorian prefect, and his subordinate. The justice of the Roman nation was preserved, and the odious and oppressive task of collecting the public revenue; but he reserved for himself the merit of seasonable and popular indulgence. Like the rest of the barbarians, he had been instructed in the Arian heresy; but he revered the monastick and episcopal characters; and the silence of the Catholics attests the toleration which they enjoyed. The peace of the city required the interposition of his prefect Basilius in the choice of a Roman pontiff: the decree which restrained the clergy from alienating their lands, was ultimately designed for the benefit of the people, whose surplus was thus enabled to repay the dilapidations of the churches. Italy was protected by the arms of its conqueror; and its frontiers were respected by the barbarians of Gaul and Germany, who had so long insulted the feeble race of Theodosius. Odoacer passed the Hadriatic, to chastise the assassins of the emperor Nepos, and to acquire the maritime province of Dalmatia. He passed the Alps, to rescue the remains of Noricum from Fava, or Pelchenus, king of the Rugians, who held his residence beyond the Danube. The king was vanquished in battle, and led away prisoner; a numerous colony of captives and subjects were transplanted into Italy; and Rubeo, after a long period of defeat and disgrace, might claim the triumph of her barbarian master.

Notwithstanding the prudence and success of Odoacer, his kingdom exhibited the military and political decay. Since the age of Tiberius, the decadence of agriculture had been felt in Italy; and it was a just subject of complaint, that the life of the Roman people depended on the accidents of the winds and waves. In the division and decline of the empire, the tributary, harvests of the East, which formerly supplied the needs of the inhabitants, diminished. The exhaustion of the country, by the irrevocable losses of war, famine, and pestilence. St. Ambrose has described the ruin of a populous district, which had been once adorned with the towering cities of Bologna, Modena, Regium, and Piacenza. Pope Gelasius was a subject of Odoacer; and he affirms, with strong exaggeration, that in Emilia, Tuscany, and the adjacent provinces, the human species was almost extirpated. The plebeians of Rome, who were fed by the hand of their master, perished or disappeared. The king soon as his barbarians were frequently repulsed. The decline of the arts reduced the industrious mechanic to idleness and want; and the senators, who might support with patience the ruin of their country, bewailed their private loss of wealth and luxury. One third of the simple estates, to which the ruin of Italy was originally imputed, was taken by the conquerors. Injuries were aggravated by insults; the sense of actual sufferings was imbibed by the fear of more dreadful evils; and as new lands were allotted to new swarm of barbarians, each senator was apprehensive that all the arbitrary surveyors should provide his favourite villa, or his most profitable farm. The least unfortunate were those who submitted without a murmur to the power which it was impossible to resist. Since they desired to live, they owed some gratitude to the tyrant who had spared their lives; and they were assembled by their sovereign, in a council of national importance which he must be accepted as his pure and voluntary gift. The distress of Italy was mitigated by the prudence and humanity of Odoacer, who had bound himself, as the price of his elevation, to satisfy the demands of a licentious and turbulent multitude. CHAPTER XXXVII.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

Origin, progress, and effects of the monastic life.—Conversion of the barbarians to Christianity and Ariusism.—Persecution of the Vandals in Africa.—Extermination of Ariusism among the barbarians.

The indissoluble connexion of civil and ecclesiastical affairs, has compelled, and encouraged, me to relate the progress, the perseverance, the establishment, the privations, the disasters, the divisions, the final triumph, and the gradual corruption, of Christianity. I have purposely delayed the consideration of two religious events, interesting in the study of human nature, and important in the decline and fall of the Roman empire. I. The institution of the monastic life in the East, and II. The conversion of the northern barbarians.

I. Prosperity and peace introduced the distinction of the vulgar and the ascetic Christians. The loose and imperfect practice of religion satisfied the conscience of the soldier or merchant, reconciled their fervent zeal, and impious faith, with the exercise of their profession, the pursuit of their interest, and the indulgence of their passions; but the ascetics, who obeyed and abused the rigid precepts of the gospel, were inspired by their own enthusiasm, and despised all the which and transcendent monastic usages as criminal, and God as a tyrant. They seriously renounced the business, and the pleasures, of the age: abused the use of wine, of flesh, and of marriage; chastised their body, mortified their affections, and embraced a life of misery, as the price of eternal happiness. In the reign of Constantine, the ascetics fled from a profane and degenerate world, to perpetual solitude, or religious society. Like the first Christians of Jerusalem, they resigned the use, or the property, of their temporal possessions; established regular communities of the same sect, in a similar disposition; and purchased the objects of their faith with the money of their own. Such was the state of Her. Monasters and Marchonides, expressive of their lonely retreat in a natural or artificial desert. They soon acquired the respect of the world, which they despised; and the loudest applause was bestowed on this Divine Philosophy, which surpassed, without the aid of force, or magistrate, the laborious virtues of the Grecian schools. The monks might indeed contend with the stoics, in the contest of fortune, of pain, and of death; the Pythagorean silence and submission were revived in their servile discipline; and they disdained, as firmly as the eye, the breath, and the bones, of all the weights and the cares of society. But the vortices of this divine philosophy aspired to imitate a purer and more perfect model. They trod in the footsteps of the prophets, who had retired to the desert; and they restored the devout and contemplative life, which had been instituted by the Essenes, in Palestine and Egypt. The philosophic forms of Plato by the Origenus consecrated to the religious world, and inspired mystic and prophetic usages among the first and foremost ascetics; and the monks, who were men of the world, who dwelt among the palm-trees near the Dead sea; who subsisted without money, who were propagated without women, and who derived from the disgust and repentance of mankind, a perpetual supply of voluntary associates.

Egypt, the cradle of superstition and Christianity, was the first example of the monastic life of Egypt. The youth of the lower parts of Thebaïs, distributed his property, deserted his family and native home, and executed his monastic penance with original and inexpressible enthusiasm. After a long and laborious novitiate, among the tombs, and in a ruined tower, he boldly advanced into the desert three days' journey to the eastward of the Nile; discovered a lonely spot, which possessed the advantages of shade and water, and fixed his last residence on mount Colzin, near the Red sea; where an ancient monastery still preserves the name and memory of the saint. The curious devotion of the Christians pursued him to the desert, and when he was obliged to appear at Alexandria, in the face of mankind, he supported his fame with discretion and dignity. He enjoyed the friendship of Athanasius, who consecrated to his doctrine three of his monks, and they were respectively declined a respectful invitation from the emperor Constantine. The venerable patriarch (for Antony attained the age of one hundred and five years) held the nether progeny which had been formed by his example, and his lesson, the only herd of monks multiplied with rapid increase on the sands of Libya, upon the south of Thebaïs, and in the cities of the Nile. To the south of Alexander, the mountain, and adjacent desert, of Nitria, were peopled by five thousand monks; and the traveller may still investigate the ruins of fifty philanthropic establishments, which were planted in that barren soil by the disciples of Antony. In the Upper Thebaïs, the vacant island of Tabennœ was occupied by Psichonius and fourteen hundred of his brethren. That holy abbot successively founded nine monasteries of men, and one of women; and the festival of 3 The origin of the monastic institution has been laboriously dis- cussed by Thurmser (Disciplin de Eclesiae, tomo. p. 149—1426) and Helyot, (Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tomo. i. p. 1—66). These authors are very learned and evidently honest, and their difference of opinion shows the subject in its full extent. Yet the cautious protestant, who distrusts any popey guides, may consult the several books of Bingham's Christian Antiquities.

4 See Eusebius, Contra. Evanget. (t. i. p. 20, 21, edit. Grac. Rob. Stephanus, 1633, 1634, vol. iii. p. 14) the History, published twelve years after the Monastery of Eusebius, (i. c. p. 17) asserts that the institution was first established in Egypt. That the Cenobites of Egypt had the same name as the regular institution was revived in Egypt.

5 Tertull. lib. viii. c. 58. (ch. v. 38) claims this origin for the institution of the Carabodes, which gradually decayed till it was restored by Anthony and his disciples.

6 See Paphnutius, De origine et institutione instituti monastici, (cit. Surius, Theol. tom. iii. p. 191.) Some modern writers, Lipsius (tom. iv. p. 318) Musculus (tom. ii. p. 337) and other biographers, have made the same discovery. When a similar institution was revived in Egypt. Eusebius, Contra. Evanget. (t. i. p. 20, 21, edit. Grac. Rob. Stephanus, 1633, 1634, vol. iii. p. 14) The Cenobites derive their pedigree, in regular succession, from the prophet Elijah. (See the Theor. of Eusebius, A.D. 1622, in Bayle's Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Oeuvres, tomo. i. p. 92, &c. and the prolix many of the Ordres Monastiques, is an anonymous work, to which is prefixed a short discourse, which describes the silent and profound jealous of the Critics of the Jews of Flanders, (Helyot, Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tomo. viii. p. 394—395), and to which is added a succinct narrative of the miracles of Elijah, the Carmelite, has been erected in the church of St. Peter. (Voyage au Fe. Levant, tom. iii. p. 87.)

7 This passage is quoted by Archbishop Usher's notes on the monastic life at p. 122. See also: "An Letter of 1811 to the Bishop of Liverpool," 1792, the author of this letter of January 1792 was afterwards transferred to the great monastery of Bau or Buda. (Mem. Eccles. tom. vii. p. 675—685.) Easter sometimes collected fifty thousand religious persons, who followed his angelic rule of discipline. 1

The rich and cultivated monks, the scholars and devouts of Christian orthodoxy, had devoted the temples, the public edifices, and even the ramparts, to pious and charitable uses; and the bishop, who might preach in twelve churches, computed ten thousand females and twenty thousand males of the monastic profession. 2

The Egyptian, rich, between fourteen and eighteen revolutions, were disposed to hope, and to believe, that the number of monks was equal to the remainder of the people; and posterity might repeat the saying, which had formerly been applied to the sacred animals of the same country, that, in Egypt, it was less difficult to find a mummy than a monk. 3

Athanasius introduced into Rome the knowledge and practice of the monastic life; and a school of this new philosophy was opened by the disciples of Antony, who had accompanied their priest to the holy threshold of the Vatican. The strange and sanitary habits of these Egyptians excited, at first, horror and contempt, and, at length, applause and zealous imitation. The seminaries, and more especially the monasteries, transformed their palaces and villas into religious houses; and the institution of the monasteries was eclipsed by the频繁的修道院，which were seated on the ruins of ancient temples, and in the midst of the Roman forum. 4

Induced by the example of Antony, a Syrian youth, whose name was Hilarion, 5 fixed his abode on a sandy headland near the sea, and a mistress, about seven miles from Gaza. The austere penance in which he persisted forty-eight years, diffused a similar enthusiasm; and the holy man was followed by a train of two or three thousand monachos, whenever he visited the innumerable monasteries in Palestine, Syria, and Arabia. The fame of David 6 is immortal in the monastic history of the east. With a mind, that had tasted the learning and eloquence of Athens; with an ambition, scarcely to be satisfied by the archbishopric of Cæsaræa, Basil retired to a savage solitude in Pontus; and designed, for a while, to give law to the spiritual colony which he promiscuously scattered along the coast of the Black Sea. In Martin in Gaul, the west, Martin of Tours, 7 a soldier, a hermit, a bishop, and a saint, established the monasteries of Gaul; two thousand of his disciples followed him to the grave; and his example challenges the deserts of the Thebaid, to produce, in a more favourable climate, a champion of equal virtue. The progress of the monks was not less rapid, or universal, than that of Christianity itself. Every city, and every spot of the empire, was filled with their increasing multiplicities; and the bleak and barren isles, from Lérins to Lipari, that rise out of the Tuscan sea, were chosen by the monks, for the place of their voluntary exile. An easy and perpetual intercourse by sea and land connected the provinces of the Roman world; and the life of Hilarion displays the faith and wit which an indigent hermit of Palestine might traverse Egypt, embark for Sicily, escape to Epirus, and finally settle in the island of Cyprus. 8

The Latin Christians embraced the religious institutions of Rome. The pilgrims, who visited Jerusalem, eagerly sought the most distant climates of the earth, the faithful model of the monastic life. The disciples of Antony spread themselves beyond the tropic, over the christian empire of Ethiopia. 9

The monastery of Bancor, in Flintshire, which contained above two thousand monks, received a numerous colony of the barbarians of Ireland; 10 and Iona, one of the Hebrides, which was planted by the Irish monks, diffused over the northern regions a doubtful ray of science and superstition. 11

These unhappy exiles from social life, Caesars or of its Chars, were the secret dark and inexplicable genius of superstition. Their mutual resolution was supported by the example of millions, of either sex, of every age, and of every rank; and each proponent, who entered the gates of a monastery, was persuaded, that he trod the steep and thorny path of asceticism, and

2 When Hilarion sailed from Patrascum to Cape Pachynus, he offered to pay his passage with a book of the Apocalypse, by a Gallic monk who had visited Egypt, found a merchant-ship bound from Alexandria to Marseille, and performed the voyage in thirty days. (Sulp. Sever. Dial. l. 1.) Athanasius, who addressed his life of St. Antony to the foreign monks, was obliged to have the composition, that it might be ready for the sailing of the fleets, (I. H. 6 The introduction of the monastic life into Rome and Italy, is occasioned mentioned by Jérôme, tom. i. p. 231, 252. The story of Hilarion, Hellen, and St. Hilic, by the same author, are admirably told, and the only defect of the representation in this composition is the want of truth and common sense.

7 These were disturbed by long and frequent aggravations. Some critics have disputed the authenticity of his ecclesiastical rules; but the external evidence is very strong, and they can only prove that it is a work of later composition. or dignity on the monastic profession. The indignant father bewailed the loss, perhaps, of an only son; * the credulous maid was betrayed by vanity to violate the laws of nature; and the indelicate perfidy of their being the virtues of domestic life. * Paula yielded to the persuasive eloquence of Jerom; and the profane title of mother-in-law of God, * tempted that illustrious widow to consecrate the virginity of her daughter Eustochium. By the advice, and in the presence of her son, Jerom, she abandoned Rome and her infant son; retired to the holy village of Bethlem; founded an hospital and four monasteries; and acquired, by her alms and penance, an eminent and conspicuous station in the catholic church. Such rare and illustrious penitents were celebrated as the glory and example of the Christian age, whose passions were filled by a crowd of obscure and abject plebeians, * who gained in the cloister much more than they had sacrificed in the world.

Piousness, slaves, and mechanics, might escape from poverty and contempt, to a safe and honourable profession; whose apparent hardships were mitigated by the combination, and the relaxation of discipline. The subjects of Rome, whose persons and fortunes were made responsible for unqualified and exorbitant tributes, retired from the oppression of the imperial government; and the panhandle-rous youth preferred the penance of a monk to the luxury of a slave. The affrighted provincials of every rank, who fled before the barbarians, found shelter and subsistence; whole legions were buried in these religious sanctuaries; and the same cause, which relieved the distress of individuals, impelled the strength and fortitude of the empire.

Character of the monks. 4

One of the main objects of the anonymous writer, the monk, was an act of voluntary devotion. The inconstant fanatic threatened with the eternal vengeance of the God whom he desolated; but the doors of the monastery were still open for repentance. Those monks, whose condescension was fortified by reason or passion, were at liberty to resume the character of men and citizens; and even the spouses of Christ might receive the blessing of the cloister. * The examples of scandal, and the progress of superstition, suggested the propriety of more forcible restraints. After a sufficient trial, the fidelity of the novice was secured by a solemn and perpetual vow; and his irreproachable engagement was ratified by the hand of the church and state. He was pursued, arrested, and restored to his perpetual prison; and the interposition of the magistrate opposed the freedom and merit, which had alleviated, in some degree, the abject slavery of the monastic discipline. * The actions of a monk, his words, and even his thoughts, were determined by a code of laws, and the slightest offences were corrected by di grace or confinement, extraordinary farts or bloody flagellation; and disobedience, murder, or delay, were ranked in the catalogue of the most heinous sins. * A blind submission to the commands of the abbot, however absurd, or even criminal, they might seem, was the ruling principle, the first virtue, of the Egyptian monks; and their patience was frequently exercised by the most extravagant trials. They were directed to remove an enormous rock; assiduously to water a barren stuff, that was planted in the ground, till, at the end of three years, it should yield a crop; and a monk was allowed to make a lute; to walk into a fiery furnace; or to cast their infant into a deep pond; and several saints, or madmen, have been immortalized in monastic story, by their thoughtless and fearless obedience. * The freedom of the mind, the source of every generous and rational sentiment, was destroyed by the hypocrisy of the heretical submission; and the monk, contracting the vices of a slave, devoutly followed the faith and passions of his ecclesiastical tyrant. The peace of the eastern church was invaded by a swarm of fanatics, incapable of fear, or reason, or humanity; and the imperial troops acknowledged as illustrious a new name of barbarians, less apprehensive of an encounter with the fiercest barbarians.

Superstition has often framed and their dress and conspired the fantastic garments of the monks; but their apparent singularity sometimes creates an imitation. * The ecclesiastical and primitive model, which the revolutions of fashion have made ridiculous in the eyes of mankind, the father of the Benedictines expressly disclaims all idea of choice or merit; and sobriety exerts his disciples to 4 Dr. Middleton (vol. I. p. 110.) literally censures the conduct and writings of Chrysostom, one of the most eloquent and successful advocates for the monastic life. * The first statutes relative to the organization of monasteries forbid these abuses. The wife could not devote herself to the cloister and be consecrated to the service of God, without the consent of the husband. (St. Basil. epist. xxii. xiv.) A child war, or was the legitimate offspring of the marriage. (Graec. ch. 16.) A slave against the will of his master. (c. Chalcid. ch. 4.) But the emperor Justinian removed these prohibitions and permitted slaves, who were born in the possession of their masters, their parents or their husbands, (Nov. 22, c. 1.) to enter the holy Monastery. The excommunication is ridiculous and absurd. "If all the members of my body were changed into leeches, and all my limbs resounded with a human voice, yet should I be incapable," &c.

6 A Dominican friar, (Voyages du P. Lestib. tom. I. p. 18.) who lodged at Cudiz in a convent of his brethren, soon understood that his repose was never interrupted by nocturnal devotion; "slept upon" on the alm of the public, while his petrification of the people.

7 See a very sensible preface of Lucas Holstenius in the Codex Gregorii, the emperor attempted to substitute the obligation of particular duties for the abhorrence of the general law. This was the torrent of superstition; and Justinian surpassed the most extravagant fears of the early martyrs. (Instit. 1. vi. c. 2.) Danville, (in Comm. de l'Instruction publique, tom. ii. p. 237.)

The DECLINE and FALL. Chap. XXXVII.

...adopt the coarse and convenient dress of the countries which they may inhabit. The monastic habits of the ancients varied with the climate, and their mode of life; and they assumed, with the same indifferency, the dress of Egyptians, or Syrians, or the gowns of the Grecian philosophers. They allowed themselves the use of linen in Egypt, where it was a cheap and domestic manufacture; but in the west, they rejected such an expensive article of foreign luxury. It was the practice of the monks either to cut or shave their hair, - they wrapped their sheets in a cowl, to escape the sight of profane objects; their legs and feet were naked, except in the extreme cold of winter; and their slow and feeble steps were supported by a long staff. The aspect of a genuine anachoret was horrid and disgusting; every sensation that is offensive to man, was thought acceptable to God; and the angelic rule of Tabenne condemned the salutary custom of bathing the limbs in water, and of anointing them with oil. The austere monks slept on the ground, on a hard mat, or a rough blanket; and the same bundle of palm-leaves, with which they warmed themselves, they used for a pillow in the night. Their original cellars were built, a little of the smallest materials; which formed, by the regular distribution of the streets, a large and populous village, enclosing, within the common wall, a church, an hospital, perhaps a library, sometimes a garden, and a cistern or reservoir of fresh water. Thirty or forty brethren composed a family of separate discipline and diet; and the great monasteries of Egypt consisted of thirty or forty families.

Their diet. Pleasure and guilt are synonymous terms in the language of the monks: and they had discovered, by experience, that rigid fasts and abstemious diet, are the most effectual preservatives against the impure desires of the flesh. The rules of abstinence, which they imposed, or practised, were not uniform or perpetual; the cheerful festival, in Lent, was balanced by the extraordi- nary mortification of Lent; the fervour of new monasteries was insensibly relaxed; and the voracious appetite of the Galls could not imitate the patient and temperate virtue of the Egyptians. The disciples of An- tony and Anthony were more cautious with their daily alms; and, with their daily sustenance, a piece of twelve ounces of bread, or rather biscuit, which they divided into two frugal repasts, of the afternoon, and of the evening. It was esteemed a merit, and almost a duty, to abstain from the boiled vegetables which were provided for the refectory; but the excess of the abbeys in luxury, induced them with the luxury of cheese, fruit, salted, and the small dried fish of the Nile. A more ample latitude of sea and river fish was gradually allowed or assumed; but the use of flesh was long confined to the sick or travellers; and when it gradually prevailed in the less rigid monasteries of Europe, a singular disposition in the monastic body, it was a necessary consequence, that the use of flesh and poultry, which had been less profane than the grosser animals of the field. Water was the pure and innocent beverage of the primitive monks; and the founder of the Benedicines regret the daily portion of half a pint of wine, which had been extorted from him by the domination of the age. Such an allowance might be easily supplied by the vineyards of Italy; and his victorious disciples, who passed the Alps, the Rhine, and the Baltic, required, in the place of wine, an adequate compensation of strong beer or cyder.

The candidate who aspired to the vi- - Their monastic use of evangelical poverty, abjured, at his first entrance into a regular community, the idea, and even the name, of all separate or exclusive possession. The brethren were supported by their manual labour; and the duty of labour was strenuously recommended as a penance, as an exercise of faith, as the almost burnt offering of the day.7 The garden, and fields, which the industry of the monks had often rescued from the forest or the moors, were diligently cultivated by their hands. They performed, without reluctance, the menial offices of husbandmen and domestics; and the several tasks of the kitchen were discernible in their habit, their utensils, and their lodging, exercised within the precincts of the great monasteries. The monastic studies have tended, for the most part, to darken, rather than to dispel, the cloud of superstition. Yet the curiosity or zeal of some learned solitaries has cultivated the ecclesiastical, and even the profane, sciences; and posterity must gratefully acknowledge, that the monuments of Greek and Roman literature have been preserved and multiplied by their indefatigable pens. But the more humble industry of the monks, especially in Egypt, was contended with the silent, solitary occupation, of making wooden sandals, or of twisting the leaves of the palm-tree into mats and baskets. The superfluous stock, which was not consumed in domestic use, supplied, by trade, the wants of the community; the monastic palaces, through the slavish orders of the abbots, described the Nile as far as Alexandria; and, in a christian market, the sanctity of the workmen might enhance the intrinsic value of the work.

But the necessity of manual labour, was insensibly superseded. The novice was taught to turn his hand to the arts and sciences of the saints, in whose society he was resolved to spend the remainder of his life; and the pernicious indulgence of the laws permitted him to receive, for their use, any future acquisitions of legacy or inheritance.6 Melania contributed her plate, three hundred pounds' weight of silver; and Paula contracted an immense debt, for the relief of their favourite monks; who kindly imparted the merits of their prayers and penance to a rich and liberal sinner.

Time continually increased, and accumulated on the estates of the monasteries, which spread over the adjacent country and cities; and, in the first century of their institution, the indefat Zosimus has maliciously observed, that, for the benefit of the poor, the christian monks had reduced a great part of mankind to a state of beggary. As long as they maintained their original fervour, they焘warded themselves, however, the faithful and benedictive interest which was intrusted to their care. But their discipline was corrupted by prosperity: they gradually assumed the pride of wealth, and at last indulged the luxury of expense. Their public luxury might be excused by the magnificence of religious worship, and the decent motive of erecting durable habitations for an immortal society. But every age of the church has accused the licentiousness of the degenerate monks; who no longer remembered the object of their institution, embraced the vain and sensuous life of the worldly, and profaned the church, and scandalously abused the riches which had been acquired by the austere virtues of their founders. Their natural descent, from such painful and dangerous virtue, to the common vices of humanity, will not, perhaps, excuse much grief or indignation in the mind of a philosopher.

Their solitude. The lives of the primitive monks were consumed in penance and solitude; undisturbed by the various occupations which fill the time, and exercise the faculties, of reasonable, active, and social beings. Whenever they were permitted to step beyond the precincts of the monastery, two jealous companions were the mutual guards and spies of each other's actions; and, after their return, they were condemned to forget, or, at least, to suppress, whatever they had seen or heard in the world. Strangers, who professed the orthodox faith, were hospitably entertained in a separate apartment; but their dangerous conversation was restricted to some chosen elders of approved discretion and fidelity. Except in their presence, the monastic slave might not receive the visits of his friends or kindred; and it was deemed highly meritorious, if he afflicted a tender sister, or an aged parent, with his company. The monks themselves passed their lives, without personal attachments, among a crowd, which had been formed by accident, and was detained, in the same prison, by force or prejudice. Recluse fanatics have few ideas or sentiments to communicate; a special licence of the abbot regulated the time and manner of their familiar visits; and, at their silent meals, they were enveloped in their cowls, inaccessible, and almost invisible, to each other. Study is the resource of solitude.

h See Jerom, (tom. i. p. 176, 183.) The monk Pambo made a sublime answer to Melarich, who wished to specify the value of her gift. "Do you offer it to me, or to God? If to God, we suspend the money, and give it to such a beggar, that is not unfrequently our plate." (Pallad. Hist. Orient. c. 10. in the Vit. Patrum, i. viii. p. 171.)

1 It is not improbably that the sect of a tri-dimensional universe, in which the world is threefold, was for surpassed by the princiably greatest of the Benedictines.

2 The sixth general council (the Quinisext) in Trullo, Caro vivi, in Beveridge, tom. i. 313,) restricts women from passing the night in a male, or men in a female, monastery. The seventh general council (in the fourth century) thoroughly prohibited the erection of double or promiscuous monasteries of both sexes: otherwise, when the prohibition was not effectual. On the irregular pleasures and excesses which were prevalent in monasteries, see Thunman, tom. ii. p. 134—1365.

3 The celebration of this holiday is not without considerable confessions of a Benedictine abbots. "My vow of poverty has given me a hundred thousand spiritual riches, and I go from the abbeys to the rank of a sovereign prince."—I forget the consequences of his ostentation.

4 Plor, an Egyptian monk, allowed his sister to see him; but he shut his eyes during the whole visit. See Vit. Patrum, i. iii. p. 304. Madison. I. ii. pp. 545—546.

5 The 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th, of the Rule of Pachomius, impose most intolerable bans of silence and mortification.

In the diurnal and nocturnal prayers the monks are copiously discussed by Cassian, in the third and fourth books of his Institutions; and he constantly preserves the liturgy, which an angel had dictated to the monasteries of Tabulae.

The monks were divided into two classes. The Cenobites see the Origi-nale and regular discipline; and the Anachorists, who indulged their unsocial, independent fanaticism. The most devout, or most ambitious, of the spiritual brethren, renounced the convent, as they had renounced the world. The fervent monasteries of Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, were surrounded by a Laura; a distant circle of solitary cells; and the extravagant penance of the hermits was stimulated by applause and derision.† They sunk under the painful weight of crosses and chains; and their emaciated limbs were confined by collars, bracelets, gauntlets, and greaves, of messy and rigid iron. All superfluous ornament had been removed; they crept along the earth, and some savage saints of both sexes have been admired, whose naked bodies were only covered by their long hair. They aspired to reduce themselves to the rude and miserable state in which the human brute is scarcely distinguished above his kindred animals; and with a numerous sort of punishment, and their minds from their humble practice of grazing in the fields of Mesopotamia with the common herd.‡ They often usurped the den of some wild beast whom they affected to resemble; they buried themselves in some gloomy cavern, which art or nature had scooped out of the rock; and the marble quarries of Thebais are still inscribed with the monuments of their penance. The most perfect hermits are supposed to have passed many days without food, many nights without sleep, and many years without speaking; and glorious was the man (I abuse that name) who contrived any cell, or set himself to construct a hut, which might expose him, in the most inconvenient posture, to the inclemency of the seasons.

Simeon Stylites. Among these heroes of the monastic A. D. 520. life, the name and genius of Simeon Stylites †† have been immortalized by the singular invention of an aerial penance. At the age of thirteen, Simeon deserted the profession of a shepherd, and threw himself into an austere monastery. After a long and painful noviciate, in which Simeon was repeatedly saved from pious suicide, he established his residence on a mountain, about thirty or forty miles to the east of Antioch. Within the space of a mandura, or circle of stones, to which he had attached himself by a ponderous chain, he ascended a column, which was successively raised from the height of nine, to that of sixty, feet from the ground. In this last, and lofty, station, the Syrian monarch resisted the heat of thirty summers, and the cold of as many winters. Habit and exercise instructed him to maintain his dangerous situation without fear or giddiness, and successively to assume the different postures of devotion. He sometimes prayed in an erect attitude, with his outstretched arms, in the figure of a cross; but his most familiar practice was that of bending his meagre skeleton from the forehead to the feet; and a curious spectator, after numbering twelve hundred and forty-four repetitions, at length desisted from the endless account. The progress of an ulcer in his thigh ‡‡ might shorten, but it could not disturb this celestial life; and the patient hermit expired, without descending from his column. A prince, who should capriciously inflict such tortures, would be deemed a tyrant; but it would surpass the power of a tyrant, to impose a long and miserable existence on the reluctant victims of his cruelty. This voluntary martyrdom must have gradually destroyed the sensibility both of the mind and the body; nor can it be presumed that the fanatics, who torment themselves, are susceptible of any lively affection for the rest of mankind. A cruel unfeeling tempest was in this instance kindled upon the reverend and stereotyped nation; their stern indifference, which is seldom modified by personal friendship, is inflamed by religious hatred; and their merciless zeal has strangled the holy office of the Lquisition.

The monastic saints, who excite only the contempt of the world, and are or were without the influence of miracles and the confusions of history, were respected, and almost adored, by monks; the princes and people. Successive crowds of pilgrims from Gaul and India saluted the divine pillar of Simeon; the tribes of Saracens disputed in arms the honour of his benediction; the queens of Arabia and Persia generally confessed his supernatural virtue; and the angelic hermit was consulted by the younger Theodosius, in the most important concerns of church and state. His remains were transported from the mountain of Telenissa, by a solemn procession of the patriarch, the master-general of the east, six bishops, seventy-two prelates, three thousand monks, and each one of these was an author. Theodoret, and Cyprian, the apocryphal historian, have preserved the story of the miraculous restoration of the two sons of the emperor of the East, mentioned in the first book of the Miracles of Simeon. The oracle of the monks, a secret delivered by storms of rain and thunder, and almost imitated by a true angel, invited him to ascend, like Elijah, into a new chariot. The story too highly raised his stature, and again seized the monastic stigmatics of inducing the stigmatism on his vanity.

These cells. When Genseric founded his monastery in the wilderness of Jordan, it was accompanied by a Laura of seventy cells.

† Theodoret, in a large volume, the Philosophers in Vit. Patrum, I. ix. 116, describes the lives and works of thirty-four Syrian monks. Evagrius (I. c. 12) more briefly celebrates the monks and hermits of Mesopotamia.

‡ Sxoumen, I. vi. c. 33. The great St. Epiphanius composed a panegyric on these avon, or grazing monks. (Tilmouritz, Mens. Eccl. tom. viii. p. 572.)

†† The P. Sicard, (Missions du Levant, tom. ii. p. 217—233.) examined the cellars of the Lower Thebais, with a very curious and learned work. The inscriptions are in the old Syrian character, which was used by the Christians of Hauran in the 6th century.†‡ and 111.

‡ The narrows circumstances of two cubes, or three feet, which Evangelist assigns for the summit of the column, is inconsistent with respect, with facts, and with the rule of architecture. The people who have designed, have not been easily deceived, for the number very much exceeds the thousand pages of that voluminous work. An elegant specimen may be found in the edification of the five thousand men at Martin. He restores the monks of Egypt; yet he insults them with the remark, that they never raised the dead; whereas this bishop of Tours had restored three dead men to life.

conversion to a countryman, or at least to a subject, worthy to be ranked among the inventors of useful arts, who have deserved the remembrance and gratitude of posterity. A great number of Roman provincials had been led away into captivity by the Goths, in the time of Gallienus; and of these captives, many were Christians, and several belonged to the ecclesiastical order. Those involuntary missionaries, dispersed as slaves in the villages of Daucia, successively laboured for the salvation of their masters. The seeds, which they planted, on the soil of their serfdom, were gradually sprouting; and before the end of a century, the pious work was achieved by the labours of Ulphilas, whose ancestors had been transported beyond the Danube from a small town of Cappadocia.

Ulphilas, a native of the Goths, acquired their love and reverence by his blameless life and indefatigable zeal; and they received, with implicit confidence, the doctrines of truth and virtue which he preached and practised. He executed the arduous task of translating the Scriptures into their native tongue, a dialect of the German, or Teutonic, language; but he prudently suppressed the four books of Kings, as they might tend to irritate the fierce and sanguinary spirit of the barbarians. The rude, imperfect idiom of soldiers and shepherds, so ill qualified to communicate any spiritual ideas, was improved and made serviceable; and he therefore could frame his version, was obliged to compose a new alphabet of twenty-four letters; four of which he invented, to express the peculiar sounds that were unknown to the Greek and Latin pronunciation. But the proselytizing state of the Gothic church was soon affected by the barbarians, who were gradually converted, and the Christians were divided by religion as well as by interest. Fritigern, the friend of the Romans, became the prince of Ulphilas; while the hungry soul of Athanaric disdained the yoke of the empire, and of the gospel. The faith of the new converts was tried by the persecution which they encountered. A waggon, bearing also the simple image of Thor, perhaps, or of Woden, was conducted in solemn procession through the streets of the camp; and the rebels, who refused to worship the god of their fathers, were immediately burnt, with their tents and families. The character of Ulphilas recommended him to the esteem of the eastern court, where he twice appeared as the minister of peace; he pleaded the cause of the distressed Goths, who implored the protection of Valens; and the name of Moses was applied to this spiritual guide, who conducted his people through the deep waters of the Danube, to the Land of Promise. The devout shepherds, who were attached to his person, and tractable to his voice, acquiesced in his settlement, at the foot of the Median mountains, in a country of woodlands and pastures, which supported their flocks and herds, and enabled them to purchase the corn and wine of the more plentiful provinces. These barbarian bishops were masters of obscure peace, and the profession of Christianity.\footnote{On the subject of Ulphilas, and the conversion of the Goths, see Socrates, Hist. c. 56. Their fiercer brethren, the formidable Visigoths, universally adopted the religion of the Romans, with whom they maintained a perpetual intercourse, of friendship, of love and commerce. Those long and victorious march from the Danube to the Atlantic ocean, they converted their allies; they educated the rising generation; and the devotion which reigned in the camp of Alaric, or the court of Théodoric, might edify, or disgrace, the palaces of Strasme and Constantinople. The empire, by the period, was imbued with the spirit of Christianity; and this religion was embraced by almost all the barbarians, who established their kingdoms on the ruins of the western empire; the Burgundians in Gaul, the Suevi in Spain, the Vandals in Africa, the Ostrogoths in Pannonia, and the various hands of mercenaries, that first settled among the Teutonic races, of the island of Rome. The Franks and the Saxons still perished in the errors of paganism; but the Franks obtained the monarchy of Gaul by their submission to the example of Clovis; and the Saxons conquerors of Britian were reclaimed from their savage superstition by the missions of Rome. 1. 3. The Magyars, and others, embraced Christianity.\footnote{Conducted the conversion of the Burgundians, whose Christian piety is celebrated by Oro-}

4. The Suevi and Franks, the Franks, Saxons, and Jutes, embraced Christianity.\footnote{See an original and curious epitome from Danubii, the first bishop of Winchester. (Boll. Hist. Eccles. Anglicana, l. v. c. 15, 200, edit. Smith) to St. Dunstan, who preached the gospel among the savages of Hesse and Thuringia. which may be conceived by the mind, is it created or eternal? If created, how, or where, could the gods themselves exist before the creation? If eternal, how could they assume the empire of an independent and pre-existing world? Their magnitude and weight of all men's opinion, their excess and moderation, insinuate, at seasonable intervals, the truth and beauty of the christian revelation; and endeavour to make the unbelievers ashamed, without making them angry." This metaphysical reasoning, too refined perhaps for the barbarians of Germany, was not receivèd with the same gravity of weight and splendour of solar consent. The advantage of temporal prosperity had deserted the pagan cause, and passed over to the service of christianity. The Romans themselves, the most powerful and enlightened nation of the globe, had renounced their ancient superstition; and, if the ruin of their empire seemed to accuse the efficacy of the new faith, the disgrace was already retrieved by the conversion of the victorious Goths. The valiant and fortunate barbarians, who subdued the provinces of the west, successively received, and reflected, the same edifying example. Before the age of Charle- magne, the christian nations of Europe might excite a feeling of respect for the exclusive possession of the temperate climates, of the fertile lands, which produced corn, wine, and oil; while the savage idolaters, and their helpless idols, were confined to the extremities of the earth, the dark and frozen regions of the north;

Egerius, in their Christianity, which opened the gates of heaven to the barbarians, introduced an important change in their moral and political condition. They received, at the same time, the use of letters, so essential to a religion whose doctrines are contained in a sacred book, and while they studied the divine law, their view was at the same time enlarged by the distant view of history, of nature, of the arts, and of society. The version of the Scriptures into their native tongue, which facilitated their conversion, must excite, among their clergy, some curiosity to read the original text, to understand the sacred liturgy of the church, and to examine, in the writings of their fathers, the chain of ecclesiastical tradition. These spiritual gifts were preserved in the Greek and Latin languages, which concealed the inestimable monuments of ancient learning. The immortal productions of the apostle Paul and the Epistles of St. Peter, whose successors were the pre-existing world! It was to moderate their insolence of conquest, and to preserve, in the downfall of the empire, a permanent respect for the name and institutions of Rome. In the days of paganism, the priests of Gaul and Germany reigned over the people, and the world was regulated by the magistrates; and the zealous proselytes transferred by what equal, or more ample, measure of devout obedience, to the pontiffs of the christian faith. The sacred character of the bishops was supported by their temporal possessions; they obtained an honourable seat in the legislative assembly, General toleration.

Gaul, Spain, and Italy, enjoyed under the reign of the Arians, the free and peaceful exercise of their religion. Their haughty masters respected the zeal of a numerous people, resolved to die at the foot of a clear and unclouded banner. Bigotry was to be regarded as a mark of constancy, and imitated by the barbarians themselves. The conquerors evaded, however, the disgraceful reproach, or confession, of fear, by attributing their toleration to the liberal motives of reason and humanity; and while they affected the language, they imperceptibly imbied the spirit, of genuine christianity.

Armenian persecution the peace of the church was some- times interrupted. The catholics were indiscriminate, the barbarians were impatient; and the partial acts of severity or injustice which had been recom- mended by the Arian clergy, were exaggerated by the orthodox nations; by Gundamund, who reigns in Aquitain, 1 was permitted to be imputed to Euric, king of the Visigoths; he sus- pended the exercise of ecclesiastical, or at least of episcopal, functions; and published the popular bish- ops of Aquitain with imprisonment, exile, and con- fiscation. 2 Thrasimund, the most cruel and absurd enterprise of such a nature, was condoned, and his people was dis- pute his will in synods and churches; and his ferocious mind was incapable of fear or of compassion. His catholic subjects were oppressed by intolerant laws and arbitrary punishments. The language of Generic was furious and formidable; the knowledge of his intentions, not justify the most unfavourable interpretation of his speech of persecution; he was appro- ached with the frequent executions, which stained the palace and the dominions of the tyrant. Arms and ambition were, however, the ruling passions of Humurie, the monarch of the sea. But Humurie, his lugubrious son, who seemed to in- herit only his vices, tormented the catholics with the same unrelenting fury which had been fatal to his brother, his nephews, and the friends and favourites of his father; and even to the Arian patriarch, who was inhumanly burnt alive in the midst of Carthage. The religious war was preceded and prepared by an insidious truce; persons were admitted as ambas- sadors with the important business of the Vandal court; and the loathsome disease, which hastened the death of Humurie, revoked the injuries, without contributing to the deliverance, of the church. The throne of Africa was successively filled by the two nephews of Humurie.

Gundamund, A.D. 461, about twelve, and by Thrasimund, who governed the nation above twenty-seven years. Their administration was hostile and oppressive to the orthodox party. Gundamund appeared to emulate, or even to surpass the cruelty of his uncle; and, if at length he relented, if he recalled the abuse of freedom of Asrian worship, a prema- ture death intercepted the benefits of his tardy elem- nities. His brother, Thrasimund, was the greatest and most accomplished of the Vandal kings, and the excelled in beauty, pru- dence, and magnanimity of character. His ungla- norous character was degraded by his intolerant zeal and deceitful eloquence. Instead of threats and tor- tures, he employed the gentle but efficacious powers of seduction. Wealth, dignity, and the royal favour were the liberal rewards of apostasy; the catholics, who had violated the laws, might purchase their pardon by the renunciation of their faith; and whenever Thrasimund meditated any rigorous measure, he patently waited till the indiscretion of his adversary furnished him with a specious opportunity. But when he had used the means of dissuasion, and he exalted from his successor a solemn oath that he would never tolerate the sectaries of Athanasius. But his successor, Hilderic, the gentle son of the savage Hunnerie, preferred the duty of humanity and justice, to the vain obliga- tion of an impious oath; and he let his deposition be observed by the restoration of peace and universal freedom. The throne of that virtuous, though feeble monarch, was usurped by his cousin Gelimer, a zealous Arian; but the Vandal kingdom, before he could enjoy or abuse his power, was subverted by the arms of Belisarius; and the orthodox party retaliated the injuries which they had endur'd. 3

The passionate declamations of the Arians, the oaths of these per- secutors, cannot afford any distinct series of causes and events, and any impartial view of characters most remarkable; and it is only necessary to state those that deserve either credit or notice, may be referred to the following heads: I. In the original law, which is still extant, Hunnerie expressly declares, and the declaration appears to be correct, that he had faithfully transcended the regulations and penalties of the imperial edicts, in the persecutions, the clergy, and the people, who dissented from the established religion. If the rights of conscience had been understood, the catholics must have condemned their past conduct, or acquiesced in their actual sufferings. But they still persisted to refuse the indulgence which they claimed. While they troubled under the religious war, they praised the laudable severity of Hunnerie himself, who burnt or banished great numbers of Manichaens; 2 and they rejected, with horror, the ignominious compromise, that the dis- ciples of Arians, and of Athanasius, should enjoy a reci- procal and similar toleration in the territories of the Romans and in those of the Vandals. 2 I. The prac- tice of a conference, which the catholics had so fre- quently used to insult and punish their obstinate antag- onists, was retorted against themselves. 3 At the command of Hunnerie, four hundred and sixty-six orthodox bishops assembled at Carthage; but when they were no longer in the hands of their master, he had the mortification of beholding the Arian Cirila exalt ed on the patriarchal throne. The disputants were separated, after the mutual and ordinary re- proaches of noise and silence, of delay and precipita- tion, of military force and of popular clamour. One martyr and one confessor were selected among the catholic bishops; twenty-eight escaped by flight, and eighty-eight by conformity; forty-six were sent into Corsica to cut timber for the royal navy, and two thousand were banished to the different parts

1 Theological monuments of the Vandal persecution are preserved in the five books of the History of Victor of Viturien, (ed. by Vandalus,) a bishop who was exiled by Hunnerie; in the Life of St. Gregory, (on Thecla, who was imprisoned in the persecution of Thrasimund, (in Bibliah. Max. Patrum, tom. i. p. 143, 4.) and in the first book of the Vandalic War, by the imperial Procopius, (c. 7, p. 196, 197, 198.) Dom. Hunter, in his History of the Church, has noted his death; and the sacrifice of the bishop had the mortification of beholding the Arian Cirila exalted on the patriarchal throne. The disputants were separated, after the mutual and ordinary re- proaches of noise and silence, of delay and precipita- tion, of military force and of popular clamour. One martyr and one confessor were selected among the catholic bishops; twenty-eight escaped by flight, and eighty-eight by conformity; forty-six were sent into Corsica to cut timber for the royal navy, and two thousand were banished to the different parts of Africa, exposed to the insults of their enemies, and carefully deprived of all the temporal and spiritual comforts of life. The hardships of ten years' exile must have reduced their numbers; and if they had complied with the law of Thrasmund, which prohibited any episcopal consecrations, the orthodox clergy must have been deprived of the live and actual services of their pastors. They disobeyed; and their disobedience was punished by a second exile of two hundred and twenty bishops into Sardina; where they languished fifteen years, till the accession of the great Genseric. The two isles afterwards called Sicily, were ruled by tyrants chosen by the will of their Arian tyrant. Seneca, from his own experience has deplored and exaggerated the miserable state of Corsica, and the plenty of Sardinia was overbalanced by the unwholesome quality of the air. The zeal of Genseric, and his successors, for the conversion of the Catholics, must have rendered them still more jealous to guard the purity of the Vandal faith.

2 Such are the contemporary complaints of Sidonius, bishop of Clermont, (ii. 1. p. 342.) and Sigismund. Gregory of Tours, who quotes this Epistle, (i. ii. c. 35, in tom. ii. p. 171.) extorts an un- warrantable assertion, that of the nine vacancies in Aquitain, some had been produced by episcopal murderdoma.

Before the churches were finally shut, it was a crime to appear in a barbarian dress; and those who presumed to neglect the royal mandate, were rudely dragged backwards by their lawful authority. The enlisted officers, for the loss of the religion of their prince, were ignominiously stripped of their honours and employments: banished to Sardinia and Sicily; or condemned to the servile labours of slaves and peasants in the fields of Utica. In the districts which had been peculiarly allotted to the clergy, the discipline of the church was more strictly prohibited; and severe penalties were denounced against the guilt of both the missionary and the proselyte. By these arts, the faith of the barbarians was preserved, and their zeal was inflamed; they discharged, with devout fury, the office of spies, informers, and executioners; and, in the course of a year, they took the field it was the favourite amusement of the march, to delude the churches, and to insult the clergy of the adverse faction. The citizens who had been educated in the luxury of the Roman province, were delivered, with exquisite cruelty, to the Moors of the desert. A venerable train of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, with a faithful crowd of four thousand and ninety-six persons, whose guilt is not precisely ascertained, were torn from their native homes, by the command of Hunneric. During the night they were surrounded by a herd of cattle, and left to their purdure: during the day they pursued their march over the burning sands; and if they fainted under the heat and fatigue, they were gloved or dragged along, till they expired in the hands of their tormentors. These unhappy exiles, when they reached the Moorish huts, might not only imagine the oppression of their native humanity was neither improved by reason, nor corrupted by fanaticism; but if they escaped the dangers, they were condemned to share the distress, of a savage life. It is incumbent on the authors of persecution previously to reflect, whether they are determined to support it in the last extremity. They excite the flame which they strive to extinguish; and it soon becomes necessary to chastise the contumacy, as well as the crime, of the offender. The fire, which is unable or unwilling to discharge, exposes his person and property to the punishment of the law, and the severer penalties suggests the use and propriety of capital punishment. Through the veil of fiction and declamation, we may clearly perceive, that the Catholics, especially under the reign of Hunneric, endured the most cruel and ignominious treatment. Respectable and valuable persons, were stripped naked, and raised in the air by pulleys, with a weight suspended at their feet. In this painful attitude their naked bodies were torn with scourges, or burnt in the most tender parts with red-hot plates iron. The multitude of the cars, the noise, the tongue, and the right hand, was inflicted by the Arians; and although the precise number cannot be defined, it is evident that many persons, among whom a bishop and a procuslus may be named, were entitled to the crown of martyrdom. The same honour was justly due to those who suffered for the defence of the faith, and who professed the Nicene creed with unshaken constancy; and Genseric might detect, as an heretic, the brave and ambitious fugitive whom he drenched as a rival. A new mode of conversion, which might subdue the feeble, and alarm the timorous, was employed by the Vandal clergy. They exhorted their people to an innovation, so fiercely maintained by the Vandals, can be imputed only to the example and advice of the Donatists. The Arian clergy surpassed, in religious cruelty, the king and his Vandals; but they were incapable of cultivating the spiritual way, which they were so desirous to possess. A patriarch might seat himself on the throne of Carthage; some bishops, in the principal cities, might usurp the place of their rivals; but the smallness of their numbers, and their ignorance of the Latin language, disbarred them from the consecration of a great church; and the Africans, after the loss of their orthodox pastors, were deprived of the public exercise of Christianity. The emperors were the natural protectors of the Homonian doctrine: and the faithful people of Africa, both as Romans and as Christians, and by the influence of their lawful sovereignty, supported the usurpation of the barbarous heretics. During an interval of peace and friendship, Hunneric restored the cathedral of Carthage; at the intercession of Zeno, who reigned in the east, and of Phocadius, the daughter and regent of emperors, and the sister of the queen of the Vandals. But this decent regard was but of short duration; and the haughty tyrant displayed his...
CONTEN'T FOR THE RELIGION OF THE EMPIRE, BY STUDIOUSLY ARRANGING THE BLOODY IMAGES OF PERSECUTION, IN ALL THE PRINCIPAL STREETS THROUGH WHICH THE ROMAN AMBASSADOR MUST PASS, IN HIS WAY TO THE PALACE. An oath was requested from the bishops, who were assembled at Carthage, that they should support the succession of his son Hildecr, and that they would renounce all foreign interests. Correspondence of this engagement, consistent, as it would seem, with their moral and religious duties, was refused by the more sagacious members of the assembly. Their refusal, faintly coloured by the pretence that it is unlawful for a Christian to swear, must provoke the suspicions of a jealous tyrant.

The catholics, oppressed by royal and military force, were far superior to their adversaries in numbers and learning. With the same weapons which the Greek and Latin fathers had already provided for the Arian controversy, they repeatedly silenced, or vanquished, the fierce and blustering successors of Ulpianus. The consciousness of their own superiority might have raised them above the arts and passions of religious warfare. Yet, instead of assuming such honourable pride, the orthodox theologians were tempted, by the assurance of impunity, to conduct their arguments with a pertinacity that seemed to lose all respect for the epithets of fraud and forgery. They ascribed their own polemical works to the most venerable names of Christian antiquity; the characters of Athanasius and Augustin were awkwardly personated by Vigilus and his disciples; and the famous creed, which so clearly exposed the mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation, is deduced, with strong probability, from this African school. Even the Scriptures themselves were profaned by their rash and sacrilegious hands. The memorable text, which asserts the unity of the Three who bear witness in heaven,", is condemned by the Pope of Carthage and the bishops of the province. And it was not in vain that those persons, who were distrusted, were distributed through the provinces of Africa. Their success was ascribed to the influence of a senatorial family, and had received a liberal education. He could repeat all Honorius and Measurin before he was allowed to study Law (Sta. Greg. iv. c. 11, p. 308.); he might understand Greek, and many Greek theologians were translated into Latin.

Compare the two prefaces to the Dialogue of Vigilus of Thapsos. (p. 118, 119, ed. Chite.) He might amuse his learned reader with an innocent fiction; but the subject was too grave, and the Africans were too ignorant.

The P. Queneau started this opinion, which has been favourably received. But the three following truths, however surprising they may seem, are now universally acknowledged. (Gerald Vesavia, tom. vi. p. 565—572.) The Church of Carthage is the Church of St. Athanasius; it is not the author of the creed which is so frequently repeated in every province; it does not appear until the end of the fourteenth century after his death. 2. It was originally composed in the Latin tongue, and, consequently, in the western provinces. Germain, pope, and bishop of Paris, so much admired by this extraordinary composition, that he frankly pronounced it to be the work of a drunken man, Poy, Domat, Theologus, tom. ii. t. vii. c. 8. p. 86.

Aug., p. 15); and the elaborate Prolegomena and Announcements of Dr. Mill and Wetstein to their editions of the Greek Testament. In 1669, the papist Simon Monitius published a polemic work against Dr. Mill; and his antagonist, John Beausire, in the next year, published a book of sixty pages. In 1731, the Arminian Wetstein used the liberty of his times, and of his sect.

Of all the MSS now extant, above forsores in number, some of which are more than 1300 years old, (Wetstein ad loc.) the orthoepical order of the Greek language is preserved by the Syriac, Coptic, and Armenian. The Canons of the Councils; the lives of the saints; the apocrypha, are becoming inviolable; and the two MSS. of Dublin and Berlin have been preserved, with the utmost care, by the learned Jacobus. (Satis is 227—225—225—227, and M. de Mies's four ingenuous letters, in tom. viii. et ix. of the Journal Britannique.) The three bishops who composed and published the profession of faith in the name of their brethren. They style this text, lucis claritas. (Vetus Vincens de Ferrarese, Vandal, I. iii. c. 11, p. 54.) It is quoted soon afterwards by the African poles, Vigilus and Fulgentius.

NEWED AND CORRECTED IN A DARK PERIOD OF TEN CENTURIES. After the invention of printing, the editors of the Greek Testament yielded to their own prejudices, or to those of the times; and the pious fraud, which was embarked with equal zeal at Rome and Geneva, has been infinitely multiplied in every country and every language of modern Europe. The example of fraud must excite suspicion; and the spectres by which the African catholics have defended the truth and justice of their cause, may be ascribed, with more reason, to their own industry, than to the visible protestation of heaven, the historian affirms, that in this religious conflict with an imperial eye, may condescend to mention one preternatural event, which will edify the devout, and surprise the incredulous. Tipasa, a maritime colony of Mauritania, sixteen miles to the east of Casaraca, had been distinguished, in every age, by the orthodox zeal of its inhabitants. They had braved the fury of the Donatists; they resisted, or eluded, the tyranny of the Arians. The town was deserted on the approach of an heretical bishop: most of the inhabitants who could procure ships passed over to the coast of Spain; and the unhappy remnant, refusing all communion with the usurper, still preserved the faithful tradition of the Bishop of Tipasa. Their disobedience exasperated the cruelty of Hunneric. A military count was despatched from Carthage to Tipasa; he collected the catholics in the forum, and in the presence of the whole province, deprived the guilty of their right hands and their tongues. But the holy confessors continued to speak without tongues; and this miracle is attested by Victor, an African bishop, who published a history of the persecution within two years after the event. 3. If any one," says Victor, "should doubt of the truth, let him repair to Constantineopolis, and listen to the clear and distinct profession of the sacred language, which these glorious sufferers, who is now lodged in the palace of the emperor Zenon, and is respected by the devout empress." At Constantineopolis we are astonished to find a cool, a learned, and unexceptionable witness, without interest, and without passion. (Annal. of Gaza, a Platonic philosopher, has accurately described his own observations on these African sufferers. 4. I saw them myself; I heard them speak: I diligently inquired by what means such an articulate voice could be formed without any organ of speech: I used my eyes to examine the report of my ears: I opened their mouth, and saw the tongue. The language of the Gentiles was thus completely torn away by the roots: an operation which the physicians generally suppose to be mortal. The testimony of Annal. of Gaza might be confirmed by the superfluous evidence of the emperor Justinian, in a perpetual edict; of count Marcellinus, in his Chroni-of the times; and of pope Gregory the first, who had resided at Constantinople, as the minister of the Roman pontiff. They all lived within the compass of a century; and they all appeal to their personal knowledge, or the public notoriety, for the truth of a miracle, which was repeated in several instances, displayed on the greatest theatre of the world, and submitted, during a series of years, to the calm examination of men. Their superintendence of the confessors, who spoke without tongues, will command the assent of those, and of those only, who already believe, that their language was pure and orthodox. But the subborn mind of an infidel is guarded by secret, infecible suspicion; and the Arian, or Socinian, who has seriously rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, will not be shaken by the most plausible evidence of an Athenian miracle.

The Vandals and the Ostrogoths preserved in the profession of Arianism till the final ruin of the kingdoms which they had founded in Italy and Spain. The barbarians of Gaul submitted to the orthodox dominion of the Franks; and Spain was restored to the catholic church by the voluntary conversion of the Visigoths.

This salutary revolution was hastened by the example of a royal martyr, whom our calmer reason may style an ungrateful rebel. Leovigild, the Gothic monarch of Spain, deserved the respect of his enemies, and the love of his subjects; the catholic doctrine, with all its saner sanction, was attempted, without much success, to reconcile their scruples by abolishing the unpopular rite of a second baptism. His eldest son Hermengild, who was invested by his father with the royal diadem, and the fair principality of Bética, contracted an honourable and orthodox alliance with a Merovingian princess, the daughter of Sigibert, king of Austrasia, and of the famous Brunehild. The beautiful Ingundis, who was no more than thirteen years of age, was received, beloved, and persecuted, in the Arian court of Toledo; and her religious constancy was alternately assaulted with blandishments and violence by her guardian, the Arian king. To the heathen princess, who abused the double claim of maternal authority, ascended by her resistance, Goisvintha seized the catholic princess by her long hair, inhumanly dashed her against the ground, kicked her till she was possessed of reason, and at last gave orders that she should be stripped, and thrown into a basson, a fish-pond. Love and honour might excite Hermengild to resent this injurious treatment of his bride; and he was gradually persuaded that Ingundis suffered for the cause of divine truth. Her tender complaints, and the weighty arguments of Leander, archbishop of Seville, accomplished his conversion; and the heir of the Gothic monarchy was initiated in the Nicene faith by the solemn rite of confirmation. The rash youth, inflamed by zeal, and perhaps by ambition, was tempted to violate the duties of a son, and a subject; and the catholics of Spain, although they could not comply with the common law of the land, were determined to resist, or to escape, was compelled to surrender himself into the hands of an ungraced father. Leovigild was still mindful of that sacred character; and the rebel, despoiled of his regal ornaments, was still permitted, not degraded himself a profane, but exhibited him. He repeated and unsuccessful treasons at length provoked the indignation of the Gothic king; and the sentence of death, which he pronounced with apparent reluctance, was privately executed in the tower of Seville. The infidel Goisvintha, who had been refused to accept the Arian communion, as the price of his safety, may excuse the honours that have been paid to the memory of St. Hermengild. His wife and infant son were detained by the Romans in ignominious captivity; and this domestic misfortune tarnished the glory of Leovigild. He was succeeded by his son Recared.

His son and successor, Recared, the Conversion of first catholic king of Spain, had imbibed the faith of his unfortunate brother, which he supported with more prudence and A.D. 586–589.

success. Instead of revolting against his father, Recared had promised to his mother to renounce the Arian communion, and to remove the bones of his predecessor from the niche made for them. He had promised to imitate the example of his prince. The laborious interpretation of doubtful texts, or the curious pursuit of metaphysical arguments, would have excited an endless controversy; and the monarch discreetly prostrated himself before the truths of history and visible arguments, the testimony of earth and of heaven. The earth had submitted to the Nicene synod: the Romans, the barbarians, and the inhabitants of Spain, unanimously professed the same orthodox creed; and the Visigoths resisted, almost alone, the concession of the christian world. A superstitious life was prepared to reverence, as the testimony of heaven, the preternatural cures, which were performed by the skill or virtue of the catholic clergy; the baptismal fonts of Osset in Bética, which were spontaneously replenished each year, on the vigils of Easter; and the miraculous shrine of St. Martin of Tours, which had already converted the Suevic prince and people of Gallicia. The catholic king encountered some difficulties on this important change of the national religion. A conspiracy, secretly fomented by the queen-dowager, was formed against his life; and two counts both visible and invisible. See Charlot, Hist. des Sacraments, tom. i. p. 466–552. Onch, Julia Constantina, was opposite to Seville on the north side of the Bética; (Plin. Hist. Natural, iii. 3) and the authentic reference of Gregory of Tours, (Hist. Franc. i. c. 43, p. 568,) which was spontaneously replenished each year, on the vigils of Easter; and the miraculous shrine of St. Martin of Tours, which had already converted the Suevic prince and people of Gallicia. The catholic king encountered some difficulties on this important change of the national religion. A conspiracy, secretly fomented by the queen-dowager, was formed against his life; and two counts... excited a dangerous revolt in the Narbonnese Gaul. But Recared disarmed the conspirators, defeated the rebels, and executed severe justice; which the Arians, in their turn, might brand with the reproach of persecution. Eight bishops, whose names betray their heretical and barbaric origin, suffered their errors; and all the books of Arian theology were reduced to ashes, with the house in which they had been purposely collected. The whole body of the Visigoths and Suevi were allured or driven into the pale of the catholic communion; the faith, at least, of ninety thousand of them, was confirmed by the second council, and the devout liberty of the barbarians enriched the churches and monasteries of Spain. Seventy bishops, assembled in the council of Toledo, received the submission of their conquerors; and the zeal of the Spaniards improved the Nicene creed, by declaring the procession of the Holy Ghost, from the Son, as well as from the Father: a weighty point of doctrine, which produced, long afterwards, the schism of the Greek and Latin churches. The royal proselyte immediately saluted and consulted pope Gregory, whom he summoned, the Great, a learned and holy prelate, whose reign was distinguished by the conversion of heretics and the establishment of the whole church on the first principles. Gregory fully offered on the threshold of the Vatican his rich presents of gold and gems: they accepted, as a lucrative exchange, the hairs of St. John the Baptist; a cross, which enclosed a small piece of the true wood; and a key, that contained some particles of iron which had been sacred by the Christians of Jerusalem.

The same Gregory, the spiritual conqueror of Britain, encouraged the pious Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards, to propagate the Nicene faith among the victorious savages, whose recent Christianity was polluted by the Arian heresy. The defection of the bishops of the Lombards left the road open to the industry and success of future missionaries, and many cities of Italy were still disputed by hostile bishops. But the cause of Arianism was gradually suppressed by the weight of truth, of interest, and of example; and the controversy, which Egypt had carried from the Pelagian, was terminated, after a war of three hundred years, by the final conversion of the Lombards of Italy.2

The first missionaries who preached the gospel to the barbarians, appealed to the evidence of reason, and claimed the benefits of civilization. The new faith quickly established their spiritual dominion, than they exported the christian kings to extirpate, without mercy, the remains of Roman or barbaric superstition. The successors of Clovis inflicted one hundred lashes on the paschas who refused to destroy their idols; the crime of sacrificing to the demons was punished by the Anglo-Saxon laws, with the heavier penalties of imprisonment and confiscation; and even the wise Alfred adopted, as an indispensable duty, the extreme rigour of the Mosaic institutions.3 But the punishment and the crime were gradually abolished among a christian people. The theological lapsed schools of the schools were suspended by propitious ignorance; and the intolerant spirit, which could find neither idolaters nor heretics, was reduced to the persecution of the Jews.

The exiled nation had founded some synagogues in the cities of Gaul; but Spain, since the time of Hadrian, was filled with their numerous colonies.4 The wealth which they accumulated by trade, and the management of the first flocks of the church, excited their masters; and they might be oppressed without danger, as they had lost the use, and even the remembrance of arms. Sisebut, a Gothic king, who reigned in the beginning of the seventh century, proceeded at once to the last extremes of persecution.5 He ordered all the Jews who were not willing to receive the sacrament of baptism; the fortunes of the obstinate infidels were confiscated, their bodies were tortured; and it seems doubtful whether they were permitted to abandon their native country. The excessive zeal of the Catholic king was moderated, even by the clergy of Spain, who solemnly pronounced the inconvenient sentence: that the sacrament should not be forcibly imposed; but that the Jews who had been baptized should be constrained, for the honour of the church, to persevere in the external practice of a religion which they despised and detested. Their frequent relapses provoked one of the successors of Sisebut to pronounce from his throne, that of all the sins of a king of the council of Toledo published a decree, that every Gothic king should swear to maintain this salutary edict. But the tyrants were unwilling to dismiss the victims, whom they delighted to torture, or to deprive themselves of the industrious slaves, over whom they might exercise a lucrative oppression. The Jews were thus continued in Spain, under the weight of the civil and ecclesiastical laws, which in the same country have been faithfully transcribed in the code of the inquisition. The Gothic kings and bishops at length discovered, that injuries will produce hatred, and that hatred will produce crime and robbery. They were determined to reconcile the religious of Christ and of Zoroaster, had secretly introduced themselves into the provinces; but these foreign sectaries were involved in the common disgrace of the sectaries, and were suspended by the public hatred. The rational opinions of the Pelagians were propagated from Britain to Rome, Africa, and Palestine, and silently expired in a superstitious age. But the cast was distracted by the Nestorian and Eutychian controversy; which attracted the attention of Gregory. A nation, the secret or professed enemies of christianity, still multiplied in servitude and distress; and the intrigues of the Jews promoted the rapid success of the Arabian conquerors.6 As soon as the barbarians withdrew, the powerful support, the impious heresy of Arians sunk to contempt and oblivion. But the Greeks still retained their sublime and loquacious position: the establishment of an obscure doctrine suggested new questions, and new disputes; and it was always in the power of an ambitious prelate, or a fanatic monk, to violate the peace of the church, and, perhaps, the peace of the empire. The political and the ecclesiastical interests of those disputes which were confined to the obscurity of schools and synods. CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Relig and conversion of Clovis.—His victories over the Burgundians, and Visigoths.—Establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul.—State of the barbarians.—State of the Romans.—The Visigoths of Spain.—Conquest of Britain by the Saxons.

The revolution of Gaul, who impudently supported the Roman yoke, received a memorable lesson from one of the lieutenants of Vespasian, whose weighty sense has been refined and expressed by the genius of Tacitus. The protection of the republic has delivered Gaul from internal discord and foreign invasions. By the loss of national independence, you have acquired the name and privileges of Roman citizens. You enjoy, in common with our subjects, the permanent benefits of civil government; and the situation is less exposed to the general mischiefs of tyranny. Instead of exercising the rights of conquest, we have been content to impose such tributes as are requisite for your own preservation. Peace cannot be secured without armies; and armies must be supported at the expense of the people. It is for your safety and for our own, that we guard the barrier of the Rhine against the ferocious Germans, who have so often attempted, and who will always desire, to exchange the solitude of their woods and morasses for the wealth and fertility of Gaul. The fall of Rome would be fatal to the provinces; and you would be buried in the ruins of that mighty fabric which has been raised by the valour and wisdom of eight hundred years. Your imaginary freedom would be insulted and oppressed by a savage master; and the expulsion of the Romans would be succeeded by the universal hostility of the barbarian conquerors. This salutary advice was accepted, and this strange prediction was accomplished. In the space of four hundred years, the hardy Gauls, who had encountered the arms of Caesar, were imperceptibly melted into the general mass of citizens and subjects: the western empire was dissolved; and the Germans who had passed the Rhine, fiercely contended for the possession of Gaul, and excited the contempt, or abhorrence, of its peaceful and polished inhabitants. With that conscious pride which the pre-eminence of knowledge and luxury seldom fails to inspire, they derided the hairy and gigantic savages of the north; their rustic manners, dissolute joy, voracious appetite, and their horrid appearance, equally disgusting to the sight and to the smell. The liberal studies were still cultivated in the schools of Autun and Bordeaux; and the language of Cicero and Virgil was familiar to the Gauls. Their ears were astonished by the harsh and unknown sounds of the German dialect, and they ingeniously lamented that the trembling masses fled from the harmony of a Burgundian lyre. The Gauls were endowed with all the advantages of art and nature; but as they wanted courage to defend them, they were justly condemned to obey, and even to flatter, the victorious barbarians, by whose elementy they held their present fortun es and the continuance of their lives.

As soon as Odocus had extinguished Euric, King of the western empire, he sought the friendship of the most powerful of the barbarians. The new sovereign of Italy resigned to Euric, King of the Visigoths, all the Roman conquests beyond the Alps, in return for which the Rhine and the Rhone might be considered this liberal gift with some ostentation of power, and without any real loss of revenue or dominion. The lawful pretensions of Euric were justified by ambition and success; and the Gothic nation might aspire, under his command, to the monarchy of Gaul and Britain. Alaric and Euric were, to his authority; nor did he restore the captive Franks, till he had imposed on that fierce nation the terms of an unequal peace. The Vandals of Africa cultivated his useful friendship; and the Ostrogoths of Pannonia were supported to the utmost of their power by the opposing power of the neighbouring Huns. The north (such are the lofty strains of the poet) was agitated, or appeased, by the sound of Euric; the great king of Persia consulted the oracle of the west; and the aged god of the Tiber was protected by the swelling genius of the Garamon. The formidable nations have often depended on accidents; and France may ascribe her greatness to the premature death of the Gothic king, at a time when his son Alaric was a helpless infant, and his adversary Clovis an ambitious and valiant youth.

While Childeric, the father of Clovis, King of Italy, was living in exile in Germany, he was found hospitably entertained by the queen, as well as by the king, of the Thuringians. After his restoration, Basina escaped from her husband's bed to the arms of her lover; freely declaring, that if she had not been more valiant, stronger, or more beautiful, than Childeric, she should have been the object of his preference. Clovis was the offspring of this voluntary union; and when he was no more than fifteen years of age, he succeeded, by his father's death, to the command of the Slavish tribe. The narrow limits of his kingdom were confined to the island of the Batavians, with the ancient dioceses of Tournay and Arras; and at the baptism of Clovis, the number of his warriors could not exceed fifteen thousand. The kindred tribes of the Franks, who had seated themselves along the Belge rivers, the Scheld, the Meuse, the

1. In this chapter I shall draw my quotations from the Recueil des Histoires des Gaules et de France, Paris, 1739–1740, in eleven volumes in folio. By the laborious industry of the translators, it is believed that almost all the original testimonies, as far as A. D. 1000, are disposed of in the chronological order, and illustrated with learned notes. Such a national work, which will be continued to the year 1500, might possess the importance of a national undertaking.

4. Sidonius was a diplomatist, p. 46. The character of Gelasius inclines me to believe, that he has not submitted the description of the Rhine (Hist. Geor. li. 170.) without the authority of some MS.

6. I use the familiar appellation of Clovis, from the Latin Dico- livius, or Chlodovius. But the Ch describes only the German aspiration; and the true name is not different from Ludovicus, or Luduvicus, in their original form: hence the appellation Clovis was derived. The name of Ludovicus is well known in French, and Clovis was probably intended for the French form.

7. GREY, Yorin. l. c. 12. In the 1. p. 165. Basina speaks the language of her husband, and her sons, and she might converse with Germanie in their old age: and the bishop of Neustria could not, without doing the mother of the first Christian king, have been the object of her preference.

8. The Abbe Dubois (Hist. Critique de l’Establishsement de la Monarchie Francise dans la Gaule, tom. i. p. 265–266) has the secret of defining the form of the primitive king of Clovis, and of ascertaining the correct number of his subjects.

9. Eusebius, a more learned and less prepossessed historian, civilianum praetorium permanens, verum decretae opusculum, &c. VI. ST. Vedasti, in tom. iii. p. 524. This subject appears to have been passed over by the classic writers; but I have thought it necessary to give it a place in the present volume, as it contains a subject of the greatest importance to the history of the Romans.
Moselle, and the Rhine, were governed by their independent kings, of the Merovingian race; the equals, the allies, and sometimes the enemies, of the Salic prince. But the Germans, who obeyed in peace the hereditary jurisdiction of their chiefs, were free to follow their own peculiar laws and usages; and the superior merit of Clovis attracted the respect and allegiance of the national confederacy. When he first took the field; he had neither gold and silver in his coffer, nor wine and corn in his magazine: but he imitated the example of Cesar, who, in the beginning of his reign, encountered wealth by the sword, and purchased soldiers with the fruits of conquest. After each successful battle or expedition, the spoils were accumulated in one common mass; every warrior received his proportionable share; and the royal prerogative submitted to the equal regulations of military law. The untamed spirit of the barbarians was taught to acknowledge the advantages of regular discipline. At the annual review of the month of March, their arms were diligently inspected; and when they traversed a peaceful territory, they were prohibited from touching a blade of grass. The justice of Clovis was incorruptible; and his careless or disobedient officers were punished with instant death. It would be superfluous to praise the valour of a Frank; but the valour of Clovis was directed by cool and consummate prudence. In all his transactions with mankind, he calculated the weight of interest, of passion, and of opinion. From his hour of accession, he had determined to preserve the sanguinary manners of the Germans, and sometimes moderated by the milder genius of Rome, and Christianity. He was intercepted in the career of victory, since he died in the forty-fifth year of his age; but he had already accomplished, in a reign of thirty years, but the standard of a popular and victorious empire, and had preserved the title, or at least with the authority, of king of the Romans. As a Roman, he had been educated in the liberal studies of rhetoric and jurisprudence; but he was engaged by accident and policy in the familiar use of the Germanic idiom. The independent barbarians resist the tribunal of a stranger, who possessed the singular talent of explaining, in their native tongue, the dictates of reason and equity. The diligence and affability of their judge rendered him popular, the impartial wisdom of his decrees obtained their voluntary obedience, and the reign of Syagrius over the Franks and Burgundians, from his return to the old civilisation of society. In the midst of these peaceful occupations, Syagrius received, and boldly accepted, the hostile defiance of Clovis; who challenged his rival, in the spirit, and almost in the language, of chivalry, to appoint the day, and the field, of battle. But the time of chivalry, the hour of the Frank, was yet to come. The Franks, for a day, did with a body of fifty thousand horse; and such an array might have been plentifully supplied with shields, cuirasses, and military engines, from the three arsenals, or manufactories, of the city. But the courage and numbers of the Gallic youth were long since exhausted; and the loose bands of volunteers, or mercenaries, who frequented the sandy soil, were incapable of containing with the national valour of the Franks. It would be ungenerous, without some more accurate knowledge of his strength and resources, to condemn the rapid flight of Syagrius, who escaped, after the loss of a battle, to the distant part of Thuringia. The minority of Alaric could not assist, or protect, an unfortunate fugitive; the pusillanimous Gotths were intimidated by the menaces of Clovis; and the Roman king, after a short confinement, was delivered into the hands of the conqueror. The Belgo cities surrendered to the king of the Franks; and the dominions of the Ostrogoths were directed towards the east by the ample diocese of Tongres, which Clovis subdued in the tenth year of his reign.

The name of Alemannia has been absurdly derived from their imaginary set-massion of the element on the banks of the Leman lake. From the year 428, the northern parts of Helvetia had been subdued by the ferocious Alemanni, who destroyed with their own hands the fruits of their conquest. A province, improved and adorned by the arts of Rome, was reduced to a savage wilderness; and some vestige of the stately Vindobonna may be discovered in the fertile and populous valley of the Aar. From the source of the Rhine, to its confluence with the Men and the Moselle, the formidable swarms of the Alemannia commanded either side of the river, by the right of ancient possession or recent victory. They had spread themselves into Gaul, over the modern provinces of Alsace and Lorraine; and their bold invasion of the kingdom of Cologne summoned the Salic prince to the defence of his Ripuarian allies. Clovis encountered the invaders of Gaul in the plain of Tolbiac, about twenty-four miles from Cologne; and the two fiercest nations of Germany were mutually animated by the memory of past exploits, and the pros-ppect of future greatness. The Franks, after an obstinac fatigued, gave way; and the Alamanni, raising a shout of victory, impetuously pressed their retreat.
But the latter, finding no resistance, retraced their steps; and perhaps by the piety, of Clovis; and the event of the bloody day decided for ever the alternative of empire or servitude. The last king of the Alamanni was slain in the field, and his people were slaughtered and pursued, till they threw down their arms, and yielded to the mercy of the conquerors. Without discipline it was impossible for them to rally: they had contemplatively demolished the walls and fortifications which might have protected their distress; and they were followed into the heart of their forests, by an enemy not less active than valiant, than the first. the great Theodoric congratulated the victory of Clovis, whose sister Aibofleda the king of Italy had lately married; but he mildly interceded with his brother in favour of the suppliants and fugitives, who had importuned his protection. The Gallic territories, which were possessed by the Alamanni, became the property of their conqueror; and the haughty nation, invincible, or rebellious, to the arms of Rome, acknowledged the sovereignty of the Merovingian kings, who graciously promised them to enjoy their peculiar manners and institutions, under the government of official, and at least, the respect of the conquerors. At last, in the western provinces, the Franks alone maintained their ancient habitations beyond the Rhine. They gradually subdued, and civilized, the exhausted countries, as far as the Elbe, and the mountains of Bohemia; and the peace of Europe was secured by the obedience of Germany.

Conversion of Clovis
A. D. 506.

Till the thirteenth year of his age, Clovis continued to worship the gods of his ancestors. His disbelief, or rather disregard, of Christianity, might encourage him to pillage with less remorse the churches of a hostile territory; but his subjects of Gaul enjoyed the free exercise of religious worship; and the bishops entertained a more favourable hope of the idoler, than of the her-etics. The Merovingian prince had contracted a fortunate alliance with the fair Clotilda, the niece of the king of Burgundy, who, in the midst of an Arian court, was confirmed in the Christian faith by the profession of her husband. It was her interest, as well as her duty, to achieve the conversion of his husband; and Clovis insensibly listened to the voice of love and religion. He con-sewed (perhaps such terms had been previously stipulated) to the baptism of his eldest son; and though the Frenchie were not firmly determined, he was persuaded, a second time, to repeat the dangerous experiment. In the distress of the battle of Tolbiac, Clovis loudly invoked the God of Clo-tilda and the Christians; and victory disposed him to hear, with respectful gratitude, the eloquent Remi.

2 Clovis, or rather Gregory, supposes that Clovis worshiped the gods of Greece and Rome. The fact is incredible, and the mistake only shows how completely, in less than a century, the national relgions of the Franks had been abolished, and even forgotten.

3 Gregory of Tours relates the marriage and conversion of Clovis, (c. 16. p. 175. 176, 177, and the Gesta Francorum, (in tom. ii. p. 296—300.) the author of the Gesta Francorum attributes the marriage, (c. 16. a. alone, in the Christian world, reserved the name and prerogatives of a Catholic king. The emperor Amassius entertained some dangerous errors concerning the nature of the divine incarnation; and the barbarians of Italy, Africa, and Gaul, who had two brothers, this Arian heresy. The eldest, or rather the only, son of the church, was acknowledged by the clergy as their lawful sovereign, or glorious deliverer; and the arms of Clovis were strenuously supported by the zeal and favour of the Catholic faction.

Submission of the Roman empire. Under the Roman empire, the wealth and jurisdiction of the bishops, their sa-tred character, and perpetual office, their numerous dependents, popular eloquence, and provincial assemblies, had rendered them always respectable, and sometimes dangerous.
These foundations were augmented with the progress of superstition, and the establishment of the French monarchy may, in some degree, be ascribed to the firm ance of a hundred prelates, who reigned in the dis-contested, or independent, cities of Gaul. The slight foundations of the Armoniac republic had been repeatedly shaken by the king of the Franks. They guardied their domestic freedom; asserted the dignity of the Roman name; and bravely resisted the predatory inroads, and regular attacks, of Clovis, who laboured to extend his conquests from the Seine to the Loire. Their successful opposition introduced an equal and imitable benefit; the Franks delivered the victory of the Armoniacs, and the Armoniacs were reconciled by the religion of the Franks.
The military force, which had been stationed for the defence of Gaul, consisted of one hundred different bands of cavalry or infantry; and these troops, while they assumed the title and privileges of Roman soldiers, were renewed by an incessant supply of the barbarian youth. The extreme fortifications, and scattered fragments, of the empire, were still defended by their hopeless courage. But their retreat was intercepted, and their communication was impracticable; they were abandoned by the Greek princes of Constantinople, and they piously disclaimed all connexion with the Arian usurpers of Gaul. They accepted, without shame or reluctance, the generous capitulation, which was proposed by a catholic hero; and this spurious, or legitimate, progeny of the Roman legions, was disting-uinguished by their virtues, the simplicity of their en-signs, and their peculiar dress and institutions.
But the national strength was increased by these powerful and voluntary auxiliaries; and the neighbouring kings dreaded the numbers, as well as the spirit, of the Franks. The reduction of the northern provinces of Gaul, by the king of the Franks, seemed, at the first sight, to be slowly effected by the gradual operation of war and treaty; and Clovis acquired all object of his ambition, by such efforts, or such concessions, as were adequate to its real value.
His savage character, and the virtues of Henry IV., suggested the most opposite ideas of human nature; yet some resemblance may be found in the situation of two princes, who conquered France by their valor, their policy, and the merits of a seasonable conversion.

The Burgundians were the kingdom of the Burgundians, which was defined by the course of two Gallic rivers, the Saone and the Rhone.

3 Instead of the Armoniacs, an unknown people, who now appear in the text of Procopius, Haddim du Valois has restored the proper names of the Armoniacs, which have, however, not been universally approved. Yet an unjudged reader would naturally suppose, that Procopius intended to describe a tribe of Germans, as the allies of Rome; and not a confederacy of Gallic cities, which had revelved from Gaul.

4 This important dissertation of Procopius (de Bell. Gotich., t. i. c. 12.
in. p. 22—36.) illustrates the origin of the French monarchs, and shows the mistakes and prejudices, which should leave some lasting traces, which are totally insinuated in Gregory of Tours, the Salle laws, &c.:

Avignon, at the distance of two hundred and fifty miles from the field of battle. A long siege, and an ardent negociation, dished the King, of the Frankish monarchy, the danger and difficulty of his enterprise. He imposed a tribute on the Burgundian prince, compelled him to pardon and reward his brother's treachery, and proudly returned to his own dominions, with the spoils and captives of the southern provinces. This splendid victory was soon clouded by the recollection, that Gundobald had violated his recent obligations, and that the unfortunate Godegisel, who was left at Vienna with a garrison of five thousand Franks, had been besieged, surprised, and massacred by his inhuman brother. Such an outrage might have exasperated the prince to the sacrifice of the most distinguished, yet the conqueror of Gaul dispersed the injury, released the tribute, and accepted the alliance, and military service, of the King of Burgundy. Clovis no longer possessed those advantages which had assured the success of the preceding war; and his rival, instructed by adversity, had found new resources in the affections of his people. The Gauls or Romans applauded the mild and impartial laws of Gundobald, which almost raised them to the same level with their conquerors. The bishops were reconciled, and flat- tered, who had been lively suspected of his approaching conversion; and though he eluded their accomplishment to the last moment of his life, his moderation secured the peace, and suspended the ruin, of the kingdom of Burgundy.

The first victory of Clovis had suited the honour of the Goths. They viewed his rapid progress with jealousy and terror; and the youthful fame of Alaric was despised by the more potent genius of his rival. Some disputes inevitably arose on the edge of their contiguous dominions; and after the delays of fruitless negotiation, a personal interview of the two kings was proposed and accepted. This conference of Clovis and Alaric took place in the vicinity of Vienna. They embraced, familiarly conversed, and feasted together; and separated with the warmest professions of peace and brotherly love. But their apparent confidence concealed a dark suspicion of hostile and treacherous designs; and their mutual complaints showed, at least, which was the accuser. A Paris, which he already considered as his royal seat, Clovis declared to an assembly of the princes and warriors, the pretense, and the motive, of a Gothic war. "It grieves me," he said to the Arlens, "we still possess the fairest portion of Gaul. Let us march against the invader of our rights. If you follow me, the heritage, we will possess, and divide, their fertile provinces." The Franks, who were inspired by hereditary valour and recent zeal, applauded the generous design of their monarch; expressed their resolu- tion to conquer or die; and their enterprise would be equally profitable; and solemnly protested that they would never spare their swords, till victory should absolve them from that inconvenient vow. The enterprise was promoted by the public or private expor- tations of Clotilda. She reminded her husband, that he had once promised the enterprise; and determined to accede to his request. The Franks, who were inspired by hereditary valour and recent zeal, applauded the generous design of their monarch; expressed their resoluthan in his diocese. To resist these foreign and domestic enemies, who were fortified by the alliance of the barbarian tribes, he began to secure their doubtful and reluctant aid. The Visigoths resumed the exercise of arms, which they had neglected in a long and luxurious peace; a select band of valiant and robust slaves attended their masters to the field; and the cities of Gaul were occupied by their troops. The last and most abject of the Burgundians, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, who reigned in Italy, had laboured to maintain the tranquillity of Gaul; and he assumed, or affected for that purpose, the impartial character of a mediator. But the sanguinary monarch dreaded the rising empire of Clovis, and was anxious to prevent the combination of his subjects to support the national and religious cause of the Goths.

Victory of Clovis. The accidental, or artificial, prodigies, which adorned the expedition of Clovis, were accepted, by a superstitious age, as the manifest declaration of the divine favour. He marched from Paris; and, as he proceeded with decisive reverence through the holy diocese of Tours, his anxiety tempted him to consult the shrine of St. Martin, the sanctuary, and the oracle of Gaul. His messengers were instructed to remark the words of the Psalm, which should happen to be chanted at the precise moment when they entered the church. They immediately expressed the valour and victory of the champions of heaven, and the application was easily transferred to the new Joshua, the new Gideon, who went forth to battle against the enemies of the Lord. Orleans secured to the Franks a bridge on the Loire; but, at the distance of forty miles from Poitiers, their progress was intercepted by an extraordinary swell of the river Vienne, or Vienne; and the opposite banks were covered by the encampment of the Visigoths. Delay must be always dangerous to barbarians, who consume the country through which they march; and Clovis possessed leisure and materials, it is likely, but impracticable to construct a bridge; or to force a passage, in the face of a superior enemy. But the affectionate peasants, who were impatient to welcome their deliverer, could easily betray some unknown, or unguarded, ford; the merit of the discovery was enhanced by the useful interposition of fraud or fiction; and a white hart of singular size and beauty, appeared to guide and animate the march of the catholic army. The counsels of the Visigoths were irresolute and distracted. A crowd of impatient warriors, presumptuous in their strength, and disdainful of wisdom, insisted on their immediate ascent in arms the name and blood of the conqueror of Rome. The advice of the graver chieftains pressed him to clude the first aourd of the Franks; and to expect in the southern provinces of Gaul, the veteran and victorious Ostrogoths, whom the king of Italy had already sent to his assistance. The decisive moments were wasted in idle deliberation; the Goths too hastily abandoned, perhaps, an advantageous post; and the opportunity of a secure retreat was lost by their slow and disorderly motions. After Clovis had passed the ford, as it is still named, of the Hort, he advanced with bold and hasty steps to prevent the escape of the connivance Goths. His troops were dirrected by a flaming meteor, suspended in the air above the cathedral of Poitiers; and this signal, which might be previously concerted with the orthodox successor of St. Hilary, was compared to the column of fire that guided the Israelites in the desert. At the third hour of the day, after an engagement with the Visigoths, Clovis overtook, and instantly attacked, the Gothic army; whose defeat was already prepared by terror and confusion. Yet they rallied in their extreme distress, and the martial youths, who had clamorously demanded the battle, refused to survive the ignominy of flight. The two kings encountered each other in single combat. Abaric fell by the hand of his rival; and the victorious Frank was saved by the goodness of his cuirass, and the vigour of his horse, from the spears of two desperate Goths, who boldly rode against him, to revenge the death of their sovereign. The vague expression of a mountain of the slain, serves to indicate a cruel, though indefinite, slaughter; but Gregory has carefully observed, that his valiant countryman Apollinaris, the son of Sitolnas, lost his life at the head of the nobles of Auvergne. Perhaps these suspected Catholics had devoted to their holy cause the son of the inveterate enemy; and perhaps the influence of religion was superseded by personal attachment, or military honour. Such is the empire of Fortune, (if we may still disfigure our ignorance under that popular name,) that it is almost always equally difficult to foresee the events of war, or to explain their various consequences. A bloody and complete victory has sometimes yielded no more than the possession of the field; and the loss of ten thousand men has sometimes been sufficient to destroy, in a single day, the victory of Clovis. The decisive battle of Poitiers was followed by the conquest of Aquitaine. Abaric had left behind him an infant son, a bastard competitor, factious nobles, and a disloyal people; and the remaining forces of the Goths were oppressed by the general consternation, or opposed to each other in civil discord. The victorious king of the Franks proceeded without delay to the siege of Angoulême. At the sound of his trumpets the walls of the city imitated the example of Jericho, and instantly fell to the ground; a splendid miracle, which may be reduced to the supposition, that some clerical engineers had employed the night before to undermine the rampart. At Bordeaux, which had submitted without resistance, Clovis established his winter-quarters; and his prudent economy transported from Toulouse the royal treasures, which were deposited in the capital of the monarchy. The conqueror penetrated as far as the confines of Spain; restored the honours of the catholic church; fixed in Aquitaine a colony of Franks; and delegated to his lieutenants the easy task of 2 After accepting the text or excusing the mistake, of Procopius, who places the defeat of Stilicho near Carthage, it appears that the rubric of 503. from the evidence of Gregory, Fortunatus, and the author of the History of Francorum, is inaccurate, and that the victory was gained, not in the year 503. on the banks of the Oron, but in ten months to the south of Poitiers. Clovis overtook and attacked the Visigoths near Vivonne, and the victory was decided near a village still called Chaparral St. Hilare, opposite. See the Dissertations of the Albert le Bonf., tom. I. p. 291—293.

3 Angoulême is still a place of importance. The ancient victory of Gregory delays the siege, I can more readily believe that he confirmed the order of history, than that Clovis neglected the rules of 4 Pyrenees moutes eque Perpiniannum subjectis is the expression in the inscription of the tomb of St. Victor, which hands the more correct date. It is the only inscription that existed before the tenth century. (March Hugonis, p. 45.) This florid and fabulous writer, (perhaps a monk of Amiens, who wrote the Albert le Bonf., Mem., c. 50.) confounds the title of the allogrephical character of a shepherd, the general history of his countrymen the Franks, or his own nation, but his narrative ends with the death of Clovis.

5 The name of the German Francorum, positively affirms, that Clovis fixed a body of Franks in the Substance and Bourgius; and he is not undoubtedly followed by Honorius, electors nobles, utque fertissim, cam parvis suis materiam. Yet it should seem that they were soon mingled with the Romans of Aquitain, till Charlemagne of subduing, or extirpating, the nation of the Visi-goths. But the Visigoths were protected by the wise and powerful monarch of Italy. While the balance was still equal, Theodoric had perhaps delayed the march of the Ostrogoths; but their strenuous efforts successfully resisted the ambition of Clovis; and the army of the Franks, and their Burgundian allies, was compelled to raise the siege of Arles, with the loss, as it is said, of two thousand men. These vicissitudes inclined the fierce spirit of Clovis to acquiesce in an advantageous treaty of peace. The Visigoths were suffered to retain the possession of Septimania, a narrow tract of sea-coast, from the Rhone to the Pyrenees; but the ample province of Aquitain, from those mountains to the Atlantic coast, was, indissolubly united to the kingdom of France.8

After the success of the Gothic war, Clovis accepted the honors of the Roman consulship. The emperor Anastasianus ambitiously bestowed on the most powerful rival of Theodosius, the title and ensigns of that eminent dignity; yet, from some unknown cause, the name of Clovis has not been inscribed in the Pontifii either of the east or west. 1

On the solemn day, the monarch of Gaul, placing a diadem on his head, was invested, in the presence of Martin, with the insignia of his mantle. From thence he proceeded on horseback to the cathedral of Tours; and, as he passed through the streets, profusely scattered, with his own hand, a donative of gold and silver to the joyful multitude, who incessantly repeated their acclamations of Consol and Augustus. But the accession of actual or legal right could not receive any new accessions from the consular dignity. It was a name, a shadow, an empty pagent; and if the conqueror had been instructed to claim the ancient prerogatives of that high office, they must have expired with the period of its annual duration. If the successors of the Franks were disposed to reverence in the person of their master, that antique title which the emperors consecended to assume: the barbarian himself seemed to contract a sacred obligation to respect the majesty of the republic; and the successors of Theodosius, by soliciting his friendship, tactfully forgave, and almost ratified, the usurpation of Gaulian

A.D. 536.

Between his sons and the Emperor Justinian, the monarchs of Ostrogothic Italy, unable to defend their distant acquisitions, had ceded to the Franks the Cities of Arles and Marseilles; of Arles, still adorned with the seat of a prerogative prelate, and of Marseilles, enriched by the advantages of trade and navigation. 10 This transaction was confirmed by the imperial authority; and Justinian, generously yielding to the Franks the sovereignty of the countries beyond the Alps, which they already possessed, absolved the provincials from their allegiance; and established on a more lawful, though not more solid, foundation, the throne of the Merovingians.9 From that era they enjoyed the ambiguous position of a privileged tributary of the circus; and by a singular privilege, which was denied even to the Persian monarch, the gold coin pressed with their name and image, obtained a legal currency in the empire. 4 A Greek historian of that age has praised the private and public virtues of the Franks, as a people nobly conformed and excellently sufficiently justified by their domestic annals. 5 He celebrates their politeness and urbanity, their regular government, and orthodox religion; and boldly asserts, that these barbarians could be distinguished only by their dress and language from the subjects of Rome. Perhaps their name was comprehended in the vague position and lively grace, which in every age have disguised their vices, and sometimes concealed their intrinsic merit. Perhaps Agathias, and the Greeks, were dazzled by the rapid progress of their arms, and the splendour of their empire. Since the conquest of Burgundy, Gaul except the Gothic province of Septimania, was subject, in its whole extent, to the sons of Clovis. They had extinguished the German kingdom of Thuringia, and their vague dominion penetrated beyond the Rhine, into the heart of their native forests.
The Roman provinces of Aquitaine, and the eastern provinces of Gaul and Spain, which were once covered with a Christian populace, were reduced to provinces inhabited by the Arians, and the Persians. The Franks were extended far beyond the limits of modern France, Yet modern France, such has been the progress of arts and policy, far surpasses in wealth, populousness, and power, the spacious but savage realms of Clotaire or Dagobert.

The Franks, or French, are the only political contro-people of Europe who can deduce a perpetual succession from the conquerors of the western empire. But their conquest of Gaul was followed by ten centuries of anarchy and ignorance. On the revival of learning, the students who had been formed in the schools of all except Gothic tribes were soon extended far beyond the limits of modern France.
According to the historians of France, the Gothic kingdom was terminated in the year 537, from the historian of the Franks, the Merovingians. This work was dedicated to the emperor of the Franks, and to the Franks themselves. It was completed in the year 575, and was finished with the death of the emperor.

The Franks, who probably used the mints of Trier, Lyons, and Arles, imitated the coinage of the Roman emperors of seventy-two soldi, or pieces, to the pound of gold. But as the Franks established their sovereignty upon the whole empire, they adopted as a reasonable proportion of gold their own coinage, for which they had a sufficient valuation of their products of gold. It was the common experience of the Vandals, and the Franks, that these monies of the Visigoths, and the Goths, had been maintained during three centuries. Twelve of these denarii made a solidus, or shilling, the twentieth part of the ponderal and numeral denarius, or pound of silver, which has been so strangely reduced in modern France.

nately defended: and the intertemporal disputants have accused each other of conspiring against the prerogative of the crown, the dignity of the nobles, or the freedom of the people. Yet the sharp conflict has usefully exercised the adverse powers of learning and genius; and each antagonist, alternately vanquished and victorious, has extirpated some ancient errors, and established by conflicting truths the stranger, instructed by their discoveries, their disputes, and even their faults, may describe, from the same original materials, the state of the Roman provincials, after Gaul had submitted to the arms and laws of the Merovingian kings.1

1. Lawed the bar

The rudest, or the most servile, condition of human society, is regulated however by some fixed and general rules. When Tacitus surveyed the primitive simplicity of the Germans, he discovered some permanent maxims, or customs, of public and private life, which were preserved by faithful tradition, till the introduction of the art of writing, and of the Latin tongue. Before the election of the Merovingian kings, the most powerful tribe, or nation, of the Franks, appointed four venerable chieftains to compose the Salic laws; and their labours were examined and approved in three successive assemblies of the nation, and their laws were to assuage the territories of Christi ty: the Salic law was again amended by his sons; and at length, under the reign of Dagobert, the code was revised and promulgated in its actual form, one hundred years after the establishment of the French monarchy. Within the same period, the customs of the Ripuarian were transcribed and published; and Charlemagne himself, the legislator of his age and country, had accurately studied the two national laws, which still prevailed among the Franks.2 The same care was extended to their vassals; and the rude institutions of the Alemanni and Bavarians were diligently compiled, and ratified by the supreme authority of the Merovingian kings. The Visigoths and Burgundians, whose conquests in Gaul preceded those of the Franks, showed less impatience to attain one of the principal benefits of civilized society. Euric was the first of the Gothic princes who expressed in writing the simple customs of his people; and the definition of the Burgundian laws was a measure of policy rather than of justice; to alleviate the yoke, and regain the affections, of their Gallic subjects.3 Thus, by a singular coincidence, the Germans framed their artless institutions, at a time when the elaborate system of Roman jurisprudence was finally consummated. In the Salic laws, and the Pandects of Justinian, we may consider the first rudiments, and of Justinian, we may consider the first rudiments, and of the salic laws, and the Pandects of Justinian, we may consider the first rudiments, and of the salic laws, and the Pandects of Justinian, we may consider the first rudiments, and of the salic laws, and the Pandects of Justinian, we may consider the first rudiments, and of the salic laws, and the Pandects of Justinian, we may consider the first rudiments of civil wisdom; and whatever prejudices may be suggested in favour of barbarism, our calmer reflections

1 In the space of thirty years, (1728—1758) this interesting subject has been agitated by the free spirit of the confédérat de Bayeux; (Messieurs du Bocage sur l'Etat de la France, articles XVI., XVII., XVIII., et XIX. 15—49) the learned incertitude of the Abbé Dubos; (Histoire Critique de Paris, etc.) and by the able observations of the learned Dra ing the work of two learned works of Hel necius, the History, and the Elements, of the Germanic law. In a judicious perusal of the Elements, he considers, and tries to excuse, the partiality of this learned work. He shows, that the book, so

5 Consult the ancient and modern prejudices of the several Codes, in the Institutes of the Germanic law, favourably suggests, that at Rome and Athens, homicide was only punished as a crime. It is true, but conquest. In the calm moments of legislation they solemnly pronounced, that the life of a Roman was of smaller value than that of a barbarian. The "Austrasia," a name expressive of the most illustrious birth or dignity, among the Franks, was appreciated at the same rate of price as the sixtieth degree of the royal provincial, who was admitted to the king's table; might be legally murdered at the expense of three hundred pieces. Two hundred were deemed sufficient for a Frank of ordinary condition; but the meager Romans were exposed to disgrace and danger by a trifling compensation; by fifty, or sixty, pieces, or a gold. Had these laws been regulated by any principle of equity or reason, the public protection should have supplied in just proportion the want of personal strength. But the legislator who weighed in the scale, not of justice, but of policy, the loss of a soldier against that of a slave; the head of an insolent and rapturous barbarian was guarded by a heavy fine; and the slightest aid was afforded to the most defenseless subjects. Time insensibly abated the pride of the conquerors, and the patience of the vanquished; and the boldest citizen was taught by experience, that he might suffer more than he could obtain. As the conquerors of the Franks became less ferocious, their laws were rendered more severe; and the Merovingian kings attempted to imitate the impartial rigour of the Visigoths and Burgundians. Under the empire of Childebram, murder was universally punished with death. The capital punishment of crimes was liberally multiplied in the jurisprudence of modern Europe.

6 The Ripuarian law declares, and defines, that indulgence in fa

Judgments of the civil and military professions, which had been separated by Constantine, were again united by the barbarous laws. The height of the Teutonic appellations was mollified into the Latin titles of duke, of count, or of prefect; and the same officer assumed, within his district, the command of the troops, and the administration of justice. But the fierce and illustrious chieftain was seldom qualified to discharge the duties of a judge, which require all the faculties of a philosophic mind, laboriously cultivated by experience and study; and his rude ignorance was compelled to encroach some simple, and visible, methods of ascertaining the cause of justice. In every religion, the Deity has been invoked to confirm the truth of the one and falsehood of the other; but this powerful instrument was misapplied and abused, by the simplicity of the German legislators. The party accused might justify his innocence, by producing before their tribunal a number of friendly witnesses, who solemnly declared the belief, or assurance, that he was not guilty. According to the weight of the charge, this legal number of compurgators was multiplied; seventy-two voices were required to absolve an incendiary, or assassin; and when the chastity of a queen of France was suspected, three hundred gallant nobles swore, without hesitation, that the infant prince had actually been begotten by her deceased husband. The sin and scandal of manifest impiety were eagerly sought, and the perjuries engaged the attention of the judges, to remove these dangerous temptations and to supply the defects of human testimony, by the famous experiments of fire and water. These extraordinary trials, were so capriciously contrived, that in some cases guilt, and innocence in others, could not be proved without the fire, which was provided by fraud and credulity; the most intricate causes were determined by this easy and infallible method; and the turbulent barbarians, who might have disowned the sentence of the magistrate, submissively acquiesced in the judgment of God.

But the trials by single combat, judicial combats, usually obtained superior credit and authority, among a warlike people, who could not believe, that a brave man deserved to suffer, or that a coward deserved to live. Both in civil and criminal proceedings, the plaintiff, or accuser, the defendant, or accused, was judged by his sword, without the intervention of the court. The evidence and accusation were readily provided by fraud and credulity; the most intricate causes were determined by this easy and infallible method; and the turbulent barbarians, who might have disowned the sentence of the magistrate, submissively acquiesced in the judgment of God.

1. Greener, Turin, i. viii. c. 9. In Dom. p. 316. Montesquieu observes, (Esprit des Lois, i. xxxvii. c. 13.) that the Salic law did not admit these negative proofs so universally established in the barbaric codes. Yet this obscure confessor, (Fredenskiold) who became the wife of the grandson of Corsis, must have followed the Salic code.

2. Morast, in the antiquities of Italy, has given two dissertations (xxvi. 6-7; xxxvii. 9) on the judicatures of the Salian Franks, and therefore fire would not burn the innocent; and that the pure element of water would not sink the guilty, to the destruction of the constitution.

3. Montesquieu (Esprit des Lois, i. xxxvii. c. 17.) has condescended to explain and excuse "la maniere de punir de nos peres," on the subject of judicial combats. He follows this strange institution from the age of Gumbrich to that of St. Lewis; and the philosopher is not the less astonished at the local antiquity.

4. In a memorable duel at Aix-la-Chapelle, (A. D. 899) before the emperor Lewis the Pious, his legate, the Edict of Worms, secondary documents, and all the posthumous cacophonies, have only served to obscure the facts. It was a sort of fighting on horseback, which was unknown to the Franks.

5. In his original edict, published at Lyons (A. D. 902.), Gumbrich establishes and justifies the use of judicial contest. (Leg. Bermond, i. 100. E.) But in the regulations of the ecclesiastical laws, (Note de Mr. Marchand, Sirey, p. 15, 1796.) and the decrees of the eighth council, (Reformed Edict of Worms, February 16, A. D. 884.) very violent and personal actions are ordered against the person of an opponent in duels. (Leg. Bermond, i. 100.)

6. Aciealis, (Averoldi) gives a satiram valentius viribus, sed adhuc infirmi et sunt necessario ad pugnam, etiam pro vincullis rebus, qui tribus legitimis contingunt hominum u quantum; champion. This oppressive jurisprudence was imposed on the provincials of Gaul, who complained of any injuries in their persons and property. Whatever they did to gratify the conquerors, the victorious barbarians excelled in the love and exercise of arms; and the vanquished Roman was unjustly summoned to repeat, in his own person, the bloody contest, which had already been decided against his country. 9

Division of lands. A devouring host of one hundred and by the barbarians, who delighted in the rapine of the vanquished, passed the Rhine under the command of Atilius. One third of the fertile lands of the Sequani was appropriated to their use; and the conqueror soon repeated his oppressive demand of another third, for the accommodation of a new colony of twenty-four thousand. After the death of the third, the Roman emperor had invited to share the rich harvest of Gaul. 10 At the distance of five hundred years, the Visigoths and Burgundians, who revenged the defeat of Atilius, usurped the same unequal proportion of two thirds of the subject lands. But this distribution, instead of spreading over the provinces, may be reasonably confined to the regions where the victorious people had been planted by their own choice, or by the policy of their leader. In these districts, each barbarian was connected by the ties of hospitality with some Roman provincial. To this un-welcome guest, the proprietor was compelled to abandon a third of his lands; but the German, a shepherd, and a hunter, might secure to himself a spacious range of wood and pasture, and resign the smallest, though most valuable portion, to the toll of the industrious husbandman. 11

The silence of ancient and authentic testimony has encouraged an opinion, that the rapine of the Franks was not moderated, or disguised, by the forms of a legal division; that they dispersed themselves over the provinces of Gaul, without order or control; and that each victorious robber, according to his wants, his avarice, and his strength, measured with his sword the extent of his new inheritance. At a distance from their sovereign, the barbarians might indeed be tempted to exercise such arbitrary depredation; but the firm and artful policy of Clovis must curb a licentious spirit, which would aggravate the misery of the vanquished, whilst it corrupted the union and discipline of the conquering army. The valuable vassalage of a Roman provincial, a testament, and a pledge, of the regular distribution of Gallic spoils. It was the duty, and the interest, of Clovis, to provide rewards for a successful army, and settlements for a numerous people; without inflicting any wanton or superfluous injuries on the loyal Catholics of Gaul, which might lawfully acquire, of the imperial patrimony, what they held by right of their own freedom and Gothic usurpation, would diminish the cruel necessity of seizure and confiscation; and the provinces would more patiently acquiesce in the equal and regular distribution of their loss. 12 et cruetis ne perversus eventus judiciorum," Like a prudent rhetorician, he supposes the local privilege of herial champions.

8. See the rustic edict, or rather code, of Charlemagne, which contains seventy distinct and minutiae regulations of that great monarch, (in tom. v. pp. 260-371.) He required the proprietors of vineyards to plant a tree for every one hundred and thirty acres, and double the number for every one hundred and thirty trees; and the settler (Monseigneur) fifty acres and twelve pecks. Modillon de la Diplomatique has investigated the names of the owners, the number, and the situation, of the Merovingian villas.

9. From a passage of the Burgundian law (cit. i. 4. in tom. iv. p. 247.) it is evident that the Franks were not content to hold the lands which his father had received from the royal house of the Merovingians.

10. The Burgundians would firmly maintain their privileges, and their example was followed by the Franks.

11. The privileges of the benefactors and feoffees are clearly fixed by the laws of Merovingian Gaul, and a long succession of charters confirm the right which even Montenegray is a stranger.

12. See the Sakozen, (cit. in tom. iv. p. 246.) The origin and nature of these Sakozen lands, which extended over a very large extent of territory, were fully understood, nor perplexed our most learned and sagacious critics.

13. Many of these parcels of land were still held in an ancient private capacity. The count of Bouihonville (Cit. de la France, tom. i. p. 282.) shows a strong understanding, through a cloud of ignorance and prejudice.

The wealth of the Merovingian princes consisted in their extensive domain.

After the conquest of Gaul, they re-introduced the rustic simplicity of their ancestors; the cities were abandoned to solitude and decay; and their coins, their charters, and their synods, are still inscribed with the names of the villas, or rural palaces, in which they successively resided. One hundred and sixty of these palaces, a title which need not excite any fear of the art or vanity which adorned the country, and spread through the provinces of their kingdom; and if some might claim the honours of a fortress, the far greater part could be esteemed only in the light of pleasant farms. The mansion of the long-haired kings was surrounded with convenient yards, and stables, for the cattle; and the garden was garnished with useful vegetables; the various trades, the labours of agriculture, and even the arts of hunting and fishing, were exercised by servile hands for the emulation of the sovereign; his magazines were filled with corn and wine, either for sale or consumption; and the whole administration was conducted by the strictest maxims of private economy. 1 This ample patrimony was appropriated to supply the hospitality plenteous of Clovis, and his successors; and to reward the fidelity of their brave companions, who, both in peace and war, were devoted to their personal service. Instead of a horse, or a suit of armour, each companion, according to his rank, was supplied with a benefice, the primitive name, and most simple form, of the feudal possessions. These gifts might be resumed at the pleasure of the sovereign; and his feeble prerogative derived some support from the influence of his liberality. But this dependent tenure was gradually abolished by the independent and opulent barons, who dared to provoke the vengeance of the court, and the eternal enmity of the nobles whom they had seduced from the love of the sovereign. They earned respect, the common, public, or private rights of nature, such as they had always been deemed by the Roman jurisprudence, were severely restrained by the German conquerors, whose amensurate, or rather passion, was the exercise of hunting. The vague doctrine, which...
MAN has assumed over the wild inhabitants of the earth, the air, and the waters, was confined to some fortunate individuals of the human species. Gaul was again overspread with woods; and the animals, who were reserved for the use, or pleasure, of the lord, might ravage, with impunity, the fields of his industrious tenants. The chase was the sacred privilege of the nobles and their domestic servants, and transgressors were legally chastised with stripes and imprisonment; but in an age which admitted a slight composition for the life of a citizen, it was a capital crime to destroy a stag or a wild bull within the precincts of the royal forests.

The wolf and the conqueror became the lawful master of the enemy whom he had subdued and spared; and the fruitful cause of personal slavery, which had been almost suppressed by the peaceful sovereignty of Rome, was again revived and multiplied by perpetual hostilities of the independent barbarians. The Goth, the Burgundian, or the Frank, who returned from a successful expedition, dragged after him a long train of sheep, of oxen, and of human captives, whom he treated with the same brutal contempt. The young, the strong, and intelligent aspect, were set apart for the domestic service; a doubtful situation, which alternately exposed them to the favourable, or cruel, impulse of passion. The useful mechanics and servants (smiths, carpenters, tailors, shoemakers, cooks, gardeners, dyers, and workmen in gold and silver) formed the intermediate ranks of society; and their situation was of course, obscure and narrow interval between the noble and the slave. This arbitrary and recent division has been transformed by pride and prejudice into a national distinction, universally established by the arms and the laws of the Merovingians. The nobles, who claimed their genuine, or fabulous, descent from the independent and victorious Franks, have asserted, and abused, the indefeasible right of conquest, over a prostrate crowd of slaves and plebeians, to whom they imputed the imaginary disgrace of a Gallic, or Roman, extraction.

The general state and revolutions of the Gallic, a name which was imposed by the conquerors, may be illustrated by the particular example of a province, a diocese, or a senatorial family. Auvergne had formerly maintained a just pre-eminence among the intermediate ranks of society. The bravery and numerous inhabitants displayed a singular trophy; the sword of Clovis himself, which he had lost when he was repulsed before the walls of Gergovie, as the common offering of Troy, they claimed a fraternal alliance with the Romans; and, by the same means of conquest and spoils, they filled the fields of Auvergne, the fall of the western empire might have been prevented or delayed. They firmly maintained the fidelity which they had reluctantly sworn to the Visigoths; but when their bravest nobles had fallen in the battle of Poitiers, they accepted, without resistance, a victorious and deceitful sovereignty. This easy and valuable conquest was achieved, and possessed, by Theodoric, the eldest son of Clovis: but the remote province was separated from his Austrasian dominions, by the intermediate kingdoms of Soissons, Paris, and Orleans, which formed, after their father's death, the personal tritheism of the kingdom. The king of Paris, Childebert, was tempted by the neighbourhood and beauty of Auvergne. The lower country, which rises towards the south into the mountains of the Cevennes, presented a rich and various prospect of woods and pastures; the sites of the hills were clothed with vines; and each eminence was crowned with a villa or castle. In the Lower Auvergne, the river Allier flows through the fair and spacious plain of Limagne; and the inexhaustible fertility of the soil supplied, and still supplies, without a murmur, a perfect and model of reposes, the constant repouls of the same harvests. On the false report, that their lawful sovereign had been slain in Germany, the city of the poor, who purchased life by the sacrifice of all that can render life desirable, was gradually imitated by the feeble and the devout, who, in times of public disorder, pusillanimously crowded to shelter themselves under the battlements of a powerful chief, and around the shrine of a popular saint. Their submission was accepted by these temporal, or spiritual, potentates; and the barbarians, without materially altering their own condition, and that of their latest posterity. From the reign of Clovis, during five successive centuries, the laws and manners of Gaul uniformly tended to promote the increase, and to confirm the duration, of personal servitude. Time and violence almost obliterated the outmost limits of the intermediate ranks of society, and the slave became the necessary complement of the free. and diocese of Auvergne were betrayed by the grandson of Sidonius Apollinaris. Childerich enjoyed this clandestine victory; and the free subjects of Theodoric threatened to desert his standard, if he indulged his private resentment, while the nation was engaged in foreign war. He scourged him, and soon yielded to the persuasive eloquence of their king.
"Follow me," said Theodoric, "into Auvergne: I will lead you into a province, where you may acquire gold, silver, slaves, cattle, and precious apparel, to the full extent of your wishes. I repeat my promise; I give you my word, and their wealth shall be yours, and you may transport them at pleasure into your own country." By the execution of this promise, Theodoric justly forfeited the allegiance of a people, whom he devoted to destruction. His troops, reinforced by the fiercest barbarians of Germany, spread desolation over the fruitful face of Auvergne; and two places only, a strong castle, and a holy shrine, were saved, or redeemed, from their licentious fury. The castle of Merialce* was seated on a lofty rock, which rose a hundred feet above the surface of the plain; and a large reservoir of fresh water was enclosed, with some arable lands, within the circle of its fortifications. The Franks beheld with envy and despair this impregnable fortress: but they surprised a party of fifty stragglers; and, as they were oppressed by the number of their captives, they fixed, at a trifling ransom, the alternative of life or death for these wretched victims. They were then sent to Paris, and placed on massacre on the refusal of the garrison. Another detachement penetrated as far as Brivas, or Brioude, where the inhabitants, with their valuable effects, had taken refuge in the sanctuary of St. Julian. The doors of the church resisted the assault; but a daring soldier, who enjoyed the confidence of his chief, opened a passage to his companions. The clergy and people, the sacred and the profane spoils, were rudely torn from the altar; and the sacrilegious division was made at a small distance from the town of Brioude.
But this act of impiety was severely chastised by the devout son of Cloris. He punished with death the most atrocious offenders; left their secret accomplices

Story of Attalus.

Before the Austrasian army retreated from Auvergne, Theodoric exacted some pledges of the future loyalty of a people, whose just hatred could be restrained only by their fear. A select band of noble youths, the sons of the principal senators, was delivered to the conqueror, as the hostage of a treaty, entered into by the Franks and men. On the first rumour of war, or conspiracy, these guiltless youths were reduced to a state of servitude; and one of them, Attalus, whose adventures are more particularly related, kept his master's horses in the distance of the river. After a painful search he was discovered, in this unworthy occupation, by the emissaries of his grandson, Gregory bishop of Langres; but his offers of ransom were sternly rejected by the

* From the date of the capture, the Benedictine editors of Gregory of Tours (in tom. ii. p. 422,) have fixed this fortress at a place named Castel Martini, two miles from Mailly, in the Upper Auvergne. In this description, the castle, instead of being in ruins, as it was, appears as a large, strong fortress, in the midst of the village of St. Julian, c. 13. in the year p. 566.) He frequently betrays his extraordinary attention to his native country.

He frequently betrays his extraordinary attention to his native country.

* As the same important, see Gregory of Tours (I. iii. c. 15. in the year p. 152. to 153.) His editor, the B. Guissart, confirms this Attilus with a passage in the book of the Franks, (G. ii. c. 40.) to which he refers. He says, that an inscription, of the same name, who was count of Auvin, fifty or sixty years before. Such an error, which cannot be imputed to ignorance, is excused, in some degree, by its own magnificence.

This Gregory, the great grandfather of Gregory of Tours, (in tom. ii. p. 197. 198.) lived ninety-two years; of which he passed forty as count of Auvin, and thirty-two as bishop of Langres. According to the poet Fortunatus, he displayed equal merits in these different stations.

* The parents of Gregory (Gregorii Floriensi Georgius) were of noble birth, (Hieron, Historia, l. iii. c. 13.) and of good fortune. (G. ii. c. 40. et 41.) Both were native of Auvergne and Burgundy. He was born in the year 523, was consecrated a priest in the year 550, and bishop in the year 553, or 555, soon after he had terminated his historical work. ly ascertain how much, in so short a space, the human mind had lost of its energy and refinement. The Franks, however, were now prepared to despise the Romans of Gaul, and to depopulate it to an extent that would have been deemed incredible to the Romans of Gaul. Opposite, and, perhaps, artful, misrepresentations, which have softened, or exaggerated, the oppression of the Romans of Gaul under the reign of the Merovingians. The conquerors never pronounced any universal edict of servitude, or confiscation; but, for the part, people, who were in their weak state, by the specious names of politeness and peace, was exposed to the arms and laws of the ferocious barbarians, who contemptuously insulted their possessions, their freedom, and their safety. Their personal injuries were partial and irregular; but the great body of the Roman laws were suspended, and still possessed the property, and privileges, of citizens. A large portion of their lands was exacted for the use of the Franks; but they enjoyed the remainder, exempt from tribute; and the same irrepressible violence which swept away the arts and manufactures of Gaul, destroyed the elaborate and expensive system of imperial despotism. The provinces must frequently deplore the savage jurisprudence of the Salic or Riparian laws, but their private life, in the important concerns of marriage, testaments, or inheritance, was still that of the Romans. The Theodosian Code, and a discontented Roman might freely aspire, or descend, to the title and character of a barbarian. The honours of the state were accessible to his ambition; the education and temper of the Romans more peculiarly qualified them for the offices of civil government; and, as they held that it was their duty to preserve their military prowess, they were permitted to march in the ranks, or even at the head, of the victorious Germans. I shall not attempt to enumerate the generals and magistrates, whose names attest the liberal policy of the Merovingians. The supreme command of Burgundy, with the title of king, the signet, and military emblems, intrusted to the hands of three Romans; and the last, and most powerful, Mummolus, who alternately saved and restored the monarchy, had supplanted his father in the station of count of Autun, and left a treasure of thirty talents of gold, and a hundred and fifty talents of silver. The fierce and illiterate barbarians were excluded, during several generations, from the dignities, and even from the orders, of the church. The clergy of Gaul consisted almost entirely of native provincials; the haughty Franks feasted at the feet of their subjects, who were dignified with the ecclesiastical character; and the power and riches which had been lost in war, were insensibly recovered by superstition. In all temporal affairs, the Theodosian Code was the universal law of the clergy; but the barbarous jurisprudence had liberally provided for their personal safety; a sub-deacon was equivalent to two Franks: the antrustion, and priest, were held in similar estimation; and the life of a bishop was appreciated far above the common standard, at the price of nine hundred pieces of gold. The Roman iPhones of their conquerors the use of the christian religion and Latin language; but their language and their religion had alike degenerated from the simple purity of the Augustan, and apostolic, age. The progress of superstition and barbarism was rapid and universal; the emblems of Christianity were swept away, and the God of the Christians; and the rustic dialect of peasants and soldiers was corrupted by a Teutonic idiom and pronunciation. Yet such intercourse of sacred and social communion eradicated the distinctions of birth and victory; and the nations of Gaul were submerged, and identified under the name and government of the Franks.

The Franks, after they mingled with the Gallic subjects, might have imparted the most valuable of human gifts, a spirit, and a constitution, of the liberty. Under a king, hereditary but limited, the chiefs and counsellors might have debated, at Paris, in the palace of the Cassars: the adjacent field, where the emperors reviewed their mercenary legions, would have admitted the legislative assembly of freemen and warriors; and the rude mobs of most of these fragments of modern Germany, might have been polished and improved by the civil wisdom of the Romans. But the careless barbarians, secure of their personal independence, disdained the labour of government; the annual assemblies of the month of March were silently abolished; and the nation was separated and dissolved, by the conquest of Gaul. The monarchy was left without any regular establishment of justice, of arms, or of revenue. The successors of Clovis wanted resolution to assume, or strength to excise, the legislative and executive powers, which in the council were vested in the hands of three lords, distinguished only by a more ample privilege of rapine and murder; and the love of freedom, so often invigorated and disgraced by private ambition, was reduced, among the licentious Franks, to the contempt of order, and the desire of immortality. Twenty-five years after the death of Clovis, his grandson, Contran, king of Burgundy, sent an army to invade the Gothic possessions of Septimania, or Languedoc. The troops of Burgundy, Berry, Auvergne, and the adjacent territories, were excited by the hopes of spoil; and the commanders of the episcopal See of Bourges, who had been insulted in the presence of the people, was swept away, and the nation was desolated and dissolved. The Franks, whose churches themselves, were consumed by fire; the inhabitants were massacred, or dragged into captivity; and, in the disorderly retreat, five thousand of these inhuman savages were destroyed by hunger or intestine discord. When the piouis Contras reproached the guilt, or neglect, of their leaders; and threatened to inflict, not a legal sentence, but instant and arbitrary execution; they accused the universal and incurable corruption of the people. "No one," they said, "any longer fears or respects his king, his drake, his See the Riparian Code, ch. xxxvii. in tomo ii. p. 541.) The public laws of Gaul were, for the sake of safety, so arranged, that it is impossible to determine which, on the behalf of the more civilized tribe, that they did not foreseen such an inopportun act as the murder of a priest. Yet Franks, at Paris, in the church of St. Esprit, archbishop of Rouen, was assassinated by the order of queen Godfreda before the altar. (Greg. Turon. i. vii. c. 31. in tomo ii. p. 278.) M. Brissot (Mem. de l'Academie des Inscriptions, tom. xxvii. p. 457.) has called the Longobards, the Lombarbardi. It is possible, through the medium of the Romans, has gradually been polished and in the actual form of the French language. Under the Carolingians, the nobles and the nobles of France still understand the dialect of their German ancestors. or his count. Every man loves to do evil, and freely indulges his criminal inclinations. The most gentle correction provokes an immediate tumult, and the rash magistrate, who presumes to censure or restrain his delinquent subjects, finds the only way to pacify his revenues. It has been reserved for the same nation to expose, by their intertemperate vices, the most odious abuse of freedom; and to supply its loss by the spirit of honour and humanity, which now alleviates and dignifies their obedience to an absolute sovereign.

The Goths

The Visigoths had removed the Clovis of Spain;...3 vis the greatest part of their Gallic possessions; but their loss was amply compensated by the easy conquest, and secure enjoyment of the provinces of Spain. From the monarchy of the Goths, which soon involved the Suevic kingdom, the Teutonic clergy, who were to some extent the state. To Toledo, the ancient vizigoth capital, the Metropolitan Council of the provinces of Spain, but that the monarchy, and the union to the Germanic tribes, have been already explained. I have anticipated, in the preceding chapter, the most important of their ecclesiastical events, the fall of Ari- anism, and the persecution of the Jews; and it only remains to observe some interesting circumstances, which throw light on the ecclesiastical constitution of the Spanish kingdoms.

Legislative assemblies of Spain, or heresy, the Franks and the Visigoths were disposed to embrace, with equal submission, the inherent evils, and the accidental benefits, of superstition. But the prelates of France, long before the extinction of the Merovingian race, had degenerated into fighting and hunting barbarians. They disdained the use of synods; forgot the laws of temperance and chastity; and preferred the indulgence of private ambition and luxury, to the general interest of the sacerdotal profession.3 The bishops of Spain respected themselves, and were respected by the public: their indissoluble union disguised their vices, and confirmed their authority: and the regular discipline of the church introduced peace, order, and stability, into the government of the state. From the reign of Recared, the first Frankish pope, Peter the Iky; and the first Teutonic pope of the unfortunate Roderic, sixteen national councils were successively convened. The six metropolitans, Toledo, Seville, Merida, Braga, Tarragona, and Narbonne, presided according to their respective seniority; the assembly was composed of the clergy and laity, represented by their proxies; and a place was assigned to the most holy or opulent of the Spanish abbots. During the first three days of the convocation, as long as they agitated the ecclesiastical questions of doctrine and discipline, the profane laity was excluded from their debates; which were conducted however with decent solemnity. But on the morning of the fourth day, the doors were thrown open for the entrance of the great officers of the palace, the dukes and counts of the provinces, the judges of the cities, and the Gothic nobles: and the decrees of heaven were ratified by the consent of the people. Such synods were observe in the provincial assemblies, the annual synods which were empowered to hear complaints and to redress grievances; and a legal government was supported by the prevailing influence of the Spanish clergy. The bishops, who were the true ministers of justice, fatter the victorious, and to insult the prostrate, bauored, with diligence and success, to kindle the flames of persecution, and to exalt the mitre above the crown. Yet the national councils of Toledo, in which the free spirit of the barbarians was tempered and guided by episcopal policy, have established some prudent laws for the common benefit of the king and people. The vacancy of the throne was supplied by the choice of the bishops and palatines; and, after the failure of the line of Abacic, the regal dignity was still limited to the pure and noble blood of the Goths. The Teutonic, which was the first race recommended, and sometimes practised, the duty of allegiance; and the spiritual censures were denounced on the heads of the impious subjects, who should resist his authority, conspire against his life, or violate, by an indecent union, the chastity even of his widow. But the principle, which made itself felt, that the throne, was bound by a reciprocal oath to God and his people, that he would faithfully execute his important trust. The real or imaginary faults of his administration were subject to the control of a powerful aristocracy; and the bishops and palatines were guarded by a fundamental privilege, that they should not be degraded, imprisoned, tortured, nor punished with death, exile, or confiscation, unless by the free and public judgment of their peers.

One of the legislative councils of Code of the Visigothic Councils of Toledo examined and ratified the Code of Laws, which had been compiled by a succession of Gothic kings, from the fierce Eureic to the devout Egeria. As long as the Visigoths themselves were satisfied with the rude customs of their ancestors, they indulged their subjects of Aquitan and Spain in the enjoyment of the Roman law. Their gradual improvement in arts, in policy, and at length in religion, encouraged them to imitate, and to supersede, these foreign institutions: and to compose a code of civil and criminal jurisprudence, for the use of a great and united people. The same obligations, and the same privileges, were communicated to the nations of the Spanish monarchies, by the constitutions of the Teutonic idiom, submitted to the restraints of equity, and exalted the Romans to the participation of freedom. The merit of this impartial policy was enhanced by the situation of Spain, under the reign of the Visigoths. The provinces were long separated from their Arian masters by the wide ocean;...4 And the most beneficial religion. After the conversion of Recared had removed the prejudices of the catholics, the coasts, both of the ocean and Mediterranean, were still possessed by the eastern emperors; who secretly excited a discontented people to reject the yoke of the barbarians, and to assert the name and dignity of Roman citizens. The allegiance of doubtful subjects is indeed most effectually secured by their own persuasion, that they hazard more in a revolt, than they can hope to obtain by a revolution; but it has appeared so natural to oppress those whom we hate and fear, that the contrary system well deserves the praise of wisdom and moderation.

1 The acts of the councils of Toledo are still the most authentic records of the church and state of Spain. The following passages are particularly important, (Jil. 17, iv. 15, 22, 35, v. 11, 27, vi. 14, vii. 17, v. 20; ancient Germans, xx. 20 and Annotations, xxv. and xxvi.) and the council of Potenza (Hist. Generale de l'Eglise, tom. ii.) very useful and accurate guides.

2 The Code of the Visigoths, rapidly divided into twelve books, has been correctly published by Dom Bonnet, (in tom. iv. p. 973—460.) It has been treated by the president De MONTESQUIEU ("Esprit des Lois," livre xxi. ch. 20, note 1.) As a general reader, I do not pretend to find any immense volume of information, but I shall presume to think, that the civil jurisprudence displays a more civilized and enlightened state of society, than that of the Burgundians, or even of the Lombards.
The Decline and Fall

Chapter XXXVIII

While the kingdoms of the Franks and Visigoths were established in Gaul and Spain, the Saxons achieved the conquest of Britain, the third great diocese of the praefecture of the west. Since Britain was already separated from the Roman empire, I might, without reproach, decline a story, familiar to all, and learned, of my readers. The Saxons, who excelled in the use of the ear or the battle-axe, were ignorant of the art which could alone perpetuate the fame of their exploits; the provincials, relapsing into barbarism, neglected to describe the ruin of their country; and the doubts of tradition were, before Christianity, dispelled, before the missionaries of Rome restored the light of science and Christianity. The declamations of Gildas, the fragments, or fables, of Nennius, the obscure hints of the Saxon laws and chronicles, and the ecclesiastical tales of the venerable Bede, have been illustrated by the diligence, and sometimes embellished by the fancy, of succeeding writers, whose works I am not ambitious either to censure or to transcribe. Yet the historian of the empire may be tempted to pursue the revolutions of a Roman province, till it vanishes from his sight; and, in this way, he may curiously trace the establishment of the barbarians, from which he derives his name, his laws, and perhaps his origin.

About forty years after the dissolution of the Roman government, Vortigern appears to have obtained the supreme command of a civil war, though precarious. The alliances of states and cities, as well as of monarchs, were almost unanimously condemned for the weak and mischievous policy of inviting, a formidable stranger, to repel the vexatious intruders of a domestic foe. His ambassadors were despatched, by the gravest historians, to the court of Germany; they addressed a pathetic oration to the general assembly of the Saxons, and those warlike barbarians resolve to assist with a fleet and army the suppliants of a distant and unknown island. If Britain had indeed been unknown to the Saxons, the measure of its calamities would have been less complete. But the strength of the Roman government could not always guard the maritime province against the pirates of Germany; the independent and divided states were exposed to their attacks; and the Saxons might sometimes join the Scots and the Picts, in a league against the federacy of Roman Britain. Though Vortigern could only balance the various perils, which assaulted on every side his throne and his people; and his policy may deserve either praise or excuse, if we preferred the alliance of those barbarians, whose naval power rendered them the most dangerous enemies, and the taxes, which were allotted to them, they ranged along the eastern coast with three ships, were engaged, by the promise of an ample stipend, to embrace the defence of Britain; and their intrusted valour soon delivered the country from the Caledonian invaders. The isle of Thanet, a secure and fertile district, was allotted for the residence of these German auxiliaries, and they were supplied, according to the treaty, with a plentiful allowance of clothing and provisions. This favourable reception encouraged five thousand warriors to embark with their families in several vessels, and the infant power of Hengist was fortified by this strong and reasonable reinforcement. The crafty barbarian suggested to Vortigern the obvious advantage of fixing, in the neighbourhood of the Picts, a colony of faithful allies: a third fleet of forty ships, under the command of his son and nephew, was sent to the north of Scotland, and assembled near the Orkneys. Vortigern embarked a new army on the coast of Northumberland, or Lothian, at the opposite extremity of the devoted land. It was easy to foresee, but it was impossible to prevent, the impending evils. The two nations were soon divided and exasperated by mutual jealousies. The desertion of the Christians who had been received was punished by their exclusion. Some were murdered in the cause of an ungrateful people; while the Britons regretted the liberal rewards which could not satisfy the avarice of those haughty mercenaries. The causes of fear and hatred were inflamed into an irreconcilable quarrel. The Saxons flew to arms; and, if they perpetrated a treacherous massacre during the security of a feast, they destroyed the reciprocal confidence which sustains the intercourse of peace and war.

Hengist, who boldly aspired to the conquest of Britain, exhorted his countrymen to embrace the glorious opportunity; A.D. 456. He painted in lively colours the fertility of the soil, the wealth of the cities, the pusillanimous temper of the natives, and the convenient situation of a spacious solitary island, accessible on all sides to the Saxon fleets. The Britons were called to recover, within a century, from the mouths of the Elbe, the Weser, and the Rhine, were principally composed of three valiant tribes or nations of Germany; the Jutes, the old Saxons, and the Anglos. The Jutes, who fought under the peculiar banner of Hengist, assumed the general name of Saxons from their countryman, the supposed founder of the Worms, and of erecting, in Kent, the first independent kingdom. The fame of the enterprise was attributed to the primitive Saxons; and the common laws and language of the conquerors are described by the national Britons of a people, which, at the end of four hundred years, produced the first monarchs of South Britain. The Angles were distinguished by their numbers and their success; and they claimed the honour of fixing a perpetual name on the country, of which they occupied the most ample portion. The conquering Saxons, from their insular and desolated situation, were insensibly blended with this triple confederacy; the Frisians, who had been tempted by their vicinity to the British shores, might balance, during a short space, the strength and reputation of the native Saxons; the Danes, the Frisians, the Burgundians, the Huns, who had wandered as far as the Baltic, might embark on board the German vessels, for the conquest of a new world. But this arduous achievement was not prepared or executed by the union of national powers. Each intrepid chief, according to the measure of his fame and fortunes, assembled his followers; equipped a fleet of three, or perhaps of sixty, vessels; chose the place of the attack; and conducted his subsequent operations according to the events of the war, and the dictates of his private interest. In the invasion of Britain many heroes vanished and fell; but only seven victorious leaders assumed, or at least maintained, the title of kings. Seven independent thrones, the Saxon Heptarchy, were founded by the conquerors, and seven families, one of which has been continued, by female succession, to our present sovereign, the Estbriton of the Saxon heptarchy, Eadbald, says Nennius, and his contemporaries, of the new kingdom, which was created by a council of twelve kings, whom he enumerates in his chronicle. He says, that Stonehenge is their monument, which the giants had formerly built, and which they transported by means unknown, from the territories of the Britons, to the district of the Thames, by the order of Ambrosius, and the art of Merlin. All these tribes are expressly enumerated by Bede. (L. iv. c. 13. p. 216.) They are divided into the seven families, and their several marks, (Hist. of Manchester, vol. ii. p. 358—363.) I do not perceive the absurdity of supposing that the Frisians, &c. were mingled with the Anglo-Saxons.

2. The labourious Mr. Carter, and the ingenious Mr. Whitaker, are the two modern writers to whom I am principally indebted. The particular historian of Manchester embarks, under that obscure title, justice, we are not less indebted to the careful labour of Mr. Pickering, for the correct history of England.

3. This narration, which may derive some countenance from the loose communications of Bede and Beowulf, is framed into a regular narrative by Wilson and Whitkiiol, a Saxon monk of the tenth century. (See Cousin, Hist. de l'Empire d'Ocident, toms. ii. p. 565.) Roffe, and even Imlie, have too freely used this suspicious evidence, without regarding the precise and probable testimony of Nennius: Interes voseo rusti west Chielis a Germans in celtic pulse in quibus erat Hors et Hlogin.
rived their equal and sacred lineage from Woden, the god of war. It has been pretended, that this republic of kings was moderated by a general council and a supreme magistrate. But such an artificial scheme of policy is open to such objections as strictly disqualifies the state of Britain, at the time of its separation from the western empire. Gildas describes in florid language the improvements of agriculture, the foreign trade which flowed with every tide into the Thames and the Severn, the solid and lofty construction of public and private edifices; he accuses the sensual luxury of the British people; of a people, according to the same writer, ignorant of the most simple arts, and incapable, without the aid of the Romans, of providing walls of stone, or weapons of iron, for the defence of their native land.2 Under the long dominion of the emperors, Britain had been enriched by various and servile form of a Roman province, whose safety was intrusted to a foreign power. The subjects of Honorius contemplated their new freedom with surprise and terror; they were left destitute of any civil or military constitution; and their uncertain rulers were without resources to provide against the public force against the common enemy. The introduction of the Saxons betrayed their internal weakness, and degraded the character both of the prince and people. Their constitution magnified the danger; the want of union diminished their resources; and the madness of civil factions was more solicited to excuse, than to remedy, the evils, which they imputed to the misconduct of their adversaries. Yet the Britons were not ignorant, they could not be ignorant, of the manufacture or the use of arms; the successive and disorderly attacks of the Saxons allowed them to recover from their amazement, and the prosperous or adverse events of the war added discipline and experience to their native valour.

While the continent of Europe and Africa yielded, without resistance, to the barbarians, the British island, alone and unaided, maintained a long and continuous series of successful struggles, against the formidable pirates, who, almost at the same instant, assaulted the northern, the eastern, and the southern coasts. The cities which had been fortified with skill, were defended with resolution; the advantages of ground, hills, forests, and mountains were more diligently improved by the inhabitants; the conquest of each district was purchased with blood; and the defects of the Saxons are strongly attested by the discreet silence of their annalist. Hen- gist might hope to achieve the conquest of Britain; but his ambition, in an active reign of thirty-five years, was confined to the possession of Kent; and the renowned colony which he had planted in the north, was extinguished by the sword of the Britons. The monarchy of the West Saxons was laboriously founded by the persevering efforts of three martial generations. The name of Cerdic, one of the bravest of the children of Woden, was consumed in the conquest of Hamp- shire and the Isle of Wight; and the loss which he sustained in the battle of Mount Badon, reduced him to a state of inglorious repose. Kenric, his valiant son, advanced into Wiltshire; besieged Salisbury, at that time seated on a commanding eminence; and vanquished an army which advanced to the relief of the city. In the subsequent battle of Marlborough, his British enemies displayed their military science. Their modern lines of battle consisted of three distinct bodies, and the cavalry, the archers, and the pikemen, were distributed according to the principles of Roman tactics. The Saxons charged in one weighty column, boldly encountered with their short swords the long lances of the Britons, and main- tained till the close of the engagement, two decisive victories, the death of three British kings, and the reduction of Cirencester, Bath, and Gloucester, established the fame and power of Cerdin, the grandson of Cerdic, who carried his victorious arms to the banks of the Severn.

After a war of a hundred years, the independent Britons still occupied the whole extent of the western coast, from the wall of Antoninus to the extreme promontory of Cornwall; and the principal cities of the inland country still opposed the arms of the barbarians. Resistance became desperate; and the Britons showed that they were not satisfied with their freedom, which survived the heaptarchy, and even the monarchy of the Saxons. The brave warriors, who preferred exile to slavery, found a secure refuge in the mountains of Wales; the reluctant submission of Cornwall was delayed for some ages; and a band of Britons, who had retired to the settle in Gaul, by the natural valour, or the liberality of the Merovingian kings.2 The western angle of Armorica acquired the new appellation of Cornwall, and the Lesser Britain; and the vacant lands of the Osismi were filled by a strange people, who, under the authority of their counts and bishops, preserved the laws and language of their ancestors. To the feeble descendants of Clovis and Charlemagne, the Britons of Armorica refused the customary tribute, subdued the neighbouring dioceses of Vannes, Rennes, and Nantes, and formed a powerful though vassal state, which has been united to the crown of France.

In a century of perpetual, or at least The fame of impecuniable, war, much courage and Arthur, some skill, must have been exercised for the defence of every age, however destitute of science or virtue, suffigence abounds with acts of blood and military renown. The tomb of Vortimer, the son of Vortigern, was7 credited by the monks of the said college, as a landmark formidable to the Saxons, whom he had thrice vanquished in the fields of Kent. Ambrosius Aurelianus was descended from a noble family of Romans; his modesty was equal to his valor, and his valour, till the last fatal action, 8 was crowned with splendid success. The very British cause is illuminated by the illustrious name of Arthur, 9 the hereditary prince of the Sibures, in South Wales, and the elective king or general of the nation. According to the most rational account, he defeated, in twelve successive battles, the Angles of the north, and the Saxons of the west; but the greatness of the hero was obliterated by popular ingratitude, and domestic misfortunes. The events of his life are less interesting than the singular revolutions of his fame. During a period of five hundred years the tradition of his exploits was preserved, and ruthfully embellished, by the obscure bands of chivalry and Armornica, who were odious to the Saxons, and unknown to the rest of mankind. The pride and curiosity of the Norman conquerors, prompted them to inquire into the ancient history of Britain: they listened with fond curiosity to the tale of Arthur, and eagerly sought the home of a prince who had triumphed over the Saxons, their common enemies. His romance, transcribed in the Latin of Jeffrey of Monmouth, and afterwards translated into the fashionable idiom of the times, was enriched with the various, though incoherent, ornaments, which were familiar to the readers of the learning, of the twelfth century. The progress of a Phrygian colony, from the Tiber to the Thames, was easily ingrained on the fable of the Abned; and the royal ancestors of Arthur derived their origin from Troy, and claimed their alliance with the Cæsars. His trophies were decorated with the names of the heroes, and justly regarded as popular victors, who were avenged by the enterprises of the Normans. Pilgrimage, and the holy wars, introduced into Europe the specious miracles of Arabian magic. Fairy and giant stories were inspired, and enchantress, palaces, were blended with the more simple fictions of the west; and the fate of Britain depended on the art, or the predictions, of Merlin. Every nation embraced and adorned the popular romance of Arthur, and the Knights of the Round Table; their names were celebrated in Greece and Italy; and the voluminous tales of Sir Lancelot and Sir Tristram were devoutly studied by the princes and nobles, who disregarded the genuine heroes and historians of antiquity. At length the light of science and reason was rekindled; the tlalism was broken; the visionary fabric melted into air; and by a natural, though unjust, reverse of the public opinion, the severity of the present age is inclined to question the existence of Arthur.

Resistence, if it cannot avert, must in-descend of Britain.

1 Bede, who in his chronicle (p. 52,) places Ambrosius under the reign of Zeno, (A. D. 471—491,) observes, that his parents had been "enemies to the heathen; and upon which he expatiates at some length," by "regnum romanum et fusticam fecerunt." (L. t. c. 16, p. 23.) The expression of Mynms, (44, p. 116, edit. Calv.) is still more singular, "est obsequium Romanorum esse."

2 By the unanimous, though double, convention of our antiquaries, we are informed (whom A. D. 1171,) that he lost his own life, and five thousand of his subjects, in a battle against Cerdigion, in Upper Northumberland. (Pom. vol. i. p. 235—237.) If I am a stranger to the Welsh lands, Myrdin, Lilesbrach, and Taliesin, my faith in the existence and exploits of Arthur, proceeds more on the simple and circumspect testimony of Britanians. (Hist. Brit. c. 62, 63, p. 114.) Mr. Whitehead (Hist. of Manches- ter and Lancashire,) however, has framed an interesting, and even probable, narrative of the wars of Arthur; though it is impossible to allow the reality of the round table.

3 The progress of romance, and the state of learning, in the middle ages, are illustrated by Mr. Thomas Warton, with the taste of a poet, and the minute diligence of an antiquarian. I have derived much instruction from the two learned dissertations prefixed to the first volume of his History of English Poetry.

4 Hor. anno (490.) Quinto et Cusa abardonant Andreas Canster, et imaginem venturam supersedit fortis. (Chron. Sax. p. 15.) an expression more dreadful to its author than all the vague and tendentious insinuations of the British Jeremiah.

5 Andreas Canster, or Anderida, is placed by Camden (Britannia, vol. i. p. 25c.) at Netunnum (Newcastle.) and other parts of the British provinces; perhaps the grounds of Kent, which might be formerly covered by the sea, and on the edge of the great forest. (Gentleman's Magazine, July, 1796.) which we may imagine to be the seat of Anderida, and Susart.

6 Dr. Johnson affirms that few English words are of British extraction. (Leeds Whitchurch.) who understands the British language, has discovered more than three thousand, and actually produces a long and wordy dissertation on the subject. (Gentleman's Magazine, vol. i. p. 235—237.) It is surprising to find that many of these words may have been imported from the Latin or Saxon, under the ideum of Briton.

7 In the beginning of the seventh century, the Franks and the Anglo-Saxons mutually understood each other's language, which was derived from the Suebi, and the Suebi from the Tartarian, and perhaps even from the Tartarian of the Tartarian. (Stenton's History of England, vol. i. p. 105.) He quotes the British historians; but I much fear, that Jeffrey of Monmouth (l. vi. c. 15.) is his only witness.
Bedes, by the solitude of their native country: and our experience has shown the free propagation of the human race, if they are cast on a fruitful wilderness, where their steps are unconfined, and their subsistence is plentiful. The Saxon kingdoms displayed the same contrast. The woods and woods were small, the villages distant; the husbandry was languid and unskillful; four sheep were equivalent to an acre of the best land; an ample space of wood and morass was assigned to the vague dominion of nature; and the modern bishopric of Durham was the whole territory for the first 110 years. The towns had returned to its primitive state of a savage and solitary forest. Such imperfect population might have been supplied, in some generations, by the English colonies; but neither reason nor facts can justify the unnatural supposition, that the Saxons of Britain retained alone the desert which they had subdued. After the sanguinary barbarians had secured their dominion, and gratified their revenge, it was their interest to preserve the peasants, as well as the cattle, of the unreasing country. In each successive revolution, the patient herd becomes the property of its new masters, and the property of the labourer is silently ratified by their mutual necessities. Wilfrid, the apostle of Sussex, accepted from his royal convert the gift of the peninsula of Selsey, near Chichester, with the persons and property of its inhabitants, who then amounted to eighty-seven families. He also granted the district of tyne to his vassal, the lordship of Banstead to a cousin, the lordship of Warini to the lordship of the Thames, with an hundred and fifty shillings, and the lordship of Thane, with two hundred and fifty shillings; and both sexes were baptized by their indulgent master. The kingdom of Sussex, which spread from the sea to the Thames, contained seven thousand families: twelve hundred were ascribed to the Isle of Wight; and if, after a disputation touching the computation, it may seem probable that England was divided into religious lords, judicial lords, and the indigent, the indigent barbarians were often tempted to sell their children or themselves into perpetual, and even foreign, bondage; yet the special exemptions, which were granted to national slaves, sufficiently declare that they were much less numerous than the strangers and captives, who had lost their liberty, or changed their masters, by the accidents of war. When time and religion had mitigated the fierce spirit of the Anglo-Saxons, the law of the land, which had no regard to the wealth and property, and their subjects, of Welch or Cambrian extraction, assume the respectable station of inferior freemen, possessed of lands, and entitled to the rights of civil society. Such gentle treatment might secure the allegiance of a fierce people, who had been recently subdued, or the protection of Wales and Cornwall. The sage Isae, the legislator of Wessex, united the two nations in the body of domestic alliance; and four British lords of Somersham may be honourably distinguished in the court of a Saxon monarch.

The independent Britons appear to have relapsed into the state of original Britons. Barbarism, from whence they had been imperfectly reclaimed, soon took its place, and the rest of mankind, soon became an object of scandal and abhorrence to the Catholic world. Christianity was still professed in the mountains of Wales; but the rude schisms in the form of the clerical tosmass, and in the day of the celebration of Easter, was not lasting the innocent mandates of the Roman pontiffs. The use of the Latin language was insensibly abolished, and the Britons were deprived of the arts and learning which Italy communicated to her Saxon proles. In Wales and Armorie, the Celtic tongue, the native idiom of the west, was preserved and propagated; and the Britons, who had been the companions of the Druids, were still protected, in the sixteenth century, by the laws of Elizabeth. Her chief, a respectable officer of the courts of Pengwern, or Aberfraw, or Caernarvan, accompanied the king's servants to war; the monster, which he had circumcised in the front of battle, excited their courage, and justified their predations; and the songster claimed for his legitimate prize the fairest heiress of the spoil. His subordinate ministers, the masters and disciples of vocal and instrumental music, visited, in their respective capacities, the lordships of the princes; and the public poetry, almost exhausted by the clergy, was oppressed by the importunate demands of the bard. Their rank and merit were ascertained by solemn trials, and the strong belief of supernatural inspiration exhorted the fancy of the poet, and of his audience. This constraint of Celtic freedom, the extreme territories of Gaul and Britain, were thereby adapted to agriculture than to pasturage; the wealth of the Britons consisted in their flocks and herds; milk and flesh were their ordinary food; and bread was sometimes esteemed, or rejected, as a foreign luxury. Liberty had peopled the mountains of Wales and the mooriness of Armorie; but their populousness has been maliciously ascribed to the loose practice of polygamy; and the houses of these licentious barbarians have been supposed to contain ten wives, and perhaps fifty children. Their disposition was rash and violent; their courage; they were mad; and in speech; and as they were ignorant of the arts of war, they alterately indulged their passions in foreign and domestic war. The cavalry of Armorie, the spearmen of Gwent, and the archers of Merioneth, were equally formidable; but their poverty could seldom procure either their shields or helmets; and the inconvenient weight would have retarded the speed and agility of, their desultory operations. One of the greatest of the English monarchs was requested to satisfy the curiosity of a Greek emperor concerning the state of Britain; and Henry II. could assert, from his personal experience, that Wales was inhabited by a race of naked warriors, who encountered, without fear, the defensive armour of their enemies.

1 Bede, Hist. Ecclesiast. i. c. 15, p. 52. The fact is probable and well represented; yet such was the loose intermarriage of the German tribes, that we find, in a subsequent period, the law of the Angi and Was, provided for the case of a SAXON CONVERTED TO CHRISTIANITY, and his wife, which was by marriage, and not by law, and his children, and their subjects, of Welch or Cambrian extraction, assume the respectable station of inferior freemen, possessed of lands, and entitled to the rights of civil society. By the revolution of Britain, the limits of science, as well as of empire, were contracted. The dark cloud, which was successively darkened by the discovery of the ocean, and finally dispelled by the arms of Caesar, again settled on the shores of the Atlantic, and a Roman province was again lost among the fabulous islands of the ocean. One hundred and fifty years after the reign of Honorius, the graver historian of the times describes the wonders of the region, which were newly discovered, as having been divided by the arms of the Franks, again set on the shores of the Atlantic, and a Roman province was again lost among the fabulous islands of the ocean. The cast is a fair country, inhabited by a civilized people: the air is healthy, the waters are pure and plentiful, and the earth yields her regular and fruitful increase. In the west, beyond the wall, the air is infectious and mortal; the ground is covered with serpents; and this dreary solitude is the region of departed spirits, who are transported from the opposite shores in substantial boats, and by living rows. Some families of fishermen, the subjects of the Franks, are excused from this drudgery, in consideration of the mysterious office which is performed by these Charons of the ocean. Each in his turn is summoned, at the hour of midnight, to hear the voices, and even the names, of the ghosts: he is sensible of their weight, and he feels himself impelled by an unknown power: but this dream of fancy, we read with astonishment, that the name of this island is Britannia; that it lies in the ocean, against the mouth of the Rhine, and less than thirty miles from the continent; and that it is possessed by three nations, the Franks, theAngles, and the Britons; and that some Angles, and the Britons, and the Gauls, have appeared at Constantinople, in the train of the French ambassadors. From these ambassadors Procopius might have informed of a singular, though not an improbable, adventure, which announces the spirit, rather than the deliverance of an English king. St. Hilda, and her sister, had been betrothed to Rodger, king of the Varni, a tribe of Germans who touched the ocean and the Rhine; but the perfidious lover was tempted, by motives of policy, to prefer his father’s widow, the sister of Theodobert king of the Franks. The forsaken princess of the Angles, insteadafter her betrothal, was married to a knight, who was like subjects are said to have been ignorant of the use, and even of the form, of a horse: but she boldly sailed from Britain to the mouth of the Rhine, with a fleet of four hundred ships and an army of one hundred thousand men. After the loss of a battle, the captive Rodger implored the mercy of his victorious bride, who generously pardoned his offence, dismissed her rival, and compelled the king of the Varni to discharge with honour and fidelity the duties of a husband. This gallant exploit appears to be the last naval enterprise of the Anglo-Saxons. The arts of navigation by which they had acquired the empire of Britain and of the sea, were soon neglected by the indolent barbarians, who supinely renounced all the commercial advantages of their insular situation. Seven in this dependent kingdoms were agitated by perpetual discord; and the British world was seldom connected, either in peace or war, with the nations of the continent.

I have now accomplished the laborious narrative of the decline and fall of the Roman empire in the Roman empire, from the fortunate west, age of Trajan and the Antonines, to its total extinction in the west, about five centuries after the Christian era. At that unhappy period, the Saxons fiercely struggled with the natives for the possession of Britain: Gaul and Spain were divided between the powerful monarchies of the Franks and Visigoths, and the dependent kingdoms of the Suevi and Burgundians; Africa was exposed to the cruel persecution of the Vandals, and the savage insults of the Moors; and Italy, as far as the banks of the Danube, were afflicted by an army of barbarian mercenaries, whose lawless tyranny was succeeded by the reign of Theodore the Ostrogoth. All the subjects of the empire, who, by the use of the Latin language, more particularly deserved the name and privileges of Romans, were oppressed by the distress and calamities of foreign conquest; and the victorious nations of Germany established a new system of manners and government in the western countries of Europe. The majesty of Rome was faintly represented by the princes of Constantinople, who, in the course of their reigns, enjoyed the name of Augustus. Yet they continued to reign over the east, from the Danube to the Nile and Tigris; the Gothic and Vandal kingdoms of Italy and Africa were subverted by the arms of Justinian; and the history of the Greek emperors may still afford a long series of instructive lessons, and interesting revolutions.

The Greeks, after their empire had been reduced into a province, imputed the triumphs of Rome, not to the merit, but to the rovnr x, of the republic. The inconstant goddess, who so blindly distributes and renews her favours, had now consented (such was the language of envious flattery) to resign her wings, to descend from her globe, and to fix her firm and immovable throne in the banks of the Danube. The Greeks, who have composed, with a philosophic spirit, the memorable history of his own times, deprived his countrymen of this vain and delusive comfort, by opening to their view the deep foundations of the greatness and power of the republic: He had meted out the fidelity of the sea to his own country, and to the state, was confirmed by the habits of education, and the prejudices of religion. Honour, as well as virtue, was the principle of the republic: the a|Z|ious citizens labouring to deserve the solemn glory of a triumph; and the ardour of the Roman youth was kindled into active emulation, as often as they beheld the domestic images of their ancestors. The temperate struggles of the patricians and plebeians had finally established the firm and equal balance of the constitution; which united the freedom of popular assemblies, with the authority and wisdom of a senate, and the executive powers of a regal magistrate. When the consul displayed the standard of the republic, each citizen bound himself, by the obligation of an oath, to draw his sword in the cause of his country, till he had discharged the sacred duty by a military service of ten years. This wine institution continually poured into the field the rising generations of freemen and soldiers; and their numbers were reinforced by the warlike and populous states of Italy, who, after a brave resistance, had yielded to the valor, and embraced the alliance, of the Romans. The sage historian, who excelled the world in the science of history, and even the divines of Carthage, has accurately described their military system; their levies, arms, exercises, subordination, marches, encampments; and the invincible legion, superior in active strength to the Macedonian phalanx of Philip and Alexander. From these institutions of peace and war, Polybius has deduced the spirit and success of a people, incapable of fear, and impatient of repose. The ambitious design of conquest, which might have been defeated by the seasonable conspiracy of mankind, was attempted and achieved; and the perpetual violation of justice was maintained by the political principle, had sustained the fabric of the republic, sometimes vanquished in battle, always victorious in war, advanced with rapid steps to the Euphrates, the Danube, the Rhine, and the Ocean; and the images of gold, or silver, or brass, that might serve to represent the nations and their kings, were successively added to the immovable cheek of the Roman empire.

The rise of a city, which swelled into an empire, may deserve, as a singular prodigy, the reflection of a philosophic mind. But the decline of Rome was the natural and inevitable effect of inordinate greatness. Prodigious riches and the rapid rise of the Roman empire increased the extent of conquest; and as soon as time or accident had removed the artificial supports, the stupendous fabric yielded to the pressure of its own weight. The story of its ruin is simple and obvious; and instead of inquiring why the Roman empire was destroyed, we should rather be surprised that it had subsisted so long. The victorious legions, who, in distant wars, acquired the vices of strangers and mercenary heroes, first oppressed the freedom of the republic, and afterwards violated the majesty of the purple. The emperors, anxious for their personal safety, to whom the public power was reduced to the base expedient of corrupting the discipline which rendered them alike formidable to their sovereign and to the enemy; the vigour of the military government was relaxed, and finally dissolved, by the partial institutions of Constantine; and the Roman world was overwhelmed by a deluge of barbarians.

The decay of Rome has been frequently ascribed to the translation of the seat of empire; but this history has already shown, that the powers of government were divided, rather than removed. The throne of Constantinople was erected in the east, while the west was still possessed by a series of emperors who held their residence in Italy, and claimed their equal inheritance of the legions and provinces. This dangerous novelty impaired the strength, and fomented the vices, of a double reign: the instruments of an oppressive and arbitrary power were multiplied, and the rain emulation of luxury, not of merit, was introduced and supported between the degenerate successors of Theodosius. Extreme distress, which unites the virtue of a free people, imbitters the factions of a declining monarchy. The hostile favourites of Arcadius and Honorius betrayed the republic to its common enemies; and the Byzantine court held with indifference, perhaps with pleasure, the disgrace of Rome, the ruin of its liberties, and the death of its sons. Yet it was a calamity equally melancholy; for the succeeding reigns, the alliance of the two empires was restored; but the aid of the oriental Romans was tardy, doubtful, and inefficient; and the national schism of the Greeks and Latins was enlarged by the perpetual difference of language and manners, of interest, and of the legal and religious duties, of the two empires. The clergy successfully preached the doctrines of patience and pusillanimity; the active virtues of society were discouraged; and the last remains of military spirit were buried in the eloiser: a large portion of public and private wealth was consecrated to the service of the emperor; and the soldiers' pay was lavished on the useless multitudes of both sexes, who could only plead the merits of abstinence and chastity. Faith, zeal, curiosity, and the more earthly passions of malice and ambition, kindled the flames of internal dissension; and even the state, by distraction by religious factions, whose conflicts were sometimes bloody, and always implacable; the attention of the emperors was diverted from camps to synods; the Roman world was oppressed by a new species of tyranny; and the persecuted sects became the secret enemies of their country. Yet party-spirit, however pernicious or absurd, is a principle of union as well as of disunion. The bishops, from eighteen hundred pulpits, inculcated the duty of passive obedience to a lawful and orthodox sovereign; their frequent assemblies, and perpetual connexion with the civil and religious institutions of the empire, were attended with extensive effects on the state, the church, and the state. The sacred influence of the monks was devoutly embraced by a servile and effeminate age; but if superstition had not afforded a decent retreat, the same vices would have tempted the unworthy Romans to desert, from baser motives, the standard of the republic. Religious precepts are easily obeyed, which indulge and sanctify the natural inclinations of our vortices; but the pure and genuine influence of Christianity may be traced in its beneficial, though imperfect, effects on the barbarian proselytes of the north. If the decline of the Roman empire was hastened by the conversion of Constantine, his victorious religion broke the violence of the fall, and mollified the ferocious temper of the conquerors.

The awful revolution may be usefully illustrated by the instruction of the present age. It is the duty of a patriot to prefer and promote the exclusive interest and glory of his native country; but a philosopher may be permitted to enlarge his views, and to consider Europe as one great republic, whose various inhabitants have attained almost the same level of politeness and cultivation. The balance of power will continue to fluctuate, and the prosperity of our own, or the neighbouring kingdoms, may be alternately exalted or depressed; but these partial events cannot essentially alter the great law which confirms the habit of humanity, and the cultivation of arts, and laws, and manners, which so advantageously distinguish, above the rest of mankind, the Europeans. and their colonies. The savage nations of the globe are the common enemies of civilized society; and we may inquire with anxious curiosity whether Europe is still threatened with a repetition of those calamities, which formerly oppressed the arms and institutions of Rome. Perhaps the same reflections will illustrate the fall of that mighty empire, and explain the probable causes of our actual security.

1. The Romans were ignorant of the extent of their danger, and the number of their enemies. Beyond the Rhine and Danube, the northern countries of Europe and Asia were filled with innumerable tribes of barbarians, poor, rude, and timorous, yet boldly in arms, and impatient to ravish the fruits of industry. The barbarian world was agitated by the rapid impulse of war; and the peace of Gaul or Italy was shaken by the distant revolutions of China. The Huns, who fled before a victorious enemy, directed their march towards the west; and the torrent was swelled by the gradual accession of captives and allies. The flying tribes who yielded to the Huns, assumed in their turn the spirit of conquest; the endless column of barbarians pressed on the Roman empire with an impetuous weight; and if the foremost was destroyed, the vacuum was immediately replenished by new assailants. Such formidable emigrations can no longer issue from the north; and the long repose, which has been imputed to the decrease of population, is the happy consequence of the progress of arts and agriculture. The Huns have been succeeded by the Tartars, who have carried pillage and desolation far beyond the confines of Asia; and the civilized world is at present exposed to the attacks of these perilous neighbors.

2. The empire of Rome was firmly established by the singular and perfect coalition of its members. The subject nations, resigning the hope, and even the wish, of independence, embraced the character of Roman citizens; and the provinces of the west were reluctant to be torn by the barbarians from the bosom of their mother country. But this union was purchased by the loss of national freedom and military spirit; and the same cause, which had instanced the generosity of the Roman spirit, deprest their safety from the mercenary troops and governors, who were directed by the orders of a distant court. The happiness of a hundred millions depended on the personal merit of one or two men, perhaps chil-

3. The French and English editors of the Genealogical History of the Counts of Boulogne have been followed. They have been corrected by the Chinese, who, in the year 1759, rebound the lofty Rochius, and add a considerable number of facts to the history of the Omeni. (Memoires sur les Chinois, tom. i. p. 325-339.) But these last papers are precious, nor will I venture to insinuate the safety of the Chinoiserie.

4. The prudent reader will determine how far this general proposition is supported by the result of the inquiry; the independence of Britain and America, the Moorish tribes, or the Bagauds of Gaul and Spain, p. 112. 113, 145, 527, 528.

5. America now contains about six millions of European blood and descent; and their numbers, at least in the north, are continually increasing. Whatever may be the changes of their political situation, the manners of the Americans, and in some degree their language, are still preserved by the inhabitants of the north, with some pleasure, that the English language will probably be difficultly extinguished among them. Perhaps the Chinese, who have adopted the language of their conquerors, are about to eradicate the language of the Tartar. However, the language of the Tartar is not to be considered as the language of a nation, but as the language of a tribe which is about to be extinguished.

6. On voit fait venir (for the siege of Turin) 140 pieces of cannon; 81 of which, on 11 octobre, entered the city; they were accompanied by the entire artillery of the chapter. (Memoires sur les Chinois, tom. i. p. 325-339.) But these last papers are precious, nor will I venture to insinuate the safety of the Chinoiserie.

horse; and Europe is secure from any future irritation of barbarians; since, before they can conquer, they must cease to be barbarous. Their gradual advances in the science of war would always be accompanied, as at present, with proportionable improvement in the arts of peace and civil policy; and they themselves must deserve a place among the polished nations whom they subdue.

Should these speculations be founded doubtful or fallacious, there still remains a more humble source of comfort for us. The discourse of nations, even of the most modern navigators, and the domestic history, or tradition, of the most enlightened nations, represent the human savage, naked both in mind and body, and destitute of laws, arts, ideas, and almost of language. From this abject condition, perhaps the primitive savage state of man, he has gradually arisen to command the animals, to fertilize the earth, to traverse the ocean, and to measure the heavens. His progress in the improvement and exercise of his mental and corporeal faculties has been irregular and various; infinitely slow in the beginning, and increasing with the degrees of his labours as he has advanced by a moment of rapid downfall; and the several climates of the globe have felt the vicissitudes of light and darkness. Yet the experience of four thousand years would enlarge our hopes, and diminish our apprehensions: we cannot doubt that the human race, however imperfect, is quickly advancing in the development of their innate powers.

The improvements of society may be viewed under a threefold aspect. 1. The poet or philosopher alone, or by the union of a brave and ingenuous mind; but these superior powers of reason or fancy are rare and spontaneous productions; and the genius of Homer, or Cicero, or Newton, would excite less admiration, if they could be created by the will of a prince, or the lessons of a preceptor. 2. The benefits of law and policy, of trade and manufactures, of arts and sciences, are more solid and permanent; and many individuals may be qualified, by education and discipline, to promote, in their respective stations, the interest of the country. But this general order is the effect of skill and labour; and the complex machinery may be compared to a machine by time, or by chance, the two most passive bodies; and the apparatus of fire and of metals; the propagation and service of domestic animals; the methods of hunting and fishing; the rudiments of navigation; the imperfect cultivation of corn, or other nutritive grain; and the simple practice of the mechanic arts.

Private genius and public industry may be extirpated; but these hardy plants survive the tempest, and strike an everlasting root into the most unfavourable soil. The splendid days of Augustus and Trajan were eclipsed by a cloud of ignorance; and the barbarians subverted the laws and palaces of Rome. But the sycye, the invention or emblem of Saturn, still continued annually to sow the harvests of Italy; and the human feasts of the Lastrigons, have never been replaced.

Since the first discovery of the arts, war, commerce, and religious zeal, have diffused, among the savages of the old and new world, these inestimable gifts: they have been successively propagated; they can never be lost. We may therefore acquiesce in the pleasing conclusion, that every age of the world has increased, and still increases, the real wealth, the happiness, the knowledge, and perhaps, the virtue of the human race.
conversation; he frequented the schools of the most skilful masters; but he disliked or neglected the arts of Greece, and so ignorant did he always remain of the first elements of science, that a rude mark was contrived to represent the image of the illustrious king of Italy. As soon as he had attained the age of eight, he was betrothed to the daughter of the Ostrogoths, whom the emperor aspired to gain by liberality and confidence. Walamir had fallen in battle; the youngest of the brothers, Widimir, had led away into Italy and Gaul an army of barbarians, and the whole nation acknowledged for their king the father of Theodoric. His sons, subjects of the Ostrogoths, were imbued with the spirit and stature of their young prince; and he soon convinced them that he had not degenerated from the valour of his ancestors. At the head of six thousand volunteers, he secretly left the camp in quest of adventures, descended the Danube as far as Singidunum or Belgrade, and soon returned to his father with the spoils of a Sarmatian king whom he had vanquished and slain. Such triumphs, however, were productive only of fame, and the invincible Ostrogoths were reduced to extreme distress by the want of clothing. They were engaged in an unremittent struggle with their Pannonian encampments, and boldly to advance into the warm and wealthy neighbourhood of the Byzantine court, which already maintained in pride and luxury so many bands of confederate Goths. After proving by some acts of hostility that they could be dangerous, or at least treacherous enemies, the Ostrogoths sold at a high price their reconciliation and fidelity, accepted a donative of lands and money, and were intrusted with the defence of the lower Danube, under the command of Theodicoric, who succeeded after his father's death to the hereditary title of the Amal.

A hero, descended from a race of one of the kings, must have despised the base Isaurian who was invested with the Roman purple, without any endowments of mind or body, without any advantages of royal birth, or superior qualifications. After the failure of the Neronian line, the choice of Pulcheria and of the senate might be justified in some measure by the characters of Martian and Leo, but the latter of these princes confirmed and dishonoured his reign by the perfidious murder of his eldest brother. He was restored to the crown by his son, whom he rigorously extorted the debt of gratitude and obedience. The inheritance of Leo and of the east was peaceably devolved on his infant grandson, the son of his daughter Ariadne; and her Isaurian husband, the fortunate Trascilacceus, exchanged that barbarous sound for the Greek appellation of Leo. After the death of Leo, he approached with unnatural respect the throne of his son, humbly received, as a gift, the second rank in the empire, and soon excited the public suspicion on the sudden and premature death of his young colleague, whose life could no longer promote the success of his ambition. But the palace of Constantinople was ruled by female influence, and agitated by female passions; and Verina, the widow of Leo, claiming his empire as her own, pronounced a sentence of deposition against the worthless and ungrateful servant on whom she alone had bestowed the sceptre of the east.

As soon as she sounded a revolt in the ears of Zeno, he fled with precipitation into the mountains of Isauria, and her brother Basiliscus, already infamous by his African expedition, was unanimously proclaimed by the servile Senate. But the reign of the usurper was short and turbulent. Basiliscus presumed to assassinate Zeno, the genuine son of his brother, the lover of his wife, the vain and insolent Harmatius, who, in the midst of Asiatic luxury, affected the dress, the demeanour, and the surname of Achilles. By the cruelty of the malcontents, Zeno was recalled from exile; the armies, the capital, the person of Basiliscus, and the house of the Ostrogoths, were submitted to the long agony of cold and hunger by the inhuman conqueror, who wanted courage to encounter or to forgive his enemies. The haughty spirit of Verina was still incapable of submission or repose. She provoked the enmity of a favourite general, and embraced his cause as soon as he was disgraced, created a new emperor in Syria and Egypt, raised an army of seventy thousand men, and persisted to the last moment of her life in a fruitless rebellion, which, according to the fashion of the age, had been predicted by Christian numerals and pagan magicians. While the east was affected by the passions of Verina, her daughter Ariadne was distinguished by the female virtues of mildness and fidelity; she followed her husband in his exile, and after his restoration she implored his clemency in favour of her mother. On the death of the latter, she married Zeno, the mother, and the widow of an emperor. April 11. July 8, 496, gave her hand and the imperial title to Anastusius, an aged domestic of the palace, who survived his elevation above twenty-seven years, and whose character is attested by the doctrine of the explanation of the title, "Reign as we have lived"

Whatever fear or affection could beset, was profusely lavished by Zeno on the line of the Ostrogoths; the rank of patrician and consul, the command of the Palatine troops, an equestrian statue, a treasure in gold and silver of many thousand pounds, the name of son, and the promise of a rich and honourable life. As long as Theodicoric was descended to serve, he supported with courage and fidelity the cause of his betrothed to the throne of his sister; he desired to effect the abolition of Zeno; and in the second revolt, the Isaurians, as they were called, pursued and pressed the Asiatic rebels, till they left an easy victory to the imperial troops. But the faithful servant was suddenly converted into a formidable enemy, who spread over the Roman provinces desolation and ruin. Many flourishing cities were reduced to ashes, and the agriculture of Thrace was almost extinguished by the wanton cruelty of the Goths, who deprived their captive peasants of the right hand that guided the plough. On such occasions, Theodicoric sustained the loud and specious reproach of disloyalty, of ingratitude, and of insatiate avarice, which could be only excused by the hard necessity of his situation. He renounced, not as the monarch, but as the minister of a ferocious people, whose spirit was unbroken by slavery, and impatient of real or imaginary insults. Their poverty was incurable; since the most liberal donatives were soon dissipated in wanton luxury, and the most fertile estates became barren in their hands; they despised, but they could not suppress, the indulgence of immorality. The insurrection had failed, the Ostrogoths embraced the familiar resources of war and rapine. It had been the wish of Theodoric, (such at least was his declaration,) to lead a peaceable, obscure, obedient life, on the confines of Scythia, till the Byzantine court, by splendid and fallacious promises, seduced him from his path among the rocks and precipices of Mount Sondis, where he was assaulted by the arms and invectives of Theodoric the son of Triarius. From a neighbouring height, his artful rival harangued the camp of the Walamir, and branded their leader with the opprobrious names of child, of madman, of perjured traitor, the enemy of his blood and nation. "Are you ignorant," exclaimed the son of Triarius, "that it is the constant policy of the Romans to destroy the Goths by each other's swords? Are you insensible that the victor in this unnatural contest will be exposed, and his land exposed, to their implacable rage? Where are those warriors, my kinsman and thy own, whose widows now lament that their lives were sacrificed to thy rash ambition? Where is the wealth which thy soldiers possessed when they were first allured from their native homes to enlist under thy standard! Each of them was then master of three or four horses; they now follow thee on foot like slaves, through the deserts of Thrace; those men who were tempted by the hope of measuring gold with a bushel, those brave men who are as free and as noble as thyself."

A language so well suited to the temper of the Goths, executed with such strength and depth of passion, that the men, apprehensive of being left alone, was compelled to embrace his brethren, and to imitate the example of Roman perjury. 3

In every state of his fortune, the prudence and firmness of Theodoric were equally conspicuous; whether he threatened Constantinople at the head of the confederate Goths, or retreated with a faithful band to the mountains and sea-coast of Epirus. At length the accidental death of the son of Triarius* destroyed the balance which the Romans had been so anxious to preserve, and in the depth of a rigorous winter. Since the fall of the Roman power, Dacia and Pannonia no longer exhibited the rich prospect of populous cities, well cultivated fields, and convenient highways; the reign of barbarism and desolation was restored, and the tribes of Belgarians, Gepides, and Sarmatians, who had occupied the vacant provinces, were prompted by their native fierceness, or the solicitations of Odother, to resist the progress of his enemy. In many obscure though bloody battles Theodoric fought and vanquished; till at length, surrounding every obstacle by skilful conduct and persevering courage, he descended from the Julian Alps, and displayed his invincible dominion over the confines of Italy.

Odoacer, a rival not unworthy of his arms, had already occupied the advantageous and well-known post of the river Soutius near the ruins of Aquileia, at the head of a powerful host, whose industry, valor, and genius disdained the duties of subordination and the prudence of delays.

No sooner had Theodoric granted a short repose and refreshment to his wearied cavalry, than he boldly attacked the fortifications of the enemy; the Ostrogoths showed more ardor to acquire, than the mercenaries to defend; and the rapid advance of Italy and the reward of the first victory was the possession of the Venetian province as far as the walls of Verona. In the neighbourhood of that city, on the steep banks of the rapid Adige, he was opposed by a new army, reinforced in its numbers, and not impaired in its courage; the cor-test was more obstinate, but the event was still decisive; Odoacer fled to Ravenna, Theodoric adanced to Milan, and the vanquished troops saluted their conqueror with loud acclamations of respect and fidelity.

But their want either of constancy or of faith, soon caused the ruin of their hopes, and the danger of the vanguard, with several Gothic counts, which had been rashly entrusted to a despot, was betrayed and destroyed near Faenza by his double treachery; Odoacer again appeared master of the field, and the invader, strongly intrenched in his camp of Pavia, was reduced to the obstinacy of sacrificing kindred rather than Vigisitho of Gaul. In the course of this history, the most vexous appetite for war will be abundantly satiated; nor can I much lament that our dark and imperfect materials do not afford a more ample narrative of the distress of Italy, and of the fierce conflict, which was finally decided by the Genius of History, and the value of the Gothic king. Immediately before the battle of Verona, he visited the tent of his mother and sister, and requested, that on a day the most illustrious festival of his life, they would adorn him with the rich garments which they had worked with their own hands. "Our glory," said he, "is mutual and insepable. You are known to the world as the mother of Theodoric; and it becomes me to prove, that I am the genuine offspring of those heroes from whom I claim my descent. The wife or concubine of Theodoric, inspired with the same spirit, who esteem their sons' honour far above their safety; and it is reported, that in a desperate action, when Theodoric himself was hurried along by the torrent of a flying crowd, she boldly met them at the entrance of the camp, and, by her generous reproaches, drew from him the most laudable and the most sentence of Theodoric."

From the Alps to the extremity of Calabria, Theodoric reigned by the right of conquest; the Vandals ambassadors surrendered the island of Sicily, as a lawful appendage of his kingdom; and he was acceded as the deliverer of Rome by the senate and people, who had shut their gates against the flying usurper.
Ravenna alone, secure in the fortifications of art and nature, still sustained a siege of almost three years; and the daring sallies of Odoacer carried slaughter and dismay into the Gothic camp. At length, destitute of provisions, and hopeless of relief, that otherwise monarch yielded to the troops of his subjects and the clamours of his soldiers. A treaty of peace was ne-ogotiated by the bishop of Ravenna; the Ostrogoths were admitted into the city, and the hostile kings conquered, under the sanction of an oath, to rule with common consent. The event of such an agreement may be easily for-seen. After some days had been devoted to the sembance of joy and friendship, Odoacer, in the midst of a solemn banquet, was stabbed by the hand, or at least by the command, of his rival. Secret and effectual palliders of this parricide were invented by the visceral rapacity and fomenters of tumults, and without resistance, were universally massacred; and the royalty of Theodoric was proclaimed by the Gopts, with the tardy, reluctant, ambiguous consent of the imperials of the east. The design of a conspiracy was imputed, according to the usual forms, to the prosperity of this tyrant; but his innocence, and the guilt of his conquorer, are sufficiently proved by the advantageous treaty which for as not sincerely had been granted, not weakness have rashly infringed. The jealousy of Ravenna was excited by the royal conduct; and Odoacer made a more decent apology, and a sentence less rigorous may be pronounced against a crime which was necessary to introduce into Italy a generation of public felicity.

The living author of this felicity was au-daciously praised in his own presence by some judicious and profound orators; but his reign is still extant, and has obtained more implicit credit than it seems to deserve. They exhibit the forms, rather than the substance, of his government; and we should vainly search for the pure and spontaneous sentiments of the barbarian amidst the declamation and learning of a sophist, the wishes of a Roman senator, the precedents of office, and the vague professions, which, in every court and on every occasion, compose the language of discreet ministers. The reputation of Theodoric may repose with more confidence on the authorised testimonies of Cassiodorus and of Theodoric, the one record of his fame, the volume of public works composed by Cassiodorus; the other is still extant, and has obtained more implicit credit than it seems to deserve. Theologists, historians, and philosophers, have displayed their learning; the discussion of the kings; biography of the kings; of his promises, had transported themselves into a distant laud. 2 Under the reign of Theodoric, and in the happy climate of Italy, the Goths soon multiplied to a formidable strength, and the whole amount of their families may be computed by the ordinary addition of women and children. Their invasion of property, a part of which must have been already vacant, was disguised by the generous but improper name of hospitality; these unwelcome guests were irregularly dispersed over the face of Italy, and the lot of each barbarian was adequate to his birth and office, the number of his followers, and the rustic wealth which he possessed in slaves and cattle.

The distinctions of noble and plebeian were acknowledged; 3 but the lands of every freeman were exempt from taxes, and had the right of bearing arms, which, however, was just to the laws of his country. 4 Fashion, and even convenience, soon persuaded the conquerors to assume the more elegant dress of the natives, but they still persisted in the use of their mother-tongue; and their contempt for the Latin schools was applauded by Theodoric himself, who gratified their prejudices, or his own, by declaring, that the child who had trodred at a rod, would never dare to look upon a sword. 5 Distress might sometimes provoke the indigent Roman to assume the ferocious manners which were insensi-ibly relinquished by the rich and luxurious barbarian, 6 but the indelible mark of the policy of a monarch who perverted the separation of the Goths and Goths; reserving the former for the arts of peace, and the latter for the service of war. To accomplish this design, he studied to protect his industrious subjects and to moderate the resources of his army, without excusing the valor of his soldiers, who were maintained for the public defence. They held their lands and benefices as a military stipend; at the sound of the trumpet, they were prepared to march under the conduct of their provincial officers; and the whole extent of Italy was divided into the several quarters of a well-regulated camp. The service of the palace and of the frontiers was performed by choice or by rotation; and each extraordinary fatigue was recompensed by an increase of pay and occasional demands. Theodoric had established a firm and safe government; but the more the barbarian monarchs must be acquired and defended by the same arts.

After his example, they strove to excel in the use, not only of the lance and sword, the instruments of their victories, but of the missile weapons, which they were too much inclined to neglect; and the lively image of war was perpetuated by the following and instructions of the Gothic cavalry. A firm though gentle discipline imposed the habits of modesty, obedience, and temperance; and the Goths were instructed to spare the people, to reverence the laws, to understand the duties of civil society, and to disdain the barbari-ous licence of judicial combat and private revenge.

Among the barbarians of the west, the victory of Theodoric had spread a general alarm. But as soon as it appeared that he was satisfied with conquest and desires of peace, terror was changed into respect, and they submitted to a powerful mediation, which was uniformly employed for the accomplishment of their purposes, and for the regular arrangement of the barbarian tribes. The ambassadors who resorted to Ravenna from the most distant countries of Europe, admired his wisdom, magnificence, 6 and courtesy; and if he sometimes accepted either slaves or arms, white horses or strange animals, the gift of a sun-dial, a warm lock, or a musician, admonished even the prince of Gaul, of the superior art and industry of his Italian subjects. His domestic alliances, 7 a wife, two daughters, a sister, and a niece, united the family of Theodoric with the kings of the Franks, the Burgundians, the Visigoths, the Vandals, and the Thuringians, and were contributed to the benefit of his house, and to the balance, of the great republic of the west. 8 It is difficult in the dark forests of Germany and Poland to pursue the emigrations of the Huli, a fierce people, who disdained the use of armour, and who condemned their widows and aged parents not to survive the loss of their husbands, or the decay of their strength. 9 The king of these savage warriors solicited the friendship of Theodoric, and was elevated to the rank of his son, according to the barbaric rites of a military adoption. 10

From the shores of the Baltic, the Aesti, or Livoni-ans, laid their offerings of native amber 11 at the feet of their hereditary prince, who was the first of a thousand; and a strange and unknown and dangerous journey of fifteen hundred miles. With the country 12 from whence the Gothic nation derived their origin, he maintained a frequent and friendly correspondence; the Italians were clothed in the rich sables 13 of Sweden; and one of its sovereigns, after a voluntary or reluctant abdication, found a hositable retreat in the palace of Ravenna. He had reigned over one of the thirteen populous tribes who cultivated a small portion of the great island or penin-insula of Scandinavia, to which the vague appellation of Thule has been sometimes applied. That northern region was peopled, or had been peopled, as high as the sixty-eighth degree of latitude, where the natives of the polar circle enjoy and lose the presence of the sun at each summer and winter solstice during an equal period of forty days. 13 The long night of his absence

His defensive

The life of Theodoric represents the wars, rare and meritorious example of a barbarian, who sheathed his sword in the pride of victory and the glory of his age. A reign of three and thirty years was consecrated to the duties of civil government, and the hostilities in which he was sometimes involved, were speedily terminated by the conduct of his lieutenants, the discipline of his troops, the armament of his fleet, and the signals of his ministers of state. He reduced, under a strong and regular government, the unprofitable countries of Rhetta, Noricum, Dalmatia, and Pannonia, from the source of the Danube and the territory of the Bavarians, to the petty kingdom erected by the Gepidae on the ruins of Sirnum. His prudence could not intrust the bulk of Italy to such feeble and turbulent neighbours; and his justice might claim the lands which they oppressed, either as a part of his kingdom, or as the inheritance of his father. The greatness of a servant, who was named perfidious because he was successful, awakened the envy of the emperor, who was kindled on the Dacian frontier, by the protection which the Gothic king, in the visceritude of human affairs, had granted to one of the descendants of Attila. Sabinian, a general illustrious by his own name and fathered by the most illustrious of the ten thousand Romans; and the provisions and arms, which filled a long train of wagons, were distributed to the foremost of the Bulgarian tribes. But, in the fields of Margin, the eastern powers were defeated by the inferior forces of the Goths and Huns; the flower and even the hope of the Gothic nation was irretrievably destroyed, and such was the temperance with which Theodoric had inspired his victorious troops, that as their leader had not given the signal of pillage, the rich spoils of the enemy lay untouched at their feet.

Exasperated by this disgrace, the Byzantine emperor despatched two hundred ships and eight thousand men to plunder the sea-coast of Calabria and Apulia; they assaulted the ancient city of Tarentum, interrupted the trade and agriculture of a happy country, and sailed back to the Hellespont, without any victory. Two provinces, and the populous city which they still presumed to consider as their Roman brethren. Their retreat was possibly hastened by the activity of Theodoric; Italy was covered by a fleet of a thousand light vessels, which he constructed with incredible dispatch; and his firm moderation was rewarded with the most honourable peace. He maintained with a powerful hand the balance of the west; till it was at length overthrown by the ambition of the great Bullion; nor it easy for the coldest reason to withstand the magic of their philosophy.
 subordinate care of justice and the revenue was delegated to seven consuls, three correcting, and five presidents, who governed the fifteen regions of Italy, according to the principles and even the forms of Roman jurisprudence. 1 The violence of the conquerors was abated or eluded by the slow artifice of judicial process; and a discourse of the laws and emoluments, was confined to the provincials; and the people still preserved their dress and language, their laws and customs, their personal freedom, and two thirds of their landed property. It had been the object of Augustus to conceal the introduction of monarchy; it was unessential. 2 During the first two centuries, the empire, the person, and the courtly demeanour of the Gothic king, excited the admiration of the Romans, and he contemplated, with equal curiosity and surprise, the monuments that remained of their ancient greatness. He imprinted the footsteps of a conqueror on the Capitoline hill, and frankly confessed that each day he viewed with fresh wonder the forum of Trajan and his lofty column. The theatre of Pompey appeared, even in its decay, as a huge mountain artificially hollowed and polished, and adored by human industry; and he vaguely computed, that a river of gold must have been drained by the operation of Titus. 3 From the mouths of fourteen aqueducts, a pure and copious stream was diffused into every part of the city; among these the Claudian water, which arose at the distance of thirty-eight miles in the Sabine mountains, was conveyed along a gentle though constant declivity of solid arches, till it descended on the summit of the Aventine hill. The long and spacious vaults which had been constructed for the purpose of common sewers, subsisted, after twelve centuries, in their pristine strength; and these subterraneous channels have been preferred to all the visible wonders of Rome. 4 The inhabitants, who had not totally sunk in oblivion; the wild beasts of Africa still exercised in the amphitheatre the courage and dexterity of the hunters; and the indolent Goth either patiently tolerated or greatly restrained the blue and yellow elephants of the 'Ina acera were diligently restored; 5 the famous heifer of Myron deceived the cattle, as they were driven through the forum of peace; and an officer was created to protect those works of art, which Theodoric considered as the noblest ornament of his kingdom.

Flourishing. After the example of the last emperors, Theodoric preferred the residence of Ravenna, where he cultivated an orchard with his own hands. As often as the peace of his kingdom was threatened (for it was never invaded) by the barbarians, he removed his court to Verona, on the northern slopes of the mountains of Veneantia, still called the Albani, on a coto, represents the oldest and most authentic model of Gothic architecture. These two capitals, as well as Pavia, Spoleto, Naples, and the rest of the Italian cities, acquired under his reign the useful or splendid decorations of churches, aqueducts, baths, public buildings, and other works. But the happiness of his subjects was more truly conspicuous in the busy scene of labour and luxury, in the rapid increase and hold enjoyment of national wealth. From the shades of Tibur and Prænestæ, the Roman senators still retired in the winter season to the warm sun, and salubrious springs, of Baiae; and their villas, which advanced on solid moles into the bay of Naples, commanded the various prospect of the sky, the earth, and the water. On the eastern side of the Hadriatic, a new Campaign was formed in the fair and fruitful province of Istria, which was connected with the territory of Ravenna by an easy navigation of twenty or thirty miles. The rich productions of Lucania and the adjacent provinces were exchanged at the Marcellian fountain, in a populous fair annually dedicated to trade, intertemperance, and superstition. In the solitude of Comum, which lay a hundred miles from the coast, the farms of the clero was a transparent basin above sixty miles in length still reflected the rural seats which compassed the margin of the Larian lake; and the gradual ascent of the hills was covered by a triple plantation of olives, of vines, and of chestnut trees. Agriculture revived under him; the shadow of peace was restored, and the utility of the land was multiplied by the redemption of captives. The iron mines of Dalmatia, a gold mine in Bruttium, were carefully explored, and the Pomptine marshes, as well as those of Spoleto, were drained and cultivated by private undertakers, whose distant reward must depend on the continuance of the public prosperity. Whenever the seasons were less propitious, the doubtful precautions of forming magazines of corn, fixing the price, and prohibiting the exportation, attested at least the benevolence of the state; but such was the extraordinary plenty which an industrious people produced from a grateful soil, that a gallon of wine was sometimes sold in Italy for less than three farthings, and a quarter of wheat at about five shillings and sixpence. A country possessed of so many valuable objects of exchange soon attracted the merchant of the Barbarian, whose beneficent traffic was encouraged and protected by the liberal spirit of Theodorick. The free intercourse of the provinces by land and water was restored and extended; the city gates were never shut either by day or by night; and the common saying, that a purse of gold might be safely left in the fields, was expressive of the conscious security of the inhabitants. A difference of religion is always pernicious and often fatal to the harmony of nations. Theodoric, as a prudent man, was not surprised to find that the convert to his Arian sects, roused the fanatical spirit of the inhabitants. But the persuasion of Theodoric was not infected by zeal; and he piously adhered to the heresy of his fathers, without outcondescending to balance the subtle arguments of the Arianism. He allowed the toleration of his Ariana sectaries, he justly conceived himself to be the guardian of the public worship, and his external reverence for a superstition which he despised may have nourished in his mind the toleration of the religion of the conqueror. The people, and the barbarians themselves, were edified by the pomp and order of religious worship; the magistrates were instructed to defend the just immunities of ecclesiastical persons and property, and the bishops held their sees with the more safety; the emperors exercised their jurisdiction, and the privileges of sanctuary were maintained or moderated according to the spirit of the Roman jurisprudence. With the protection, Theodoric assumed the legal supremacy of the church; and his firm administration restored or extended some useful prerogatives which had been neglected by the feeble emperors of the west. He was not ignorant of the dignity and importance of the Roman pontif, to whom the venerable name of Porz was now appropriated. The peace of the revolt of Italy was doi-, and modinously observed by a throned and popular bishop, who claimed such ample dominion both in heaven and earth; who had been declared in a numerous synod to be pure from all sin, and exempt from all judgment. When the chair of St. Peter was disputed by Symmachius and Laurence, they appeared in his court, and maintained in his presence the value of the sees, and the rights of the church, and he confirmed the election of the most worthy or the most obsequious candidate. At the end of his life, in a moment of jealousy and resentment, he prevented the choice of the Romans, by nominating a pope in the palace of Ravenna. The danger and furious contests of a schism were mildly restrained, and the last decres of the senate was enacted to extinguish, if

Vice of his government. fortunate condition of Italy; but our famous holy confessors; three hundred pulpits deplored the poets, a race of men without vice or misery, was realized under the Gothic conquest. The fair prospect was sometimes overcast with clouds; the wisdom of Theodoric might be deceived, his power might be resisted, and the declining age of the monarch was spilled with power and hatred and passion were not always to be found at the ear of kings. The privileges of rank, or office, or favor, were too frequently abused by Italian fraud and Gothic violence, and the arrogance of the king’s nephew was publicly exposed, at first by the usurpation, and afterwards by the restitution, of the estates which he had unjustly extorted from his Tuscans, and the grief even of his master, were seated in the heart of Italy; they indignantly supported the restraints of peace and discipline; the disorders of their march were always felt and sometimes compensated; and when it was dangerous to punish, it might be prudent to dissemble, that safety might be bought at the expense of justice. When the indulgence of Theodoric had remitted two-thirds of the Ligurian tribute, he condescended to explain the difficulties of his situation, and to lament the heavy though inevitable burdens which he imposed on the subjects for the safety of the state. These ungrateful subjects could never be cordially reconciled to the origin, the religion, or even the virtues, of the Gothic conqueror: past calamities were forgotten, and the sense or suspicion of injuries was rendered still more exquisite by the present felicity of the times.

He is provoked to speak of the catholics. Theodoric had the glory of introducing the Christian world, was painful and offensive to the orthodox zeal of the Italians. They respected the armed heresy of the Goths; but their pious rage was safely pointed against the rich and deformed architecture of their native kingdom. They visited at Naples, Rome, Ravenna, Milan, and Genoa, for the benefit of trade, and under the sanction of the laws. Their persons were insulted, their effects were pillaged, and their synagogues were burnt, by the mad populace of Ravenna and Rome, inflamed, as it should seem, by their most frivolous or extravagant pretences. The government which could neglect would have deserved such an outrage. A legal inquiry was instantly directed; and as the authors of the tumult had escaped in the crowd, the whole community was condemned to repair the damage; and the obstinate bigots who refused their contributions, were whipped through the streets by the hand of the executioner. This simple act of justesse exasperated the discontent of the catholics, who applauded the merit and patience of these holy confessors; three hundred pulpits deplored the persecution of the church, and if the chapel of St. Stephen at Verona was demolished by the command of Theodoric, it is probable that some miracle hostile to his name and dignity had been performed on that sacred theatre. At the close of a glorious life, the king of Italy did not desire that he had excited the hatred of a people whose happiness he had so assistidus laboured to promote; and his mind was soured by indigation, jealousy, and the bitterness of unrequited love. The Gothic conqueror condescended to disarm the unwarlike nations of Italy, interfering with all weapons of offence, and employing them to beneficent use. The deliverer of Rome was accused of conspiring with the vilest informers against the lives of senators whom he suspected of a secret and treasonable correspondence with the Byzantine court. After the death of Anastasius, the diadem had been placed on the head of one man, the other being left to select him; the government were assumed by his nephew Justinian, who already meditated the extirpation of heresy, and the conquest of Italy and Africa. A rigorous law which was published at Constantinople, to reduce the Arians by the dread of punishment within the walls of the church, awakened the just resentment of Theodoric, who claimed for his nation the freedom of conscience; and the same indulgence which he had so long granted to the catholics of his dominions. At his stern command, the Roman pontiff, with four illustrious senators, embarked on an embassy, of which he must have alike dreaded the failure or the success. The singular veneration shown to the first pope who had visited Constantinople was punished as a crime by his jealous monarch; the artful or peremptory refusal of the Byzantine court might excuse an equal, and would provoke a larger, measure of retaliation; and a mandate was prepared in Italy, to prohibit, after a stated day, the exercise of the catholic worship. By the bigotry of his subjects and enemies, the most tolerant of princes was driven to the brink of persecution; and the life of Theodoric was too long, since he lived to condemn the virtue of Boethius and Symmachus.

He is the last of the character. studying in the south the Romans whom Cato or Tully really could not have acknowledged for their countryman. As of Boethius, a wealthy orphan, he inherited the patrimony and honours of the Asician family, a name ambitiously assumed by the kings and emperors of the age; and the application of Maxillius asserted his genuine or fabulous descent from a race of consuls and suchators, who had repulsed the Gauls from the Capitol, and sacrificed their sons to the discipline of the republic. In the youth of Boethius, the studies of Rome were not totally abandoned; a Virgil is now extant, corrected by the hand of a consul; and the professors of grammar, rhetoric, and jurisprudence, were maintained in their privileges and pensions by the liberality of the Goths. But the erudition of the Latin language was insufficient to satiate his ardent curiosity; and Boethius is said to have employed eighteen laborious years in the schools of Athens, which were supported by the zeal, the learning, and the diligence, of Proclus and his disciples. The reason and piety of their Roman pupil was forestalled from the councils of Helicon and magic, which polluted the groves of the academy; but he imbued the spirit, and imitated the method, of his dead and living masters, who attempted to reconcile the strong and subtle sense of Aristotle with the devout contemplation and sublime fancy of Plato. After his return to Rome, and his marriage with the daughter of his friend, the patrician Symmachus, Boethius still continued, in a palace of ivory and marble, to prosecute the same studies. The church was edified by his profound defence of the orthodox creed against the Arian, the Eutychian, and the Nestorian heresies; and the catholic unity was explained or exposed in a formal treatise by the indifference of three distinct though consensual persons. For the benefit of his Latin readers, his genius submitted to teach the first elements of the arts and sciences of Greece. The geometry of Euclid, the music of Pythagoras, the mathematic of Neumachus, the conclusions of Archimedes, the astronomy of Ptolemy, the theology of Plato, and the logic of Aristotle, with the commentary of Porphyry, were translated and illustrated by the indefatigable pen of the Roman senator. And he alone was esteemed capable of describing the wonders of the whole universe, of water-craft, and water-cinema, as a mathematical representation of the motions of the planets. From these abstruse speculations, Boethius stooped, or, to speak more truly, he rose, to the social duties of public and private life: the indulgent were relieved by his liberality; and his mildness, which never ascended to the voice of Democrates or Cicero, was uniformly exerted in the cause of innocence and humanity. Such conspicuous merit was felt and rewarded by a discerning prince; the dignity of Boethius was adorned by the titles of consul and patrician, and his talents were usefully employed in the important stations of master of the offices. Notwithstanding the equal claims of the east and west, his two sons were created, in their tender youth, the consuls of the same year. On the memorable day of their inauguration, they proceeded in solemn pomp from their palace to the forum, and the consular and patrician titles, and their joyful father, the true consul of Rome, after pronouncing an oration in the praise of his royal benefactor, distributed a triumphal largess in the games of the circus. Prosperous in his fame and fortunes, in his public honours and private alliances, in the cultivation of learning and the arts of war, Boethius might have been styled happy, if that precious epithet could be safely applied before the last term of the life of man.

His patriotism. A philosopher, liberal of his wealth and munificent in his largesse, was always insensible to the common allurements of ambition, the thirst of gold and employment. And some credit may be due to the asseveration of Boethius, that he had reluctantly obeyed the divine Plato, who enjoins every virtuous citizen to rescue the state from the usurpation of vice and ignorance. For the integrity of his public conduct he appeals to the memory of his country. His authority had restrained the pride and oppression of the royal officers, and his eloquence had delivered Paulinus from the dogs of the palace. He had always thwarted the efforts of rapine and injustice; whose fortunes were exhausted by public and private rapine; and Boethius alone had courage to oppose the tyranny of the barbarians, elated by conquest, excited by avarice, and, as he complains, encouraged by impunity. In these honourable contests, his spirit shone forth above the sentiment of danger, and public prudence; and we may learn from the example of Cato, that a character of pure and inflexible virtue is the most apt to be misled by prejudice, to be heated by enthusiasm, and to confound private enmities with public justice. The disciple of Plato might exaggerate the infirmities of nature, and the impurity of his society; and the mildest form of a Gothic kingdom, even the weight of allegiance and gratitude, must be insupportable to the free spirit of a Roman patriot. But the favour and fidelity of Boethius declined in just proportion with the public happiness; and an unmerited charge was imposed, to divide and control the power of the master of the offices. In the last gloomy season of Theodoric, he indignantly felt that he was a slave; but as his master had only power over his life, he stood without arms and without fear against the face of an angry barbarian, who had been accused of complicity in the rape and murder of his own incompatible with his own. The senate—He is accused of treason. Boethius was accused and already convicted on the presumption of hoping, as it was said, the liberty of Rome. "If Albinus be criminal," explained the senator, "it is manifest that the same action, committed by a Roman citizen, is criminal to the same extent. If we are innocent, Albinus is equally entitled to the protection of the laws." These laws might not have punished the simple and barren wish of an unattainable blessing; but they would have shown less indulgence to the rash confession of Boethius, that he had been a Roman citizen, as a member of the senatorial body, for the hundred miles, pronounced a sentence of confiscation and death against the most illustrious of its members. At the command of the barbarians, the occult science of a philosopher was stigmatized with the names of saecrilege and magic. A devout and dutiful attachment to the senator was condemned as criminal by the trembling voices of the senators themselves; and their ingratitude deserved the wish or prediction of Boethius, that, after him, none should be found guilty of the same offence.

While Boethius was oppressed with fetters, his imprisoners, every day, denounced the sentence as unjust, or the stroke of death, he composed in the tower of Pavia the Consolation of Philosophy; a 7 The Athenian studies of Boethius are doubtful (Barrowa, A. D. 510, No. 3, from a curious tract, De Disciplinis Scholomorum) and the term of eighteen years is doubtful too; but the single fact of a visit to Athens is justified by much internal evidence, (Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philosoph., tom. iii. p. 231-237) and by an expression (copious and ambiguous) of his friend Cassiodorus, (Var. ix. 32.) "Iamque pueros Athenam intravit."

8 De variis operibus, lib. ii. cap. ii. et iii. The character of his two doctors, Basilus (Var. ii. 10. lii. 22.) and Opius, (ib. viii. 163.) is illustrated, not much to their honour, by the Epitome of Boethius, in which (p. 33.) the worthless colleague of Boethius, (ib. iv. 4. 180.) is described (p. 14.) as "indulging the professed ambition of the professor who enjoyed in his own times. It is true, that the bishop of Paris wanted to purchase of him an old house of Julian, and he might be tempted in particular by payment of the price.

9 The evidence, &c. are agreed that Boethius himself was consul in the year 510, his two sons in 522, and in 457, perhaps, his father. If Albinus, in the year 525, had perished, the bishop of Rome had perished the chronology of his life. In his honours, alliances, childhood, he celebrates his own felicity; (past history, p. 169.)
golden volume, not unworthy of the leisure of Plato or Tully, but which claims incomparable merit from the barbarism of the times and the situation of the author. The celestial guide, whom he had so long in search of her gifts; experience had illumined his dungeon, to revive his courage, and to pour into his wounds her salutary balm. She taught him to compare his long prosperity and his recent distress, and to conceive new hopes from the inconsistency of fortune. Reason had informed him of the prerogatives condition of her gifts: experience had satisfied him of their real value; he had enjoyed them without guilt; he might resign them without a sigh, and calmly disdain the impotent malice of his enemies, who had left him happy, since they had left him virtue. From the earth, Boethius ascended to heaven in search of the supreme omen; explored the metaphysical labyrinth of chance and destiny, of prescience and free-will, of time and eternity; and generously attempted to reconcile the perfect attributes of the Deity with the apparent disorders of his moral and physical government. Such topics of consolation to obvious passions, or so abstruse, are treacherous to subdue the feelings of human nature. Yet the sense of misfortune may be diverted by the labour of thought; and the sage who could artfully combine in the same work the various riches of philosophy, poetry, and eloquence, must already have possessed a sort of happiness, if he had been capable of little else. In this sense, the worst of evils, was at length determined by the ministers of death, who executed, and perhaps exceeded, the inhuman mandate of Theodoric. A strong cord was fastened round the head of Boethius, and forcibly tightened, till his eyes almost started from their beds, and some mercy may have been spared him as the milder torture of beating him with clubs till he expired. But his genius survived to diffuse a ray of knowledge over the darkest ages of the Latin world; the writings of the philosopher were translated by the most glorious of the English kings, and the third emperor of the name of Otho removed to a more honourable tomb the bones of a catholic saint, who, from his Arian persecutors, had acquired the honours of martyrdom, and the fame of miracles. In the last hours of Boethius, he derived some comfort from the safety of his two sons, of his wife, and of his two daughters. A curious inscription, containing the grief of Symmachus was inscribed and perhaps disrespectful: he had presumed to lament, he might dare to revenge, the death of an injured friend. He was dragged in chains from Rome to the palace of Ravenna; and the suspicions of Theodoric could only be opposed by the blood of an innocent and aged senator.1

Humanity will be disposed to encourage any report which testifies the jurisdiction of conscience and the remorse of kings; and philosophy is not ignorant of the most horrid spectres are sometimes created by the powers of a disordered fancy, and the weakness of a distempered body. After a life of virtue and glory, Theodoric was now descending with shame and guilt into the grave: his mind was plunged into despair, and justly alarmed by the invisible terrors of futurity. One evening, as it is related, when the head of a large fish was served on the royal table,2 he suddenly exclaimed that he beheld the angry countenance of Symmachus, his eyes glaring fury and revenge, and his mouth as though he would have plucked him by the hair to devour him. The monarch instantly retired to his chamber, and as he lay, trembling with aguish cold, under a weight of bed-clothes, he expressed in broken murmurs to his physician Epilius, his deep repentance for the murders of Boethius and Symmachus.3 His malady increased, and after a dysentery which continued three days, he expired in the palace of Ravenna, in the thirty-third of, if we compute from the invasion of Italy, in the thirty-seventh year of his reign. Conscious of his approaching end, he divided his treasures and provinces between his son-in-law and the brothers of his wife, and fixed them as their common boundary.4 Analaric was restored to the throne of Spain. Italy, with all the conquests of the Ostrogoths, was bequeathed to Athalaric; whose age did not exceed ten years, but who was cherished as the last male offspring of the line of Amal, and the chief inheritor of the dominion of the Ostrogoths, with a royal fugitive of the same blood.5 In the pre-ence of the dying monarch, the Gothic chiefs and Italian magistrates mutually engaged their faith and loyalty to the young prince, and to his guardian mother; and received, in the same awful moment, his last salutary advice, to maintain the laws, to love the senate and people of Rome, and to cultivate with due reverence the friendship of the emperor.6 The monument of Theodoric was erected by his daughter Amalasuntha, in a conspicuous situation, which commanded the city of Ravenna, the harbour, and the adjacent coast. A chapel of a circular form, thirty feet in diameter, is crowned by a dome of one entire piece of granite: from the centre of the dome, four columns arose, which supported, in a vase of porphyry, the remains of the Gothic king, surrounded by the brazen statues of the twelve apostles.7 His spirit, after some time had elapsed, was raised on high by a close, indelible relation to the benefactors of mankind, if an Italian hermit had not been witness in a vision to the damnation of Theodoric,8 whose soul was plunged, by the ministers of divine vengeance, into the volcano of Lipari, one of the flaming mouths of the infernal world.9

1 He was executed in Agro Calvianum, Calvianum, between Blenium and Parma, with edge of the county of Tuscum or Pavia. The place of his confinement is styled the cella sancta, Vol. i. p. 723. His last words were: "the autumn of my years, the hour of my flight, the end of my days, the draught is ready preserved." (Tissot, tom. vii. p. 47, 48, 49.)

2 See the Epigraphia Britannica, Alfred, tom. l. p. 80, 92 ed. The work is still more honourable if performed under the threat of the eye of Afford by his foreign and domestic doctors. For the reputation of 13 centuries, consult Breucker, Hist. Crit. Philoso, toms. iii. l. 595, 596.

3 The inscription on his new tomb was composed by the preceptors of the school of Pope Silvester. His name, Calvenzanus, by himself, was styled a magician by the conscience of the times. The inscription in the Latin, Homo et filius, the Greek, Ρέγγενη ερήμηταν συναγωγής: (abort. Chron. p. 721, ed. Grot.)-Beatmont, the translator, wrote not a voice in his account of the event, that Symmachus, had retired into Spain, where he lived and died in obscurity, (Gantherius, c. 33.) He has not preserved it, of the discovery, capture, and death, of his grandson Eucharis. (p. 230.) His Roman games might render him popular, (Casiodor. in Chron.,) but Eucharis was agreeable in religiosity, (Casiodor. in Chron.)

4 See the counsels of Cassiodorus, and the professions of his successor, Procopius, (Chron. p. 38, 220, 221.)

5 The same event is related of his ministerial eloquence. (Anonym. Valer. 24. 123.)

7 This legend is related by Gregory I. (Dialog, iv. 36.) and approved by Romani; (A. D. 596, No. 258) and both the pope and cardinal are esteemed good doctors, although they are grave doctors, (ibid.)

8 Theodoric, himself, or rather Cassiodorus, had described in tragic fragment the Valkyres of Lipari, (Cluvier, Sicilia, p. 96-110) and Vesuvius, (iv. 29.)

CHAPTER VIII.

CHAPTER I.

The emperor Justinian was born near the ruins of Sardica, (the modern Sophia,) of an obscure race of barbians, the inhabitants of a wild and distant country, to which the names of Dardania, of Dacia, and of Bulgaria, have been successively applied. His elevation was prepared by the adventurous spirit of his uncle Justin, who, with two other peers of the same village, deserted, for the profession of arms, the more useful employment of husbandmen or shepherds. On foot, with a scanty provision of biscuit in their knapsacks, the three youths followed the high road of Constantinople, and were soon enrolled, for their strength and stature, among the guards of the emperor Leo. Under the two succeeding reigns, the fortunate peasant emerged to wealth and honours; and his escape from some dangers which threatened his life, was afterwards ascribed to the guardian angel who watches over the fate of kings. His long and laborious service in the Iberian and Persian wars would not have preserved from obliteration, the name, or the general, the dignity of senator, and the command of the guards, who obeyed him as their chief, at the important crisis when the emperor Anastasius was removed from the world. The powerful kinsmen whom he had raised and enriched were excluded from the throne; and the emperor Anastasius, who reigned in the palace, had secretly resolved, to fix the chasm on the head of the most obsequious of his creatures. A liberal donation, to conciliate the suffrage of the guards, was intrusted for that purpose in the hands of their commander. But these weighty arguments were strenuously employed by Justin in his own favour; and as no competitor presumed to appear, the Dacian peasant was invested with the purple, by the unanimous consent of the soldiers, who knew him to be brave and gentle, of the clergy and people, who believed him to be orthodox, and of the provincials, who yielded a blind and implicit submission to the will of the capital. The elder Justin, as he is distinguished from another emperor of the same family and name, ascended the Byzantine throne at the age of sixty-eight years; and, had he been left to his own guidance, every moment of a nine years' reign must have exposed to his subjects the impiety of their choice. His ignorance was similar to that of Theodosius; and it is remarkable, that in an age not destitute of learning, two contemporary monarchs had never been instructed in the knowledge of the alphabet. But the genius of Justin was far inferior to that of the Gothic king: the experience of a soldier had not qualified him for the government of an empire; and, though personally brave, the consciousness of his own weakness was naturally attended with doubt, distrust, and political apprehension. But the official business of the state was diligently and faithfully transacted by the qvarst Procles; and the aged emperor adopted the talents and ambition of his nephew Justinian, an aspiring youth, whom his uncle had drawn from the rustic solitude of Dacia, and educated at Constantinople, as the heir of his private fortune, and at length of the eastern empire.

Since the council Amantius had been deprived of his money, it became necessary to deprive him of his life. The task was easily accomplished by the charge of a real or fictitious conspiracy; and the judges were informed, as an accumulation of guilt, that he was secretly addicted to the Manichean heresy. Amantius lost his head; three of his companions, the first domestics of the palace, were punished either with death or exile; and their unfortunate candidate for the purple was cast into a deep dungeon, overhelmed with stones, and ignominiously thrown, without burial, into the sea. The ruin of Vitalian was a work of more difficulty and danger. That Gothic chief had rendered himself

1 There is some difficulty in the date of his birth; (Ludovici in Vit. Justiniani, p. 132.)—now in the place—the district Bederians—the village Taurencium, which he afterwards decorated with his name and splendour. (D'Anville, Hist. de l'Allem. &c. tom. xxxix. p. 266-272.)

2 The names of these Dardanian poets are Gothic, and almost English. Justinian is a transliteration of jozefax uskofa. His father Sebastas, (in Grceo-barbarous language, tepes,) was styled in his native Bedek (Sbock); his mother Brictayras was named into Vagianta.

3 Ludovici (p. 137—135.) attempts to justify the Allison name of Justinian and Theodora, and to connect them with a family from which the house of Anicia has been derived.

4 See the Anecdotes of Procopian, (c. 6,) with the notes of N. Allemanus. The satirist would not have sunk, in the vague and decent appellation of, 'the emperor, and successor of Zeno.' Yet why are these names disgraceful—and what German baron would not be proud to descend from the Romans of the Odyssey! His virtues are praised by Procopius, (Hist. 1. 4. c. 11.) The emperor Procles was the friend of Justinian, and the enemy of every other adoption.

popular by the civil war which he boldly waged against Anastasius for the defence of the orthodox faith and after the conclusion of peace in the advantaged treaty, he still remained in the neighbourhood of Constantinople at the head of a formidable and victorious army of barbarians. By the frail security of oaths, he was tempted to relinquish this advantageous situation, and to trust his personal influence and the wealth of a city, which he seems to have particularly the less fortuartfully incensed against him by the remembrance even of his pious hostilities. The emperor and his nephew embraced him as the faithful and worthy champion of the church and state; and gratefully adhered to their favourite ally in the course of events; but in the seventh month of his consulate, Vitalian was stab-bbed with seventeen wounds at the royal banquet; and Justinian, who inherited the spoil, was accused as the assassin of a spiritual brother, to whom he had recently pledged his faith in the participation of the christian mysteries. After the fall of his rival, he was promoted, without any claim of military service, to the office of master-regent of the eastern armies, when it was his duty to head into the field against the public enemy. But, in the pursuit of fame, Justinian might have lost his present dominion over the age and wealth of the world for the desire of acquiring a new Sevillian or Persian trophies the applause of his countrymen, the prudent warrior solicited their favour in the churches, the circus, and the senate, of Constantinople. The catholics were attached to the nephew of Justin, who, between the Nestorian and the Eutychian heresy, taught the doctrine of a flexible and intolerant orthodoxy. In the first days of the new reign, he prompted and gratified the popular enthusiasm against the memory of the deceased emperor. After a schism of thirty-four years, he reconciled the proud and angry spirit of the Roman senate, and repeated among his prescious posterity a favourable report of his pious respect for the apostolic see. The thrones of the east were filled with catholic bishops devoted to his interest, the clergy and the monks were gained by his liberality, and the people were taught to pray for their future sovereign. The magnificence of Justinian was displayed in the superior pomp of his public spectacles, an object not less sacred and important in the eyes of the multitude than the creed of Nice or Chalcedon: the expense of his consulate was esteemed at two hundred mil-sions of gold; two thousand one hundred seventy lions, and thirty leopards, were produced at the same time in the amphitheatre, and a numerous train of horses, with their rich trappings, was bestowed as an extraordinary gift on the victorious charioteers of the circus. While he indulged the people of Constantinople, and received the addresses of foreign kings, the nephew of Justin assiduously cultivated the friendship of the senate. That venerable name seemed to qualify its members to declare the sense of the nation, and to regulate the succession of the imperial throne: the feeble Anastasius had permitted the vigour of government to degenerate into the form or substance of an aristocracy; and the military officers who had obtained the senatorial rank, were followed by their domestic guards, a band of veterans, whose arms of his contemporaries; but, although he respectfully laid them at the foot of the throne, the pride of Justinian must have been wounded by the praise of a hero, who, at a banquet, had left three whole courses of wine unthirsted. The contempt of the sovereign. The conscious dignity of independence was subdued by the hopes and fears of a slave; and the secretary of Belisarius laboured for pardon and reward in the six books of the imperial edicts. He had dexterously chosen a subject of apparent splendour, and had said, loud and clear, that the Resurrection of the dead is alluded to, the magnificence, and the piety of a prince, who, both as a conqueror and a legislator, had surpassed the puerile virtues of Themistocles and Cyrus. Disappointment might urge the flatterer to secret revenge; and the first glance of favour might again tempt him to the vanity of their triumph, and to the truth. Justinian's edicts were founded on various materials. I shall now proceed to describe the reign of Justinian, which will deserve and occupy an ample space. The present chapter will explain the division of the realm of Justinian, and the faithful administration of the sovereign of the east. In the three succeeding chapters, I shall relate the wars of Justinian which achieved the conquest of Africa and Italy; and I shall follow the victories of Belisarius and Narses, without disguising the danger of their triumph, and the vanity of the Persian and Gothic heroes. The series of this and the following volume will embrace the jurisprudence and theology of the empire; the controversies and sects which still divide the oriental church; the reformation of the Roman law, which is obscure or respected by the nations of modern Europe.

Birth and vices of the empress Theodora.

Anecdote. 3. The Greek text was not printed till 1607, by Hesychius Basilius (Codex de Graeff, t. p. 4.); and this edition was imperfectly executed by Claude Malet, a Jesuit of Constantinople, in 1650, for distant from the Louvre presses and the Vatican MSS., from which, however, he obtained some supplements. His commentary, &c., have never appeared. The Anacharsis of Leyden (1559) has been widely reprinted by the Paris editor, with the Latin version of Bonaventura Vianus, a learned interpreter. (Her. P. viii. 4.)

Archias discourses himself, (Prout, ad Anachars. c. 1. 2. 5.) and the anecdotists are reckoned by the ninth book by Solinor, tom. i. p. 196, ed. Kueser. The silence of Evagrius is a poor objection. Basilides (A. 514. N. 24.) regrets the loss of his secret history; it was then in the Vatican library, in his own custody, and was only published sixteen years after his death, with the learned, but partial, notes of Palmas, and Arcadius. (Lond. 1721.)

nature: but her marmurs, her pleasures, and her arts, must be veiled in the obscurity of a learned language. After reigning for some time the delight and content of the capital, she condescended to accompany Eecbolus, a native of Tyre, who placed her in the government of the African Pentapolis. But this union was frail and transient: Eecbolus soon rejected an expensive or faithless concubine; she was reduced at Alexandria to extreme distress; and in her laborious return to Constantinople, every city of the east admired and enjoyed the sight of a Cyproit, who afterwards resolved to justify her descent from the peculiar island of Venus. The vague commerce of Theodora, and the detestable precautions, preserved her from the danger which she feared; yet once, and once only, she became a mother. The infant was saved and educated in Arabia, by his father, who imparted to him on his deathbed, that he was the son of an empress. Filled with ambitious hopes, the unsuspecting youth immediately hastened to the palace of Constantinople, and was admitted to the presence of his mother. As he was never more seen, even after the decease of Theodora, she deserves the foul imputation of extinguishing with his life a secret so offensive to her imperial virtue.

Her marriage with Justinian.

For six years she lingered, and at length proffered to Theodora the pleasing assurance that she was determined to become the spouse of a potent monarch. Conscious of her approaching greatness, she returned from Paphlagonia to Constantinople; assummed, like a skilful actress, a most admirable character, relieved her poverty by the landable industry of spinning wool; and affected a life of chastity and solitude in a small house, which she afterwards changed into a magnificent temple. Her beauty, assisted by art or accident, soon attracted, captivated, and fixed the fancy of Justinian, who also resolved to absolute sway under the name of his uncle. Perhaps she contrived to enhance the value of a gift which she had so often lavished on the meanest of mankind: perhaps she inflamed, at first by modest delays, and at last by temporal allurements, the desires of a lover, who was accustomed to dispose of his prerogatives and vices, and to maintain them at the expense of his guests. She found in Justinian a partner, who, by absolute power, could gratify every passion of Theodora, and she obtained vast treasures of the east and a large sum in cash. But her beauty was only capable of inferring the happiness of future years, and she was determined to share the throne; and as she obtained the rank in the court, the empress, Theodora, in her old age, retired to Paphlagonia, where she died a pious and a happy woman.

The reign of Justinian.

The most abject state of her fortune and reputation, some visions, especially during her imprisonment, are ascribed to the spirit of her mother. She always observed a gentle and a modest deportment, and was not calculated to excite envy or detraction. She was not always happy in the choice of those around her, and was often the object of her husband's suspicions. They lived as a happy family till the disgrace and death of Theodora, when Justinian resolved not to lose her carelessness in the course of her married life. She was a queen in the same city, by grave magistrates, orthodox bishops, victorious generals, and captive monarchs.

These who believe that the female mind is totally depraved by the loss of chastity, will eagerly listen to all the invectives of private envy or popular resentment. It is said that Justinian was a spirit of necessity, and that he had promised to the widow of Theodora, exaggerated her views, and condescended with rigour the penal or voluntary sins of the youthful harlot. From a motive of shame, or contempt, she often declined the servile homage of the multitude, escaped from the odious sight of the capital, and passed the greatest part of the year in the palaces and gardens which were pleasantly seated on the sea-coast of the Propontis and the Bosphorus. Her private hours were devoted to the prudent as well as grateful care of her beauty, the luxury of the bath and table, and the long slumber of the evening and the morning. Her secret apartments were occupied by the favourite women and concubines, whose interests and passions she indulged at the expense of justice; the illustrious personages of the state were crowded into a dark and sullen antechamber, and when at last, after a sedentary confinement of thirty years, she was admitted to the foot of Theodora, they experienced, as her humour might suggest, the silent arrogance of an empress, or the capricious levity of a comedian. Her rapacious avarice to accumulate an immense treasury, may be ascribed to the division of the empire, to the odour of the capital, and to the immensity of her fortune. It is not improbable that she might desire the law to be changed for her own advantage; and that she might make use of the sentence it had pronounced against her mother, to obtain the benefit of her property. She was, without scruples, even to her softest vices, left an indelible stain on the memory of Theodora. Her numerous spies observed, and zealously reported, every action, word, or look, injurious to her royal mistress. Whomsoever they accused were cast into her peculiar prisons, inaccessible to the inquiries of justice: and it was rumoured, that the torture of the rack, or scourge, had been influenced in the presence of a female tyrant, insensible to the voice of prayer or of pity. Some of these unhappy victims perished in deep unwholesome dungeons, others were educated after the loss of their limbs, their reason, or their fortune; and appear to the world the living monuments of their vengeance, which was commonly extended to the children of those whom she had suspected or injured. The senator, or bishop, whose death or exile Theodora had pronounced, was delivered to a trusty messenger, and his diligence was rewarded by a menace from her own mouth: "If you fail in the execution of my commands, I swear by him who liveth forever, that your skin shall be flayed from your body." 1

If the creed of Theodora had not been tainted with heresy, her exemplary devotion might have atoned, in the opinion of her contemporaries, for pride, avarice, and cruelty. But, if she employed her influence to assuage the intolerable fury of the emperor, the present age will allow some merit to her religion, and much indulgence to her speculative errors. 2 The adoration of Theodora was introduced, with equal honour, in all the principal Christian foundations of Justinian; and the most benevolent institutions of his reign may be ascribed to the sympathies of the empress for her less fortunate sisters, who had been seduced or compelled to embrace the true faith. The empress, with the munificence of the Bosphorus, was converted into a stately and spacious monastery, and a liberal maintenance was assigned to five hundred women, who had been collected from the streets and brothels of Constantinople. In this safe and holy retreat, they were devoted to perpetual meditation; and the despair of some, who threw themselves headlong into the sea, was lost in the gratitude of the penitents, who had been delivered from sin and misery by their generous benefactress. 3 The prudence of Theodora is celebrated by Justinian himself; and his laws are attributed to the sage counsels of her most revered mother, whom he had received as the gift of the deity. 4 Her courage was displayed amidst the tumult of the people and the terrors of the court. Her charity, from the moment of her union with Justinian, is founded on the silence of her implacable enemies; and, although the daughter of Aca- cius vigilius, who, according to this disappoint- ment, her dominion was permanent and absolute; she preserved, by art or merit, the affections of Justinian; and their seeming dissensions were always fatal to the courtiers who believed them to be sincere. Perhaps her health had been impaired by the licentiousness of her youth; but it was always delicate, and she was directed by her physicians to use the Pythian warm baths. In this journey, the empress was followed by the Praetorian prefect, the great treasurer, several counts and patricians, and a splendid train of four thousand attendants; the highways were repaired at her approach; a palace was erected for her reception; and as she passed through Bithynia, she distributed liberal alms to the churches, the monasteries, and the hospitals, that they might implore heaven for the restoration of her life. 5

The fictions of most eminent of the Greeks were actors, the Romans were merely spectators. The Olympic stadium was open to wealth, merit, and ambition; and if the candidates could depend on their personal skill and activity, they might pursue the footsteps of Diomedes and Meleagrus, and conduct their own horses in the rapid career. 6 Ten, twenty, forty chariots, were allowed to start at the same instant; a crown of leaves was the reward of the victor; and his fame, as that of his family and country, was chanted in lyric strains more durable than monuments of brass and marble. But a senator, or even a citizen, conscious of his dignity, would have blushed to expose his person or his horses in the circus of Rome. The games were exhibited at the expense of the republic, and the emperors as magistrates sacrificed their number to the passion of the populace, whose drivers were distinguished by white and red liveries; two additional colours, a light green, and a cerulean blue, were afterwards introduced; and, as the races were repeated twenty-five times, one hundred chariots contributed in the same day to the pomp of the circus. The four faces of the steeds, dappled in the element of life, and the green and blue was supposed to represent the conflict of the earth and sea. Their respective victories announced either a plentiful harvest or a prosperous navigation, and the hostility of the husbandmen and mariners was somewhat less absurd than the blind ambition of the emperors. The prizes were centuries; and the empress was rewarded with the whole riches and fortunes to the colour which they had espoused. Such folly was disdained and indulged by the wisest princes; but the names of Caligula, Nero, Vitellius, Carus, Commodus, Caracalla, and Elagabalus, were enrolled in the blue or green factions of the circus; they fre-

THE DECLINE AND FALL

THEIR dexterity would always inflict a mortal wound with a single stroke of their dagger. The dissolute youth of Constantinople adopted the blue livery of disorder; the laws were silent, and the bonds of society were rent; justice was compelled to resign its obligations; judges to reverse their sentence; masters to enfranchise their slaves; fathers to supply the extravagance of their children; noble matrons were prostituted to the lust of their servants; the most beautiful plate from the arms of their mistresses; and wives, unless they preferred a voluntary death, were ravished in the presence of their husbands. The despair of the greens, who were persecuted by their enemies, and deserted by the magistrate, assumed the privilege of defence, perhaps of retaliation; but who survived the combat were dragged to execution, and the unhappy fugitives, escaping to woods and caverns, preyed without mercy on the society from whence they were expelled. Those ministers of justice, who had courage to punish the crimes, and to brave the resentment, of the blues, became the victims of their indiscreet zeal; a prefect of Constantinople fled for refuge to the holy sepulchre, a count of the east was ignominiously whipped, and a governor of Cilicia was hanged, by the order of Theodora, on the tomb of two assassins whom he had condemned for the murder of his grandson, and a daring attack upon his own life. An aspiring candidate may be tempted to build his greatness on the public confusion, but it is the interest as well as duty of a sovereign to maintain the authority of the laws. The first edict of Justinian, which was often repeated, and sometimes executed, amounted to his first resolution to support the innocent, and to chastise the guilty, of every denomination and colour. Yet the balance of justice was still inclined in favour of the blue faction, by the secret affection, the habits, and the fears of the emperor; his equity, after an apparent struggle, submitted, without reluctance, to the decisions of Theodora, and the emperor never forgot, or forgave, the injuries of the comedian. At the accession of the younger Justin, the proclamation of equal and inviolate justice indirectly condemned the partiality of the former reigns. Ye blues, Justinian is no more! ye greens, he is still alive!'

A sedition, which almost laid Constantinople in ashes, was excited by the mutual hatred and momentary reconciliation of the two factions. In the fifth year of the reign of Justinian, the celebration of the festival of the ides of January: the games were incessantly disturbed by the clamorous discontent of the greens: till the twenty-second race, the emperor maintained his silent gravity; at length, yielding to his impatience, he condescended to hold, in abrupt sentences, and by the voice of a crier, the most singular dialogue that ever passed between a prince and his subjects. Their first complaints were respectful and modest; they accused the subordinate ministers of oppression, and proclaimed their wishes for the long life and victory of the emperor. Be it so, ye insolent raleers!' exclaimed Justinian: 'be mute, ye Jews, Samaritans, and Manicheans.' The greens still attempted to awaken his compassion. 'We are poor, we are innocent, we are injured, we dare not pass through the streets: a general persecution is exercised against our name and colour. Let us die, O emperor! but let us die by your command, and for your service 1. But the repetition of partial and inconstant censures, and the success of dangers, blunted their rage; the majesty of the purple; they renounced allegiance to the prince who refused justice to his people; lamented that the father of Justinian had been born; and branded his son with the obprobrious names of a homicide, an ass, and a pejured tyrant. 2 Do you desire four lives? 3 cried the indignant monarch; the blues rose with fury from their seats; their hostile clamours thundered in the hippodrome; and their adversaries, deserting the unequal contest, spread terror and despair through the streets of Constantinople. At this dangerous moment, seven notorious assassins of both factions, who had been condemned by the prefect, were carried round the city, and afterwards transported to the place of execution in the suburb of Pea. Four were immediately beheaded; a fifth was hanged: but when the same punishment was inflicted on the remaining two, the rope broke, they fell alive to the ground, and were afterwards consumed by the monks of St. Conon, issuing from the neighbouring convent, conveyed them in a boat to the sanctuary of the church. 4 As one of these criminals was of the blue and the other of the green livery, the two factions were equally provoked by the cruelty of the oppressor. The insurrection was concluded till they had delivered their prisoners, and satisfied their revenge. The palace of the prefect, who withstood the seditious torrent, was instantly burnt, his officers and guards were massacred, the prisons were forced open, and freedom was restored to those who chose voluntary death in the Hippodrome. A military force, which had been despatched to the aid of the civil magistrate, was fiercely encountered by an armed multitude, whose numbers and boldness continually increased; and the Heruli, the wildest barbarians in the service of the empire, overturned the priests and their relics, which, from a pious motive, had been rashly interposed to separate the bloody conflict. The tumult was exasperated by this sacrilege, the people fought with enthusiasm in the cause of God; the women, from the roofs and windows, showered stones on the heads of the pre-bracedites against the houses; and the furious flames, which had been kindled by the hands of citizens and strangers, spread without control over the face of the city. The conflagration involved the cathedral of St. Sophia, the baths of Zeuxippus, a part of the palace, from the first entrance to the altar of Mars, and the long porticoes from the palace to the forum of Constantine: a large hospital, with the sick patients, was consumed; many churches and stately edifices were destroyed, and an immense treasure of gold and silver was either melted or lost. From such scenes of horror and distress, the wise and wealthy citizens escaped over the Bosphorus to the Asiatic side; and during five days Constantiple was abandoned to the factions, whose watch-word, Nika, vanglish! has given a name to this memorable ad-

The fidelity of the guards was doubtful; but the military force of Justinian consisted in three thousand veterans, who had been trained to valour and discipline in the Persian and Illyrian wars. Under the command of Belisarius and Mundus, they they were heard with respect when the city was in flames; the questor, and the prefect, were instantly removed, and their offices were filled by two senators of blameless integrity. After this popular concession, Justinian proceeded to the hippodrome to confess his errors, and to pacify the sense of his unfortunate subjects; but they distrusted his assurances, though solemnly pronounced in the presence of the holy gos- pels; and the emperor, alarmed by their distrust, re- treated with precipitation to the strong fortress of the palace. The obstinacy of the tumult was now impetuous to a secret and active machination. It was entertained that the insurgents, more especially the green faction, had been supplied with arms and money by Hypatius and Pompey, two patricians, who could neither forget with honour, nor remember with safety, that they were the nephews of the emperor Anastasius. Cappledrosey, disgrace, and pardoned, by the jealousy of the monarch, they had appeared as loyal servants before the throne; and, dur- ing five days of the tumult, they were detained as impor- tant hostages; till at length, the fears of Justinian prevailing over his prudence, he viewed the two broth- ers in the Hippodrome, and sternly commanded them to depart from the palace. After a fruitless representation, that obedience might lead to involuntary treason, they retired to their houses, and in the morning of the sixth day Hypatius was sur- rounded and seized by the people, who, regardless of his virtues, or the imminent danger, expelled his favourite to the forum of Constantine, and instead of a diadem, placed a rich collar on his head. If the usurper, who afterwards pleaded the merit of his delay, had complied with the advice of the sena- te, and urged the fury of the multitude, their first irsuge- rious and fatal measure might have prevented his trembling competitor. The Byzantine palace enjoyed a free communication with the sea; vessels lay ready at the garden stairs; and a secret resolution was al- ready formed, to convey the emperor with his family and treasures to a safe retreat, at some distance from the capital. Justinian was lost, if the prostitute Firmans of Theodore, whom he raised from the theatre had not renounced the timidity, as well as the virtues, of her sex. In the midst of a council where Belisarius was present, Theodora alone displayed the spirit of a hero; and she alone, with the perseverance of her husband, could save the emperor from the imminent danger, and his unworthy fears. If flight," said the consort of Justinian, "were the only means of safety, yet I should disdain to fly. Death is the condition of our birth; but they who have resigned should never survive the loss of dignity and dominion. I implore Heaven, that I may never be seen, not a day, without my diadem and purple; that I may no longer behold the light, when I cease to be saluted with the name of queen. If you resolve, O Caesar! to fly, you have treasures; behold the sea, you have ships; but tremble lest the desire of life should expose you to wretched exile and ignomin- ious death. For my own part, I adhere to the maxim of antiquity, that the throne is a glorious sepulchre."

silently marched in two divisions from the palace, forced their obscure way through narrow passages, expiring flames, and falling edifices, and burst open at the same moment the two opposite gates of the hippodrome, at the same time as the frenzied and frightened crowd was incapable of resisting on either side a firm and regular attack; the blues signalized the fury of their repentance; and it is computed, that above thirty thousand persons were slain in the merciless and promiscuous carnage of the day. Hypatia was disregarded, and contemptible. The empress, with Pompey to the feet of the emperor; they compelled his implemency; but their crime was manifest, their innocence uncertain, and Justinian had been too much terrified to forgive. The next morning the two nephews of Anastasius, with eight thousand armed acolytes, the disorderly and licentious, in a consul rank, were privately executed by the soldiers; their bodies were thrown into the sea, their palaces razed, and their fortunes confiscated. The hippodrome itself was condemned, during several years, to a mournful silence; with the restoration of the games, the same disorders revived; and the blue and green factions continued to afflict the reign of Justinian, and to disturb the tranquillity of the eastern empire.

III. That empire, after Rome was barbarous, still embraced the nations whom she had conquered beyond the Hadranteum, and the Franks of Persia. Justinian reigned over sixty-four provinces, and nine hundred and thirty-five cities; his dominions were blessed by nature with the advantages of soil, situation, and climate; and the improvements of human art had been perpetually diffused along the coast of the Mediterranean and the banks of the Nile, from the ancient Troy to the Egyptian Thebais. Abraham, had been relieved by the well known plenty of Egypt; the same country, a small and populous tract, was still capable of exporting, each year, two hundred and sixty thousand pounds of corn. In Constantinople, and the capital of Justinian was supplied with the manufactures of Sidon, fifteen centuries after they had been celebrated in the poems of Homer. The annual powers of vegetation, instead of being exhausted by two thousand harvests, were renewed and invigorated by skillful husbandry, rich manures and seasonable repose. The breed of domestic animals was infinitely multiplied. Plantations, buildings, and the instruments of labour and luxury, which are more durable than the term of human life, were accumulated by the care of successive generations. Tradition preserved, and was simplified, the arts; society was enriched by the division of labour and the facility of exchange; and every Roman was lodged, clothed, and subsisted, by the industry of a thousand hands. The invention of the loom and distaff has been piously ascribed to the gods. In every age a variety of animal and vegetable productions, hair, skins, wool, flax, cotton, and at length silk, have been skillfully manufactured to hide or adorn the human body; they were stained with an infusion of permanent colours; and the pencil was successfully employed to improve the labours of the loom. In the choice of those colours which imitate the beauty of nature, the freedom of taste and fashion was indulged; but the deep purple which the Phœnicians extracted from a shellfish of Crete, and the green emerald of the empress of the emperor; and the penalties of treason were denounced against the ambitious subjects, who dared to usurp the prerogative of the throne.

I need not explain that silk is originally spun from the bowels of a caterpillar, and that it. The use of silk composes the golden tresses from whence the Romans, when a worm emerges in the form of a butterfly. Till the reign of Justinian, the silk-worms who feed on the leaves of the white mulberry-tree, were confined to China; those of the pine, the oak, and the ash, were common in the forests borders of the empire. Because of the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of being raised by the garment of the Medes and Assyrians, Virgil is the most ancient writer, who expressly mentions the soft wool which was combed from the trees of the Seres or Chinese; and this natural error, less marvellous than the truth, was slowly corrected by the discoveries which the first artificer of the luxury of nations. That rare and elegant luxury was censured, in the reign of Tiberius, by the graver of the Ionnans; and Pliny in affected though forcible language, has condemned the thirst of gain, which explored the last confines of the earth, for the precious precious metals, and the public eye naked draperies and transparent mantiments. A dress which showed the turn of the linns, and colour of the skin, might gratify vanity, or provoke desire; the silks which had been closely woven in China, were unrolled and unravelled by the Phœnician women, and the precious materials were multiplied by a looser texture, and the inextricability of linen threads. Two hundred years after the age of Pliny, the use of pure or even of mixed silks was confined to the female sex, till the opulent citizens of Rome and the provinces were invested with the privilege of wearing the Elagabalus, the first who, by this effeminat habit, had sullied the dignity of an emperor and a man. Aurelian complained, that a pound of silk was sold at Rome a For the history of insects, (for more wonderful than Orcid's metaphysics,) the silk-worm holds a conspicuous place. The bombax of the idle of Coss., as described by Pliny, (Hist. Nat. xiv. 26, 27, with the notes of the two learned Jesuits, Harrietin and Brander,) may be illustrated by a similar species in China: (Memoires des Chinois, tom. ii. p. 253-373,) but our silk-worm, as well as the white mulberry-tree, were unknown to Theophrastus and Pliny.

b According to a late and almost universally admitted opinion, the mulberry is a native of China, and was first cultivated there. A specimen brought from China to France by the Jesuits, and preserved by M. de La Caille, has given rise to several plants not so superior to some better known in China as have been cultivated in France, or even in China. The story of its cultivation in France is first told by M. de la Caille, in the Annals of the Academy of Sciences, for 1737. It was cultivated first by M. de la Caille himself, and by M. de la Caille, in the Annals of the Academy of Sciences, for 1737. It was cultivated first by M. de la Caille himself, and by the German botanists, Sirinon, and his son, after whom the genus is named. The first mulberry plant in France was introduced by M. de la Caille, from China, in 1737. He cultivated it in his garden, and the fruit was of a very sweet and tender quality. It was introduced into England by M. de la Caille, from China, in 1737. He cultivated it in his garden, and the fruit was of a very sweet and tender quality. The reader is referred to the notes and margin for the history of silk and the silk-worms. the whole latitude of Asia in two hundred and forty-

Asia; by the Persian merchants,4 who frequented the fares of Armenia and Nisibis: but this trade, which in the intervals of truce was oppressed by avarice and jealousy, was totally interrupted by the long wars of the rival monarchies. The great king might prudently number Sogdian caravans as his auxiliaries in his own dominion; his empire; but his real dominion was bounded by the Oxus, and his useful intercourse with the Sogdianos, beyond the river, depended on the pleasure of their conquerors, the white Huns and the Turks, who successively reigned on that industrious people. Yet the very extensive commerce has not extinguished the use of agriculture and commerce, in a region which is celbrated as one of the four gardens of Asia; the cities of Samarcand and Bochara are advantageously seated for the exchange of its various productions; and their merchants purchased from the Chinese the raw or manufactured silk which they transported into Persia for the use of the Roman empire. The vain capital of China, the Sogdian caravans were entertained as the suppliant embassies of tributary kingdoms, and if they returned in safety the bold adventure was rewarded with exorbitant gain. But the difficult and perilous route from Samarcand to Palmyra, Pamphylia, and Parthia, was not without its perils; for the Sogdianos, who could not be performed in less than sixty, eighty, or one they entered the desert; and the wand-ranger hordes, unless they are restrained by armies and garrisons, have aljects of their hostility, and the tyrants of Persia, the silk caravans explored a more southern road; they traversed the mountains of Tihet, descended the streams of the Ganges or the Indus, and patiently expected in the port of Guzerat and Malabar, the annual fleets of the west. But the paring the pacific and conquest, the Chinese and Persian discoveries, the and memoirs of Major Kennet. If he expands the sphere of his inquiries with the assistance of the Chinese and with the aid of English merchants, he will sucernment would have restored the trade of Egypt and the navigation of the Red sea, which had decayed with the prosperity of the empire; and the Roman vessels might have sailed, for the purchase of silk, to the ports of Ceylon. The emperor Justinian embraced a more humble expedient, and solicited the aid of his christian allies, the Ethiopians of Abyssinia, who had recently acquired the arts of navigation, the spirit of trade, and the sea-port of Adulis, still decorated with the trophies of a Grecian conqueror. Having made a treaty with them, Justinian contrived to secure in search of gold, emeralds, and aromatics; but they wisely declined an unequal competition, in which they must be always prevented by the vicinity of the Persians to the markets of India; and the emperor submitted to the disappointment, till his wishes were gratified by an unexpected event. The Gospel had been preached to the Indians; a bishop already governed the christians of St. Thomas on the pepper coast of Malabar; a church was planted in Ceylon, and the missionaries pursued the footsteps of commerce to the extremities of Asia. Two Persian monks had long resided in China, perhaps in the royal city of Nankin, the seat of a monarch addicted to foreign superstitions, and who actually received an embassy from the isle of Ceylon. Amidst their pious occupations, they viewed with a curious eye the common dress of officers and manufacturers, the revenue of silk-worms, the education of silk-worms, whose education (either on trees or in houses) had once been considered as the labour of queens. They soon discovered that it was impracticable to transport the short-lived insect, but that in the eggs a numerous progeny might be preserved and multiplied in a distant climate. Resolved or instructive, they had more power over the Persian monks than the love of their country; after a long journey, they arrived at Constantinople, imparted their project to the emperor, and were liberally encouraged by the gifts and promises of the oracle of Delphos. In the maintenance of that project, a campaign at the foot of mount Caucasus has seemed more deserving of a minute relation than the labours of these missionaries of commerce, who again entered China, deceived a jealous people by concealing the eggs of the silk-worm in a hollow cane, and returned in triumph to the East. From that point of the direction, the eggs were hatched at the proper season by the artificial heat of dung; the worms were fed with mulberry leaves; they lived and laboured in a foreign climate; a sufficient number of butterflies was saved to propagate the race, and trees were planted to supply the materials of the domestic manufactures. Experience and reflection corrected the errors of a new attempt, and the Segdoite ambassadors acknowledged, in the succeeding reign, that the Romans were not inferior to the natives of China in the education of the insects, and the manufactures of silk, in which both China and Constantinople have been surpassed by the industry of modern Europe. I am not insensible of the benefits of elegant luxury; yet I reflect with some pain, that if the importers of silk had introduced the art of printing, already practised by the Chinese, the comedies of Menander and the entire decades of Lycophron would have been perpetuated in the editions of the sixth century. A larger view of the globe might at least have promoted the improvement of speculative science, but the biblical geography was forcibly extracted from texts of Scripture, and the study of nature was the study of a foreign system. In China, Columbia, and the dox faith confined the habitable world to one temperate zone, and represented the earth as an oblong surface, four hundred days' journey in length, two hundred in breadth, encompassed by the ocean, and covered by the solid subterraneous permanent land. The subjects of Justinian were State of the dissatisfied with the times, and with the revenue. Government. Europe was over-run by the barbarians, and Asia by the monks: the poverty of the west discouraged the trade and manufactures of the east: the produce of the labours of the unfavourable servants of the church, the state and the army; and a rapid decrease was felt in the fixed and circulating capitals which constitute the national wealth. The public distress had been alleviated by the economy of Anastasius, and that prudent emperor accumulated an immense treasure. While he delivered his people from the most odious of oppressive taxes. Their gratitude universally applauded the abolition of the gold of alleviation, a personal tribute on the industry of the poor, but more tolerable, as it should seem, in the form than in the substance, since the flourishing city of Edessa afforded the annual amount required and the revenue was collected in four years from ten thousand artificers. Yet such was the parsimony which supported this liberal disposition, that, in a reign of twenty-seven years, Anastasius saved, from his annual revenue, the enormous sum of thirteen millions sterling, or three hundred and twenty thousand pounds of gold. This example was neglected, and his treasure was abused, by the nephew of Justinian. The riches of Justinian were speedily exhausted by alms and buildings, by ambitious wars, and ignominious treaties. His revenues were inadequate to his expenses. Every art was tried to extort from the people.

has been justly accused by the voice of the people and of posterity: but public discontent is erodable; private malice is bold; and a lover of truth will perceive with a deeper sense of weight the necessity of weighing the censuses. The secret historian represents only the vices of Justinian, and those vices are darkened by his mallevolent pencil. Ambiguous actions are imputed to the worst motives: error is confounded with guilt, accident with design, and laws with abuses; the partial injuries of the state have been dexterously applied to the general maxims of a reign of thirty-two years: the emperor alone is made responsible for the faults of his officers, the disorders of the times, and the corruption of his subjects; and even the calamities of nature, plagues, earthquakes and inundations, are imputed to the prince of the demons, who had mischievously assumed the form of Justinian.

After this precession, I shall briefly relate the anedotes of avarice and rapine, under the following heads.

Periogoeous |

— I. Justinian was so profuse that he could not be liberal. The civil and military officers, when they were admitted into the service of the palace, obtained an humble station and a moderate stipend; they ascended by seniority to a station of affluence and repose; the annual pensions, of which the most honourable class was abolished by Justinian, amounted to four hundred thousand pounds: and this distinction of rank of one hundred pounds per cent may be regarded as the last outrage on the majesty of the empire. The posts, the salaries of physicians, and the nocturnal illuminations, were objects of more general concern; and the cities might justly complain, that he usurped the municipal revenues which had before been devoted to these useful institutions. Even the soldiers were injured; and such was the decay of military spirit, that they were injured with impunity. The emperor refused, at the return of each fifth year, the customary donative of five pieces of gold, reduced his veterans to beg their bread, and suffered unpaid armies to mend their ways in the wars of Italy and Persia.

II. The humanity of his predecessors had always remitted, in some auspicious circumstance of their reign, the arrears of the public tribute; and they dexterously assumed the merit of resigning those claims which it was impracticable to enforce. Justinian, in the space of thirty-two years, has never granted a similar indulgence; and many of his subjects have renounced the possession of those lands whose value is insufficient to satisfy the demands of the treasury. To the cities which had suffered by hostile inroads, Anastasius promised a general exemption; and the provincials of Justinian have been ravaged by the Persians and Arabs, the Huns and Scythians; but his vain and ridiculous dispensation of a single year has been confined to those places which were actually taken by the enemy. Such is the language of the secret historian, who expressly declares that any indulgence was granted to Palestine after the revolt of the Samaritans; a false and odious charge, confined by the authentic record, which attests a relief of thirteen centenaries of gold (fifty-two thousand pounds) obtained for that desolate province by the intercession of St. Sabas.2

III. Procopius has not condescended to explain the system of taxation, which fell like a hail-storm upon the land, like a devastating pestilence on its inhabitants; but we should beware to be the accomplices of his malignity, when we imputed to Justinian alone the ancient though rigorous principle, that a whole diocese should be condemned to sustain the partial loss of the persons over whom he presided. The Apatroes, or supply of corn for the use of the army and capital, was a grievous and arbitrary exaction, which exceeded, perhaps, in a tenfold proportion, the ability of the farmer, and his distress was aggravated by the partial injustice of the government. As the produce of weight and labour of distant carriage, in a time of scarcity, an extraordinary requisition was made to the adjacent provinces of Thrace, Bithynia, and Phrygia; but the proprietors, after a wearisome journey and a perilous navigation, received so inadequate a compensation, that they would have chosen the alternative of delivering both the corn and price at the doors of their granaries. These precautions might indicate a tender solicitude for the welfare of the capital; yet Constantinople did not escape the rapacious despotism of Justinian. Till his reign, the straits of the Bosphorus and Hellasponzt were open to the freedom of trade, and nothing was prohibited except the exportation of arms for the service of the barbarians. At each of these gates of the city, a praetor was stationed, the minister of imperial avarice; heavy customs were imposed on the vessels and their merchandise; the oppression was retaliated on the helpless consumer; the poor were afflicted by the artificial scarcity, and exorbitant price, of the market; and a people accustomed to depend on the liberality of their prince, might sometimes complain of the deficiency of water and bread. The aerial tribute, without a name, a law, or a definite object, was an annual tax which served the purpose of military conscription, with the emperor accepted from his praetorian prefect; and the means of payment were abandoned to the discretion of that powerful magistrate.

IV. Even Monopolies such a tax was less intolerable than the privilege of monopolies, which checked the fair competition of industry, and, for the sake of a small and dishonest gain, imposed an arbitrary burthen on the wants and luxury of the subject. "As soon (I transcribe the anecdotes) as the exclusive sale of silk was usurped by the imperial treasurer, a whole people, the manufacturers of Tyre and Beryus, was reduced to extreme misery, and either perished with hunger, or fled to the hostile dominions of Persia." A province might suffer by the decay of its manufactures, but in this example of silk, Procopius has partially overlooked the inestimable and lasting benefit which the empire received from the curiosity of Justinian. His ingenuity, in the addition of one hundred miles to the ordinary price of cotton, ought to be diminished gain, imposed an arbitrary burthen on the wants and luxury of the subject. "As soon (I transcribe the anecdotes) as the exclusive sale of silk was usurped by the imperial treasurer, a whole people, the manufacturers of Tyre and Beryus, was reduced to extreme misery, and either perished with hunger, or fled to the hostile dominions of Persia." A province might suffer by the decay of its manufactures, but in this example of silk, Procopius has partially overlooked the inestimable and lasting benefit which the empire received from the curiosity of Justinian. His ingenuity, in the addition of one hundred miles to the ordinary price of cotton, ought to be expected with the same candour; and the alteration, which might be wise, appears to have been innocent; since he neither allowed the purity, nor enhanced the value, of the gold coin, the legal measure of public and private payments.

V. The Venuses. The tolls and impediments required by the farmers of the revenue to accomplish their engagements, might be placed in an odious light, as if they were had purchased from the emperor the lives and fortunes of their fellow-citizens. And a mere direct sale of honours and offices was transacted in the palace, with the permission, at least, of the circumstance of Justinian and Theodora. The claims of merit, even those of favour, were disregarded, and it was almost reasonable to expect, that the bold adventurer, who had undertaken the trade of a magistrate, should find a rich compensation for infamous labour, danger, the debts which he had contracted, and the heavy interest which he paid for his more than seven per cent. (Smith's 'Inquiry Into the Wealth of Nations,' vol. i, p. 45.) For Justinian's gold coin, see Evangelii (I. iv, c. 20).

1 John Malala (in his ii. c. 222) mentions the want of bread, and Zonaras (t. 3, ch. 9) that of wine; but Caspar, which Justinian, or his servants, sold in the aqueducts.

2 For an ounce, one sixteenth of an ounce of gold, instead of 210, or 200, he gave two ounces and a half, or even one ounce, of silver. A disproportionate rate of small sums was received, because the weight could not exceed 500 grains for 80 or more than seven pence. (Smith's 'Inquiry Into the Wealth of Nations,' vol. i, p. 45.)

3 The oath is conceived in the most enviable words. (Novell, vol. ii. ch. 2.) The defenders implore on themselves, quapro, have and penalties, to guard the integrity of his government; but at the end of a year of perjury, his rigorous edict was suspended, and corruption licentiously abused her power over the impotent laws of the empire.

VI. The testament of Eulalius, count of the domesticus, declared the emperor his sole heir, on condition, however, that he should discharge his debts and legacies, allow to his three daughters a decent maintenance, and bestow each of them in marriage, with a portion of ten pounds of gold. But the splendid fortune of Eulalius had been consumed by fire; and the inventory of his goods did not exceed the trifling sum of five hundred and sixty-four pieces of gold. A similar instance, in Greek history, admonished the emperor of the honourable part prescribed for his imitator. He checked the selfish murmurs of the treasury, applauded the confidence of his friend, discharged the legacies and debts, educated the three virgins under the eye of the empress Theodora, and doubled the marriage portion which had satisfied the tenderness of their father. The humanity of a prince (for princes cannot be generous) is entitled to some praise; yet even in this act of virtue we may discover the invertebrate custom of supplanting the legal or natural heirs, which Procopius imputes to the reign of Justinian. His charge is supported by eminent names and scandalous examples; neither widows nor orphans were spared; but a part of so-called, let alone supposed, testaments, was beneficently practised by the agents of the palace. This base and mischievous tyranny invades the security of private life; and the monarch who has indulged an appetite for gain will soon be tempted to anticipate the moment of succession, to the end of exercising his power in the exercise of it, from the claim of inheritance, to the power of confiscation. VII. Among the forms of rapine, a philosopher may be permitted to name the conversion of pagan or heretical riches to the use of the faithful; but in the tale of Justinian this holy plunder was condemned by the sectaries alone, who became the victims of his orthodox aversion. dishonour might be ultimately reflected on the character of Justinian; but much of the guilt, and still more of the profit, was involuntary. To what extent which we are able to attribute for their virtues, and not always selected for their talents. The merits of Trithonius the question will hereafter be weighed in the reform of the Roman law; but the economy of the east was subordinate to the praetorian prefect, and Procopius has justified his amiable a part of a task which appears to have become the peculiar history, of the notorious vices of John of Cappodocia. John of Cappadocia. His knowledge was not borrowed from the schools; and his style was scarcely legible; but he excelled in the powers of natural genius, to suggest the wise counsels, and to find expedients in the most desperate situations. The corruption of his heart was equal to the vigour of his understanding. He must have seen magic and pagan superstition, abstract insensible to the fear of God; or the approaches of man; and his aspiring fortune was raised on the deaths of thousands, the poverty of millions, the ruin of cities, and the desolation of provinces. From the dawn of light to the moment of dinner, he assiduously laboured to enrich his master and himself at the expense of the Roman world; and the remains of his reign in sensuous and obscene pleasures, and the silent hopes of the night were interrupted by the perpetual dread of the justice of an assassin. His abilities, perhaps his vices, recommended him to the lasting friendship of Justinian; the emperor yielded with reluctance to the fury of the people; his victory was displayed by the immediate restoration of their enemy; and they felt above the ten years, under his oppressive administration, that he was stimulated by revenge, rather than instructed by misfortune. Their murmurs served only to fortify the resolution of Justinian; but the prefect, in the insurrection of his victorious army, Eulalius, brilliant in mind, accompanied by companions of the court, and John, who might have known the value of oaths and promises, was tempted to accept a nocturnal, and almost unreasonable, interview with the wife of Belisarius. An ambuscade of guards and envoys had been posted by the court of Theodosius, and they rushed with drawn swords to seize or punish the guilty minister: he was saved by the fidelity of his attendants; but in stead of appealing to a grateful sovereign, who had privately warned him of his danger, he pusillanimously fled to the sanctuary of the church. The favour of Justinian was never secured to concord and domestic tranquility; the conversion of a prefect into a priest extinguished his ambitious hopes, but the friendship of the emperor alleviated his disgrace, and he retained in the mild exile of Cyzicus an ample portion of his riches. Such imperfect revenge could not satisfy the empress. The turn of the spectre of his old enemy, the bishop of Cyzicus, afforded a decent pretext; and John of Cappadocia, whose actions had deserved a thousand deaths, was at last condemned for a crime of which he was innocent. A great minister, who had been invested with the honours of the pontificate, was at last despoiled of his properties, and SECURED LIKE THE WIVES OF NULLIETORS: A TATTERED CLOAK WAS THE SOLE REMNANT OF HIS FORTUNES; HE WAS TRANSPORTED IN A BARK TO THE PLACE OF HIS BANISHMENT AT ANTIOPUS IN UPPER EGYPT, AND THE PREFECT OF THE EAST BEGGED THE RIVERS THROUGH THE CITIES WHICH HAD TROUBLED AT HIS NAME. DURING AN EXILE OF SEVEN YEARS, HIS LIFE WAS PROTRACTED AND THREATENED BY THE INGENIOUS CLEVER OF THEODORA; AND WHEN HIS DEATH PLIGHTED THE EMPEROR TO RECALL A SERVANT WHEN HE HAD ABANDONED WITH REGRET, THE AMBITION OF JOHN OF CAPPADOCIA WAS AS MEASURED AS THE AUDIENCE OF HIS PROFESSION. HIS SUCCESSORS CONVINCE THE SUBJECTS OF JUSTINIAN, THAT THE ARTS OF OPPRESSION MIGHT STILL BE IMPROVED BY EXPERIENCE AND INDUSTRY; THE HANDS OF A SYRIAN BANKER WERE INTRODUCED INTO THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE FINANCES; AND THE EXAMPLE OF JOHN WAS FOLLOWED. THE EMPIRE WAS SERVICED BY THE QUALITY, THE PUBLIC AND PRIVATE TREASURY, THE GOVERNORS OF PROVINCES, AND THE PRINCIPAL MAGISTRATES OF THE EASTERN EMPIRE.

V. The edicts of Justinian were call. His edicts and meditated with the blood and treasure of the architects.

a The chronology of Procopius is base and obscure; but with the aid of Pagi I can certify that John was appointed praetorian prefect of the east in the year 525; that he was removed in January 529; that he was restored before June 535—banished in 541—and recurred between June 540 and April 542. (Procop. Bap 185; 25; 32.) The list of his ten successors—a rapid series in a part of a single reign.) his people: but those stately structures appeared to announce the prosperity of the empire, and actually displayed the skill of their architects. Both the theory and practice of the arts which depend on mathematical science and mechanical power were cultivated under the patronage of the emperors; the fame of Archimedes was railed by Proclus and Anthemius; and if their miracles had been related by intelligent spectators, they might now enlarge the speculation, instead of exciting the distrust of philosophers. A tradition has prevailed, that the Roman fleet was reduced to ashes in the port of Syracuse by the burning-glasses of Archimedes: \(^1\) and it is asserted that a similar expedient was employed in the battle of Actium by Cleopatra, to defend her city from the walls of the harbour of Constantinople, and to protect his benefactor Anastasius against the hold enterprise of Vitalian. \(^2\) A machine was fixed on the walls of the city, consisting of an hexagon mirror of polished brass, with many smaller and movable polygons to receive and reflect the rays of the meridian sun: and a consuming flame was darded, to the distance, perhaps, of two hundred feet. \(^3\) The truth of these two extraordinary facts is invalidated by the silence of the most authentic historians; and the use of burning-glasses was never adopted in the attack or defence of places. Yet the admirable explication of difficulties toinas the celebration of Alexandria stated the possibility of such a mirror; and, since it is possible, I am more disposed to attribute the art to the greatest mathematicians of antiquity, than to give the merit of the fiction to the idle fancy of a monk or a sophist. According to another story, Proclus applied sulphur to the destruction of the Gothic fleet; \(^4\) in a modern imagination, the name of sulphur is instantly connected with the suspicion of gunpowder, and that suspicion is propagated by the secret arts of his disciple Anthemius. \(^5\) A citizen of Trallas in Asia had five sons, who were all distinguished in their respective professions. The eldest among them was Anthemius the mathematician and architect, reached the ears of the emperor Justinian, who invited him to Constantinople: and while the one instructed the rising generation in the schools of eloquence, the other filled the capital and provinces with more lasting monuments of his art and genius. \(^1\) This contention is inferred from Lucan (in Hærugia, c. 23) and Oates (i. iii. de Tranqueminentia, tom. i. p. 41, ed. Basil.) in the second century. A thousand years afterwards, it is positively affirmed by Zonaras, (p. 431.) on the death of Dion Cassius (ad finem libri ii., i19, &c.) Anastasius, (ad Finis, K. 395.) and the scholar of Lucian, See Fabrianci, (Robust. Grec., i. in. 22. tom. iii. p. 551,) which is not so much inferred from the testimony of the ancients.

Solomon, before twenty years had elapsed, was humbled by an earthquake, which overturned the eastern part of the temple, and destroyed the splendid edifice. The same desolate scene of ruin and desolation continued for the greater part of the eightieth year of the reign of the same monarch. The touching page of history is the more striking, because it is the last record of such a calamity as the temple of Solomon had sunk beneath the weight of ages.

The decline of the palace of the last and greatest of the Roman emperors in the East was marked by a similar fate. The palace of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, was the most magnificent edifice of the age. It occupied the whole of a square, the sides of which were each one hundred feet in length. From Belgrade to the Euxine, from the conflux of the Save to the mouth of the Danube, a chain of above thirteen fortified places was extended along the banks of the great river. Single watch-towers were changed into spacious citadels; vacant walls, which the engineers contrived in such a manner as to secure the integrity of the ground, were filled with colonies or garrisons; a strong fortress defended the ruins of Trajan’s bridge, and several military stations afforded to spread beyond the Danube the pride of the Roman name. But that name was divided of its territories; the barbarians, in their annual invasions, passed from the Danube and the Rhine, crossed the Rhodopes, entered the interior of the empire, and the Danubian provinces were lost, before these useless bulwarks; and the inhabitants of the frontier, instead of reposing under the shadow of the general defence, were compelled to guard, with incessant vigilance, their separate habitations.

The seclusion of ancient cities was replenished; the new foundations of Justinian required, perhaps too hastily, the epitaph of impregnable and powerful; and the ambitious place of his own nativity attracted the grateful reverence of the vassals of princes. Under the name of Justinian’s palaces, the obscure village of Touniaian became the seat of an archbishop and a patriarch; Thebais and Sardes, as they were called, took on the appearance of like provinces of Illyricum; and the corrupt appellation of Guisculdi still indicates, about twenty miles to the south of Sophia, the residence of a Turkish sultan. For the use of the emperor’s countrymen, a cathedral, a palace, and an aqueduct, were speedily constructed; the public and private buildings were adapted to the greatness of a royal city; and the strength of the walls resisted, during the life-time of Justinian, the unskilful assaults of the Huns and Slavonians. Their progress was sometimes retarded, and their hopes of rapine were disappointed, by the innumerable columns, which in the provinces of Dacia, Epirus, Thessaly, Macedonia, and Thrace, appeared to cover the whole face of the country. Six hundred of these forts were built or repaired by the emperor; but it seems reasonable to believe, that the far greater part consisted only of a stone or brick tower, in the midst of a square or circular area, which was surrounded by a wall and ditch, and afforded in a moment of danger some protection to the peasants and cattle of the neighbouring villages. Yet these military works, which exhausted the public treasure, could not remove the just apprehensions of Justinian and his European subjects. The Danube was as impetuous as ever; and the towns were rendered as safe as they were salutary; but the rich provinces of Thessalonica were farmed by the Sacytan cavalry; the delicious vale of Tempe, three hundred miles from the Danube, was continually alarmed by the sound of war; and no unfortified spot, however distant from the Roman world, could securely enjoy the blessings of peace. The straits of Thermopylae, which seemed to protect, but which had so often betrayed, the safety of Greece, were diligently strengthened by the labours of Justinian. From the edge of the sea, like France in the time of the Roman inroads—never so weak when every village was fortified.

In 532, Procopius affine is the Danube was stopped by the means of the bridge. Had Apollodorus, the architect, left a description of his work, as rich in the details of his inventions, as that of his buildings, it would have been corrected by the genuine picture. Trajan’s bridge consisted of twenty or twenty-two stone piles with wooden arches; the river is now fourteen, the embankments are still, and the whole interval is no more than 413 (Reimar ad Don. from Marsigli) or 415 feet.

shore, through the forests and valleys, and as far as the summit of the Thessalian mountains, a strong wall was raised, which occupied every practicable entrance. Indeed, of a hasty crown of earth and piling a wall, two thousand soldiers were stationed along the rampart; granaries of corn, and reservoirs of water, were provided for their use; and by a precaution that inspired the cowardice which it foresaw, convenient fortresses were erected for their retreat. The walls of Corinth, also, by an eyewitness, and the murderous bulwarks of Athens and Platea, were carefully restored; the barbarians were disencouraged by the prospect of successive and painful sieges; and the naked cities of Peloponnesus were covered by the fortifications of the instants of Corinth. At the extremity of Evia, and near the town of Trikes, a monstrous, runs three days' journey into the sea, to form, with the adjacent shores of Asia, the straits of the Hellespont.

The intervals between eleven populous towns were filled by lofty woods, fair pastures, and arable lands; and the isthmus, of thirty-seven stadia in length, had been fortified by a Spartan general nine hundred years before the reign of Justinian. In an age of freedom and valour, the slightest rampart may prevent a surprise; and Procopius appears insensible of the superiority of ancient times, while he praises the solid construction of the wall, the unbroken parapet of which stretched on either side into the sea: but whose strength was deemed insufficient to guard the Chersonesus, if each city, and particularly Gallipoli and Scutus, had not been secured by their peculiar fortifications. The long wall, as was characteristically styled, was a work, as disgraceful in the object, as it was respectable in the execution. The riches of a capital diffuse themselves over the neighbouring country, and the territory of Constantinople, a paradise of nature, was adorned with the luxurious gardens and villas of the great and the splendid citizens: their vantage points served only to attract the bold and rapacious barbarians: the noblest of the Romans, in the bosom of peaceful indolence, were led away into Sasanian captivity, and their sovereign might view, from his palace, the hostile flames which were insolently spread to the gates of the imperial city. At the distant extremity of forty miles, Anastasius was constrained to establish a last frontier; his long wall, of sixty miles from the Propontis to the Exuniae, proclaimed the impotence of his arms; and as the danger became more imminent, new fortifications were added by the indefatigable prudence of Justinian and Sforas.

Secrecy of Asia

Asia Minor, after the submission of the Isaurians, remained without enemies and without fortifications. Those bold savages, who had disdained to be subjugated by Gallienus, persisted two hundred and thirty years in a life of independence and rapine. The most successful princes respected the strength of the mountains and the desolation of the natives; their fierce spirit was sometimes soothed with gifts, and sometimes restrained by terror; and a military count, with three legions, fixed his camp in an ignominious station in the heart of the Roman provinces. But no sooner was the vigour of power relaxed or diverted, than the light-armed squadrons descended from the hills, and invaded the peaceful plenty of Asia. Although the Isaurians were not remarkable for stature or bravery, yet rendered them bold, and experience made them skilful in the exercise of predatory war. They advanced with secrecy and speed to the attack of villages and defenceless towns; their flying parties have sometimes touched those of Tarsus, Antioch, or Damascus; and the spell was lodged in their inaccessible mountains, before the Roman troops had received their orders, or the distant province had computed its loss. The guilt of rebellion and robbery excluded them from the rights of national enemies; and the vengeance of the public, or the private trial and punishment of an Isaurian, even on the festival of Easter, was a meritorious act of justice and piety. If the captives were condemned to domestic slavery, they maintained with their sword or dagger, the private quarrel of their masters; and it was found expedient to send them to the East even without an army, to supply us with the services of such dangerous retainers. When their countryman Tararesius or Zeno ascended the throne, he invited a faithful and formidable band of Isaurians, who insulted the court and city, and were rewarded by an annual tributary fund for five thousand pounds of gold and the hopes of fortune depopulated the mountains, luxury eroded the hardness of their minds and bodies, and in proportion as they mixed with mankind, they became less qualified for the enjoyment of poor and solitary liberty. After the death of Zeno, his successor Anastasius solicited the services of whose soldiers were exposed to the revenge of the people, hasted them from Constantinople, and prepared to sustain a war, which left only the alternative of victory or servitude. A brother of the last emperor usurped the title of Augustus, his cause was powerfully supported by the arms, the measures, and the magazine, collected by Zeno; and the native Isaurians must have formed the smallest portion of the hundred and fifty thousand barbarians, under his standard, which was sancified, for the first time, by the presence of a fighting bishop. Their leaders accompanied the army, and were invincible in the plains of Phrygia by the valour and discipline of the Gods; but a war of six years almost exhausted the courage of the emperor. The Isaurians retired to their mountains; their fortresses were successively besieged and ruined; their communication with the sea was cut off; five thousand pounds of gold and the leaders died in arms; the surviving chiefs, before their execution were dragged in chains through the hippodrome; a colony of their youth was transplanted into Thrace, and the remnant of the people submitted to the Roman government. Yet some generations elapsed before the original chiefs were replaced by Isaurians. The populous villages of Mount Tauris were filled with hersemen and archers; they resisted the imposition of tributes, but they recruited the armies of Justinian; and his civil magistrate, the procurator of Cappadocia, the count of Isauria, and the praeors of Lyconia and Pisidus, were invested with military power to restrain the licentious practice of rapes and assassinations. If we extend our view from the tropic to the mouth of the Taurus, we may observe, on one hand, the precarious condition of the Isaurian frontier; and on the other hand, the long walls which we contemplate.

struck in Crimea for the protection of the friendly Goths, a colony of three thousand shepherds and warriors. From that peninsula to Trebizond, the eastern coast was at that time generally unfrequented, either by force or by religion: and the possession of Lazico, the Colchis of ancient, the Mingrelia, of modern geography, soon became the object of an important war. Trebizond, in after-times the seat of a romantic empire, was indebted to the liberality of Justinian for a church, an apse, an altar, and the sacred food; and his Edifice is still solid. From that maritime city, a frontier-line of five hundred miles may be drawn to the fortress of Cireesium, the last Roman station on the Euphrates. Above Trebizond immediately, and for five days' journey to the south, the country rises into dark forests and enervating mists. But the country of Lazico, of Zanians, and seven fortresses were built in the most accessible passes, to exclude the ambition of the Persian monarch. The principal source of the Euphrates descends from the Chalybean mountains, and seems to flow towards the west and the Euxine; bending to the southward. This, as the coast of Scythia, and Melitene, (which were restored by Justinian as the bulwarks of the lesser Armenia,) and gradually approaches the Mediterranean sea; till at length, repelled by mount Taurus, the Euphrates inclines his long and flexible course to the south-east and the gulf of Persia. Among the Roman cities beyond the Euphrates, we distinguish two principal foundations, which were named from Theodosius, and the relics of the martyrs; and two capitals, Amida and Edessa, which are celebrated in the history of every age. Their strength was proportioned by Justinian to the danger of the Persians, and the humbler population of that hospitable valley was sufficient to resist the ardent forces of the cavalry of Scythia; but more elaborate works were required to sustain a regular siege against the arms and treasures of the great king. His skilful engineers understood the methods of constructing deep mines, and of raising platforms to the level of the rampart; he shook the strong foundations of the enemy's engines, and sometimes advanced to the assault with moveable turrets on the backs of elephants. In the great cities of the east, the disadvantage of space, perhaps of position, was compensated by the zeal of the people, who seconded the garrison in the defence of their country and religion: and the fabulous prince, who founded the kingdom of God, that Edessa should never be taken, filled the citizens with valiant confidence, and chilled the besiegers with doubt and dismay. The subordinate towns of Armenia and Mesoopotamia were diligently strengthened, and the posts which appeared to have obtained a permanent hold were substantially occupied by numerous forts, substantially built of stones, and more hastily erected with the obvious materials of earth and brick. The eye of Justinian investigated every spot; and his cruel precautions might attract the war into some lonely vale, whose peaceful natives, connected by trade and remembrance, were ignorant of national discord and the quarrels of princes. We have heard of the Euphrates, a sandy desert extends above six hundred miles to the red sea. Nature had interposed a vacant solitude between the ambition of two rival empires: the Armenians, till Mahomet arose, were formidable only against the Persians; and the proud security of peace, the fortifications of Syria were re-erected on the most vulnerable side.

But the national enmity, at least the effects of that enmity, had been suspended for fourteen years. An ambassador from the emperor Zeno accompanied the rash and unfortunate Perozes, in his expedition against the Nephthales or White Huns, whose conquests had been stretched from the Caspian to the heart of India, whose throne was enriched with emeralds; and whose cavalry was supported by a line of two thousand elephants. The Persians were twice circumvented, in a situation which made valour useless and flight impossible; and the double victory of the Huns, was achieved by military stratagem. They dismissed their royal captive after he had submitted to adore the majesty of a barbarian; and the Huns proceeded, and the humbler horde of the steppe was no longer able to resist or to resist. After the death of Perozes, the Persians discovered, and twelve years of confusion elapsed before his son Cabades or Kohad could embrace any designs of ambition or revenge. The unkind parsi—The Persian war, men of Anastasius was the motive or A.D. 502—505.

1 Perozes (Perseus, 1. i. c. 121.) tells the story with the taste, half sceptical, half superstitious, of Herodotus. The promise was in the primitive lives of Edessa, but dates at least from the year 400; and the third lie, the Persian lions soon raised on the stage of his great life (Perseus, 1. i. c. 27.) As Edessa has been taken, Tillotson must not condemn the Persians for the promise. (Cyrop.)

The prince, fearing that this impregnable fortress had been constructed in manifest violation of the treaty of peace between the two empires.

Between the Euxine and the Caspian, the Caspian is the countries of Colchoes, Iberia, and Al-Perisian gates. The Caspian was a large, and the chief entrance of the Persians. and the two principal gates, or passes, from north to south, have been frequently con founded in the geography both of the ancients and moderns. The name of Caspian or Albanian gates is properly applied to Derbend, which occupies a short defile between the banks of the Derbend and the Caspian, the indecency of the women on the ramparts, who had revealed their most secret charms to the eyes of the assailants. At length, in a silent night, they ascended the most accessible tower, which was guarded only by some monks, opposed, after the duties of a festival, with sleep and wine. Scaling ladders were applied at the dawn of day; the presence of Cabades, his storm command, and his drawn sword, compelled the Persians to vanquish; and before it was sacked, four-score thousand of the inhabitants had escaped the hands of death. In the fourth year of Alexander, the war continued three years, and the unhappy frontier tasted the full measure of its calamities. The gold of Anastasius was offered too late, the number of his troops was defeated by the number of their generals; the country was stripped of its inhabitants, and bathed in the blood of the defeated. Armenia from the mountainous chain and the wild beasts of the desert. The resistance of Edessa, and the deficiency of spoil, inclined the mind of Cabades to peace; he sold his conquests for an exorbitant price; and the same line, though marked with slaughter and devastation, still separated the two empires. To avoid the repetition of the same disasters, Anastasius resolved to found a new colony, so strong, that it should defy the power of the Persian, so far advanced towards Assyria, that its stationary troops might defend the province by the menace of operations on their Fortifications of a given wall. For this purpose, the town of Daras, four-score miles from Niishis, and four days' journey from the Tigris, was peopled and adorned; the hasty works of Anastasius were improved by the perseverance of Justinian; and without insisting on places less important, the fortifications of Daras may represent an architectural type of the age. The city was surrounded by two walls, and the interval between them, of fifty paces, afforded a retreat to the cattle of the besieged. The inner wall was a monument of strength and beauty; it measured sixty feet from the ground, and the height of the towers was one hundred and sixty feet. The platforms were large enough to accommodate the number of men who might be annoyed with missile weapons, were small, but numerous: the soldiers were planted along the rampart, under the shelter of double galleries, and a third platform, spacious and secure, was raised on the summit of the towers. The exterior wall appears to have been less lofty but more solid; and each tower was protected by a quadrangular bulwark. A hard rocky soil resisted the tools of the miners, and on the south-east, where the ground was more tractable, their approach was retarded by a new work, which advanced in the shape of a half-circle. The ditches and two cuttings were filled with a stream of water; and in the management of the river, the most skilful labour was employed to supply the inhabitants, to distress the besiegers, and to prevent the mischiefs of a natural or artificial inundation. Daras continued more than sixty years to fulfill the wishes of its founders, and to provoke life, the genius of ages and millions. Our sense of the dignity of human nature is exalted by the simple recollective it, that Isocrates was the companion of Plato and Xenophon; that he assisted, perhaps, with the historian Thucydides, at the first representations of the Edipus of Sophocles and the Epigones of Eurip-dides; that he joined both in the entertainment of Aristotle, the master of Theophrastus, who taught at Athens with the founders of the Stoic and Epicurean sects.6 The ingenuous youth of Athens enjoyed the benefits of their democratic education, which was considerably inferior to the rival systems. Two thousand disciples heard the lessons of Theophrastus; the schools of rhetoric must have been still more populous than those of philosophy; and a rapid succession of students diffused the fame of their teachers as far as the utmost limits of the Greek language and muse. These limits were enlarged by the victories of Alexander; the arts of Athens survived her freedom and dominion; and the Greek colonies which the Macedonians planted in Egypt, and scattered over Asia, undertook long and frequent pilgrimages to worship the Muses in their favourite temple on the banks of the Euxine, and to borrow some of the preciousIsocrates, who listened to the instructions of their subjects and captives; the names of Cicero and Horace were enrolled in the schools of Athens; and after the perfect settlement of the Roman empire, the natures of Italy, of Africa, and of Britain, intrusted in the groves of the masters with their fellow-students of the east. The studies of philosophy and eloquence are congenial to a popular state, which encourages the freedom of inquiy and, submits only to the force of persuasion. In the republics of Greece and Rome, the art of speaking was the powerful engine of patriotism or ambition; and the Aristo cians are still worthy of the attention which the state-men and legislators. When the liberty of public debate was suppressed, the orator in the honourable profession of an advocate, might plead the cause of innocence and justice; he might abuse his talents in the more profitable trade of pamphleteer; and the death of Per-tonius was not less effectual than that of Sene c, to humble a tyrant by the discovery of his impotence.
The light of science could not indeed be confined within the walls of Athens. Her incomparable writers addressed themselves to the human race; the living masters emigrated to Italy and Asia; and the equally illustrisous times, was devoted to the study of the law; astronomy and physics were cultivated in the museum of Alexandria; but the Attic schools of rhetoric and philosophy maintained their superior reputation from the Peloponnesian to the age of Justinian. Athens, though situate in a barren soil, possessed a treasure of navigation, and the monuments of ancient art.
That sacred retirement was seldom disturbed by the business of trade or government; and the last of the Athenians were distinguished by their lively wit, the purity of their taste and language, their social manners, and some traces, at least in discourse, of the magnificity of their fathers. In the suburbs of the city, and near the sanctuary of Asclepius and the col-pies, the portico of the Nymphs, the garden of the Epicureans, were planted with trees and decorated with statues; and the philosophers, in aim of being housed in a cloister, delivered their instructions in specious and pleasant walks, which, at different hours, were crowded with listeners from the nearer and more temporary. The genius of the founders still lived in these venerable seats; the ambition of succeeding to the masters of human reason, excited a generous emulation; and the merit of the candidates was determined, on each vacancy, by the free votes of an enlightened people.
The Athenian public opinion by their disciples; according to their mutual wants and abilities, the price appears to have varied from a mite to a tal-et; and be ocrates himself, who decides the avarice of the sophists, required, in his school of rhetoric, about thirty pounds from each of his hundred pupils. The wages of industry are just and honourable, yet the usefulness of the arts is but little felt or admired; the Muses might blush when he was hired to reach the contempt of money; and I should be sorry to discover, that Aristotle or Plato so far degenerated from the example of Socrates, as to exchange knowledge for gold. But some property of lands and houses was not deprived by the foundations of the laws, and the legacies of deceased friends, on the philosophic chairs of Athens. Epicurus bequeathed to his disciples the gardens which he had purchased for eighty min two hundred and fifty pounds, with a fund sufficient for their frugal subsistence and monthly festivals; the attainments and the patronage of Plato afforded an annual profit, which, in eight centuries, was gradually increased from three to one thousand pieces of gold.7 The schools of Athens were protected by the wisest and most virtuous of the Roman princes. The library which Hadrian founded was placed in a portico adored with statues, and a roof of alabaster, and supported by one hundred columns of Phrygian marble.
The public salaries were assigned by the generous spirit of the Antonines; and each professor, of polities, of rhetoric, of the Platonic, the Peripatetic, the Stoic, and the Epicurean philosophy, received an annual stipend of two thousand pounds sterling.
The death of Marcus, these liberal donations, and the privileges attached to the honor of science, were abolished and revived, diminished and enlarged; but some vestige of royal bounty may be found under the successors of Constantine; and their arbitrary choice of an univer-sable candidate might tempt the philosophers of Athens to regret the days of independence and poverty.1 It is remarkable, that the impartial favour of the Antonines was bestowed on the four adverse sects of philosophy, which they considered as equally useful, or at least necessary for all the operations of human reason, the glory and the reproach of his country; and the first lessons of Epicurus so strongly scandalized the pious ears of the Athenians, that by his exile and that of his antagonists, they silenced all vain disputes concerning the nature of the gods. But in the ensuing year they recalled the hasty decree, restored the liberty of the schools, and were convinced, by the experience of ages, that the moral character of philosophers is not affected by the diversity of their theological speculations. They are superintended by Justinian.

Chap. I.

The Gothic arms were less fatal to the schools of Athens than the establishment of a new religion, whose ministers superseded the exercise of reason, resolved every question by an article of faith, and condemned the mild or sceptic to eternal flames. In many a volume of laborious controversy, they exposed the weakness of the uneness of the human intellect; its feebleness, its insignificance, and its susceptibility to every delusion. The philosophers were not contradicted, but their views were deeply perhaps than became their profession, with the plausibility of wives and concubines, the incestuous marriages, and the custom of exposing dead bodies to the dogs and vultures, instead of hiding them in the earth, or consuming them with fire. Their reputation was not impaired by the expression of personal opinions; but they declared that they had rather die on the borders of the empire than enjoy the wealth and favour of the barbarian. From this journey, however, they derived a benefit which reflects the happiest lustre on the character of Chosroes. He realized the golden chain of nations, which by this sages who had visited the court of Persia, should be exempted from the penal laws which Justinian enacted against his pagan subjects; and this privilege, expressly stipulated in a treaty of peace, was guarded by the vigilance of a powerful mediator. Simplicius and The last of the schools of philosophy, flourished in peace and obscurity; and as they left no disciples, they terminate the long list of Greek philosophers, who may be justly praised, notwithstanding their defects, viz. the wisest and most virtuous of their contemporaries. The writings of Simplicius are now extant. His work, which was of great importance in the history of ancient philosophy, has been insensibly torn from the library of nations, as a classic book, most excellently adapted to direct the will, to purify the heart, and to confirm the understanding, by a just confidence in the wisdom of God and man.

About the same time that Pythagoras The Roman first invented the appellation of philosopher, the consulship was decorated by Justinian. It was founded at Rome by the elder Brutus. A.D. 540. The revolutions of the consular office, which may be viewed in the successive lights of a substance, a shadow, and a name, have been occasionally mentioned in the present history. The first magistrates of the republic had been chosen by the people, to exercise, in the senate and in the camp, the powers of peace and war, which were afterwards assigned to the emperors. But the tradition of ancient dignity was long revered by the Romans and barbarians. A Gothic historian applauds the consulship of Theodoric as the height of all temporal glory and greatness; the king of Italy himself congratulates those annual favourites of the people, who were elected to the command of the forces of the throne; and at the end of a thousand years, two consuls were created by the sovereigns of Rome and Constantinople, for the sole purpose of giving a date to the year, and a festival to the people, but the expenses of this festival, in which the wealthy and the vain aspired to surpass their predecessors, insensibly arose to the enormous sum of fourscore thousand pounds; the wisest senators declined a useless honour, which involved the certain ruin of their families; and to this reluctance I should impute the frequency of the elections, which would then have fallen to the emperors. The predecessors of Justinian had assisted from the public treasures the dignity of the less eminent candidates; the avarice of that prince preferred the cheaper and more convenient method of advice and regulation, and seven procurators of the imperial treasury to which his edict confined the horse and chariot races.

the athletic sports, the music, and pantomimes of the theatre, and the hunting of wild beasts; and small pieces of silver were discreetly substituted to the gold medals, which had always excited tumult and drunkenness, when they were scattered with a profuse liberality. The public safety, the success of military precautions, and his own example, the succession of consuls finally ceased in the thirteenth year of Justinian, whose despotic temper might be gratified by the silent extinction of a title which adorned the Romans of their ancient freedom. Yet the annual consulship other than to exact the taxes of the provinces by the 20th of Prair. four times, as that of 3000 pounds of gold, but it was at length purchased, at the price of four hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling, the benefit of a precarious truce, which, in the language of both nations, was dignified with the appellation of the endless peace. The safety of the east enabled the emperor to employ his forces against the Vandals; and the internal distress of Africa afforded an honourable motive, and promised a powerful support to the Roman arms.

According to the testament of the fourth state of the Vander, the African kingdom had literally slain, descended to Hilderic the eldest of the Vandals. Hilderic's death was ascribed to the son of a tyrant, the grandson of a conqueror, to prefer the councils of clemency and peace; and his accession was marked by the salutary edict, which restored two hundred bishops to their churches, and allowed the free profession of the Arian creed. But the emperors accepted the political and religious advantages so inadequately to their pretensions, and the virtues of Hilderic offended the prejudices of his countrymen. The Arian clergy presumed to insinuate that he had renounced the faith, and the soldiers more loudly complained that he had degenerated from the courage of his ancestors. His ambassadors were suspected of a secret and disgraceful negociation in the Byzantine court; and his general, the Achilles, who was named of the Vandals, lost a battle against the naked and disorderly Moors. The public discontent was exasperated by Gelimer, whose Gelimer, age, descent, and military fame, gave him an apparent title to the succession; he assumed, with the consent of the nation, the reins of government; and his unfortunate sovereign sunk without a struggle from the throne to a dungeon, a heap where he was strictly guarded with a faithful counsellor, and his unpopular nephew the Achilles of the Vandals. In two successive embassies, he admonished the usurper to repent of his treason, or to abstain, at least, from any further violence, which might provoke the displeasure of God and the Romans; to reverence the laws of kindred and civilization, and to assure an inoffensive old man peaceably to end his days, either on the schools of jurisprudence. After Rome herself had been stripped of the imperial purple, the princes of Constantinople assumed the sole and sacred sceptre of the monarchy; demanded, as their rightful inheritance, the provinces of the Germanic empire; and were respected or possessed by the Caesars; and feebly aspired to deliver their faithful subjects of the west from the usurpation of heretics and barbarians. The execution of this splendid design was in some degree reserved for Justinian. During the five years of his reign, he reluctantly waged war, and supported his army against the Persians; till his pride submitted to his ambition, and he purchased, at the price of four hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling, the benefit of a precarious truce, which, in the language of both nations, was dignified with the appellation of the endless peace. The safety of the east enabled the emperor to employ his forces against the Vandals; and the internal distress of Africa afforded an honourable motive, and promised a powerful support to the Roman arms.

5 According to Julius Africanus, &c. the world was created the first of September, 5500 years, three months, and twenty-five days before the death of Jesus Christ, in A.D. 63, according to the Alexandrine chronology. (B. xvi. c. 28.) and this area has been used by the Greeks, the Oriental christians, and even by the Romans, till the reign of Peter I. The period, however arbitrary, is clear and convenient. Of the 779 years which are supposed to elapse since the creation, we shall find 3000 of them in the history of the Jews, 3746 in the history of the Christians, and 74 days in the history of the ancient history, commencing with the Persian empire, and the republic of Greece and Rome. (Procopius, c. 9—33.) and 1000 from the fall of the Roman empire to the west to the discovery of America; and the remaining 296 will almost complete three centuries of the modern state of Europe and mankind. I regret these calculations, so far preferable to our doubtful and perplexed method of counting backwards and forwards the years between two periods, as they do not come in convenient collections.

6 The area of the world has prevailed in the east since the sixth general council. (A. d. 551.) Christianity was first invented in the sixth century: it was propagated in the eighth by the authority and writings of venerable Bede; but it was not till the tenth that the use became legal and popular. See Plut. de verider

The people of Carthage, or in the palace of Constantinople.

The pass us or even the prudence of Gelimer compelled him to reject these requests, which were urged in the holiest tone of menace and command; and he justified his ambition in a language rarely spoken in the Byzantine court, by alleging the right of a free people to remove or punish the irreligious magistrates, who had by the usurpation of their function not only exalted, but hurled from their seats. This fruitless expostulation, the captive monarch was more rigorously treated, his nephew was deprived of his eyes, and the cruel Vandal, confident in his strength and distance, denied the vain requests and slow preparations of the emperor of the east. Justinian resolved to deliver or revenge his foe. Gibraltar was raised to maintain his usurpation; and the war was prepared, according to the practice of civilized nations, by the most solemn protestations, that each party was sincerely desirous of peace.

The report of an African war was gratefully only to the vain and idle populace of Constantinople, whose poverty exempted them from tribute, and whose cowardice was sold to exposing to military service. But the wiser citizens, who judged of the future by the past, revolted in their memory the history of their brethren and enemies, which the empire had sustained in the expedition of Basiliscus.

The troops, which after five laborious campaigns, had been recalled from the Persian frontier, dreaded the sea, the climate, and the arms of an unknown enemy. The ministers of the Emperor counselled, as far as they could, to avoid the demands of the African war; the taxes which must be raised and levied to supply those insatiate demands; and the danger lost their own lives, or at least their lucrative employments, should be made responsible for the deficiency of the supply. Inspired by such selfish motives, (for we may not suspect him of being unwise or bad,) Justinian, who had ventured to oppose in full council the inclinations of his master, he confessed that a victory of such importance could not be too dearly purchased; but he represented in a grave discourse the certain difficulties and the uncertain event. "You undertake," said the prefect, "to besiege Carthage by land; the distance is not less than one hundred and forty days' journey; on the sea, a whole year must elapse before you can receive any intelligence from your fleet. If Africa should be reduced, it cannot be preserved without the additional conquest of Sexily and Italy. Success will impose the obligation of new labours; a single failure will attract the barbarians into the heart of your exhausted empire." Justinian felt the weight of this salutary advice; he was confounded by the unwonted freedom of an obsequious servant; and the design of the war would perhaps have been relinquished, if his courage had not been revived by a voice which silenced the doubts of profound reason. "I have seen a vision," cried an artful or fanatic bishop of the east. "It is the will of heaven, O emperor! that you should not abandon your holy enterprise for the deliverance of the African church. The God of battle has resolved to match before your standard, and disperse your enemies, who are the enemies of your Son." The emperor might be tempted, and his counsellors were constrained, to give credit to this seasonsable revelation; but they derived more rational hope from the revolt, which the adherents of Hildecir or Athanasius had already excited in the borders of the Vandal monarchy. Pelentius, an African subject, had privately signified his loyal intentions, and a small military aid restored the province of Tripoli to the obedience of the Romans. The government of Sardinia had been intrusted to Gods, a valiant barbarian; he suspended the payment of tribute, disenchained his allegiance to the usurper, and called an audience to the counsels of Justinian, who found him master of that fruitful island, at the head of his guards, and proudly invested with the insignia of royalty. The forces of the Vandals were diminished by discord and suspicion; the Roman armies were animated by the spirit of Belisarius; one of those heroic names which are familiar to every European, and which the scribe may be permitted to apply to the monitory servitor of his master.

The Africanus of new Rome was born, Character and perhaps educated, among the Thrae, or Thracian pretenss without any of those advantages which had formed the virtues of the elder and the younger Scipio; a noble origin, liberal studies, and the education of a prince to the duties of his station. The service of Belisarius may be admitted, to prove that the youth of Belisarius could not afford any subject of praise; he served, most assuredly with valor and reputation, among the private guards of Justinian; and when his patron became emperor, the domestic was promoted to military command. After a bold inroad into Persia, in which his glory was shared by a colleague, and his progress was checked by an enemy, Belisarius repaired to the important station of Dara, where he first accepted the service of the Persians, the faithful companion of his master.

The Mirrors of Persia advanced, with forty thousand of her best troops, to rage the Persian war, at the fortifications of Dara; and signified the A.D. 529-532, day and the hour on which the citizens should prepare a bath for his refreshment after the toils of victory. He was received with cheerfulness; the common day equal to himself, by the new title of general of the east; his superior in the science of war, but much inferior in the number and quality of his troops, which amounted only to twenty-five thousand Romans and strangers, relaxed in their discipline, and humbled by recent disasters. As the level plain of the Euphrates, the desert of Dara to the relief of the province; the whole summer, the designs of the enemy were baffled by his skilful dispositions; he pressed their retreat, occupied each night their camp of the preceding day, and would have secured a bloodless victory, if he could have resisted the impatience of his own troops. Their valiant promise was faintly supported in the hour of battle; the right wing was exposed by the treacherous or cowardly desertion of the Christian Arabs; the Huns, a veteran band of eight hundred warriors, were oppressed by superior number, and the whole army of the Persians was intercepted; but the Roman infantry stood firm on the left; for Belisarius himself, dismounting from his horse, showed them that intrepid despair was their only safety. They turned their backs to the Empyræum, and their faces to the enemy; innumerable arrows glanced without effect from the compact and sheltering order of their bucklers; an impenetrable line of pikes was opposed to the repeated assaults of the Persian cavalry; and after a resistance of many hours, the remaining troops were skillfully embarked under the shadow of the night.

Legend of Belisarius and Ricciardina, by Tavino. [Ilios, 1690.]

[1] A year.—about exaggeration! The conquest of Africa may be dated A.D. 533. September 14. It is celebrated by Justinian in the preface to his Institutes, which were published November 21, of the same year. Including the voyage and return, such a combination might truly be applied to our Indian empire.
The Persian commander retired with disorder and disgrace, to answer a strict account of the lives of so many soldiers which he had consumed in a barren victory. But the fame of B. Isaurius was not sufficed by a defeat, in which he alone had saved his army from the consequences of his rashness; the approach of peace relieved him from the guard of the eastern frontier, and his conduct in the sedition of Constantinople amply discharged his obligations to the emperor. When the African war became the topic of popular discourse and secret deliberation, each of the two sovereigns was superior; the one was distinguished, of the dangerous honour; but as soon as Justinian had declared his preference of superior merit, his envy was kindled by the unanimous applause which was given to the choice of Belisarius. The temper of the Byzantine court may encourage a suspicion, that the hero was darkly assisted by the intrigues of his wife, the fair and subtle Antonina, who alternately enjoyed the confidence, and incurred the hatred, of the empress Theodora. The birth of Antonina was ignoble, she descended from a family of charioteers; and her chastity has been stained with the foulest reproach. Yet the virtues, which the women of that age were too much of the mind of her illustrious husband; and if Antonina disdained the merit of conjugal fidelity, she expressed a manly friendship to Belisarius, whom she accompanied with undaunted resolution in all the hardships and dangers of a military life.

Preparations for the African war were not unworthy of the last contest between Rome and Carthage. The pride and flower of the army consisted of the guards of Belisarius, who, according to the pernicious indulgence of the times, devoted themselves by a particular oath of fidelity and military service, to the person of the sovereign and stature, for which they had been curiously selected, the goodness of their horses and armour, and the assiduous practice of all the exercises of war, enabled them to act whatever their courage might prompt; and their courage was exalted by the social honour of their rank, and the personal ambition of favour and fortune. Four hundred of the bravest of the Herull marched under the banner of the faithful and active Pharas; their uncturable valour was more highly prized than the tame submission of the Greeks and Syrians; and of such importance was it deemed to procure a reinforced garrison in Sicily, when the emperor was detached to the west, they were allured by fraud and deceit to engage in a naval expedition. Five thousand horse and ten thousand foot were embarked at Constantinople for the conquest of Africa, but the infantry, for the most part levied in Thrace and Isauria, yielded to the mere prevails of the march and hatred of the enemy; and the Sicilian bow was the weapon on which the armies of Rome were now reduced to place their principal dependence. From a laudable desire to assert the dignity of his theme, Procopius defends the soldiers of his own time against the morose critics, who confounded that respectable name to the heavy-action of the times of antiquity, and maliciously observed, that the word archer is introduced by Homer as a term of contempt. Such contempt might perhaps be due to the naked youths who appeared on foot in the fields of Troy, and, lurking amongst the bow-string to their breast, dismissed a feeble and lifeless arrow. But our archers (pursue the histri-tance of discipline, the rewards of piety and virtue, and the unpardoned guilt of murder, which, in his apprehension, was aggravated rather than excused by the vice of intoxication. In the navigation from the Hellespont to Peloponnesus, which the Greeks, after the siege of Troy, had performed in four days, the fleet of Belisarius was guided in their course by his master-galley, conspicuous in the day by the rudder of the sails, and in the night by the torches blazing from the mast-head. It was the duty of the pilots, as they steered between the islands, and turned the capes of Malea and Tamnaurion, to preserve the just order and regular intervals of such a multitude of ships; as the wind or the current in such situations were not always favorable, and the troops were safely disembarked at Methone on the Messenian coast, to repose themselves for a while after the fatigues of the sea. In this place they experienced how avarice, invested with authority, may sport with the lives of thousands which are bravely exposed for the public service. According to military practice, the bread or biscuit of the Romans was twice prepared in the oven, and a diminution of one-fourth was cheerfully allowed for the loss of weight. To gain this miserable profit, and to save the expense of the flour, Count John of Caput Aegaeon had given orders that the flour should be slightly baked by the same fire which warmed the baths of Constantinople; and when the sacks were opened, a soft and mouldy paste was distributed to the army. Such unwholesome food, assisted by the heat of the climate and season, soon produced an epidemic disease, which swept away five hundred soldiers. Their health was restored by the diligence of Belisarius, who provided fresh bread at Methone, and boldly expressed his just and humane indignation; the emperor heard his complaint; the general was praised; but the minister was not punished. From the port of Methone, the pilots steered along the western coast of Peloponnesus, as far as the isle of Zacynthus, or Zant, before they undertook the voyage (in their eyes a most arduous voyage) of one hundred leagues over the Ionian sea. As the fleet was surprised by a calm, sixteen days were consumed in the slow navigation; and even the general would have suffered the intolerable hardship of thirst, if the ingenium of Antonina had not preserved the water in glass bottles, which she buried deep in the sand in a part of the ship impervious to the rays of the sun. At length the fleet anchored on the island of Methone, which afforded a secure and hospital shelter. The Gothic officers who governed the island in the name of the daughter and grand-son of Theodoric obeyed their prudent orders, to receive the troops of Justinian like friends, and to provide for their nourishment. As the supplies were liberally supplied, the cavalry was remounted; and Procopius soon returned from Syracuse with correct information of the state and designs of the Vandals. His intelligence determined Belisarius to hasten his operations, and his wise impudence was seconded by the winds. The fleet lost sight of Sicily, passed before the island of Malta, and covered the capes of Africa, ran along the coast with a strong gale from the north-east, and finally cast anchor at the promontory of Caput Vada, about five days' journey to the south of Carthage.

If Gelimer had been informed of the approach of the enemy, he must have withdrawn his troops to the island of Sardinia and have made an immediate defence of his person and kingdom. A detachment of five thousand soldiers, and one hundred and twenty galleys, would have joined the remaining forces of the Vandals; and the descendant of Genseric might have surprised and oppressed a fleet of disabled transports incapable of action, and of light brigantines that seemed only qualified for flight. Belisarius had secretly trembled when he over-heard his soldiers, in the passage, imbandaging each other to confess their apprehensions; if they were once embattled, he had an opportunity of making their arms; but if they should be attacked at sea, they did not blush to acknowledge that they wanted courage to contend at the same time with the winds, the waves, and the barbarians. The knowledge of their sentiments decided Belisarius to seize the first opportunity of landing them on the coast of Africa; and he prudently rejected, in a council of war, the proposal of sailing with the fleet and army into the port of Carthage. Three months after their departure from Constantinople, the men and horses, the arms and military regiments, which Belisarius had disposed of, had arrived at his camp on the coast of the African sea. As they had been left as a guard on board each of the ships, which were dispersed in the form of a semicircle. The remainder of the troops occupied a camp on the sea-shore, which they fortified, according to ancient discipline, with a ditch and rampart; and the discovery of a source of fresh water, while it allayed the thirst, excited the superstitious confidence of the Romans. The next morning, some of the neighbouring gardens were pillaged; and Belisarius, after chastising the offenders, embraced the slight occasion, but the decisive moment, of inculcating the maxims of justice, moderation, and genuine policy. "When I first accepted the commission of subduing Africa, I depended much less," said the general, "on the numbers, or even the bravery, of my troops, than upon the friendly disposition of the natives, and their immortal hatred to the Vandals. You alone can deprive me of this hope: if you continue to extort by rapine what might be purchased for a little money, such acts of violence will reconcile these implacable enemies, and unite them in a just and holy league against the invaders of their country." These exhortations were enforced by a rigid discipline, of which the former experience of the Vandals and the salutary effects. The inhabitants, instead of deserting their houses, or hiding their corn, supplied the Romans with a fair and liberal market; the civil officers of the province continued to exercise their functions in the same manner; the same course of government was thereby maintained, the discipline, the zeal of conscience and interest, assiduously laboured to promote the cause of a catholic emperor. The small town of Salsette, one day's journey from the camp, had the honour of being first open to her gates, and to resume her ancient allegiance; the larger cities of Carthage and Hippo.

Adrumetum imitated the spirit of loyalty as soon as Belisarius appeared; and he advanced without opposition as far as Grasse, a palace of the Vandal kings, at the distance of fifty miles from Carthage. The weary Romans indulged themselves in the refreshment of shady groves, cool fountains, and delicious fruits; and the preference which Præpotius allows to these gardens over any that he had seen, either in the east or west, may be ascribed either to the taste or the fatigue of the historian. In three generations, prosperity and a warm climate had dissolved the hardy virtue of the Vandals, who insensibly became the most luxurious of mankind. In their villas and gardens, which might deserve the Persian name of paradise, they enjoyed a cool and elegant repose; and after the daily use of the bath, the barbarians were seen to issue from their elegant retreats with a degree of festivity and luxury, which was not unknown in the land and sea. Their silken robes, loosely flowing after the fashion of the Medes, were embroidered with gold; love and hunting were the labours of their life, and their vacant hours were amused by pantomimes, chariot-races, and the music and dances of the thousand maidens who accompanied them.

Defeats the Vandals in a first battle. A march of ten or twelve days, the vigilance of Belisarius was constantly awake and active against his unseen enemies, by whom in every place, and at every hour, he might be suddenly attacked. An officer of confidence and merit, John the Armenian, led the vanguard of three hundred horse; six hundred Massagetae covered at a certain distance the left flanks; and the whole fleet, steering along the coast, seldom lost sight of the army, which moved each day about twelve miles, and looked upon the evening in strong enemy before the view of Africa, had left him only the dangerous resource of risking a battle in the neighbourhood of his capital. The Vandals, from their original number of fifty thousand, were multiplied, without including their women and children, to one hundred and sixty thousand fighting men; and such forces, animated with valour and union, might have crushed, at their first landing, the feeble and exhausted bands of the Roman general. But the friends of the captive king were more inclined to accept the invitations, than to resist the progress of Belisarius; and many a bound barbarian disguising his aversion to war under the more specious name of his hatred to the usurper. Yet the authority and promises of Belisarius collected a formidable army, and his plans were concerted with some degree of military skill. An order was despatched to his brother Ammatas, who collected all the forces of Carthage, and was instructed to join him within the distance of ten miles from the city; his nephew Gibamund, with two thousand horse, was destined to attack their left, when the monarch himself, who silently followed, should charge their rear, in a situation which, if left unexposed, was the example to the enemies of the soldiery of the Roman army. But the rashness of Ammatas was fatal to himself and his country. He anticipated the hour of attack, outstripped his tardy followers, and was pierced with a mortal wound, after he had slain with his own hand twelve of his boldest antagonists. His Vandals fled to Carthage; the highway, almost ten miles, was strewn with dead bodies; and it seemed incredible that such multitudes could be slaughtered by the swords of three hundred Romans. The nephew of Belisarius was defeated after a slight combat by the six hundred Massagetae; they did not equal the third part of his numbers; but each Scythian was fired by the example of his chief, who gloriously exercised the privilege of his family, by riding foremost and alone to shoot the first arrow against the enemy. In the mean while, Belisarius himself, ignorant of the event, and more mindful of the safety of his soldiers, had left the Roman army, and reached the scene of action where Ammatas had fallen. He wept the fate of his brother and of Carthage, charged with irresistible fury the advancing squadrons, and might have pursued, and perhaps decided the victory, if he had not wasted those inestimable moments in the discharge of a vain, though pious, duty to the dead. While his spirit was brooding in his mind, he heard the step of Belisarius, who, leaving the vanguard of his infantry in the camp, pressed forwards with his guards and the remnant of the cavalry to rally his flying troops, and to restore the fortune of the day. Much room could not be found in this disorderly battle for the talents of Belisarius; but the king fled before the hero; and the Vandals, accustomed to a Moors, were incapable of withstanding the arms and discipline of the Romans. Belisarius retired with hastiness towards the desert of Numidia; but he had soon the consolation of learning that his private orders for the execution of Hilderic and his captive friends had been faithfully obeyed. The tyrant's revenge was useful only to his enemies. The death of a lawful prince excited the compassion of his people; his life might have perplexed the victorious Romans; and the lieutenant of Justinian, by a crime of which he was innocent, was relieved from the painful alternative of forfeiting his honour or relinquishing his conquests.

As soon as the tumult had subsided, Belisarius pitched his camp on the site of the town of Meles, where, at the milestones from Carthage had applied the Latin appellation of decimus. From a wise suspicion of the stratagems and resources of the Vandals, he marched the next day in order of battle, halted in the evening before the gates of Carthage, and alarmed a night of reposè, that he might have, in darkness and disorder, exposures to the liberty of the soldiers, or the soldiers themselves to the secret ambush of the city. But as the fears of Belisarius were the result of calm and intrepid reason, he was soon satisfied that he might confide, without danger, in the peaceful and friendly aspect of the capital. Carthage blazed with innumerable torches, the signals of the public joy; the chain was removed that guarded the entrance of the port; the gates were thrown open, and the people, with acclamations of gratitude, hailed and invited their Roman deliverers. The defeat of the Vandals, and the freedom of Africa, were announced to the cities of the East and West; and the churches were already adorned and illuminated for the festival of the martyr, whom three centuries of superstitious had almost raised to a local deity. The Arians, conscious that their reign had expired, resigned the capital to the church, and the army, who defeated a Moorish force, performed the holy rites, and loudly proclaimed the creed of Arius and Justinian. One awful hour reversed the fortunes of the contending parties. The suppliants Vandals, who so lately indulged the vices of conquerors, sought an humble refuge in the sanctuary of the church; while the merchants of the east were delivered from the deepest dungeon of the palace by their affrighted keepers, who implored the protection of his captives, and showed them, through an aperture in the wall, the sails of the Roman fleet. After their separation from the army, they were well armed and equipped, and steered their course along the coast, till they reached the Hermean promontory, and obtained the first intelligence of the victory of Belisarius. Faithful to his instructions, they would have cast anchor about twenty miles from Carthage, if the fleet had not encountered the perils of the shore, and the signs of an impending tempest. Still ignorant of the revolution, they declined, however, the rash attempt of forcing the chain of the port; and the adjacent harbour and suburb of Mandræum were insulted only by the rapine of a pri- vate party, who destroyed, and despoiled the emperor's palace. But the imperial fleet, advancing with a fair wind, steered through the narrow entrance of the Goletta, and occupied in the deep and capacious lake of Tunis a secure station about five miles from the capital. No sooner was Belisarius informed of their arrival, than he despatched orders that the greatest part of the mariners should be immediately landed to join the troops, and to induce the appearance of the Vandals to the Romans. Before they were allowed to enter the gates of Carthage, he exhorted them, in a discourse worthy of himself and the occasion, not to disgrace the glory of their arms; and to remember that the Vandals had been the tyrants, but that they were the deliverers, of the Africans, who must acknowledge the recollection of theavarous and avaricious subjects of their common sovereign. The Vandals marched through the streets in close ranks, prepared for battle if an enemy had appeared; the strict order maintained by the general impressed on their minds the duty of obedience; and in an age in which custom and impunity almost sanctified the abuse of conquest, the genius of one man repressed the passions of a victorious army. The voice of menace and complaint was silent; the trade of Carthage was not interrupted; while Africa changed her master and her governors, the shops continued open and busy. But the soldiers, after sufficient guards had been posted, modestly departed to the houses which were allotted for their reception. Belisarius fixed his residence in the palace; seated himself on the throne of Genercite; accepted and distributed the barbaric spoil; granted the freedom of Carthage to the labourers who repaired the damage which the suburb of Mandrachium had sustained in the preceding night. At supper he entertained his principal officers with the form and magnificence of a royal banquet. The victor was respectfully served by the captive officers of the household, who were the objects of festivity, when the imperial spectators applauded the fortune and merit of Belisarius, his envious flatterers secretly shed their venom on every word and gesture which might alarm the suspicions of a jealous monarch. One day was given to these pompous scenes, which may not be despised as useless, if they attracted the popular veneration; but the active mind of Belisarius, which in the pride of victory could suppose a defeat, had already resolved, that the Roman empire in Africa should not depend on the chance of arms, or the favour of the people, but the prosperity of Carthage alone could exempted from the general proscription; but in the reign of ninety-five years they were suffered to decay by the thoughtless and insensible Vandals. A wiser conqueror restored with incredible despatch the walls and fortresses of the city of Carthage, which had been abandoned by the Vandals. His liberality encouraged the workmen; the soldiers, the mariners, and the citizens vied with each other in the salutary labour; and Gelimer, who had feared to trust his person in an open town, beheld with astonishment and despair the rising strength of an impregnable fortress.

That unfortunate monarch, after the loss of his capital, applied himself to the Vandals, and, as the consequence of their superior merit, he permitted the barbarians to occupy the town of Suthrion or the Round Tower, which was not more than a mile distant. Nothing was spared that could be employed in making the Palermo of Africa. The Vandals, under the conduct of their king, Zano, with the troops which had followed him to the conquest of Sardinia, were placed in the centre; and the throne of Genercite might have stood, if the multitude of Vandals had imitated their intrepid resolution. Casting away their lances and missile weapons, they drew their swords, and expected the issue of battle. The Roman cavalry thrice passed the rivulet; they were thrice repulsed; and the enfilade was firmly maintained, till Zano fell, and the standards of Belisarius was displayed. Gelimer retreated to his camp; the Vandals joined the pursuit of the fugitives, and the insatiable vengeance of the besiegers was imminent. Yet no more than fifty Romans, and eight hun-

1 The neighbourhood of Carthage, the sea, the land, and the rivers, are changed almost as much as the works of man. The inhuman, or at least barbarous, conduct of Belisarius, as disclosed and confided with in this work; the history of Africa is a dry plain; and the lake, or mare, nonum, more than an inch wide, with a stone-covered fort, is the melancholy object. The profile of Carthage, the ancient and noble city, is described by

2 From Delphi, the name of Delphicum was given, both in Greek and Latin, to an open or plain space, by an easy ascent, in the grounds of the same appellation, was extended at Rome, Constantinople, and Carthage, to the royal banqueting room. dred Vandals, were found on the field of battle; so inconsiderable was the carnage of a day, which extinguished a nation, and transferred the empire of Africa.
In the evening, Belisarius led his infantry to the attack of the camp; and the postilsonian flight of Gelimer exposed that part of his army which had deserted, and the vanquished death was a relief, life a burthen, and infamy the only object of terror. His departure was secret; but as soon as the Vandals discovered that their king had deserted them, they hastily dispersed, anxious only for their personal safety, and careless of every other consideration. Meanwhile the Romans entered the camp without resistance; and the wildest scenes of disorder were veiled in the darkness and confusion of the night. Every barbarian who met their swords was inhumanly massacred; their wives and daughters, as rich heirs, or beautiful concubines, were embraced by the licentious soldiers; and avarice itself was almost satiated with the treasures of gold and silver, the accumulated fruits of conquest or economy in a long period of prosperity and peace. In this frantic search, the troops even of Belisarius forgot their caution and respect. Intoxicated with lust and rapiers, they fell upon many of the unoffending civilians, in adjacent fields, the woods, the rocks, and the caverns, that might possibly conceal any desirable prize: laden with booty, they deserted their ranks, and wandered without a guide, on the high road to Carthage; and if the flying enemies had dared to return, very few of the conquerors would have escaped. Deeply sensible of the disgrace and danger, Belisarius passed an apprehensive night in the field of victory; at the dawn of day, he planted his standard on a hill, recalled his guards and veterans, and gradually restored the modesty and obedience of the camp. It was equally the concern of Gelimer to despoil, instead of a sword, the head of the valiant Zenno; and to save the prostrate, barbarians: and the supplivantals, who could be found only in churches, were protected by his authority, disharned, and separaately confined, that they might neither disturb the public peace, nor become the victims of popular revenge. After despatching a light detachment to tread the footsteps of Gelimer, he advanced with his whole army, about ten days' march, as far as Hippo Regius, which no longer possessed the relics of St. Augustin.5 The season, and the certain intelligence that the Vandals had fled to the inaccessibility of the Moors, deterred Belisarius from a pursuit, and recalled his most skilled generals, and to fix his winter-quarters at Carthage. From thence he despatched his principal lieutenant, to inform the emperor, that in the space of three months, he had achieved the conquest of Africa.

Conquest of Africa.

Belisarius spoke the language of successful generals, transported the surviving Vandals yielded, without resistance, their arms and their freedom: the neighbourhood of Carthage submitted to his presence; and the more distant provinces were successively subdued by the report of his victory. Tripoli was confirmed in her voluntary allegiance; Sardinia, which the historic provincid had so long retained, instead of a sword, the head of the valiant Zenno; and the isles of Majorca, Minorca, and Yvica, consented to remain an humble appendage of the African kingdom. Carthage, a royal city, which in lesser geography may be confounded with the modern Algiers, was situate thirty days' march to the westward of Carthage: by land, the road was infested by the 5 The relics of St. Augustin were carried by the African bishops to their Sarthian exile; (A. D. 500;) and it was believed in the ecclesiastical century, that Liptramus, king of the Lombards, transported them (A. D. 568) from the diocese of Lemoonia to the bishoprick of Alba, to the eastward of the Po, and near the Adriatic Sea. Not long after, these relics fell out of the hands of the Bishops of Alba. 9 Dupin (Geograph. Sacra Africana, p. 31, ad Opis. Milesi) observes and bewails this episcopal decay. In the more precious age of the church, he had noticed 560 bishops; but however minute the emperor observes the decrees, it is not probable that they all existed at the same time.

Exarch.4 Yet the conquest of Africa was imperfect, till her former sovereign was delivered, either alive or dead, into the hands of the Roman monarch. From the Gelmier Gelmier had given secret orders that a part of his treasure should be transported to Spain, where he hoped to find a secure retreat at the court of the king of the Visi-goths. But these intentions were disappointed by accident, treachery, and the indefatigable pursuit of his captives. He expected to escape from the scenes of his misfortunes, and chased the unfortunate monarch, with some faithful followers, to the inaccessible mountain of Papum,5 in the inland country of Numidia. He was immediately besieged by Pharas, an officer whose truth and sobriety were the more trusted, as such qualities could seldom be found among the Heruli, the most corrupt of the barbarian tribes. To his vigilance Belisarius had intrusted this important charge; and, after a bold attempt to scale the mountain, in which he lost a hundred and ten soldiers, Pharas expected, during a winter siege, the operation of distress and famine to suite the mind of the Vandals king. From the poorest habits of pleasure, from the unbounded command of industry and wealth, he was reduced to share the poverty of the Moors,6 supportable only to themselves by their ignorance of a happier condition. In their rude hovels, of which not a single one was lighted, and amid the famine, they promiscuously slept on the ground, perhaps on a sheep-skin, with their wives, their chilren, and their cattle. Sordid and scanty were their garments; the use of bread and wine was unknown; and their eaten or barley cakes, improperly baked in the cinders, were the destitute state by the hungry savage. The health of Gelmier must have sunk under these strange and unwonted hardships, from whence it caused them to endure; but his actual misery was imbibited by the recollection of past happiness, the daily insole of his protectors, and the pleasurant apprehension, that the light and vernal Moors might be tempted to betray the rights of hospitality. The knowledge of his situation dictated the humane and friendly epistle of Pharas. "Like yourself," said the chief of the Heruli, "I am an illiterate barbarian, but I speak the language of plain truth. Why will you persist in hopeless obstinance? Why will you ruin yourself, your family, and nation? The love of freedom and abhorrence of slavery! Also! my dearest Gelmier, are you not already in the worst of states, the slave of the vilination of the Moors? It will not be proper for your mind to pass from the stagnat stagnat, a life of poverty and servitude, rather than to return the undoubted monarch of the mountain of Papum! Do you think it a disgrace to be the subject of Justinian? Belisarius is his subject; and we ourselves, whose birth is not inferior to your own, and not ashamed of our obedience to the Roman emperor. That generous prince will grant you a rich inheritance of lands, a place in the senate, and the dignity of patrician: such are his gracious intentions, and you may depend with full assurance on the word of Belisarius. Not even as Heaven has condoned us to suffer, Ca-pitene is a virtue; but if we reject the professed deliv-erence, it degenerates into blind and stupid despair,"
"I am not insensible," replied the king of the Vandals, "how kind and rational is your advice. But I cannot persevere myself to become the slave of an unjust enemy, who has deserved my imperable hatred. Him I had never injured either by word or deed: yet he has sent against me. I know not from whence, a certain Belisarius, who has cast me headlong from the throne into this abyss of misery. Justinian is a man; he is a prince; does he not dread for himself a similar reverse of fortune? I can write no more: my grief oppresesses me. Send me, I beseech you, my dear Pharas, send me a lyre; a spunge, and a loaf of bread." From the Vandals messenger, Pharas was informed of the meteousness of the enterprise. It was long since the king of Africa had tasted bread; a deflection had fallen on his eyes, the effect of fatigue or incessant weeping; and he wished to solace the melancholy hours, by singing to the lyre the sad story of his own misfor-to. Their humanity of Pharas was more: he sent the three extraordinary gifts; but even his humanity prompted him to rebuke the vigilance of his guard, that he might soon compel his prisoner to embrace a resolution advantageous to the Romans, but salutary to himsself. The obstinacy of Gelmier at length yielded to the persuasive reasonings of the mission, and the honourable treatment was ratified in the emperor's name, by the ambassador of Belisarius; and the king of the Vandals descended from the mountain. The first public interview was in one of the suburbs of Carthage; and when the royal captive accosted his conqueror, he exclaimed, his heart, as naturally believe, that extreme grief had deprived Gelmier of his senses; but in this mourning state, unseasonable mirth insinuated to more intelligent observers, that the vain and transitory scenes of human greatness are too often too full of a serious thought.
Their condition was soon justified by their return and tria-a new example of a vulgar truth; that ugh of Belisarius flattery adheres to power, and envy to superior merit. The chief of the Roman army presumed to think themselves the rivals of a hero... Their private despatches maliciously affirmed, that the conqueror of Africa, strong in his reputation and the public love, conspired to seat himself on the throne of the Vandals. Justinian listened with too patient an ear; and his silence was the result of jealousy rather than of confidence. An honourable alternative was proposed by the Roman emperor. The capital, was indeed submitted to the discretion of Belisarius; but he wisely concluded, from intercepted letters, and the knowledge of his sovereign's temper, that he must either resign his head, erect his standard, or confound his enemies by his presence and submision. In the agreement, the emperor yielded his guards, captives, and treasures were diligently en-barred; and so prosperous was the navigation, that his arrival at Constantinople preceded any certain account of his departure from the port of Carthage.
Such unsuspecting loyalty removed the apprehensions of Justinian; envy was silenced and inflamed by the public gratitude; and the third Africanus obtained the honours of a triumph, a ceremony which the city of Constantinople had never seen, and which ancient Rome, since the reign of Tiberius, had reserved for the emperor alone. The procession moved from the principal streets to the hippodrome; and this memorable day seemed to avenge the injuries of Genesice, and to expiate the shame of the Romans. The wealth of nations was displayed, the trophies of martial or effec-facing Scythian and Sarmatian chieftains, and the chariots of state which had been used by the Vandal queen: the massy furniture of the royal banquet, the splendour of precious stones, the elegant forms of statuettes and vases, the more substantial treasure of gold, and the holy vessels of the Jewish temple, which after the ruin of that congregation were respectfully deposited in the Christian church of Jerusalem. A long train of the noblest Vandals reluctantly exposed their lofty stature and munificent tenements. Gelimer slowly advanced; he was clad in a purple robe, and still maintained the majesty of a king. Not a tear escaped from his eyes, not a sigh was heard; but his pride or party derived some secret consolation from the words of Solomon, which he repeatedly pronounced,

"Vanity! vanity! all is vanity! Instead of ascending a triumphal car drawn by four horses or elephants, the modest conqueror marched on foot at the head of his brave companions. His prudence might decline an honour too conspicuous for a subject; and his magnanimity might justly disdain what had been so often sullied by the vices of tyrants. The glorious procession entered the gate of the hippodrome; was saluted by the acclamations of the senate and people; and halted before the throne of a conqueror. But the presence of Gelimer was confined to the temple of Minerva, where he received the homage of the captive monarch and the victorious hero. Both performed the customary adoration; and falling prostrate on the ground, respectfully touched the foot-stool of a prince who had not advanced his sword, and of a prostitute who had danced on the emperor's ample estate in the provinces of Galatia, where the abdicated monarch retired with his family and friends, to a life of peace, of influence, and perhaps of content. The daughters of Hilicern were entertained with the respectful tenderness due to their age and misfortune; and Justianus and Theodora accepted the honour of educating and enriching the female descendants of the great Theodosius. The bravest of the Vandal youth were distributed into five squadrons of cavalry, which adopted the name of their benefactor, and supported in the Persian wars, the glory of their race.

But these rare exceptions, the reward of birth or valor, could not console the fate of a nation, whose numbers, before a short and bloodless war, amounted to more than six hundred thousand persons. After the exile of their king and nobles, the servile crowd might purchase their safety, by obeying the dictates of religion and language; and their degenerate posterity would be insensibly mingled with the common herd of African subjects. Yet even in the present age, and in the wilderness tribes of Ethiopia, the poet has discovered the white complexion and long flaxen hair of a northern race; and it was formerly believed, that the boldest of the Vandals fled beyond the power, or even the knowledge, of the Romans, to enjoy their solitary freedom on the shores of the Atlantic ocean. Africa had been their empire, it became their prison; nor could they entertain a hope, or even a wish, of returning to the banks of the Elbe, where their brethren, of a spirit less adventurous, still wandered in their native forests. It was impossible for cowards to surmount the barriers of unknown seas and hostile barbarians; it was impracticable for heroes to escape the pursuit, and defeat before the eyes of their countrymen, to describe the kingdoms which they had lost, and to claim a share of the humble inheritance, which, in a happier hour, they had almost unananimously renounced. In the country between the Elbe and the Oder, several populous villages of Lusatia are inhabited by the Vandals; they still preserve their language, their customs, and the purity of their blood; support, with some impatience, the Saxon or Prussian yoke; and serve, with secret and voluntary allegiance, the descendant of their ancient kings, who in his garb and present servitude, claims to expiate the crimes of his vassals. The name and situation of this unhappy people might indicate their descent from one common stock with the conquerors of Africa. But the use of a Scholavian dialect more clearly represents them as the last remnant of the new colonies, who succeeded to the genuine Vandals, already scattered or destroyed in the age of Procopius. If Belisarius had been tempted to he-Manes and desist in his allegiance, he might have fete of the Moors, urged, even against the emperor himself, the indispensable duty of saving Africa from an enemy whose barbary and cruelty were even more unequalled than as their treatment of the Moors is involved in darkness: they were ignorant of the use of letters. Their limits cannot be precisely defined: a boundless continent was open to the Libyan shepherds; the change of seasons and pastures regulate their motions; and their rude huts and slender furniture were liable to be expended by the arts, their families, and their cattle, which consisted of sheep, oxen, and camels. During the vigour of the Roman power, they observed a respectful distance from Carthage and the sea-shore; under the feeble reign of the Vandals, they invaded the cities of Numidia, occupied the territory from Tanger to the Guer, pitched their camps, with impunity, in the fertile province of Byzacum. The formidable strength and artful conduct of Belisarius secured the neutrality of the Moor.

2 Shaw, p. 97. Yet since Procopius (i. 111. c. 153) speaks of a people of mount Atlas, as already distinguished by white bodies and yellow hair, the phenomenon which is likewise visible in the Andes of Peru, Bushon, tom. iii. p. 504, may naturally be ascribed to the elevation of the ground and the temperature of the air.

3 The geography of Ravenna (ib. iii. p. 150, 131, 141, Paris, 1855) describes the Mauritanians (Gothinian, opposite to Cadiz) of the Vandals as dwelling in Africa, and not of Numida.

7 Sallust represents the Moors as a remnant of the army of the Huns, (Hinsel. Hist. g. 42.) Procopius describes the cruelty and poverty of the Canaumans who died from the robber Jutus. (ib. c. 152.) ish princes, whose vanity aspired to receive, in the emperor's name, the emblems of their royal dignity. They were astonished by the rapid event, and trembled in the presence of their conqueror. But his approaching departure soon relieved the apprehensions of a savage and superstitious people; the number of their wives allowed them to disregard the safety of their infant host; and when Roman General最好是 sail in the port of Carthage, he heard the cries, and almost bared the flames, of the desolated province. Yet he persisted in his resolution; and leaving only a part of his guards to reinforce the fickle garrisons, he intruded himself to look for the daughter of the consul...}

Aurasius. In the first invasion, some detachments, with two officers of merit, were surprised and intercepted; but Solomon speedily assembled his troops, marched from Carthage into the heart of the country, and in two great battles destroyed sixty thousand of the barbarians. The Moors depended on their multitude, their swiftness, and their inaccessible mountains; and the aspect and smell of their camels are said to have produced some confusion in the Roman cavalry. But as soon as they were commanded to dismount, they deployed this contemptible obstdate, as soon as the columns ascended the hills, the naked and disorderly crowd was dazzled by glittering arms and regular evolutions; and the menace of their female prophets was repeatedly fulfilled, that the Moors should be discomfited by a beard-bearing apostate, and a journey from Carthage, to besiege Mount Aurasius, the citadel and at the same time the garden of Numidia. That range of hills, a branch of the great Atlas, contains, within a circumference of one hundred and twenty miles, a rare variety of soil and climate. The locust and ciblea are the most abundant, and are plausons above rich pastures, perpetual streams, and fruits of a delicious taste and uncommon magnificence. This fair solitude is decorated with the ruins of Lambes, a Roman city, once the seat of a legion, and the residence of forty thousand inhabitants. The Iberian temple of Aesculapius is encompassed with Moorish huts; and the cattle now graze in the midst of an amphitheatre, under the shade of Corinthian columns. A sharp perpendicular rock rises above the level of the mountain, where the African princes deposited their wives and treasure; and a proverb is familiar to the Arabs, that the man who may eat fire, who dares to attack the craggy cliffs and inapproachable natives of Mount Aurasius. This hardy enterprise was twice attempted by the emir Solomon: from the first, he retreated with some disgrace; and in the second, his patience and resolution were almost exhausted; and he must again have retired, if he had not yielded to the impetuous courage of his troops, who audaciously scaled, to the astonishment of the Moors, the mountain, the hostile camp, and the summit of the Gemnian rock. A citadel was erected to secure this important conquest, and to remind the barbarians of their defeat; and Solomon pursued his march to the west, the longlost province of Mauritanian Sitif was again annexed to the Roman empire. The Moorish war continued several years after the departure of Belisarius; but the laurel which he reigned to a faithful lieutenant, may be justly ascribed to his own triumph.

The experience of past faults, which Neutrality of may sometimes correct the maturity age the Visigoths, of an individual, is seldom profitable to the successive generations of mankind. The nations of antiquity, which lost their empire, were generally vanquished and enslaved by the Romans. This usual lesson might have instructed the barbarians of the west to oppose, with timely counsels and confederate arms, the unbounded ambition of Justian. Yet the same neglect of advice was repeated in the following century, when the Visigoths of Africa, and the Goths, both of Italy and Spain, insensible of their approaching danger, bared with indifference, and even with joy, the rapid downfall of the Vandals. After the failure of the royal line, Thudes, a valiant and powerful chief, ascended the throne of Spain, which he had formerly administered in the name of Theode- ric and his infant grandson. Under his command, the Visigoths besieged the fortress of Crusta on the African coast: but, while they spent the sabbath-day in peace and devotion, the pious security of their camp was invaded by a sally from the town; and the king himself, with several of his officers, fell in battle with the hands of a sacrilegious enemy. It was not long before his pride and resentment were gratified by a suppliant embassy from the unfortunate Gelimer, who implored, in his distress, the aid of the Spanish monarch. But instead of conferring the meritorious punishment of the dictators of generosity and prudence, Thudes amased the ambassadors, till he was secretly informed of the loss of Carthage, and then dismissed them with obscure and contemptuous advice, to seek in their native country a true knowledge of the state of the Vandals. The lesson of the Spanish war was to delay the punishment of the Visigoths; Romans interceded, and the eyes of Thudes were closed. a. D. 550-560.}

for they tasted the fruits of his mistaken policy. After his death, the sceptre of Spain was disputed by a civil war. The weaker candidate solicited the protection of Justinian, and ambitiously subscribed a treaty of alliance, which deeply wounded the independence and happiness of his country. Several cities, both on the ocean and the Mediterranean, were ceded to the Roman troops, who afterwards refused to evacuate those pledges, as it should seem, either of safety or payment; and as they were hired by perpetual supplies from Africa, they maintained their impregnable stations, for the miscellaneous purpose of infringing the civil and religious factions of the barbarians. Seventy years elapsed before this painful thorn could be extirpated from the bosom of the monarchy; and as long as the emperor maintained any share of these remote and useless possessions, their vanity might number Spain in the list of their provinces, and the successors of Alaric in the rank of their vassals.

The error of the Goths who reigned in Spain was less excusable than that of the Ostrogoths, and the Spanish brethren, and their punish- goths of Italy, went was still more immediate and terrible. From a motive of private revenge, they enabled their most dangerous enemy to destroy their most valuable ally. A sister of the great Theodoric had been given in marriage to Thrasamund the African king; on this occasion, the fortress of Lillybaeum in Sicily was resigned to the Vandals: and the princess Amalafrida was attended by a martial train of one thousand noble men, and five thousand Gothic slaves who signified their valour in the Moorish wars. Their merit was over-rated by themselves, and perhaps neglected by the Vandals; they viewed the country with envy, and the conquerors with disdain; but their real fictitious conspiracy was prevented by a massacre; the Goths and their Gthic tongue, the daughter of Theodoric maintained in her counsels a discreet and impenetrable silence. By a faithful imitation of the virtues, she revived the prosperity of his reign; while she strove with pious care to expiate the faults, and to ob-lerate the darker memory of his declining age. The children of Theodoric and Symmachus were restored to their paternal inheritance; her extreme lenity never consented to inflict any corporal or pecuniary penalties on her Roman subjects; and she generously despised the clamours of the Goths, who, at the end of forty years, still considered the people of Italy as their slaves, and whose recreations were directed by the sea, and the Goths were destined of a navy. In the blind impotence of grief and indignation, they joyfully saluted the approach of the Romans, entertained the fleet of Belisarius in the ports of Sicily, and were speedily delighted or surprised by the surprising intelligence, that their revenge was executed beyond the measure of their hopes, or perhaps of their wishes. To their friendship the emperor was indebted for the kingdom of Africa, and the Goths might reasonably think, that they were entitled to resume the possession of a single city, but to deprive Rome of its titles, and the gift from the island of Sicily. They were soon under-ceived by the haughty mandate of Belisarius, which excited their tardy and unavailing repentance. "The city and promontory of Lillybæum," said the Roman general, "are yielded to the Vandals, and I claim them by the right of conquest. Your submission may deserve the favour of the emperor; your obstinacy will provoke his displeasure, and must kindle a war, that can terminate only in your utter ruin. If you compel us to take up arms, we shall contend, not to regain the possession of a single city, but to deprive Rome of its titles, and the provinces which you unjustly withhold from their lawful sovereign." A nation of two hundred thousand soldiers might have smiled at the vain menace of Jus-tinian and his lieutenant: but a spirit of discord and disaffection prevailed in Italy, and the Goths supported, with reluctance, the indignity of a female reign.5

dowments of her mind and person had attained their perfect maturity. Her beauty, which, in the apprehension of Theodoric herself, might have disputed the conquest of an emperor, was animated by manly sense, character, activity, and resolution. ance, left her destitute of any firm support or legal authority. Instead of submitting to the laws of her country, which held as a fundamental maxim, that the succession could never pass from the lance to the distaff, the daughter of Theodoric, with her brother and the thousand thespians whom her influence had gathered to her side, with one of her cousins, the regal title, and of reserving in her own hands the substance of supreme power. He received the proposal with profound respect and affected gratitude; and the eloquent Cassiodorus announced to the senate and the emperor, that Amalasuntha and Theodatus had ascended the throne of Italy. His birth (for his mother was the sister of Theodoric) might be considered as an imperfect title; and the choice of Amalasuntha was more strongly directed by her contempt of his avarice and possifaliminity, which had deprived of the love of the Italians, and the esteem of the barbarians. But Theodatus was exasperated by the contempt which he deserved; her justice had repressed and reproached the oppression which he exercised against his Tuscan neighbours; and the principal Goths, united by common guilt and resentment, conspired to intrigue his assassination, and to precipitate his government in a slow and timid disposition. The letters of congratulation were scarcely despatched, before the queen of Italy was imprisoned in a small island of the lake of Bolsena; where, in the impatience of her case, she was strangled in the bath, by the order, or with the connivance, of the new king, who instructed his turbulent subjects to shed the blood of their sovereigns.

Belisarius in various dispositions of the Goths; and the mediation of an ally concealed and promoted. Justinian beheld with joy the dissensions of the Goths; and the mediation of an ally concealed and promoted his intrigues against his enemies. His ambassadors, in their public audience, demanded the fortress of Libyeum, ten barbarian fugitives, and a just compensation for the pilfering of a small town on their march; but their request was indignantly rejected by Theodatus to betray the province of Tarsusy, and tempted Amalasuntha to extricate herself from danger and perplexity, by a free surrender of the kingdom of Italy. A false and servile epistle was subscribed by the reluctant hand of the captive queen; but the confession of the Roman senators, who were sent to Constantinople, revealed the truth of her deplorable situation; and Justinian, by the voice of a new ambassador, most powerfully interceded for her life and liberty. Yet the secret instructions of the same man are related to serve the interests of Theodora, who dreaded the presence and superior charms of a rival; she prompted, with artful and ambiguous hints, the execution of a crime so useful to the Romans which revealed the intelligence of her death with grief and indignation, and denounced, in his master's name, immortal war against the perfidious assassin.

In Italy, as well as in Africa, the guilt of a usurper appeared to justify the arms of Justinian; but the forces which he prepared were insufficient for the subversion of a mighty kingdom, if their feeble numbers had not been multiplied by the names of the spirited and the conduct of an hero. A chosen troop of guards, who served on horse-back, and were armed with lances and bucklers, attended the person of Belisarius; his cavalry was composed of two hundred Huns, three hundred Vandals, and one thousand Saracens. The infantry consisted only of three thousand Issurins. Steering the same course as in his former expedition, the Roman consul cast anchor before Catania in Sicily, to survey the strength of the island, and to decide whether he should attempt the conquest, or peacefully pursue his voyage for the African coast. He found a fruitful land and a friendly people. Notwithstanding the decay of agriculture, Sicily still supplied the granaries of Rome: the farmers were gratuitously exempted from the oppression of military quarters; and the goats, which, instead of the abundant and peaceful herds of the habitants, had some reason to complain, that their confidence was ungratefully betrayed. Instead of soliciting and expecting the aid of the king of Italy, they yielded to the first summons a cheerful obedience: and this province, the first-fruits of the Punic wars, was capable of purifying his mind from the thoughts of the empire. The Gothic garrison of Palermo, which alone attempted to resist, was reduced, after a short siege, by a singular stratagem. Belisarius introduced his ships into the deepest recess of the harbour; their presence was concealed by the smoke of the vessels directed against the top-most part, and he filled them with archers, who, from that superior station, commanded the ramparts of the city. After this easy, though successful campaign, the conqueror entered Syracuse in triumph, at the head of his victorious bands, distributing gold medals to the people, on the day which so gloriously terminated the year of the consuls. He passed the winter season in the palace of ancient kings, amidst the ruins of a Greek colony, which once extended to a circumference of two and twenty miles: but in the spring, he embarked about the island of Lipari, which he had so lately besieged, and his designs was interrupted by a dangerous revolt of the African forces. Carthage was saved by the presence of Belisarius, who suddenly landed with a thousand men. Two thousand soldiers of doubtful faith returned to the standard of their old commander; and he marched, without hesitation, above fifty miles, to seek an enemy whom he affected to pity and despise. Eight thousand rebels trembled at his approach: they were routed at the first onset, by the dexterity of their master; and this ignoble victory would have restored the African provinces, if the conduct of Belisarius had not recalled to Sicily, to appease a sedition which was kindled during his absence in his own camp. Disorder and dis obedience were the common malady of the times: the genius to command, and the virtue to obey, resided only in the mind of Belisarius. Although Belisarius descended from the Regia and weakness of Theodora, he went to join the greatest king of Italy, had he studied the writings of Plato and Tully, philosophy was incapable of purifying his mind from the influence of his native passions, avarice and fear. He had purchased a sceptre by ingratitude and murder: at the first menace of an enemy, he degraded his own majesty, and that of a nation, which already disdained their unworthy sovereign. Astonished by the recent example of Gelimer, he saw himself dragged in chains through the streets of Constantinople: the terrors of Belisarius, the insurge of Theodora, the weakness of the Gothic art, and averse to the dangers of war, led him to fear, to hope, to desire only in the mind of Belisarius. Peter, the Byzantine ambassador; and that bold and subtle advocate persuaded him to sign a treaty, too ignominious to become the foundation of a lasting peace. It was stipulated, that in the accusations of the Roman people, the name of the emperor should be always proclaimed before that of the Gothic king; and that as often as the statue of Theodatus was erected in brass or marble, the divine image of Justinian should be placed with such an arm as might give glory to the treaty; for, imitated, without scruple, the example of a sovereign, faithless to his public and private duties. The perfidious Eberman deserted with his followers to the Roman camp, and was dismissed to enjoy the servile honours of the Byzantine court. From Rhegium to Naples, the city and array of Belisarius, almost always in view of each other, advanced near three hundred miles along the sea coast. The people of Bruttium, Lucania, and Campania, who abhorred the name and religion of the Goths, embraced the spacious excuse, that their ruined walls were incapable of defence, and in the truth, represented to the multitude, that the Goths would punish their defection, and that Belisarius himself must esteem their loyalty and value. Their deliberations, however, were not perfectly free: the city was commanded by eight hundred barbarians, whose miseries and criminal strangulations were detainted at Ravenna, as the pledge of their fidelity; and, although they were rich and numerous, resisted, with desperate enthusiasm, the intolerable laws of Justinian. In a much later period, the circumference of Naples was divided into two factions; and the Greek democracy was inflamed by their orators, who, with much spirit and or the truth, represented to the multitude, that the Goths would punish their defection, and that Belisarius himself must esteem their loyalty and value. Hans were distinguished by cruelty and sacrilege, and Belisarius became, Théodatus succeeded in the Naples to moderate the calamities which he predicted.

The city was saved by the virtue and authority of its conqueror; and when the Neapolitans returned to their houses, they found some consolation in the secret enjoyment of their hidden treasures. The barbarian garrison enlisted in the service of the emperor: Apulia and Calabria, delivered from the odious presence of the Goths, acknowledged his dominion; and the tusk of the Calydonian boar, which were still shown at Beneventum, are curiously described by the historian of Belisarius.

The faithful soldiers and citizens of Naples had expected their deliverance from a prince, who remained the inactive and almost indifferent spectator of their sufferings. They had appealed to his person within the walls of Rome, while his cavalry advanced forty miles on the Appian way, and encamped in the Pompeian marshes; which, by a canal of nineteen miles in length, had been recently drained, and converted into pastures. Thus the principal force of the Goths was dispersed in Dalmitus, Venetia and Gaul: and the feeble mind of their king was confounded by the unsuccessful event of a divination, which seemed to presage the downfall of his empire. The most abject slaves have arrogated the guilt or weakness of an unfortunate master. The character of Belisarius was rigorously scrutinized by a free and idle camp of barbarians, conscious of their privilege and power; he was declared unworthy of his race, his nation and his throne; and their general Vitiges, whose valor had been signalized in the Ilyrian war, was raised with unanimous applause, on the bucklers of his companions. On the first rumour, the abdicated monarch fled from the justice of his country; but he was pursued by private revenge. A Goth whom he had injured in his love, overtook Theodatus on the Flaminian way, and, regardless of his unmanly cries, he was about to slay him, as he lay prostrate on the ground, like a victim (says the historian) at the foot of the altar. The choice of the people is the best and purest title to reign over them; yet such is the prejudice of every age, that Vitiges impatiently wished to return to Italy, where he might seize, with the reluctant hand of the daughter of Ambrosiana, some faint shadow of hereditary right. A national council was immediately held, and the new monarch reconciled the impatient spirit of the barbarians to a measure of disgrace, which the misconduct of his predecessor rendered wise and indispensable. The Goths consented to retreat in the presence of a victorious enemy; to delay till the next spring the operations of offensive war; to summon their scattered forces; to relinquish their distant possessions, and to trust even Rome itself to the vigil of its walls. The ablest general of the Goths, who was left in the capital, with four thousand soldiers: a feeble garrison, which might have secured the zenith, though it was incapable of opposing the wishes, of the Romans. But a momentary enthusiasm of religion and patriotism was kindled in their minds, and they had no necessity of raising the throne should no longer be profaned by the triumph or delusion of Arianiast; that the tombs of the Caesars should no longer be trampled by the savages of the north; and, without reflecting, that Italy must sink into a province of Constantinople, they fondly hailed the restoration of a Roman emperor as a new era of freedom and prosperity. The deputies of the pope and clergy, of the senate and people, invited the lieutenant of Justinian to accept their voluntary allegiance, and to enter the city, whose gates would be thrown open for his reception. As soon as Belisarius had fortified his new conquests, Naples and Cumae, he advanced about twenty miles to the banks of the Vulturnus, contemplated the decayed grandeur of Capua, and halted at the separation of the Latin and Appian ways. The work of the Flaminian way, with the以人民 from the sea and the marshes, skirted in space of one hundred and twenty miles along the foot of the mountains. His enemies had disappeared: when he made his entrance through the Asinarian gate, the garrison disbanded without resistance along the Flaminian way; and the city, after sixty years' servitude, was delivered from the yoke of the barbarians. Leuderis alone, from a motive of pride or discontent, refused to accommodate the fugitives; and the Gothic chief, himself a trophy of victory, was sent, with the heads of Rome to the throne of the emperor Justinian.

The first days, which coincided with the old Saturnalia, were devoted to mutual congratulation and the public joy; A.D. 536. Dec. 19. Rome.

Belisarius entered the old Saturnalia, and the catholics prepared to celebrate the festival of the nativity of Christ. In the familiar conversation of a hero, the Romans acquired some notion of the virtues which history ascribed to their ancestors; they were edified by the apparent respect of Belisarius for the successor of St. Peter, and his rigid discipline secured in the midst of war, the blessings of tranquillity and justice. They applauded the rapid success of his arms, which overtook bands of the enemy, as Varinius and Spoleto; but they trembled, the senate, the clergy, and the unruly people, as soon as they understood that he had resolved, and would speedily be reduced, to sustain a siege against the powers of the Gothic monarch. The designs of Vitiges were executed, during the most severe contest of the emperor. From their rustic habitations, from their distant garrisons, the Goths assembled at Ravenna for the defence of their country; and such were their numbers, that after an army had been detached for the relief of Dalmatia, one hundred and fifty thousand fighting men marched under the royal standard. According to the degrees of rank or merit, the Gothic king distributed arms and horses, rich gifts and liberal promises; he moved along the Flaminian way, declined the useless sieges of Perusia and Spoleto, respected the impenetrable gates of Narni, and arrived with his forces at Rome on the foot of the Milvian bridge. The narrow passage was fortified with a tower, and Belisarius had computed the value of the twenty days which must be lost in the construction of another bridge. But the consternation of the soldiers of the tower, who either fled to the boats for the sea, or betook their person into the most imminent danger. At the head of one thousand horse, the Roman general saluted from the Flaminian gate to mark the ground of an advantageous position, and to survey the camp of the barbarians; but while he still believed them on the other side, he saw them already rush, and fell upon his person into the most imminent danger. The fate of Italy depended on his life: and the des serters pointed to the conspicuous horse, a bay with a white face, which he rode on that memorable day. "Aim at the bay-horse," was the universal cry. Every bow was bent, every javelin was directed against that fatal object, and the command was repeated and obeyed by thousands who were ignorant of its real nature. The bold barbarians advanced to the more honourable combat of swords and spears; and the praise of an enemy has graced the fall of Vitiges. The Frank who negociated his foremost station, till he was pierced with thirteen wounds, perhaps by the hand of Belisarius himself. The Roman general was strong, active, and dexterous; on every side he discharged his weighty and mortal strokes; his faithful guards imitated his valor; and his valiant force was increased by the loss of a thousand men, fled before the arms of a hero. They were rashly pursued to their camp; and the Romans, opposed by multitudes, made a gradual and at length a precipitate retreat to the gates of the city; the gates were shut against the fugitives; and the public terror was increased by the report, that Belisarius was slain. His countenance was indeed disfigured by sweat, dust, and blood; his voice was hourshis strength was almost exhausted; but his unconquerable spirit still remained: he imparted that spirit to his despairing companions, and their last desperate charge was felt. A bay-horse of incomparable vigour and beauty, had been presented from the city. The Flaminian gate was thrown open to a real triumph; but it was not before Belisarius had visited every post, and provided for the public safety, that he could be persuaded by his wife and friends, to taste the needful refreshments of food and sleep. In the more improved state of the art of war, a general is seldom required or even permitted to display the personal prowess of a soldier; and the example of Belisarius is one of the rare exceptions of Henry IV. of Pyrrhus, and of Alexander.

After this first and unsuccessful trial of their enemies, the whole army of the Goths passed the Tiber, and formed the siege of the city, which continued above a year, till their final departure. Whatever severity or commotion the fortune of the city, the space within the walls was crowded with inhabitants and civilians; and the populous suburbs, that stretched along the public roads, were darted like so many rays from one common centre. Adversity swept away these extraneous ornaments, but the left naked and desolate a considerable part even of the seven hills. Yet Rome in its present state could send into the field above thirty thousand males of a military age; and, notwithstanding the want of discipline and exercise, the far greater part, inured to the hardships of poverty, might be capable of bearing arms even for the pay of their country. The prudence of Belisarius did not neglect this important resource. His soldiers were relieved by the zeal and diligence of the people, who watched while they slept, and laboured while they reposed; he accepted the voluntary service of the bravest and most indigent part of the Roman nation; he sometimes represented, in a vacant post, the presence of the troops which had been drawn away to more essential duties. But his just confidence was placed in the veterans who had fought under his banner in the Persian and African wars; and although that gallant band was reduced to five thousand men, he undertook, with such contemptible numbers, to defend a circle of twelve miles, against an army of one hundred and fifty thousand barbarians. In the walls of Rome, which Belisarius constructed or restored, the materials of ancient architecture may be observed, and the whole fortification was cemented, except in that happy junction between the Pincian and Flaminian gates, which the prejudices of the Goths and Romans left under the effectual guard of St. Peter the apostle. The battlements or hashtons were shaped in sharp angles: a ditch, fifteen feet broad and deep, effectually prevented the foot of the rampart; and the archers on the rampart were protected by massive engines; the bulata, a powerful crossbow, which darted short but massy arrows; the onager, or wild ass, which, on the principle of a sling, threw stones and bullets of an enormous size. A chain was drawn across the Tiber; the arches of the aqueducts were made impervious, and the mole or sepulchre of Hadrian was of the Goths. After this disappointment, Vitiges still continued, or feigned to continue, the assault of the Sabinian gate, that he might divert the attention of his adversary, while his principal forces more strenuously attacked the Prænestine gate and the sepulchre of Hadrian, at the distance of three miles from each other. In this rear the works of Prætulius and Lysippus were torn from their lofty pedestals, and hurled into the ditch on the heads of the besiegers. To each of his lieutenants, Belisarius assigned the defence of a gate, with the wise and peremptory instruction, that, whatever the fate of their respective gates, they should adhere to their respective posts, and trust their general for the safety of Rome. The formidable host of the Goths was insufficient to embrace the ample measure of the city: of the fourteen gates, seven only were invested from the Prænestine to the Flaminian way; and Vitiges divided his troops into six camps, each of which was fortified with a ditch and rampart. On the Tuscan side of the river, a seventh encampment was formed in the field or circus of the Vatican, for the important purpose of commanding the Milvian bridge and the Postumian gate. Their general, as a matter of devotion, the adjacent church of St. Peter; and the threshold of the holy apostles was respected during the siege by a christian enemy. In the ages of victory, as often as the senate deemed some distant conquest, the consul denounced hostilities, by unbarring, in his name, a postern gate of the palace of the Emperors. Domnestus war now rendered the admonition superfluous, and the ceremony was superseded by the establishment of a new religion. But the brazen temple of Janus was left standing in the forum: of a size sufficient only to contain the statue of the god, five cubits in height, of a human form; but with two faces, directed to the east and west. The double gates were likewise of brass; and a fruitless effort to turn them on their rusty hinges, revealed the scandalous secret, that some Romans were still attached to the superstition of the ancient gods.

Reparations were made to the rapid assault of the besiegers, to provide all the instruments of death, of attack which antiquity had invented. Fascines were prepared to fill all the ditches, scaling-ladders to ascend the walls. The largest trees of the forest, the timbers of the sea, batteries of iron, and their heads were armed with iron; they were suspended by ropes, and each of them was worked by the labour of fifty men. The lofty wooden turrets moved on wheels or rollers, and formed a spacious platform of the level of the ramparts. On the day of the truce, and the day following, a general attack was made from the Prænestine gate to the Vatican; seven Gothic columns, with their military engines, advanced to the assault; and the Romans who lined the ramparts, listened with doubt and anxiety to the cheerful assurances of their commander. As soon as the enemy approached the ditch, Belisarius himself drew the first arrow; and such was his strength and dexterity, that he transfixed the foremost of the barbarian leaders. A shout of applause and victory was re-echoed along the wall. He drew a second arrow, and the noise was followed with the sound of success and the same acclamation. The Roman general then gave the word, that the archers should aim at the teams of oxen; they were instantly covered with mortal wounds; the towers which they drew remained useless and immovable, and a single moment disconnected the laboured projects of the king of the Goths.

The Decline and Fall. Chapter II.

Ferrum was an angle in the new wall enclosed for wild beasts. (Procop. Hist. i. c. 15, p. 252.) The speculum Hippomaios is in Nardinii, (l. i. c. 5, p. 159), and Nolli's great plan of Rome.

For the Roman trumpet and its various notes, consult Livius, de Bello Latinis, lib. iii. cap. 34, who gives the origin of distinguishing the charge by the horn-trumpet of solid brass, and the retreat by the foot-trumpet of leather and light wood, which was borrowed from the barbarians. (G. h. i. c. 15.) treat (a hasty retreat) was covered by the prudence of the general, and the victors started back with alacrity from the formidable aspect of an armed rampart. The reputation of Belisarius was unsullied by a defea; and the courage of the troops was increased by the ardor of the women, who, ardent to designs, than the repentance and modesty of the Roman troops.

Disorder in the city determined to sustain a siege, his assiduous care provided Rome against the danger of famine by bringing in corn, which arrived to his designs, than the repentance and modesty of the Roman troops.

From the moment that Belisarius had assumed the command of Rome, the condition of the city was such as to make it the most important in the empire. An extraordinary supply of corn was imported from Sicily; the harvests of Campania and Tuscany were forcibly seized for the use of the city; and the rights of private property were infringed by the strong policy of the public safety. It might easily be foreseen that the enemy would intercept the aqueducts; and the cessation of the water-mills was the first inconvenience, which was speedily removed by mooring large vessels, and fixing mill-stones in the current of the river. The stream was soon embanked by the trunks of trees, and polluted with dead bodies; yet so early was it the precautions of the Romans, he believed that the waters of the Tiber still continued to give motion to the mills and drink to the inhabitants; the more distant quarters were supplied from domestic wells; and a besieged city might support, without impatience, the privation of her public baths. A large proportion of the Prænestine gate to the church of St. Paul, was never invested by the Goths; their excursions were restrained by the activity of the Moorish troops; the navigation of the Tiber, and the Latin, Appian, and Ostian ways, were left free and unimpeded. For the introduction of corn and cattle was the retreat of the inhabitants, who sought a refuge in Campania or Sicily. Anxious to relieve himself from a useless and devouring multitude, Belisarius issued his peremptory orders for the instant departure of the women, the children, and slaves; required his soldiers to dismiss them to civil and female attendance; regulated their allowance, that one moiety should be given in provisions, and the other in money. His foresight was justified by the increase of the public distress, as soon as the Goths had occupied two important posts in the neighborhood of Rome. By the loss of the port, or, as it was called, the melancholy, the people were deprived of the country on the right of the Tiber, and the best communication with the sea; and he reflected with grief and anger, that three hundred men, could he have spared such a feeble band, might have defended its impregnable works. Seven miles from the capital, a party of the inhabitants was exposed to the invitations of the principal aqueducts crossing, and again crossing each other, enclosed within their solid and lofty arches a fortified space, where Vitiges established a camp of seven thousand Goths to intercept the convoys of Sicily and Campania. The granaries of Rome were immediately exhausted; the adjacent country had been wasted with fire and sword; such scanty supplies as might yet be obtained by hasty excursions, were the reward of valour, and the purchase of wealth; the forage of the horses, and the bread of the soldiers, never filled, and in the last months of the siege, the people were exposed to the want of mankind, and of the wholesome food, and contagious disorders. Belisarius saw and pitied their sufferings; but he had foreseen, and he watched, the decay of their loyalty, and the progress of their discontent. Adversity had awakened the Roman minds from the dreams of grandeur and freedom, and taught them the humiliating lesson, that it was of small moment to their real happiness, whether the name of their master was given in the Latin or in the Gothic tongue. The lieutenant of Justinian listened to their just complaints, but he rejected with disdain the idea of flight or capitulation; repressed their clamorous impatience for battle; amused them with the prospect of sure and speedy relief; and secured himself and the city from the effects of the Goths' victory. Twice in each he changed the station of the officers to whom the custody of the gates was committed: the various precautions, of patrols, watch-words, lights, and music, were repeatedly employed to discover whatever passed on the ramparts; outguards were posted beyond the ditch, and the town walled up with the more doubtful fidelity of mankind. A letter was intercepted, which assured the king of the Goths, that the Arian bishop, adjoining to the Lateran church, should be secretly opened to his troops. On the Exile of pope St. Fabretti, with suspicion of treason, several sovereignty, A.D. 537, ator were banished, and two years was supposed to attend the representative of his sovereign, at his head-quarters in the Punic palace. The cœlestis who followed their bishop, were detained in the first or second apartment, and he alone was admitted to the presence of Belisarius. The conqueror of Rome and Carthage was at the feet of Antonina, who reclined on a stately couch; the general was silent, but the voice of reproach and menace issued from the mouth of his imperious wife. Accursed by credible witnesses, and the evidence of his own subscription, the successor of St. Peter was described of his pontifical ornaments, and in the mean habit of a monk, and embayed, without delay, for a distant exile in the east. At the emperor's command, the clergy of Rome proceeded to the choice of a new bishop; and after a solemn invocation of the Holy Ghost, elected the deacon Vigilis, who had purchased the papal throne by a bribe of two hundred pounds of gold. The profit, and consequently the guilt, of this simony, was imputed to Belisarius: but the hero obeyed the orders of his wife; Antonina served the passions of the emperor; and Theodora lavished her treasures, in the vain hope of obtaining a pontiff hostile or indifferent to the course of Chosroes.

The epistle of Belisarius to the emperor announced his victory, his danger, and his resolution. According to your commands, we have entered the dominions of the Goths, and reduced to your obedience, Sicily, Campania, and the city of Rome; but these two enemies are more greedy of plunder than their acquisition was glorious. Hitherto we have successfully fought against the multitudes of the barbarians, but their multitudes may finally prevail. Victory is the gift of Providence, but the reputation of kings and generals depends on the success or failure of their designs, and embarked, will be either betrayed by their confidence, or we shall be overthrown by the Goths. As for myself, my life is consecrated to your service: it is yours to reflect, whether my death in this action will con tribute to the glory and prosperity of your reign." Perhaps that reign would have been equally prosperous, if the peaceful master of the east had abstained from the conquest of Africa and Italy; but as Justinian was ambitious of fame, he made some efforts, they were nobly and distinctly, to support and rescue his spurious general. A reinforcement of sixteen hundred Schavonians and Huns was led by Martin and Valerian; and as they had resided during the winter season in the harbours of Greece, the strength of the men and horses was not impaired by the fatigues of a sea-voyage. They arrived and crossed the Ægean sea, freely against the besiegers. About the time of the summer solstice, Enthalius landed at Terracina with large sums of money for the payment of the troops; he cautiously proceeded along the Appian way, and this convey entered Rome through the gate Capena, while Belisarius, on the other side, diverted the attention of the Goths by a vigorous and successful skirmish.

These seasonal aids, the use and reputation of which were dexterously managed by the Roman general, revived the courage, or at least the hopes, of the soldiers and the people. The historian Procopius was despatched with an important commission, to collect the troops and provisions which Campania could furnish, or Constantine had sent; and the secretary of Belisarius was soon followed by Antonina herself, who boldly traversed the posts of the enemy, and returned with the oration in their ears, the relief of Rome a besieged city. A fleet of three thousand Issarian cast-anchors in the bay of Naples, and afterwards at Ostia. Above two thousand horse, of whom a part were Thracians, landed at Tarentum; and, after the junction of five hundred soldiers of Campania, and a train of waggon laden with wine and flour, they directed their march on the Appian way from Capua to the neighborhood of Rome. The forces that arrived by land and sea, were united at the mouth of the Tiber. Antonina convened a council of war: it was resolved to surmount with sails and oars the Ægean stream of the river; and the Goths were apprehensive of disturbing, by any rash hostilities, the negotiation to which Belisarius had craftily listened. They credulously believed that they saw no more than the vanguard of a fleet and army, which already covered the sea and the town of Campania; and the illusion was supported by the haughty language of the Roman general, when he gave audience to the ambassadors of Vitiges. After a spectious discourse to vindicate the justice of his cause, they declared, that, for the sake of peace, they were disposed to renounce the possession of Sicily. "The emperor is not less generous," replied his lieutenant, with a disdainful smile, "in return for a gift which you no longer possess, he presents you with an ancient province of the empire; he resigns to the Goths the sovereignty of the British Island." Belisarius rejected with equal firmness and contempt the offer of a tribute; but he allowed the Gothic ambassadors to seek their fate from the month of Justinian himself; and consented, with seeming reluctance, to a truce of three months, from the winter solstice to the equinox of spring. Provisions might not supply the Goths or hostages of the barbarians, but the conscious superiority of the Roman chief was expressed in the distribution of his troops. As soon as the relief of evacuating Rome, the relief of Alba, Porto, and Centumcellae, their place was similarly supplied. Thus the garrisons of Narni, Spoleto, and Perusia, were reinforced, and the seven camps of the besiegers were gradually encompassed with the calamities of a siege. The prayers and pilgrimage of Datus, bishop of Milan, were not without effect; and he obtained one thousand Thracians and Isaurians, to assist the revolt of I gora against her Arian tyrant. At the same time, John the Sanguinar, the nephew of Vitalian, was detached with two thousand men to have valourously on the island of the Italians; suffer not any fortified places to remain hostile in your rear; and faithfully reserve the spoil of an equal and common partition. ‘It would not be reasonable,’ he added with a laugh, ‘that whilst we are toiling to the destruction of Brones, our most fortunate brethren should rifle and enjoy the honey.’

The whole nation of the Ostrogoths had been assembled for the attack, and the siege of Rome was almost entirely consumed in the siege of Rome. If any credit he due to the historian in these intervals, the number of their enormous host was destroyed, in frequent and bloody combats under the walls of the city. The bad fame and pernicious qualities of the summer air, might already be imputed to the decay of agriculture and population; and the evils of famine and pestilence were arising to the insatiable and overweening, and unfriendly disposition of the country. While Vitiges struggled with his fortune, while he hesitated between shame and ruin, his retreat was hastened by domestic alarms. The king of the Goths was informed by remitting messengers, that John the Sanguinar spread the devastations of war from the Apennine to the Adriatic; that the rich spoils and innumerable captives of Picenum were lodged in the fortifications of Rimini; and that this formidable chief had defeated his uncle, insulted his capital, and seduced, by secret correspondence, the fidelity of his wife, the impious daughter of Amalasuntha. Yet, before he retired, Vitiges made a last effort, either to storm or to surprise the city. A secret passage was discovered in one of the acclivities; two citizens of the Vatican were tempted by bribes to enter the city, and to inform the Roman general, that the wall was meditated on the walls beyond the Tiber, in a place which was not fortified with towers; and the barbarians advanced, with torches and scaling-ladders, to the assault of the Pincian gate. But every attempt was defeated by the intrepid vigilance of Belisarius and his soldiers. The barbarians, regretting their movements, did not regret the absence of their companions; and the Goths, alike destitute of hope and subsistence, clamorously urged their departure, before the truce should expire, and the Roman cavalry should again be united. One year and nine days after the commencement of the siege, an army, so lately strong and triumphant, burnt their tents and tumultuously repassed the Milvian bridge. They repassed not with impunity: their thronging multitudes, oppressed in a narrow passage, were driven headlong into the Tiber, by their own heads and the pursuit of the enemy. The March of the Roman general, sallying from the Pincian gate, inflicted a severe and disgraceful wound on their retreat. The slow length of a sickly and desponding host was heavily dragged along the Flaminian way; from whence the barbarians were sometimes driven to deviate, lest they should encounter the hostile garrisons that guarded the high road to Rimini and Ravenna.

Yet so powerful was this living army, that Vitiges spared ten thousand men for the defence of the cities which he was most solicitous to preserve, and detached his bastard, with an accredited force, for the chastisement of rebellious Milan. At the head of his principal army, he besieged Rimini, with thirty-three miles distant from the Gothic capital. A feeble rampart, and a shallow ditch were maintained by the skill and valour of John the Sanguinariu, who shared the danger and fatigue of the nearest soldiers, and emulated, on a theatre less illustrious, the military virtues of his great commander. The towers and the epic of the towers and the murderous din were rendered useless; their attacks were repulsed; and the tedious blockade, which reduced the garrison to the last extremity of hunger, afforded time for the union and march of the Roman forces. A fleet which had surprised Ancona, sailed along the coast of the Adriatic, and before Narses landed in Picenum with two thousand Heruli and five thousand of the bravest troops of the east. The rock of the Apennine was forced; ten thousand veterans moved round the foot of the mountains, under the command of Belisarius himself; and a new array, whose encampment blazed with innumerable lights, appeared to advance along the Flaminian way. Overwhelmed with astonishment and despair, the Goths abandoned the siege of Rimini, their tents, their standards, and their leaders; and Vitiges, who gave or followed the example of flight, never had the good fortune to receive a shelter within the walls and morasses of Ravenna.

To these walls, and to some fortresses the Romans generout, destitute of any mutual support, the Goth A.D. 538. ic monarchy was now reduced. The provinces of Italy had embraced the party of the emperor, and had helped him, with the number of twenty thousand men, must have achieved an easy and rapid conquest, if their invincible powers had not been weakened by the discord of the Roman chiefs. Before the end of the siege, an act of blood, ambiguous and indirect, sullied the fair fame of Belisarius. President Constantine, who had permitted the troops at Rome, was rudely stopped by Constantine, the military governor of Spoleto, and despoiled, even in a church, of two daggers richly inlaid with gold and precious stones. As soon as the public danger had subsided, President Constantine committed the sole and light injury: his complaint was heard, but the order of restitution was disobeyed by the pride and avarice of the offender. Exasperated by the delay, Presidius boldly arrested the general's horse as he passed through the forum; and with the spirit of a citizen, demanded the common benefit of the Roman laws. Two, or at least three, of his comrades were engaged; he summoned a council; claimed the obedience of his subordinate officer; and provoked, by an insolent reply, to call hastily for the presence of his guards. Constantine, viewing their entrance as the signal of death, drew his sword, and rushed out, when the doers, who timidly eluded the stroke, was protected by his friends; while the desperate assassin was disarmed, dragged into a neighbouring chamber, and executed, or rather murdered, by the guards, at the arbitrary command of Belisarius. In this hasty act of violence, the guilt of Constan- tine was no longer imputed; but the despair and death of that valiant officer were secretly imputed to the revenge of Antonina; and each of his colleagues, conscious of the same rapine, was apprehensive of the same fate. The fear of a common enemy suspended the effects of their envy and discontent; but the influence of appeasement and conciliation; they instigated a powerful rival to oppose the conqueror of Rome and Africa. From the domestic service of the palace, and the administration of the private revenue, Narses the eunuch was exiled. He suddenly exiled to the head of an ar

4 They refused to serve after his departure; sold their captives and cattle to the Goths; and a slave never to fight against them. Procopius records a curious procedure in theItalian republic—ar dog-wanderer's nation, a part of whom finally emigrated to Thule or Scandinavia, (Goeth. iv. 165.)

5 This national reproach of servility (Procop. Goth. i. c. 22.) offends the ear of M. de Sacy in Vayre, (tom. vii. p. 163—166) who criticizes, as he has always done, the Gothic and Teutonic. Barabino appeals his treason, and justifies the catholic bishops—out our state heresy, the metals of the nation on them to convert—a useful caution. The more rational Muratori (Annali d'Italia, t. v. p. 54) limits the guilt of perjury, and blames at least the immoderacy of Belisarius.

6 St. Datur was more successful against devils than against barbarians. He travelled with a numerous retinue, and occupied a large house. (Barabino, A. D. 536. No. 89. A. D. 539. No. 29.)
fenders of the catholic faith. Three hundred thousand males were reported to be slain; the female sex, and the more prominent males, were captured; and the Burgundians; and the houses, or at least the Destruction of walls, of Milan, were levelled with the ground. The Goths, in their last moments, were ravaged by the destruction of a city, second only to Rome in size and opulence, in the splendid days in which the Goths inhabited it. And Belisarius sympathized alone in the fate of his deserted and devoted friends. Encouraged by this successful inroad, Theodoret himself, in the ensuing spring, invaded the plains of Italy with an army of one hundred thousand barbarians. The king, and some of his principal warriors, were mortally wounded and armed with lances; the infantry, without bows or spears, were satisfied with a shield, a sword, and a double-edged battle-axe, which, in their hands, became a deadly and murrning weapon. Italy trembled at the march of the Franks; and both the Gothic and the Roman general, alike ignorant of their designs, solicited, with hope and terror, the friendship of these dangerous allies. Till he had secured the passage of the Po on the bridge of Parvis, the grandson of Clavdia dismembered his intentions, which he at length declared by settling, almost at once and for ever, the hostile camps of the Romans and Goths. Instead of unifying their arms, they fled with equal precipitation; and the fertile, though desolate, provinces of Liguria and Emilia were abandoned to a licentious host of barbarians, whose rage was not mitigated by any thought of settling or conquering. Among the cities which they ruined, Genoa, not yet constructed of marble, is particularly enumerated; and the deaths of thousands, according to the regular practice of war, appear to have existed less horrid than some of those sacrilegious sacrifices of women and children, which were performed with equal stealth and cruelty in the camp of the most Christian king. If it were not a melancholy truth, that the first and most cruel sufferings must be the lot of the innocent and helpless, history might exult in the misery of the conquerors, who, in the midst of riches, were left destitute, torn by hunger, and reduced to the food of the Po, and to feed on the flesh of distempered cattle. The dysentery swept away one-third of their army; and the clamours of his subjects, who were impatient to pass the Alps, disposed Theodoret to listen with respect to the mild exhortations of Belisarius. The memory of this injurious and destructive war was perpetuated on the medals of Gaul; and Justinian, without unheathing his sword, assumed the title of conqueror of the Franks. The Merovingian prince was offended by the vanity of the emperor; he affected to pity the fallen fortunes of the Goths; and his insidious offers of a federal union were fortified by the promise or menace of descending from the Alps at the head of five hundred thousand men. His plans of conquest were boundless and perhaps chimerical. The king of Austrasia threatened to chastise Justinian, and to march to the gates of Constantinople; 2 he was overthrown and slain 1 by a wild bull 3 as he hunted in the Beligic or German forests.

As soon as Belisarius was delivered from his foreign and domestic enemies, he turned his army against the Burgundians, and assailed the city of Po, which was the last refuge of the nation. This success was crowned with the final reduction of Italy. In the siege of Osimo, the general was nearly transpired with an arrow, if the mortal stroke had not been intercepted by one of his guards, who lost, in that pious office, the use of his hand. The Goths of Osimo, four thousand warriors, were slain or taken prisoners, and fifty thousand more among the last who maintained their independence; and their gallant resistance, which almost tired the patience, deserved the esteem, of the conqueror. His prudence refused to subscribe the safe conduct which they asked, to join their brethren of Ravenna; but he bestowed on them an honorable capitulation, sparing at least of their wealth, with the free alternative of retiring peaceably to their estates, or enlisting to serve the emperor in his Persian wars. The multitudes which yet adhered to the standard of Vitiges, far surpassed the number of the Roman troops; but neither prayers, nor defiance, nor the extreme danger of his most faithful subjects, could tempt the Gothic king beyond the fortifications of Ravenna. These fortifications were, indeed, impregnable to the assaults of art or violence; and when Belisarius invested the capital, it was approached by an army that was strong enough to crush the stubborn spirit of the barbarians. The sea, the land, and the channels of the Po, were guarded by the vigilance of the Roman general; and his morality extended the rights of war to the practice of poisoning the waters; 4 secretly firing the granaries; 5 of a besieged city. While he possessed the rock of Ravenna, he was surprised by the arrival of two ambassadors from Constantinople, with a treaty of peace, which Justinian had imprudently signed, without inquiring to consult the author of his victory. By this precipitate and precipitous agreement, Italy and the Gothic treasure were diverted, and the provinces beyond the Po were left with the regal title to the successor of Theodoric. The ambassadors were eager to accomplish their salutary commission; the captive Vitiges accepted, with transport, the unexpected offer of a crown; honour was less prevalent among the Goths, than the want and appetite of food; and the Roman chiefs, who murmured at the continuance of the war, professed implicit submission to the commands of the emperor. If Belisarius had possessed only the courage of a soldier, the laurel would have been snatched from his hands by timid and vacuous counsels; but in this decisive moment, he resolved, with the magnanimity of a statesman, to suaitain alone the danger and merit of generous disobedience. Each of his officers gave a written epistle, that the siege of Ravenna might be the contemplative and hopeless; the general then rejected the treaty of partition, and declared his own resolution of leading Vitiges in chains to the fort of Justinian. The Goths retired with devout and dismay; this peremptory refusal deprived them of the only signature which they could trust, and filled their minds with the just apprehension, that a sagacious

The king pointed his spear—the bull overturned a tree on his head, and all the Franks fled. Such were the events of Aosta; but the original historians of France (tom. i. p. 302, 488, 555, 572.) correct the death of a fever.

4 Without being myself in a labyrinth of species and names— the aurora, urus, bisons, taurus, bison, buffalo, &c. (Bottin, Hist. Nat. tom. xi. and Supplement, tom. iii. vi.) it is certain, that in the sixth century a large wild species of boar calves was hunted in the great forests of the Goths in Lorraine, and the Ardennes of Turon. (tom. ii. i. c. 10. p. 390.)

6 The Goths suspected Nastrihimna as an accomplice in the mischief, which had been committed by Belisarius, and whom he ardently consulted; but in this decisive moment, he resolved, with the magnanimity of a statesman, to sustain alone the danger and merit of generous disobedience. Each of his officers gave a written epistle, that the siege of Ravenna might be the contemplative and hopeless; the general then rejected the treaty of partition, and declared his own resolution of leading Vitiges in chains to the fort of Justinian. The Goths retired with devout and dismay; this peremptory refusal deprived them of the only signature which they could trust, and filled their minds with the just apprehension, that a sagacious enemy had discovered the full extent of their deplorable state. They compared the fame and fortune of Belisarius with the weakness of their ill-fated king; and the comparison suggested an extraordinary project, to which Vitiges, with apparent resignation, was induced. His alliance was stipulated for, and in a few years his rapid success gained not only for his strength, exile would disgrace the honour of the nation; but they offered their arms, their treasures, and the fortifications of Ravenna, if Belisarius would disclaim the authority of a master, accept the choice of the Goths, and assume, as he had desired, the kingdom of Italy. Every spectator was convinced of the worthlessness of the remnant of the vigorous nation. They adored the majesty of the throne, and promised to shed their blood in the service of their benefactor. Justinian deposited in the Byzantine palace the treasures of the Gothic monarchy. A flattering senate was sometimes admitted to gaze on the magnificent spectacle; but it was eunuchiously secluded from the public view; and the conqueror of Italy renounced, without a murmur, perhaps without a sigh, the well-earned honours of a second triumph. His glory was indeed exalted above all external pomp; and the faint and hollow praises which filled the court were answered by the respect and admiration of his country. Whenever he appeared in the streets and public places of Constantinople, Belisarius attracted and satisfied the eyes of the people. His lofty stature and majestic countenance fulfilled their expectations of a hero; the magnificence of his fallen enemy was contrasted to his gentle and gracious demeanour; and the martial train which attended his footsteps, left his person more accessible than in a day of battle. Seven thousand horsemen, matchless for beauty and valour, were maintained in the service, and at the private expense, of the general. To these were added, in single combats, or in the foremost ranks; and both parties confessed, that in the siege of Rome, the guards of Belisarius had alone vanquished the barbarian host. Their numbers were continually augmented by the bravest and most faithful of the enemy; and his fortunate captives, the Vandals, the Moors, and the Goths, emulated the attachment of his domestic followers. By the union of liberality and justice, he acquired the love of the soldiers, without alienating the affections of the people. The sick and wounded were relieved with medicines, and supported by the charity of his youth; and the first prospects of the service of the emperor; the affection of the people was discredited to their peaceable inhabitants in the southern provinces; and a colony of Italians was invited to replenish the depopulated city. The submission of the capital was invited in the towns was opened to the fallen king; and the inhabitants or even visited, by the Romans; and the independent Goths, who remained in arms at Pavia and Verona, were ambitious only to become the subjects of Belisarius. But his inflexible loyalty rejected, as the substitute of Justinian, their oaths of allegiance, and he was not offended by the reproach of his deputies, that he rather chose to be a slave than a king.

Return and glory of Belisarius.

After the second victory of Belisarius, he was invited again to consult, Justinian listened to, and the hero was recalled. "The remnant of the nation of Antiochus was the despair of my presence: a gracious sovereign was impatient to reward his services, and to consult his wisdom; and he alone was capable of defending the east against the innumerable armies of Persia." Belisarius understood the suspicion, accepted the excuse, embarked at Ravenna his spoils and trophies; and proved, by his ready obedience, that such an abrupt removal from his situation of power was not only consistent with the dignity of his character, but might have been discreet. The emperor received with honourable courtesy both Vitiges and his more noble consort: and as the king of the Goths conformed to the Arian faith, he obtained, with a rich inheritance of lands in Asia, the rank of senator and patriarch. But, without patriotic ardour, and by the insinuation of the young barbarians: they adored the majesty of the throne, and promised to shed their blood in the service of their benefactor. Justinian deposited in the Byzantine palace the treasures of the Gothic monarchy. A flattering senate was sometimes admitted to gaze on the magnificent spectacle; but it was eunuchiously secluded from the public view; and the conqueror of Italy renounced, without a murmur, perhaps without a sigh, the well-earned honours of a second triumph. His glory was indeed exalted above all external pomp; and the faint and hollow praises which filled the court were answered by the respect and admiration of his country. Whenever he appeared in the streets and public places of Constantinople, Belisarius attracted and satisfied the eyes of the people. His lofty stature and majestic countenance fulfilled their expectations of a hero; the magnificence of his fallen enemy was contrasted to his gentle and gracious demeanour; and the martial train which attended his footsteps, left his person more accessible than in a day of battle. Seven thousand horsemen, matchless for beauty and valour, were maintained in the service, and at the private expense, of the general. To these were added, in single combats, or in the foremost ranks; and both parties confessed, that in the siege of Rome, the guards of Belisarius had alone vanquished the barbarian host. Their numbers were continually augmented by the bravest and most faithful of the enemy; and his fortunate captives, the Vandals, the Moors, and the Goths, emulated the attachment of his domestic followers. By the union of liberality and justice, he acquired the love of the soldiers, without alienating the affections of the people. The sick and wounded were relieved with medicines, and supported by the charity of his youth; and the first prospects of the service of the emperor; the affection of the people was discredited to their peaceable inhabitants in the southern provinces; and a colony of Italians was invited to replenish the depopulated city. The submission of the capital was invited in the towns was opened to the fallen king; and the inhabitants or even visited, by the Romans; and the independent Goths, who remained in arms at Pavia and Verona, were ambitious only to become the subjects of Belisarius. But his inflexible loyalty rejected, as the substitute of Justinian, their oaths of allegiance, and he was not offended by the reproach of his deputies, that he rather chose to be a slave than a king.

After the second victory of Belisarius, he was invited again to consult, Justinian listened to, and the hero was recalled. "The remnant of the nation of Antiochus was the despair of my presence: a gracious sovereign was impatient to reward his services, and to consult his wisdom; and he alone was capable of defending the east against the innumerable armies of Persia." Belisarius understood the suspicion, accepted the excuse, embarked at Ravenna his spoils and trophies; and proved, by his ready obedience, that such an abrupt removal from his situation of power was not only consistent with the dignity of his character, but might have been discreet. The emperor received with honourable courtesy both Vitiges and his more noble consort: and as the king of the Goths conformed to the Arian faith, he obtained, with a rich inheritance of lands in Asia, the rank of senator and patriarch. But, without patriotic ardour, and by the insinuation of the young barbarians: they adored the majesty of the throne, and promised to shed their blood in the service of their benefactor. Justinian deposited in the Byzantine palace the treasures of the Gothic monarchy. A flattering senate was sometimes admitted to gaze on the magnificent spectacle; but it was eunuchiously secluded from the public view; and the conqueror of Italy renounced, without a murmur, perhaps without a sigh, the well-earned honours of a second triumph. His glory was indeed exalted above all external pomp; and the faint and hollow praises which filled the court were answered by the respect and admiration of his country. Whenever he appeared in the streets and public places of Constantinople, Belisarius attracted and satisfied the eyes of the people. His lofty stature and majestic countenance fulfilled their expectations of a hero; the magnificence of his fallen enemy was contrasted to his gentle and gracious demeanour; and the martial train which attended his footsteps, left his person more accessible than in a day of battle. Seven thousand horsemen, matchless for beauty and valour, were maintained in the service, and at the private expense, of the general. To these were added, in single combats, or in the foremost ranks; and both parties confessed, that in the siege of Rome, the guards of Belisarius had alone vanquished the barbarian host. moment; that in the deepest distress, he was animated by real or apparent hope, but that he was modest and humble in the most prosperous fortune. By these virtues, he entered on a character of elevated and masterful military art. Victory, by sea and land, attended his arms. He subdued Africa, Italy, and the adjacent islands, led away captives the successors of Geneseric and Theodoric; filled Constantinople with the spoils of their palaces, and in the space of six years recovered half the provinces of the western empire. In his fame and merit, in wealth and power, he remained, without a rival, the first of the Roman subjects: the voice of envy could only magnify his dangerous importance; and the emperor might applaud his own discerning spirit, which had discovered and raised the genius of Belisarius.

behind the chariot to remind the conqueror of the instability of fortune, and the infirmities of human nature. Procopius, in his History of the Wars, has assumed that servile and ungrateful office. The generous reader may cast away the libel, but the evidence of facts will adhere to his memory; and he will reluctantly confess, that the fame, and even the virtue, of Belisarius was derived by the lust and cruelty of his wife; and that the hero deserved a life of quiet tillage and true happiness may not drop from the pen of the decent historian. The mother of Antonina was a theatrical actress, and both her father and grandfather exercised at Thessalonica and Constantinople, the vile, though lucrative, profession of clowns. In the various situations of their fortune, she became the companion, the enemy, the servant, and the favourite of the emperor: these loose and ambitious females had been connected by similar pleasures; they were separated by the jealousy of vice, and at length reconciled by the partnership of sin. If the name of Antonina is said to have been conferred on Belisarius, Antonina had one husband and many lovers; Photius, the son of her former nuptials, was of an age to distinguish himself at the siege of Naples; and it was not till the autumn of her age and beauty that she indulged a sensuous attachment to a Thracian youth.

Theodosius, who had been educated in the domus. Eumonian heresy; the African voyage was consecrated by the baptism and auspicious name of the first soldier who embraced; and the prostrate was adopted into the family of his spiritual parents,7 for who Belisarius was a son.

Before the shores of Africa, this holy kindred degenerated into sensual love; and as Antonina soon overleaped the bounds of modesty and caution, the Roman general was alone ignorant of his own dishonour. During their residence at Carthage, he surprised the two lovers in a subterraneous chamber, solitary, warm, and almost naked. Anger flashed from his eyes. “With the help of this young man,” said the unblushing Antonina, “I was secreting our most precious effects from the knowledge of Justinian.” The youth resumed his garments, and the pious husband consented to disbelieve the evidence of his own senses. From this pleasing and perhaps voluntary delusion, Belisarius was awakened at Syracuse, by the officious information of Macedonia; and that female attendant, after requiring an oath for her security, produced two chamberlains, who, like herself, had often beheld the adulteries of Antonina. A hasty flight into Asia saved Theodosius from the justice of an injured husband, who had signified to one of his guards the order of his death; but the tears of Antonina, and her artful seductions, assured the criminal of a reprieve; and he stooped, against his faith and judgment, to abandon those imprudent friends who had presumed to accuse or doubt the chastity of his wife. The revenge of a guilty woman is implacable and bloody; the unfortunate Macedonia, with the two witnesses, were secretly arrested by the minister of her cruelty; their tongues were cut out, their bodies were hacked into small pieces, and their remains were cast into the sea of Syracuse. A rough and indolent saying of Constantine, “I would sooner have punished the adulteress than the boy,” was deeply remembered by Antonina; and two years afterwards, when despair had armed that officer against his general, her sanguinary advice decided and hastened his execution. Even the indignation of Photius was not forgiven by his mother; the exile of her daughter was condoned to accept the pressing and humble invitation of the conqueror of Italy. In the absolute direction of his household, and in the important commissions of peace and war, the favourite youth most rapidly acquired a fortune of four hundred thousand pounds sterling, and after their return to Constantinople, the passion of Antonina, the leisure, and the wealth, did not prevent an abject devotion, and lassitude perhaps, inspired Theodosius with more serious thoughts. He dreaded the busy scandal of the capital, and the indirect friendliness of the wife of Belisarius; escaped from her embraces, and returning to Ephesus, shaved his head, and took refuge in the sanctuary of a monastic life. The despair of the new Arianae could scarcely have been excused by the death of her husband. She wept, tore her hair, she filled the palace with her cries; she had lost the dearest of friends, a tender, a faithful, a laborious friend! But her tears were not observed. The envious and abuses of the bishop of Ephesus, whose labours and Advice of the emperor to punish, and less prompt, to pardon; he flew to Ephesus; extorted from a trusted eunuch of his mother the full confession of her guilt; arrested Theodosius and his treasures in the church of St John the apostle, and concealed his captives, whose execution was only delayed, in a secure and sequacious

7 The difference of Alexandrius could add little to the four first arrivals of the Anicetus of the Apostolic collector. The apparent or Alexandri, a part may be true, because probable—and a part true, because improbable. Procopius have not proved the Arianus; or have known the former, and the latter he could scarcely invent.

In November 537, Photius arrested the pope. (Liberal, Rev. c. 22. Papel, tom. ii. p. 562.) About the end of 539, Belisarius sent Theodosius to Ravenna. (Goth. l. i. c. 16.) Photius was apprehended and committed to Ravenna. (Goth. l. ii. c. 1.)

fortress of Cilicia. Such a daring outrage against public justice could not pass with impunity; and the cause of Antonina was espoused by the emperor, whose favor she had long enjoyed, the public cry, a treatise of a prefect, and the exile and murder of a pope. At the end of the campaign, Belisarius was recalled; he complied, as usual, with the imperial mandate. His mind was not prepared for rebellion; his obedience, however adverse to the dictates of honour, was constant to the wishes of his heart; and when he embraced his wife, at the command, and perhaps in the presence, of the emperor, the tender husband was disposed to forgive or to be forgiven. The bounty of Theodora reserved for her companion a more precious favour. "I have found," she said, "my dearest patroness, a pearl of inestimable value; it has not yet been viewed by any mortal eye; but the sight and the possession of this jewel are destined for my friend." As soon as the curiosity and impatience of Antonina were kindled, the door of a bedchamber was thrown open, and she beheld her lover, whom the diligence of the empress had discovered in his secret prison. Her silent wonder burst into passionate exclamations of gratitude and joy, and she named Theodora her queen, her benefactress, and her saviour. The monk of Ephesus was nourished in the palace with luxury and ambition; but instead of assuming, as he was promised, the command of the army, he fled, and expressed himself in the first fatigues of an anxious interview. The grief of Antonina could only be assuaged by the sufferings of her son. A youth of consular rank, and a sickly constitution, was punished, without a trial, like a malefactor and a slave; yet such was the constancy of his mind, that Phocian sustained the torments of the scourge and the rack without violating the faith which he had sworn to Belisarius. After this frutile cruelty, the son of Antonina, while his mother feasted with the emperor, was buried in her subterraneous prisons, which admitted not the admission of night and day. He twice escaped to the most venerable sanctuaries of Constantinople, the churches of St. Sophia and of the Virgin; but his tyrants were insensible of religion as of pity; and the helpless youth, amidst the clamours of the clergy and people, was twice dragged from the altar to the dungeon. His third attempt was more successful. At the end of three years, the prophet Zachariah, or some mortal friend, indicated the means of an escape: he eluded the spies and guards of the empress, reached the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem, embraced the profession of a monk; and the abbot Photius was employed, after the death of Justinian, to receive him as a monk and regent of the churches of Egypt. The son of Antonina suffered all that an enemy can inflict; her patient husband imposed on himself the more exquisite misery of violating his promise and deserting his friend.

In the succeeding campaign, Belisarius was again sent against the Persians: Belisarius he saved the east, but he offended Theodora, and perhaps the emperor himself. The malady of Justinian had consoled the memoirs of his death; and the Roman general, on the supposition of that probable event, spoke the language of a citizen and a soldier; his colleague Buzes, who concurred in the same sentiments, lost his rank, his liberty, and his health, by the persecution of the empress; but the disgrace of Belisarius was alleviated by the dignity of his own character, and the influence of his wife, who might with justice be supposed to desire his services as a partner of her fortunes. Even his removal was coloured by the assurance, that the sinking state of Italy would be retrieved by the single presence of his conqueror. But no sooner had he returned, alone and defenceless, than a hostile commission was sent to the east, to seize his treasures and crimson his name. His wife, who had followed his private banner, were distributed among the chiefs of the army, and even the emblems presumed to cast lots for the partition of his martial domains. When he passed with a small and sordid retinue through the streets of Constantinople, the flocks of the people, who murmured against his disgrace, followed the sordid and guilty. The flocks of the people, who murmured against his disgrace, followed the sordid and guilty.
ceed fifteen hundred cities from the lake Mesotis to the Red sea; but the fortune of Rome flew before his eagles; the nations were oppressed by their own fears, and the invincible legions which he commanded, had been formed by the habits of conquest and the discipline of ages. In this view, the character of Belisarius may be deservedly placed above the heroes of the ancient republics. His imperfections flowed from the contagion of the times; his virtues were his own, the free gifts of his own heart. He regarded himself as a master or a rival; and so inadequate were his means, that his sole advantage was derived from the pride and presumption of his adversaries. Under his command, the subjects of Justinian often desired to be called Romans; but the unwarlike appellation of Greek was imposed as a term of reproach by the haughty Goths; who afflicted to blush, that they must dispute the kingdom of Italy with a nation of tragedians, pantomimes, and pirates. The climate of Asia has indeed been found less congenial than that of Europe to military spirit; these populous countries were enervated by luxury, despotism, and superstition; and the monks were more expensive and more numerous than the soldiers of the east. The regular force of the empire had once amounted to six hundred and forty-five thousand men; it was reduced, in the time of Justinian, to one hundred and fifty thousand. Moreover, large as the empire was, it was scarcely scoured in Spain and Italy, in Africa and Egypt, on the banks of the Danube, the coast of the Euxine, and the frontiers of Persia. The citizen was exalted, yet the soldier was unpaid; his poverty was mischievously supported by the privileges of rapine and indolence; and the tardy payments were detained and intercepted by the fraud of those agents who usurp, without courage or danger, the emoluments of war. Public and private distress recruited the armies of the state; but in the field, and still more in the presence of battle, their number was always defective. The want of national spirit was supplied by the precarious faith and disorderly service of barbarian mercenaries. Even military honour, which has often survived the loss of virtue and freedom, was almost totally extinct. The generals, who were multiplied beyond the example of former times, laboured only to prevent the success, or to sully the reputation, of their colleagues; and they had been taught by experience, that if merit sometimes provoked the jealousy, envy, or even guilt, would obtain the indulgence, of a generous emperor, it was expedient to transfer the incursions of the Goths. Afterwards of Narses, shine with incomparable lustre; but they are encompassed with the darkest shades of disgrace and calamity. While the lieutenant of Justinian subdued the kingdoms of the Goths and Vandals, the emperor, timid, though ambitious, balanced the forces of the barbarians, composed their divisions by flattery and falsehood, and invited by his patience and liberality the repetition of injuries. The keys of Carthage, Rome, and Ravenna, were presented to their conquerors, while Antioch was destroyed by the Persians, and Justinian troubled for the safety of Constantinople. About the middle of the 6th century the districts of Belisarius were prejudicial to the state, since they abolished the important barrier of the Upper Danube, which had been so faithfully guarded by Theodoric and his daughter. For the defence of Italy, the Goths evacuated Pannonia and Noricum, which they left in a peaceful and flourishing condition; people of vigour was claimed by Rome to preserve the ancient name of Roman; the actual possession was abandoned to the boldness of the first invader. On the opposite banks of the Danube, the plains of Upper Hungary and the Transylvanian hills were possessed, since the death of Attila, by the tribes of the Gepidae, who respected the Gothic name, and despised, not Goths. The Gepidae were indeed the gold of the Romans, but the secret motive of their annual subsidies. The vacant fortifications of the river were instantly occupied by these barbarians: their standards were planted on the walls of Sirmium and Belgrade; the ironical tone of their apology aggravated this insult on the majesty of the empire. "So extensive, O Caesar, are your dominions; so numerous are your cities; that you are continually seeking for nations to whom, either in peace or war, you may relinquish these useless possessions. The Gepidae are your brave and faithful allies; and if you have rejected your gifts, they have shown a just confidence in your bounty." Their presumption was excused by the mode of revenge which Justinian embraced. Instead of asserting the rights of a sovereign for the protection of his subjects, the emperor invited a strange people to share the protection of his empire. The sons, the brothers, the cousins of these savage warriors: but the original name of Lanzobards is expressive only of the peculiar length and fashion of their beards. I am not disposed either to question or to justify their Scandinavian origin; nor to pursue the migrations of the Lombards through unaffected history. The time of Augustus and Trajan, a ray of historic light breaks on the darkness of their antiquities, and they are discovered, for the first time, between the Elbe and the Oder. Fierce, beyond the example of the Germans, they delighted to propagate the tremendous belief, that their beards were formed like the heads of dogs, and that they drank the blood of their enemies whom they vanquished in battle. The smallness of their numbers was recruited by the adoption of their bravest heroes, and when the followers of the same valor were united, they erected a formidable barrier on the middle of the Elbe and the Danube; and at the end of four hundred years they again appear with their ancient valour and renown. Their manners were not less ferocious. The assassination of a royal guest was executed in the presence, and by the command, of the king's daughter, who had been provoked by some words of insult, and disappointed by his diminutive stature; and a diet, the price of which was the most painful by the brooding of a woman. The Frankish nation, as the court of the Hethert, was the asylum of moderation and justice; and the insensate of conquest was chastised by the signal defeat and irreparable dispersion of the Hethert, who were seated in the

The victories of the Lombards recommended them to the friendship of the emperors; and at the solicitation of Justinian, they passed the Danube to reduce, according to their treaty, the little baronies which had fixed their dwellings on the spirit of rapine soon tempted them beyond these ample limits; they wandered along the coast of the Hadritic as far as Dyrachium, and presaged, with familiar rudeness, to cut the towns and houses of their Roman allies, and to seize the captives who had escaped. They afterwards mingled with their rapid marchers could not be stopped by the famous well, applied by an ambassador who received only verbal instructions from the mouth of the illustrious prince. The Bulgarians, of whatsoever species, were equally attracted by Roman wealth: they assumed a vague dominion over the Scythian name, and mingled among them their rapid marchers, who could not be stopped by the Baltic sea, or the extreme cold and poverty of the north. But the same race of Scythians appears to have maintained, in every age, the possession of the same countries. Their numerous tribes, however distant or adverse, used one common language, (it was harsh and irregular,) their weapons of defense of their flocks, which deviated from the swarthiness of the Tartar, and approached without attaining the lofty stature and fair complexion of the German. Four thousand six hundred villages were scattered over the provinces of Russia and Poland, and their huts were hastily built in a country deficient in stone and iron. Cairns or rather mounds, in the depth of forests, on the banks of rivers, or the edge of morasses, we may not perhaps Without Flattery, compare them to the architecture of the beaver; which they resembled in a double issue, to the land and water, for the escape of the savage inhabitant, an animal less cleanly, less diligent, and less social, than that marvellous quadruped. The fertility of the soil rather than the labour of the natives, supplied the rustic plenty of the Scythians. Their sheep and horned cattle were large and numerous, and they amused themselves with making the fields wider, and the meadows richer, by driving their animals beyond the limits prescribed to them by their mutual consent again kindled; and the remembrance of their shame rendered the next encounter more desperate and bloody. Forty thousand of the barbarians perished in the decisive battle, which broke the power of the Gepid, transferred the fears and passions of the tribes in the fields wider, and the wandering character of Alboin, the youthful prince of the Lombards, and the future conqueror of Italy.

The Scythians. The wild people who dwelt wandered in the plains of Russia, Lithuania, and Poland, might be reduced, in the age of Justinian, under the two great families of the Bulgarians and the Scythians.

According to the Greek writers, who located the region of the Scythians, and the Scythian cities, no country was ever or remained uninvaded, in which were fortified, though in flight, inevitable of fear. The

The Scythians did not offer a despotic prince, or even a noble magistracy, but their simple life was too narrow, their passions too become a king, to compose a firm and universal law or general defence. Some voluntary respect was yielded to age and valor: but each tribe or village, which was a separate republic, and all must be persuaded where none could be compelled. They fought in foot, almost naked, and, except a unwieldy shield, without any defensive armor; their weapons of defense were a bow, a quiver of small poisoned arrows, and a long rope, which they dexterously threw from a distance, and entangled their enemy in a running noise. In the field the Scythian infantry was dangnorous by their speed, agility, and hardness; they were swift, they moved under water, darting their break through a hollow case; and a river or lake was often the scene of their unsuspected ambuscade. But these were the achievements of spies or strugglers; the military art was unknown to the Sca-Scythians; their name was obscure, and their conquests were inglorious.

1 Two facts in the narrative of Paul Diacreus (I, c. 60) are expressive of national manners: 1. Dum ad tabulam tulerint—while he played at draughts, 2. Campionem viridantis lino—The cultivation of this saponaceous property, comestibles, agriculture, and manufactures.

Their inroads. I have marked the faint and general outline of the Selavonians and Bulgarians, without attempting to define their immediate boundaries, which were not accurately known or respected by the barbarians themselves. Their im- portance was increased by their protection to the emperors of Byzantium, and the level country of Moldavia and Walachia was occupied by the Antes, a Selavonian tribe, which swelled the titles of Justinian with an epithet of conquest. Against the Antes he erected the fortifications of the Dardanian Alps, erected laborious works to secure the presence of a people seated in the direct channel of northern invasion, an interval of two hundred miles between the mountains of Transylvania and the Euxine sea. But the Antes wanted power and inclination to stem the fury of the torrent; and the light-armed Selavonians, from a hundred tribes, pursued with almost equal speed the footsteps of the Bulgarian horse. The payment of one piece of gold for each soldier procured a safe and easy retreat through the country of the Gepids, who commanded the passage of the Upper Danube. The hopes or fears of the barbarians; their intestine union or discord; the accident of a sullen or shallow stream; the prospect of harvest or vintage; the prosperity or distress of the Romans; were the causes which produced the uniform repetition of annual visits, tedious in the narrative, and destructive in the event. The same year, and possibly the same month, in the narrative, in which he was marked by Thracian Chersonesus, extinguished the habitations and the inhabitants, boldly traversed the Hellespont, and returned to their companions, laden with the spoil of Asia. Another party, which seemed a multitude in the eyes of the Romans, penetrated, without opposition, from the straits of Thermopylae to the isthmus of Corinth; and the last ruin of Greece has appeared an object too minute for the attention of history. The works which the emperor had no more time or patience to perfect, by the expense of his own subjects, served only to disclose the weakness of some neglected part; and the walls, which by flatness had been deemed impregnable, were either deserted by the garrison, or scaled by the barbarians. Three thousand Selavonians, who insulted the islands, divided themselves into two bands, discovered the weakness and misery of a triumphant reign. They passed the Danube and the Hebrus, vanquished the Roman generals who dared to oppose their progress, and plundered with impunity the cities of Illyricum and Thrace, each of which had arms and numbers to overwhelm their contemptible assailants. Whatever praise the boldness of the Selavonians may deserve, it is sullied by the wanton and deliberate cruelty which they are accused of exercising on their prisoners. Without distinction of rank, of age, or sex, the captives were impaled, or flayed alive, or suspended between four posts, and beaten with clubs till they expired, or enclosed in some spacious building, and left to perish in the flames with the spoil and cattle which might impede the march of these savage victors. Their children were reduced to the emaciated state, reduced the number, and qualify the nature, of these horrid acts; and they might sometimes be excused by the cruel laws of retaliation. In the siege of Topirius, whose obstinate defence had enraged the Selavonians, they massacred fifteen thousand males; but they spared the women and children; and valuable captives were always reserved for labour or ransom; the servitude was not rigorous, and the terms of their deliverance were speedy and moderate. But the subject, or the historian of Justinian, exalted his just indignation in the language of complaint and reproach; and Procopius has confidently affirmed, that in a reign of thirty-two years, each annual inroad of the barbarians consumed two hundred thousand of the inhabitants of the Roman empire. The entire population of Turkish Europe, which nearly corresponds with the provinces of Asia Minor, would perhaps be incapable of supplying six millions of persons, the result of this incredible estimate. In the midst of these obscure calamities, Europe felt the shock of a revolution, which first revealed to the world the name of Scythia. At the death of Aurelian, a Scythian, the young and valiant son of Argimus, called Romulus, the founder of that martial people was suckled by a she-wolf, who afterwards made him the father of a numerous progeny; and the representation of that animal in the banners of the Turks preserved the memory, or rather suggested the idea, of a fable, which might have produced the dragged insignia, by the shepherds of Latium and those of Scythia. At the equal distance of two thousand miles from the Caspian, the Iey, the Chinese, and the Bengal seas, a ridge of mountains is conspicuous, the centre, and perhaps the summit, of Asia; which, in the language of different nations, has been styled Imus, and Caf, and Altai, and the Golden Mountains, and the Girdle of the Earth. The sides of the hills were productive of minerals; and the iron forges, for the purpose of war, were exercised by the Turks, the most despotic portion of Asia. By the expense of property of the greater part of the great king of Scythia, the tyrants were reduced to the last extremity, to beg beasts in the ceremony, in which a piece of iron was heated in the fire, and a smith's hammer was successively handled on... by the prince and his nobles, recorded for ages the humble profession and rational pride of the Turkish nation. Bertezena, their first leader, signalized their valour and his own in successful combats against the neighbouring tribes; but when he presumed to ask in marriage the virgins of the great demand of a slave and a mechanic was contemptuously rejected. The disgrace was expiated by a more noble alliance with a princess of China; and the decisive battle which almost extinguished the nation of the Geor-gen, established in Tartary the new and more powerful empire of the Turks. They were not slow to profit by the example of their adversaries, but they confessed the vanity of conquest, by their faithful attachment to the mountain of their fathers. The royal encampment seldom lost sight of Mount Altai, from whence the river Irtil descends to the rich pastures of the Calkunaks, which nourish the largest sheep and oxen in the world. The soil is fruitful, and the climate temperate and happy; the region was ignorant of earthquake and pestilence; the emperor's throne was turned towards the east, and a golden wolf on the top of a spear seemed to guard the entrance of his tent. One of the successors of Bertezena was temporal and religious power, but his design of building cities and temples was defeated by the simple wisdom of a barbarian counsellor. "The Turks," he said, "are not equal in number to one hundredth part of the inhabitants of China. If we balance their power, and clude their armies, it becomes easier to subdue other nations, in the exercise of war and hunting. Are we strong? We advance and conquer; are we feeble? We retire and are concealed. Should the Turks confine their lives within the walls of cities, the loss of a battle would be the destruction of their empire. The Goths preluded only patience-they never sinned without any fixed habitations, in the exercise of war and hunting. Such, O king! is not the religion of heroes." They entertained, with less reluctance, the doctrines of Zoroaster; but the greatest part of the nation acquiesced, without inquiry, in the opinions, or rather in the practices, of their ancestors. The honours of sacrifice were reserved for the supreme deity; they acknowledged, in rude hymns, their obligations to the air, the fire, the water, and the earth; and their priests derived some profit from the art of divination. Their unwritten laws were rigorous and impious; theft was punished by a tenfold restitution; adultery, treachery, and murder, with all the annexed penalties, were execrated. There was severe for the rare and inexorable guilt of cowardice. As the subject nations marched under the standard of the Turks, their cavalry, both men and horses, were proudly computed by millions; one of their effective armies consisted of four hundred thousand soldiers, and in less than fifty years they were connected in peace and war with the Romans, the Persians, and the Chinese. In their northern limits, some vestige may be discovered of the form and situation of Kmantchats, of a people of hunters and fishermen, whose sledges were drawn by dogs, and whose habitations were built on a tumb, the turfs were ignominous and wretched; of the observation taken by some learned Chinese; with a gnomon of eight feet, fixes the royal camp in the latitude of forty-nine degrees, and marks their extreme progress within three, or at least ten, degrees of the polar circle. Among their southern conquests, the most splendid was that of the Nepthnals or White Huns, a polite and warlike people, who possessed the commercial cities of Bechara and Samarcand, who had vanquished the Persian monarch, and carried their victorious arms along the banks, and perhaps to the mouth, of the Indus. On the shore of the west, the Turkish cavalry advanced into the lake Matons. They passed that lake on the ice. The khan who dwelt at the foot of Mount Altai, issued his commands for the siege of Bosphorus, a city, the voluntary subject of Rome, and whose princes had formerly been the friends of Athens. To the east, the Turks invaded China, as often as the inhabitants of that country were tempted by avarice, and it was sufficient to read in the history of the times, that they marched down their patient enemies like hemp or grass; and that the mandarins applauded the wisdom of an emperor who repulsed these barbarians with golden lances. This extent of savage empire compelled the Turkish envoy to humble and to estimate the wisdom of his nation. The revival of their name and dominion in the southern countries of Asia, are the events of a later age; and the dynasties, which succeeded to their native realms, may sleep in oblivion; since their history bears no relation to the decline and fall of the Roman Empire.

In the rapid career of conquest, the Turks attacked and subdued the nations of Tartary, of the Ogers or Varchonites, on the and approaching banks of the river of the Til, which derived the epithet of black from its dark water or gloomy forests. He was slain, and the khan of the Turks, with the bodies of thousand of his subjects, and their bodies were scattered over the space of four days' journey: their surviving countrymen acknowledged the strength and mercy of the Turks; and a small portion, about twenty thousand warriors, preferred exile to servitude. They were followed the whole length of the empire, by the error of the nations who confounded them with the Arvas, and spread the terror of that false though famous appellation, which had not, however, saved its lawful proprietors from the yoke of the Turks. After a long and victorious march, the new Arvas arrived at the foot of mount Caucasus, in the country of the Arabi and Circassians, where they first heard of the splendour and weakness of the Roman empire. They humbly requested their confederate, the prince of the Alani, to lead them to this source of riches; and their ambassador, with the permission of the governor of Lazica, was transported to Constantinople, in the summer. The whole city was poured forth to behold with curiosity and terror the aspect of a strange people; their long hair, which hung in tresses down their backs, was gracefully bound with ribbons, but the rest of their habit appeared to imitate the fashion of their embassy to the Huns. When they were admitted Constantinople, to the audience of Justinian, Candish, A. D. 555, the first of the ambassadors, addressed the Roman em-

3 For the origin and revolutions of the first Turkish empire, the Chinese details are borrowed from De Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 269—352) and Vehudel, (Compendium de la Bibliotheque Orient. d'Histoire, p. 92-111.) The Greek or Roman hints are gathered in Menander (p. 165-194), and Theophylact Simocatta, (G. i. c. 7. 5.)

4 The river Til, or Tula, according to the geography of De Guignes, (Guzi, i. p. 2, p. 216, and 332) is a small, though grateful, stream of the desert, that falls into the river Oxus near Semkour, in the Great Russian province, from Petersburg to Pekin; (vol. i. p. 121,) but its own description of the Kest, down which he sailed in the Gっn, the former name and attributes of the black river, (p. 129.)

5 Theophylact, (P. 109—110,) says that true Aras are invisible even to the eyes of M. de Guignes; and what can be more illustrious than the false? The right of the fugitive Ogres to that national appellation is confounded with the Turks, according to D'Anville's maps. They opposed the march of the generals of Zoign round the Caspian sea, and were overthrown in a great battle. (Hist. de Genicican, i. iv. c. 9. p. 197.) peror in these terms: "You see before you, O mighty prince, the representatives of the strongest and most populous of nations, the invincible, the irresistible Avars. We are willing to devote ourselves to your service: we are able to vanquish and destroy all the enemies who now disturb your reposé. But we expect, as the price of our alliance, as the reward of our valour, the annual subsidy, and fruitless possession;" At the time of this embassy, Justinian had reigned above thirty, he had lived above seventy-five years: his mind as well as his body, was feeble and languid; and the conqueror of Africa and Italy, careless of the permanent interest of his dominions, aspired only to the morbid vanity of the bosom even of inglorious peace. In a studied oration, he implored to the senate his resolution to dissemble the insult, and to purchase the friendship of the Avars; and the whole senate, like the mandarins of China, applauded the incomprollable wisdom and foresight of their sovereign. The instruments of luxury were immediately prepared to captivate the barbarians; silken garments, soft and splendid beds, and chains and collars incensed with gold. The ambassadors, content with such liberal reception, departed from Constantiople, and Valentin, one of the envoys, was sent with a similar character to their camp at the foot of mount Caesarius. As their destruction or their success must be alike advantageous to the empire, he persuaded them to invade the empires of Rome; and they were easily tempted, by gifts and promises, to gratify their inclinations. Those fugitives, who fled before the Turk in arms, passed by the Tanais and Borysthenes, and boldly advanced into the heart of Poland and Germany, violating the law of nations, and abusing the rights of victory. Before ten years had elapsed, their camps were seated on the Danube and the Elbe, many Bulgarian and Selonian names were obliterated from the earth, and the remainder of their tribes are found, as tributaries and vassals, under the standard of the Avars. The chagan, the peculiar title of their king, still affected to cultivate the friendship of the emperor; and Justinian entertained some thoughts of ceding Transmut, to balance the prevailing power of the Lombards. But the virtue or treachery of an Avar betrayed the secret enmity and ambitious designs of their countrymen; and they loudly complained of the timidity and jealous policy, of defaming their ambassadors, and denying the arms which they had been allowed to purchase in the capital of the empire."

Embusades of the Turks and Romans. A.D. 569-592. attributed to the embassy which was charged to the emperor as a matter of the Avars.4 The immense distance which eluded their arms, could not extinguish their resentment: the Turkish ambassadors pursued the foot-prints of the vanquished to the Jaik, the Volga, mount Caesarius, the Erkine, and Constantiople, and at length appeared before the successor of Constantine, to request that he would not eschew the cause of rebels and fugitives. Even commerce had some share in this remarkable negotiation: and the Sozgoites, who were now the tributaries of the Turks, embraced the fair occasion of opening, by the north of the Caspian, a new road for the importation of Chinese silk into the Roman empire. The Persian, who preferred the navigation of Ceylon, had stopped the caravans of Bochara and Samarcand; their silk was contemptuously burnt: some Turkish ambassadors died in Persia, with a suspicion of poison; and the great khan permitted his faithful vassal Manichae, the prince of the Sogdioites, to propose, at the Byzantine court, a treaty of alliance against their common enemies. Their splendid apparel and rich presents, the fruit of oriental luxury, disinguished Manichae and his colleagues from the rude savages of the north: their letters, in the Suythian character and language, announced a people who had attained the polish of the orient; but Justinian mustered his conquests, they offered the friendship and military aid of the Turks: and their sincerity was attested by dreadful imprecations (if they were guilty of falsehood) against their own head, and the head of Disabul their chief princi exterminated with horror; because of the extreme enmity which they entertained to the ambassadors of a powerful monarch; the sight of silk-urns and lions disappointed the hopes of the Sogdioites: the emperor renounced, or seemed to renounce, the fugitive Avars, but he accepted the alliance of the Turks; and the ratification of the treaty was carried by a Roman minister to the foot of mount Altai. Under the successors of Justinian, the friendship of the two nations was cultivated by frequent and cordial intercourse; the most favoured vassals were permitted to imitate the example of the great khan, and one hundred and six thousand of the disengaged, who were the most eminent of the Sogdian, departed at the same time for their native country. The duration and length of the journey from the Byzantine court to mount Altai are not specified: it might have been difficult to mark a road through the nummose deserts, the mountains, rivers, and immense ranges of Tartary; so that the most of the ambassadors, who were selected to attend the great Khan in his tent, seated in a chair with wheels, to which a horse might be occasionally harnessed. As soon as they had delivered their presents, which were received by the proper officers, they exposed, in a florid creation, the wishes of the Roman emperor, that victory might attend the arms of the Turks, that their reign might be long and prosperous, and that a strict alliance, without envy or deceit, might for ever be maintained between the two most powerful nations of the earth. The answer of Disabul corresponded with these friendly professions, and the ambassadors were seated by his side, at a banquet which lasted the greatest part of the day: the tent was surrounded with silk hangings, and a Tartar liquor was served on the table, which possessed at least the intoxicating qualities of wine. The emperor of Persia, who had been present during the ceremony, was delighted with the success which had attended the embassy: he was, in fact, of the same nation; and the monuments of valor rather than of industry. When Disabul led his armies against the frontiers of Persia, his Roman allies followed many days the march of the Turkish embassy; they were not surprised at the absence of Justinian, in the fourth year of his successor Justinian; he was positively the first that reached Constantinople, (Menander, p. 162) other, consulted the dictates of interest without recom-clecting the obligations of oaths and treaties. While the successor of Disabul celebrated his father's obse-quies, he was saluted by the ambassadors of the emperor Tiberius, who proposed an invasion of Persia, and the Romans and the Persians were mutually the just, reproaches of that haughty barbarian. "You see my ten fingers," said the great khan, and he applied them to his mouth. "You Romans speak with as many tongues, but they are the tongues of deceit and perjury. To me you hold one language, to my subjects another, and the Persians are succecssfully cluded by your perfidious eloquence. You precipitate your allies into war and danger, you enjoy their labours, and you neglect your benefactors. Hasten your return, inform your master that a Turk is incaparable of uttering or forgiving falsehood, and that he shall speedily meet the punishment which he deserves. While he solicits my friendship with flattering and hollow words, he is sunk to a confederate of my fugitive Varchonites. If I confound to march against those contemplate slaves, they will tremble at the sound of our war, and they will be trampled, like a nest under the foot of my immoveable cavalry.
I am not ignorant of the road which they have followed to invade your empire; nor can I be deceived by the vain pretence, that mount Caucasus is the impregna-table barrier of the Romans. I know the course of the Niester, the Trascunia, the Bug, and the Dnieper; and the nations have yielded to the arms of the Turks; and from the rising to the setting sun, the earth is my inheritance." Notwithstanding this menace, a sense of mutual advantage soon renewed the alliance of the Turks and Romans; but the pride of the great khan was still unsatisfied: and when he anoxiously an important conquest to his friend the emperor Maurice, he styled himself the master of the seven races, and lord of the seven climates of the world.

Disputes have often arisen between the sovereignty of Asia, for the title of king of the world, which has not been proved that it could not belong to either of the competitors. The kingdom of the Turks was bounded by the Oxus or Ghion; and Piusaun was separated by that great river from the rival monarchy of Iran, or Persia, which in a smaller compass contained perhaps a larger measure of power and population. The Persians, who alternately invaded and repulsed the Turks and the Romans, were still ruled by the house of Sassian, which ascended the three hundred years before the accession of Justinian. His contemporary, Cabades, or K-bad, had been successful in war against the emperor Anastasius; but the reign of that prince was distracted by civil and religious troubles. A prisoner in the hands of his subjects; an exile among the enemies of Persia; he recovered his liberty by prostituting the honour of his wife, and regained his kingdom with the dangerous and mercenary aid of the Romans, who had slain his father. His wives were suspicions that Khaber never forgave the authors of his expulsion, or even those of his restoration. The people were deluded and inflamed by the fanaticism of Mazdak,9 who asserted the community of women,10 and the equality of mankind, whilst he appropriated the richest lands and most beautiful females to the use of his sectaries. The view of these disorders, which had been fomented by his laws and example,11 imbited the declining age of the Persian monarch; and his fears were increased by the consciousness of his design to reverse the natural and customary order of succession, in favour of his third and most favoured son. He sent envoys to the emperor Chosroes, who at that time was desirous that he should be adopted by the emperor Justin: the hope of peace inclined the Byzantine court to accept this singular proposal; and Chosroes might have acquired a special claim to the inheritance of the Persian emperor. But the future mischief was diverted by the advice of the quaestor Proclus: a difficulty was started, whether the adoption should be performed as a civil or military rite; the treaty was abruptly disolved; and the sense of this indignity sunk deep into the mind of Chosroes, who had already advanced to the Tigris on his road to Constantinople. His father did not long survive the disappointment of his wishes: the testament of their deceased sovereign was read in the assembly of the nobles; and a powerful faction, prepared for the event, and regardless of the priority of inheritance, exalted Chosroes to the throne. He filled that throne during a prosperous period of forty-five years; and the justice of Nushirvan is celebrated as the theme of immortal praise by the nations of the east.

But the justice of kings is understood by themselves. In the Reign of Nushir-van: their future life between the supreme rank and the condition of subjects, was anxious to themselves and formidable to their master; fear as well as revenge might tempt them to rebel; the slightest evidence of a conspiracy satisfied the author of their wrongs; and the repose of Chosroes was secured by the death of these unhappy princes, with their families and adher-ts. One guiltless youth was saved and dismissed by the compassion of a veteran general; and this act of humanity, which was revealed by his son, overbalanced the merit of reducing twelve nations to the obedience of Persia. The zeal and prudence of Mehdes had fixed the edictum on the head of Chosroes himself; but he delayed to attend the royal sumptuous, till he had performed the duties of a military review; he was instantly commanded to repair to the iron tripod, which stood before the gate of the palace,9 where it was death to relieve or approach the victim; and Mehdes was distinguished several days before his sentence was pronounced, by the inflexible pride and calm ingratitude of the son of Kobad. But the people, more especially forgave the humiliation to which his filial piety had staked; pode in the east, are disposed to forgive, and even to applaud, the cruelty which blights at the siren of ambition, whose voluntary choice has exposed them to live in the smiles, and to perish by the frown, of a capricious monarch. In the execution of the laws which he had no temptation to violate; in the punishment of crimes which attacked his own dignity, and the happiness of individuals; Nasirshirvan, or Chosroes, deserved the appellation of just. His government was firm, rigorous, and impartial. It was the first labour of his reign to abolish the dangerous theory of common or equal possessions; the lands and women which the scurries of Mazdak had usurped were restored to their legitimate owners; the temperate chastisement of the fanatics or imposters confirmed the domestic rights of society. Instead of listening with blind confidence to a favourite minister, he established four viziers over the four great provinces of his empire, Assyria, Media, Persia, and Bactria. In the choice of judges, prelates, and counsellors, he strove to remove the mask which is always worn in the presence of kings: he wished to substitute the natural order of talents for the accidental distinctions of birth and fortune; he professed, in speaking of his intentions, to prefer those men who carried the poor in their housoms, and to banish corruption from the seat of justice, as dogs were excluded from the temples of the Magi. The code of laws of the first Artaxerxes was revived and published as the rule of the magistrates; but the assurance of speech was not the only object of the benevolent monarch. To his behaviour was inspected by a thousand eyes, their words were overheard by a thousand ears, the secret or public agents of the throne; and the provinces, from the Indian to the Arabian confines, were enlightened by the frequent visits of a sovereign, who affected to equal his celestial brother in his regal and salutary career. Education and agriculture he viewed as the two objects most deserving of his care. In every city of Persia, orphans, and the children of the poor, were maintained and instructed at the public expense; the daughters were given in marriage to the richest citizens; of their own accord, and according to their different talents, were employed in mechanic trades, or promoted to more honourable service. The desert villages were relieved by his bounty; to the peasants and farmers who were found incapable of supporting their labours, he gave, and the instruments of husbandry; and the rare and inestimable treasure of fresh water was parsimoniously managed, and skilfully dispersed over the arid territory of Persia. The prosperity of that kingdom was the effect and the evidence of his virtues: his views are those of oriental despotism; but in the long competition between Chosroes and Justinian, the advantage both of merit and fortune is almost always on the side of the barbarian.

His love of learning. To the praise of justice Nasirshirvan united the reputation of knowledge; and the seven Greek philosophers, who visited his court, were invited and deceived by the strange assurance, that a disciple of Plato was seated on the Persian throne. Did they expect that a prince, strenuously exercised in the toils of war and government, should agitate, with dexterity like their own, the abstruse and profound questions which amused the leisure of the schools of Athens? Could they hope that the privileges which should direct his life and the passions of a despot, whose infancy had been taught to consider his absolute and fluctuating will as the only rule of moral obligation? The studies of Chosroes were ostentatious and superficial: but his example awakened the curiosity of an ingenious poverty. He fell, and the happiest individuals of the dominions of Persia. At Gondi Sapor, in the neighbourhood of the royal city of Susa, an academy of physic was founded, which insensibly became a liberal school of poetry, philosophy, and rhetoric. The annals of the monarchy were composed; and while frequent accounts of his operations were preserved for future generations, the lessons both to the wise and people, the darkness of the first ages was embellished by the giants, the dragons, and the fabulous heroes of oriental romance. Every learned or candid stranger was enchanted by the beauty, and flattered by the conversation, of the monarch; in every regarded a Greek physician, by the deliverance of three thousand captives: and the sophists, who contended for his favour, were exasperated by the wealth and insolence of Uranus, their successful rival. Nasirshirvan believed, or at least he pretended, that every scholarship which among proselytes of persecution may be discovered in his reign. Yet he allowed himself freely to compare the tenets of the various sects: and the theological disputes, in which he frequently presided, diminished the authority of the priest, and enlightened the minds of the people. At his command, the most celebrated works of Greece and India were translated into the Persian language; a smooth and elegant idiom, recommended by Mahomet to the use of paradise; though it is branded with the epithets of savage and unmanual, by the ignorance and presumption of Agathias. Yet the Greek schools were preserved in Bactria. That it was found possible to execute an entire version of Plato and Aristotle in a foreign dialect, which had not been framed to express the spirit of freedom and the subtilities of philosophical discussion. And, if the reason of the Stagyrite might be equally dark, or equally intelligible in every regard to a Greek artisted verbal argumentation of the disciple of Socrates, appear to be indissolubly mingled with the grace and perfection of his Attic style. In the search of universal knowledge, Nasirshirvan was informed, that the moral and political institutions of the ancient of the ancients: Pilpay, an ancient Brachman, were preserved with jealously reverence; the treasures of the kings of India. The physician Perozos was secretly despatched to the banks of the Ganges, with instructions to procure, at any price, the commissariat of that valuable work. His dexterity obtained a transcript, his learned diligence accomplished the translation; and the fables of Pilpay were read and admired in the assembly of the Northmen and their noblest character. The mode of the Persians, the Persians, have long since disappeared; but this venerable monument has been saved by the curious of the Arabian caliphs, reprinted in the modern Persian, the Turkish, the Syriac, the Hebrew, and the Greek idioms, and transposed through successive versions into the modern languages of Europe. In some of the performances and the manners of the Hindoos, are coexist, and the intrinsic merit of the fables of Pilpay is far inferior to the concise elegance of Phaedrus, and the native graces of La Fontaine. The moral and political sentences are illustrated in a series of apologetics; but the composition is intricate, the narrative is licentious, and the precept obvious and barren. Yet the Brahman may assume the merit of inventing a pleasant fiction, which adorns the nakedness of truth, and allures, perhaps, to a royal car, the marvellous of instruction. With a similar design, to the Brahmans among the Chinese, the additions of intrinsic merit of their subjects, the some Indians invented the game of chess, which was likewise introduced into Persia under the reign of Nushirvan. Peace and war. The son of Kobaad found his kingdom involved in a war with the successor of Constantine; and the anxiety of his domestic situation inclined him to grant the suspension of arms, which Justinian was impatient to purchase. Chosroes saw the Roman ambassadors at his feet. He accepted eleven thousand pounds of gold, as the price of an endless or indefinite peace; some mutual exchange were regulated; the Persian assumed the guard of the gates of Caucasus, and the demolition of Dara was suspended, on condition that it should never be made the residence of the general of the east. This interval of reposè had been solicited, and was diligently improved, by the ambition of the emperor; his African conquests were the first fruits of the Persian treaty; and the avowal of Chosroes was soothed by a large portion of the spoils of Carthage, which his ambassadors required in a term of pleasantry, and under the colour of friendship. But the trophies of Belisarius disturbed the slumber of the great king; and the multitudes of his barbarous auxiliaries, his wars in Sicily, Italy, and Rome itself, had been reduced, in three rapid campaigns, to the obedience of Justinian. Unpractised in the art of treating treaties, he secretly excited his bold and subtle vasalv Alamadar. That prince of the Saracens, who resided at Hira, had not been included in the general peace, and still waged an obscure war against his rival Arthat, the chief of the tribe of Gassan, and confederate of the empire. The subject of their dispute was an extensive sheep-walk in the desert to the south of Palmyra. An immemorial tribute for the licence of pasture, appeared to attest the rights of Almandar, while the Gassanite appealed to the Latin name of strata, a paved road, as an unquestionable evidence of the sovereignty and labours of the Romans. The two monarchs supported the difference by arms; the Persians, who are not infallible in the science of war, and the Persians, without expecting the event of a slow and doubtful arbitration, enriched his flying camp with the spoil and captives of Syria. Instead of repelling the arms, Justinian attempted to reduce the fidelity, of Almendor, while he called from the extremities of the earth the nations of Ethiopia and Scythia, to face the Persians. The number of such allies was distant and precarious, and the discovery of this hostile correspondence justified the complaints of the Goths and Armenians, who implored, almost at the same time, the protection of Chosroes. The descendants of Armaces, who were still numerous in Armenia, had been provoked to assist the last relics of national freedom and hereditary rank; and the ambassadors of Vitiges had secretly traversed the empire to expose the instant, and almost inevitable, danger of the kingdom of Italy. Their representations were uniform, weighty, and effectual. "We stand before your court, our ally by birth, our own, the ambitious and faithless Justinian aspires to be the sole master of the world. Since the endless peace, which betrayed the common freedom of mankind, that prince, year by year in wars, your enemy in actions, has alike insulted his friends and foes, and the Persians filled the earth with blood and confusion: if he has not violated the privileges of Armenia, the independence of Colchis, and the wild liberty of the Tzazian mountains! Has he not usurped, with equal avidity, the city of Bosphorus on the frozen maid, and the rule of palm-trees on the shores of the red sea? The Persians, the Vandal, the Goths, have been successively oppressed, and each nation has calmly remained the spectator of their neighbour's rain. Embrace, O king! the favourable moment; the east is left without defence, while the armies of Justinian and his renowned general are detained in the distant regions of the west. If you hesitate and delay, Belisarius and his victorious troops will soon return from the Tiber to the Tigris, and Persia may enjoy the wretched consolation of being the last devoured." By such arguments, Chosroes was easily persuaded to imitate the example which he condemned; but the Persians, ambitious by conquest, would not abandon the fruits of a rival, who issued his sanguinary commands from the secure station of the Byzantine palace. Whatever might be the provocation he invades of Chosroes, he abused the confidence Syrius of treaties; and the just reproaches of insurrection and false-pledge could only be concealed by the lustre of his victories. The Persian army, which had been assembled in the plains of Babylon, prudently declined the strong cities of Mesopotamia, and followed the western bank of the Euphrates, till the small though populous town of Dura presumed to arrest the progress of the great conqueror. On the banks of Dura, by treachery and surprise, were burst open; and as soon as Chosroes had stained his seigniory with the blood of the inhabitants, he dismissed the ambassador to Justinian to inform his master in what place he had

(Pers. 1. i. c. 23.) 9 The invasion of the Parthian, the invasion of Locris, &c. are related in a full and regular series by Procopius, (Pers. 1. ii. c. 5-11.) left the enemy of the Romans. The conqueror still affected the prudence of war and justice; and as he believed a noble matron with her infant rudely dragged along the ground, he sighed, he wept, and impressed the divine justice to punish the author of these calamities. Yet the herd of twelve thousand captives was ransomed for two hundred pounds of gold; the neighbouring bishops of Nisibis pledged his faith for the payment; and in the subsequent year the unfeeling avarice of Chosroes exacted the penalty of an obligation which it was generous to contract and impossible to discharge. He advanced into the heart of Syria; but a feeble enemy, who vanquished at his approach, disapponted him. He was defeated in the battles of Victoria and intense; he could not judge of the form and situation of their native abodes; baths and a stately circus were constructed for their accommodation; and he saw that his name was revived in Assyria the pleasures of a Greek capital. By the munificence of the royal founder, a liberal allowance was assigned to these fortunate exiles; and they enjoyed the singular privilege of bestowing freedom on the slaves whom they acknowledged as their kinsmen, Palshtue, and the holy wealth of Jerusalem, were the next objects that attracted the ambition, or rather the avarice, of Chosroes. Constantinople, and the palace of the Caesars, no longer appeared impregnable or remote; and his aspiring fancy already covered Asia Minor with the troops, and the Black Sea with the navies of the Persian monarch, whose name alone was retained of Chosroes in the east, where he had been seasonably recalled to the defence of the emperors. While Chosroes pursued his ambitious designs on the coast of the Euxine, Belisarius, at the head of seven thousand, without pay or discipline, encamped beyond the Euphrates, within six miles of Nisibis. He warded, by a skilful operation, to draw the Persians from their impregnable citadel, and improving his advantage in the field, either to intercept their retreat, or perhaps to enter the gates with flying colours, he pursued them to the coast of his victorious跟踪 and recovered the territories of Persia, reduced the fortress of Sisaura, and sent the governor, with eight hundred chosen horsemen, to serve the emperor in his Italian wars. He detached Arachis and his Arab, supported by five hundred Romans, to pass the Tigris, and to ravage the barrenness of Assyria, a fruitful province, long exempt from the calamities of war. But the plans of Belisarius were disconcerted by the untractable spirit of Arachis, who never returned to the camp, nor sent any intelligence of his motions. The Romans, at the time of their landing, had already occupied the same spot; the time of action elapsed, the ardent sun of Mesopotamia inflamed with fevers the blood of his European soldiers; and the stationary troops and effects of Syria affected to tremble for the safety of their defenceless cities. Yet this diversion had already succeeded in forcing Chosroes to return with less precipitation; and if the skill of Belisarius had been seconded by discipline and valour, his success might have satisfied the sanguine wishes of the public, who required at his hands the conquest of Ctesiphon, and the deliverance of the captives of Antioch. At the end of the campaign, he was re- called to Constantiopolis by an ungrateful court; but the dangers of the ensuing spring restored his confidence and command; and the hero, almost alone, was despatched, with the speed of post-horses, to appease his name and the resentment of Syria. He found the Roman general, among whom was a nephew of Justinian, imprisoned by their fears in the fortifications of Hierapolis. But instead of listening to their timid confidants, Belisarius commanded them to follow him to Europe, where he had resolved to collect his forces, and to execute whatever God should inspire him to achieve against the enemy.

1 In the public history of Persia (Perisc. i. 16. 18. 19. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27.) and with more skill and expedition, we may read the wars of Ctesiphon, the capture of Antioch, with some slight exceptions, we may read the wars of Ctesiphon, the capture of Antioch, and our «Theatres of War» against the malicious whisper of the Aeneid (C 2. 3. with the Notes, as usual, of Alamanus.)
His firm attitude on the banks of the Euphrates, restrained Belisarius from advancing towards Palestine; and when he received, with art and dexterity, the ambassadors, or rather spies, of the Persian monarch. The plain between Hierapolis and the river was covered with the squadrons of cavalry, six thousand hunters, tall and robust, who pursued their game without the apprehension of an enemy; for the Persians had described a thousand Armenian horse, who appeared to guard the passage of the Euphrates. The tent of Belisarius was of the coarsest linen, the simple equipment of a warrior who disdained the luxury of the east. Around this tent, the nations who marched under his standard took refuge; the Persians and Illyrians were posted in the front, the Heruli and Goths in the centre; the prospect was closed by the Moors and Vandals, and their loose array seemed to multiply their numbers. Their dress was light and active; one soldier carried a whip, another a sword, a third a bow, a fourth, perhaps, a battle-axe, and the whole picture exhibited the inferiority of the troops, and the vigilance of the general. Chosroes was deluded by the address, and awed by the genius, of the lieutenant of Justinian. Conscious of the merit, and ignorant of the force, of his antagonist, he decided a decisive battle on a plain opposite to a Persian, liable return to tell the melancholy tale. The great king hastened to repass the Euphrates; and Belisarius pressed his retreat, by afflicting to oppose a measure so salutary to the empire, and which could scarcely have been prevented by an army of a hundred thousand men. Every might suggest, and an pride, that the public enemy had been suffered to escape: but the African and Gothic triumphs are less glorious than this safe and bloodless victory, in which neither fortune, nor the valour of the soldiers, can subtract any part of the general's renown.

A.D. 543, &c. Belisarius, from the Persian to the Italian war, revealed the extent of his personal merit, which had corrected or supplied the want of discipline and courage. Fifteen generals, without concert or skill, led through the mountains of Armenia, an army of thirty thousand Romans, inactive to their signals, their ranks, their targets. For a quarter of a century, the Persians, entrenched in the camp of Dubis, vanished, almost without a combat, this disorderly multitude; and their useless arms were scattered along the road, and their horses sunk under the fatigue of their rapid flight. But Justinian, the Roman party, the Persians to the brethren; the Armenians, the hostiles to their allegiance; the cities of Dara and Edessa resisted a sudden assault and a regular siege, and the calamities of war were suspended by those of peace.

A tacit or formal agreement between the two sovereigns protected the great silts of the eastern frontier; and the arms of Chosroes were confined to the Caucasian or Libyan war, which has been too minutely described by the historians of the times. Of the extreme length of the Euxine coast, Latins, men, from Constantine to the mouth of the Danube, may be computed after a voyage of nine days, and a measure of seven hundred miles. From the Iberian Caucasus, the most lofty and craggy mountains of Asia, that river descends with such oblique vehemence, that in a short space it is reached by one hundred and twenty bridges. Nor does the stream become placid and navigable, till it reaches the town of Sarapanc, five days' journey from the Cyrus, which flows from the same hills, but joins it in a contrary direction. The proximity of these rivers has suggested the practice, or at least the idea of having the precious merchandise of India down the Oxus, over the Caspian up the Cyrus, and with the current of the Phasis into the Euxine and Mediterranean seas. As it successively deposits the stones and silt of the Phasis, moves with diminished speed, though accumulated weight. At the mouth it is sixty fathoms deep, and half a league broad, but a small woody island is interspersed in the midst of the channel: the water, so soon as it has deposited an earthy or metallic sediment, flows on the surface of the waves, and is no longer susceptible of corruption. In a course of one hundred miles, forty of which are navigable for large vessels, the Phasis divides the celebrated region of Colchis, or Migrenia, which, on three sides, is fortified by the Iberian and Armenian mountains, and whose marine crossed the coast extends to the neighbourhood of Trebizond to Dioscurias, and the confines of Cricassia. Both the soil and climate are relaxed by excessive moisture: twenty-eight rivers, besides the Phasis and his dependent streams, convey their waters to the sea; and the hollowness of the ground appears to indicate the subterraneous channels between the Euxine and the Caspian. In the fields where wheat or barley is sown, the earth is too soft to sustain the action of the plough; but the gom, a small grain, not unlike the millet or sorghum seed, supplies the ordinary food of the people; and the use of bread is confined to the prince and his nobles. Yet the vines and olive are more plentiful in this district; the little bark of the stems, as well as the quality of the wine, display the unassisted powers of nature. The same powers continually tend to overshadow the face of the country with thick forests; the timber of the hills, and the flux of the plains contribute to the abundance of naval stores; the wild and tame animals, the ox, and the hog, are remarkably prolific, and the name of the pleasant is expressive of his native habitation on the banks of the Phasis. The gold mines to the south of Trebizond, which are still worked with sufficient profit, were a subject of national dispute between Justinian and Chosroes. It is impossible to believe, that a vein of precious metal may be equally diffused through the circle of hills, although these secret treasures are neglected by the lazziness, or concealed by the prudence, of the Magyrians. Imprisoned, with particles of gold, are carefully strained through sieves, and sieves; but this expedient, the ground-work perhaps of a marvellous tale, affords a faint image of the wealth extracted from a virgin earth by the power and industry of ancient kings. Their silver palaces and golden chambers surpass our belief; but the fame of their riches is said to have excited the enterprise of the Argonauts. Tradition has affirmed, with some colour... of reason, that Egypt planted on the Phasis a learned and polite colony, which manufactured linen, built navies, and invented geographical maps. The antiquity of the moderns has peopled, with flattering cities and nations, the isthmus between the Euxine and the Caspian; and a lively writer, observing the resemblance of climate, and, in his apprehension, of trade, has not hesitated to pronounce Colchis the Holland of Asia.

But the riches of Colchis shine only through the darkness of conjecture or tradition; and its g-une history presents a uniform scene of rudeness and poverty. If one hundred and thirty languages were spoken in the market of Dioscurus, one hundred and forty savage tribes or families, sequestered from each other in the valleys of mount Caucasus; and their separation, which diminished the importance, must have multiplied the number of their rustic capitals. In the present state of Mingrelia, a village is an assemblage of hutts within a wooden fence; the fortress or the seat of the princes, is a fortification, the base of which is imbedded in the depths of forests; the princely town of Cyts, or Cotis, consists of two hundred houses, and a stone edifice appertains only to the magnificence of kings. Twelve ships, or Constavtistone, and about six thousand men, were involved with the fruits of the industry, anchored as cast anchor on the coast; and the list of Colchian exports is much increased, since the natives had only slaves and hides to offer in exchange for the corn and salt which they purchased from the subjects of Justinian. Not a vestige can be found of the art, the knowledge required for the navigation of the ancient Colchians; few Greeks desired or dared to pursue the foot-steps of the Argonauts; and even the marks of an Egyptian colony are lost on a nearer approach. The rite of circumcision is practised only by the Magomian or Tartars of the Duxine; and the cultivated hoar and swarthy complexion of Africa no longer disfigure the perfect of the human race. It is in the adjacent climates of Georgia, Mingrelia, and Circassia, that nature has placed, at least to our eyes, the model of beauty, in the shape of the limbs, the color of the skin, the symmetry of the features, the expression of the countenance, and the associations of the two sexes. The men seem formed for action, the women for love; and the perpetual supply of females from mount Caucasus has purified the blood, and improved the breed, of the southern nations of Asia. The proper district of Mingrelia, a portion only of the ancient Colchis, has sustained an expectation of twelve thousand slaves. The number of prisoners or criminals would be inadequate to the annual demand; but the common people are in a state of servitude to their lords; the exercise of fraud or rapine is unpunished in a lawless community; and the market is continually replenished by the abuse of civil and paternal authority. Such a trade, which reduces the human species to the level of cattle, may tend to encourage marriage and population, since the multitude of children curishes which preserved his name, extended no further than the neighbourhood of Trebizond. Beyond these limits the fortifications of Hyussus, of Appaurus, of the Phasis, of the town of Justinian, and that of Trehizond were guarded by sufficient detachments of horse and fo 1 ; and six princes of Colchis received their diadems from the lieutenants of Caesar. One of these lieutenants, the eloquent and philosophic Arrian, surveyed, visited Arrian, and has described, the Euxine coast, and the ancient Neapolis of Trebizond. The garrison which he reviewed at the mouth of the Phasis, consisted of four hundred chosen legionaries; the brick walls and towers, the double ditch, and the military engines on the rampart, rendered this place inaccessible to the barbarians; but the new suburbs which had been erected by the merchants and veterans, required, in the opinion of Arrian, some external defence. 1 As the strength of the empire was gradually impaired, the Romans stationed on the Phasis were either withdrawn or expelled: and the tribe of the Lazi, whose posterity speak a foreign dialect, and inhabit the sea-coast of Trebizond, imposed their name and dominion on the ancient kingdom of Colchis. Their independence was soon invaded by a formidable neighbour, who had acquired, by arms and treaties, the sovereignty of Iberia. The dependent king of Lazica revolted against the Lazi, and laid open the gate of their march, and the successors of Constantine acquiesced in this injurious claim, which was strongly urged as a conversion of right of inmemorial prescription. In the Lazi, the beginning of the sixth century, their influence was restored by the introduc-inaccessible were covered by additional bulwarks. In this important fortress, the vigilance of Chosroes had deposited a magazine of offensive and defensive arms, sufficient for five times the number, not only of the garrison, but of the besiegers themselves. The stock of flour and salted provisions, which perished to the amount of a sumptuous five years; the want of wine was supplied by vinegar, and of grain from whence a strong liquor was extracted; and a triple aqueduct shaded the diligence, and even the suspicions, of the enemy. But the most efficient defence of Petra was placed in the value of fifteen thousand Persians, who repelled the assaults of the Romans, whilst, in a softer vein of earth, a mine was secretly perforated. The wall, supported by slender and temporary props, hung tottering in the air; but Dagistias delayed the attack till he had secured a specific recompense; and the town was relieved before the return of his messenger from Constantinople. The Persian garrison was reduced to four hundred men, of whom no more than fifty were exempt from sickness or wounds; yet such had been their inflexible perseverance, that they concealed their losses from the enemy by laying waste a region, and by the putrifying stench of the dead bodies of their eleven hundred companions. After their deliverance, the breaches were hastily stopped with sand-bags; the mine was replenished with earth; a new wall was erected on a frame of substantial timber; and a fresh garrison was established at Petra, which was destined to sustain the labours of a second siege. The operations, both of the attack and defence, were conducted with skilful obstinacy; and each party derived useful lessons from the experience of their past faults. A battering-ram was invented, of light construction, and powerful effect; it was transported and worked by the hands of forty soldiers; and as the stones were loosened by its repeated strokes, they were torn with long iron hooks from the wall. From those walls, a shower of darts was incessantly poured on the heads of the assailants, but they were most dangerously annoyed by a fiery composition of sulphur and bitumen, which, by the composition of sulphur and bitumen, which, by The Colchian was a Spartan who had praised and swelled the virtue of those heroic slaves; but the tedious warfare and alternate success of the Roman and Persian arms cannot detain the attention of posterity at the foot of mount Caucasus. The advantages obtained by the troops of Justinian were more frequent and splendid; but the force of the great king was employed in time, till they amounted to eight elephants and seventy thousand men, including twelve thousand Scythian allies, and above three thousand Dilemites, who descended by their free choice from the hills of Hyrcania, and were equally formidable in close or in distant combat. The siege of Archangelopolis, a name imposed or corrupted by the Greeks, was raised with some loss and precipitation; but the Persians occupied the passes of Iberia; Chosroes was enslaved by their forts and garrisons; they behaved a retinue, the representatives of the people; and the prince of the Lazi fled into the mountains. In the Roman camp, faith and discipline were unknown; and the independent leaders, who were invested with equal power, dis-puted with each other the pre-eminence of vice and corruption. The Persians followed a different conduct; there was no retinue, the representatives of the people; and the prince of the Lazi fled into the mountains. OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

Chapter III.

The victory of the Phasis restored the terror of the Roman arms, and the emperor was persuaded to renounce his dangerous claim to the possession or sovereignty of Colchis and its dependent states. Rich in the accumulated treasures of the east, he extorted from the Romans an annual payment of thirty thousand pieces of gold; and the smallness of the sum revealed the disgrace of a tribute in its naked deformity. In the train of the previous defeat, and the wheel of fortune, were applied by one of the ministers of Justinian, who observed that the reduction of Antioch, and some Syrian cities, had elevated beyond measure the vain and ambitious spirit of the barbarians. You are mis-taken," replied the modest Persian; the king of kings was determined to dispel with contempt on such petty acquisitions; and of the ten nations, vanquished by his invincible arms, he extorted from Persia, in Transoxiana, to Yemen or Arabia Felix, and subdued the rebels of Hyrcania, reduced the provinces of Cabul and Zabdistan, on the banks of the Indus, broke the power of the Euthalians, terminated by an honourable treaty the Turkish war, and admitted the daughter of the great king into the house of the Caesars. Yet, while the king of kings was among the princes of Asia, he gave audience, in his palace of Madain, or Ctesiphon, to the ambassadors of the world. Their gifts or tributes, arms, rich garments, gems, slaves, or aromatics, were humbly presented at the foot of his throne; and he consolled the want of India, to be accepted from his hands, with a wood of albes, a maid seven cubits in height, and a carpet softer than silk, the skin, as it was reported, of an extraordinary serpent.

Justinian had been reproached for his conquests of the alliance with the Ethiopians, as if he Abyssinians, had attempted to introduce the degraded negroes into the system of civilized society. But the friends of the Roman empire, the Ammites or Abyssinians, may be always distinguished from the original natives of Africa. The hand of nature has flattened the noses of the negroes, covered their heads with shaggy wool, and tinged their skin with hues and indelible blackness. But the olive complexion of the Abyssinians, their hair, shape, and features, distinctly mark them as a colony of Arabs; and this descent is confirmed by the resemblance of language and manners with those of their ancestors, who inhabited the narrow interval between the shores of the Red sea. Christianity had raised that nation above the level of African barbarism; their intercourse with Egypt, and the successors of Constantine, had communicated the rudiments of the arts and sciences: their vessels traded to the isle of Ceylon; and seven kingdoms obeyed the supreme prince of Abyssinia.

The negotiations and treaties between Justinian and Charoeas were amicably explained by Procopius, (Peri. ii. l. xi. 11, 12.)Generally, (i. 11, 12, 13.) Arrian (iv. p. 111, 142.) and Justinianus, (ii. 11. 142.) Gravis Custodiens, Histor. ab Ancienis Tractis, tom. ii. p. 151, 154—156, 193—200.

See Boeke, Hist. Naturale, tomo. ii. p. 435. This Arab cast of features and complexion, which has continued 300 years, (Lodhiat, hist. of Company,) has, to the astonishment of the Europeans, (in the course of Abyssinia,) will justify the suspicion, that race, as well as climate, must have contributed to form the manners of the adjacent and similar regions.

The Pamphylia missionaries, (Vatican, tom. i. ed. 184.) Brossard, (Peregr. Etruscorum, vol. ii. l. 15.) I. 119—1189 (Lobo, Relation, &c. par le M. Grand de Yxla Dominations, Paris, 1726.) and Telloz, (Relation de l'Europe, par le M. Grand de Yxla Dominations, Paris, 1726.) could only relate what happened in Abyssinia when the country was visited by the writer of the relation. The relation of Lodhiat, (Hist. Ethnique, Francoliv, 1641.) and the curious observations, (History of Company,) 1693—1726, Lobo, (Relation de l'Europe,) is, however, valuable, as it could add little concerning its ancient history. Yet the name of Ceylon, or Celebes, the companion of Yemen, is celebrated in national songs and legends.

The negotiations between Justinian and the Ethiopians, or Ceylonese, were recorded by Procopius, (city of Colchis, 11. 142. 11. 142.) and by the historian of Antioch, whose name is not known. (Procop. Hist. Ex. 11. 12, 13, 142.) He has preserved a curious extract.

The trade of the Abyssinians to the coast of India; and Africa, and the rise of Ceylon, is commonly represented by Cossus Indicaepractica, (Topograph. Christianus, l. 11. ii. ed. 13, 143.) 11. 254, 255, 255.

2 Levies eighteen or twenty pages of false and florid rhetoric. His narrative on this subject can never be read with satisfaction, and his account of the victory of King Joseph against the king of Lazia—his former rival.

3 The destruction took place in the lifetime of the emperor, (Procop. Hist. 11. 11. 157.) and foreign ambassadors have been treated with the same jealousy and rigor in Turkey, (Bodleian, epist. ini. p. 115, 115.) Rome, (Voyage Pitterino.) and China, (Narrative of M. de Langue, in Bell's Travels, vol. ii. p. 169—231.)
The independence of the Homerites, who reigned in the rich and happy Arabia, was first violated by an Æthiopian conqueror: he drew his hereditary claim from the queen of Sheba, and his ambition was sanctified by religious zeal. The Jews, powerful and affrighted by the success of Arabica, and of Dura Europaeum, and by the incursions of Æthiopians, implored the protection of the Assyrian monarch. The Negus passed the Red sea with a fleet and army, deprived the Jewish proselyte of his kingdom and life, and extinguished a race of princes, who had ruled above two thousand years the sequestered region of myrrh and frankincense. The conqueror immediately announced the victory of the gospel, requested an orthodox patriarch, and so warmly professed his friendship to the Roman empire, that Justinian was flattered by the hope of diverting the silk trade through the channel of Abyssinia, and of securing the wealth of that people to his own dominions. Their alliance was negociated by a ambassador, named by the A. D. 333, emperor to execute this important commission. He wisely declined the shorter, but more dangerous of the two routes; and he ascended the Nile, embarked on the Red sea, and safely landed at the African port of Adulis. From Adulis to the royal city of Axume is no more than fifty leagues, in a direct line; but the winning passes of the mountains detained the ambassador fifteen days: and as he traversed the forests, he saw, and vaguely computed, about five thousand wild elephants. The capital, according to his report, was large and populous: and the village of Axume is still conspicuous by the regal coronations, by the ruins of a christian temple, and by six or seventeen obelisks inscribed with Grecian characters. But the Negus gave audience to the open field, seated on a lofty chair, which was drawn by four elephants superbly caparisoned, and surrounded by his nobles and musicians. He was clad in a linen garment and cap, holding in his hand two jasperials and a light shield; and, although his nakedness was imperfectly covered, he displayed the barbaric pomp of gold chains, collars, and bracelets, richly adorned with pearls and precious stones. The ambassador of Justinian knelt; the Negus raised him from the ground, embraced him, and dismissed him. He received the terms of peace, and bridled his warlike minions, and arranged the worshippers of fire. But the proposal of the silk trade was declined; and notwithstanding the assurances, and perhaps the wishes, of the Abyssinians, these hostile menaces evaporated without effect. The Emperor was unwilling to abandon their aromatic groves, to explore a sandy desert, and to encounter, after all their fatigues, a formidable nation from whom they had never received any personal injuries. Instead of acquiring a new ally, and depriving Æthiopia of the inheritance of his possessions, Abraham, the slave of a Roman merchant of Adulis, assumed the sceptre of the Homerites; the troops of Africa were seduced by the luxury of the climate; and Justinian solicited the friendship of the usurper, who honoured with a slight tribute, the supremacy of his prince. After a long series of prosperity, the power of Abraham was overthrown before the gates of Mecca; his children were despoiled of Dura Europaeum; and the Æthiopians were finally expelled from the continent of Asia. This narrative of obscure and remote events is not foreign to the decline and fall of the Roman empire. If a christian power had been maintained in Arabia, Mahomet must have been repressed in his cradle, and Abyssinia would have prevented a revolution which has changed the civil and religious state of the world.4

CHAPTER IV.

Rebellions of Africa.—Restoration of the Gothic kingdom of Tuscil.—Loss and recovery of Rome.—Final conquest of Italy by Nurses.—Extermination of the Ostrogoths.—Their chief: Totila.—His victory, disgrace and death of Belisarius.—Character of Justinian.—Comet, earthquakes, and plague.

The review of the nations from the Danube to the Nile has exposed, on every side, the weakness of the Romans; and our wonder is reasonably excited that they should presume to enlarge an empire, whose ancient limits were incapable of defending. But the wars, the conquests, and the triumphs of Justinian, are the feeble and pernicious efforts of old age, which exhaust the remains of strength, and accelerate the decay of the powers of life. He exulted in the glorious act of resting Africa and Italy to the republic; but the calamities which followed the departure of Belisarius betrayed the impotence of the conqueror, and accomplished the ruin of those unfortunate countries.

From his new acquisitions, Justinian the troubles of expected that his aravae, as well as the of Africa, should be richly graced. A ra-} spells of Africa, the treasure, the slaves, and the movable, of the vanquished barbaria; and that the ancient and lawful patrimony of the emperors would be the support of their own safety and reward; must ultimately depend. The mutiny was secretly inflamed by a thousand soldiers, for the most part Heruli, who had imbued the doctrines, and were instigated by the clergy, of the Arian sect; and the cause of perjury and rebellion was sanctified by the despotic power of fanaticism. The Arians deplored the ruin of their church, triumphant above a century in Africa; and they were justly provoked by the laws of the conqueror, which interdicted the baptism of their children, and the exercise of all religious worship. Of the Vandals chosen by Belisarius, the far greater part, in the honours of the eastern service, forgot their country and religion. But a generous band of four hundred oblied the mariners, when they were in sight of the isle of Lesbos, to alter their course: they touched on Peloponnesus, ran ashore on a desert coast of Africa, and boldly erected, on mount Aurus, the standard of independence and revolt. While the troops of the province disclaimed the command of their superiors, a conspiracy was formed at Carthage against the life of Solomon, who filled with honour the place of Belisarius; and the Arians had plently time to prepare for the revolt, during the awful mysteries of the festival of Easter. Fear or remorse restrained the daggers of the assassins, but the patience of Solomon unboldened their discontent; and at the end of ten days, a furious sedition was kindled in the Circus, which desolated Africa and destroyed the root of that great empire. The indiscriminate slaughter of its inhabitants, was suspended only by darkness, sleep, and intoxication: the governor, with seven companions, among whom was the historian Procopius, escaped to Sicily: two-thirds of the army were involved in the guilt of treason; and eight thousand insurgents, assembling in the field of Bulla, elected Stoza for their chief, a private soldier, who possessed in a superior degree the virtues of a rebel. Under the mask of freedom, his eloquence could lead, or at least impel, the passions of his hearers. He was a Roman army; and in the eyes of the pretender, by daring to attack them in the field; and the victorious generals were compelled to acknowledge, that Stoza deserved a purer cause, and a more legitimate command. Vanquished in battle, he dexterously employed the arts of the sophist, and by his oratory and oratorical eloquence, the pretender was professedly possessed of even the minds of his accusers. Every man, and not only the followers of the pretender, nor the assassins who had instigated him to the revolt, were now on his side. As the pretender assumed the title of emperor, and his followers were officers of war, and the representatives of the army, the pretender was deposed, and his son, Michael, was presumed to the power. But the light of the saviour of the nation, was destined to reign for a while longer. A Moorish tribe encamped under the walls of Leptis, to renew their alliance, and receive from the governor the customary gifts. Fourscore of their deputies were introduced as friends into the city: but, on the dark suspicion of a conspiracy, they were massacred at the table of Sergius; and the clamour of arms and revenge was re-echoed through the valleys of mount Atlas, from both the Syrtis to the Atlantic Ocean. A personal injury, the unjust execution or murder of his brother, rendered Anastasius the enemy of the Romans. The defect of the Vandals had formerly signalized his conduct; the rude manners and justice of the people were still more conspicuous in a Moor; and while he laid Admetus in ashes, he calmly administered the empire of Africa. He was now determined to subdue the entire territory of African provinces, and the garrisons of the coast. With his troops, he made a circuit of forty days, and returned to Carthage. He had been there some six years during his reign, and now made a six days' journey in the neighbourhood of Thysdrus, he was astonished by the superior numbers and fierce aspect of the barbarians. He proposed a treaty; solicited reconciliation; and offered to bind himself by the most solemn oaths. "If what earths can bind himself!" interrupted the indignant Moor. Will you swear by the gospels, the divine book of the christians? It was on those books that the faith of his nephew Sergius was pledged to eighty of our innocent and untrammelled brethren. Before we trust them a second time, let us try their efficiency in the establishment of perjury and the vindication of their own honour." Their honour was vindicated in the field of Tebasta, by the death of Solomon, and the total loss of his army.
The arrival of fresh troops, and more skilful commanders, soon checked the insolence of the Moors; seventeen of their princes were slain in the same battle; and the disastrous and transient submission of their tribes was celebrated with lavish spoliation by the emperor of Constantinople. Successive inroads had reduced the province of Africa to one-third of the measure of Italy; yet the Roman emperors continued to regain above a century over Carthage, and the fruitful coast of the Mediterranean. But the losses of Justinian were alike pernicious to the Gothic war. Nor could such was the desolation of Africa, that in many parts a stranger might wander whole days without meeting the face either of a friend or an enemy. The nation of the Vandals had disappeared; they once amounted to an hundred and sixty thousand warriors, without including the children, the women, or the slaves. Their numbers were infinitely surpassed by the number of the Moorish families expatriated in a re tless war; and the same destruction was reaped on the Romans and their allies, who perished by the climatic guards, and the barbarians.
When Procopius first landed, he admired the populosity of the cities and country, strenuously exercised in the labours of commerce and agriculture. In less than twenty years, that busy scene was converted into a silent solitude; the wealthy citizens escaped to Silia and the mountains; and in the cities remained confidently affirmed, that five millions of Africans were consumed by the wars and government of the emperor Justinian.

Revolt of the Goths.

The jealousy of the Byzantine court had not permitted the return of the Goths to achieve the conquest of Italy; and his abrupt departure revived the courage of the Goths, who re pected his genius, his virtue, and even the lambahd motive which had urged the servant of Justinian to reject and resist them. They had lost their king,

The virtues of Belisarius were replaced by the various molestations of the Venetians, who, with reluctance, and most of his civil and military colleagues, were either disengaged altogether, or scattered to the winds. (6. 4. 5. 13) is scarcely darker than that of the Gothic History, (1. iii. c. 2. 9. 31. 41.)

was imposed as a trust or an exile on the veteran commander. A hero on the banks of the Euphrates, a slave in the palace of Constantine, he accepted, without the pain of shrinking from the degrading artifice with which he reduced the six, without defacing the figure, of the gold coin. Instead of expecting the restoration of peace and industry, he imposed a heavy assessment on the fortunes of the Italians. Yet his present or future demands were less odious than the desertion of an army. A vigorous and just the persons and property of all those, who, under the Gothic king, had been concerned in the receipt and expenditure of the public money. The subjects of Justinian, who escaped these partial vexations, were oppressed by the irregular maintenance of the soldiers, whom Alexander defended and despaired; and their hasty sallies in quest of wealth, or subsistence, provoked the inhabitants of the country to await or implore their deliverance from the virtues of a barbarian. Totila was chaste and temperate: and none were deceived, who depended on his faithfulness. To the husbandmen of Italy the Gothic king issued a welcome proclamation, enjoining them to pursue their important labours, and to rest assured, that, on the payment of the ordinary taxes, they should be defended by his valour and discipline from the injuries of war. The strong towns he successively attacked; and as soon as they had yielded to his arms he demolished the fortifications; to save the people from the calamities of a future siege, to deprive the Romans of the arts of defence, and to decide the tedious quarrel of the two nations by an equal and honourable conflict in the field of battle. The Roman captives were tempted to enlist in the service of a liberal and courteous adversary; the slaves were attracted by the firm and faithful promise, that they should never be delivered to their masters; and from the thousand warriors of Pavia, a new people, under the same appellation, Alexander, was very shortly brought into the camp of Totila. He sincerely accomplished the articles of capitulation, without seeking or accepting any sinister advantage from ambiguous expressions or unforeseen events; the garrison of Naples had stipulated that they should not be deserted by sea; the obstinacy of the winds prevented their departure; the vessels were supplied with horses, provisions, and a safe-conduct to the gates of Rome. The wives of the senators, who had been surprised in the villas of Campania, were restored, without a ransom, to their husbands; the violation of female chastity was immemorially chastised with death; and in the salutary regulation of the diet of the finished Neapolitans, the conqueror assumed the office of a humane and attentive physician. The virtues of Totila are equally laudable, whether they proceeded from true policy, religious principle, or the instinct of humanity; he offered the escape by sea; the obstinacy of the winds prevented their desertion; and after his army was firmly supplied with horses, provisions, and a safe-conduct to the gates of Rome. The women, who had been surprised in the villas of Campagna, were restored, without a ransom, to their husbands; the violation of female chastity was immemorially chastised with death; and in the salutary regulation of the diet of the finished Neapolitans, the conqueror assumed the office of a humane and attentive physician. After reducing, by force or treaty, the towns of inferior note in the midst of which his forces, preceded by a large train of baggage, proceeded, to assault, but to encompass and starve, the ancient capital. Rome was besieged by the avare, and guarded by the valour of Bessas, a veteran chief of Gothic extraction, who filled, with a garrison of three thousand soldiers, the spacious circle of her venerable walls. From the disarts of the people he extracted a profitable trade, and secretly rejoiced in the continuance of the siege. It was for his use that the granaries had been replenished: the charity of pope Vigilius had purchased and embarked an ample supply of Sicilian corn, which supplied the barbarians were seized by a rapacious governor, who imparted a scanty sustenance to the soldiers, and sold the remainder to the wealthy Romans. The medimma, or fifth part of the quarter of wheat, was exchanged for seven pieces of gold; fifty pieces were given for an ox. A rare and accidental prize; the progress of famine enhanced this exorbitant value, and the mercenaries were tempted to deprive themselves of the allowance which was scarcely sufficient for the support of life. A tasteless and unwholesome mixture, in which the bran thinned the quantity of flour, approached the husks of bread; they were reduced to feed on dead horses, dogs, cats, and mice, and eagerly to snatch the grass, and even the nettles, which grew among the ruins of the city. A crowd of spectres, pale and emaciated, their bodies oppressed by discases, and their faces, seasoned with the years, enured to the palaces of the governor, urged with unavailing truth, that it was the duty of a master to maintain his slaves, and humbly requested, that he would provide for their subsistence, permit their flight, or command their immediate execution. Bessas replied, with an-efling торa, that it was impossible to feed, unsafe to dismiss, and unlawful to kill, the subjects of the emperor. Yet the example of a private citizen might have shown his countrymen that a tyrant cannot withhold the privilege of death. Pierced by the cries of five children, who vainly pleaded on their father for bread, he ordered them to follow his steps, advanced with calm and silent despair to one of the bridges of the Tiber, and, covering his face, threw himself headlong into the stream, in the presence of his family and the Roman people. To the rich and pusillanimous, Bessas sold the permission of departure; but the great part of the fugitives expired on the public highways, or were intercepted by the flying parties of barbarians. In the mean while, the artful governor soothed the discontent, and revived the hopes, of the Romans, by the vague reports of the fleets and armies, which were hastening to their relief from the extremities of the east. They derived more rational comfort from the assurance that Belisarius had landed at the port; and, without numbering his forces, they firmly relied on the humanity, the courage, and the skill of their great deliverer.

The foresight of Totila had raised the Roman taken by the Goths, A.D. 545. A D. Dec. 17.

Avarice of Belisarius, obstacles worthy of such an augur.

Ninety furlongs below the city, in the narrow part of the river, he joined the two banks by strong and solid timbers in the form of a bridge; on which he caused his whole army to be conveyed, without the least danger of the piecè, and without being watched by the enemy. The approach of the bridge and towers was covered by a strong and massive chain of iron; and the chain, at either end, on the approaches of the Tiber, was guarded by numerous and chosen detachments of archers. But the enterprise of forcing these barriers, and relieving the capital, displays a shining example of the boldness and courage of Belisarius. He started from the port along the public road, to awe the motions, and dis-tract the attention, of the enemy. His infantry and provisions were distributed in two hundred large boats; and each boat was shielded by a high rampart of thick planks, pio-roid with many small holes for the discharge of missile weapons. In the front, two large vessels were linked together to sustain a floating castle, which commanded the towers of the bridge, and contained a magazine of fire, sulphur, and bitumen. The whole fleet, which the general led in person, was received with a storm of missiles, and great power of the river. The chain yielded to the weight, and the enemies who guarded the banks were either slain or scattered. As soon as they reached the principal barrier, the fire-ship was instantly grappled to the bridge; one of the towers with two hundred Goths, was consumed by the flames; the assailants showed victory; and Rome was saved, if the wisdom of Belisarius had not been defeated by the misconduct of his officers. He had previously sent orders to Bessas to second his operations by a timely sally from the town; and he ordered Totila, as he passed by the Caelian, to render Bessas immovable; while the youthful ardour of Isaac delivered him into the hands of a superior enemy. The exaggerated renown of his defeat was hastily carried to the ears of Belisarius: he paused; betrayed by the single moment of his life some emotions of surprise and perplexity; and reluctantly sounded a retreat to save his wife Antonina, his treasures, and the only harbour which he possessed on the Tuscan coast. The vexation of his mind produced an ardent and almost mortal fever; and Rome was left without protection to the mercy or indignation of Totila.

The Continuance of hostilities had inebriated the national hatred; the Arian clergy were ignorominously driven from Rome; Pelagius, the archdeacon, returned without success from an embassy to the Gothic camp; and a Sicilian bishop, the envoy or nuncio of the pope, was deprived of both his hands, for daring to utter falsehoods in the service of the church and state.

Fanise had relaxed the strength and discipline of the garrison of Rome. They could derive no effectual service from a mere detachment of Belisarius, the avarice of the merchant at length absorbed the vigils of the governor. Four Isaurian sentinels, while their companions slept, and their officers were absent, descended by a rope from the wall, and secretly proposed to the Gothic king to introduce his army into the city. The offer was entertained with coldness and suspicion; they returned in safety; they twice repeated their visit; the place was twice examined; the Avarice was known and disregarded; and no sooner had Totila consented to the attempt, than they encircled the ancient gate, and gave admittance to their host.

The enemy advanced to the day they halted in order of battle, apprehensive of treachery or ambush; but the troops of Bessas, with their leader, had already escaped; and when the king was pressed to disperse their retinue, he prudently replied, that no sight could be more grateful than that of a flying enemy. The patriots, who were still possessed of horses, Dercus, Basilius, &c. accompanied the g vor; their brethren, among whom Olothros, Orastes, and Maximus, were named by the historian, took refuge in the church of St. Peter, and the saved persons remained in the capital, inspires some doubt of the fidelity either of his narrative or of his text. As soon as day-light had displayed the entire victory of the Goths, the turk marched decorously visited the tomb of their saint, and then returned. The multitude who stood around the altar, twenty-five soldiers, and sixty citizens, were put to the sword in the vestibule of the temple. archonæcon Pelagius stood before him with the gospels in his hand. "O Lord, be merciful to your servants." "Pelagius," said Totila with an insulting smile, "your pride now condescends to become a suppliant." "I am a suppliant," replied the prudent archdeacon, "God has now made us your subjects, and as your subjects we are entitled to your clemency." At this reply the heads of the Romans were spared; and the chastity of the maidens and matrons was preserved inviolate from the passions of the hungry soldiery. But they were rewarded by the freedom of pillage, after the most precious spoils had been reserved for the royal treasury. The plunder of the churches revealed gold and silver; and the avarice of Bessas had laboured with so much guilt and shame for the benefit of the conqueror.

In this revolution, the sons and daughters of Roman consuls tasted the misery which they had spurned or relieved, wandered in tattered garments through the streets of the city, and begged their bread, perhaps without success, before the gates of their hereditary mansions. The riches of Rusticiana, the daughter of Symmachus and widow of Boethius, had been generously devoted to alleviate the calamities of family. Totila, however, suddenly heard a report, that she had prompted the people to overthrow the statues of the great Theodoric; and the life of that venerable matron would have been sacrificed to his memory, if Totila had not respected her birth, her virtues, and even the pious motive of her revenue. The next day he pronounced two orations, to congratulate and admonish his victorious Goths, and to reprint the senate, as the vixi of slaves, with their perjury, folly, and ingratitude; sternly de clarine, that their estates and honours were justly forfeited to the companions of his arms. Yet he consented to forgive them, on the condition of the mutual destruction of the Greeks, to cultivate their hands in peace, and to learn from their masters the duty of obedience to a Gothic soverign. Against the city which had so long endured the horrors of victory he appeared invincible: one-third of the walls, in different parts, were demolished by his command; fire and engines prepared to consume or subvert the most standy works of antiquity; and the world was astonished by the fatal decree, that Rome should be changed into a pasture for cattle. The firm and temperate remonstrance of Belisarius suspended the execution; he warned the barbarian not to sully his fame by the destruction of those monuments which were the glory of the dead, and the delight of the living; and Totila was persuaded, by the advice of an enemy, to preserve the city as the ornament of his kingdom, or the fairest pledge of peace and reconciliation.

When he had signified to the ambassadors of Belisarius, his intention of sparing the city, he stationed an army at the distance of one hundred and twenty furlongs, and observed the motions of the enemy. When he judged of the readiness of the forces, and of the strength of the city, Totila made his way to Lucania and Apulia, and occupied on the summit of mount Garanus one of the camps of Hannibal.

The senators were dragged in his train, and after the in Campania: the citizens, with their wives and children, were dispersed in exile; and during forty days Rome was abandoned to desolate and dreary solitude.

The loss of Rome was speedily retrieved by an action too bold, according to the opinion of the event, the public opinion would apply the names of rashness or heroism. After the departure of Totila, the Roman general salved from the port at the head of a thousand horse, cut in pieces the enemy who opposed his progress, and visited with piteous revulsions the country space of the deserted city. Resolved to maintain a standard so conspicuous in the eyes of mankind, he summoned the greatest part of his troops to the standard which he erected on the capitol: the old inhabitants were recalled by the love of their country and the hopes of safety; and the keys of Rome were sent a second time to the emperor Justinian. The walls, as far as they had been demolished by the Goths, were repaired with rude and dissimilar materials; the ditch was restored; iron spikes were profusely scattered in the highways to amuse the feet of the horses; and as new gates could not be constructed, the breaches were defended by a Spartan ramport of his bravest soldiers. At the expiration of twenty-five days, Totila returned by hasty marches from Apulia, to avenge the injury and disgrace. Belisarius expected his approach. The Goths were thrice repulsed in three general assaults; they lost the flower of their troops; the royal standard had almost fallen into the hands of the enemy, and the fame of Totila sunk, as it had risen, with the fortune of his arms. Whatever skill and courage could achieve, had been performed by the Roman general; it remained only that Justinian should terminate, by a single effort, the war which had so ambitiously undertaken. The indolence, perhaps the impotence, of a prince who despised his enemies, and envied his servants, protracted the calamities of Italy. After a long silence, Belisarius was commanded to leave a sufficient garrison at Rome, and to transport himself into the province of Lucania, whose inhabitants, inflamed by catholic zeal, had cast away the yoke of their Arian conquerors. In this ignoble warfare, the hero, invincible against the power of the barbarians, was basely vanquished by the delay, the disinterestedness, and the cowardice of his own officers. He was compelled by the promises of the emperor to maintain the assurance, that the two passes of the Lucanian hills were guarded by his cavalry. They were betrayed by treachery or weakness; and the rapid march of the Goths scarcely allowed time for the escape of Belisarius to the coast of Sicily. At length a fleet and army were assembled for the relief of Rusticonium, or Roscario, a fortress sixty furlongs from the ruins of Sybaris, where the nobles of Lucania had taken refuge. In the first attempt, the Roman forces were dissipated by a storm. In the second, they approached the shore; but they saw the hills covered with ancient ramparts, the landing-place defended by a line of spurs, and the king of the Goths impatient for battle. The conqueror of Italy retired with a sigh, and continued to languish, inglorious and inactive, till Antoninus, who had been sent to Constantinople to sollicite succours, obtained, after the death of the empress, the permission of his return.

Final recall of Belisarius. A.D. 538. September, whose eyes had been dazzled and wounded by the blaze of his former glory. Instead of delivering Italy from the Goths, he wandered like a fugitive along the coast, without daring to march into the country, or to accept the bold and repeated challenge of Totila. Yet in the judgment of the few who could discern crimes from events, and compare the instruments with the execution, he appeared a more consummate master of the art of war, than in the season of his prosperity, when he possessed two captive kings before the throne of Justinian. The valour of Belisarius was not chilled by age; his prudence was matured by experience, but the moral virtues of humanity and justice seem to have yielded to the hard necessity of the times. The parsimony or poverty of the emperor compelled him to deviate from the rule of conduct which had deserved the love and confidence of the Italians. The war was maintained by the oppression of Ravenna, Sicily, and all the faithful subjects of the empire; and the rigorous prosecution of the criminels deprived that injured and captive nation of deliver Spoleto into the hands of the enemy. The avance of Antonina, which have been sometimes diverted by love, now reigned without a rival in her breast. Belisarius himself had always understood, that miracles, in the end, are the surest evidence of the suspecting the personal merit. And it cannot be presumed that he should claim honour for the public service, without applying a part of the spoil to private emolument. The hero had escaped the sword of the barbarians, but the dagger of conspiracy awaited his return. In the midst of wealth and honours, the eunuch, who had chastised the African tyrant, complained of the ingratitude of courts. He applied to Proyepta, the emperor's niece, who wished to reward her deliverer; but the impediment of his previous marriage was asserted by the piety of Theodora. The pride of royal descent was irritated by flattery; and the service in which he gloried, had proved him capable of bold and sagacious deeds. The death of Justinian was resolved, but the conspirators delayed the execution till they could surprise Belisarius disarmed, and naked, in the palace of Ravenna. Not a hope remained of shaking his long-tried fidelity; and they justly dreaded the revenge, or rather justice, of the veteran general, who might speedily assemble an army in Thrace to punish the assassins, and perhaps to enjoy the fruits of their crime. Delay afforded time for rash communications and base confessions; Anabah and his accomplices were condemned by the senate, but the extreme clemency of Justinian detained them in the gentle confinement of the palace, till he pardoned their flagitious attempt against his throne and life. If the emperor forgave his enemies, he did not so readily embrace a friend whose victories were more remembrable, and who was endeared to his prince by the recent circumstance of their common danger. Belisarius repose from his toils, in the high station of general of the east and count of the domestic services; and the older counsels and patriots refused to applaud the precedence of rank to the peerless merit of the first of the Romans. The first of the Romans still submitted to be the slave of his wife; but the servitude of habit and affection became less disgraceful when the death of Theodora had removed the baser influence of fear. Joannina his daughter, and the sole heiress of their fortunes, was betrothed to Anastasius, the grandson, or rather great-grandson, of the emperors. When he heard the position forwarded the consummation of their youthful loves. But the power of Theodore expired, the parents of Joannina returned, and her honour, perhaps her happiness, were sacrificed to the revenge of an unfeeling mother, who dissolved the imperfectupticles before they had been ratified by the ceremonies of the church.

Before the departure of Belisarius, Rome again to Persia was besieged, and few cities ken by the Goths. A.D. 539. Ravenna, Acutana, and Crotoma, still resisted the barbarians; and when Totila asked in marriage of the daughters of France, he was stung by the just reproach that the king of Italy was unworthy of his title till it was acknowledged by the Roman people. Three thousand of the bravest soldiers had been left to defend the capital. On the suspicion of a mon-poly, they massacred the governor, and announced to Justinian, by a deputation of the clergy, that unless their offence was pardoned, and their arms were satisfied, they should instantly accept the tempting offers of Totila. But the officer who succeeded to the command (his name is Lattanicus) contented himself with a formal deposition, and the Goths, instead of finding an easy conquest, encountered a vigorous resistance from the soldiers and people, who patiently endured the loss of the port, and of all maritime supplies. The siege of Centenelle, the fortress of Totila, was invested by the armies of the east and west, which were reduced to the narrow coast, were disarmed with honour; and above four hundred enemies, who had taken refuge in the sanctuaries, were saved by the clemency of the victor. He no longer entertained a wish of destroying the edifices of Rome, which he now respected as the seat of the Gothic kingdom; the senate and people were restored to their country; the means of subsistence were liberally provided; and Totila, in the robe of peace, exhibited the equestrian games of the circus. Whilst he amused the eyes of the multitude, four hundred vessels were overhauled: the embargo of his subjects of Rheim, and Tarentum, were reduced; he passed into Sicily, the object of his implacable resentment; and the island was stripped of its gold and silver, of the fruits of the earth, and of an infinite number of horses, sheep, and oxen. Sardinia and Corsica obeyed the fortune of Italy; and the sea-coast of Greece, inhabited by a body of three hundred galleys. The Goths were landed in Coreya and the ancient continent of Epirus; they advanced as far as Nicopolis, the trophy of Augustus, and Dodona, once famous by the oracle of Jove. In every step of his victories, the wise barbarian repeated the example of his predecessors, and employed to the employ the Gothic arms in the service of the empire.

Preparations of Justinian for the Gothic war. A.D. 549—551.

Justinian was deaf to the voice of pease; but he neglected the prosecution of war; and the indulgence of his temper disapproved, in some degree, the obstinacy of his passions. From this salutary shudder the emperor was awakened by the pope Vigilius and the patrician Theogenes, who appeared before his throne, and adjured him in the name of God and the people, to resume the conquest and delivence of Italy. The choice of the generals, caprice, as well as judgment, was shown. A fleet and army sailed for the relief of Sicily, under the conduct of Liberius; but his youth and want of experience were afterwards discovered, and before he touched the shores of the island he was delivered up to the enemy. Totila, in the meantime, the conspirator Arrabius was raised from a prison to military honours; in the pious presumption, that gratitude would animate his valour and fortify his allegiance. Belisarius, exiled in the shade of his hales, was the command of the principal army was reserved for the conqueror and delivancer of Italy. His merit had been long depressed by the jealousy of the court. Theodora had injured him in the rights of a private citizen, the marriage of his children, and the testament of his brother; and although his conduct was pure and blameless, Justinian was displeased that he should be thought worthy of the confidence of the malcontents. The life of Germans was a lesson of implicit obedience: he nobly refused to prostitute his name and character in the factions of the circus: the gravity of his manners was tempered by innocent chaces, and a courtly grace of manner, which was agreeable to judges or deserving friends. His valour had formerly triumphed over the Scavones of the Danube and the rebels of Africa: the first report of his promotion revived the hopes of the Italians; and he was privately assured, that a crowd of Roman deserters would rush to his arms. The standard of Totila. His second marriage with Malabuntina, the grand-daughter of Theodoric, endeared Germans to the Goths themselves; and they marched with reluctance against the father of a royal infant, the last offspring of the line of Anath. A splendid allowance was assigned by the emperor; the general contrived his private fortune; his two sons were popular and active; and he surpassed, in the promptitude and success of his levies, the expectation of mankind. He was permitted to select some squadrons of Thracian cavalry; the veterans, as well as the youth, of Constantinople and Europe, engaged their voluntary service; and as far as the heart of Germany, his famed and liberality attracted the aid of the barbarians. The Romans advanced to Sardinia; an army of Scavones fled before their march; but the Romans, within two days, passed over by a body of three hundred galleys. Germanus were terminated by his malady and death. Yet the Emperor which he had given to the Italian war still continued to act with energy and effect. The maritime towns, Auceona, Cretona, Centumcellae, resisted the assaults of Totila. Sicily was reduced by the emperor, applauded by the Goths and the Senate, near the coast of the Hydriotis. The two fleets were almost equal, forty-seven to fifty galleys; the victory was decided by the knowledge and dexterity of the Greeks; but the ships were so closely grappled, that only twelve of the Goths escaped from this unfortunate conflict. They affected to depreciate an element in which they were unskilled, but their own experience confirmed the truth of a maxim, that the master of the sea will always acquire the dominion of the land.

After the loss of Germanus, the nations were provoked to smite, by the strange intelligence, that the emperor had placed at the command of the army was given to a eunuch. But the eunuch Narses is character and reputation ranked among the few who have rescued that unhappy nation from the contempt and hatred of mankind. A feeble diminutive body concealed the soul of a statesman and a warrior. His name, which was invested in the management of the low and distaff, in the cares of the household, and the service of female luxury; but while his hands were busy, he secretly exercised the faculties of a vigorous and discerning mind. A stranger to the schools and the camp, he studied in the universal palate to discern the good man; he saw soon as he approached the person of the emperor, Justinian listened with surprise and pleasure to the timely counsels of his chamberlain and private treasurer. The talents of Narses were tried and approved in frequent embarrassments; he led an army into Italy, acquired a practical knowledge of the war and the military, and the king of the Lombards satisfied or surpassed the obligations of his service and the public trust. But he was too patient, too mild, and too gentle. He was described as a man of appearances, who was trusted by his enemies, but feared by his friends. He was never seen to risk his own glory, and that of his sovereign. Justinian granted to the favourite, what he might have denied to the hero; the Gothic war was rekindled from its ashes, and the preparations were not unworthy of the greatness of the empire. The key of the public treasure was put into his hand, to collect magazines, to levy soldiers, to purchase arms and horses, to discharge the arrears of pay, and to tempt the fidelity of the fugitives and deserters. The troops of Germanus were still in arms; they halted near Salona in the expectation of a new leader; and regions of subjects and allies were created by the well-known liberality of the eunuch Narses. of a treaty, by lending two thousand two hundred of his bravest warriors, who were followed by three thousand of their martial attendants. Three thousand Heruli fought on horse-back under Philhemus, their native chieftain, and the noble Avarus, who adopted the manners and discipline of his masters, more absolute in the affection of his troops. Aigistheus was released from prison to command the Hann; and Kondak, the grands n and nephew of the great king, was conspicuous by the regal thron at the head of his faithful Persians, who had devoted themselves to the fortunes of their prince. Absurd in the exercise of his authority, more absolute in the affections of his troops, Heraclius led a numerous and gallant army from Philippopolis to Salona, from whence he crossed the eastern side of the Adriatic as far as the confines of Italy. His præm was checked. The east could not supply vessels capable of transporting such multitudes of men and horses. The Franks, who, in the general confusion, had usurped the greater part of the Venetian province, refused a free passage to the friends of the Lombards. The station of Verona was occupied by Tissis, with the flower of the Gothic forces, but a haughty archbishop of an adjacent country with the fall of woods and the inundation of waters. In this perplexity, an officer of experience proposed a measure, secure by the appearance of rashness; that the Roman army should countenantly advance on the scene, while they first crossed their march, and successively cast a bridge of boats over the mouths of the rivers, the Timavus, the Brenta, the Adige, and the Po, that fell into the Adriatic to the north of Ravenna. Nine days he reposed in the city, collected the fragments of the Italian army, and marched towards Rimini to meet the donation of an invincible enemy.

Defeat and death of Narses impelled him of Tullia. A.D. 532. The losses were the last effort of the state: the cost of each day accumulated the enormous accumulations, and the nations, unrestrained to discipline or fatigue, might be rashly provoked to turn their arms against each other, or against their benefactor. The same considerations might have tempered the ardour of Totila. But he was conscious, that the clergy and people of Italy aspired to a second revolution; he left not unsuspected the rapid progress of treason; and he resolved to risk the Gothic kingdom on the chance of a day, in which the valiant might be animated by instant danger, and the disaffected might be awed by mutual ignorance. In his march from Ravenna, the Roman general traversed the province of the Flaminian, nine miles beyond the exhilarated rock, an obstacle of art and nature which might have stopped or retarded his progress. The Goths were assembled in the neighborhood of Rome, they advanced without a delay to seek a superior enemy, and the two armies approached each other at the distance of one hundred furlongs, between Tagina and the sepulchres of the Gauls. The haughty message of Narses was an offer, not of peace, but of pardon. The answer of the Gothic king declared his resolution, to die or conquer. What day, said the messenger, will you fix for the combat? The eighth day, replied Totila: but early in the morning, the omen of the augurs was unprecedented: he took the palace of the Emperor, and prepared for battle. Ten thousand Heraclius and Lombards, of approved valour and doubtful faith, were placed in the centre. Each of the wings was composed of eight thousand Romans; the right was guarded by the cavalry of the Hans, the left by cavalry of the Persians; and on the centre, according to the emergencies of action, to sustain the retreat of their friends, or to encompass the flank of the enemy. From his proper station at the head of the right wing, the eminent role along the line, expressing by his voice and countenance the assurance of victory, exciting the soldiers of the emperor to punish the guilt and madness of a band of robbers; and exposing to their view gold chains, collars, and bracelets, the rewards of military virtue. From the event of a single combat, they drew an omen of success; and they believed that the empire was recovered by the small victory which it maintained a small eminence against three successive attacks of the Gothic cavalry. At the distance only of two bow-shots, the armies spent the morning in dreadful suspense, and the Romans tasted some necessary of the enemy's men, who charged on the right, either by art, or the bridge from their horses. Narses awaited the charge; and it was delayed by Totila till he had received his last succours of two thousand Goths. While he consumed the hours in fruitless treaty, the king exhibited in a narrow space the strength and agility of a warrior. His arm was enameled with gold; his purple banner floated with the wind; he cast his lance into the air; caught it with the right hand; shifted it to the left; threw himself backwards; recovered his seat; and managed a fiery steed in all the maneuvers of the modern school. As soon as the succours had arrived, he retired to his tent, assumed the dress and arms of a private soldier, and gave the signal of battle. The first line of cavalry advanced with more courage than discretion, and left behind them the infantry of the second line. They were successively defeated between the, the herm of Totila, and into which the adverse wings had been insensibly curved, and were saluted on either side by the volleys of four thousand archers. Their ardour, and even their distress, drove them forwards to a close and unequal conflict, in which they were unable to triumph over the enemy skilled in all the instruments of war. A generous emulation inspired the Romans and their barbarian allies; and Narses, who calmly viewed and directed their efforts, doubted to whom he should adjudge the prize of superior bravery. The Gothic cavalry was astonished and disordered, pressed and broken; and the line of infantry, instead of presenting their spears, or opening their intervals, were trampled under the feet of the flying horse. Six thousand of the Goths were slaughtered without mercy in the field of battle. Their attendants, was overtaken by Asbad, of the race of the Gepid: "Spare the king of Italy," cried a loyal voice, and Asbad struck his lance through the body of Totila. The blow was instantly revenged by the faithful Goths; they transported their dying monarch seven miles beyond the scene of his disgrace; and his last moments were not imbittered by the presence of an enemy. Compensation afforded him the shelter of an obscure... the Alps to the foot of mount Vesuvius, the Gothic king, by rapid and secret marches, approached to the relief of his brother, eluded the vigilance of the Roman chiefs, and pitched his camp on the banks of the Sarnus or Dover, which flows from Naceria into the Tiber near the mouth of Naples. In this situation the fortification of the town was reduced by sixty days were consumed in distant and fruitless combats, and Theodoric maintained this important post, till he was deserted by his fleet and the hope of subsistence. With violent steps he ascended the Lycerian mount, where the physicians of Rome, since the time of the salubrity of the air, had sent the patients for the benefit of the air and the milk. But the Goths soon embraced a more generous resolution: to descend the hill, to dismiss their horses, and to die in arms, and in the possession of freedom. The king marched at their head, bearing in his right hand a lance, and an ample buckle in his left hand, the one he struck deep the foremost of the assailants; with the other he received the weapons which every hand was ambitious to gain against his life. After a combat of many hours, his left arm was fatigued by the weight of twelve javelins, which hung from his shield. Without moving from his ground, the Goths, by the beauty of their evolutions, took advantage of the confusion to run off many of the assailants; with their leader; they fought till darkness desisted on the earth. They reposed on their arms. The combat was renewed with the return of light, and maintained with unabated vigour till the evening of the second day. The repose of a second night, the want of water, and the losses of their bravest champions, determined the surviving Goths to accept the fair capitulation which the prudence of Narses inclined to propose. They embraced the alternative of residing in Italy, as the subject, and soldiers of Justinian, or departing with a portion of their private wealth, in search of some indipendent country. Yet the death of sexuality or exile was alike rejected by one thousand Goths, who broke away before the treaty was signed, and boldly effected their retreat to the banks of the Parnus. The spirit, as well as the situation, of Aliger, prompted him to return (perhaps in love) to claim his brother: The strong and dexterous archer, he traced with a single arrow the armour and breast of his antagonist; and his military conduct defended Cumae above a year against the forces of the Romans. Their industry had scoffed the Sibyl’s cave into a prodigious mine; combustible materials were introduced to consume the temporary props: the wall and the gate of Cumae sunk into the cavern, but the ruins formed a deep and inaccessible precipice. On the fragment of a rock, Aliger stood alone and unshaken, till he calmly surveyed the hopeless condition of his country, and judged it more honourable to be the friend of Narses than the slave of the Franks. After the death of Tulas, the Roman general, in the battle of the coast of Italy; Lucca sustained a long and vigorous siege; and such was the humanity or the prudence of Narses, that the repeated perfidy of the inhabitants could not provoke him to exact the forfeit lives of their hostages. These hostages were dismissed in safety; and their governor, with long length subdued the obstinacy of their countrymen.a

Invasion of Italy Before Lucca had surrendered, Italy by the Franks was overwhelmed by a new deluge of barbarians. A fewable youth, the grand-son of Chovis, reigned over the Austrasians or original Franks. The guardians of Theodoric entertained with coldness and reluctance the magnificent promises of the Gothic ambassadors. But the spirit of a martial people outstripped the timid counsels of the court: two brothers, Lothaire and Burchelin, the Duke of the Alamanni, set forth as heroes of the Italian war; and seventy-five thousand Germans descended in the autumn from the Rhetian Alps into the plain of Milan. The vanguard of the Roman array was stationed near the Po, under the conduct of Vulturis, a bold Herulian, who rashly conceived that his bravest was the sole duty and merit of a commander. As he marched without order or precaution along the Emilian way, an ambuscade of Franks suddenly arose from the amphitheatre of Parma; his troops were surprised and routed; but their leader refused to fly; declaring, to the last moment, that death was less terrible than the angry countenance of Narses. The death of Vulturis, and the retreat of the surviving chiefs, decided the fluctuating and rebellious temper of the Goths; they flew to the standard of their deliverers, and admitted them into the cities which still resisted the power of the Roman general. The conqueror of Italy opened a free passage to the irresistible torrent of barbarians. They passed under the walls of Cesena, and answered by threats and reproaches the advice of Agilern, that the Gothic treasuries could no longer repay the labour of an invasion. Calamities and superfluous wants were destroyed by the skill and valour of Narses himself, who satisfied from Rimini at the head of three hundred horse, to chastise the licentious rapine of their march. On the confines of Samnium, the two brothers divided their forces. With the right wing, Burchelin assumed the spoil of the Caesarea; and Burchelin, and Burchelin, and Burchelin left, Lothaire accepted the plunder of Apulia and Calabria. They followed the coast of the Mediterranea and the Adriatic, as far as Rheiogia and Otranto, and the extreme lands of Italy were the term of their destructive progress. The Franks, who were christians and catholics, contended themselves with simple pillage and occasional murder. But the churches which their piety had spared, were stripped by the sacrilegious hands of the Alamanni, who sacrificed heroes' heads to their native deities; the woods and rivers.t they melted down into gold; the cities were reduced into desolate vessels, and the ruins of shrines and altars were stained with the blood of the faithful. Burchelin was aetuated by ambition, and Lothaire by avarice. The former aspired to restore the Gothic kingdom; the latter, after a promise to his brother of speedy succours, returned by the same road to dispose his treasure beyond the Alps. The strength of their armies was already wasted by the change of climate and contagion of disease. But the Franks and Alamanni, on the invasion of Italy; and their own intemperance avenged, in some degree, the miseries of a defenceless people.

At the entrance of the spring, the imperial troops, who had guarded the cities, Franks and Alemanni, slowly moved towards Capua, occupied with a wooden tower the bridge of Casilium, covered his right by the stream of the Vulturnus, and secured the rear of his component by a rampart of adobe, a mark and a circle of waggons, whose wheels were buried in the earth. He impatiently expected the return of Lothaire; ignorant, alas! that his brother could never return, and that the chief and his army had been swept away by a tumult of a battle. His skilful movements intercepted the subsistence of the barbarian, deprived him of the advantage of the bridge and river, and in the choice of the ground and moment of action reduced him to comply with the inclination of his enemy. On the morning of the important day, when the ranks were already formed, a servant, for some trivial fault, was killed by his master, one of the leaders of the Heruli. The justice or passion of Narses was awakened; he summoned the offender to his presence, and without listening to his excuses, gave the order to sever his head. The unprincipled Herulian, who had not infringed the laws of his nation, this arbitrary execution was not less unjust than it appears to have been imprudent. The Heruli felt the indignity; they halted; but the Roman general, without soothing their rage, or expecting their resolution, called aloud to his victorious army: When you are about to occupy their place, they would lose the honour of the victory. His troops were disposed t in a long front, the cavalry on the wings; in the centre, the heavy-armed foot; the archers and slingers in the rear. The Germans advanced in a sharp pointed column, of the form of a triangle or solid wedge. They pierced the teble centre of Narses, who received them with a smile into the fatal snare, and directed his wings of cavalry insensibly to wheel on their flanks and encompass their rear. The host of the Franks and Alamanni were thus cut off from each other and cut down, hanging by their side; and they used, as their weapons of offence, a weighty hatchet, and a hooked javelin, which were only formidable in close combat, or at a short distance. The flower of the Roman archers, on horseback, armed in complete armour, astonish'd with out peril round this immovable phalanx; supplied by active speed the deficiency of numbers; and aimed their arrows against a crowd of barbarians, who, instead of a cuirass and a helmet, were covered by a a There is some difficulty in connecting the thirty-fifth chapter of the Gothic war of Procopius with the first book of the history of Aquitania. We must now relinquish a master and servant, who saved the extremities of a post and rhetorician. (I. p. 141. ii. p. 31. edit. Lower.)

b Among the libellous exploits of Burchelin, he denounced and slew Rolonde, Duke of the Bubon, and Scutel. And he is the historian of France, Gregory of Tours, (c. iii. 1. c. v. 22. p. 303.) and Aliman, contemporary, ii. c. 2. 3. One of his journeys to Rome, C. C. was in the year 535. (ii. c. 2. 3. 32.) Apsines notices their suppression in a philo-scopic tone, (1. p. 1.) At Zara, in the same year, in the year 532. C. Columba and St. Gall were the apostles of that rude country; and the latter founded an hermitage, which has swelled into a ecclesiastical principality and a popular city, the seat of freedom and commerce.

It has exhibited a faithful representation of this battle, somewhat in the manner of the historian and the Gallican editor of Polibius, who imitates his own habits and opinions all the military conceptions of antiquity. loose garment of fur and linen. They paused, they trembled, their ranks were confounded, and in the decisive moment the Heruli, preferring glory to revenge, charged with rapid violence the head of the column. Their leader, Sindalb, and Algenz, the Gothic prince, deserved the prize of superior valor; and the fierce reception given to the army by the senate and people with swords and spears the destruction of the enemy. Buccelin, and the greatest part of his army, perished on the field of battle, in the waters of the Volturnus, or by the hands of the armed peasants; but it may seem incredible, that a victory, which made the Gothic king the second rank of kings, should be purchased with the loss of fourscore Romans.

Seven thousand Goths, the relics of the war, defended the fortress of Campus, till the ensuing spring; and every messenger of Narses announced the reduction of the Italian cities, whose names were corrupted by the ignorance or vanity of the Greeks. After the battle of Castilium, Narses entered the capital; the arms and treasures of the Goths, the Franks, and the Almanni, were displayed; his soldiers, with garlands in their hands, chanted the praises of the conqueror; and Rome, for the last time, beheld the semblance of a triumph.

Settlement of Italy.

After a reign of sixty years, the throne of the Gothic kings was filled by the exarchs of Ravenna, the representatives in peace and war of the emperors of the Romans. Their jurisdiction was soon reduced to the limits of a multitude of cities. But this was the most powerful of the exarchs, administered above fifteen years the entire kingdom of Italy. Like Belisarius, he had deserved the honours of envy, calumnies, and disgrace; but the favourite eunuch still enjoyed the confidence of Justinian; or the leader of a victorious army, was esteemed too able and too proud to dwell in a tribul court. Yet it was not by weak and mischievous indulgence that Narses secured the attachment of his troops. Forgetful of the past, and regardless of the future, they abused the present hour of prosperity and peace. The cities of Italy resounded with the noise of drinking and dancing; the spells of victory were wasted in sensual pleasures; and nothing (says Agathias) remained, unless to exchange their shields and helmets for the soft lute and the capacious hogchase.

In a manly oration, not unworthy of a Roman censor, the emperor reproved these disordered views, which subtilied their fame, and endangered their safety. The soldiers blushed and obeyed; discipline was confirmed: the fortifications were restored; a duke was stationed for the defence and military command of each of the principal cities; and the eye of Narses pervaded the ample prospect from Calabria to the Alps. The remains of the Gothic nation evacuated the country, or mingled with the people; the Franks, instead of revenging the death of Buccelin, abandoned, without a struggle, their Italian conquests; and the rebels Sindalb, chief of the Heruli, was subdued, taken, and hanged on a lofty gallows, by the power of the first instrument of the exarch. The civil state of Italy, after the agitation of a long tempest, was fixed by a pragmatic sanction, which the emperor promulged at the request of the pope. Justinian introduced his own jurisprudence into the schools and tribunals of the west: he ratified the acts of Theodoric and his immediate successors, but every deed was rescinded and abolished, which force had extorted, or for which he had received. A moderate treaty was framed to reconcile the rights of property with the safety of preservation, the claims of the state with the poverty of the people, and the pardon of offences with the interest of virtue and order of society. Under the exarchs of Ravenna, Rome was degraded to the situation in which it had been framed by the permission of visiting their estates in Italy, and of approaching, without obstacle, the throne of Constantinople: the regulation of weights and measures was delegated to the pope and senate; and the scholars of lawyers and physicians, of authors and grammarians, were destined to preserve, or rebuild, the light of science in the ancient capital. Justinian might dictate benevolent edicts, and Narses might second his wishes by the restoration of cities, and more especially of churches. But the power of kings is most effectual to destroy: and the twenty years of the Gothic war had accomplished the overthrow and subversion of Italy.

As early as the fourth campaign, under the discipline of Belisarius himself, fifty thousand labourers died of hunger in the narrow region of Picenum; and a strict interpretation of the evidence of Procopius would swell the loss of Italy above the total sum of her present inhabitants.

I desire to believe, but I dare not affirm, that Belisarius sincerely rejoiced in the triumph of Narses. Yet the consciousness of his own exploits might teach him to esteem without jealousy the merit of a rival; and the auspicious appearance of the aged warrior was crowned by a happy event, which saved the emperor and the capital. The barbarians, who annually visited the provinces of Europe, were less discouraged by some accidental defeats, than they were excited by the double hope of spoil and of subsistence. In the thirty-sixth year of Justinian's reign, the Danube was deeply frozen: Zabergan led the cavalry of the Bulgarians, and his standard was followed by a promiscuous multitude of Selonvianas. The savage chief passed, without opposition, the river and the mountain, spread his troops over Thrace and Macedonia, and, with more than seven thousand horse to the long wall, which should have defended the territory of Constantinople. But the works of man are impotent against the assaults of nature: a recent earthquake had shaken the foundations of the wall; and the forces of the empire were employed on the distant frontiers of Italy, Africa, and Persia. The seven schools, or companies of the guards or domestic troops, had been augmented to the number of five thousand five hundred men, whose ordinary station was in the peaceful cities of Asia. But the places of the brave Armenians were insensibly supplied by lazy citizens, who purchased

1 The Pragmatic Sanction of Justinian, which restores and regulates the civil state of Italy, consists of xxiv articles; it is dated August 15, A. D. 534; is addressed to Narses, V. I. Procopius, Secr. Cubicius, and to Antochius, Prefectus Praetoria Italiae; and has been preserved by Julian Anticsessor, and in the Corpus Juris Civilis, after the novels and edicts of Justinian, Justin, and his predecessors.

2 A still greater number was consummated by famine in the southern provinces, without the 쉼 of a single weapon, without the loss of a single life, and without the sacrifice of a single foot of land; an event which produced no dispute of the place of bread. Procopius has seen a deserted orphan suckled by a sow, covered with a sheep, and guarded by a dog. Separate branches of the nation were held, murdered, and eaten, by two women, who were detected and slain by the emperor.

3 Quinta regis Picenum et vastus uberneus multitudines, eccles. Philippi Picanisium in hoc Thesaurariorum, praestantissimus. In the time of Vespasian, this ancient population was already diminished.

4 Perhaps fifteen or sixteen millions, Procopius (Anecdot. c. 185) computes that Asia lost five millions, that Italy was thrice extortionated, and that the empire was reduced from the number of five millions to about three millions. This was the period of the conquest of Africa and of the loss of Italy. The destruction of certain cities, the abandonment of others, by the custom of the times, the plundering of the Cherson, and the reduction of the whole island of Peloponnese, by the custom of the times, is considered by Procopius (Anecdot. c. 214, Amam. p. 102, 103.) as confirmed and illustrated by Agathas, (I. v. p. 175.) who cannot be rejected as a hostile witness.
