an exemption from the duties of civil life, without being exposed to the dangers of military service. Of such soldiers, few could be tempted to salary from the gates; and none could be persuaded to remain in the field, unless they wanted strength and speed to escape from their pursuers. The very recorded numbers of the fugitives exaggerated the numbers and fierceness of an enemy, who had polluted holy virgins, and abandoned new-born infants to the dogs and vultures; a crowd of rustics, imploiring food and protection, succeeded the consternation of the city, and the troops of Zebagian were pitched at the distance of twenty miles,§ on the banks of a small river, which encircles Melanthes, and afterwards falls into the Propontis. Justinian trembled: and those who had only seen the emperor in his old age, were pleased to suppose, that he had lost the alacrity and vigour of his youth. By his command, the vessels of gold and silver were removed from the churches in the neighbourhood, and even the suburbs, of Constantinople: the rauparts were lined with trembling spectators: the golden gate was crowded with useless generals and tribunes, and the senate shared the fatigues and the apprehensions of the populace.

But the eyes of the prince and people were directed to a feeble veteran, who was compelled by the public danger to reassume the armour in which he had entered Carthage and defeated the Romans. The state of private citizens, and even of the circus, were hastily collected; the emulation of the old and young was roused by the name of Belisarius, and his first encampment was in the presence of a victorious enemy. His prudence, and the labour of the friendly peasants, secured, with a blush and rampart, the repose of the night: innumerable fires, and clouds of dust, were artfully contrived to magnify the opinion of his strength: his soldiers suddenly passed from despondency to presumption; and, while ten thousand voices demanded the battle, Belisarius assembled his knowledge, that in the hour of trial he must depend on the firmness of three hundred veterans.

The next morning the Bulgarians advanced to the charge. But they heard the shouts of multitudes, they beheld the arms and discipline of the front; they were assaulted on the flanks by two ambuscades which issued from the woods, and their foremost warriors fell by the hand of the aged hero and his guards; and the swiftness of their evolutions was rendered useless by the close attack and rapid pursuit of the Romans. In this action (so speedily was their flight) the Bulgarians lost only forty-hand of their best officers, and most of their prisoners, who felt the hand of a master, withdrew to a respectful distance.

But his friends were numerous in the councils of the emperor, and Belisarius obeyed with reluctance the commands of Sventio and Justinian, which forbade him to achieve the deliverance of his country. On his return to the city, the people still conceal as of their danger, accimpanied his triumph with acclamations of joy and gratitude, which were imputed as a crime to the victorious general. But when he entered the palace, the couriers were silent, and the emperor, after inquiries by two ambuscades which issued from the woods, and his ambulance, dismissed him to mingle with the train of slaves. Yet so deep was his impression of glory on the minds of men, that Justinian, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, was encouraged to advance near forty miles from the capital, and to inspect in person the rest-ration of the fleeing Thracians: but they were inclined to peace by the failure of their rash attempts on Greece and the Chersonesus. A menace of killing their prisoners quickened the payment of heavy ransoms; and the departure of Zebagian was hastened by the report, that double proved vessels were being built on the mouth of the river, for the passage of another enemy. The danger was soon forgotten; and a vain question, whether their sovereign had shown more wisdom or weakness, amused the idleness of the city.

About two years after the last victory, the emperor retired to Constantinople, on his return from Greece, and was received with great demonstrations of joy and devotion. Justinian was afflicted by a pain in his head; and his private essay commended the rumour of his death. Before the third hour of the day, the bakers' shops were plundered of their bread, the houses were shut, and every citizen, with hope or terror prepared for the impending tumult. The senators themselves, fearful and suspicious, were convened at the sixth hour: and the prefect received their commands to visit every quarter of the city, and to proclaim a general illumination for the recovery of the emperor's health. Many of the multitude that should have betrayed the impotence of the government, and the factions temper of the people: the guards were disposed to mutiny as often as their quarters were changed, or their pay was withheld: the frequent calamities of Greece and the barbarous state of the populace, which suffered from the orthodoxy and heresies, degenerated into bloody battles; and, in the presence of the Persian ambassador, Justinian blushed for himself and for his subjects. Capricious pardon and arbitrary punishment embittered the remorse and dissention of a long reign: a conspiracy was formed in the palace; and, unless we are deceived by the names of Marcellus and Sergius, the most virtuous and the most profligate of the couriers were associated in the same designs. They had fixed the time of the execution; their rank gave them access to the royal banquet; and their black slaves were stationed in the vestibule and porticoes, to announce the death of the tyrant, and to excite a sedition in the capital. But the indiscretion of an accomplice saved the poor remnant of the days of Justinian. The conspirators were detected and seized, with the因而 their passers: the situation of the bakers, under their garments: Marcellus died by his own hand, and Sergius was dragged from the sanctuary; Pressed by remorse, or tempted by the hopes of safety, he accused two officers of the household of Belisarius; and torture forced them to declare that they had actuated the conspirators, and that Zebagian was in the province of Constantine. Postcrity will not hastily believe that a hero who, in the vigour of life, had disdained the fairest offers of ambition and revenge, should stoop to the murder of his prince, whom he could not long expect to survive. His followers were impatient to fly; but flight must have been supported by rebellion, and he had lived enough for nature and for glory. Belisarius appeared before the council with less fear than indignation: after forty years' service, the emperor had prejudged his guilt; and justice was sanctioned by the presence and authority of the patriarch. The life of Belisarius was graciously spared; but his fortunes were seques-

§ A distance from Constantinople to Melanthes, Villa Cæsariensis. (Asinius, Marcellus, xxi. 11) is variably fixed at 190 or 191 miles. (Suidas, to. ii. 522, 523. Aristarchus, i. c. 188.) or from 190 to 198 miles. (Strabo, xiv. 730. Ptolemy, xiv. 282.) and to 199 miles. (Suidas, to. ii. 522, 523.) and to 199 miles. (Suidas, to. ii. 522, 523.) This last, though generally considered the most probable, is probably the most correct; and the most correct. (Procop. de Edif. i. c. 87.)

§ The Ayran, (Procop. Vandal, i. c. 28, p. 160, ed. Voss.) Anathor river's mouth, a town or castle of its name was fortiied by Justinian. (Procop. de Edif. i. c. 27. Fiermarc, p. 326, and Wesseling.)
prisoner in his own palace. At length his innocence was acknowledged; his freedom and honours were restored; and death, which might have been hastened by resentment and grief, removed him from the world about eight months after his deliverance. The name of Belisarius cannot die; but instead of the funeral, the memorable facts, the incident, are daily due to his name.

I only read, that his treasures, the spoils of the Goths and Vandals, were immediately confiscated by the emperor. Some decent portion was reserved, however, for the use of his widow; and as Antonina had much added to her wealth by the government, she was fortunate to the foundation of a convent. Such is the simple and genuine narrative of the fall of Belisarius and the ingratitude of Justinian. That he was deprived of his eyes, and reduced by envy to beg his bread, "Give a penny to Belisarius the general!" is a fiction of later times; which obtained credit, or rather, as a strange example of the vices of fortune.

Death and char. If the emperor could rejoice in the act of Justinian, death of Belisarius, he enjoyed the base satisfaction only eight months, the last period of a reign of thirty-eight, and a life of eighty-six years. The talents of Belisarius, if we trace the character of a prince who is not the most conspicuous object of his own times: but the confessions of an enemy may be received as the safest evidence of his virtues. The resemblance of Justinian to the bust of Domitian, is maliciously urged; with the acknowledgment, however, of a well-proportioned figure, a ruddy complexion, and a pleasing countenance. The emperor was easy of access, patient of hearing, courteous and affable in discourse, and a master of the angry passions, which rage with such destructive violence in the breast of a despot. Procopius praises his temper to reconciliation with calm and deliberate cruelty: but in the conspiracies which attacked his authority and person, a more candid judge will approve the justice, or admire the clemency, of Justinian. He excelled in the private virtues of chastity and temperance; but the impartial love of beauty would have been less disgraceful than his conjugal tenderness for Theroanda; and his abstemious diet was regulated, not by the prudence of a philosopher, but the superstition of a monk. His repasts were short and frugal; on solemn fasts, he contented himself with water and vegetables; and he often appear to have lived on the flesh of fowls. He should conclude this chapter with the comets, the earthquakes, and the plague, which astonished or afflicted the age of Justinian.

I. In the fifth year of his reign, and in Constanthe month of September, a comet was A. D. 531—539.

seen during twenty days in the western quarter of the heavens, and which shot its rays into the north. Eight years afterwards, while the sun was in Capricorn, another appeared to follow in the Sagittary: the size was gradually increasing; the head was in the east, the tail in the west, and it remained visible about forty days. The nations, who gazed with astonishment, expected wars and calamities from their beneficent influence; and these expectations were abundantly fulfilled. The astronomers disseminated their ignorance of the nature of these blazing stars, which they affected to represent as the floating meteors of the air; and few chose to embrace the simple notion of Sempere and the Chaldeans, that they are only planets of a longer
The Decline and Fall

CHAP. IV.

THE DECLINE AND FALL

The Decline and Fall

Time and science have justified the conjectures and predictions of the Roman sage: the telescope has opened new worlds to the eyes of astronomers; 2 and, in the narrow space of history and fable, one and the same comet is already found to have revisited the earth in seven equal revolutions of five hundred and forty-seven years. The first, which preceded the Christian era one thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven, is coeval with Ogyges the father of Grecian antiquity. And this appearance explains the tradition which Varro has preserved, that under his reign, the planet Venus changed its usual color from green to red as a prodigy, without example either in past or succeeding ages. 3 The second visit, in the year eleven hundred and ninety-three, is darkly implied in the fable of Elecra the seventh of the Pleiads, who has been reduced to six since the time of the Trojan war. That nymph, the wife of Dardanus, was unable to support the ruin of her country: she abandoned the dances of her sister orbs, fled to the zodiac to the north pole, and obtained, from her dishevelled locks, the name of the comet. The third period expires in the year six hundred, when it is recorded by the poet of a sibyl, and perhaps of Pliny, which arose in the west two generations before the reign of Cyrus. The fourth apparition, forty-four years before the birth of Christ, is of all others the most important. And the death of Caesar, a long-haired star was conspicuous to Rome and to the nations, during the games which were exhibited by young Octavian, in honour of Venus and his uncle. The vulgar opinion, that it conveyed to heaven the divine soul of the dictator, was cherished and conse- crated by the pieties of a sibyl: while his secret superstition referred the comet to the glory of his own times. 4 The fifth visit has been already ascribed to the fifth year of Justinian, which coincides with the five hundred and thirty-first of the Christian era. And it may deserve notice, in this, as in the preceding instance, the comet was followed, though at a longer interval, by a remark peculiar to the sun. The sixth return, in the year eleven hundred and six, is recorded by the chronicles of Europe and China; and in the first fervor of the crusades, the Christians and the Saracens might furnish a sight equal to the heavens, that it pertained the destruction of the infidels. The seventh phenomenon, of one thousand six hundred and eighty, was presented to the eyes of an enlightened age. 5 The philosophy of Bayle dispelled a prejudice which Milton had so recently adored, that the comet..." manhood. The hut of a savage, or the tent of an Arab, may be thrown down without injury to the inhabitants; and yet, by the miserable shape they assume, the Spanish conquerors, who with so much cost and labour erected their own sepulchres. The rich mar-bases of a patrician are dashed on his own head: a whole people is buried under the ruins of public and private edifices, and the conflagration is kindled and propagated by the inhabitants by which are necessary for the subsistence and manufactures of a great city. Instead of the mutual sympathy which might comfort and assist the distressed, they dreadfully experience the vices and passions which are released from the fear of punishment: the tottering houses are the prey of wanton savages; revenge embraces the moment, and selects the victim; and the earth often swallows the assassin, or the ravisher, in the consummation of their crimes. Superstition involves the present danger with invisible terrors; and if the image of death may sometimes be subservient to the virtue or repentance of individuals, an affright too is more forcibly moved to expect the end of the world, or to deprave with servile homage the wrath of an aven-

Deity.

III. Ethiopia and Egypt have been the scenes of devastation, stigmatized in every age. (Hist. Lond. 372.)

A.D. 542.

In a damp, hot, stagnating air, this African fever is generated from the putrefaction of animal substances, and especially from the swarms of locusts, not less destructive to mankind in their death than in their lives. The fatal disease which depopulated the earth in the time of Justinian and his successors, first appeared in the neighbourhood of Pelusium, between the Nubian bog and the eastern channel of the Nile. From thence, tracing as it were a double path, it spread to the east, over Syria, Persia, and the Indies, and penetrated to the remotest parts of Africa, and partially to the continent of Europe. In the spring of the second year, Constantinople, during three or four months, was visited by the pestilence; andProcopius, who observed its progress and symptoms with the eyes of a physician, has emulated the skill and diligence of Thucydides in the description of his plague so frightful, though it was not an epidemic which spread itself through the body, but was, like the distemper; sometimes announced by the visions of a dis-tempered fancy, and the victim despairing as soon as he had heard the menace and felt the stroke of an invisible spectre. But the greater number, in their beds, in the streets, in their usual occupation, were surprised by this death so slight, although the pulse nor the colour of the patient gave any signs of the approaching danger. The same, the next, or the succeeding day, it was declared by the swelling of the glands, particularly those of the groin, of the armpits, and under the ear; and when these buboes or tumours were opened, they were found to contain a curved, or black substance, of the size of a leu-
til. If they came to a just swelling and suppuration, the patient was saved by this kind and natural discharge of the morbid humour. But if they continued hard and dry, a mortification quickly ensued, and the fifth day was commonly the term of his life. The fever was often accompanied with lethargy or delirium; the bodies of the sick were covered with black patches or carbonized, irregular, innumerable blisters; vomiting was too feeble to produce an eruption, the vomitting of blood was followed by a mortification of the bowels. To pregnant women the plague was generally mortal; yet one infant was drawn alive from his dead mother, and three mothers survived the loss of their infected fœtuses. A ooth was the most perilous season; and the female sex was less susceptible than the male: but every rank and profession was attacked with indiscriminate rage, and many of those who escaped were deprived of the use of their speech, without being securely from a return of the disorder. The physicians of Constantinople were lunatics and skilful: but their art was baffled by the various symptoms and pertinacious vehemence of the disease: the same remedies were productive of contrary effects, and the event capriciously disappopinted their prognostics of death or recovery. The order of funerals, and therites of sepulchres, were confounded; those who were left without friends or servants, lay unburied in the streets, or in their desolate houses; and a magistrate was authorized to collect the promiscuous heaps of dead bodies, to transport them by land or water, and inter them in deep pits beyond the precincts of the city. Their own horror, and the public distress, awakened some remorse in the minds of the most vicious of mankind; the confidence of health again revived their passions and habits; but philosophy must disdain the observation of Procopius, that the lives of such men were governed by what was peculiar to fortune or providence. He forgets, or he not servilely recolected, that the plague had touched the person of Justinian himself; but the abstemious diet of the emperor may suggest, as in the case of Socrates, a more rational and honourable cause for his recovery. During his sickness, the public consternation was expressed in the habits of the citizens; and their idleness and despondence occasioned a general scarcity in the capital of the east.

Contagion is the insipable symptom. Extent and durations, of the plague: which by mutual respiration, is transfused to the infected person. (Hist. Lond. 172.)

A.D. 544.

In the spring of the year, the plague, having infected persons to the lungs and stomach of those who approach them. While philosophers believe and tremble, it is singular, that the existence of a real danger should have been denied by a people most prone to vain and imagi-nory terrors. Yet the fellow-citizens of Constantinople were saved by a providential signal effect; and the knowledge they obtained of the disease, that the infection could not be gained by the closest conversation; and this persuasion might support the assiduity of friends or physicians in the care of the sick, whom inhuman prudence would have condemned to solitude and despair. But the fatal security, like the predestination of the Turks, must have aided the progress of the contagion; and those salutary precautions to which Europe is indebted for its safety, were unknown to the government of Justinian. No restraint were imposed on the free and fre-CHAPTER V.

Idea of Roman jurisprudence.—The laws of the kings.

The twelve tribes of the decemvirs. —The laws of the people. —The decretals of the senate. —The edicts of the magistrates and emperors. —Authority of the civil law.

The civil or Roman law. Justinian are crumbling into dust; but the name of the legislator is inscribed on a fair and everlasting monument. Under his reign, and by his care, the civil jurisprudence was digested in the immortal works of the Code, the Pandects, and the Institutes; the public reason of the Romans has been silently or studiously transferred into the domestic institutions of Europe, and the laws of Justinian still command the respect or obedience of independent nations. Wise or fortunate is the prince who connects his own reputation with the honour and interest of a perpetual order of men. The divinity of their founder is the first cause, which in every age has exercised the inherent power of levelling and dividing the mankind; to commemorate his virtues; to obviate their fallings; and fiercely chastise the guilt or folly of the rebels, who presume to sully the majesty of the purple. The idolatry of love has provoked, as it usually happens, the rancour of opposition; the character of Justinian is not the better esteemed for the meanness and invective, and the injustice of a sect (the Justin-Trivinius) has refused all praise and merit to the prince, his ministers, and his laws. 4 Attached to no party, interested only for the truth and candour of his conduct, and directed by the most tenacious and skillful guides, 5 I enter with just difficulty on the subject of civil law, which has exhausted so many learned lives, and clothed the walls of so many spacious libraries. In a single, if possible in a short, chapter, I shall trace the Roman jurisprudence from Remulus to Justinian, 6 the happy and prosperous period of the Roman empires. To contemplate the principles of a science so important to the peace and happiness of society. The laws of a nation form the most instructive portion of its history; and, although I have devoted myself to write the ancient political history of the ancillary monarchy, I shall embrace the occasion to breathe the pure and invigorating air of the republic.

The primitive government of Rome 7 Law of the Twelve Tables, 8 of an elective king, a council of nobles, and a general assembly of the people. War and religion were administered by the supreme magistrate; and he alone proposed the laws, which were debated in the senate, and finally ratified or rejected by a majority of votes in the thirty curia or parishes of the city. Romulus, Numa, and Servius Tullus are celebrated as the most ancient legislators; and each of them claims his peculiar part in the three-fold division of Jurisprudence. 9 The laws of marriage, the education of children, and the authority of parents, which may seem to draw their origin from nature itself, are ascribed to the two emperors of the Roman empire, and the civil laws of Justinian, as the most complete system of institutions and of religious worship, which Numa introduced, was derived from his nocturnal converse with the nymph Egeria. The civil law is attributed to the experience of Servius: he balanced the rights and fortunes of the several classes of citizens by fifty new regulations, the observance of contracts and the punishment of crimes. The state, which he had inclined towards a democracy, was changed by the last Tarquin into lawless despotism; and when

4. Francis Hackett, a learned and acute lawyer of the sixteenth century, wished to mortify Curious, and to please the chancellor de l'Hospital. His Anti-Trivinius (which I have never been able to procure) was published in French in 1688; and his sect was propagated in Germany. (Heineccius, Opp. tom. iii. syll. p. 171-183.)

5. At the head of these guides I shall respectfully place the learned and perceptive Heineccius, a German professor, who died at Halle in 1701, and is buried in the church of his native town; his Elegies de l'ancien et du nouveau droit, his Elements de jurisprudence, and of religious worship, which Numa introduced, was derived from his nocturnal converse with the nymph Egeria. The civil law is attributed to the experience of Servius: he balanced the rights and fortunes of the several classes of citizens by fifty new regulations, the observance of contracts and the punishment of crimes. The state, which he had inclined towards a democracy, was changed by the last Tarquin into lawless despotism; and when

6. After some figures of circus, the sands of the sea, &c. (Pandect. Anecd. c. 125.) attempts a more definite account: that answer. The expression of shapes in grammar and rhetoric, and a literal interpretation would produce several millions of millions. Alphonsi de la Concorde, filii p. 58. They are, I think, the easiest, "two hundred millions," but I am ignorant of their motives. If we drop the thesaurus, the remaining coda, & c., a myriad of my books, would furnish me hundreds of millions, a number not wholly inadmissible.

7. The civil laws of the darker ages have established an absurd and incomprehensible mode of notation, which is supported by authority and precedent. In their present state, they are of no use to the commonwealth; but, if we consult them with respect to the principles, to the fundamental law, and to the laws of the constitution, we may find there, a mass of useful and important materials, a mass of materials, the book, the title, and the law.

8. The historians of England, France, and Scotland, have received them as common law or reason: in France, Italy, &c., they possess a direct or indirect influence; and they were respected in England, from the beginning of the 13th century. (Vie de l'empereur Justinien, p. 58.)
The twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth books of the Decameron, which are often sought for, are the only ones that have been preserved. Indeed, the end of these books was considered to be their crowning glory. The deaths of the authors, the Civil War, the political upheavals, and the general decadence of the ancient world were all factors that contributed to the loss of these works. The only fragments that have survived are those preserved in various manuscripts and copies, which are now scattered throughout the libraries of Europe.
and of Lycurgus. The twelve tables were committed to the memory of the young and the meditation of the old; they were transcribed and illustrated with brass plates, the arts of which, under the Romans, surpassed the number of a hundred chapters. The decemvirs had neglected to import the sanction of Zaleucus, which so long maintained the integrity of his republic. A Lorician who proposed any new law, stood forth in the assembly of the people with a cord round his neck, and if the law was rejected, the innovator was instantly strangled.

Laws of the The decemvirs had been named, and people, their tables were approved, by an assembly of the centuries, in which riches preponderated against numbers. To the first centuries, the Romans, to prevent the mad and irritable proceedings of the tribes, the ten thousand pounds of copper, ninety-eight votes were assigned, and only ninety-five were left for the six inferior classes, distributed according to their substance by the awful policy of Servius. But the tribunes soon established a more specious division of the nation, in which every citizen had an equal right to enact the laws which he is bound to obey. Instead of the centuries, they convened the tribes; and the patricians, after an impotent struggle, submitted to the decrees of an assembly, in which their votes were confounded with those of the meanest of the multitude, and the long-practised ascendancy of that body was passed over narrow bridges, and gave their voices aloud, the conduct of each citizen was exposed to the eyes and ears of his friends and countrymen. The insolvent debtor consulted the wishes of his creditor; the client would have had his patron's name, the general was followed by his veterans; and the aspect of a grave magistrate was a living lesson to the multitude. A new method of secret ballot abolished the influence of fear and shame, of honour and interest, and the abuse of freedom accelerated the progress of anarchy and despotism. The Romans had aspired to be equal; they were levellled by the equality of servitude; and the dictates of Augustus were patientiy ratified by the formal consent of the people. The laws of Delia, applauded the virtues of honour and love; and the project of reform was suspended till a new and more tractable generation had arisen in the world. Such an example was not necessary to instruct a prudent usurper of the mischief of popular assemblies. Augustus, who was formerly hostile to the project, and who had it secretly prepared, was accomplished without resistance, and almost without notice, on the accession of his successor. Sixty thousand plebeian legislators, whose names were made infamous, and poverty secure, were supplanted by six hundred senators, who held the balance of their fortunes, and their lives, by the clemency of the emperor. The loss of Decrees of the executive power was alleviated by the senate, gift of legislative authority; and Ulpian might assert, after the practice of two hundred years, that the decrees of the senate obtained the force and validity of the laws. In the time of Augustus, the people had often been dictated by the passion of the moment; the Cenomani, Pompeian, and Julian laws, were adapted by a single hand to the prevailing disorders; but the senate, under the reign of the Caesars, was composed of magistrates and lawyers, and in questions of private jurisprudence, the integrity of their judgment was seldom perverted by fear or interest.

The silence or ambiguity of the laws Edicta of the was supplied by the occasional exacts of those who were no longer practised with the honours of the state. This ancient prerogative of the Roman kings was transferred, in their respective offices, to the consuls and dictators, the censors and praetors; and a similar right was assumed by the tribunes of the people, the ediles, and the procensors. At Rome, and in the provinces, the duties of the subject, and the intentions of the governor, were proclaimed; and the civil jurisprudence was reformed by the annual edicts of the supreme judge, the prator of the city. As soon as he ascended his tribunal, he announced by the voice of the people, with the solemnity and formality of the rules which he proposed to follow in the decision of doubtful cases, and the relief which his power would afford from the precise rigour of ancient statutes. A principle of discretion more congenial to monarchy was introduced into the republic; the art of respecting the same, and eluding the efficacy, of the laws, was improved by successive praetors; subtleties and fictions were invented to defeat the plainest meaning of the decrees, and where the end was sanitary, the means were frequently absurd. The secret or prohibited death of the dead was suffered to prevail over the order of succession and the forms of testament; and the claim, who was excluded from the character of heir, accepted with equal pleasure from an indulgent praetor the possession of the goods of his late kinsman or benefactor. In the redress of private wrongs, compensations and fines were substituted to the absolute rigour of the twelve tables; time and space were annihilated

See Heinrichs, (Hist. J. R. No. 29—32.) I have followed the translation of all the tables by Gravina (Origines J. C. p. 293—307.) and Tsenas, (Hist. de la Jurisprudence Romane. p. 24—26.) 2 Finae equi manus, (Tact. Ann. iii. 25.) Finae omnia publica et privata juris. (T. Liv. iii. 21.) 3 De principiis jur. exquisitus modis ad hanc multitudinem infini tarum et exquisitorum perennis in aliusdam distinctorum. (Tact. Ann. iii. 25.) This deep suspicion fits only two pages, but they are the pages of Tacitus. With equal sense, but with less energy, Livy (full. 31.) had complained, in hoc immensus alienis superius aliarum jurisprudentiarum vetustatem, &c. 4 sertones in Vessigiano, c. 8. 5 Cicero ad Familiar. 6 Bonnay, with Arbuthnot, and most of the moderns, (except Eschenclait de Fonderieux, &c. p. 357—410.) represent the 100,000 Names by 100,000 pounds in silver or some other metal. But their calculation can apply only to the latter times, when the rise of the acres was diminished to 5/10th of their ancient weight; or I can believe that even in the first ages, however destitute of the precious metals, a single ounce of silver could have been exchanged for seventy pounds of copper or brass; this is to say, that the copper itself according to the present rate, and, after comparing the mint and the market prices, the Roman and the Arabo- weight, the primitive use or Roman pound of copper may be appreciated at one English shilling, and the 2000 marks of silver plate amounted to 2000 pounds sterling.-Ammon. Bacher. Hist. Natur. xviii, 4) nor do I see any reason to reject those authorities, which moderate our ideas of the modern value of the first Romans.- 7 Consult the common writers on the Roman Censors, especially Si- cius Pulcher. (Hist. litter. ii. 6) The same is observed by Tacitus, (Hist. ii. i.) on the privileges of the ancient Censors. 8 See Homer, (Hist. litter. iii. 21.) 9 On the honours of the people as a torba. (Parlement. 1. tit. ii. 1. 2 seq.) But the judici- acar of the people was a torba. (Parlement. 1. tit. ii. 1. 2 seq.) And the word was loosely explained in the Greek paraphrase of Theophrastus, (p. 31—32.) (edit. Reit.) who drops the important word humanisarias.
by fanciful suppositions; and the plea of youth, or fraud, or violence, annulled the obligation, or excused the performance of an inconvenient contract. A jurisdiction thus vague and arbitrary was exposed to the most dangerous abuse: the substance as well as the form of legal procedure was concealed by the elective nature of the judges of virtue, the bias of laudable affection, and the grosser seductions of interest or resentment. But the errors or vices of each prator expired with his annual office; such maxims alone as had been approved by reason and practice were copied by succeeding judges; the rule concerning was defended by the sole times, few cases; and the temptations of injustice were removed by the Cornelian law, which compelled the prator of the year to adhere to the letter and spirit of his first proclamation. It was reserved for the curiosity and learning of Hadrian, to accomplish the design which had been conceived by the genius of Cassar; and the pratorship of Salvius Julian, an eminent lawyer, was immortalized by the composition of the peremptory edict. This well-digested code was ratified by the emperor and the senate; the right of divorce of law and equity was accepted and reconciled; and, instead of the twelve tables, the peremptory edict was fixed as the invariable standard of civil jurisprudence. Constitution of the emperors. From Augustus to Trajan, the modern civil law was created along with the questions of private law. The edicts and, in the decrees of the senate, the ediciae and aedulciae of the prince were respectfully inserted. Hadrian appears to have been the first who assumed, without disguise, the plentitude of legislative power. And this innovation, so agreeable to his active mind, was so resounding by the patience only subdued, and his long absence from the seat of government. The same policy was embraced by succeeding monarchs, and, according to the harsh metaphor of Tertullian, the gloomy and inherent force of ancient laws was cleared away by the axe of royal mandates and Constitutiones. During four centuries, from Constantine to Justinian, the public and private jurisprudence was moulded by the will of the sovereign; and few institutions, either human or divine, were permitted to stand on their former basis. The origin of imperial legislation was concealed by the darkness of ages and the terror of the laws, propagated by the servility, or perhaps the ignorance, of the civilians, who basked in the sunshine of the Roman and Byzantine courts. To the prayer of the ancient Caesars, the senate or the prince had sometimes granted a personal exemption from the obligation and penalty of particular statutes; and every indulgence was an act of jurisdiction exercised by the republic over the first of her citizens. His humble privilege was at length transformed into the prerogative of a tyrant; and the Latin expression of "released from the laws,\(^1\) was supposed to exalt the emperor above all human restraints, and to leave his conscience and reason as the sacred instrument of his conduct. A similar dependence was implied in the decrees of the senate, which, in every detail, defined the acts of his conscience. But it was not before the ideas, and even the language, of the Romans had been corrupted, that a royal law, and an irrevocable gift of the people, were created by the fauce of Ulpius, or more probably of Tribonian himself; \(^2\) and the origin of imperial power, though false and artificial, perhaps, in its consequences, was supported on a legislative principle of freedom and justice. The power of the emperor has the vigour and effect of law, since the Roman people, by the royal law, have transferred to their prince the full extent of their own power and sovereignty.\(^3\) The will of a single man, of a child perhaps, was allowed to prevail over the wisdom of ages and the inclinations of millions; and the degenerate Greeks were proud to declare, that in his hands alone the arbitrary exercise of legislation could be safety deposited. What interest or passion, what fear or hope in the court, could reach the calm and sublime elevation of the monarch? He is already master of the lives and fortunes of his subjects; and those who have incurred his displeasure, are already numbered with the dead.\(^4\) Disdaining the language of flattery, the historian may confess, that the power of the emperor was the true measure of the rise of a prince, and that the reign of a great empire can seldom be influenced by any personal considerations. Virtue, or even reason, will suggest to his impartial mind, that he is the guardian of peace and equity, and that the interest of society is inseparably connected with his own. Under the weakest and most vilenest reign the seal of justice was filled by the wisdom and integrity of Papian and Ulpius; \(^5\) and the purest materials of the Code and Pandects are inscribed with the names of Caracalla and his ministers.\(^6\) The tyrant of Rome was sometimes the benefactor of the provinces. A dagger terminated the crimes of Domitian; but the prudence of Nerva confirmed his acts, which, in the joy of their deliverance, had been rescinded by an indignant senator.\(^7\) Yet in the rescripts,\(^8\) replies to Their rescripts, the consolations of the magistrates, the wisest of princes might be deceived by a partial exhibition of the temper of the times. And this plan, which placed their hasty decisions on the same level with mature and deliberate acts of legislation, was insidiously concealed by the sense and example of Trajan. The rescripts of the emperor, his grants and decrees, his edicia and pragmatica sanzioni, were subscribed in purple ink,\(^9\) and transmitted to the provinces as general or this occasion his editor, Reimarus, joins the universal clausure which freedom and criticism have pronounced against that slavish historian. The need (Lex Regia) was still more recent than the thing. The slaves of Commodes or Caracalla would have started at the name of slavery.

---

1 Dio Cassius (t. I. x. p. 190.) fixes the peremptory edict in the year of Rome 356. Their institution, however, is ascribed to the year 524 in the Acta Diurna, which have been published from the plates of the press of 324. Some, indeed, have referred to the year 526, ascribed to Constantius (who is supposed to have been the author of the edict) by Hume (in the introduction to his edition of the Acts of Diurna.) But it is evident that the name is a corruption of Cassar, and that the expression is of the ancient phrase, "the edicts of the Caesars, etc."

2 See Gravins (p. p. 304—322.) and Baerwent. (Republique Romane. tom. i. p. 235—274.) He has made a proper use of two dissertations by John Frederick Gravier and Noe, both translated into English. The valuable notes, by Barbyienne, 2 vols. in 12mo. 1821. In 1804, 411, litres. p. 423.) Cassar, t. 1. tit. xvi. reg. 1. No. 7. He has a distinctness of the institutions, and the Code is illustrated by Gravins (p. xii. 178.) and Gravins (p. 47—58.)

4 There is no reason to fear that the empire of Maximus: (Jul. Capitolini. c. 13.) Nul ne se rsaiera eis commodi et caracallae, as the historian decries the edicts of the Caesars. (Justinian, t. 1. tit. xvi. reg. 1. No. 7.)

5 Seidem, (in the Proem. ii. p. 234, 235.) Yet he only treads the middle road. And the special marriage. (Cod. Theod. t. 1. tit. ii. reg. 1.)

6 Of Antelaves Caracalla alone 200 constitutions are extant in the Code, and with his father 160. These two princes are quoted fifty times in the Pandects. Yet the judicature is left in the hands of Severus. (Rudbeck, Proleg. vii. p. 234, 235.) Yet he only treads the middle road. And the special marriage. (Cod. Theod. t. 1. tit. ii. reg. 1.)

7 A compound of vermillion and cinnamon, which marks the impresspecial laws, which the magistrates were bound to execute, and the people to obey. But as their number continually multiplied, the rule of obedience became each day more doubtful and obscure, till the will of the sovereign was fixed and ascertained in the Gregorian, the Hemicogenian, and the Theodosian codes. The two first, of which some fragments have escaped, were framed by two private lawyers, to preserve the constitutions of the pagan emperors from Hadrian to Constantine. The third, which is still extant, was dictated to three renowned and learned sages, from the scenes of a pontificate; the words were adapted to the gestures, and the slightest error or neglect in the forms of proceeding was sufficient to annual the substance of the fairest claim. The conclusion of the marriage-life was denoted by the dissension of the voice of the law, and the deserted wife regained the bunch of keys, by the delivery of which she had been invested with the government of the family. The manumission of a son, or a slave, was performed by turning him round with a gentle blow on the check; a work was performed by the casting of a stone; a prescription was interrupted by the breaking of a branch; the clenched fist was the symbol of a pledge or deposit; the right hand was the gift of faith and confidence. The indigent of covenants was a broken staff; weights and scales were introduced into every payment, and the historian, who accepted a testament, was sometimes obliged to snap his fingers, to cast away his garments, and to leap and dance with real or affected transport. If a citizen pursued any stolen goods into a neighbour's house, he concealed his nakedness with a linen towel, and hid his face with a mask or house, his hands over the eyes of a virgin or a matron. In a civil action, the plaintiff touched the ear of his witness, seized his reluctant adversary by the neck, and immoderately, in solemn lamentation, the aid of his fellow-citizens. The two compromissors grasped each other by the hand and stood prepared to contradict the testimony of the tribunal of the praetor; he commanded them to produce the object of the dispute; they went, they returned with measured steps, and a cloud of earth was cast at his feet to represent the field for which they contended. This or that sentence of the words and actions of his was the substitute of the pontiffs and the patricians. Like the Chaldean astrlogers, they announced to the clients the days of business and reposes; these important trires were interwoven with the religion of Numa; and, after the publication of the twelve tables, the Roman people accepted by the ignorance of the judges. The treachery of some plebeian officers at length revealed the profitable mystery: in a more enlightened age, the legal actions were derided and observed; and the same antiquity which sanctified the practice, obliterated the use and meaning, of their primitive forms. A more liberal art was cultivated. Succession of the however, by the sages of Rome, who, civil lawyers, in a stricter sense, may be considered as the authors of the civil law. The alteration of the idiom and manners of the Romans rendered the style of the twelve tables less familiar, to each living generation, and the doubtful passages were imperfectly explained by the study of legal antiquarians. To define the ambiguities, to circumscribe the latitude, to apply the principles, to extend the consequences, to reconcile the real or apparent contradictions, was a more and more important task; and the province of legislation was silently invaded by the expounders of ancient statutes. Their subtle interpretations concurred with the equity of the prior, to redress the tyranny of the darker ages: however strange or intricate the means, it was the matchless wisdom of juridical jurisprudence to reduce the simple dictates of nature and reason, and the skill of private citizens was usefully employed to undermine the public institutions of their country. The revolution of almost one thousand years, from the twelve tables under the reign of Justinian, may be divided into three periods: a first epoch, which was occupied with the market or assembly, the masters of the art were seen walking in the forum ready to impart the needful advice to the meanest of their fellow-citizens, from whose votes, on a future occasion, they might solicit a grateful return. As their years and honours increased, they became such as might be expected to retire from the difficult and prolix business of the forum, and the public order and peace of the civil law. The second period, the learned and splendid age of jurisprudence, may be Second period, from the birth of Cicero to the reign of Severus Alexander, A system was formed, schools were instituted, books were composed, and laws. On the public days of the forum or the market, the masters of the art were seen walking in the forum ready to impart the needful advice to the meanest of their fellow-citizens, from whose votes, on a future occasion, they might solicit a grateful return. As their years and honours increased, they became such as might be expected to retire from the difficult and prolix business of the forum, and the public order and peace of the civil law. The second period, the learned and splendid age of jurisprudence, may be Second period, from the birth of Cicero to the reign of Severus Alexander, A system was formed, schools were instituted, books were composed, and laws. On the public days of the forum or the market, the masters of the art were seen walking in the forum ready to impart the needful advice to the meanest of their fellow-citizens, from whose votes, on a future occasion, they might solicit a grateful return. As their years and honours increased, they became such as might be expected to retire from the difficult and prolix business of the forum, and the public order and peace of the civil law. The second period, the learned and splendid age of jurisprudence, may be three sages of the law; but the perfection of the science was ascribed to Servius Sulpicius their disciple, and the friend of Tully; and the long succession, which followed the retirement or undying laurels of the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian. Their names, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.

Theirs, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.

Theirs, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.

Theirs, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.

Theirs, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.

Theirs, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.

Theirs, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.

Theirs, and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved, and the example of Laboec may suggest some idea of their diligence and fame. The end of the most enlightened age, and the period under the Caesars, is finally closed by the respectable characters of Popinian, of Paul, and of Ulpian.
selves. But positive institutions are often the result of custom and prejudice; laws and language are ambiguous and arbitrary; where reason is incapable of pronouncing, the love of argument is inflamed by the envy of others, and might swerve the blind attachment of many of their disciples; and the Roman jurisprudence was divided by the once famous sects of the Proculei ans and Sabinians. Two sages of the laws, Aticus Capito and Antiusus Laboe, adopted the peace of the Augustan age; the former distinguished by the favour of the latter monarch, the latter by the contempt of that favour, and his stern though harmless opposition to the tyrant of Rome. Their legal studies were influenced by the various colours of their temper and principles. Laboe was attached to the follies of the old republic; his rival embraced the more profitable substance of the rising monarchy. But the disposition of a courtier is tame and submissive; and Capito seldom presumed to deviate from the sentiments, or at least from the words, of his predecessors; while the bold republican pursued his independent investigations, and avaricious ill-humour. The freedom of Laboe was envied, however, by the rigour of his own conclusions, and he decided, according to the letter of the law, the same questions which his indolent competitor resolved with a latitude of equity suitable to the more lenient and feelings of mankind. If a fair exchange had been substituted to the payment of money, Capito still considered the transaction as a legal sale; and he consulted nature for the age of puberty, without confining his definition to the precise period of twelve or fourteen years.

This opposition of sentiments was propagated in the writings and lessons of the two founders; the schools of Capito and Laboe maintained their inveterate conflict from the age of Augustus to that of Hadrian; and the two sects derived their appellations from Sabinian and Capito, their most celebrated teachers. The names of Cassian and Peguanus were likewise applied to the same parties; but, by a strange reverse, the popular cause was in the hands of Peguanus, a timid slave of Domitian, while the favourite of the Caesars was represented by Cassian, who glorified in his descent from the most illustrious of slaves. By the school of Capito, the controversies of the sects were in a great measure determined. For that important work, the emperor Hadrian preferred the chief of the Sabinians: the friends of monarchy prevailed; but the moderation of Sabinian smoothed the resentment of the victors of the vanquished. Like the contumacious philosophers, the lawyers of the age of Antonines disclaimed the authority of a master, and adopted from every system the most probable doctrines. But their writings would have been less voluminous, had their choice been more unanimous. The conscience of the judge was perplexed by the number and weight of discordant testimonies, and every sentence that his passion or interest might suggest was submitted to the voice of that infallible and venerable name. An indolent edict of the younger Theodosius excuses him from the labour of comparing and weighing their arguments. Five civilians, Caius, Papinian, Paul, Ulpian, and M. destinus, were established as the oracles of jurisprudence: a majority was decisive; but their opinions were equally divided, a casting vote was ascribed to the superior wisdom of Papinian.

When Justinian ascended the throne, the reformation of the Roman law was an arduous but indispensable task. In the space of ten centuries, the infinite variety of laws and legal opinions had filled many thousand volumes, which no fortune could purchase and no capacity could digest. Books could not easily be found; and the judges, poor in the midst of riches, were unable to answer the questions of their own discretion. The subjects of the Greek provinces were ignorant of the language that disposed of their lives and properties; and the barbarous dialect of the Latins was imperfectly studied in the academies of Berytus and Constantinople. The lawyers were familiar with the infancy of Justinian; his youth had been instructed by the lessons of jurisprudence, and his imperial choice selected the most learned civilians of the east, to labour with their sovereign in the work of reformation. The theory of professors was assisted by the practice of advocates, and the experience of magistrates; and the whole undertaking was animated by the spirit of Tribonian.

Tribonian, an ordinary man, the object of so much A. D. 527–546. praises and censure, was a native of Side in Pamphylia; and by his own exertions, and the support of his own, all the business and knowledge of the age. Tribonian composed, both in prose and verse, on a strange diversity of curious and abstruse subjects; a double panegyric of Justinian and the life of the philosopher Theodorus; the nature of happiness and the duties of government; Homer's catalogue and the four and twenty sorts of metre; the astronomical canon of Ptolemy; the changes of the months; the houses of the planets; and the harmonic system of the world. To the literature of Greece he added the use of the Latin authors, and strove to compose a universal library and in his mind: and he most assiduously cultivated those arts which opened the road of wealth and preferment. From the bar of the praetorian prefects, he raised himself to the honours of quatorz, of consul, and of master of the offices: the council of Justinian listened to his eloquence and wisdom, and envy was mitigated by the gentleness and affability of his manners. The reproaches of imperty and avarice have which was applied to three eclecic lawyers: heresitae is synonymously used.

1 See the See the Theodorian Code, l. i. tit. iv. with Godfrey's Commentary, tom. i. p. 39–35. This decree might give occasion to the barbarian not to pay anything, or to depart without this weight of money, and the verse of Eng. (c. x. 34.) since, in a simple exchange, the buyer could not be discriminated from the seller.

1 For the legal Labors of Justinian, I have studied the Preface to the Institutes; the Int. 3 and 34 Prefaces to the Pandects; the 1st and 25th, and 1st and 25th of the Code; and the 25th part of the Pandects; a part of the Pandects, and the Prae-terita. (Hist. de la Jurisprudence Romaine, p. 295–336.) Gravina, (Opp. p. 33–93.) and Ludovici, in his life of Justinian, (p. 19–123, 181–209.)

2 For the history of Tribonian, we see the testimonials of Procopius, (Pers. i. c. 23, 24, Aquinc. c. 13.) and Suidas, (tom. iii. p. 584. 26.) to whom we are indebted for the character of Tribonian. He was a prince of the first rank in the law; and the Council of Constantinople were often his adversaries. His legal acknowledgments were equal, and his legal attainments were much more prodigious. (Hist. de la Jurisprudence Romaine, tom. i. p. 262–317.)

3 I apply the two passages of Suidas to the same man; every circumstance exactly tints. Yet the lawyers appear genuine originals, as the 'philohistoria' is inclined to separate the two characters. (Biblioth. Graec. tom. i. p. 541. ii. p. 315. iii. p. 418. iv. p. 346. 342.)
stained the virtues or the reputation of Tribonian. In a bigoted and persecuting court, the principal minister was accused of a secret aversion to the Christian faith, and was supposed to entertain the sentiments of an atheist and a pagan, which have been imputed, incorrectly, to former times—His avarice was more clearly proved and more sensibly felt. If he were swayed by gifts in the administration of justice, the example of Bacon will again occur; nor can the merit of Tribonian atone for his baseness, if he degraded the sanctity of his profession; and if large sums of money were advanced for the Storia, Tribonian preferred the base consideration of his private emolument. In the edict of Constantine, his removal was granted to the clamours, perhaps to the just indignation of the people: but the question was speedily restored, and till the hour of his death, he possessed, above twenty years, the favour and confidence of the emperor. His passive and duteful submission has been honoured with the praise of Justinian himself, whose vanity was incapable of discerning how often that submission degenerated into the grossest perfidy. Tribonian adorned the virtues of his master; the earth was unworthy of such a prince; and he affected a pious fear, that Justinian, like Eliah or Romulus, would be snatched into the air, and translated alive to the mansions of celestial glory.

The code of Justinian was made with a view to the public good. A code of laws was necessary, and the imperial authority must be the dispenser of this kind of grace. But, in the edict of the Storia, Tribonian preferred the bargain to the public benefit. Were it necessary to describe the virtues and talents of Tribonian, his name would have been the world a pure April 7, and original system of jurisprudence.

Whatever flattery might suggest, the emperor of the east was afraid to establish his private judgment as the standard of justice; but as the Roman power, he borrowed the aid of time and opinion; and his laborious compilations are guarded by the sage and legislators of past times. Instead of a statute cast in a simple mould by the hand of an artist, the works of Justinian represent a tensed pavement of antique and costly, but too often of incoherent, fragments. In the first year of his reign, he directed the faithful Tribonian, and nine learned associates, to revise the ordinances of his predecessors, as they were contained, since the time of Hadrian, in the Gregorians, Hermogenes, and Theodoricus codes, and to correct the errors and contradictions, to retrench whatever was obsolete or superfluous, and to select the wise and salutary laws, best adapted to the practice of the tribunals and the use of his subjects. The work was accomplished in fourteen mouths; and the twelve books or tables, which the compilers produced—thought he was obliged to imitate the labours of their Roman predecessors. The new code of Justinian was honoured with his name, and confirmed by his royal signature; authentic transcripts were multiplied by the pens of notaries and scribes; they were transmitted to the magistrates of the European, the Asiatic, and afterwards the African provinces; and the law of the empire was proclaimed on solemn festivals at the doors of churches. A more

The code of Justinian was made with a view to the public good. A code of laws was necessary, and the imperial authority must be the dispenser of this kind of grace. But, in the edict of the Storia, Tribonian preferred the bargain to the public benefit. Were it necessary to describe the virtues and talents of Tribonian, his name would have been the world a pure April 7, and original system of jurisprudence.

Whatever flattery might suggest, the emperor of the east was afraid to establish his private judgment as the standard of justice; but as the Roman power, he borrowed the aid of time and opinion; and his laborious compilations are guarded by the sage and legislators of past times. Instead of a statute cast in a simple mould by the hand of an artist, the works of Justinian represent a tensed pavement of antique and costly, but too often of incoherent, fragments. In the first year of his reign, he directed the faithful Tribonian, and nine learned associates, to revise the ordinances of his predecessors, as they were contained, since the time of Hadrian, in the Gregorians, Hermogenes, and Theodoricus codes, and to correct the errors and contradictions, to retrench whatever was obsolete or superfluous, and to select the wise and salutary laws, best adapted to the practice of the tribunals and the use of his subjects. The work was accomplished in fourteen mouths; and the twelve books or tables, which the compilers produced—thought he was obliged to imitate the labours of their Roman predecessors. The new code of Justinian was honoured with his name, and confirmed by his royal signature; authentic transcripts were multiplied by the pens of notaries and scribes; they were transmitted to the magistrates of the European, the Asiatic, and afterwards the African provinces; and the law of the empire was proclaimed on solemn festivals at the doors of churches. A more

The code of Justinian was made with a view to the public good. A code of laws was necessary, and the imperial authority must be the dispenser of this kind of grace. But, in the edict of the Storia, Tribonian preferred the bargain to the public benefit. Were it necessary to describe the virtues and talents of Tribonian, his name would have been the world a pure April 7, and original system of jurisprudence.

Whatever flattery might suggest, the emperor of the east was afraid to establish his private judgment as the standard of justice; but as the Roman power, he borrowed the aid of time and opinion; and his laborious compilations are guarded by the sage and legislators of past times. Instead of a statute cast in a simple mould by the hand of an artist, the works of Justinian represent a tensed pavement of antique and costly, but too often of incoherent, fragments. In the first year of his reign, he directed the faithful Tribonian, and nine learned associates, to revise the ordinances of his predecessors, as they were contained, since the time of Hadrian, in the Gregorians, Hermogenes, and Theodoricus codes, and to correct the errors and contradictions, to retrench whatever was obsolete or superfluous, and to select the wise and salutary laws, best adapted to the practice of the tribunals and the use of his subjects. The work was accomplished in fourteen mouths; and the twelve books or tables, which the compilers produced—thought he was obliged to imitate the labours of their Roman predecessors. The new code of Justinian was honoured with his name, and confirmed by his royal signature; authentic transcripts were multiplied by the pens of notaries and scribes; they were transmitted to the magistrates of the European, the Asiatic, and afterwards the African provinces; and the law of the empire was proclaimed on solemn festivals at the doors of churches. A more benefit of his subjects. It was their duty to select the useful and practical parts of the Roman law; and the writings of the old republicans, however curious or excellent, were no longer suited to the new system of manners, religion, and government.

Pomponius was, but his version was excelled by the school of Papinian and Ulpian. The science of the laws is the slow growth of time and experience, and the advantage both of method and materials, is naturally maintained by the most recent authors. The civilizers of the reign of the Antonines had studied the works of their predecessors: their philanthropic spirit had mitigated the rigour of antiquity, simplified the forms of proceeding, and emerged from the jealous and prejudiced spirit of the rival sects. The choice of the authorities that compose the Pandects, depended on the judgment of Tribonian; but the power of his sovereign could not absolve him from the sacred obligations of truth and fidelity. As the legislator of the empire, Justinian might repeat the acts of the Antonines, or correct the innovations, the few priapics, maintained by the last of the Roman lawyers. But the existence of past facts is placed beyond the reach of despotism; and the emperor was guilty of fraud and forgery, when he corrupted the integrity of their text, with their reverence to the works and ideas of his servile reign, and suppressed, by the hand of power, the pure and authentic copies of their sentiments. The changes and interpolations of Tribonian and his colleagues, are excused by the pretence of uniformity: but their cares have been insufficient, and the pandects, collated by some of their predecessors, still exercise the patience and subtlety of modern civilizers.

A rumour devoid of evidence has been propagated by the enemies of Justinian: that the juristic age of ancient Rome was reduced to ashes by the author of the Pandects, from the vain persuasion, that it was now either false or superfluous. Without usurping an office so inviolis, the emperor might safely commit to ignorance and time the accomplishment of this destructive wish. But the kind friends of printing, and paper, the labours and materials of writing could be purchased only by the rich; and it may reasonably be computed, that the price of books was a hundred-fold their present value.

Copies were slowly multiplied and cautiously reduced to the second century, by the sacrilegious attempt to erase the charactérs of antiquity, and Sophecus or Tactius were obliged to resign the parchment to missals, homilies, and the golden legend.

1 Strip away the crust of Tribonian, and allow for the use of technical words, and the Latin of the Pandects will be found not unworthy of the silver age. It has been vehemently attacked by Laurentius Vallo, a fastidious Grammarian of the fiftieth century, and by his apostate Florus Sabinius. It has been defended by Blest, and a non-philosophic advocate, most probably James Capellus. Their various treaties are collected by Duker, (Quaternia de Lucanis et veterum Jurisconsultorum, Ed. Rot. 1721, in 4m). 2. In the fair period of a recent century, the editors of old manuscripts, the name of an ancient patron, or the name of the pandects, is preserved in the epistle dedicata est quaque lex. (Cod. Justini. 1. t. xiv. leg. 3. No. 10). A frank confession. 3. The number of these emblematia (a polite name for forgeries) is much reduced by Bynkershoek, (in the first last books of his Observations), who poorly maintains the right of Justinian and the duty of Tribonian. 4. The antimonarchic, or opposite laws of the Code and Pandects, are sometimes the cause, and often the excuse, of the glorious emblems of the civil law, which so often affords what Montaigne calls "fictions". It is a great mistake to suppose that, in the pandects, the impious act, and in perspective, the peril of the act. (Cod. Justini. 1. t. xiv. leg. 3. No. 10). A frank confession.

1 Pomponius (Pandect. 1. l. t. ii. leg. 2) observes, that of the three founders of the civil law, Marcus, Brutus, and Manlius, excellent volumina, scripta Manlii magnificentia; that of some old republican law was, scripta curiosior et semper intima honestas. 2. of Tributius, minus frequentior; of Fabius, nullius. The most grat test slips of Roman materials are derived from books which Tribonian never saw; and, in the long period of time, even the thirteenth pandects, of the red reading of the moderns successively depend on the knowledge and errors of the bygone predecessors. 3. All, in several instances, repeat the errors of the script and the translations of some leaves in the Florintine Pandects. This fact, if it be true, is one of the most fatal consequences of the pandects. Yet the Pandects of Bologna (who died in 1112) by the Bishop, Archbishop of Cantorero, and by the care and perseverance of the future writer, in the year 1116, (in the deed of October 7. tom. p. 6, 1099—1105). Have our British MSS. of the Pandects been collected? 4. See the description of this original in Brenczmann. (Hist. Pandect. Florent. i. c. 2. 3. p. 4. 17. and i. 4.) Politian, an enthusiast, revered as the authentic standard of Justinian himself, (p. 407, 408); but this paradox is refuted by the abbreviations of the Florintine MS. G. i. c. p. 117—118.) It is composed of two paper volumes, with large margins, on a thin parchment, and the Latin characters being the hand of a Greek scribe. 5. Brenczmann, at the end of his history, has inserted two dissertations on the republic of Amphil and the Pisan war in the year 1135, &c. 6. The discovery of the pandects at Amphil (A.D. 1137) is first described (in 1509) by Lodovico Belonolus, (Brenczmann, i. c. p. 472, 73. iv. c. d. p. 417—425, on the faith of a Pisan chronicle, p. 409, 410) without a name or a date. The whole story, though unknown to the twelfth century, embellished by ignorant artists, and suspected by rigid criticism, is not, however, destitute of much internal probability, (i. c. p. 417—425) and the pandects are doubtlessly consulted in the fourteenth century by the great Bartolus, (p. 495, 496.) See also, c. i. c. p. 50—52.) 7. By Tribonian, (in the year 1406; and in 1111 the Pandects were transported to the capital. These events are authentic. The pandects of Flaminia Baldini have been rescued by Tribonian, (L. i. i. p. 230.) Acc. etd Ludovis, p. 305, 306.) 8. The pandects, or the Florintine pandects, were printed in 1607 by the press of Giorgio Ascoli. The first edition was, at first pleased with the cheapness, and at length provoked by the fraud of the compositors. (Lutrin, AAnn. Typograph. tom. i. p. 12, first edition.) 9. This execrable practice prevailed from the eighth, and more especially, the twelfth century, when it was transcribed, (Monaco, in the Memorie de l'Academie, tom. vi. p. 606, &c. Bibliotheca Raisonnée de la Diplomatique, tom. i. p. 176.) should presume to interpret or pervert the will of their sovereign. The scholars of Accursius, of Bartolus, of Cajetan, should blush for their accomplished guilt, unless the liberty of the subject shall be secured to him for ever. Six years had not elapsed since the first proclamation of the Code, before he condemned the imperfect attempt, by a new and more accurate edition of the work; which he enriched with two hundred of his own laws, and fifty decisions of the darkest and most intricate points of jurisprudence. Every year, or, according to Procopius, each day, of his long reign, was marked by some legal innovation. Many of his acts were rescinded by himself; many were rejected by his successors, many had been obliterated by time; but the number of sixteen or twenty lost, since the reign of Justinian, is less than the number of the decisions of a single judge. The emperor, whose jurisprudence is the textbook of the highest magistrates, and whose dexterity an artist, who subscribed confessions of debt and promises of payment with the names of the richest Syrians, they pleaded the established prescription of thirty or forty years; but their defence was overruled by the retrospective edict, which extended the claims of the church to the term of a century; an edict so pregnant with injustice and disorder, that, after serving this occasion purpose, it was prudently abolished in the same reign. If candour will acquit the emperor himself, and transfer the corruption to his wife or favourites, the suspicion of so foul a vice can always vitiate the annual paymasters of the richest provinces. Many of Justinian's legal advocates may acknowledge, that such levity, whatever be the motive, is unworthy of a legislator and a man.

Monarchs seldom descend to be the preceptors of their subjects; yet Justinian, in whose name was introduced an unwritten system, was the most popular in the east and west; and his use may be considered as an evidence of their merit. They were selected by the imperial delegates, Tribonian, Theophillus, and the Areobindus; and the freedom and independence of the subject was inured with the coarser materials of a degenerate age. The same volume which introduced the youth of Rome, Constantinople, and Byrritus, to the gradual study of the Code and Pandects, is still precious to the historiographer, the philosopher, and the magistrate. The ancient publications were divided into four books; they proceeded, with no contemptible method, from 1. Persons, to, 11. Things, and from things to, 111. Actions; and the article IV. of Private Wrongs, is terminated by the principles of Criminal Law.

1. The distinction of ranks and persons, 1. Or persons, is the finest branch of a limited or absolute government. In France, the remains of liberty are kept alive by the spirit, the honours, and even the prejudices, of fifty thousand nobles. Two hundred families supply, in lineal descent, the second branch of the English legislature, which maintains the memory of the king and confirms the balance of the constitution. A gradation of patricians and plebeians, of strangers and subjects, has supported the aristocracy of Geneva, Venice, and ancient Rome. The perfect equality of men is the point in which the extremes of demerit and despotism are confounded; the spirit of one of Christian civilisation, offended, if any leads were exalted above the level of their fellow-slaves or fellow-citizens. In the decline of the Roman empire, the proud distinctions of the republic were gradually abolished, and the reason or instinct of Justinian completed the simple form of an absolute monarchy. The emperor could not eradicate the popular reverence which always waits on the possession of hereditary wealth, or the memory of famous ancestors. He delighted to honour, with titles and emoluments, his generals, magistrates, and senators; and his preciosus indulgence communicated some rays of their glory to the persons of their wives and children. But in the eye of the law, all Roman citizens were equal, and all subjects of the empire were citizens of Rome. That insinuative character was degraded into an obsolete and empty name. The voice of a Roman could no longer erect his laws, or express the annual paymasters of his provinces. The national rights might have checked the arbitrary will of a master; and the bold adventurer from Germany or Arabia was admitted, with equal favour, to the civil and military command, which the citizen alone had been once entitled to assume over the conquests of his ancestors. The freedom of the citizens was at the distinction of ingenuous and servile birth, which was decided by the condition of the mother; and the candour of the laws was satisfied, if her freedom could be ascertained, during a single moment, between the conception and the delivery. The slaves, who were liberated by a generous master, immediately entered into the middle class of libertines or freemen; but they could never be emancipated from the duties of obedience and gratitude: whatever were the fruits of their industry, their patron and his family inherited the third part; or even the whole of their fortune, if they died without children and without a testament. Justinian respected the rights of patrons; but his indulgence removed the badge of disgrace from the inferior orders of freemen: whoever ceased to be a slave, obtained, without reserve or delay, the station of a citizen; and at length the dignity of an ingenuous birth, which until the times of the Tiber was superior to the distinction of noble birth without a title; and from the nobility of the emperor, transferred, by the omnipotence of the emperor. Whatever

2. See the Annals Politiques de l'Abbe de St. Pierre, tom. i. p. 55 where is the year in the year of the Conquest, the precise year, and the exact year of the Conquest, the year in which the Conquest took place. The recent and vulgar error is derived from the Institute of the true and genuine which was transferred to the full of the king, for merit and services. The recent and vulgar essay is derived from the Institute of the true and genuine which was transferred to the full of the king, for merit and services.
Chap. V.

restraints of age, or forms, or numbers, had been formerly introduced to check the abuse of impositions, and the too rapid increase of vile and indigent Romans, he finally abolished; and the spirit of his laws promoted the extinction of domestic servitude. Yet the capacity of the state was, of course, filled with the image of Justice, with multitudes of slaves, either born or purchased for the use of their masters; and the price, from ten to seventy pieces of gold, was determined by their age, strength, and their education. 3 But the hardships of this dependent state were continually diminishing by the influence of education and civilization; and the pride of a subject was no longer elated by his absolute dominion over the life and happiness of his bondsman.

The law of nature instructs even animals to cherish and educate their infant progeny. The reason of law invests in the human species the returns of filial pity. But the exclusive, absolute, and perpetual dominion of the father over his children, is peculiar to the Roman jurisprudence, 4 and seems to be coeval with the foundation of the civil power which was invested or e-nfranchised by Romulus himself; and after the practice of three centuries, it was inscribed on the fourth table of the deacons.

In the forum, the senate, or the camp, the adult son of a Roman citizen enjoyed the public and private rights of a person in his father's house; his power was confined by the laws with immovable, the cattle, and the slaves, whom the capricious master might alienate or destroy, without being responsible to any earthly tribunal. The hand which bestowed the daily sustenance might resume the voluntary gift, and whatever was acquired by the labour or fortune of the son was immediately lost in its whole property of the father. His stolen goods (his own or his children's) might be recovered by the same action of theft; 5 and if either had been guilty of a trespass, it was in his own option to compensate the damage, or resign to the injured party the obnoxious animal.

At the call of evidences or infirmities, the master of a family could dispose of his children or his slaves. But the condition of the slave was far more advantageous, since he regained, by the first manumission, his alienated freedom; the son was again restored to his unnatural father; he might be sold or released to a service, turned to a third time, and it was not till after the third sale and deliverance, 6 that he was enfranchised from the domestic power, which had been so repeatedly abused. According to his discretion, a master might chaste his real or imaginary faults of his children, by stripes, by imprisonment, by exile, by sending them to the country to work in chains.

3 If the option of a slave was bequeathed to several legates, they drew lots, and the slaves were entitled to the share of his value: ten pieces of gold for a common servant or maid under ten years; if above that age, twenty; if they knew a trade, thirty; nineteen for a slave under ten, thirty for above, fifty; and slaves of publics, sixty; runach under ten, thirty pieces above, fifty; if tradeless, seventy. (Cod. I. tit. xiii. leg. 3. 1.)

4 These local prices are generally below those of the market.

5 And the sale of slaves and freed-men, are Institutes, L. I. tit. viii. i. lit. tit. viii. i. lit. vi. tit. x. leg. 5. 2. and the sale of the wife of the slave. (Cod. I. tit. xiii. leg. 4. 4. 7.) Be it known forwards and lasting that, with the original text of the Institutes and Pandects, the correspondent and extended Institutes and Elements and accurate logiography quoted, and with the twenty-seven first books of the Pandects, the learned and rational commentators of Gerard Noot. (Opera, lib. I. p. 1. 293.) the end, lucas, Boc. 1724.)

7 In Roman Law, (Doss. 51. 52. Gravina, Opp. p. 266.) a production of the world of the xii. tabls, Papinian in C. Cels. L. G. Roman, et M. Basilian, (tit. iv. p. 201) yeas his parts potestas, ex recita: Ulpianus in the Digest, (tit. I. p. 201) says: "In Roman Law, the former is the qui recte definiatur." But Jordan in the Bar. (tit. I. p. 201) says: "in Roman Law, the latter is the qui recte definiatur."

8 In Pandects, I. xiii. tit. leg. 11. N. S. 13. leg. 38. N. 1. Such was the decision of Ulpian and Pacius.

9 The true meaning is most clearly defined by Ulpian, (Fragment. x. p. 291. 292. ed. Schulting.) and best illustrated in the Antiquities of Hermogenes.

among the meanest of his servants. The majesty of a parent was armed with the power of life and death; 6 and the examples of such bloody executions, which were sometimes praised, and never punished, may be traced in the annals of Rome, beyond the times of the Empire. Pompilia, the daughter of Justinius, was not the consular office, nor the honours of a triumph could exempt the most illustrious citizen from the hounds of filial subjection; 7 his own descendants were included in the family of their common ancestor; and the claims of adoption were not less sacred or less respected. In conquerors, however, who were not without danger of abuse, the Roman legislators had reposed an unbounded confidence in the sentiments of paternal love; and the oppression was tempered by the assurance that each generation must succeed in its turn to the awful dignity of parent and master.

The first limitation of paternal power, the limitations of the law, is ascribed to the justice and humanity of the Roman law. Vaun: and the maid who, with his throny father's consent, had espoused a freeman, was protected from the disgrace of becoming the wife of a slave. 8 As the city was expressed; the town, when the trade would be destroyed by the conquests of the republic, and when the freedom was communicated to sons; and the threefold distinction of peculities, adventitious, and professional, was ascertained by the jurisprudence of the Code and Pandects. 9 Of all that proceeded from the father, he imparted only the use, and reserved the absolute dominion of the goods sold, which was not the case when his son was emanci­ pated, by a favourable interpretation, from the demands of the creditors. In whatever accrued by marriage, gift, or collateral succession, the property was severed to the son; but the father, unless he had been specially excluded, reayed the usufruct during his life. As a just and prudent reward of military virtue, the spoils of the enemy were acquired, possessed, and bequeathed by the soldier alone; and the fair analogy was extended to the emoluments of any liberal profession, the salary of public service, and the emoluments of those engaged in the service.

The life of a citizen was less exposed than his fortune to the abuse of paternal power. Yet his life might be adverse to the interest or passions of an unworthy father; the same crimes that flowed from the corruption, were more sensibly felt by the humanity of the father; and he might, without the necessity of whipping his son till he be expired, was saved by the emperor from the just fury of the multitude. 10 The Roman father, from the licence of servile dominion, was reduced to the gravity and moderation of a judge.

The sense and opinion of Augustus confirmed the sentence of exile pronounced against an intentional partisan by the domestic tribunal of Arius. Hadrian transported to an island the jealous parent, who, like a robber, had seized the opportunity of hunting, to assassinate a youth, the incestuous lover of his stepmother. 11 A private jurisdiction is repugnant to the spirit of monarchy; the parent was again reduced from a judge to an accuser; and the magistrates were enjoined by Sertorius to hear his complaints and execute his sentence. He could no longer take the life of a son without incurring the guilt of the infanticide, from which he had been exempted by the Pompeian law, were finally inflicted by the justice of Constantine.

10 By Justinian, the old law, the just rector of the Roman father, division (L. iv. tit. xvi. leg. 1., p. 483.) is reported and renoted. Some local vestiges are left in the Pandects, (I. xiv. tit. xix. leg. 2. N. 4.) and the Colossi Legum Romanarum et Mortuorum, (Cod. lib. 11. p. 4. 180.)

12 Jus potestatis qua dicitur liberae habentem prope quidam ut curiam Romanorum. Nec enim etiam, qui ubique in historiis, ubique in praebentibus potestatem quaeque in habebant.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

The same protection was due to every period of existence, and reason and religion must have assumed the Humanity of Paulus, for imputing the crime of murder to a woman who had murdered her own child, or abandoned, his new-born infant; or exposes him in a public place to find the mercy which he himself had denied. But the exposition of children was the prevailing and stubborn vice of antiquity; it was sometimes prescribed, often permitted, almost always practised with impunity, by the laws of the nations which never entertained the Roman ideas of paternal power; and the dramatic poets, who appeal to the human heart, represent with indifference a popular custom which was palliated by the motives of economy and compassion. If the father could subordinate his own feelings, or his own interest, to the cure, at least the chastisement of the laws; and the Roman empire was stained with the blood of infants, till such murders were included, by Valentinian, and his colleagues, in the letter and spirit of the Cornelian law. The lessons of jurisprudence, and Christian charity, prescribed by the emperors, were, in this human practice, till their gentle influence was fortified by the terrors of capital punishment.

Husbands and Wives.

Experience has proved, that savages are the tyrants of the female sex, and that the condition of women is usually softened by the introduction of material or political society. In the last generation, Lycurgus had delayed the season of marriage: it was fixed by Numa at the tender age of twelve years, that the Roman husband might educate to his will a pure and obedient virgin. According to the religious views of marriage, that custom of antiquity, he brought to his bride of her parents, and she fulfilled the ceremony, by purchasing with three pieces of copper, a just introduction to his house and household duties. A sacrifice of fruits was offered by the contracting parties in the presence of ten witnesses; the contracting parties were seated on the same shepheard with the spindle and the shuttle of the synagogue conformation, which denoted the ancient fo d'Italy, served as an emblem of their mutual union of mind and body. But this union on the side of the woman was rigorous and unequal; and she renounced the name and worship of her father's house, to embrace a new服役, decorated only by the title of adoption. A fiction of the law, neither rational nor elegant, bestowed on the wife of a family (for her proper appellative) the stipends of a liber, his children, and of daughter to her husband or master, who was invested with the plenitude of paternal power. By his judgment or caprice her behaviour was approved, or censured, or chastised; he exercised the jurisdiction of life and death; and it was allowed, that in the cases of adultery or drunkenness, the punishment might be properly inflicted. She acquired and inherited for the sole profit of her lord; and so clearly was woman defined, not as a person, but as a thing, that, if the original title were deficient, she might be claimed, like other movables, by the use and possession of an entire one. The inclination of the Roman husband discharged or withheld the conjugal debt, so scrupulously exacted by the Athenian and Jewish laws; but as polygamy was unknown, he could never admit to his bed a fairer or more favoured partner.

After the Punic triumphs, the matrons of Rome aspire to common honour; they were only the mark of a free and opulent republic; their wishes were gratified by the indulgence of fathers and lovers, and their ambition was unsuccessfully resisted by the gravity of Cato the Censor.

They declined the solemnities of the nuptials, defeated the annual expense of three months in losing their name or independence, subscribed the liberal and definite terms of a marriage contract. Of their private fortunes, they communicated the use, and secured the property: the estates of a wife could neither be alienated nor mortgaged by a pro dignus husband; their mutual gifts were prefilled by the judgment of the laws; and the misconduct of either party might afford, under another name, a future subject for an action of theft. To this loose and voluntary compact, religious and civil rites were no longer essential; and, between persons of a similar rank, the apparent community of life was allowed as sufficient evidence of their nuptials. The dignity of marriage was restored by the Christians, who derived all spiritual grace from the prayers of the faithful and the benediction of the priest or bishop. The origin, validity, and duties of the holy institution, were regulated by the tradition of the apostles and the councils of general or provincial synods; and the consecration of the Christians was waived by the decrees and censures of their ecclesiastical rulers. Yet the magistrates of Justinian were not subject to the authority of the church: the emperor consulted the unbelieving civilans of antiquity, and claimed for his laws in the Code and Pandects, is directed by the earthly motives of justice, policy, and the natural freedom of both sexes.

8. Actus Galliis (Nelsis, Act. xvi, 6.) gives a ridiculous definition of Circus Magnus, Matrons, seu senex, natus familiae qui sensus generis, aequa cum scripsa in colo full. He then adds the grounds of the title of the city of the Virgin.

9. It was enough to have tasted wine, or to have stolen the key of the cellar, (Plin. Hist. Nat. xiv. 11.)

11. Salon requires three payments per month. By the Manna, a daily diet was supposed on the head of the family; a woman child born, was a week's stipend on a citizen; once on a peasant; once in thirty days on a cavalier; once in six months on a senator. But the student or doctor was free from tribute; and no wife, if she received a weekly subsistence, could see for a divorce; one week's a week's allowance was allowed. Pecuniary divided, without multiplying, the duties of the husband.

12. (Selden, Exc. Ebraica, t. i. c. 6. in his works, vol. p. 717, 720.)

13. On the Ossianic laws of the Vendel, and the later Codex of Ulpian. (Lyra, vi.)

14. For the system of Jewish and Catholic matrimonial, see Selden, (Gen. Ebraica, Opp. tom. i. c. 29.) and the Pandects, of Anclytie, ii. xxii.) and Chardon, (Hist. des Sacramens, tom. vi.)

15. The civil laws of marriage are exposed in the Institution, (1. liv., 1. the Pandects, of xiv. xxxii., and Cod. 1. v.) and the title de usu matrimonii is yet imperfect, we are obliged to consult the fragments of Ulpian, (tit. ix. p. 290, 291.) and the Codice Legum

23. Among the winter fragments, the tritum is a bearded wheat: the festival of the marriage is in the name of the dionysus, whose feast is celebrated with the wine and oil, and is a rival of the festival of the corn, and has been celebrated with the Roman Muscianus.
Liberty and abuse of divorce.

Besides the agreement of the parties, the essence of every rational contract, marriage required the parent\'s previous approbation of the parents. A furtur might be forced by some recent laws to supply the wants of a mature daughter; but even his insanity was not generally allowed to supersede the necessity of his consent. The causes of the dissolution of matrimony have various, the Romans: but the least solemn separation, the confarreation itself, might always be done away with rites of a contrary tendency. In the first ages, the father of a family might sell his children, and his wife was reckoned in the number of his children; the domestic judge might pronounce the death of the wife, and the tyrant was unwilling to relinquish his slave. When the Roman matrons became the equal and voluntary companions of their lords, a new prudence was introduced; that marriage, like other partnerships, might be dissolved by the abdication of one of the associates. In three centuries of prosperity and corruption, this principle was enlarged to frequent practice and pernicious abuse. Passion, interest, or convenience, had made the daily motives for the dissolution of marriage; a word, a sign, a message, a letter, the mandate of a freedman, declared the separation; the most tender of human connexions was degraded to a transient society of profit or pleasure. According to the various conditions of life, both sexes alternately felt the disgrace and injury: an Inconstant spirit tranferred her wealth to a new family, abandoning a numerous, perhaps a spurious, progeny to the paternal authority and care of her late husband; a beautiful virgin might be dismissed to the world, old, indigent, and friendless; but the reluctance of the Romans, when they were pressed to marriage by Augustus, sufficiently marks, that the prevailing institutions were least favourable to the males. A specious theory is confuted by this free and perfect experiment, which demonstrates, that the liberty of divorce does not contribute to the misfortunes and evils of our condition; it would destroy all mutual confidence, and inflame every trifling dispute: the minute difference between a husband and a stranger, which might so easily be removed, might still more easily be forgotten; and the matron, who in five years can submit to the embrace of eight husbands, must cease to reverence the chastity of her own person.

Limitations of the liberty of distant and tardy steps the rapid progress of the evil. The ancient worship of the Romans afforded a peculiar goddess to hear and receive the complaints of a married life; but her epithet, Periploa, the appeaser of husbands, too clearly indicates an entitled submission and respectance were always expected. Every act of a citizen was subject to the judgment of the census; the first who used the privilege of divorce assigned, at their command, the motives of his conduct; and a senator was sometimes consulted respecting the knowledge or advice of his friends. Whenever action was instituted for the recovery of a marriage-partition, the prador, as the guardian of equity, examined the cause and the characters, and guided inclinately the scale in favour of the guiltless and injured party. The custom of the church was first to compel her from the house of both husbands; they adopted their different modes of repressing or chastising the licence of divorce. The presence of seven Roman witnesses was required for the validity of this solemn and deliberate act: if any adequate provocation had been given by the husband, in stead of the extramarital years, he was compelled to law was subdialdy, or in the space of six months: but if he could assign the manners of his wife, her guilt or levity was exposed by the loss of the sixth or eighth part of her marriage-portion. The christian princes were the first to substitute to this, and take the measures, from Constantine to Justinian, appear to fluctuate between the custom of the empire and the wishes of the church, and the authors of the Novels of frequently reformed the jurisprudence of the Code and Pandects. In the most rigorouus laws, a wife was condemned to support a gaugener, a drakard, or a libertine, unless she were guilty of homicide, poison, or sacrilege, in which cases the marriage, as it should seem, might have been dissolved by the hand of the executioner. But the sacred right of the husband was invariably maintained, to deliver his name and family from the disgrace of adultery: the list of mortal sins, either male or female, was curtailed and enlarged by successive regulations, and the obstacles of incurable impotence, long absence, and monastic profession, were allowed to rescind the matrimonial obligation. Whenever transgressed the permission of the law was subject to various and heavy penalties. The woman was stript of her wealth and orientaments, without excepting the bodkin of her hair: if the man introduced a new bride into his bed, her fortune might be lawfully seized by the vengeance of his lawful wife, She could not make a legal fine; the fine was sometimes aggravated by transportation to an island, or imprisonment in a monastery; the injured party was releas from the bonds of marriage; but the offender, during life, or a term of years, was disabled from the repetition of nuptial. The successor of Justiniyed to the prayers of his unhappy subjects, and restored the liberty of divorce by mutual consent: the civilians were unanimous, the theologians were divided, and the ambiguous word, which contains the

in a month of the post Martial, is an exasperating hyperbole. (l. vi. epigram 7)

Sacerdum Virginal (Valerius Maximus, i. l. c. l.) in the Palm of Augustus, in the time of Theodosius, in the description of Rome by Publius Victor.

Valerius Maximus, i. l. c. 9. With some propriety he judge divorce more criminal than celibacy: he lamo nonnulla sapientiae sacrifici sapientiae, sacris tanas, sacri eri triumvirato (tria triumvirato).

The Institutes are silent, but we may consult the Code of Theodosius (l. cit. l. xvi. with Godges, p. 322—322. l. vii. vii. viii. viii. viii. viii.) the Pandects (xxiv. xxiv. xxiv. xxiv.) and the Novels, (xxvi. xxvi. xxvi. xxvi. xxvi.) Justinian fluctuated between the rigorous empire and ecelesiastic law.

In pure greek, εциκλοθρατιο is not a common word; nor can the proper translation of it be exactly applied. But the greek more figurative sense, how far, and to what offences, may it be extended. Did Christ speak the Biblical or extension of the word is the translation? How variously is that greek word translated in the versions ancient and modern? There are two Matt. xi. 14—14. to one (Matthew xix. 15) that such ground of
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

The freedom of love and marriage was almost entire, and was free from all restraint among the Romans by natural and civil impediments. An instinct, almost innate and universal, appears to prohibit the incestuous commerce of parents and children in the industrious breeds. They only acknowledged as legitimate their natural children. Concerning the oblique and collateral branches, nature is indifferent, reason mutable, and custom various and arbitrary. In Egypt, the marriage of brothers and sisters was admitted without scruple or exception: a Spartan might espouse the daughter of his father, an Athenian the daughter of his mother. The discover of those who married their uncle with his niece were applauded at Athens as a happy union of the dearest relations. The profane lawyers of Rome were never tempted by interest or superstition to multiply the forbidden degrees; but they inflexibly condemned the marriage of sisters and brothers, hesitated whether first cousins should be touched by the same interdict; revered the parental character of aunts and uncles, and treated affinity and adoption as just a imitation of the ties of blood. According to the proud maxims of the republic, a legal marriage could not legitimate their natural children; and, at least an ingenious birth, was required for the spouse of a senator: but the blood of kings could never mingle in legitimate nuptials with the blood of a Roman; and the name of Straged Cleopatra and Berenice to live the concubines of Mark Antony. The Roman public were not by any means disposed to the prejudice, no act of conductious to the majesty, cannot without indulgence be applied to the manners, of these oriental queens. A concubine, in the strict sense of the civilians, was a woman of service or plebeian extraction, the sole and faithful companion of a Roman citizen, who continued in the same condition after the death of her husband. Her modest situation, below the honours of a wife, above the infancy of a prostitute, was acknowledged and approved by the laws: from the age of Augustus to the tenth century, the use of this secondary marriage prevailed both in the west and east, and the humble virtues of a concubine were often preferred to the pomp and influence of a noble birth. In this connection, the two Antonines, the best of princes and of men, enjoyed the comforts of domestic love: the example was imitated by many citizens impatient of celibacy, but regardful of their families. If at any time they had an irrevocable aversion to the rights of a husband, the conversion was instantly performed by the celebration of their nuptials with a partner whose fruitfulness and fidelity they had already tried. By this epitome of natural, the offering of the concubine were distinguished from the spurious brood of adultery, prostitution, and incest, to whom Jusitnian reluctantly grants the necessary aliment of life; and these natural children alone were capable of succeeding to a sixth part of the inheritance of their reputed father. According to the rigour of law, bastards were entitled only to the name and condition of their mother, from whom they might derive the character of a slave, a stranger, or a citizen. The outskirts of every family were adopted without reproach as the children of the state.

The relation of a guardian and ward, which covers so many titles of the Institutes and Pandects, is of a very simple and uniform nature. The relation of a person to an orphan is dependent upon the trust to the custody of some discreet friend. If the deceased father had not signified his choice, the agnats, or paternal kindred of the nearest degree, were compelled to act as the natural guardians; the Athenians were apprehensive of exposing the infant to the injustice of these relations interested in the profits of a ward, and the axioms of Roman jurisprudence has pronounced, that the charge of tutelage should constantly attend the emolument of succession. If the choice of the father, and the line of consanguinity, afforded no efficient guardian, the failure was supplied by the nomination of the prior of the city, or the president from the province. But the person whom they named to this public office might be legally excused by insanity or blindness, by ignorance or inability, by previous enmity or adverse interest, by the number of children or guardians, the two or three being always selected by the immunities which were granted to the useful laborers of magistrates, lawyers, physicians, and professors. Till the infant could speak and think, he was represented by the tutor, whose authority was finally determined by the age of puberty. Without his consent, no act could bind himself to his own prejudice, though it might oblige others for his personal benefit. It is needless to observe, that the tutor often gave security, and always rendered an account, and that the want of diligence or integrity exposed him to a civil and almost criminal action for the injury of his ward. The violation of his duty was not at all times very severely punished, but had been rashly fixed by the civilians at fourteen; but as the faculties of the mind ripen more slowly than those of the body, a curator was interposed to guard the fortunes of the Roman youth from his own inexperience and headstrong passions. Such a trustee had been often preferred to the honor of a successor, husband, or guardians; a sex created to please and obey was never supposed to have attained the age of reason and experience. Such at least was the stern and haughty spirit of the ancient law, which had been insensibly mollified before the time of Justinian.

II. The original right of property can only be justified by the accident or merit of prior occupancy; and on this foundation it is wisely established by the philosophy of the civilians. The savage who hallows a tree, inserts a sharp stone into a wooden handle, or applies a string to an elastic branch, becomes in a state of nature the just proprietor of the canoe, the bow, or the hatchet. The materials were common to all, the new form, the produce of his time and simple industry, beholds solely to himself. His hungry brethren cannot, without a sense of their own injustice, extract from the hunter the game of the forest overthrown or slain by his personal strength and dexterity. If his provident care

The humble but legal rights of concubines and natural children, are stated in the Institutes (i. tit. x.) and the Pandects. (i. tit. vii.)...
preserves and multiplies the tame animals, whose nature is tractable to the arts of education, he acquires a perpetual title to the use and service of their numerous progeny, which derives its existence from his labours. If he encloses and cultivates a field for their sustenance and his own, a barren waste is converted into a fertile soil; the seed, the nurture, the labour, create a new value, and the rewards of harvest: painfully earned by the fatigue of the revolving year. In the successive states of society, the hunter, the shepherd, the husbandman, may defend their possessions by two reasons which forcibly appeal to the feelings of the human mind: that whatever they enjoy is the fruit of their own industry; and that every man who envies the wages of industry to purchase such a happiness, is empowered to the exercise of similar diligence. Such, in truth, may be the freedom and plenty of a small colony cast on a fruitful island. But the colony multiplies, while the space still continues the same: the common rights, the equal inheritance of mankind, are engrossed by the bold and crafty; each field and forest is circumscribed by the land-marks of a jealous master; and it is the peculiar praise of the Roman jurisprudence, that it asserts the claim of the first occupant to the wild animals of the earth, the air, and the waters. For while the primitive estate, and the steps are silent, the shades are almost imperceptible, and the absolute monopoly is guarded by positive laws and artificial reason. The active institute principle of self-love can alone supply the arts of life and trade, and as such as civil government and exclusive property have been introduced, they become necessary to the existence of the human race. Except in the singular institutions of Sparta, the wisest legislators have disapproved an agrarian law as a false and dangerous innovation. Among the Romans, the enormous disproportion of wealth surmounted the ideal restraints of a doubtful tradition and an obsolete statute; a tradition that the poorest follower of Romulus had been endowed with the perpetual inheritance of two jugera, a statute which confined the richest citizen to a measure of five hundred and twenty acres of land. The original territory of Rome consisted only of some miles of wood and meadow along the banks of the Tiber; and domestic exchange could add nothing to the national stock. But the goods of an alien of more than usually extensive occupation; the city was enriched by the profitable trade of war; and the blood of her sons was the only price that was paid for the Volscan sheep, the slaves of Britain, or the gems and gold of Asiatic kingdoms. In the longitude of ancient jurisprudence, which were corrupted and forgotten before the age of Justinian, these spoils were distinguished by the name of mancipia, mancipia, mancipia, taken with the hand; and whenever they were sold or emancipated, the purchaser required some assurance that they had been the property of an enemy, and not of a fellow-citizen. A citizen could only forfeit his rights by apparent dereliction, and such dereliction of a valuable interest could not easily be presumed. Yet according to the twelve tables, a prescription of one year for movables, and of two years for immovables, abolished the claim of the ancient master, if the actual possessor had apprehended them by a fair transaction from the person whom he believed to be the lawful proprietor. Such conscientious injustice, without any mixture of fraud or force, could seldom injure the members of a small republic; but the various periods of three, of ten, or of twenty years, differing in different districts, are more suitable to the latitude of a great empire. It is only in the term of prescription that the distinction of real and personal property has been remarked by the civilians, and their general idea of property is that of simple, uniform, and absolute dominion. The subordinate exceptions of use, of usufruit, of servitudes, imposed for the benefit of a neighbour on lands and houses, are ably explained by the professors of jurisprudence. The claims of property, as far as they are altered by the mixture, the division, or the transformation of substance, has been reduced to the requisites and metaphysical stability by the same civilians.

The personal title of the first proprietor of inheritance must be determined by his death; and succession, but the possession, without any appearance of change, is peaceably continued in his children, the descendants of his till, and the partners of his wealth. This natural inheritance has been protected by the legislators of every climate and age, and the father is encouraged to persevere in slow and distant improvements, by the tender hope, that a long posterity will enjoy the fruits of his labour. Such a perpetual inheritance is universal, but the color has been variously established by convenience or caprice, by the spirit of national institutions, or by some partial example which was originally decided by fraud or violence. The jurisprudence of different nations to the same equality of nature, much less than the Jewish, the Athenian, or the English institutions. On the death of a citizen, all his descendants, unless they were already free from his paternal power, were called to the inheritance of his possessions. The insolvent precepts of the state were violated by the two sexes were placed on a just level; all the sons and daughters were entitled to an equal portion of the personal estate; and if any of the sons had been interdicted by a premature death, his person was represented, and his share was divided, by his surviving children. On the failure of a direct line, the right of succession must devolve to the collateral Civil degree of branches. The degrees of kindred are kindred, numbered by the civilians, ascending from the last possessor to a common parent, and descending from the same connection to the first heir. In the first degree, my brother in the second, his children in the third, and the remainder of the series may be conceived by fancy, or pictured in a genealogical table. In this computation, a distinction was made, in the presenting of the laws and even the constitution of Rome; the agnates, or persons connected by a line of males, were called, as they stood in the nearest degree, to an equal partition; but a female was incapable of

he is reproached, and not without reason, for overlooking the conditions. (Instit. i. ii. tit. vi.)

See the Institutes, (i. i. tit. iv. c.) and the Pandects, (vii. c.)

Nodd has composed a learned and dispassionate de Manzur, (Opp. tom. 1. p. 387. 475.)

2 The de Manzur are disapproved by the civilians, (Instit. i. ii. tit. vi.) and the Pandects, (vii. c.)

Cicer (pro Mercur. c. 9.) and Lactantius (Instit. Lib. 1. c. 1.) affect to laugh at the insignificant, destructive de Manzur, (Opp. tom. 1. p. 387. 475.)

Yet it might be of frequent use among litigious neighbours, both in town and country.

A distinction was made, the Roman patria potestas, and the Latin and spiritual primogeniture: (Reser.

The manzur are disapproved by the civilians, (Instit. i. ii. tit. vi.)

The Debretony, 37. 17, with Le Clerc's judicious Commentary.

1 At Athens the sons were equal, but the poor daughters were en dowed with property in the lands of their brothers, or the manzur of Jesus, (in the seventh volume of the Greek Orators.)

irregularly by the very learned edification of Sir William Jones, a scholar, a lawyer, and a man of genius.

1 In England, the eldest son alone inherits all the land; a law say the second division of Blackstone, (in the last volume of the Civil Law of England, vol. ii. p. 233.) justice only in the opinion of younger breth-

Blackstone (vol. ii. p. 202.) represent and compare the degrees of the civil with those of the canon and common law.

a separate tract of Julius Faulius, de gradibus ex aequitate, is inserted or abridged in the Pandects, (i. xxix. tit. c.)

Blackstone's Table, (vol. ii. p. 302.) represent and compare the degrees of the civil with those of the canon and common law.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

(weighted the copper money, which was paid by an imaginary purchaser; and the estate was emancipated by a fictitious sale and immediate release. This singular ceremony, which excited the wonder of the Greeks, was still practised in the age of Severus; but the prators had already approved a more simple testament, for which they required the seals and signatures of seven witnesses. Free from all legal exption, and purposely summoned for the execution of that important act. A dead child, or a son who regained the lives and fortunes of his children, might distribute their respective shares according to the degrees of their merit or his affection: his arbitrary displeasure chastised an unworthy son by the loss of his inheritance, and the mortifying preference of a stranger, in the experience of unnatural parents recommended some limitations of their testamentary powers. A son, or, by the laws of Justinian, even a daughter, could no longer be disinherited by their silence: they were compelled to name the criminal, and to specify the offence; and the justice of the emperor enumerated the sole causes that could justify such a violation of the first principles of nature and society. Unless a legitimate portion, a fourth part, had been reserved for the children, they were entitled to institute an action or complaint of ineffectual testament; to suppose that their father's understanding was impaired by sickness or age, and require the sentence of the deliberate wisdom of the magistrate. In the Roman jurisprudence, an essential distinction was admitted between the inheritance and the legacies. The heirs who succeeded to the entire unity, or to any of the twelve fractions of the substance of the deceased, could name his and his father's or his mother's domestic, or the property, his house, or the property, his domestic, or the property, his family, or the property, his blood, their maintenance, or the part of his blood. The latter, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of the property, his domestic, or the property, his family, or the property, his blood, their maintenance, or the part of his blood. The latter, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his father's blood, unless his mother had previously adopted the same rights. The former, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his mother's blood, unless his father had previously adopted the same rights. The latter, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his father's blood, unless his mother had previously adopted the same rights. The former, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his mother's blood, unless his father had previously adopted the same rights. The latter, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his father's blood, unless his mother had previously adopted the same rights. The former, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his mother's blood, unless his father had previously adopted the same rights. The latter, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his father's blood, unless his mother had previously adopted the same rights. The former, in the case of a minor citizen, married or single, was entitled to take care of his mother's blood, unless his father had previously adopted the same rights.

1 The Voconian law was enacted in the year of Rome 584. The younger Scipio, who was then 17 years of age, (Cicero, de Leg. de Civ. ii.) fonds an occasion of exercising his generosity to his mother, sisters, &c. (Polybius, tom. ii. l. xxxi. p. 1453—1464.)

word, it conveyed the idea of a firm and irrevocable contract, which was always expressed in the mode of a question and answer. Do you promise to pay me one hundred pieces of gold? I was the solemn interrogation of Scius; and the benefit of partition, or order of reciprocal actions, insensibly deviated from the strict theory of stipulatio. That most cautious and deliberate consent was justly required to sustain the validity of a gratuitous promise; and the citizen who might have obtained a legal security, incurred the suspicion of fraud, and paid the forfeit of his neglect. But the ingenuity of the citizens conducted these mutual engagements into the form of solemn stipulations. The praetors, as the guardians of social faith, admitted every rational evidence of a voluntary and deliberate act, which in their tribunal produced an equable obligation, and for which according to an action and a remiss.*

2. The obligations of the second class, as they were contracted by the delivery of a thing, are marked by the civilians with the epithet of real. A grateful return is due to the author of a benefit; and whoever is intrusted with the property of another is under a legal obligation of renuntiation to restitution. In the case of a friendly loan, the merit of generosity is on the side of the lender only; in a deposit, on the side of the receiver; but in a pledge, and the rest of the selfish commerce of ordinary life, the benefit is compensated by an equivalent, and the obligation to restore is variously modified by the nature of the transaction. The Latin language very happily expresses the fundamental difference between the consociatum and the mutuum, which our poverty is reduced to confound under the vague and common term of soccasion. Or in the delivery of any thing, it was obliged to restore the same individual thing with which he had been accommodated for the temporary supply of his wants; in the latter, it was destined for his use and consumption, and he discharged this mutual engagement, substituting the same specific value, according to the nature of the thing, in the form of repossession, with a right of action; the right of action, according to the rights of the Latins of location, is of a more complicated kind. Lands or houses, labour or talents, may be hired for a definite term; at the expiration of the time, the thing itself must be restored to the owner with an additional reward for the beneficial occupation and employment of the tenant, and these lucrative contracts, to which may be added those of partnership and commissions, the civilians sometimes imagine the delivery of the object, and sometimes presume the consent of the parties. The substantial pledge has been refined into the invisible rights of a mortgage or hypotheca; and the agreement of sale, for a certain price, imputes, from that moment, the chances of gain or loss to the account of the purchaser. It may be fairly supposed, that every man will obey the dictates of his interest: and if he accepts the benefit, he is obliged to sustain the expenses of the transaction.

In this boundless subject, the historian will observe the location of land and money, the rent of the one and the interest of the other, as they materially affect the prosperity of agriculture and commerce. The landlord was often obliged to advance the stock and instru-

* Dion Cassius (com. ii, l. v. p. 814. with Reimar's Notes) specifies in Greek money the sum of 20,000 drachmas. The Roman laws of inheritance are finery, though sometimes fancifully, deduced from Montesquieu. (Essais des Lois, l. xxiv. 1)

1 Of the civil jurisprudence of successions, testaments, codicils, leagues, and the like, the principles are embodied in the Instituti of Calis (l. ii. tit. ii. 9. p. 94-141. Justinian, i. ii. tit. x-xv.) and Tholophius (3. 329-544.) and the immense detail occupies twelve books (xxvii.—xxxii.) of the Pandects.

2 The Institutes of Calis (l. ii. tit. iv. p. 141-214.) of Justinian (l. iii. tit. xiii—xxv. p. xii and p. 484—523.) of Tholophius (pp. 484—523.) distinguish four sorts of obligations: aut re, aut vexa, aut littera, and aut pacta; but I confine myself to my own division.

3 How much is the civil, rational evidence of Polybius (l. p. 269. l. xxvi. p. 139. 186.) superior to vague, indiscernible applause; omnium maxime et praeterea solo cult. (A. Gelius, iv. 1.)

The Law of the Romans (L'Isle, Prætorii of Parties and Transactionis) is a separate and satisfactory treatise of Gerard Noodt (Opp. tom. 1. p. 483—561.) And I was the more prepared to entertain the views of this writer, for I have seen that his most relevant and important subject is spread over four books (xxii.—xxv.) of the Pandects, and is of the part of best deserving of the attention of an English student.
mements of husbandry, and to content himself with a portion of the fruits. If the feeble tenant was oppressed by accident, contagion, or hostile violence, he claimed a proportionable relief from the equity of the laws, and that which could be attained by peace or costly improvements could be expected from a farmer, who, at each moment, might be ejected by the Interest of the sale of the estate. Usury, the inevitable rate of interest, was everywhere frowned upon. Persons of illustrious rank were confined to the moderate profit of four per cent; six was pronounced to be the ordinary and legal standard of interest; and the practice of exorbitant usury was severely restrained. The most simple interest was condemned by the clergy of Rome, and west; but the sense of practical utility, which had triumphed over the laws of the republic, has resisted with equal firmness the decrees of the church, and even the prejudices of mankind.

3. Nature and society impose the strict obligation of repairing an injury; and the sufferer is entitled to recover the personal right and a legitimate action. If the property of another be intrusted to our care, the requisite degree of care may arise and fall according to the benefit which we derive from such temporary possession; we are seldom made responsible for inevitable accident, but those who manage a horse-bearing inn, on which which has always triumphed over the laws of the public, have resisted with equal firmness the decrees of the church and of mankind.

Injuries.

The execution of the Albian dictator, whose demission by eight horses, is represented by Livy as the first and the last instance of Roman cruelty in the punishment of the most atrocious crimes. But this act of justice, or revenge, was inflicted on a foreign enemy in the heat of victory, and at the command of a single man. The Servo of the twelve tables affords a more decisive twelvetables, proof of the natural spirit, since they were framed by the wisest of the senate, and accepted by the free voices of the people; yet these laws, like the statutes of Draco, are written in characters of blood. They prove the inherent evil of private passion, and the rectitude of the public mind; and the forfit of an eye for a tooth, a limb for a limb, is rigorously exacted, unless the offender can redeem his pardon by a fine of three hundred pounds of copper. The decemvirs distributed with much liberality the slightest chastisements of flails and scorpions, and our ancestors, who had not the benefit of the common law and the common law, were adjudged worthy of death. Any act of treason against the state, or of correspondence with the public enemy. The mode of execution was painful and ignominious: the head of the degenerate Roman was shrouded in a veil, his hands were tied behind his back, and, after he had been scourged by the lictor, he was suspended in the midst of the forum on a cross, or insinuations tree.

2. Nocturnal meetings in the city; whatever might be the presence of pleasure, or religion, or the public good.

3. The murder of a citizen; for which the common

---

The conveyance of rent is defined in the Pandect, (l. xiii.) and the Code, (l. iv., tit. xxv.) The quinquennium, or term of five years, appears to have been a custom rather than a law; but in France all rents specified as due for one, two, or three years, or the year following the date of the lease, were only payable until the death of the lessor. The so-called "annual rent," which was usually paid on the feast of St. John, was condemned by an edict of Justinian, and removed only in the year 1775, (Encyclopédie Methodique, tom. i., de royaumes et monarchies, p. 132.) and I am sorry to see that it still prevails in the beautiful and happy country where I am permitted to reside.

1. I might implicitly acquiesce in the sense and learning of the three books of G. Nisii, de sonore et morbo (Opp. tom. l. 173—235.) The interpretation of the actes or sacrements seems to be mistaken; the unarius at one per cent. is maintained by the best critics and the opening of the cistern, p. 433—435 the founder, or at least the champion, of this improbable view; which is, however, perplexed with many difficulties.

2. Provo xiii tabellae existimus esse non quia unarius fonsius amplius exsistet, (Tact. Annal. vi. 15.) For proo gauus Montempeis, Esprit de l'hist. de l'empire, tom. vii. p. 472, and above John Frederic Rassius, (de Placentia Vetus, l. iii. tom. 13. p. 232—232, and his three later works, p. 833—835.) the founder, or at least the champion, of this improbable view; which is, however, perplexed with many difficulties.

4. Justinian has not consecrated to give usury a place in his Institutes, and the necessary rules and restrictions on it are found on the Pandects (l. xxiii., tit. lii.) and the Code, (l. iv., tit. xxvii.)

5. The fathers are unanimous: (Barthryac, Morale des Peres, p. 141.) but the council of Trent has condemned usury as a sin. (Niccolo de’ Maccello, De jure ecclesiastico, tom. i. c. 7. p. 152.)

6. Cato, Scipio, Flaccus, have loudly condemned the practice or abuse of usury. According to the stoicism of James and I of the Roman empire, the practice is universally just. (Ench. v. 24.) The usury, with his usual good taste, observes that the subject was "too weighty a matter for the simplicity of any." (Adag. p. 225.)

7. The age of Draco (Olympiad xxxiii.) is fixed by Sir John Marshall (Cromn Chronicle, p. 525—536.) and Corsoni, (Attalk Attici, tom. vii. c. 21.) p. 43.) For his historical notes, writers on the government of Athens, Signors, Meuniers, Potter, &c.

8. The sixth, de selecta, of the xii tabellae is delineated by Gravius, (Opp. Q. 229—230,) with a comment of p. 214—215.) And Gravius (xxi.) and the Collatio Legum Macedonae et Romanae afford much original information.

10. Atlinu Griffin (l. iv.) borrowed his story from the Commentaries of Q. Labus on the xii tabellae.

11. The narrative of the xii tabellae is very summary and solemn. At dictus Albane manus est a harsh reflection, unworthy of Virgil's humble narrator; (Ench. v. 24.) Heyne, with his usual good taste, observes that the subject was "too weighty a matter for the simplicity of any." (Adag. p. 225.)

12. The age of Draco (Olympiad xxxiii.) is fixed by Sir John Marshall (Cromn Chronicle, p. 525—536.) and Corsoni, (Attalk Attici, tom. vii. c. 21.) p. 43.) For his historical notes, writers on the government of Athens, Signors, Meuniers, Potter, &c.
THE DECLINE AND FALL.

CHAP. V.

Feelings of mankind demand the blood of the murderer. Poison is still more odious than the sword or dagger; and we are surprised to discover, in two flagitious events, how early such subtle wickedness had infected the simplicity of the republic, and the chaste virtues of the Roman matrons. The paricide who violated the duties of nature and piety, was cast into the river or the sea, enclosed in a sack; and a cock, a viper, a dog, and a monkey, were successively added as the most suitable companions. Italy produces no monkeys; but the want could never be felt, till the sixth, or the first revealed guilt of a paricide. 4. The malice of an incendiarist. After the previous ceremony of whipping, he himself was delivered to the flames; and in this example alone our reason is tempted to approve the justice of retaliation. 5. Judicial perjury. The corrupt or malicious witness was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock to expiate his falsehood, which was rendered still more fatal by the severity of the penal laws, and the deficiency of written evidence. 6. The corruption of a judge, who accepted bribes, to pronounce an iniquitous sentence. 7. Libels and satires, whose rude strains exposed the public to the peculiar censure of a! The author was beaten with clubs, a worthy chastisement, but it was not certain that he was left to expire under the blows of the executioner. 8. The nocturnal mischief of damaging or destroying a neighbor's cornfield was punished with an extirpation of the corn to Ceres. But the sylvan deities were less implacable, and the extirpation of a more valuable tree was compensated by the moderate fine of twenty-five pounds of copper. 9. Magical incantations; which had power, in the opinion of the Latin shepherds, to exhaust the strength and to extinguish the life, and to move from their seats his deep-rooted plantations. The cruelty of the twelve tables against insolvent debtors still remains to be told; and I shall dare to prefer the literal sense of antiquity, to the specious refinements of modern criticism. After the judicial proof or confession of the debt, thirty days of grace were allowed before a Roman was delivered into the power of his fellow-citizen. In this private prison, twelve ounces of rice was his daily food; he might be bound with a chain of fifteen pounds' weight; and his mouth was exposed in the market-place, to cut the compassion of his friends and countrymen. At the expiration of sixty days, the debt was discharged by the loss of liberty or life, the insolvent debtor was either put to death, or sold in foreign slavery beyond the Tiber; but if several creditors were alike obstinate and exacted the debt, the insolvent debtor might drive near his body, and satiate his revenge by this horrid partition. The advocates for this savage law have insisted, that it must strongly operate in deterring idleness and fraud from contracting debts which they were unable to discharge; but experience would dissipate this salutary terror, by proving, that no creditor could be found to exact this unpunishable penalty of life or limb. As the manners of Rome were insensibly polished, the criminal law also was not exempt from the same influence. The community of accusers, witnesses, and judges; and impunity became the consequence of immoderate rigour. The Pisan and Valerian laws prohibited the magistrates from inflicting on a free citizen any capital or corporal punishment; and the obloquies of blood were mortified, and perhaps devoted to the spirit, not of patrician, but of regal, tyranny.

In the absence of penal laws, and the insufficiency of civil actions, the peace or abolition of war and justice of the city were imperfectly maintained by the private jurisdiction of the citizens. The malefactors who replenish our goals, are the outcasts of society, and the crimes for which they suffer may be commonly ascribed to ignorance, poverty, and brutal appetite. For the perpetration of similar enormities, a vile plebeian might claim and abuse the federal power of justice, or an accusation of the proof or suspicion of guilt, the slave, or the stranger, was nailed to a cross, and this strict and summary justice might be exercised without restraint over the greatest part of the populace of Rome. Each family was a commonwealth, and as a grateful vassal, owed like that of the preator, to the cognizance of external actions: virtuous principles and halits were incalculable by the discipline of education; and the Roman father was accountable to the state for the manners of his children, since he disposed, without appeal, of their person, their liberty, and their inheritance. In some pressing emergencies, the citizen was authorized to avenge his private or public wrongs. The consent of the Jewish, the Athenian, and the Roman laws, approved the slaughter of the nocturnal thief; though in open day-light a robber could not be slain without previous evidence of danger and the citizens. Whoe'er surprised an adulterer in his nuptial bed might freely execute his revenge; the most bloody or wanton outrage was excused by the provocation; nor was it before the reign of Augustus that the husband could lawfully destroy his wife, or confiscate the parent was condemned to sacrifice his daughter with her guilty seducer. After the expulsion of the kings, the ambitious Roman who should dare to assume their title or imitate their tyranny, was devoted to the eternal gods; each of his fellow-citizens was armed against his person, and he might almost despair of safety. Each of the citizens, however repugnant to gratitude or prudence, had been already sanctified by the judgment of his country. The barbarous practice of wearing arms in the midst of peace, and the bloody maxims of honour, were unknown to the Romans; and, during the two pure ages, from the establishment of equal freedom to the end of the Punic wars, the city was never disturbed by sedition, and rarely polluted with atrocious crimes. The failure of penal laws was more sensibly felt when every vice was inflamed by faction at home and domi-ment, were too often determined by the discretion of the rulers, and the subject was left in ignorance of the legal right which he might incur by every action of his life.

A sin, a vice, a crime, are the objects of theology, ethics, and jurisprudence. Measured guilt, whenever their judgments agree, they corroborate each other; but as often as they differ, a prudent legislator apprehends the guilt and punishment according to the measure of special injury. On this principle, the most daring attack on the life and property of a private citizen is judged less atrocious than the crime of treason or rebellion, which invades the majesty of the republic: the obsequious civilians unanimously pronounced, that the republic is contained in the person of its chief; and the edge of the Julian law was sharpened by the incessant diligence of the emperors.

The licentious commerce of the sexes may be tolerated as an impulse of nature, or forbidden as a source of disorder and corruption; but the fame, the fortunes, the family of the husband, are seriously injured by the infamy of the adulteress or the gallantry of the wife. The wisdom of Augustus, and the curtailing of the freedom of revenge, applied to this domestic offence the animadversion of the laws; and the guilty parties, after the payment of heavy forfeitures and fines, were condemned to long or perpetual exile in the colonies. Religious intolerance omits an equal censure against the infidelity of the husband: but as it is not accompanied by the same civil effects, the wife was never permitted to vindicate her wrongs; and the distinction of simple or double adultery, so familiar and so important in the canon law, is unknown to the jurisprudence of the Code and the Pandects.

I touch with reluctance, and despatch Unnatural vice, with impatience, a more odious vice, of which modesty rejects the name, and nature abominates the idea. The primitive Romans were infected by the example of the Etruscans and Greeks. In the mad abuse of prostitution and power, the victor of the battle was made a capital offence; but simple theft was uniformly considered as a mere civil and private injury. The degrees of guilt, and the modes of punishment... or female partner of his guilt. From Catullus to Juvenal, the poets accuse and celebrate the degeneracy of the times, and the reformation of manners was feebly attempted by the reason and authority of the civilians, till the most virtuous of the Caesars proscribed the evil against nature as a crime against society. 1

Rigour of the Christian emperors.

The free citizens of Athens and RomeJudgments of the enjoyed in all criminal cases, the invariable privilege of being tried by their country. 2 The administration of justice is the most ancient office of a prince: it was exercised by the Roman kings, and abused by usurpers. The first emperor, Augustus, in his council, pronounced his arbitrary judgments. The first consuls succeeded to this regal prerogative; but the sacred right of appeal soon abolished the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and all public causes were decided by the supreme tribunal of the people. But a wild and precipitate spirit, from the first, disdains the essential principles of justice: the pride of despotic war was envenomed by plebeian envy, and the heroes of Athens might sometimes applaud the happiness of the Persian, whose fate depended on the chance of a single tyrant. Some solitary crime, imposed by the people on their own passions, were at once the cause and effect of the gravity and temperament of the Romans. The right of accusation was confined to the magistrates. A vote of the thirty-five tribes could inflict a fine; but the cognizance of all capital crimes was assigned by the assembly of the centuries, in which the weight of influence and property was sure to preponderate. Repeated proclamations and adjournments were interposed, to allow time for prejudice and resentment to subside; and in the case of the same emperor, the empire declared to himself the implacable enemy of unmanly lust, and the cruelty of his persecution can scarcely be excused by the purity of his motives. 3

In defiance of every principle of justice, he stretched to the past as well as future offences the operations of his edicts, with the previous allowance of a short respite for confession and pardon. A painful death was inflicted by the ambuscade of the sinful instrument, or the insertion of sharp reeds into the pores and tubes of most exquisite sensibility; and Justinian defended the propriety of the execution, since the crimes of the emperors had lost their heads, and they had been convicted of sacrilege. In this state of disgrace and agony, two bishops, Isaiah of Rhodes, and Alexander of Daphnopolis, were dragged through the streets of Constantinople, while their brethren were admonished by the voice of a crier, to observe this awful lesson, and not to pollute the sanctity of their character. Perhaps these prelates were innocent. A sentence of death and infamy was often founded on the slight and suspicious evidence of a child or a servant: the guilt of the green faction, of the rich, and of the enemies of Theodosius, was supposed by the people to have been the crime of those to whom no crime could be imputed. A French philosopher 4 has dared to remark, that whatever is secret must be doubtful, and that our natural horror of vice may be abused as an engine of tyranny. But the favourable persuasion of the same writer, that a legislator may confide in the taste and reason of mankind, is impeached by the unwelcome discovery of the antiquity and extent of the disease. 5

1 A crowd of disgraceful passages will force themselves on the memory of the classifier: I will only recommend to the cool declaration of Ovid: Odis conculcis oui non uniforme resurgent. Hoec est quod poenae tumere amore mors. Elius Lampadius, in Vit. Helvogali, in Hist. August., p. 112. Aurelius Victor, in Philosoph. Codex Theod., l. ix., terti. vii. 2. and Godfrey's Commentary, tom. iii., p. 63. Theodorus abolished the subterfuges of the brothels of Rome, in which the prostitution of both sexes was acted with impunity. 2 Constans, and his successors against adulterers, sodomy, &c. in the Theodorian (l. ix., terti. vii. 7. l. xi., terti. xxxvi. leg. 1.4) and Justinian Codes, (l. xii., terti. ix. leg. 35. 23.) These principles, the language of passions as well as reason, loudly acriate their own severity to the first Caesars. 3 Justinian (Institutiones, l. xxvi., cxxxiv, ed. Anocet, c. 11. 16, with the Notes of Alphonse, Theophanes, p. 152. Cedrenus, p. 461.) Justinian and his code of laws, in which the punishment of these crimes, as well as every other sort of crime, was more severe than in the constitutions of his predecessors. p. Monastiraki, Esprit des Lois, l. vii. c. 6. That eloquent philospher connects the rights of liberty and of nature, which should not be conformed to each other. 4 For the corruption of Palestine, see Bevis and the Chinese laws and laws of Moses. Ancient Greece is stigmatized by Diodorus Siculus, (tom. ii. l. v. p. 36.) China by the Mahometan and Christian travellers, (Ancient Relations of India and China, p. 34. translated by Remondine, and his bitter critic the Poor Persian, Lettres Edifiantes, tom. xiv. p. 395.) and native America by the Spanish historians. (Gonzalez de la Vega, l. iii. c. 13. Rycan's translation, Dictionnire de Bayeu, tom iii. p. 29.) I believe, and hope, that the negroes, in their own country, were exempt from this moral porridge. 5 The important subject of the public questions and judgments at Rome is explained with much patience, and in a clear style, by Mr. de Charlet, in the Dictionnaire, l. i. c. 1679—82), and a good abridgment may be found in the Repertoire Romaine de Bevillon, in the dictionary of the lawyer, may study Nolde, (De Jurisdictione et Impera Libri duo, tom. l. i. 8vo.) Himelfast, (ed. Paley, l. i. c. 118. Inst. l. iv., xvi. Elements of Antiquity.) and Grevinius, (Opp. 239—251.) The office, both at Rome and in England, must be considered as an occupation of the highest dignity, and not a machination of a vain and pernicious spirit. This law, which condemns the jurymen to undergo the torture from whence they have exannned the criminal.
the judicial authority of the state. In each particular case, a sufficient number was drawn from the urn; their integrity was guarded by an oath; the mode of ballot secured their independence; the suspicion of partiality was at least as fortunate, rather than more, when cast against the accuser and defendant; and the judges of Miloy, by the retribution of fifteen on each side, were reduced to fifty-one voices or tablets, of acquittal, of condemnation, or of favourable doubt. 3. In the civil jurisdiction, the prator of the city was truly a judge, and almost a legislator: but he was far no more than a stenographer when the action of law, he often referred to a delegate the determination of the fact. With the increase of legal proceedings, the tribunal of the centurivs, in which he presided, acquired more weight and reputation. But whether he acted alone, or with the advice of his counsel, the most absolute powers might be trusted to a magistrate who was annually chosen by the votes of the people. The rules and precautions of freedom have required some explanation; the order of despotism is simple and inanimate. Before the age of Justin-ian, or perhaps of Dioecletian, the decries of Roman judges had sunk to an empty title; the children or of the assessors might be accepted or despised; and in each tribunal the civil and criminal jurisdiction was administered by a single magistrate, who was raised and disgraced by the will of the emperor. Voluntary Asses. A Roman accused of any capital crime die might prevent the sentence of the law by voluntary exile, or death. Till his guilt had been legally proved, his innocence was presumed, and his person was free; till the votes of the last century had been counted and declared, he might peaceably succeed to any of the allied cities of Italy, or Greece, or Asia. 8

His fame and fortunes were preserved, at least to his children, by this civil death; and he might still be happy in every rational and sensual enjoyment, if a mind acceast-med to the ambitious tumult of Rome could. But voluntarily a man sometimes were reduced to poverty by the confiscation of their fortunes. But if the victims of Tiberius and Nero anticipated the decree of the prince or senate, their courage and despatch were recommenced by the applause of the public, the decent honours of burial, and the validity of their testament. 9 The expedices of avarice and cruelty of Domitian appear to have depre-ced the unfortunate of this last consolidation, and it was still denied even by the clemency of the Antonines.

A voluntary death, which in the case of a capital offence, intervened between the accusation and the sentence, was admitted as a confession of guilt, and the spoils of the deceased were seized by the inhuman claims of the treasury. 7 Yet the civilians have always enjoyed the natural right of a citizen to dispose of his life; and the posthumous disgrace invented by Tar-quin to check the despair of his subjects, was never revived or imitated by succeeding tyrants.

1 We are indebted for this interesting fact to a fragment of Asconius Pedianus, who flourished under the reign of Tiberius. The loss of his Commentaries on the Orations of Cicero has deprived us of a valuable fund of historical and juridical knowledge.

2 Polyb. 1. 23. 33. The extension of the empire and city of Rome obliged the exile to seek a more distant place of retirement.

3 Eusebius, Praef. Hist. 28. 1. 25. 476, etc.

4 Pis. Praet. Dist. 16 c. Suid. 284.

5 R. v. v. v. c. 137, etc.

6 Dig. 22. a. 5. 3.

7 Plut. Historiarum, xxxvi. 34. When he fatigued his subjects in building the capitol, many of the laborers were provoked to despatch themselves by nailing their dead bodies to crosses.

8 The sole resemblance of a violent and premature death has en-

}

VOL. II. - N
seritude; and the Romans were oppressed at the same time by the multiplicity of their laws and the arbitrary will of their master.

CHAPTER VI.

Reign of the younger Justin.—Embassy of the Avars.

—Their settlement on the Danube.—Conquest of Italy by the Lombards.—Adoption and reign of Tiberius.—Of Maurice.—State of Italy under the Lombards and the exarchs of Ravenna.—Distress of Rome.

—Character and conduct of Gregory the first.

Death of Justinian.

During the last years of Justinian, his infirm mind was devoted to heavenly contemplation, and he neglected the business of the lower world. His subjects were impatient of the long continuance of his life and reign; yet all who were capable of reflection, apprehended the moment of his death, which might issue in trouble, in tumult, and war. Seven nephews of the childless monarch, the sons or grandsons of his brother and sister, had been educated in the splendour of a princely fortune; they had been shown in high commands in the provinces and armies; their station, which was known, should have led them to the rulers were zealous, and as the jealousy of age postposed the declaration of a successor, they might expect with equal hope the inheritance of their uncle. He expired in his palace, after a reign of thirty-eight years; and the decisive opportunity was embraced by the friends of Justin, the son of Vigilantius. At the hour of midnight, his domestics were awakened by an importunate crowd, who thundered at his door, and obtained admittance by revealing themselves to be the principal ministers of the senate. These welcome deputes announced the recent and momentous secret of the emperor's decease: reported, or perhaps invented, his dying choice of the best beloved and most deserving of his nephews, and conjured Justin to prevent the disorders of the multitude, if they should perceive, with the return of light, that they were left without a master. After promising his fidelity with the most solemn and fervent oaths to his instructions, he custom of emperor, and despotic modesty, Justin, by the advice of his wife Sophia, submitted to the authority of the senate. He was conducted with speed and silence to the palace; the guards saluted their new sovereign, and the religious and religious rites of his coronation were diligently accomplished. By the hands of the proper officers he was invested with the imperial garments, the red buskins, white tunic, and purple robe. A fortunate soldier, whom he instantly promoted to the rank of tribune, encreased his neck with a military collar; four robust youths excelled him on a shield; he stood firm and erect to receive the adoration of his subjects; and their choice was sanctified by the benediction of the patriarch, who imposed the diadem on the head of an orthodox prince. The hippodrome was filled with innumerable multitudes; and no sooner did the emperor appear on his throne, than the voices of the blue and green factions were confounded in the same loud acclamations. In the speeches which Justin addressed to the senate and people, he promised to correct the abuses which had disgraced the age of his predecessor, displayed the maxims of a just and beneficent government, and declared, that on the approaching calends of January, he would revive in his own person the name and liberality of a Roman consul. The immediate discharge of his uncle's debts exhibited a solid pledge of his faith and generosity: a train of pots laden with bags of gold advanced into the midst of the hippodrome, and the hopeless creditors of Justinian accepted this equitable payment as a voluntary gift. Before the end of three years, his example was imitated and surpassed by the emperor Sophia, who delivered the whole of the goods of the exiles; the multitude, with the left eyes and gilt bucklers of the guards, which they had found their arms and axes with more confidence than they would have shown in a field of battle. The officers who exercised the power, or attended the person, of the prince, were attired in their richest habits, and conducted to the throne of Justin, in the presence of the hierarchy. When the veil of the sanctuary was withdrawn, the ambassadors beheld the emperor of the east on his throne, beneath a canopy, or dome, which was supported by four columns, and crowned with a winged figure of Victory. In the first emotions of surprise, they submitted to the servile adoration of the Byzantine court; but as soon as they arose from the ground, Targetius, the chief of the embassy, expressed the freedom and pride of a barbarian. He extolled, by the tongue of his interpreter, the greatness of the chagrin, by whose eloquence the kingdoms of the south were permitted to exist, whose victorious subjects had traversed the frozen rivers of Scythia, and who now covered the banks of the Danube with innumerable tents. The late emperor had cultivated, with annual and costly gifts, the friendship of a grateful monarch, and the memory of her illustrious son was perpetuated by the new emperor of the Avars. The same prudence would instruct the nephew of Justinian to imitate the liberality of his uncle, and to purchase the blessings of peace from an invincible people, who delighted and excelled in the exercise of war. The reply of the emperor was delivered in the same strain of haughty defiance, and he derived his confidence from the G d of the christians, the ancient glory of Rome, and the recent triumphs of Justinian. "The empire," said he, "abounds with men and horses, and arms sufficient to defend our frontiers, and to chastise the barbarians. You offer aid, you threaten hostilities; we despise your enmity and your aid. The conquerors of the Avars solicit our alliance; shall we dread their fugitives and exiles? The beauty of our uncle was granted to your misery, to your humble condition. You offer us the holy severities of your obligations, the knowledge of your own weakness. Retire from our presence; the lives of ambassadors are

* * *

It is surprising how Paci (Critica in Annal. Bonon. tom. ii. p. 229) could be tempted by any chronicler to contradict the plain and declarative text of Corippus, Crisicia dona, l. 1. 254, vicini dies, l. 1. 1) and to postpose, U. A. 567, the consilium of Justin and the Avars. Theophan., Chron. p. 260. Wherever Cedrenus or Zonaras are more transcribed, it is superfluous to allege their testimony. Compare, U. A. 567. The unquestioned error of the Turks, the conquerors of the Avars; but the word secluder has no apparent reference to the sole XI. C. of Constantinople, to which it relates in the first edition (1515, apud Planchon) is not longer visible. The red edition of Fregelius, Rome, has inserted in the marginal emendation of soled: but the proofs of Ducas (Jouvenel, D'Herbe, vii. ed. 240) for the early use of this title among the Turks and Femenia, are weak. I believe, U. A. 567, that the consilium of Justin, signified by Cedrenus (l. 1. 254), and B. (Bibliotheca orient. p. 825), who ascribes the war to the Arabic and Oriental annals. The second, or the fourth, of the two first battles of the century, when it was bestowed by the khalf of Baghdad on Mahommed prince of Geza, and conqueror of India.
safe; and if you return to implore our pardon, perhaps you will taste of our benevolence."

On the report of his ambassadors, the chagan was awed by the apparent force of the Avars, but he maintained the objects of his design. Instead of executing his threats against the eastern empire, he marched into the poor and savage countries of Germany, which were subject to the dominion of the Franks. After two doubtful battles he consented to retire, and the Avar king believed that the Avars had obtained that immediate supply of corn and cattle which he foresaw and solicited; but the Lombards could not long withstand the furious assault of the Avars, who were sustained by a Roman army. And as the offer of marriage was rejected with contempt, Alboin was compelled to relinquish his prey, and to leave his partisans of the eastern empire which he had inflicted on the house of Cunimund.¹

When a public quarrel is envenomed, the Lombards by private injuries, a blow that is mortal or decisive can be productive only of a short truce which allows the Gauls a successful combattant to sharpen his arms for a new encounter. The strength of Alboin had been found unequal to the gratification of his love, ambition, and revenge; he condescended to implore the formidable aid of the chagan, and the arguments that he employed are expressive of the art and policy of the barbarians. In the attack of the Avars, they had been prompted by the just desire of exterminating a people whose alliance with the Roman empire had rendered the common enemies of the nations, and the personal adversaries of the chagan. If the forces of the Avars and the Lombards should unite in this desperate and abortive quarell, the victors would receive as a reward inestimable: the Danube, the H-Brus, Italy, and Constantinople would be exposed, without a barrier, to their invincible arms. But if they hesitated or delayed to prevent the malice of the Romans, the same spirit which had insulted, would pursue the Avars to the extremity of the earth. These specious reasons were heard by the chagan with coldness and disdain: he detained the Lombard ambassadors in his camp, protracted the negotiation, and by turns alleged his want of inclination, or his want of ability, to undertake this important concern. At length he signified the ultimate price of his alliance, that the Lombards should immediately present him with the title of their entitle: that the spoils and captives should be equally divided; but that the lands of the Avars should become the sole patrimony of the Avars. Such hard conditions were eagerly accepted by the passions of Alboin; and as the Romans were dissatisfied with the ingratitude and perfidy of the Avars, Justin abandoned that incorrigible people to their fate, and remained the tranquil spectator of this unequal conflict. The deep pair of Cunimund was active and dangerous. The Avars had the advantage of the country, he was informed of the designs of the Lombards, and to prevent that union of forces which was expected, he detached Alboin from the Danube, and Alboin returned in triumph; and the Lombards, who celebrated his matchless intrepidity, were compelled to praise the virtues of an enemy.² In this extraordinary visit he had procured, Alboin has mingled with those of the most illustrious of the Franks. He was informed of the defeat of his father, and the death of his king, and he ascended the throne of the Avars. Her name was Rosamond, an appellation expressive of female beauty, and which our own history or romance has consecrated to amorous tales. The king of the Lombards, (the father of Alboin no longer lived) was contracted to the grand-daughter of Clevis; but his strange suit of faith and policy soon yielded to the hope of possessing the fair Rosamond, and of insulting her family and nation. The arts of persuasion were tried without success; and the impatient lover, by force and stratagem, obtained his desire. The marriage was celebrated, according to the ancient custom of the barbarians. At length he signified the further obstacle which could impede the progress of the confederates, and they faithfully executed the terms of their agreement.³ The fair countries of Walachia, Moldavia, Transylvania, and the parts of Hungary beyond the Danube, were occupied, without resistance, by a new colony of Seythians; and the Dacian empire

¹ For these characteristic speeches, compare the verse of Corippus (Ciliciae Deis de Caesare) [19] and the prose of Menander (Chorographia, c. 102, 105). Their divergency proves that they did not copy each other; these are the words, that the division has been original.

² For the Austrian war, see Menander, (Excerpta. Legat. p. 110.) Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. l. iv. c. 29.) and Paul the deacon, (De chorographia, l. ii. c. 29.)

³ Paul Warnefird, the deacon of Frei, de Gent. Langobard. l. i. c. 23; His pictures of national manners, though rudely sketched, are more lively and faithful than those of Rome, or Gregory of Tours.
of the chagars subsisted with splendour above two hundred and thirty years. The nation of the Gepidae was dissolved; but in the distribution of the captives, the slaves of the Avars were less fortunate than the companions of the Lombards, whose generosity adopted the valiant, and whose approbation was incapable with cool and deliberate tyranny. One moiety of the spoil was introduced into the camp of Albin more wealth than a barbarian could readily compute. The fair Rosamond was persuaded, or compelled, to acknowledge the rights of her victorious lover; and the daughter of Camoens approved him to be worthy of his crimes which might be indebted to her own irresistible charms.

The destruction of a mighty kingdom established the fame of Albin. In the days of Charlemagne, the Bavarians, the Saxons, and the other tribes of the Teutonic language, still repeated the songs which described the heroic virtues, the valour, liberality, and fortune of the king of the Lombards. But his ambition was yet unsatisfied; and the conqueror of the Gepidae turned his eyes from the Danube to the rieher banks of the Po and the Tiber. Fifteen years had elapsed, since his subjects, the confederates of Norse, had visited the pleasant climate of Italy; the mountains, the rivers, the highways, were familiar to their memory: the report of their success, perhaps the view of their kindred in the flames of emulation and contention. Their hopes were encouraged by the spirit and eloquence of Albin; and it is affirmed, that he spoke to their senses, by producing, at the royal feast, the fairest and most extensive magazine of a noble and generous heart in the greater part of the world. No sooner had he erected his standard, than the native strength of the Lombards was multiplied by the adventurous youth of Germany and Scythia. The robust freshness of Noricum and Pannonia had resumed the manners of barbarians; and the names of the Gepidae, Bulgarians, Saracens, and Bavarians, may be distinctly traced in the provinces of Italy. Of the Saxons, the old allies of the Lombards, twenty thousand warriors, with their wives and children, accepted the invitation of Albin. Their bravery contributed to his success; but the accession of the all-conquering power of the Lombards was not second to the courage of his host. Every mode of religion was freely practised by its respective votaries. The king of the Lombards had been educated in the Arian heresy; but the catholics, in their public worship, were allowed to have their service; while the Lombards, who were stubborn, or barbarians sacrificed a she-goat, or perhaps a captive, to the gods of their fathers. The Lombards, and their confederates, were united by their common attachment to a chief, who exalted in all the virtues and views of a savage hero; and the vigour of Albin provided an ample magazine of offensive and defensive arms for the use of the expedition. The portable wealth of the Lombards attended the march; their lands they cheerfully relinquished, to the Avars, on the solemn promise, which was made and accepted without a smile, that if they failed in the conquest of Italy, these voluntary exiles should be reinstated in their former possessions.

They might have failed, if Nurses Dissonance had been the antagonist of the Lombard prince. But he had encountered with reluctance the enemy whom they dreaded and esteemed. Nor did the arm of the barbarians want a master as active and patient of labour as his air. His government was oppressive and unpopular, and the general discontent was expressed with freedom by the deputies of Rome. Before the throne of Justin they held dictation, that their Gothic sovereignty had been more tolerable than the despotism of a Greek exarch; and that, unless their tyrants were instantly removed, they would consult their own happiness in the choice of a master. The apprehension of a revolt was urged by the voice of envy and detraction, which had so recently triumphed over the merit of Albin. The Senate and patricians of Rome pointed to supersede the conqueror of Italy, and the base motives of his recall were revealed in the insulting mandate of the empress Sophis, "that he should leave to men the exercise of arms, and return to his proper station among the munificence of the palace, where his disdained virtues were to be elevated to a more glorious sphere of power."" I will spin her such a thread, as she shall not easily unravel!" was said to have been the reply which indignation and conscious virtue extorted from the hero. Instead of attending, a slave and a victim, at the gate of the Byzantine palace, he retired to Naples, from whence (if any credit is due to the belief of the times) Nurses invited the Lombards to chastise the ingratitude of the prince and people. But the passions of the people are furious and changeable, and the Romans soon recollected the merits, or dreaded the resentment, of their victorious general. By the mediation of the pope, who undertook a special pilgrimage to Naples, their repentance was accepted; and Nurses, assuming a milder aspect and a more dutiful language, consented to fix his residence in the capitol. His death, though in the extreme period of old age, left the Lombards as flourishing as ever in the state of Italy; but, alone, he alone could have restored the last and fatal error of his life. The reality, or the suspicion, of a conspiracy disarmed and dissolved the Italians. The soldiers received the disgrace, and bewailed the loss, of their monarch. It was not without deep lamentations that a man who was alone could have repaired the last and fatal error of his life. Whatever might be the grounds of his security, Albin neither expected nor encountered a Roman army in the field. He ascended the Julian Alps, and looked down with contempt and desire on the fruitful plains to which the operation of a Milanese exarch was a seductive beckon. The inhabitants of Lombardy were alarmed at the approach of their enemies, and Longinus was himself ignorant of the state of the army and the province. In the preceding years Italy had been desolated by pestilence and famine, and a disaffected people ascribed the calamities of nature to the guilt of folly of their rulers. Whatever might be the grounds of his security, Albin neither expected nor encountered a Roman army in the field. He ascended the Julian Alps, and looked down with contempt and desire on the fruitful plains to which the operation of a Milanese exarch was a seductive beckon. The inhabitants of Lombardy were alarmed at the approach of their enemies, and Longinus was himself ignorant of the state of the army and the province. In the preceding years Italy had been desolated by pestilence and famine, and a disaffected people ascribed the calamities of nature to the guilt of folly of their rulers. He ascended the Julian Alps, and looked down with contempt and desire on the fruitful plains to which the operation of a Milanese exarch was a seductive beckon. The inhabitants of Lombardy were alarmed at the approach of their enemies, and Longinus was himself ignorant of the state of the army and the province. In the preceding years Italy had been desolated by pestilence and famine, and a disaffected people ascribed the calamities of nature to the guilt of folly of their rulers. He ascended the Julian Alps, and looked down with contempt and desire on the fruitful plains to which the operation of a Milanese exarch was a seductive beckon. The inhabitants of Lombardy were alarmed at the approach of their enemies, and Longinus was himself ignorant of the state of the army and the province. In the preceding years Italy had been desolated by pestilence and famine, and a disaffected people ascribed the calamities of nature to the guilt of folly of their rulers.
Frilli, to guard the passes of the mountains. The Lombards respected the strength of Pavia, and listened to the prayers of the Trevisans: their show and heavy multitudes proceeded to occupy the palace and city of Verona, and near the town of Padua was invested by the powers of Alboin five months after his departure from Pannonia. Terror preceded his march; he found every where, or he left, a dreary solitude; and the pusillanimous Italians presumed, without a trial, that the stranger was invincible. Escaping to lake, rocks, or mountains, and from thence he continued to move by the public calamities. Honorous, but a man of no principle, the archbishop of St. Ambrose, had erudually accepted the faithless offers of a capitulation; and the archbishop, with the clergy and nobles of Milan, were driven by the perdy of Alboin to seek a refuge in the less accessible ramparts of Genoa. Alboin, with a spirited enterprise, courted the inhabitants was supported by the facility of supply, the hopes of relief, and the power of escape; but from the Tentine hills to the gate of Ravena and Rome, the inland regions of Italy became, without a battle or a siege, the lasting patrimony of the Lombards. Thus the bravest champions, who had assumed the character of a lawful sovereign, and the helpless exarch was confined to the office of annciing to the emperor Justin, the rapid and irretrievable loss of his provinces and cities. One city, which had been diligently fortified by the Goths, resisted the arm of a new invader; and while Italy was subdued by the flying detachments of the Lombards, the royal camp was fixed above three years before the westgate of Ticinum, or Pavia. The same courage which obtains the esteem of a civilized enemy, provokes the fury of a savage, and the impotent besieger had bound himself by a tremendous oath, that age, and sex, and dignity, should be confounded in a general massacre. The aid of famine at length enabled him to execute his bloody vow; but as Alboin entered the gate, his horse stumbled, fell, and could not be raised from the ground. One of his attendants was promptly by compassion, or pity, being shut in the gates of the city, as a mark of the wrath of Heaven; the conqueror paused and re-lected; he sheathed his sword, and peacefully reposing himself in the palace of Theodoric, proclaimed to the trembling multitude, that they should live and obey. Delighted with the situation of a city, which was endangered by the army of the invader, and for the purchase, the prince of the Lombards disdained the ancient glories of Milan; and Pavia, during someges, was respected as the capital of the kingdom of Italy.

The reign of the founder was splendid and transient; and before he could regular, and the king himself was tempted by appetite, or vanity, to exceed the ordinary measure of his intemperance. After draining many copacious bowls of Khastian or Falernian wine, he called for the skull of Caninnus, the eldest son of his sideboard. The cup of victory was accepted with horrid applause by the circle of the Lombard chiefs. "Fill it again with wine," exclaimed the insane conqueror, "fill it to the brim; carry this goblet to the queen, and request in my name that she would rejoice with her fatigued. In an agony of grief and rage, Rosandom had strength to utter," Let the will of my lord be obeyed!" and touching it with her lips, pronounced a silent imprecation, that the insult should be washed away in the blood of Alboin. Some indulgence might be due to the resentment of a daughter, if she had not already violated the duties of a wife. Impeachable in her con ty, or inconsistent in her love, the queen of Italy had stooped from the throne to the arms of a subject, and Helvichii, the king's armour-bearer, was the secret minister of her pleasure and revenge. Against the proposals of the conqueror, she could no longer urge the scruples of fidelity or gratitude; but Helvichius trembled, when he revoluted the danger as well as the guilt, when he recollected the matchless strength and intrepidity of a warrior, whom he had so often attended in the field of battle. He pressed, and obtained, that one of the bravest champions of the Lombards should be introduced to the enterprise, but no more than a promise of secrecy could be drawn from the gallant Peredeus; and the mode of seduction employed by Rosandom betrays her shameless insensibility both to honour and love. She supplied the place of one of her female attendants who was beloved by Peredeus, and contrived some excuse for darkness and silence, till she could inform her companion that he had enjoyed the queen of the Lombards, and that his own death, or the death of Alboin, must be the consequence of such treasonable adultery. In this alternative, he chose rather to be the accomplice than the victim of Ros-andom, whose undaunted spirit was incapable of fear or remorse. She expected and soon found a favourable moment, when the king, oppressed with wine, had retired from the table to his afternoon slumbers. His faithless spouse was anxious for his health and repose; she was shut in the palace, the attendants dismissed, and Rosandom, after lulling him to rest by her tender caresses, unchambered the chamber-door, and urged the reluctant conspirators to the instant execution of the deed. On the first alarm, the warrior started from his couch; his sword, which he attempted to dash away, was received instantly, and plunged by the hand of Rosandom; and a small steel, his only weapon, could not long protect him from the spears of the assassins. The daughter of Caninnus smiled in his fall; his body was buried under the staircase of the palace, and the grateful posterity of the Lombards revered the tomb and memory of their victorious leader.

The ambitious Rosandom aspired to Her flight and reign in the name of her lover; the city and palace of Verona were awed by her power, and a faithful band of her native Goths was prepared to avenge the revenge, and to second the wishes of their sovereign. But the Lombard chiefs, who fled in the first moments of consternation and disorder, had resumed their courage and collected their powers; and the nation, instead of submitting to her reign, demanded, with unanimous cries, that justice should be executed on the guilty spouse and the murderers of their

p. 101

The classical reader will recollect the wife and murder of Cannaudus, so agreeably told in the first book of Herodotus. The choice of Greek, egreio, as a good name, may serve as the excuse of Per-dan, and this use of an idiom has been imitated by the best writers of antiquity (Gruenius, ad Ciceron. Ort. pro Milone, c. 109).

The decline and fall

The story of the decline of mankind was protected by the selfish policy of the earth. With her daughter, the heiress of the Lombard throne, her two lovers, her trusty Gepidae, and the spoils of the palace of Verona, Rosamond descended died the Agige and the Po, and was transported by a Greek vessel to the safe harbor of Venice. The genius beheld with delight the charms and the treasures of the widow of Albin: her situation and her past conduct might justify the most licentious proposals; and she readily listened to the passion of a minister, who once more of the decline of the house of Rosamond was respected as the equal of kings. The death of a jealous lover was an easy and grateful sacrifice, and as Helmeric issued from the bath, he received the deadly potion from the hand of his mistress. The taste of the liquor, its speedy operation, and his experience of the cardinal character of Rosamond, convinced him that he was poisoned: he pointed his dagger to her breast, compelled her to drain the remainder of the cup, and expired in a few minutes, with the consolation that she could not survive to enjoy the fruits of her wickedness.

The daughter of Albinia and Rosamond, with the richest heir of Lombardy, and the one of the severest climates, was chosen to be the successor of Albin. Before the end of eighteen months, the throne was polluted by a second murder: Clepho was stabbed by the hand of a domestic: the regal office was suspended above ten years, during the minority of his son Anthius; and Italy was divided and oppressed by a ducal aristocracy of thirty tyrants.

When the nephew of Justinian as emperor Justin II conceded the throne, he proclaimed a new art of happiness and glory. The annals of the second Justin are marked with disgrace and misery at home. In the west, the Roman empire was affected by the loss of Africa, and the conquests of the Persians. Injustice prevailed in both the empire and the provinces; the rich plundered for their property, the poor for their safety, the ordinary magistrates were ignorant or venal; the salutary remedies appear to have been arbitrary and violent, and the complaints of the people could no longer be silenced by the splendid names of a legislator and a conqueror. The opinion which imparts to the prince all the calamities of his times, may be sustained by the historian as a serious truth or a salutary prejudice.

Yet a candid suspicion will arise, that the sentiments of Justin were pure and benevolent, and that he might have filled his station without reproach, if the futilities of his mind had not been injured by disease, which deprived the emperor of the use of his feet, and confined him to the palace, a stranger to the complaints of the people and the vices of the government. The tardy knowledge of his own impotence determined him to lay down the weight of the diadem; and in the choice of a worthy substitute, he showed some symptoms of a discerning and even magnanimous spirit. The only son of Justin and Sophia died in his infancy: their daughter Arabina was the wife of Badurias, superintendent of the palace, and afterwards commander of the Italian armies, who vainly inspired religious rights of marriage by those of adoption. While the empire was polluted by an object of desire, Justin was accustomed to behold with jealousy and hatred his brothers and cousins, the rivals of his hopes; nor could he depend on the gratitude of those who would accept the purple as a restitution, rather than be guilty of the destruction of their benefactor, who had been removed by exile, and afterwards by death; and the emperor himself had inflicted such cruel insults on another, that he must either dread his resentment or despise his patience. This domestic animosity was refined into a generous resolution of seeking a successor, not to his relative Justinian, but to the artful Sophia. See the history of Paul, b. i, c. 22-22. I have borrowed some interesting circumstances from the Liber Pontificalis of Agnellus, in Script. Rev. lat. tom. iii. p. 124. Of all chronological guides, Murat-neri's is the most correct.

The original authors for the reign of Justin the younger, are Evagrius, Hist. Ecclel. i. vii. c. 13, Theophrastus de Carthago, in Peterse- nius, tom. iii. p. 204-219, Zosimus, tom. ii. xiv. p. 70-72. Credonius, in Compend. paul. tom. i. c. 12.

b. A prosopographus novus sacre Baduriae autr. Successor a sacri mactis Carlia eali. Cauriopis. Badurias is enumerated among the descendants and allies of the house of Justinian. A family of noble Venetians (Cana Baduriae) built churches and gave dudes to the republic as early as the ninth century. They descend from a Badurias who produced a pedesire so ancient and illustrious. Dusegate, Fam. Byz-

The praese restoratm on princes before their elevation, is the praxis singularis of the Byzantines, and is afterwards the accession of Justinian (I. 1. 212-252). Yet even a captain of the guards could not destroy the dignity of an emperor. Evagrius (I. vii. c. 13) adds the reply to his ministers. He applies this speech to the ceremony when Tiberius was invested with the ioni. A praedicate Rnnum, and the home expression of error, of Thoproseus, &c. has delayed it to his Augustan invention immediately before the death of Justinian.

4 Theophrastus Simonetta (I. xii. c. 11) declares that he shall give no permission to superintend the death of Justin as if in an attempt to correct the imperfections of language or rhetoric. Perhaps the vain sophist would have been incapable of producing such sentiments.
Reign of Tiberius,

Among the virtues of Tiberius, his beauty (he was one of the tallest and most comely of the Romans) might introduce him to the favour of Sophia; when she accepted his proposal, he promised that she should preserve her station and influence under the reign of a second and more youthful husband. But if the ambitious candidate had been tempted to flatter and dissemble, it was no longer in his power to fulfil her expectations, or his own promise. The factions of the hippocrene demanded, with some insistence, the name of their new empress; both the people and Sophia were astonished by the proclamation of Anastasia, the secret though lawful wife of the emperor Tiberius. Whatever could alleviate the disappointment of Sophia, imperial honours, a stately palace, a numerous household, was literally bestowed by the piety of her adopted son; on solemn occasions he attended and consulted the widow of his benefactor; but her ambition disguised the vain semblance of royalty, and the respectful appellation of mother served to exasperate, rather than appease, the rage of an injured woman. While she accepted, and repaid with a hearty smile, the fairest expressions of regard and confidence, a secret alliance was concluded between the dowager empress and her ancient enemies; and Justinian, the son of Germanus, was employed as the instrument of her revenge. The pride of the reigning house supported, with reluctance, the spirit of a mental disease, which was never restored to its due station, according to the tenure by which he held it, to the most deserving of his fellow-citizens. He selected Maurice from the crowd, a judgment more precious than the purple itself; the patriarch and senates were summoned to the bed of the dying prince; he restored his honour and the rest of his fortune; and the advice was solemnly delivered by the voice of the quaestor. Tiberius expressed his hope, that the virtues of his son and successor would cleft the noblest mausoleum to his memory. His memory was embellished by the public affliction; but the most sincere grief evaporated in the tumult of a new reign, and the eyes and acclamations of mankind were speedily directed to the rising sun.

The emperor Maurice derived his origin from ancient Rome; but his immediate parents were settled at Arabissus in Cappadocia, and their singular felicities preserved them alive to behold and partake of the fortune of their august son. The youth of Maurice was spent in the profession of arms; Tiberius promoted him to the command of a new and favourite legion of twelve thousand confederates; his vaunted victories were speedily displayed; and he returned to Constantinople to accept, as his just reward, the inheritance of the empire. Maurice ascended the throne at the mature age of forty-three years; and he reigned above twenty years over the east and over himself; he expelling from his mind the wild depressions of policy, restored the spirit and sounds of the ancient Roman epocha. His cold and reserved demeanour might be imputed to arrogance; his justice was not always exempt from cruelty, nor his clemency from weakness; and his rigid economy too often expressed him to the reproach of avarice. But the rational wishes of an absolute monarch must tend to the happiness of his people; for it is therefore singular enough that Paul (3, iii. 15) should distinguish him as the first Greek emperor—primum ex Graecorum genus imperatorum—immediate progenitor of an immediate progeny of emperors, who were born in the Latin provinces of Europe; and a various reading, in the account of the Graecorum ingenui, would apply the expression to the empire rather than the prince.

* For the character and reign of Tiberius, see Evagrius, l. v. 13, Theophrastus, in Thesprotios, p. 25, to 27. Zonaras, tom. ii. l. xiv. p. 72. Cedrenus, p. 392. Paul Warnefrid, de Gesta Langobardorum, 1. iii. c. 11, 12. The deacon of Forum Junii appears to have possessed some curious and authentic facts.

- It is therefore singular enough that Paul (3, iii. 15) should distinguish him as the first Greek emperor—primum ex Graecorum genus imperatorum—immediate progenitor of an immediate progeny of emperors, who were born in the Latin provinces of Europe; and a various reading, in the account of the Graecorum ingenui, would apply the expression to the empire rather than the prince.

- For the character and reign of Maurice, the fifth and sixth books of Evagrius, particularly l. v. 13, 14, 22, 23. Theophrastus, in Thesprotios, p. 25, to 27. Zonaras, tom. ii. l. xiv. p. 72. Cedrenus, p. 392. Paul Warnefrid, de Gesta Langobardorum, 1. iii. c. 11, 12. The deacon of Forum Junii appears to have possessed some curious and authentic facts.

- For the character and reign of Maurice, the fifth and sixth books of Evagrius, particularly l. v. 13, 14, 22, 23. Theophrastus, in Thesprotios, p. 25, to 27. Zonaras, tom. ii. l. xiv. p. 72. Cedrenus, p. 392. Paul Warnefrid, de Gesta Langobardorum, 1. iii. c. 11, 12. The deacon of Forum Junii appears to have possessed some curious and authentic facts.

- For the character and reign of Maurice, see Evagrius, l. v. 13, Theophrastus, in Thesprotios, p. 25, to 27. Zonaras, tom. ii. l. xiv. p. 72. Cedrenus, p. 392. Paul Warnefrid, de Gesta Langobardorum, 1. iii. c. 11, 12. The deacon of Forum Junii appears to have possessed some curious and authentic facts.
Maurice was endowed with sense and courage to promote that happiness, and his administration was directed by the principles and example of Tiberius. The pusillanimity of the Greeks had introduced so complete a separation between the offices of king and of general, that a private soldier who had deserved and obtained the sable and bare head of his armies. Yet the emperor Maurice enjoyed the glory of restoring the Persian monarch to his throne; his lieutenants waged a doubtful war against the Avars of the Danube, and he cast an eye of pity, of intellectual pity, on the abject and distressful state of his Italian provinces, the District of Italy.

From Italy the emperors were incessantly tormented by tales of misery and demands of succour, which extorted the humiliating confession of their own weakness. The existing dignity of Rome was only marked by the freedom and energy of her complaints: "If you are incapable," she said, "of delivering us from the sword of the Lombards, save us at least from the calamity of famine." Tiberius forgave the reproach, and relieved the distress; a supply of corn was transported from Egypt to Italy, under the Roman name, not of Camillus, but of St. Peter, repulsed the barbarians from their walls. But the relief was accidental, the danger was perpetual and pressing; and the clergy and senate, collecting the remains of their ancient power, a sum of three thousand pounds of gold, despatched a deputation to Pampelmuse, to solicit their complaints at the foot of the Byzantine throne. The attention of the court, and the forces of the east, were diverted by the Persian war; but the justice of Tiberius applied the subsidy to the defence of the city: and he dismissed the patrician with his best advice, either to bribe the Lombard chief, or to purchase, from the aid of the kings of France. Notwithstanding this weak invention, Italy was still afflicted, Rome was again besieged, and the suburb of Classis, only three miles from Ravenna, was pillaged and occupied by the troops of a simple duke of Spoleto. Maurice gave audience to a second deputation of priests and senators; the duties and the menaces of religion were forcibly urged in the letters of the Roman pontiff; and his nuncio, the deacon Gregory, was alike qualified to solicit the powers, either of heaven or of the earth. They were first pacified, with the conditions of his predecessor: some formidable chiefs were persuaded to embrace the friendship of the Romans; and one of them, a mild and faithful barbarian, lived and died in the service of the exarch: the passes of the Alps were delivered to the Franks; and the pope encouraged them to violate, without scruple, their oaths and engagements to the misbelievers. Childerich, the great-grandson of Clovis, was persuaded to invade Italy by the payment of fifty thousand pieces; but as he had viewed with delight some Byzantine coin of the weight of one pound of gold, the king of Austrasia might stipulate, that the gift should be rendered more worthy of his acceptation, by a proper mixture of these respectable medals. The dukes of the Lombards had provoked by frequent invasions their powerful neighbours of Gaul. As soon as they were appeased, the patrician reverted to the feeble and disorderly independence: the advantages of royal government, union, secrecy, and vigour, were unanimously confessed; and Autharish, the son of Clepho, had already attained the strength and reputation of a warrior. Under the standard of their new king, the conquerors of Italy withstood three successive invasions, one of which was led by Childerich himself, the last of the Merovingian race who descended from the Alps. The first expedition was defeated by the jealous animosity of the Franks, and a few days afterwards they were vanquished in a bloody battle, with more loss and dishonour than they had sustained since the foundation of their monarchy. Impatient for revenge, they returned a third time with accumulated forces, and Autharish yielded to the fury of the torrent. The troops and treasures of the Lombards were distributed in the walled towns between the Alps and the Apenine. A nation, less sensible of danger, than of fatigue at the length and dignity of their discipline; composed of twenty commanders; and the hot vapours of an Italian sun infected with disease those trumonante bodies which had already suffered the vicissitudes of intestine and famine. The powers that were inadequate to the conquest, were more than sufficient for the destruction of the country; the trembling natives distinguished between their enemies and their deliverers. If the junction of the Merovingian and imperial forces had been effected in the neighbourhood of Milan, perhaps they might have subdued the throne of the Lombards; but the Franks expected six days the signal of a flaming village, and the arms of the Greeks were idly employed in the reduction of Modena and Parma, which were torn from them after the retreat of their transalpine allies. The victorious Autharish asserted his claim to the dominion of Italy. But the Austrasian prince was able to bear the resistance, and rid the hidden treasures of a sequestered island in the lake of Comun. At the extreme point of Calabria, he touched with his spear a column on the seashore of Rhegium, proclaiming that ancient landmark to stand the immovable boundary of his kingdom.

During a period of two hundred years, the exarchate of Italy was unequally divided between the kingdom of the Lombards and the exarchate of Ravenna. The offices and professions, which the jealousy of Constantine had separated, were united by the rule of Tiberius; and the wealth of Ravenna, which the arms were invested, in the decline of the empire, with the full remains of civil, of military, and even of ecclesiastical power. Their immediate jurisdiction, which was afterwards consecrated as the patrimony of St. Peter, extended over the modern Romagna, the marches or valleys of Ferrara and Comun, the five maritime cities from Rimini to Ancona, and a second, inland Pentapolis, between the Adriatic coast and the hills of the Apenine. Three subordinate provinces, of Rome, of Venice, and of Naples, which were divided by the effects of the division, were acknowledged, both in peace and war, the supremacy of the exarch. The duchy of Rome appears to have included the Tuscan, Sabine, and Latian conquests of the first four hundred years of the city, and the limits may be distantly traced along the coast, from Civitavecchia to Gaeta, and with the course of the river from Ameria and Narni to the port of Ostia. The numerous islands from Grado to Chiussa, composed the infant dominion of Venice; but the more accessible towns on the continent were overthrown by the Lombards, who beheld with impotent fury a new capital rising from the waves. The power of the dukes of Naples was circumscribed by the bay and the adjacent isles, by the hostile territory of Capua, and by the Roman colony of Amalfi, whose industrious citizens, by the invention of the mariner's compass, have unveiled the face of the globe. The three islands of Sardinia, Corsica, and Sicily, still adhered to the empire; and the acquisition of the further Calabria removed the last patch of Autharis from the shore of Rhegium to the isthmus of Messenia. In Sicily, the savage mountaineers preserved the liberty and religion of their ancestors; but the husbandmen of Sicily were chained to their rich and cultivated soil. Rome was oppressed by the iron sceptre of the exarchs, and a Greek, perhaps a numismatic intruder with impudence, lengthened the reign of the Atabegs. But Napoleon reversed the privilege of electing her own dukes;* the independence of Amalfi was the fruit of commerce; and the voluntary attachment of Venice was finally ennobled by an equal alliance with the eastern empire. On the map of Italy, the arrange of the exarchate occupies a very inconsiderable space, but it included an ample proportion of wealth, industry, and population. The most faithful and valuable subjects escaped from the barbarian yoke; and the banners of Pavia and Verona, of Milan and Padua, were displayed in their respective quarters by the new inhabitants of Ravenna and Virtus. The kingdom of The remained of Italy was possessed by the Lombards and Pavia, the royal seat, their kingdom was extended to the east, the north, and the west, as far as the confines of the Avarians, the Bavarians, and the Franks of Austrasia and Burgundy, and of the Goths. In Sicily, now represented by the Terra Firma of the Venetian republic, Tyrol, the Milanese, Piedmont, the coast of Genoa, Mantua, Parma, and Modena, the grand duchy of Tuscany, and a large portion of the ecclesiastical state from Perugia to the Adriatic. The dukes, and at length the princes, of the Lombards, were the successors of the monarchy, and propagated the name of the Lombards. From Capua to Tarentum, they reigned near five hundred years over the greatest part of the present kingdom of Naples.*

Language and manners of the victorious and the vanquished people. Lombards, the change of language will afford the most probable inference. According to this standard it will appear that the Lombards of Italy, and the Visigoths of Spain, were less numerous than the Franks or Burgundians; and the conquerors of Gaul must yield to the Lombards in a pastoral and rustic sagacity which almost eradicated the Iblions of Britain. The modern Italian has been insensibly formed by the mixture of nations; the awkwardness of the barbarians in the nice management of declensions and conjugations, reduced them to the use of articles and auxiliaries that by no means can be expressed by Teutonic appellations. Yet the principal stock of technical and familiar words is found to be of Latin derivation and if we were sufficiently conversant with the obsolete, the rustic, and the municipal dialects of ancient Italy, we should trace to the old, in many terms which might, perhaps, be rejected by the classic purity of Rome. A numerous army constitutes but a small nation, and the powers of the Lombards were soon diminished by the retreat of twenty thousand Saxons, who secured a dependent situation, and robbed them of any hold and perilous adventures, to their native country. The camp of Alboin was of formidable extent, but the extent of a camp would be

---

* Gregor. Mon. i. 3ii. epist. 23. 25—27.
* Homer. Iliad. i. 347—348.
*慢retto; from the Italian, the first three letters of the name of Naples. After the loss of the true Calabria, the vanity of the Greeks extended their power in place of their miserable acquisition; — and the change appears to have taken place before the time of Charlemagne. (Estienne. p. 78.)
* The same. p. 319—321. and Moratoni. (Anatichia Italiano, etc. ii. Dissertation. xxxii. xviii. p. 71—305.) have been very much in the same degree a proof of this change of name. But the reason of this inferiority in taste andHospitality, the latter with discretion; both with learning, ingenuity, and truth.
* Paul. de Greg. Langobardia. i. c. 3. 5—7. Vol. II. —9 and execute the commands, of their master, had been unknown to the ingenuity of the Greeks and Romans. Scandinavia and Scythia produce the boldest and most tractable falcons; they are tamed and educated by the roving inhabitants, always on horseback and in the field, and are accurate marksmen; a new species is introduced by the barbarians into the Roman provinces; and the laws of Italy esteem the sword and the hawk as of equal dignity and importance in the hands of a noble Lombard.

Dress and arms.

So rapid was the influence of climate and manners, and so easy, that the Lombards, in the fourth generation surveyed with curiosity and affright the portraits of their savage fathers. Their heads were shaven behind, but the shaggy locks hung over their eyes and mouth, and a long beard represented the name and character of the nation. Their dress consisted of loose linen garments, after the fashion of the Anglo-Saxons, which were decorated, in their opinion, with broad stripes of variegated colours. The legs and feet were clothed in long hose, and open sandals; and even in the security of peace a trusty sword was constantly close at hand. Vered, the orator, in his oration upon the strange appearance and horrid aspect, often concealed a gentle and generous disposition; and as soon as the rage of battle had subsided, the captives and subjects were sometimes surprised by the humanity of the victor. The vices of the ancients were the effect of ignorance, of intoxication; their virtues are the most laudable, as they were not affected by the hypocrisy of social manners, not imposed by the rigid constraint of laws and education. I should not be apprehensive of deviating from my subject, if it were in my power to delineate the private life of the conquerors of Italy, and I shall relate with pleasure the adventurous gallantry of Autharis, which breathes the true spirit of chivalry and romance.

After the loss of his promised bride, a Merovingian princess, he sought in marriage the daughter of the king of Bavaria; and Garibald accepted the alliance of this Italian monarch. Impatient of the slow progress of negotiation, the ardent lover escaped from his palace, and visited the court of Bavaria in the train of his own embassy. At the public audience, the unknown stranger advanced to the throne of the king of Germany. The ambassador, who was indeed the minister of state, but that he alone was the friend of Autharis, who had trusted him with the delicate commission of making a faithful report of the charms of his spouse. Theudelinda was summoned to undertake this important examination, and after a pause of three days, he hailed her as so amiable and so humble, that it was necessary to consult the ancient laws of Italy, and the princess was to present a cup of wine to the first of her new subjects. By the command of her father, she obeyed: Autharis received the cup in his turn, and, in restoring it to the princess, he secretly touched her hand, and drew his own finger over her face and lips. In the evening, Theudelinda imparted to her nurse the indirect familiarity of the stranger, and was comforted by the assurance, that such boldness of nature, such放肆, such audacity, must, if he were the descendant of Autharis, "such are the strokes of the king of the Lombards." On the approach of a French army, Garibald and his daughter took refuge in the dominions of their ally; and the marriage was consummated in the palace of Vered. At the end of one year, it was agreed, by the voice of Autharis; but the virtues of Theudelinda had endeared her to the nation, and she was permitted to bestow, with her hand, the sceptre of the Italian kingdom.

From this fact, as well as from similar examples, it appears that the Lombards possessed freedom to elect their sovereign, and sense to decline the frequent use of that dangerous privilege. The public revenue arose from the produce of land, and the profits of justice. When the independent character of their prince was consummated, the throne of his father, he restored the administration of justice with a fair mixture of the respective domains. The proudest nobles aspired to the honours of servitude near the person of their prince; he reformed the fidelity of his vassals by the precarious gift of pensions and benefices; and atoned for the injuries of war, by the rich foundation of monasteries and churches. In peace a judge, a leader in war, he never usurped the powers of a sole and absolute legislator. The king of Italy convened the national assemblies in the palace, of which in probability, he was the chief. The representatives of ninety hundred pieces of gold declined a just sense of the value of a simple citizen. Less atrocious injuries, a wound, a fracture, a blow, an opprobrious word, were measured with scrupulous and almost ridiculous diligence; and the prudence of the

---

* Their ignorance is proved by the silence even of those who professed--treatise of the arts of hunting and the history of animals. Aristotle, (Hist. Animal. L. i. c. 30, tom. i. p. 395, and the Notes of his last editor, M. Camus, tom. ii. p. 364) Pinyuy, (Hist. Natur. l. i. c. 10,) Aelian, (de Natur. Animal. l. i. c. 42,) and perhaps Homer, (Odyss. xxix. 127.) Their ignorance of the true size and common grace between the hawks and the Thracian falcons, may be illustrated from a small extract. See the annotated description of M. de Buffon, Hist. Naturelle, tom. xvi. p. 239, &c.

Script. Barum, Italiam, tom. i. part ii. p. 129. This is the sixteenth law of the emperor Lewis the pious. His father Charlemagne had falcons in his household as well as hunters. (Memoires sur l'Ancienne Chevalerie, par M. de St. Palaye, tom. iii. p. 173.) I observe in the laws of Rotharis in more and more of the art of the king's park, (not 222,) and in Gaul, in the sixth century, it is celebrated by St. Gildas.

Script. Italiam multiorem circa quos habitant. Aulus (p. 207-208.) The council of Thaton has given the title of Amphilochus to the arms of a murderer.

* Paul, l. c. 22. The first dissertations of Muratori, and the first volume of Giannone's history, may be consulted for the state of the kingdom of Italy.

 Giannone (Istoria Civile di Napoli, tom. i. p. 292,) has justly censured the impertinence of Boccaccio, (Gio. iii. Notici. 2,) who, without regard to the existence of the ancient laws, has given the title of Amphilochus to the arms of a murderer.

LEGISLATOR encouraged the ignoble practice of bartering honour and revenge for a pecuniary compensation. The ignorance of the Lombards, in the state of paganism or christianity, gave implicit credit to the motives and misdeeds of witchcraft; but the judges of the seventeenth century might have been instructed and confounded by the wisdom of Rohliris, who derides the absurd superstition, and protects the wretched victims of popular or judicial cruelty. The same spirit of a legislator, who is a benefactor food for the ways of life and misfortune to the universal, at length concludes its season, by dismissing, on the ground of the Lombards, those who admitted the bishops of Italy to a seat in their legislative councils. But the success of their kings is marked with virtue and ability; the troubled scenes of their annals are adorned with fair intervals of peace, order, and domestic happiness; and the Romans enjoyed a milder and more equitable government than any of the other kingdoms which had been founded on the ruins of the western empire.

Misery of Rome

Amidst the arms of the Lombards, and under the despotism of the Greeks, we again inquire into the fate of Rome, which had reached, about the year 800, the sixth lowest period of her depression. By the removal of the seat of empire, and the successive loss of the provinces, the sources of public and private opulence were exhausted; the lofty tree, under whose shade the historians of their brethren, who were to be destroyed together like dogs, and dragged away into distant slavery beyond the sea and the mountains. Such incessant alarms must annull the pleasures and interrupt the labours of a rural life; and the Campagna of the cloister and the wilderness, in which the land is barren, the waters are impure, and the air is infectious. Curiosity and ambition no longer attracted the nations to the capital of the world; but if chance or necessity directed the steps of a wandering stranger, he contemplated with horror the vacancy and solitude of the city, and might be tempted to ask, Where is the senate, and where are the people? In a season of excessive rains, the Tiber swelled above its banks, and rushed with irresistible violence into the valleys of the seven hills. A pestilential disease arose from the stagnation of the deluge, and so rapid was the course in the midst of a solitude, which implored the mercy of heaven. A society in which marriage is encouraged and industry prevails, soon repairs the accidental losses of pestilence and war; but the foreign domination of the Romans was condemned to hopeless indigence and celibacy, the depopulation was constant and visible, and the gloomy enthusiasts might expect the approaching failure of the human race. Yet the number of citizens still exceeded the measure of subsistence; their power was supplied by citizens themselves, from Sicily or Egypt; and the frequent repetition of famine betrays the inattention of the emperor to a distant province. The edifices of Rome were exposed to the same ruin and decay; the mouldering fabrics were easily overthrown by inundations, tempests and earthquakes. It was a form in proof of national ruin, a typical advantage of stations, excided in their base triumph over the ruins of antiquity.

Misery of Rome

It is commonly believed, that pope Gregory the first attacked the temples and mutilated the statues of the city; that, by the command of the barbarian, the Palatine library was reduced to ashes, and that the history of Livy was the peculiar mark of his absurd and mischievous fanaticism. The writings of Gregory himself reveal his implacable aversion to the monuments of classic genius; and he points his severest censure against the profane learning of a bishop, who taught the art of grammar, and who studied the Latin orations, and pronounced in the same voice the praises of Jupiter and those of Christ. But the evidence of his destructive rage is double and recent: the temple of Peace, or the theatre of Marcus, have been demolished by the slow operation of ages, and a form of 430 was impressed on the copies of Virgil and Livy in the countries which were not subject to the ecclesiastical dictator.

The tombs and ruins of the city were neither more the spoil of the barbarians, nor a stadium of the pious. The tomb and relics of the saints were preserved from the heathen, and the destruction of the saracens, and the subversion of the state, and the preservation of the nation. But the relics of the apostles were guarded by miracles and invisible terrors; and it was not without fear that the pious had approached the object of his worship.

It was for these reasons, that it was dangerous to be held, the bodies of the saints and martyrs from the purest motives presumed to disturb the repose of the sanctuary, were afflicted by visions, or punished with sudden death. The unreasonable request of an emperor, who wished to deprive the Romans of their sacred treasure, the head of St. Paul, was rejected with the deepest abhorrence; and the pope asserted, most probably with truth, that a linen which had been sanctified in the neighbourhood of his body, or the filigree of his chain, which it was sometimes easy and sometimes impossible to obtain, possessed an equal degree of miraculous virtue. But the power as well as virility... of the apostles resided with living energy in the breasts of their successors; and the chair of St. Peter was filled under the reign of Maurice by the first and birth and praetorius, greatest of the name of Gregory. His reform of Gregorius's grandfather Felix had himself been pope, and indeed the bishop, who was already honored by the law of celibacy, his consecration must have been preceded by the death of his wife. The parents of Gregory, Sylvia and Gordian, were the noblest of the senate, and the most pious of the church of Rome; his father and mother were adorned among the ancients withvirgins; and his own figure with those of his father and mother were represented near three hundred years in a family portrait, which he offered to the monastery of St. Andrew. The design and colouring of this picture afford an honourable testimony, that the art of painting was cultivated by the Italians of the sixth century; but the most abject ideas must be entertained of their taste and learning, since the epistles of Gregory, his sermons, and his dialogues, are the work of a man who was second in erudition to none of his contemporaries: his birth and abilities had raised him to the office of prefect of the city, and he enjoyed the merit of renouncing the pomp and vanities of this world. His ample patrimony was dedicated to the foundation of seven monasteries; one in Rome, and six in Sicily; and it was the wish of Gregory to be buried with his predecessors in this life, and to have the glory only in the next. Yet his devotion, and it might be sincere, pursued the path which would have been chosen by a crafty and ambitious statesman. The talents of Gregory, and the splendour which accompanied his retreat, rendered him dear and useful to the emperors: his implied obedience has been always inculcated as the first duty of a monk. As soon as he had received the character of deacon, Gregory was sent to reside at the Byzantine court, the papa or minister of the apostolic see; and he boldly assumed, in the person of St. Peter, a tone of independence dignity, which would have been criminal and dangerous in the most illustrious layman of the empire. He returned to Rome with a just increase of reputation, and after a short exercise of the monastic virtues, he was dragged from the cloister to the papal throne, by the nominating care of the clergy and people. He alone resisted, or seemed to resist, his own elevation; and his humble petition, that Maurice would be pleased to reject the choice of the Romans, could only serve to exalt his character in the eyes of the emperor and the public. When the fatal mandate was pronounced, Gregory solicited the aid of some of his friends to convey him in a barge beyond the gates of Rome, and modestly concealed himself some days among the woods and mountains, till his retreat was discovered, as it is said, by a celestial light.

The pontificate of Gregory the Great, which lasted thirteen years six months and ten days, is one of the most edifying periods of the history of the church. His virtues and even his faults, a singular mixture of simplicity and cunning, of pride and humility, of sense and supposition, were happily suited to his station and to the temper of the times. In his rival, the patriarch of Constantinople, he condemned the antichristian title of universal bishop, which the successor of St. Peter was too haughty to confer on the patriarch of Rome; his spiritual and the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Gregory were confined to the triple character of bishop of Rome, primate of Italy, and apostle of the west. He frequently ascended the pulpit, and kindled, by his rule, though pathetic, eloquence, the congenial passions of the congregation of the church. In this life, the scripture was interpreted and applied, and the minds of the people, depressed by their present calamities, were directed to the hopes and fears of the invisible world. His precepts and example defined the model of the Roman liturgy; the distribution of the parishes, the calendar of festivals, the order of processions, the service of the priests and deacons, the variety and change of sacerdotal garments. Till the last days of his life, he officiated in the canon of the mass, which continued above three hours; the Gregorian chant has preserved the vocal and instrumental music of the theatre, and the rough voices of the barbarians attempted to imitate the melody of the Roman school. Experience had shewn him the efficacy of these solemn and pompous rites, to soothe the distress, to confirm the faith, to mitigate the sufferings, and to dispel the fear, of the Roman people; and he confidently gave their tendency to promote the reign of priesthood and superstition. The bishops of Italy and the adjacent islands acknowledged the Roman pontiff as their special metropolitan. Even the existence, the authority, the sanctity of the succession of the pope, without the consent of the church of Rome, was determined by his absolute discretion: and his successful inroads into the provinces of Greece, of Spain, and of Gaul, might countenance the most lofty pretensions of succeeding popes. He interposed to prevent the abuses of popular elections; his jealous care maintained the purity of faith and discipline, and the apostolic shepherd assiduously watched over the faith and discipline of the subordinate pastors. Under his reign, the Arians of Italy and Spain were reconciled to the catholic church, and the conquest of Britain reflects glory on the name of Gregory the first. Instead of six legions, forty monks... were embroiled for that distant island, and the pontiff recommended the austere duties which forbade him to partake the perils of thir spiritual warfare. In less than two years he could announce to the archbishop of Alexandria, that they had baptized the king of Kent with ten thousand of his Angle-Saxons, and that the Roman missionaries, like those of the primitive church, were armed only with spiritual and supernatural powers. The credulity or the prudence of Gregory was always disposed to confirm the truths of religion by the evidence of ghosts, miracles, and resurrections; and posterity has paid to his memory the same tribute, which he freely granted to the virtue of hispnach or the daring spirit of his honours have been liberally bestowed by the authority of the popes, but Gregory is the last of their own order whom they have presumed to inscribe in the calendar of saints, and temporal. Their temporal power insensibly arose government: from the calamities of the times; and the Roman bishops, who have dwelt Europe and Asia with blood, were compelled to reign as the ministers of charity and peace. I. The church of Rome, as it has been formerly observed, was endowed with ample possessions in Italy, Sicily, and the more distant provinces; and Gregory, who had acquired a civil, and even criminal jurisdiction over their tenants and husbandmen. The successors of St. Peter administered his patrimony with the temper of avigilant and moderate landlord: and the epistles of Gregory are filled with salutary instructions to abstain from doubtful or vexatious lawsuits; to preserve the integrity of weights and measures; to grant every reasonable delay, and to reduce the capitation of the slaves of the deceased, who purchased the right of marriage by the payment of an arbitrary fine. The tont or the bank was a Roman institution which appeared to be of the Tiber, at the risk and expense of the pope, in the use of wealth, he acted like a faithful steward of the church and the poor, and liberally applied to their wants the inexhaustible resources of abstinence and order. The voluminous account of his receipts and disbursements was kept above three hundred years in the Lateran, as the model of christian economy. On the four great festivals, he divided their quarterly allowance to the clergy, to his domestics, to the monasteries, the churches, the places of burial, the almshouses, and the hospital of St. John the Baptist, in the rest of the diocese. On the first day of every month, he dis tributed to the poor, according to the season, their stated portion of corn, wine, cheese, vegetables, oil, fish, fresh provisions, clothes, and money; and his treasures were continually summed to satisfy, in his name, the extraordinary demands of indigence and merit. The constant distress of the sick and helpless, of strangers and pilgrims, was relieved by the bounty of every day, and of every hour; nor would the pontiff indulge himself in a frugal repast, till he had sent the dishes from his own table to the receptacle preserving of his compassion. The munificence of the times had reduced the nobles and matrons of Rome to accept, without a blush, the ben 71oence of the church; three thousand virgins received their food and raiment from the hand of their benefactor, and many bishops of Italy escaped from the barbarians to the hospitable threshold of the Vatican. Gregory might justly be styled the father of his country; and such was the extreme sensibility of his conscience, that, for the death of a beggar who had perished in the streets, he interceded himself among several days from the consent of several nations. The misfortunes of Rome involved the apostolical pastor in the business of peace and war; and it might be doubtful to himself, whether pious or ambitious prompted him to supply the place of his absent sovereign. Gregory awakened the emperor from a long slumber, exposed the guilt or incapacity of the exarch and his inferior ministers, complained that the veterans were withdrawn from Rome for the defence of Spoleto, encouraged the Italians to guard their cities and altars; and condescending, in the crisis of danger, to name the tribunes, and to direct the operations of the provincial troops. But the martial spirit of the pope was checked by the scruples of humanity and religion: the imposition of tribute, though it was employed in the Italian war, he freely condemned as odious and oppressive; while he protected, against the imperial edicts, the pious cowardice of the soldiers who desisted a military provocation and a monastic life. If we may credit his own declarations, it would have been easy for Gregory to exterminate the Lombards by their domestic actions, without leaving a king, a duke, or a count, to save that unfortunate nation from the vengeance of their foes. As a christian bishop, he preferred the salutary offices of peace; his mediation appeased the tumult of arms; but he was too conscious of the arts of the Greeks, and the passions of the Lombards, to engage his sacred promise for the observance of the truce. Disappointed in the hope of a general and lasting treaty, he presumed to save his country, without the consent of the emperor, and put himself at the head of the church. The sword of the enemy was sus pended over Rome; it was averted by the mild eloquence and seasonable gifts of the pontiff, who commanded the respect of heretics and barbarians. The merits of Gregory were treated by the Byzantine court with reproach and insult; but in the attachment of a grateful people, he found the purest reward of a citizen, and the best right of a sovereign.

CHAPTER VII.

Revolution of Persia after the death of Chosroes or Nu sebinshin.—His tyrant, is depo sed. — Usurpation of Bahrain.—Flight and restoration of Chosroes II. — His gratitude to the Romans. — The el og an of the Avars. — Revolt of the army against Maur ice. — His death. — Tyranny of Phocas. — Elevation of Heraclius. — The Persian war. — Chosroes' subdues Sy ria, Egypt, and Asia Minor.—Siege of Constantinople by the Persians and Avars. — Persian expeditions. — Victories and triumphs of Heraclius.

The conflict of Rome and Persia was caused of Rome prolonged from the death of Crassus to and Persia, the reign of Heraclius. An experience of seven hundred years might convince the rival nations of the impossibility of maintaining their conquests beyond the fatal limits of their existence. The emasculation of Trajan and Julian was awakened by the triumphs of Alexander, and the sovereignty of Persia indulged the ambitions hope of restoring the empire of Cyrus. Such extraordinary efforts of power and courage will always command the attention of posterity; but the events by which the fate of nations is not materially changed, leave a faint impression on the page of history, and the patience of the reader would be exhausted by the repetition of the same hostilities, undertaken without cause, prosecuted without glory, and terminated without effect. One part of the ties which unite the human species, unknown to the simple greatness of the senate and the Caesars, were assiduously cultivated by the Byzantine princes, and the memorials of their perpetual embassies重复, with the same uniform prolixity, the language of classical splendor, the impatient wish of immortal fame, the influence of their greatness, and the servile temper of the tributary Greeks. Lamenting the barren superfluity of materials, I have studied to compress the narrative of these interesting transactions; but the just Nushirvan is still amplidad as the model of oriental kings, and the ambition of his grandson Chosroes prepared the revolution of the east, which was speedily accomplished by the arms and the religion of the successors of Mahomet.

In the useless alternations that precede and follow the death of a prince and the sanguinary rights and wrongs of the distance of time, other of violating the peace which had been contracted between the two empires about four years before the death of Justinian. The sovereignty of Persia and India aspired to secure its existence under the name of peace. The province, the conquered of the east. After the death of Abrahah under the walls of Mecca, the discord of his sons and brothers gave an easy entrance to the Persians; they chased the strangers of Abyssinia beyond the seas; and a native prince of the ancient Homestes was restored to the throne as the vassal or viceroy of the great Nushirvan. But the

was declared his resolution to avenge the injuries of his christian ally the prince of Abyssinia, as they suggested a decent pretence to discontinue the annual tribute, which was purely disguised by the name of pension. The churches of Persarmenia were oppressed by the intolerant spirit of the Magi; they secretly invoked the protector of the christians, and after the pious murder of their sages, the rebels were avowed and acknowledged by the brethren and posterity of the Roman emperor. The complaints of Nushirvan were disregarded by the Byzantine court; Justin yielded to the importunities of the Turks, who offered an alliance against the common enemy; and the Persian monarchy was threatened at the same instant by the united forces of the Parthians and the Persians, and of the save.

of four score the sovereign of the east would perhaps have chosen the peaceful enjoyment of his glory and his last war with greatness; but as soon as war became the Romans, inevitable, he took the field with the A.D. 572, &c., ancestry of youth, whilst the aggressor in the meanwhile his general Adaran advanced from Babylon, traversed the desert, passed the Euphrates, insulted the suburbs of Antioch, reduced to ashes the city of Apamea, and laid the spoils of Syria at the feet of his master, whose perseverance in the midst of winter at length subdued the bolhvar of the east, and brought the provinces of Syria, Mesopotamia, and Antiochian, to the banks of the river Oxus, from the confines of India. (Plln. Hist. Nat. vi. 21.)

of Asia, and his armies were received by the viceroy of the coast of Persia. (Bel's Travels, vol. p. 82—332.) He joyously observed, that such of the annexation of the Persians, which Persicor, near Adarman, the city, formed in A.D. 572, &c., by the hands of the neighboring Amazonian. Ptolemy, in Ptolemy, tom. i. p. 116, 1150.

of the history of the world I can only perceive two nations on the Caspian: 1. Of the Macedonians, when Ptolemy, the admiral of the kings of Syria, Macedon, and Athens, delivered an address to the river Oxus, from the confines of India. (Plln. Hist. Nat. vi. 21.)

of that year, the year of the elephant, or the defeat of Abrahah; (Gaznei. Vie de Mahomet, tom. i. p. 84, 90, &c.) and this account allows two years for the conquest of Yemen.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

The throne of Chosroes Nushirvan was filled by Hormuz or Hormisdas, the eldest of the most favoured of his sons. With the kingdoms of Persia and India, he inherited the reputation and example of his predecessors, and possessed the same valiant officers, and a general system of administration, harmonized by time and political wisdom to promote the happiness of the prince and people. But the royal youth enjoyed a still more valuable blessing, the friendship of a sage who had presided over his education, and who always preferred the advice of the interest of his pupil, his interest to his inclination. In a dispute with the Greek and Indian philosophers, Buzurg had once maintained, that the most grievous misfortune of life is old age without the remembrance of virtue; and our censure will that the same sovereign, for three years, to direct the councils of the Persian empire. His zeal was rewarded by the gratitude and docility of Hormuz, who acknowledged himself more indebted to his preceptor than to his parent; but when age and labour had impaired the strength, and perhaps the faculties, of this prudent counsellor, his son banished the youthful monarch to his own passions and those of his favourites. By the fatal vicissitude of human affairs, the same scenes were renewed at Ctesiphon, which had been exhibited in Rome after the death of Marcus Aemilius. The ministers of decay and corruption, who had been banished by the father, were recalled and cherished by the son; the disgrace and exile of the friends of Nushirvan established their tyranny; and virtue was driven by degrees from the mind of Hormuz, from his palace, and from the government. He never suspected his own retirement, and the ears of the king, informed him of the progress of disorder, that the provincial governors flew to their prey with the fierce despair of lions and eagles, and that their rapine and injustice would teach the most loyal of his subjects to abhor the name and authority of their sovereign. The sincerity of this advice was punished without death, the murmurs of the cities were despaired, their tumults were quelled by military execution; the intermediate powers between the throne and the people were abolished; and the childish vanity of Hormuz, who affected the daily use of the tiara, was fond of attendant the blood of the descendants and the tyrants, who reigned the master of his kingdom. In every word, and in every action, the son of Nushirvan degenerated from the virtues of his father. His aversion defrauded the troops; his jealous cuprice degraded the satraps; the palace, the tribunals, the waters of the Tigris, were staled by their blood and that of the tyrants, who exulted in the sufferings and execution of thirteen thousand victims. As the excuse of his cruelty, he sometimes descended to observe, that the fears of the Persians would be productive of hatred, and that their hatred must terminate in rebellion; but he forgot that his own guilt and folly had inspired the sentiments which he deplored, and prepared the event which he so justly apprehended. Exasperated by long and hopeless oppression, the provincials of Babylonia, Susa, and Carmania erected the standard of revolt. The princes of Arabia, India, and Scythia, refused the customary tribute to the unworthy successor of Nushirvan. The arms of the Romans, in slow sieges and frequent inroads, affrighted the borders of Mesopotamia and Assyria; one of their generals professed himself the disciple of Scipio, and the soldiers were animated by a miraculous image of Christ, whose mild aspect should never have been displayed in the front of battle. At the same time, the eastern provinces of Persia were ravaged by the marauding bands of the Lakait, who passed the Oxus at the head of three or four hundred thousand Turks. The imprudent Hormuz accepted their perfidious and formidable aid; the cities of Khorasan or Baetiana were commanded to open their gates; the march of the barbarians towards the mountains of Hyrcania removed the correspondence of the Turkish and Roman arms; and their union must have subdued the throne of the house of Sassan.

Persia had been lost by a king; it was saved by a hero. After his revolt, Varanes or Brahram is stigmatized by the history of the time, the son of Hormuz as an ungrateful slave; the proud and ambiguous reproach of despotism, since he was truly descended from the ancient princes of Rey, one of the seven families whose splendour as well as substantial prerogatives outlived them above the heads of the Persian nobility. At the siege of Dara, the valour of Varanes was rewarded under the eyes of his father, and both the son and father successively promoted him to the command of armies, the government of Media, and the superintendence of the palace. The popular prediction which marked him as the deliverer of Persia might be inspired by his lofty and extraordinary figure: the epithet Gobat is bestowed on him for the quality of dry wood; he had the strength and stature of a giant, and his savage countenance was fearfully compared to that of a wild cat. While the nation trembled, while Hormuz disguised his terror by the name of suspicion, and his servants continued their disloyalty under the mask of fear, Brahram alone displayed his undaunted courage and apparent fidelity: and as soon as he found that no more than twelve thousand soldiers would follow him against the enemy, he prudently declared, that to this fatal number heaven had reserved the honours of the triumph. The short and narrow descent of the Pole Rudbar or Hyrcanian rock, is the only pass through which an army can penetrate into the territory of Rej and the plains of Media. From the commanding heights, a band of resolute men might overwhelm with stones and darts the multitude of the Turkish host. The chief of the army ordered his son were transpierced with arrows; and the fugitives were left, without counsel or provisions, to the revenge of an injured people. The patriotism of the Persian general was stimulated by his affection for the city of his forefathers; in the hour of victory every present interest was overlooked, and every consideration vanished. The crowd and ardour of his mind was kindled by the gorgeous spectacles of beds, and Thrones, and tables of massy gold, the spoils of Asia, and the luxury of the hostile camp. A

1. See the imitation of Scipio in Theophrastus, L. ii. c. 114; the image of Christ, L. ii. c. 23. Hereafter I shall speak more fully of the Christian religion; I have almost said. This, if I am not mistaken, is the oldest writer of divine manufacture; but in the thousand years, many others issued from the same workshop.

2. D'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, tom. i. p. 729, 730. His grandeur and populosiness in the ninth century is exaggerated beyond the bounds of credibility; but Rej has been since ruined by war and the multitudes of the air. Chardin, Voyage en Perse, tom. i. p. 279, 280. D'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Oriental, tom. i. p. 714.

3. Theophrastus, L. ii. c. 18. The story of the seven Persians is told in an interesting and graceful manner in the third book of Herodotus; and their noble descendants are often mentioned, especially in the fragments of Caesar. Yet the venerable name of Orestes, the son of Ortholan, the son of Orestes, the son of the Persians of the palace, the son of Anaximander, the son of the Persians of the palace, is no longer employed, and it may not seem probable that the seven families would survive the revolution of Persia. This, however, is not represented by the seven minstrels (Diaz, de Regno Persico, L. ii. p. 190) and some Persian nobles, like the kings of Altas and the kings of the kingdom of Arachia and Armenia. (Herodotus, lib. i. xxx.) p. 577.) They claim their descent from the bold companions of the Saracen.

4. See an accurate description of this mountain by Olearius, (Voyage en Perse, p. 397, 398.) who ascended it with much difficulty and danger in his return from Eryptah to the Caspian sea.
prince of a less malignant temper could not easily have forgiven his benefactor, and the secret hatred of Hormouz was envenomed by a malicious report, that Bahram had privately retained the most precious fruits of his Turkish victory. But the approach of a Roman army on the side of the Arazes compelled the implied

7. As he expatiated on the advantages of order and obedience, the danger of innovation, and the inevitable discord of those who had encouraged each other to trample on their lawful and hereditary sovereign. By a pathetic appeal to their humanity, he extorted that pity which is seldom refused to the fallen fortunes of a king. While they beheld the unbridled and squalid appearance of the prisoner, his tears, his chains, and the marks of ignominious stripes, it was impossible to forget how recently they had adored the divine splendour of his diadem and purple. But an imperial magnificence was the only thing which could be presumed to vindicate his conduct, and to applaud the victories of his reign. He defined the duties of a king, and the Persian nobles listened with a smile of contempt; they were fired with indignation when he dared to vilify the character of Chosroes; and by the indirect offer of resigning the sceptre to the second of his sons, he subscribed his own condemnation, and sacrificed the life of his innocent favourite. The mangled bodies of the boy and his mother were exposed to the people: the eyes of Hormouz were pierced with a hot torch. The punishment of the eldest was succeeded by the execution of his eldest son. Chosroes had ascended the throne of Persia without guilt, and his piety strove to alleviate the misery of the abdicated monarch; from the dungeon he removed Hormouz to an apartment of the palace, supplied him with all the comforts of existence, and patiently endured the furious sallies of his resentment and despair. He might despise the resentment of a blind and unpopular tyrant, but the pain was trembling on his head, till he could subvert the power, or acquire the friendship, of the great Bahram, who sternly denied the justice of a revolution, in which himself and his soldiers, the true representatives of Persia, had never been consulted. The offer of a general amnesty, and of the second rank in his kingdom, was answered by an epistle from Bahram, friend of the gods, conqueror of men, and enemy of tyrants, the satrap of satraps, general of the Persian armies, and a prince adored with the title of eleven virtues. He commands Chosroes, the son of Hormouz, to shun the example and fate of his father, to confine the traitors who had been released from their chains, to deposit in some holy place the diadem which he had usurped, and to accept from his gracious benefactor the pardon of his faults and the government of a province. The rebel might not be proud, and the king most assuredly was not humble; but the one was prompt to forgive, and the other was prompt to condescend to the weakness, and even the modest language of his reply still left room for treaty and reconciliation. Chosroes led into the field the slaves of the palace and the populace of the capital: they beheld with terror the banners of a veteran army; they were encompassed and surprised by the revolutions of the general; and the satraps who had deposed Hormouz, received the punishment of their revolt, or expiated their first treason by a second and more criminal act of disloyalty. The life and liberty of Chosroes were saved, but he was reduced to the narrow limits of his own dominions, or some foreign land; and the implacable Bahram, anxious to secure an unquestionable title, hastily returned to the palace, and ended, with a bow-string, the wretched existence of the son of Nushirvan.

7. See the words of Theophylact, l. iv. ch. 7. See also Strabo, v. 7. 8. The Editors of the Roman lit. 420. This is genuine oriental bastard.

8. The text of Theophylact, l. iv. 7. is inaccurate. See the nobles and satraps. He was heard with decent attention as long as he expatiated on the advantages of order and obedience, the danger of innovation, and the inevitable discord of those who had encouraged each other to trample on their lawful and hereditary sovereign.
with his remaining friends; for whether he should lurk in the valleys of mount Caucasus, or fly to the tents of the Turks, or solicit the protection of the emperor. The long enmity of the successors of Artaxerxes and Constantine increased his reluctance to appear as a supplicant in a rival court; but he weighed the forces of the Romans, and prudently considered, that the necessity of a safe retreat, and the escape more easy, and their succours more effectual. Attended only by his concubines, and a troop of thirty guards, he secretly departed from the capital, followed the banks of the Euphrates, traversed the desert, and halted at the frontiers of Syria, where he was recognised. About the third watch of the night, the Roman prefect was informed of his approach, and he introduced the royal stranger to the fortress at the dawn of day. From thence the king of Persia was conducted to the more honourable residence of Hierapolis; and Maurice dissembled his pride, and displayed his benevolence at the reception of the letters and ambassadors of the grandson of Nushirvan. They humbly represented the vicissitudes of fortune and the common interest of princes, exaggerated the ingratitude of Bahram, the agent of the evil principle, and urged with specious arguments, that it was for the advantage of the Romans themselves to support the two monarchies which balance the world, the two great luminaries by whose salutary influence it is vivified and adorned. The anxiety of Chosroes was soon relieved by the assurance, that the emperor had counted on the grace of his majesty, and that Maurice prudently declined the expense and delay of his useless visit to Constantinople.

In the name of his generous benefactor, a rich diadem was presented to the fugitive prince, with an insensible gift of jewels and gold; a powerful army was associated with him, and he, under the command of the valiant and faithful Narses, and this general, of his own nation, and his own choice, was directed to pass the Tigris, and never to sheathe his sword till he had restored Chosroes to the throne of his ancestors. The enterprise, however splendid, was necessarily unsuccessful.

His return, Persia had already repented of her fatal rashness, which betrayed the heir of the house of Sassan to the ambition of a rebellious subject; and the bold refusal of the Magi to consecrate his usurpation, compelled Bahram to assume the sceptre, regardless of it was for the advantage of the nation. The palace was soon distracted with conspiracy, the city with tumult, the provinces with insurrection; and the cruel execution of the guilty and the suspected served to irritate rather than subdue the public discord. No sooner had the prince himself appeared to display his own and the Roman banners beyond the Tigris, than he was joined, each day, by the increasing multitudes of the nobility and people; and as he advanced, he received from every side the grateful offerings of the keys of his cities and the heads of his enemies. As soon as Modan was freed from the presence of the usurper, the loyal inhabitants obeyed the first summons of Mebodes at the head of only two thousand horse, and Chosroes accepted the sacred and precious ornaments of the palace as the pledge of their truth, and a promise of his approaching success. After the junction of the imperial troops, which Bahram vainly struggled to prevent, the contest was decided by two battles on the banks of the Zab, and the confines of Media. The Romans, with the faithful Persians, and the final victory, sixty thousand, while the whole force of the usurper did not exceed forty thousand men: the two generals signalized their valour and ability, but the victory was chiefly attended to the merit of justice and discipline. With the remnant of a broken army, Bahram fled towards the eastern provinces of the Oxus: the enmity of Persia reconciled him to the Turks; but his days were shortened by the poison, perfidious from the stings of remorse and despair, and the bitter remembrance of lost glory. Yet the modern Persians still commemorate the exploits of Bahram; and some excellent laws have prolonged the duration of his troubled and transitory reign.

The restoration of Chosroes was celebrated with feasts and executions; and the music of the royal banquet was often disturbed by the groans of dying or mulcted criminals. A general pardon might have diffused comfort and tranquillity through a country which had been shaken to the roots by the late revolution. But the sanguine temper of Chosroes is blamed, we should learn whether the Persians had not been accustomed either to dread the rigour, or to despise the weakness, of their sovereign. The revolt of Bahram, and the consequent disaster, was impartially punished by the revenge or justice of the Persians; and the merit of Bindoes himself could not purify his hand from the guilt of royal blood; and the son of Hormouz was desirous to assert his own innocence, and to vindicate the sanctity of kings. During the vigour of the Roman power, several princes were overthrown by the pressure of Persia by the arms and the authority of the first Cassars. But their new subjects were soon disgusted with the vices or virtues which they had imbibed in a foreign land; the instability of their dominion gave birth to a vulgar observation, that the choice of Rome was solicitted and rejected with equal ardour by the capricious levity of oriental slaves. But the glory of Maurice was conspicuous in the long and fortunate reign of his son and his ally. A band of a thousand Romans, who continued to guard the person of Chosroes, proclaimed his confidence in the fidelity of the strangers; his posterity, or the suspicion of an attempt to dismiss this unpopular aid, he steadfastly professed the same gratitude and reverence to his adopted father; and till the death of Maurice, the peace and alliance of the two empires were faithfully maintained. Yet the mercenary friendship of the Roman prince had been purchased with costly and important gifts; the strong cities of Martyropolis and Dura were restored, and the Persarmen became the willing subjects of an empire, whose eastern limit was extended, beyond the example of former times, as far as the banks of the Euphrates and the neighbourhood of the Caspian. A pious hope was indulged, that the church as well as the state might triumph in this revolution: but if Chosroes had sincerely listened to the christian bishops, the impression was erased by the zeal and eloquence of the Magi; if he was armed with philosophic indifference, he would have accommodated his whole life, or rather his professions, to the various circumstances of an exile and a sovereign. The imaginary conversion of the king of Persia was reduced to a local and superstitious veneration for Sergius, one of the saints of Antioch, 4 Experiments cognosci est barbarus malle Romae populus rege quam habet. These experiments are admirably represented in the Experimenta et experimentis, A.D. 591—593 (Annual i. 32—41, and Mechermatex. A.D. 591, 592—594). The eyes of Tacitus seems to have transfigured the camp of the Caesars and the walls of the harem.

5 Sergius and his companion Bacchus, who are said to have suffered in the persecution of Diocletian, obtained a posthumous apotheosis, and were supposed to have appeared in France, Italy, Constantinople, and the east. Their tomb at Rapsafe was famous for miracles, and that Syrian town acquired the more honourable who heard his prayers and appeared to him in dreams; he enriched his shrine with offerings of gold and silver, and ascribed to his invisible patron the success of his arms, and the propagation of Siva, a devout christian and the best beloved of his wives. The beautiful and chaste, her musical and tuneful songs, her orators, and her或lents, are still famous in the history or rather in the romances of the east: her own name is expressive, in the Persian tongue, of sweetness and grace; and the epithet of Pariz alludes to the charms of her royal lover. Yet Sira never shared the passion which she inspired, and the pride of Chosroes was tortured by a jealous doubt, that while he possessed her, she had bestowed her affections on a meaner favourite.

8 VOL. IV.—P

Pride, policy, and power of the chagan of the Avars.

While the majesty of the Roman name was reviv'd in the east, the prospect of Europe is less pleasing and less glorious. By the departure of the Lombards, and the ruin of the Goths, the balance of power was destroyed on the Danube; and the Avars spread their permanent dominion from the foot of the Alps to the sea-coast of the Euxine. The reign of Avar power was brightened by the magnificent lives of their chagans, who occupied the rustic palace of Attila, appears to have imitated his character and policy; but as the same scenes were repeated in a smaller circle, a minute representation of the copy would be deteftible, as well as foreign to the original.

The pride of the second Justin, of Tiberiius, and Maurice, was humbled by a proud barbarian, more prompt to inflict, than exposed to suffer, the injuries of war; and as often as Asia was threatened by the Persian arms, Europe was oppressed by the dangerous inroads, or costly friendship, of the Avars. When the Avars' envoys approached the presence of the chagan, they were commanded to wait at the door of his tent, till, at the end perhaps of ten or twelve days, he condescended to admit them. If the substance or the style of the words deserved his ear, he inquired, with a real or affected fury, their own dignity, and that of their prince; their baggage was plundered, and their lives were only saved by the promise of a richer present and a more respectful address. But Asia's sacred ambassadors enjoyed and abused an unhonoured licence in their passage through the empire.

The great and the more important amours, the increase of tribute, or the restitution of captives and deserts; and the majesty of the empire was almost equally degraded by a base compliance, or by the false and fearful excesses, with which they eluded such insolent demands. The chagan had never seen an elephant; and his curiosity was excited by the strange, and perhaps fabulous, portrait of that wonderful animal. At his command, one of the largest elephants of the imperial stables was sent to him. But the chagan, in a maniacal condition, conveyed his precious train to the royal village in the plains of Hungary. He surveyed the enormous beast with surprise, with disgust, and possibly with terror; and smiled at the vain industry of the Romans, who, in search of such useless rarities, could explore the limits of the Hid and sea. He wished, at the destruction of the emperor, to repose in a golden bed. The wealth of Constantinople, and the skilful diligence of her artists, were instantly devoted to the gratification of his caprice; but when the work was finished, he rejected with scorn a present so unworthy the majesty of a great king. These were the casual sallies of his pride, but the avarice of the chagan was a more steady and tractable passion; a rich and regular supply of silk apparel, furniture, and plate, introduced the rudiments of art and luxury among the tents of the Scythian and the Avar. In the course of life, a preference was shown for pepper and cinnamon of India; the annual subsidy or tribute was raised from fourscore to one hundred and twenty thousand pieces of gold; and after each hostile interruption, the payment of the arrears, with infinite delay, was again the condition of the origin of the new treaty. In the language of a barbarian, without guile, the princes of the Avars affected to complain of the insincerity of the Greeks, yet he was not inferior to the most civilized nations in the refinements of dissimulation and perfidy. As the successor of the Lombards, the chagan asserted his claim to the important city of Sirmium, the ancient bulwark of the Illyrian provinces. The plains of the Lower Hungary were covered with the Avar horse, and a fleet of large boats was built in the Hercynian wood, which was designed to transport into the Save the materials of a bridge. But as the strong garrison of Singidunnin, which commanded the conflux of the two rivers, might have stopped their passage and baffled his designs, he dispelled their apprehensions by a solemn oath, that his views were not hostile to the empire, and that he was only anxious to transport the materials of a bridge. As soon as he rose from his knees, he accelerated the labour of the bridge, and despatched an envoy to proclaim what he no longer wished to conceal. "Inform the emperor," said the perfidious Bajan, "that Sirmium is invested on every side. Advise his prudence to withdraw the citizens, and consider their effects, which are dangerous and alarming."

The Greeks only describe her as a Woman by birth, a christian by religion; but she is represented as the daughter of the emperor Maurice in the Persian and Turkish romances, which celebrate the love of Khosro for Schirin, of Schirin for Perbad, the most beautiful youth of the east. D'Herbelot, Biblib, Orient, p. 728, 157, 263.

The whole series of the tyranny of Hormuz, the revolt of Bahram, and the flight and restoration of Chosroes, as related by two contemporary Greeks—more correctly by Eværus (I. v. c. 16, 17, 18, 19.) and most diffusely by Thiotheby Theophylact Somococius (I. iii. c. 6, 15, 16, c. 37, &c.) proceeding copiously from the works of Zephania and Codrus, can only transcribe and abridge. The Christian Arabs, Evænthus (Lampra, h. c. 369, p. 206—209) and Aflabihaurumus (Dyssan, p. 86—90) appear to have consulted some particular memoirs. The great Persian historians of the fifteenth century, Wirked and Censured, are only to be known by the imperfect extracts of Strickland, (Tarikh, p. 129—135.) Texiera, or rather Schōner, (Hist. of Persia, p. 152—154.) A Florentine historian, (de l'Academy, tom. vii. p. 283—291.) and D'Herbelot, (avec méme, Historique de Bahram, p. 472.) were perfectly satisfied of their authority, I could wish those original materials had been more copious. The quality and power of the chagan may be taken from MENANDER (Excerpt. Lec. p. 117, &c.) and Thiotheby, (I. c. 3, &c.) whose abilities are not much concerned about the distinction of the Avar than the Roman prince. The predecessors of Bajan had tasted the insatiable appetite, and were savagely possessed; Bajan, Hist. Des Peoples Barbaros, tom. xii. p. 545.) The chagans who invaded Italy A.D. 611, (Muratori, Amulii, tom. vi. p. 365.) was then bereft of state, foretasted, (Paul Warnefried, de Gris, Langob. I. v. c. 583. the son, perhaps, or the grandson, of Bajan.
and to resign a city which it is now impossible to relieve or defend. Without the hope of relief, the defence was abandoned, and, the walls were still untouched; but famine was enclosed within the walls, till a merciful capitulation allowed the escape of the naked and hungry inhabitants. Singidunum, at the distance of fifty miles, experienced a more cruel fate: the buildings were razed, and the vanquished people were condemned to servitude and exile. Yet the ruins of Sirmium are no longer visible; the advantageous situation of Singidunum soon attracted a new colony of Sclavonians, and the conflux of the Save and Danube is still guarded by the fortifications of Belgrade, or the White City, so often and so obstinately defended beyond the Salisians' arms. From Belgrade to the walls of Constantinople a line may be measured of six hundred miles: that line was marked with flames and with blood; the horses of the Avars were alternately bathed in the Bazine and the Adriatic; and the Roman pontiff, alarmed by the approach of a more savage enemy, was reduced to cherish the Lombards as the protectors of Italy. The despair of a captive, whom his country refused to ransom, disclosed to the Avars the invention and practice of military engines; but in the first attempts, they were rudely framed and awkwardly managed. The Avars, under their chief, Soven and Berea, of Philippopolis and Adrianople, soon exhausted the skill and patience of the besiegers. The warfare of Baian was that of a Tartar, yet his mind was susceptible of a humane and generous sentiment; he spared Anobius, whose summary waters had restored the health of the best beloved of his wives; and the Romans confess, that their starving army was fed and dismissed by the liberality of a foe. His empire extended over Hungary, Poland, and Prussia, from the mouth of the Danube to that of the Oder; and his new subjects were divided and transplanted by the jealousy policy of the conquerors. The eastern regions of Germany, which had been left vacant by the emigration of the Vandals, were replenished with Sclavonian colonists; the same tribes are discovered in the neighbourhood of the Adrian and of the Baltic, and with the name of Baian himself, the Illyrian cities of Nyessa and Lissa are again found in the heart of Silesia. In the disposition both of his troops and of the provinces, the chagan exposed the vassals, whose lives he disregarded: to the first assault; and the swords of the enemy were blunted before they encountered the native valour of the Avars.

With the disunion alliance restored the ancient troopers of the east to the defence of Emperor; 592-602; rope; and Mauricius, who had supported for ten years the insolence of the chagan, declared his resolution to march in person against the barbarians. In the space of two centuries, none of the successors of Theodosius had appeared in the field, their lives were supinely spent in the palace of Constantinople; and the Greeks could no longer understand the danger, or the decrees of the empire. The emperor Maurice was opposed by the grave flattery of the senate, the timid superstition of the patriarch, and the tears of the empress Constantina; and they all conjured him to devolve on some manner general the fatigues and perils of a Scythian campaign. Deaf to their advice and entreaty, the emperor boldly advanced seven miles from the capital; the sacred ensign of the cross was displayed in the front, and Maurice reviewed, with conscious pride, the arms and numbers of the veterans who had fought and conqueror against the insurmountable Avars. New scenes crowned his progress by sea and land; he solicited, without success, a miraculous answer to his nocturnal prayers; his mind was conferred by the death of a favourite horse, the encounter of a wild boar, a storm of wind and rain, and the birth of a monstrous child; and he forgot that the best of emperors is to muzzle our sword in the defence of our country. Under the pretence of receiving the ambassadors of Persia, the emperor returned to Constantinople, exchanged the thoughts of war for those of devotion, and disappointed the public hope, by his absence and the choice of his lieutenants. The blinding parley for the promotion of his brother Peter, whom he fled from the barbarians, from his own soldiers, and from the inhabitants of a Roman city. That city, if we may credit the resemblance of name and character, was the famous Azinum, which had alone repelled the tempests of Attila. The example of the warlike youth was propagated to succeeding generations; and they obtained, from the first or the second Justin, an honourable privilege, that their valour should be always reserved for the defence of their native country. The brother of Maurice attempted to violate this privilege, and to mingle a patriotic band with the mercenaries of his camp; they retired to the church, he was not awed by the sanctity of the place; the people rose in their cause, the gates were shut, the ramparts were manned; and the cowardice of Peter was found equal to his arrogance and injustice. The military fame of Commentriodatus 5 is the object of satire or comedy rather than of serious history; since he was even deficient in the vile and vulgar qualification of personal courage. His solemn councils, strange evolutions, and secret orders, always supplied an apology for flight or delay. If he marched against the barbarians, the pleasant valley of Mount Hautus opposed him an insuperable barrier; in his retreat, he explored, with fearless curiosity, the most difficult and obscure paths, which had almost escaped the memory of the oldest native. The only blood which he lost was drawn, in a real or affected malady, by the lance of a surgeon; and his health, which fell with exquisite sensibility the approach of the barbarians, was uniformly restored by the repose and safety of the winter season. A prince who could promote and support this unworthy favourite must derive no glory from the accidental merit of his colleague. Peter in five successive battles, which seem to have been conducted with skill and resolution, seventeen thousand two hundred barbarians were made prisoners; near sixty thou-

5 See D'Aulibo, in the Memoires de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tom. xxiv. p. 412-413. The Sclavonic name of Belgrade is mentioned in the tenth century by Constantine Porphyrogennetos; the Latin appellation is Balgradum, Balamgrad; and Baian or Baianus, in the beginning of the ninth. (p. 413.)

6 Brenn. Annals, Eccles. A.D. 600, No. I. Paul Warndorf (p. iv. c. 38) relates their irruption into Frithi, and (c. 39) the captivity of his son-in-law Anobius. A.D. 637. The Sciri traversed the Hadrianian Wine country of Carantania, and made a descent in the territory of Sigmundus, (c. 57.)

7 Even the heptopolis, or movable tower, Theophrastus, l. B. 15, 17.

8 The arms and alliances of the chagan reached to the neighbour- hood of the Saxons, and the Danes were the western vassals of the chagan. The emperor Maurice conversed with some liberal harpers from that remote country, and only seems to have maintained a trade for a nation. (Theophrastus, l. B. 15, 17.

9 This is one of the most probable and luminous conjectures of the chagan of the Germanic period. See in the Deutsche, chagan de France, p. 565.) The Teuton and Serbi are found together near mount Cacass, in Hermon, and on the lower Elbe. Except the wildest traditions of the Boemian, &c. afford some colour to his hypothesis.

10 See Frederickus, in the Historians de France, tom. ii. p. 452. Baian died in the year 592. (Theophrastus, l. B. 15, 17.)

11 See See Appendix, p. 244. (According to a Slavonic compilation) 390-483, P. 424. Baian died in the year 592. (Theophrastus, l. B. 15, 17.)

12 See Appendix, p. 244. (According to a Slavonic compilation) 390-483, P. 424. Baian died in the year 592. (Theophrastus, l. B. 15, 17.)

13 This noble verse, which unites the spirit of an hero with the reason of a sage, may prove that Homer was in every light superior to his age and eminence.
sand, with four sons of the chagan, were slain: the Roman general surprised a peaceful district of the Gepids, who slept under the protection of the Avars; and his last trophies were erected on the banks of the Danube. Since the death of Teutoburg, the iron of the empire had not penetrated so deeply into the old Dacia; yet the success of Priscus was transient and barren: he was soon recalled, by the apprehension, that Baian, with dauntless spirit and recruited forces, was preparing to avenge his defeat under the auspices of Constantinople.

The theory of war was not more fatal to man armies; similar to the camps of Caesar and Trajan, than to those of Justinian and Maurice. The iron of Tuscany or Pontus still retained the keenest temper from the skill of the Byzantine workmen. The magazines were plentifully stored with every species of offensive and defensive arms. In the construction and use of ships, engines, and fortifications, the barbarians admired the superior ingenuity of a people whom they so often vanquished in the field. The science of tactics, the art of evolutions, and stratagems of antiquity was transcribed, and studied in the books of the Greeks and Romans. But the solitude or degeneracy of the provinces could no longer supply a race of men to handle those weapons, to guard those walls, to navigate those ships, and to reduce the theory of war into the practice of successful practice. The Gepids and the Goths, the barbarians of the east, and the Saracens of the west, had been formed without a master, and expired without a disciple. Neither honour, nor patriotism, nor generous superstition, could animate the lifeless bodies of slaves and strangers, who had succeeded to the honours of the legions; it was in the camp alone that the emperor should have exercised a despotic command; it was only in the camp that his authority was disbelieved and insulted: he appeared and inflamed with gold the licentiousness of the troops; but their vices were inherent, their virtues were accidental, and their costly maintenance exhausted the substance of a state which they were unable to defend. After a long and pernicious indulgence, the cure of this inveterate evil was undertaken by Maurice; but the rash attempt, which drew destruction on his own head, tended only to aggravate the disease. A reform should be exempt from the suspicion of interest, and he must possess the confidence and esteem of those whom he proposes to reclaim. The troops of Maurice might listen to the voice of a victorious leader; they disdained the admonitions of statesmen and sophists, and when they rewarded an edtict with an exclamation of their discontent, they pay the price of their arms and clothing, they executed the avarice of a prince insensible of the dangers and fatigues from which he had escaped. The camps both of Asia and Europe were agitated with frequent and furious seditions: the enraged soldiers of Edessa pursued, with reproaches, with threats, with wounds, their trembling generals; they overturned the statues of the emperor, cast stones against the miraculous image of Christ, and either rejected the yoke of all civil and military laws, or instituted a dangerous model of voluntary subjugation. The monarch, always distant and often deceived, was incapable of yielding or persisting, according to the exigence of the moment. But the fear of a general revolt induced him too readily to accept any act of valor, or any expression of loyalty, as an atonement for the popular offence; the new reform was abolished as hastily as it had been announced, and the troops, instead of punishment and restraint, were agreeably surprised by a gracious proclamation of immunities and of pardons. Since the death of Teutoburg, the army of the empire had not imbibed the spirit of Teutoburg. The inconstancy, the peremptory usage of the emperor, the passing of edicts without the right of appeal, the blindness of the law courts, the tyrannical and relentless gifts of the emperor; their insolence was elated by the discovery of his weakness and their own strength: and their mutual hatred was inflamed beyond the desire of forgiveness or the hope of reconciliation. The historians of the times adopt the charges of Fanariot, that Maurice used to employ the troops whom he had laboured to reform; the misconduct and favour of Constantiopolis are imputed to this malevolent design; and every age must condemn the inhumanity or avarice of a prince, who, by the trilling ransom of six thousand pieces of gold, as soon as have prevented the massacre of twelve thousand prisoners in the hands of the chagan, and revolution. In the just fervor of indignation, an order was signified to the army of the Danube, that they should spare the magazines of the province, and establish the winter quarters in the hospitable vicinity of the Avars. The measure of their grievances was full: they pronounced Maurice unworthy to reign, expelled or slaughtered his faithful adherents, and under the command of Phocas, a simple centurion, returned by hasty marches to the neighborhood of Constantinople. Notwithstanding the disunion, the discord, the division, the military disorders of the third century were again revived; yet such was the novelty of the enterprise, that the insurgents were awed by their own rashness. They hesitated to invest their favourite with the vacant purple; and while they rejected all treaty with Maurice himself, they held a friendly correspondence with his son Theodosius, and with Germanus the father-in-law of the royal youth. So obscure had been the former condition of Phocas, that the emperor was ignorant of his name and character of his rival; but as soon as he learnt that the centurion, though held in sedition, was timid in the face of danger, "Alas!" cried the despising prince, "if he is a coward, he will surely be a murderer." Yet if Constantinople had been firm, the revolt of Constanza, the second chagan, the third chagan, might have stunned Phocas; he spent his fury against the walls; and the rebel army would have been gradually consumed or reconciled by the prudence of the emperor. In the games of the circes, which he repeated with unusual pomp, Maurice disguised, with smiles of confidence, the anxiety of his heart. He had been deducted from the fasces, the factions, and flattered their pride by accepting from their respective tribunes a list of nine hundred blues and fifteen hundred greens, whom he affected to esteem as the solid pillars of his throne. Their treacherous or languid support betrayed his weakness and hastened his fall: the green faction were the secret accomplices of the rebels, and the blues recommended lenity and moderation in a contest with their Roman brethren. The rigid and parimonious virtues of Maurice had long since alienated the hearts of his subjects: he was beloved by his race as a man, but detested by all who deplored the impiety of his proceedings. A fanatic monk ran through the streets with a drawn sword, denouncing against him the sentence of God, and a vile plethora, who represented his countenance as being seated on an ass,? and pursued by the imprecations of the multitude. The emperor suspected the popularity

1 Theophylact and Theophanes see ignorant of the conspiracy of Maurice. Those charges, so unfavourable to the memory of the emperor, if they are true, as Cicero of the first mentioned, in his History of Constantine (iii. 20), from whence Zonaras (com. iii. 1. iv. p. 27. and the) Thucydides, with others, with a satirical view of his character. The History of the World (p. 298), has followed another computation of the time.
2 The discourse is all in the History of the World (p. 298), with a satirical view of his character. The History of the World (p. 298), has followed another computation of the time.
Maurice were kindly interred. His fate alone was remembered; and at the end of twenty years, in the month of Theophylactus, the mournful tale was interrupted by the tears of the audience.

In a small bark, the unfortunate Maurice, with his wife and nine children, escaped to the Asiatic shore, but the violence of the wind and weather caused the vessel of St. Anthony's near Chalcidon, from whence he despatched Theodosius, his eldest son, to implore the gratitude and friendship of the Persian monarch. For himself, he refused to fly: his body was tortured with severe pains, his mind was enfeebled by superstition; he put off his life not for the duty of God, nor for the welfare of his soul. A fervent prayer and public prayer to the Almighty, that the punishment of his sins might be inflicted in this world rather than in a future life. After the abdication of Maurice, the two Leontias disputed the choice of an emperor; but the favourite of the blues, and Germanus himself was hurried along by the crowds, who rushed to the palace of Hecbolon, seven miles from the city, to adore the majesty of Phocas the centurion. A modest wish of resigning the purple to the rank and merit of Germanus was opposed by his resolute adversary, who, by the vote of the Senate and clergy, obeyed his summons, and as soon as the patriarch was assured of his orthodox belief, he consecrated the successful usurper in the church of St. John the Baptist. On the third day, amidst the acclamations of a thoughtless people, Phocas made his public entry in a chariot drawn by four white horses: the revolt of the troops was rewarded by a lavish donation, and the new sovereign, after visiting the palace, beheld from his throne the games of the hippodrome. In a dispute of precedence between the two factions, his partial judgment inclined in favour of the greens. Remember that Maurice, like Gregory the Great, resigned from the opposite side; and the indiscreet churlishness of the blues abominable and stimulated the cruelty of the tyrants. The deaths of defenders were dispatched to Chalcedon: they dragged the emperor from his sanctuary: and the five sons of Maurice were successively murdered before the eyes of their agonizing mother.

At each stroke, which felt in his heart, he found strength to reprove a pious exclamation: "Thou art just, O Lord! and thy judgments are righteous."

And such, in the last moments, was his contemplation of his own guilt. Yet he had renounced himself to the soldiers the pious falsehood of a nurse who presented her own child in the place of a royal infant. The tragic scene was finally closed by the execution of the emperor himself, in the twentieth year of his reign, and the sixty-third of his age. The bodies of the father and his five sons were cast into the sea, their heads were exposed at Constantinople to the insults or pity of the multitude, and it was not till some signs of putrefaction had appeared, that Phocas convined at the private burial of these venerable remains. In that grave, the faults and errors of

\[\text{Death of Maurice and his children. A.D. 602. Nov. 27.}\]

\[\text{They did only cast out a vague reproach—or had the emperor really listened to some obscure teacher of those ancient Greeks?}\]

\[\text{The church of St. Antoninus (whom I have not the honour to know) was torn down to the very foundations.}\]

\[\text{The port of Ephesus, where Maurice and his children were murdered, is described by Cyril (De Bogophoro Thracio, I. cit. xiv) as one of the most pleasant and most ancient cities, and its barrows were a pest to the inhabitants of the place.}\]

\[\text{The inhabitants of Constantinople were generally subject to the influence of the three theological schools, the Catharumarian, the Bentian, and the Grecian.}\]

\[\text{It was consistent with the rules of history, he could assign the medical cause. Yet even a prince would not have been more permittent than his inquiry (I. vii. c. 16. 17.) at the annual installations of the Nile, and all the opinions of the Greek philosophers on that subject.}\]

\[\text{From this generous attempt, Cornelle has deduced the intricate web of the imperial age. In his Epistles a volume is not sufficient to be clearly understood. (Cornelle de Voltaire, tom. i. p. 250.) and which, although an interval of some years, is said to have puzzled the author himself. (Histoires Drameues, tom. ii. p. 122.)}\] still mindful of her father, her husband, and her sons, aspired to freedom and revenge. At the dead of night, she sought to the sanctuary of St. Sophia; but her ears, and the gold of her associate Germans, were invoked to invoke in revenge; but her life was forfeited to revenge, and even to justice; but the patriarch obtained and pledged an oath for her safety: a mansion was allotted for her prison, and the widow of Maurice accepted and abused the liberty of his assassin.
Thus the memory of a second conspiracy, dissolved the engaged interests and ruled the turn of Phocas. A matron who commanded the respect and piety of mankind, the daughter, wife, and mother of emperors, was tortured as the vilest malefactor, to force a confession of her designs and ass-illates; and her innocence is now to be regretted.

the plane-tree, and
and

A daughter of Phocas, his only child, was given in marriage to the patrician Crispus, and the royal images of the bride and bridegroom were indiscriminately placed in the circus, by the side of the emperor.
The father must desire that his posterity should inherit the fruit of his crimes, but the monarch was offended by this premature and popular assumption: the tribunes of the green faction, who accused the effrontery of their sculptors, were condemned to instant death;
their lives were granted to the prayers of the people;
but Crispus might reasonably doubt, whether a jealous usurper could forget and pardon his involuntary competition. The green faction was alienated by the ingress of Claducus and the loss of the every province of the empire was ripe for rebellion; and Heraclius, exarch of Africa, persisted above two years in refusing all tribute and obedience to the curonian who disgraced the throne of Constantinople.
By the secret emissaries of Crispus and the senate, the independent exarch was seduced to save and to govern his country: but his ambition was chilled by age, and he resigned the dangerous enterprise to his son Hera-clius, and to Nicetas, the son of Gregory, his friend and lieutenant. The powers of Africa were armed by the two adventurous youths; they agreed that the one should navigate the ocean, and the other to Constantinople, that the other should lead an army through Egypt and Asia, and that the imperial purple should be the reward of diligence and success. A faint rumour of their undertaking was conveyed to the ears of Phocas, and the wife and mother of the younger Heraclius were seized as the hostages of his faith; but the treacherous art of Crispus extenuated the distant peril, the means of defence were neglected or delayed, and the tyrant supinely slept till the African army east avor to the Hellespont. His standard was joined at the Volusianus, and was received by his son Heraclius, rather as revenge; the ships of Heraclius, whose lofty masts were adorned with the holy symbols of religion, steered their triumphant course through the Propontis;

and Phocas beheld from the windows of the palace his approaching and inevitable fate. The green faction was dispelled by the heroism of heroes; which exposed the fruitless resistance to the landing of the Africans;
but the people, and even the guards, were determined by the well-timed defection of Crispus; and the tyrant was seized by a private enemy, who boldly invaded the solitude of the palace. Stripped of the diadem and purple, clothed in a vile figure, and his chains, was transported in a small boat to the imperial galley of Heraclius, who reproached him with the crimes of his abominable reign.
"Wilt thou govern better?" were the last words of the despair of reigns. In after, suffering of the severity of death and torture, his head was severed from his body, mangled trunk was cast into the flames, and the same treatment was inflicted on the statues of the vain usurper, and the sedulous banner of the green faction.
The voice of the clergy, the senate, and the people, were united in the demand that the traitor should be purified from guilt and ignorance; after some grave hesitation, he yielded to their entreaties.

His coronation was accompanied by that election of his wife Eudoxia; and their posterity, Oct. 5, 627, and till the fourth generation, continued to reign with the honours of the throne. In the voyage of Heraclius had been easy and prosperous, the tedious march of Nicetas was not accomplished befpre the decision of the contest; but he submitted without a murmur to the fortune of his friend, and his bondable intentions were rewarded with an equestrian stature, and a daughter, who was more difficult to tryst the fidelity of Crispus, whose recent services were recompensed by the command of the Cappadocian army. His arrogance soon provoked, and seemed to excuse, the ingratitude of his new soverigns. In their desire of the succession of the East, of Phocas was condemed to embrace the monastic life; and the sentence was justified by the weighty observation of Heraclius, that the man who had beheld his father, could never be faithful to his friend.
Even after his death, the republic was afflicted with civil discord. Chosroes invaded their territory, and a Roman army, armed with a pious cause the most for pre-midable of her enemies. According to
A.D. 603, &c.
the friendly and equal forms of the Byzantine and Persian courts, he announced his exaltation to the throne; and his ambassador Lilius, who had presented him with the heads of Maurice and his sons, was the best qualified to describe the circumstances of the tragic scene. However it might be vanquished by fiction or Sophisty, Chosroes turned with horror from the assassin, impriomined the pretended envoy, discharged the usurper, and declared himself the avenger of his father and benefactor. The death of Phocas afforded the pretext and resentment which humanity would feel, and honour

* According to Theophanes, * C 140.

Theophanes, scribes and modern writers, C Theophanes, scribes and modern writers.

C 140.

C. C 140.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.

C.
would dictate, promoted, on this occasion, the interest of the Persian king; and his interest was powerfully magnified by the designs of the Magi and satraps. In a strain of artful adulation, which assumed the language of freedom, they presumed to cen sure the excess of his gratitude and friendship for the Greeks; a nation with whom it was dangerous to conclude either peace or alliance; whose superiority was despised by the oriental sages, and who must be incapable of any virtue, since they could perpetrate the most atrocious crimes, the impious murder of their sovereign. For the crime of an ambitious centurion, the nation which he oppressed was chastised with the calamities of war: and the same calamities, on the account of Christian patriotism, were retaliated and reembolded on the heads of the Persians.

The general who had restored Chosroe to the throne still commanded in the east; and the name of Narses was the formidable sound with which the Assyrian mothers were accustomed to terrify their infants. It is not improbable, that a native subject of Persia should encourage his master and his friend to deliver and possess the provinces of Asia. It was still more probable, that Chosroe should animate his troops by the assurance that the sword which they dreaded the most would remain in its scabbard, or be drawn in their favour. The heart of such a tyrant was conscious how little he deserved the obedience of a hero: Narses was removed from his military command; he reared an independent standard at Hierapolis in Syria; he was betrayed by false-pretences, and burnt alive in the market-place of Constantinople. Deprived of the only chief whom they could fear or esteem, the bands which he had led to victory were twice broken by the cavalry, trampled by the elephants, and pierced by the arrows of the barbarians; and a great number of the captives were beheaded on the field of battle by the sentence of the licentious victor, who might justly condemn their seditious misconduct as the authors or accomplices of the death of Maurice. Under the reign of Phocas, the fortifications of Merdin, Dara, Amida, and Edessa, were successively besieged, reduced, and destroyed by the Persian monarch: he passed the Euphrates, and ravaged the cities, the riches, and the wealth of Cyrrhus, Bithynia, and Thrace; and Hierapolis, Chalcedis, and Berbeus or Aleppo, and soon encompassed the walls of Antioch with his irresistible arms. The rapid tide of success discloses the decay of the empire, the incapacity of Phocas, and the disaffection of his subjects; and Chosroe provided a defensible post for his father, who might justly condemn the seditious misconduct of the archbishop as the authors or accomplices of the death of Maurice and the lawful heir of the monarchy. The first intelligence from the east which Heraclius received, was that of the loss of Antioch; but the aged metropolis, so often overturned by earthquakes, and pillag ed by the enemy, could supply but a small and languid stream of treasure and blood.

7 We must now, for our better understanding, take our leave of contemporary historians, and descend, if it be a discretion, from the imitation of rhetoric and oratory, to the use of the facts and truths of history. Theophanes. (Chron. p. 214—279, and Nicphorus, (p. 3—165, supply a regular, but imperfect, series of the Persian war; and for any additional facts I quote my special authorities. Theophanes, a courtier who became a monk, was born A.D. 740; Nicphorus, patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 825, was somewhat younger; they both suffered in the cause of images. Hankius, de Scribtoribus Byz. lib. i. cap. iii. p. 290—291.

8 The Persian historians have been themselves deceived; but Theophanes, (p. 214) accuses Chosroe of the fraud and falsehood; and the Persian authors, who is the cause of the fraud and falsehood, who was saved from the assassins, lived and died a monk on mount Troad.

9 Euthychus dates all the losses of the empire under the reign of Phocas, an error which savours the honour of Heraclius, whom he brings to an earlier period than the facts will permit. Theophanes has been more accurate, and gives the reign of Phocas for the relief of Constantinople, (Annal. tom. i. p. 233—241.) The date of Heraclius is fixed by the treaty of the Caucausus, 211. Th. Cyril. Oriental, tom. ii. p. 112, 413. Elmasi, Hist. Sarac. p. 15—16.) Abaphragius, (Dionys. p. 29, 92) are more sincere and accurate. The years of the Persian war are disposed in the chronology of Pagi.
THE DECLINE AND FALL

From the long-disputed banks of the Tigris and Euphrates, the reign of the god and nation was extended to the Hellespont and the Nile, the ancient limits of the Persian monarchy. But the provinces, which had been fashioned by the habits of six hundred years to the virtues and vices of the Roman government, supported with reluctance the yoke of the barbarians. The idea of the vices of their form of government, the institutions or at least the writings, of the Greeks and Romans, and the subjects of Heracleius had been educated to pronounce the words of liberty and law. But it has always been the pride and policy of oriental princes, to display the titles and attributes of their monarchical dignity, and to demand, with their personal name and absolute condition, and to enforce, by cruel and insolent threats, the vogue of their absolute commands. The Christians of the east were scandalized by the worship of fire, and the impious doctrine of the two principles; the Magi were not less intolerant than the bishops, and the martyrdom of some native Persians, who had deserted the religion of Zoroaster, was conceived to be the prelude of a fierce and general persecution. By the oppressive laws of Justinian, the adversaries of the church were made the enemies of the state; the alliance of the Jews, Nestorians, and Jacobites, had contributed to the success of Chosroes, and his partial favour to the sectaries provoked the hatred and fears of the catholic clergy. Conscous of their fear and hatred, the Persian conqueror governed his new subjects with an iron sceptre: and as he suspected the loyalty of his dominion, he exhausted their wealth by exorbitant tributes and licentious rapine, despoiled or demolished the temples of the east, and transported to his hereditary realms the gold, the silver, the precious marbles, the fruits of the art of Greece, and the pride of the cities. In his obscure picture of the calamities of the empire, it is not easy to discern the figure of Chosroes himself, to separate his actions from those of his lieutenants, or to ascertain his personal merit in the general blaze of glory and magnificence. He enjoyed with ostentation the fruits of victory, and magnificently retired from the hardships of war to the luxury of the palace. But in the space of twenty-four years, he was detained by superstition or resentment from approaching the gates of Ctesiphon: and his favourite residence of Armenia, or Dastagird, was situate beyond the Tigris, about sixty miles to the north of the capital. The adjacent pastures were covered with flocks and herds: the paradise or park was replenished with pheasants, peacocks, ostriches, roe-deers, and wild boars, and the noble game of lions and tigers was sometimes turned loose for the holier pleasures of the chase. Nine hundred and sixty elephants were maintained for the use or splendour of the great king: his tents and baggage were carried into the field by twelve thousand great camels and eight thousand of a smaller size; and the royal stables were filled with six thousand mules and horses, among whom the names of Scythian, Burgis, and Arabiz are renowned for their speed or beauty. Twenty thousand guards successively mounted before the palace gate; the service of the interior apartments was performed by twelve thousand slaves, and in the number of three thousand virgins, the fairest of some happy concubine might console her master for the disappointment of the legitimate wife. Sometimes, instead of the various treasures of gold, silver, gems, silk, and aromatics, which were deposited in a hundred subterraneous vaults; and the chamber Badawerden denoted the accidental gift of the winds which had wafted the spoils of Heracleius into one of the Syrian harbours of his rival. The voice of the ocean resounded with the flattery of the institution; or at least by the writings, of the Greeks and Romans, and the subjects of Heracleius had been educated to pronounce the words of liberty and law. But it has always been the pride and policy of oriental princes, to display the titles and attributes of their monarchical dignity, and to demand, with their personal name and absolute condition, and to enforce, by cruel and insolent threats, the vogue of their absolute commands. The Christians of the east were scandalized by the worship of fire, and the impious doctrine of the two principles; the Magi were not less intolerant than the bishops, and the martyrdom of some native Persians, who had deserted the religion of Zoroaster, was conceived to be the prelude of a fierce and general persecution. By the oppressive laws of Justinian, the adversaries of the church were made the enemies of the state; the alliance of the Jews, Nestorians, and Jacobites, had contributed to the success of Chosroes, and his partial favour to the sectaries provoked the hatred and fears of the catholic clergy. Conscous of their fear and hatred, the Persian conqueror governed his new subjects with an iron sceptre: and as he suspected the loyalty of his dominion, he exhausted their wealth by exorbitant tributes and licentious rapine, despoiled or demolished the temples of the east, and transported to his hereditary realms the gold, the silver, the precious marbles, the fruits of the art of Greece, and the pride of the cities. In his obscure picture of the calamities of the empire, it is not easy to discern the figure of Chosroes himself, to separate his actions from those of his lieutenants, or to ascertain his personal merit in the general blaze of glory and magnificence. He enjoyed with ostentation the fruits of victory, and magnificently retired from the hardships of war to the luxury of the palace. But in the space of twenty-four years, he was detained by superstition or resentment from approaching the gates of Ctesiphon: and his favourite residence of Armenia, or Dastagird, was situate beyond the Tigris, about sixty miles to the north of the capital. The adjacent pastures were covered with flocks and herds: the paradise or park was replenished with pheasants, peacocks, ostriches, roe-deers, and wild boars, and the noble game of lions and tigers was sometimes turned loose for the holier pleasures of the chase. Nine hundred and sixty elephants were maintained for the use or splendour of the great king: his tents and baggage were carried into the field by twelve thousand great camels and eight thousand of a smaller size; and the royal stables were filled with six thousand mules and horses, among whom the names of Scythian, Burgis, and Arabiz are renowned for their speed or beauty. Twenty thousand guards successively mounted before the palace gate; the service of the interior apartments was performed by twelve thousand slaves, and in the the remnant of Greece, Italy, and Africa, and some maritime cities, from Tyre to Trebizond, of the Asiatic coast. After the loss of Egypt, the capital was afflited by famine and pestilence, and the emperor, pressed by the un-palable of resistance, and hopeless of relief, had resolved to transfer his person and government to the more secure residence of Carthage. His ships were already laden with the treasures of the palace, but his flight was arrested by the patriarch, who armed the powers of religion in the defense of his country, led Hera-clius to the altar of St. Sophia, and extorted a solemn oath, that he would live and die with the people whom God had intrusted to his care. The chalagon was encamped in the plains of Thrace, but he assembled his perfidous designs, and solicited an interview with the emperor near the town of Heraclea. Their reconcilition was celebrated with equestrian games, the senate and people in their gayest apparel resorted to the festival of peace, and the Avars beheld, with envy and desire, the spectacle of Roman luxury. On a sudden, the hippocrepide was encompassed by the Seychyan cavalry, who had pressed their secret and nocturnal march; the tremendous sound of the chalagon's whip gave the signal of the assault; and Heraclius, wrapning his diadem round his arm, was saved, with extreme hazard, by the fleetness of his horse. So rapid was the pursuit, that the Avars almost entered the golddust glittering on the capricious air; and Heraclius, but the plunder of the suburbs rewarded their treason, and they transported beyond the Danube two hundred and seventy thousand captives. On the shore of Chal-cedon, the emperor held a safer conference with a more honorable foe, who, before Heraclius descended from his galley, saddled with reserve dignity and the majesty of the purple. The friendly offer of Sain, the Persi-an general, to conduct an embassy to the presence of the great king, was accepted with the warmest gratitude, and the prayer for pardon and peace was humbly presented by the patriarch prefect, the præfect of the city, and one of the first ecclesiastics of the patriarchal church. But the lieutenant of Chosroes had fatally mistaken the intentions of his master. "It was not an embassy," said the tyrant of Asia, "it was the person of Heraclius, bound in chains, that he should have brought. I will not accept the chalice of peace to the emperor of Rome, till he has abjured his credulity, and embraced the worship of the sun." Sain was layed alive according to the inhuman practice of his country; and the separate and rigorous consignation of the ambassadors violated the laws of nations, and the policy of all ages. Yet, the experience of six years at length persuaded the Persian monarch to renounce the conquest of Constantinople, and to specify the annual tribute or ransom of the Roman empire; a thousand talents of gold, a thousand talents of silver, a thousand silk robes, the thousand horses, and a thousand virgins. Heraclius subscribed these ignominious terms, but the time and space which he obtained to collect such treasures from the poverty of the east was industriously employed in the preparations of a bold and desperate attack.

His preparations for war. A. D. 621. The characters conspicuous in history, that of Heraclius is one of the most extraordinary and inconsistent. In the first and last years of a long reign, the emperor appears to be the slave of sléth, of pleasure, or of superstition, then, when his wealth and the luxury of public calamities. But the languid mists of the morning and evening are separated by the brightness of the meridian sun: the Areatius of the palace arose the Cesar of the camp; and the honour of Rome and Heraclius was restored to the exploits and triumphs of six adventurous campaigns. It was the duty of the Byzantine historians to have revealed the causes of his slumber and vigilance. At this distance we can only conjecture, that he was endowed with more personal courage than political resolution; that he was detained by the charma and perhaps the arts of his niece Martina, with whom, after the death of Eudocia, he contracted an incestuous marriage; and that he yielded to the base advice of the counsellors, who urged as a fundamental law, that the life of the emperor should never be exposed in the field. Perhaps he was awakened by the last insolent demand of the Persian conqueror; but at the moment when Hera-clius assumed the spirit of a hero, the only hopes of the Romans were drawn from the vicissitudes of fortune, which might threaten the proud prosperity of Chosroes, and must be favourable to those who had attained the lowest period of depression. To provide for the expenses of war, was the first care of the emperor; and for the purpose of collecting the tribute, he was allowed to collect the benevolence of the east ern provinces. But the revenue no longer flowed in the usual channels: the credit of an arbitrary prince was annihilated by the power; and Heraclius was first displayed in daring to borrow the con-scerated wealth of churches under the solemn vow of restoring, with usury, whatever he had been compelled to employ in the service of religion and of the emprise. The clergy themselves appear to have sympathized with the public distress, and the discreet patriarch of Alexandria, without admitting the precedent of sacri-
lege, assisted his sovereign by the miraculous or se-culous revelation of a secret treasure. Of the soldiers who had conspired with Phæcon, only two were found to have survived the stroke of time and of the barbarians; the loss, even of these ardent veterans, was imperfection supplied by the new levies of Herac-lius, and the gold of the sanctuary united, in the same camp, the names, and arms, and languages, of the east and west. He would have been content with the neutrality of the Avars; and his friendly entreaty, not a design, but a constant and United of the guardian, of the empire, was accompanied with a more persuasive donative of two hundred thousand pieces of gold. Two days after the festival of Easter, the emperor, exchanging his purple for the simple garb of a penitent and warrior, gave the signal of his Cæsariality. The preparations of this new reign were recommended to the children; the civil and military powers were vested in the most deserving hands, and the discretion of the patriarch and senate was authorized

4 Nicephorus, (p. 10, 11,) who brands this marriage with the names of incest and impudic, is happy to observe, that two so convenient frui: the elder was marked by Providence with a stuff neck, the younger with the loss of hearing.
5 George of Pisidia, Hist. p. 142—145, p. 53 who states the opinions, acquired the punishallious counsel of any sinister views. Would he have been revered the proselytes of the gnostic heresy? of Cyprian?
Where, if in 2. 1. 1. 3. (p. 12.)
6 The Oriental are not less fond of remarking this strange visitation:
I remember some story of Khorow Paris, not very unlike the ring of Polycent at Sams. Baronius gravely described this discovery, or rather transmission of barrels, not of honey, but of gold, (Annals, Eccles. A. D. 620, No. 3, &c.) Yet the loss of the treasure, by the early departure of by the barbarians, who were ordered to leave the patriarch of Alexandria no more than years afterwards, speaks the ill humour of the Bulgarians, which the cshow of Constantinople might still feel.
7 p. 13. This circumstance need not excite our surprise. The muster-roll of a regiment, even in time of peace, is renewed by every large levy of twenty thousand men.
8 He changed his purple, for black, buskins, and died them red in the blood of the Persians. (Geogr. Pisid. Asiae iii. 115. 121. 122. See the Notes of Foggini, p. xci.)
to save or surrender the city, if they should be oppressed in his absence by the superior forces of the enemy.

The neighbouring heights of Chalce- don were covered with tents and arms; and the length of Heraclius had been rashly led to the adventure; the vanity of the Persians in the sight of Constanti- nople might have been the last day of the Roman empire. As imprudent would it have been to advance into the provinces of Asia, leaving their innumerable cavalry; but the Persians were already ready to the assault; and the movement was expressed in the choice of this important post. From all sides, the scattered garrisons of the maritime cities and the mountains might repair with speed and safety to his imperial standard. The nature of Chalcedon, Cilicia, and Cilicia, in the gulf of Scændron, where the coast abruptly rises to the summits, must hang on the basalt and disorder of his rear. But the Greeks were still masters of the sea; a fleet of galleys, transports, and storeships, was assembled in the harbour; the barbarians consented to embark; a steady wind carried them through the Hellespont; the western and southern coast of Asia Minor lay on their left hand; the spirit of their chief was first displayed in a storm; and even the encomium of his train were excited to suffer and to work by the example of their master. He landed his troops on the confines of Syria and Cilicia, in the gulf of Scændron, where the coast abruptly rises to the summits, and the movement was expressed in the choice of this important post. From all sides, the scattered garrisons of the maritime cities and the mountains might repair with speed and safety to his imperial standard. The natural image of Christ, he urged them to revenge the holy altars which had been profaned by the worshippers of fire; addressing them by the exuding appellations of sons and brethren, he deplored the public and private wrongs of the republic. The subjects of a monarch were persuaded that they fought for the cause of freedom; and a similar enthusiasm was communicated to the foreign mercenaries, who must have viewed with equal indifference the interest of Rome and of Persia. Heraclius himself, with the skill and patience of a mercenary, incited the lessers warriors to the exercise of arms, and the soldiers were assiduously trained in the use of their weapons, and the exercises and evolutions of the field. The cavalry and infantry in light or heavy armour were divided into two parties; the trump- pets were fixed in the centre, and their signals directed the march, the charge, the retreat, or pursuit; the direct or oblique order, the deep or extended phalanx; to represent in fictitious combat the operations of genuine war. Whatever hardship the emperor imposed on the troops, he inflicted with equal severity on himself; their labour, their diet, their sleep, were measured by the inflexible rules of discipline; and, without despising the enemy, they were taught to repose an implicit confidence in their own valour and the wisdom of their leader. Cilicia was soon encompassed with the Persian arms; but their cavalry hesitated to enter the defiles of mount Taurus, till they were circumvented by the enemy. Heraclius, who intended to keep his rear, whilst he appeared to present his front in order of battle. By a false motion, which seemed to threaten Armenia, he drew them, against their wishes, to a general action. They were tempted by the artful lure of his ambassador, who urged them to advance to combat, the ground, the sun, and the expectation of both armies, were unpropitious to the barbarians; the Romans successfully repeated their tactics in a field of battle, and the event of the day decided the fate of the Persians; but the presence of the emperor was indispensably required to soothe the restless and rapacious spirit of the Aryans.

Since the days of Scipio and Hanni- bals, the number of men engaged, and the nature of the attack, was greater than that than which Heraclius achieved at Adrianople, Turquie, and established his troops for the winter season, in safe and plentiful quarters on the banks of the river Halys. His soul was superior to the vanity of external appearance. Constantine the Great, who was a Roman and a German, was more inclined to the of the city of Christ. The limits of Armenia, as it had been endowed to the emperor Mauric, extended as far as the Axages: the river submitted to the indignity of a

This expedition of Heraclius was the result of his hard work, perseverance, and the support of his army. It is described by the ancient historians, such as Procopius, Jordanes, and Cassiodorus, who left valuable and accurate accounts of the events. Heraclius, who had been a soldier and a general, knew the importance of discipline and order in the army. He was able to motivate his soldiers to fight with a passion that was unusual, and he was able to keep them well-fed and well-rested. His strategy was based on the use of well-trained cavalry and infantry, who were able to fight in close formation, and on the use of the Persian army's weaknesses, such as their lack of discipline and their tendency to be influenced by the promises of their leaders. Heraclius' victory at Adrianople was a turning point in the war, as it allowed the Romans to re-establish their control over the Eastern provinces of the empire. The victory at Adrianople was a testament to the strength and determination of the Roman army, and it showed that the Romans were still capable of defeating their enemies.
bridge; and Heraclius, in the footsteps of Mark Antony, advanced towards the city of Turus or Gandzas, the ancient and modern capital of Persia. At the head of forty thousand men, Chosroes himself had returned from some distant expedition to oppose the progress of the Roman arms; but he reiterated on the approach of Heraclius, declining the generous alternative of peace or of battle. Instead of half a million of inhabitants, which had been ascertained to Turus under the reign of the Sophsy, the city contained no more than three thousand houses; but the value of the royal treasures was enhanced by a tradition, that they were the spoils of Cresus, which had been transported by Cyrus from the citadel of Sardes. The rapid conquests of Heraclius were, as it were, performed a laborious task in the silence of the night. The flat roofs of the houses were defended with useless valour against the darts and torches of the Romans: the satraps and nobles of Persia, with their wives and children, and the flower of their martial youth, were either slain or made prisoners. The general escaped by a precipitate flight, but his golden armour was the prize of the conqueror; and the soldiers of Heraclius enjoyed the wealth and repose which they had so nobly deserved. On the return of the spring, the emperor traversed in seven days the mountains of Cusuditan, and passed without resistance the narrow and impetuous stream of the Bosphorus. His vengeance was returned by the fire of the new camp, as well as by the fire of the holy sepulchre. A purer spirit of religion was shown in the relief and deliverance of fifty thousand captives. Heraclius was rewarded by their tears and grateful acclamations; but this wise measure, which spread the fame of his benevolence, diffused the murmurs of the Persians against the pride and obstinacy of their own sovereign.

Amidst the glories of the succeeding campaign, Heraclius is almost lost to our eyes, and to those of the Byzantine historians. From the spacious and fruitful plains of Albania, the emperor appears to follow the progress of Hyrcanian mountains, to descend into the province of Media or Irak, and to carry his victorious arms as far as the royal cities of Casbin and Isphahan, which had never been approached by a Roman conqueror. Alarmed by the danger of his kingdom, the powers of Chosroes were already called from their winter encampment, the same winter which surrounded, in a distant and hostile land, the camp of the emperor. The Colebian allies prepared to desert his standard; and the fears of the bravest veterans were expressed, rather than concealed, by their desponding silence. "Be not terrified," said the intercept Heraclius, "by the multitude of your foes. With the aid of Heaven, one Roman may triumph over a thousand; and if we are few, the salvation of our brethren, we shall obtain the crown of martyrdom, and our immortal reward will be liberally paid by God and posterity." These magnanimous sentiments were supported by the vigour of his actions. He repelled the three-fold attack of the Persians, improved the divisions of their chiefs, and, by a well-concerted train of marches, retreats, and successful actions, finally chased them from the field into the fortified cities of Media and Assyria. In the severity of the winter season, Sahazarra deemed himself secure in the walls of Salban; he was surprised by the activity of Heraclius, who divided his troops, and performed a laborious march through the snows of the mountains, at the head of his own, and the seventy thousand men, to which were added the barbarians of the Sophsy and the desert. The rapidity of the Roman conquests is proved by the testimony of the Caryatides of the holy sepulchre. A purer spirit of religion was shown in the relief and deliverance of fifty thousand captives. Heraclius was rewarded by their tears and grateful acclamations; but this wise measure, which spread the fame of his benevolence, diffused the murmurs of the Persians against the pride and obstinacy of their own sovereign.

Amidst the glories of the succeeding campaign, Heraclius is almost lost to our eyes, and to those of the Byzantine historians. From the spacious and fruitful plains of Albania, the emperor appears to follow the progress of Hyrcanian mountains, to descend into the province of Media or Irak, and to carry his victorious arms as far as the royal cities of Casbin and Isphahan, which had never been approached by a Roman conqueror. Alarmed by the danger of his kingdom, the powers of Chosroes were already called from their winter encampment, the same winter which surrounded, in a distant and hostile land, the camp of the emperor. The Colebian allies prepared to desert his standard; and the fears of the bravest veterans were expressed, rather than concealed, by their desponding silence. "Be not terrified," said the intercept Heraclius, "by the multitude of your foes. With the aid of Heaven, one Roman may triumph over a thousand; and if we are few, the salvation of our brethren, we shall obtain the crown of martyrdom, and our immortal reward will be liberally paid by God and posterity." These magnanimous sentiments were supported by the vigour of his actions. He repelled the three-fold attack of the Persians, improved the divisions of their chiefs, and, by a well-concerted train of marches, retreats, and successful actions, finally chased them from the field into the fortified cities of Media and Assyria. In the severity of the winter season, Sahazarra deemed himself secure in the walls of Salban; he was surprised by the activity of Heraclius, who divided his troops, and performed a laborious march through the snows of the mountains, at the head of his own, and the seventy thousand men, to which were added the barbarians of the Sophsy and the desert. The rapidity of the Roman conquests is proved by the testimony of the Caryatides of the holy sepulchre. A purer spirit of religion was shown in the relief and deliverance of fifty thousand captives. Heraclius was rewarded by their tears and grateful acclamations; but this wise measure, which spread the fame of his benevolence, diffused the murmurs of the Persians against the pride and obstinacy of their own sovereign.

Amidst the glories of the succeeding campaign, Heraclius is almost lost to our eyes, and to those of the Byzantine historians. From the spacious and fruitful plains of Albania, the emperor appears to follow the progress of Hyrcanian mountains, to descend into the province of Media or Irak, and to carry his victorious arms as far as the royal cities of Casbin and Isphahan, which had never been approached by a Roman conqueror. Alarmed by the danger of his kingdom, the powers of Chosroes were already called from their winter encampment, the same winter which surrounded, in a distant and hostile land, the camp of the emperor. The Colebian allies prepared to desert his standard; and the fears of the bravest veterans were expressed, rather than concealed, by their desponding silence. "Be not terrified," said the intercept Heraclius, "by the multitude of your foes. With the aid of Heaven, one Roman may triumph over a thousand; and if we are few, the salvation of our brethren, we shall obtain the crown of martyrdom, and our immortal reward will be liberally paid by God and posterity." These magnanimous sentiments were supported by the vigour of his actions. He repelled the three-fold attack of the Persians, improved the divisions of their chiefs, and, by a well-concerted train of marches, retreats, and successful actions, finally chased them from the field into the fortified cities of Media and Assyria. In the severity of the winter season, Sahazarra deemed himself secure in the walls of Salban; he was surprised by the activity of Heraclius, who divided his troops, and performed a laborious march through the snows of the mountains, at the head of his own, and the seventy thousand men, to which were added the barbarians of the Sophsy and the desert. The rapidity of the Roman conquests is proved by the testimony of the Caryatides of the holy sepulchre. A purer spirit of religion was shown in the relief and deliverance of fifty thousand captives. Heraclius was rewarded by their tears and grateful acclamations; but this wise measure, which spread the fame of his benevolence, diffused the murmurs of the Persians against the pride and obstinacy of their own sovereign.

Amidst the glories of the succeeding campaign, Heraclius is almost lost to our eyes, and to those of the Byzantine historians. From the spacious and fruitful plains of Albania, the emperor appears to follow the progress of Hyrcanian mountains, to descend into the province of Media or Irak, and to carry his victorious arms as far as the royal cities of Casbin and Isphahan, which had never been approached by a Roman conqueror. Alarmed by the danger of his kingdom, the powers of Chosroes were already called from their winter encampment, the same winter which surrounded, in a distant and hostile land, the camp of the emperor. The Colebian allies prepared to desert his standard; and the fears of the bravest veterans were expressed, rather than concealed, by their desponding silence. "Be not terrified," said the intercept struction of the sacred and profane buildings of the Asiatic suburbs, while he impatiently waited the arrival of his Scythian friends on the opposite side of the strait. In the mean time the vast multitude of Turks, barbarians, the vanguard of the Avars, forced the long wall, and drove into the capital a promiscuous crowd of peasants, citizens, and soldiers. Four score thousand of his native subjects, and of the vassal tribes of Gepid, Huns, Bulgarians, and Scavavians, who were under the soldiers of the chagan; a month was spent in marches and negotiations, but the whole city was invested on the thirty-first of July, from the suburbs of Pera and Galata to the Blackmeres and seven towers; and the inhabitants desired with all the flaming signals of the European and Asiatic shores. In the mean while the magistrates of Constantinople repeatedly strove to purchase the retreat of the chagan; but their deputies were rejected and insulted; and he suffered the patricians to stand before his throne, while the Persian envoys, in silk robes, dressed, were seated by his side. " You see," said a haughty barbarian, " the proofs of my perfect union with the great king; and his lieutenant is ready to send into my camp a select band of three thousand warriors. Preserve no longer to tempt your master with a partial and inadequate ransom; your wealth and your city are the only presents worthy of my assentance. For yourselves, I shall permit you to depart, each with an under-garment, and a shirt; and, at my entreaty, my friend Sarbar will not refuse a passage through his lines. Your absent prince, even now a captive or a fugitive, has left Constantinople to its fate; nor can you escape the arms of the Avars and Persians, unless you could soar into the air like birds, unless fishes you could dive into the waves." During ten successive days, the capital was assaulted by the Avars, who had made some progress in the science of attack, and advanced to the apart or battier the wall, under the cover of the impetuous tortoise; their engines discharged a perpetual volley of stones and darts; and twelve lofty towers of wood exalted the combattants to the height of the neighbouring ramparts. But the senate and people were animated by the spirit of Heraclius, who had detached to their relief a body of twelve thousand cuirassiers; the powers of fire and mechanics were used with superior art and success in the defence of Constantinople; and the galleys, with two and three ranks of oars, commanded the Bosphorus, and rendered the Persians the idle spectators of their defeat. The Avars were repulsed; a fleet of Scythonian canoes was destroyed in the harbour; the vessels of the chagan threatened to desert, his provisions were exhausted, and after burning his engines, he gave the signal of a slow and formidable retreat. The devotion of the Romans ascribed this signal deliverance to the Virgin Mary; but the mother of Christ would surely have condemned their inhuman murder of the Persian envoys, who were entitled to the rights of humanity, if they were not protected by the laws of nations.

After the division of his army, Heraclius prudently retired to the banks of the Phasis, from whence he maintained a defensive war against the fifty thousand gold spears of Persia. His anxiety was relieved by the deliverance of Constantinople; his hopes were confirmed by a victory of his brother division of the Turkocratic league of Chosroes with the Avars, the Roman emperor opposed the useful and honourable alliance of the Turks. At his liberal invitation, the horde of Chozars transported their tents from the plains of the Volga to the mountains of Georgia; Heraclius received them at the palace of Tediis, and the khan, with his nobles dismounted from their horses, if we may credit the Greeks, and fell prostrate on the ground, to adore the purple of the Cesar. Such voluntary homage and important aid were entitled to the grace and magnanimity of the Persian monarch. Heraclius is said to have taken off his own diadem, placed it on the head of the Turkish prince, whom he saluted with a tender embrace and the appellation of son. After a sumptuous banquet, he presented Zebiel with the plate and ornaments, the gold, the gems, and the silk, which had been inadequately bestowed on his own son, and distributed rich jewels and ear-rings to his new allies. In a secret interview, he produced the portrait of his daughter Eudocia, a prince to flatter the barbarian with the promise of a fair and augur bride, obtained an immediate succour of forty thousand horse, and drove the Persian vanguard, which Heraclius' army had defeated, on the side of the Oxus. The Persians, in their turn, retreated with precipitation; in the camp of Edessa, Heraclius reviewed an army of seventy thousand Romans and strangers; and some months were sufficiently employed in the recovery of the cities of Syria, Mesopotamia, and Armenia, whose fortifications had been imperfectly restored. Sarbar still maintained the important station of Chalecedon; but the jealousy of Chosroes, or the artifice of Heraclius, soon alienated the mind of that powerful satrap from the service of his master. A message was intercepted, by a real or fictitious hand, to the emperor of Persia, or in a garri gan, or second in command, directing him to send, without delay, to the throne, the head of a guilty or unfortunate general. The dispatches were transmitted to Sarbar himself; and as soon as he read the sentence of his own death, he exterminarily ordered the names of four hundred officers, assembled a military council, and asked the edocarion, whether he was prepared to execute the commands of their tyrant? The Persians unanimously declared, that Chosroes had forfeited the sceptre; a separate treaty was concluded with the emperor of Persia, and the partition of the empire was agreed upon. The derivations of honour or policy restrained Sarbar from joining the standard of Heraclius, the emperor was assured, that he might prosecute, without interruption, his designs of victory and peace.

Deprived of his finest support, and his third expedition in the east, of the facility of his subjects. A.D. 627.

Sporuous in its ruins. The number of five hundred thousand may be interpreted as an oriental metaphor, to describe the men and arms, the horses and elephants, that covered Media and Assyria against the invasion of Heraclius. Yet the Romans boldly advanced from the Araxes to the Tigris, and the timid prudence of Rhazates was content to follow them by

---

1 This number of eight myriads is specified by George of Pindia, (Bell, Abat, 20.) The poet (26—27) clearly indicates that the old chagan lived till the reign of Heraclius, and that his son and succes er was born of a foreign mother. Yet Foggini (Annotas, p. 57) has great objection to this tradition to this power.

2 A bird, a fox, a mouse, and five arrows, had been the present of the Persians (Herod. 1. 101.) Subastian, an old letter a ces signes (say Roussel, with much good taste) plus elle sera magnifique une elle effrune; ce sera une courte mais que dont l'air ne fuit que rare. (Emile. Comment. XIII. p. 146.) Yet I much question whether the senate and people of Constantinople laughed at the edocarion.

3 The Paschal Chronicle (p. 392—397) gives a minute and authen tic account of the destruction of Constantinople. The 4 The Phases, which are (p. 264.) adds some circumstances; and a faint light may be obtained from the smokes of George of Pindia, who has composed a poem (des Belo Abarca, p. 13—143) to commemorate this auspicious event.

5 The power of the Chozars prevailed in the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries. They were known to the Greeks, the Arabs, and, under the name of Jofikut, to the Chazars. They are mentioned by l'Ins. des Romains, tom. ii. part. iii. p. 507—509.

6 Eudocia, daughter of Heraclius and his wife Eudocia, was born at Constantinople on the 7th of July, A.D. 601, baptized the 15th August, and crowned by the monks in the ordnary of St. Sophia, in the palace on the 8th of October of the same year. At this time she was about fifteen. Eudocia was afterwards sent to her Turkish husband, but the news of his death stopped her journey, and prevented the consummation. (Ducange, Famille Byzantine, p. 133.)

7 Elmacini (Hist. Saracen, p. 13—16) gives some curious and proba tive facts; but his numbers are rather too high—300,000 Romans as teugated at Edessa—500,000 Persians killed at Nineveh. The abate cnt of a cavalry is scarcely enough to restore his sanity.
forced marches through a desolate country, till he received a peremptory mandate to risk the fate of Persia in a battle without hostiles. Eastward of the bridge of Mound, the great Nineveh had formerly been erected: the city, and even the ruins of the city, had long since disappeared: the vacant space afforded a spacious field for the operations of the two armies. But these operations are neglected by the Byzantine historians, and, as we have seen, the authors of the Tigris, and the Lycopers, describe the victory, not to the military conduct, but to the personal valor, of their favourite hero. On this memo-approaching end, he resolved to fix the tiara on the head of Merdaza, the most favoured of his sons. But the will of Chosroes was no longer revered, and Siroes, who had followed the court of Persia with his mother, and had conspired with the malcontents to assert and anticipate the rights of primogeniture. Twenty-two satraps, they styled themselves patriots, were tempted by the wealth and honours of a new reign; to the soldiers, the heir of Chosroes promised an increase of pay; to the mandarins, the freedom of their action; to the captives, liberty and rewards; and to the nation, instant peace and the reduction of taxes. It was determined by the conspirators, that Siroes, with the ensigns of royalty, should appear in the camp; and if the enterprise should fail, his escape was contrived to be a triumph. Siroes was saluted with unanimous acclamations; the flight of Chosroes (yet where could he have fled?) was rudely arrested, eighteen sons were massacred before his face, and he was thrown into a dungeon, where he expired on the fifth day. The Greeks and modern Persians minutely describe how Chosroes was insulted, and famished, and tortured, by the command of an inhuman son, who so far surpassed the example of his father: but at the time of his death, what tongue would express the horror of the spectators? What eye could penetrate into the lower of darkness? According to the fidelity and mercy of his christian enemies, he sunk without hope into a still deeper abyss; and it will not be denied, that tyrants of every age and sect are the best entitled to such infernal abodes. The glory of the house of Sassanid ended with the life of Chosroes: his unnatural son enjoyed only eight months the fruit of his crimes; and in the space of four years, the regal title was assumed by nine candidates, who disputed, with the sword or dagger, the fragments of an exhausted monarchy. Every province, and each city in Persia, was the scene of discord, and of blood, and the state of anarchy prevailed about eight years longer, till the factions were silenced and united under the common yoke of the Arabian caliphs.

Give me the complete text, as it is written on the page.

Treaty of peace between the two empires, A.D. 628. March, &c.

As soon as the mountains became passable, the emperor received the welcome news of the success of the conspiracy, the death of Chosroes, and the elevation of his eldest son to the throne of Persia. The authors of the revolution, eager to display their merit, came to the camp of the conquerors. The last of the Persian satraps, who delivered the letters of their master to his brother the emperor of the Romans. In the language of the usurpers of every age, he imputes his own crimes to his fate, and without degrading his equal majesty, he offers to reconquer the lost discords of the two nations, by a treaty of peace and alliance more durable than brass or iron. The conditions of the treaty were easily defined and faithfully executed. In the recovery of the standards and prisoners which had fallen into the hands of the Persians, the emperor imitated the example of Augustus; their care of the provincial dignity was celebrated by the poets of the times, but the decay of genius may be measured by the distance between Horace and George of Pisania: the subjects and brethren of Heraclius were redeemed from the oppressions of the wife of Chosroes, but instead of the Roman eagles, the true symbol of the Christian cross was restored to the importunate demands of the successor of Constantine. The victor was not ambitious of enlarging the weakness of the empire; the son of Chosroes abandoned without regret the conquests of his father; and the Persians by the sound of their trumpets, and Egypt were honourably conducted to the frontier, and a war which had wounded the vitals of the two monarchies, produced no change in their external and relative situation. The return of Heraclius from Tauris to Constantinople, was a perpetual triumph; and after the death of his son, he appeared more than ever a monarch: he had already enjoyed the sabbath of his toils. After a long impatience, the senate, the clergy, and the people, went forth to meet their hero, with tears and acclamations, with olive branches and innumerable lamps: he entered the capital in a chariot drawn by four elephants; and as soon as the emperor could disengage himself from the tumult of public joy, he tasted more genuine satisfaction in the embraces of his mother and son.

The succeeding year was illustrated by a triumph of a triumph. The king of the Persians, touching the earth with the true cross to the holy sepulchre. Heraclius performed in person the pilgrimage of Jerusalem, the identity of the relic was verified by the discreet patriarch, and this august ceremony has been commemorated by the annual festival of the exaltation of the cross. Before the emperor presumed to address the conquerors, he was instructed to strip himself of the diadem and purple, the pomp and vanity of the world; but in the judgment of his clergy, the persecution of the Jews was more easily reconciled with the precepts of the gospel. He again ascended his throne to receive the addresses of the clergy, and the presents of the nation, of the provinces, of the cities. The empress Irene was left to attend God and the pope of Alexandria, was not spared the visit at Constantinople: she added a female grace to the majesty of her husband, and kept the public council with exalted rather than exercised their strength. While the emperor triumphed at Constantinople, and

1 The authentic narrative of the fall of Chosroes is contained in the letter of Heraclius (Chron. Paschal, p. 289.) and the history of Theophanes (Chron. p. 276-278.)

2 On the first rumour of the death of Chosroes, an Heraclian in two cantons was instantly published at Constantinople by George of Pisa, &c. A Vat. MS. and a poet much very much more insidious to the public enemy, (Cassiodorus, &c. v. 355.) but much more exact in the description of the person of Chosroes. (Cassiodorus, &c. v. 355.) The emperor Heraclonas (Annal. Eusebi. p. 249.) and Heraclius (Hist. Eccl. p. 9.) at the same time speak of another letter of Heraclius: he almost applauds the part of Siroes as an act of piety and justice.

3 The historical accounts of this last period of the Sassanian kings are found in Eutychius, (Annal. tom. ii. p. 251--256.) which describes the reception of Siroes, (p. 255.) and of the mother of Siroes, (p. 279.) and Asemaei (Biblioth. Oriental, tom. iii. p. 412--423.)

4 The letter of Siroes in the Paschal Chronicle (p. 9.) and other facts before he proceeds to business. The text appears in its execution in the history of Theophanes and Nicophorus.

5 The butchery of Corneille's song.

6 Monarch Heraclias au peuple qui l'attend, is much better suited to the present occasion. See his triumph in Thophanes, (p. 272--273.) and Nicophorus (p. 15.) The life of the first son of Heraclius (Chron. p. 284.) is rather more matter of interest than the life of the second son (B.B. Abbr. 256.) &c. p. 27.) The metaphor of the Sabbath is used, somewhat differently, by the emperor Vasilius. (Hist. Eccl. p. 7--10.) The year 692 A.D. the case had never been broken: and this preservation of the cross was ascribed (under God) to the devotion of queen Sara.

7 Compare, (see on Acroas. ii. 22.) and Panaetius, (p. 43.) and Heraclidas, Acroas. i. 65--69. I neglect the meaner parables of Daniel, (p. 211.) and Semeias, (p. 212.) and the apocryphal canons, or decretals of Blachelse, Pharaoh, the old serpent, &c.

8 Suidas (in Excerpt. Hist. Byzanz, p. 46.) gives this number: but either the Persians must be read for the Bavarians, or the passage does not belong to the emperor Heraclius. obscure town on the confines of Syria was pillaged by the Saracens, and they cut in pieces some troopers who advanced to its relief: an ordinary and trifling occurrence, had it not been the prelude of a mighty revolution. These robbers were the apostles of Mahomet; their frantic valor had emerged from the desert; and in the last eight years of his reign, Heraclius lost to the Arabs the same provinces which he had rescued from the Persians.
THE DECLINE AND FALL

CHAP. VIII.

the same voice which dictated to Isaiah the future conception of a virgin. The son of a virgin, generated by the ineffable operation of the Holy Spirit, was a creature without example or resemblance, superior in every attribute of mind and body to the children of Adam. Since the introduction of the Greek or Chaldean philosophy, the Jews were persuaded of the existence of pre-existence, transmigration, and immortality of souls; and Providence was justified by a supposition, that they were confined in their earthly prisons to extinguish the stains which they had contracted in a former state. But the degrees of purity and corruption are almost incredible. It might fairly be presumed that the most sublime and virtuous of human spirits was infused into the offspring of Mary and the Holy Ghost; that his abasement was the result of his voluntary choice; and that the object of his mission was to purify, not his own, but the sins of the world. On his return to his native skies, he received the immense reward of his obedience; the everlasting kingdom of the Messiah, which had been darkly foretold by the prophets, under the canals images of peace, of conquest, and of demilion. Omnipotence could enlarge the human faculties of Christ to the extent of his intention. In the large scope of divinity, the title of God has not been severely confined to the first parent, and his incomparable minister, his only-begotten Son; might claim, without presumption, the religious, though secondary, worship of a subject world.

II. A pure God to the docets. slowly arisen in the rocky and ungrateful soil of Judea, was transplanted, in full maturity, to the happier climes of the gentiles; and the strangers of Rome or Asia, who never beheld the manhood, were not only properly disposed to embrace the divinity, of Christ. The polytheist and the philosopher, the Greek and the barbarian, were alike accustomed to conceive a long succession, an infinite chain, of angels or demons, or deities, or demons, or emanations, issuing from the throne of light. Nor could it seem strange or incredible, that the first of these gods, Logos, or word of God, of the same substance with the Father, should descend upon earth, to deliver the human race from vice and error, and to conduct them in the paths of life and immortality. But the prevailing doctrine of the eternity and inherent purity of matter infected the primitive churches of the east. Many among the gentle proselytes refused to believe that a celestial spirit, an undivided portion of the first essence, had been personally united with a mass of impure and contaminated flesh: and, in their zeal for the divinity, they phlegmatically rejected the humanity, of Christ. While his blood was still recent on mount Calvary, the Docetists, a numerous and learned sect of Asia, invected the phænotic system, which was afterwards propagated by the Marcionites, the Manicheans, and the various names of the Gnostic heresy. They denied the truth and authenticity of the gospels, as far as they relate the conception of Mary, the birth of Christ, and the thirty years that preceded the establishment of the Messiah. He first appeared on the banks of the Jordan in the form of perfect manhood; but was a form only, and not substance; a human figure created by the hand of Omnipotence to imitate the faculties and actions of a man, and to impose a perpetual illusion on the senses of his friends and enemies. Artificers, in the same spirit of hypocrisy, that the image which was impressed on their optic nerve, eluded the most stubborn evidence of their touch; and they enjoyed the spiritual, not the corporeal, presence of the Son of God. The rage of the Jews was idly wasted against an impassive phantom; and the mystic scenes of the passion and death, the resurrection and ascension, of Christ, were represented on the theatre of Jerusalem for the benefit of mankind. If it were urged, that such ideal mimicking, such incessant deception was unworthy of the God of truth, the Docetists agreed with too many of their orthodox brethren, that the authority of antiquity. The title of God has not been severely confined to the first parent, and his incomparable minister, his only-begotten Son; might claim, without presumption, the religious, though secondary, worship of a subject world.

One of the most subtle disputants of His incorrupt the Manichean school, has pressed the body.

danger and indecency of supposing, that the God of man was clothed with an impassable and incorruptible body. Such, indeed, in the more orthodox a sys- tem, he has acquired since his resurrection, and such he must always have possessed, if it were capable of pervading, without resistance or injury, the density of intermediate matter. Devoid of its most essential properties, it might be exempt from the attributes of the infirmities of the flesh. A factus that could increase from an invisible point to its full maturity; a child that could attain the stature of perfect manhood, with- out deriving any nourishment from the ordinary sources, might continue to exist without repairing a daily waste by a daily supply of external matter. Jesus might share the repasts of his disciples without being subject to the calls of thirst or hunger; and his virgin purity was never sullied by the involuntary stains of sensual concupiscence. Of a body thus singularly constituted, a question would rise, by what means, and of what materials, it was originally framed; and our sounder theology is startled by an answer which was not peculiar to the Gnostics, that both the form and the substance proceeded from the divine essence. The ideal of pure and absolute spirit is a refinement of modern philosophy, derived from incorporeal essences, ascribed by the ancients to human souls, celestial beings, and even the Deity himself; does not exclude the notion of extended

1 About the year 200 of the Christian era, Irenæus and Hippolytus refuted the thirty-two sects, ex. \textit{cat. des sect.}. which had real- ized the rule of life in the time of Epiphanius, and ascribed the names of

1 Juxta auctore in several superstitios, apud Josuam Christi sanguine recente,

f. 22 (1 John iv 1-5).

2 The metaphysics of the soul are disannounced by Cicero, (\textit{Fiscul. 1. l.} and \textit{Maxim. de Tyri, (Deorin. xvi.) from the instructions of da-même, and often perplexed, the readers of the 3 The discipies of Jesus were persuaded that a man might have signs of divine inspiration. (\textit{John c. 10, 11.}) Phœnicians before transmigration of virtuous souls, (Joseph, de Bell. Judae. 1. i.)

4 The modern Rabbi is more modestly assured, that Hermes, Pythagoras, or Homer, did not invent them in their physiological speculations; his illustrious coun-

5 Four different opinions have been entertained concerning the origin of human souls. 1. That they are eternal and divine. 2. That they are of separate gate of existence, before their union with the body. 3. That they have been propagated from the original stock of Adam, who contained in himself the mental as well as the corporeal nature. 4. That human soul is essentially created and embodied in the moment of conception. The last of these opinions, very much more probable, have prevailed among the moderns. In our spiritual history the ground is grown less sublime, without becoming more intelligible.

6 The syrians, \textit{Dox. 601. \textit{c. 146. \textit{Ad. \textit{Alym.}}} was one of the fifteen heretics imputed to Origen, and denied by his apologists. (Photius, \textit{Bibl. \textit{ibid. ccc. cxxxv.}}) Some of this long attribute one and the same soul to the persons of Adam, David, and the Messiah.

space; and their imagination was satisfied with a subtle nature of air, or fire, or ether, incomparably more perfect than the grossness of the material world. If we define the place, we must describe the figure, of the Deity. Our experience, perhaps our vanity, represents, a mere semblance of a form. The anthropomorphists, who swarmed among the monks of Egypt and the catholics of Africa, could produce the express declaration of Scripture, that man was made after the image of his Creator. The venerable Serapion, one of the 'saints of the Nitrian desert, refuted them with many a tear, his dissertation, and bewailed like an infant, his unlucky conversion, which had stolen away his God, and left his mind without any visible object of faith or devotion. The fell shadows of Cerinthus of Asia, who dared to oppose the last of the apostles. Placed on the confines of the Jewish and Gentile world, he laboured to reconcile the Gnostic with the Ebionite, by confessing in the same Messiah the supernatural union of a man and a God. He was a jealous hatchet, most exacting, from their present, fanciful improvements by Carpocrates, Basilides, and Valentine, the heretics of the Egyptian school. In their eyes, Jesus of Nazareth was a mere mortal, the legitimate son of Joseph and Mary: but he was the best and wisest of the human race, selected as the vehicle of the celestial person, and to confirm the true and supreme Deity. When he was baptized in the Jordan, the Chast, the first of the woes, the Son of God himself, descended on Jesus in the form of a dove, to inhabit his mind and direct his actions, during the allotted period of his ministry. When the Messiah was delayed, the infant person of this Jews, the Christ, an immortal and impossible being, forsook his earthly tabernacle, flew back to the plurona, or world of spirits, and left the solitary Jesus to suffer, to complain, and to expire. But the justice and generosity of such a desertion are strongly questionable; and the fate of an innocent martyr, at first perplexed, and at length abandoned, by his divine companion, might provoke the pity and indignation of the profane. Their murmurs were variously silenced by the sectaries who espoused and modified the double system of Cerinthus. It was alleged, that when Jesus was made the mediator, the place of the apathy of mind and body, which rendered him insensible of his apparent sufferings. It was affirmed, that

V. All those who believe the immnu- 4. Divine in-

ternity of the soul, a specious and noble carnation of the factum absolutum, most exacted, from their present, a fancy upon the edge of a precipice where it was im- possible to recede, dangerous to stand, dreadful to fall; and the manifold inconveniences of their creed were aggravated by the sublime character of their theology. They hesitated to pronounce; that God himself, the Word of the second person, had been crucified and nailed to the cross. It was manifested in the flesh; that a being who pervaded the universe had been confined in the womb of Mary; that his eternal duration had been marked by the days, and months, and years, of human existence; that the Almighty had been scourged and crucified; that his impenetrable essence had felt pain and anguish; that his omniscience was not exempt from ignorance; and that the source of life and immortality expired on mount Calvary. These alarming consequences were affirmed with unblushing simplicity by Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, and one of the luminaries of the church. The son of a learned grammarian, he was skilled in all the sciences of Greece; eloquence, erudi- tion, and philosophy, conscious in the volumes of Apollinaris, were humbly devoted to the service of religion. The worthy friend of Athanasius, the worthy antagonist of Julian, he bravely wrestled with the Arians, and preserved the faith; in the rigour of geometrical demonstration, his commentaries revealed the literal and allegorical sense of the Scriptures. A mystery, which had long floated in the loose- ness of public belief, was defined by his perverse vigour in a mathematical form; and he first proclaimed the memorable words, "One incarnate nature of Christ," which are still re-echoed with hostile clamours in the churches of Asia, Egypt, and Ethiopia. He taught that the Godhead was united or mingled with the nature of a man; and that the Logos, the eternal wisdom, supplied in the flesh the place and office of a human soul. Yet as the profound doctor had been terrified at his own rashness, Apollinaris was heard to mutter some faint accents of excuse and explanation. He continued the carnal nature of Christ, whose body either came from heaven, impassable and incorruptible, or was absorbed, and as it were transformed, into the essence of the Deity. The system of Apollinaris was strenuously attacked by the Asiatic and Syriac divines, whose schools were followed by the names of Basil, Gregory, and Chrysostom, and tainted by those of Diodorus, Theodore, and Nestorius. But the person of the aged bishop of Landecan, his character and dignity, remained inviolate; and his rivals, since we may not suspect them of the weakness of toleration, were anony, heed, perhaps, by the novelty of the arguments and difficult of the final sentence of the Catholic Church. Her judgment at length inclined in their favour; the heresy of Apollinaris was condemned, and the separate congregations of his disciples were proscribed. The legal laws of the Church were established, from the arguments and documents. Yet secretly entertained in the monasteries of Egypt, and his enemies felt the hatred of Theophilus and Cyril, the successive patriarchs of Alexandria.

V. Orthodox con. V. The grovelling Ebionite, and the sect and verbal phantastic Decrees, were rejected and denounced.

But instead of a temporary and occasional alliance, they established, and we still embrace, the substantial, indis- soluble, and everlasting union of the three persons of the Trinity, with a reasonable and human flesh. In the beginning of the fifth century the unity of the two natures was the prevailing doctrine of the Church. On all sides, it was confessed, that the mode of their co-existence could neither be represented by our ideas, nor expressed by our language. Yet a secret and ineradicable discord was cherished, between those who were most apprehensive of confounding, and those who were more fearful of separating, the divinity and the humanity of Christ. Impelled by religious frenzy, they fled with adverse hands from each other, and their alliances were perverted by the most destructive of truth and salvation. On either hand they were anxious to guard, they were jealous to defend, the union and the distinction of the two natures, and to invent such forms of speech, such symbols of doctrine, as were least susceptible of doubt or ambiguity. The poverty of ideas and language tempted them to ramnack art and nature for every possible comparison, and each comparison mised their fancy in the explanation of an incomparable mystery. In the polemic microscope, an atom is enlarged to a monster, and each particle is made evident or invisible, and conclusions that might be extricated from the principles of their adversaries. To escape from each other, they wandered through many a dark and devioes thicket, till they were astonished by the horrid phantoms of Erasmus and Apollinaris, who guarded the opposite issues of the theological labyrinth. As soon as they beheld the twilight of sense and heresy, they started, measured back their steps, and were again involved in the gloom of impenetrable orthodoxy. To purge them- selves from the guilt or reproach of damnable error, they disavowed their consequences, explained their principles, excused their indiscretions, and unanimously pronounced the sounds of concord and faith. Yet a latent and almost invisible spark still lurked among the embers of controversy; by the breath of prejudice and passion, it was quickly kindled to a mighty flame, and the verbal disputes of the oriental sects have shaken the pillars of the church and state.

The name of Cyril of Alexandria is famous in controversial story, and the catalogue of the living and his and his party have finally prevailed. In the house of his uncle, the archbishop Theophilus, he inherited the orthodox lessons of zeal and dominion, and five years of his youth were profitably spent in the adjacent monasteries of Nitria. Under the tuition of the abbot Serapion, he applied himself to ecclesiastical studies with such indefatigable zeal that Cyril parochy, torn, that in the course of one sleepless night he has pursed the four gospels, the catholic epistles, and the epistle to the Romans. Origen he detested; but the writings of Clemens and Didymus of Athens and Basil, were continually in his hands: by the theory and practice of dispute, his faith was confirmed, but his wit was sharpened; he extended round his cell the censers of scholastic theology, and meditated all the arts of allegory and metaphysics, and the more sordid, in several eccentric, folios, now peacefully slumber by the side of their rivals. Cyril prayed and fasted in the desert, but his thoughts (it is the re- proach of a friend?) were still fixed on the world; and the call of Theophilus, who summoned him to the metropolitan throne, was received by the aspiring hermit. With the approbation of his uncle he assumed the office, and acquired the fame of a popular preacher. His comely person adorned the pulpit, the harmony of his voice resounded in the cathedral, his friends were stationed to lead or second the applause of the congregation, and the last meters of the serio preserved his discourses, which, in their effect, though not in their composition, might be compared with those of the Athenian orators. The death of Theophilus expanded and realized the hopes of his successor; for Cyril, the most unprejudiced, and free soldiers and their general supported the claim of the archdeacon; but a resisting multitude, with voices and with hands, asserted the cause of their favourite; and, after a period of thirty-nine years, Cyril was settled on the throne of Alexandria. The privity was not unworthy of his ambition. At a distance from the court, A. D. 413, 414, and at the head of an immense capital, the patriarch, as he was now styled, of Alexandria, had gradually usurped the state and authority of a civil magistrate. The public and private charities of this city were administered in a manner that could not induce or appease the passions of the multitude; his commands were blindly obeyed by his numerous and fanatical parabolani, familiarized in their daily office.

1 I appeal to the confession of two oriental prelates, Gregory the Bichaphor and the Jacobite Patriarch of the east, and Elias the Nesterian metropolitan of Damascus (see Asseman, Bibliotheca Oriental, tom. ii. p. 259. col. 86, p. 511, &c.) that the Melchites, Jacobites, Nestorians, &c. agree in the doctrine, and differ only in the expression. Our most learned Christian divines—Bosanquet, Le Clerc, Asseman, La Croze, Mascheim, Juchoty are inclined to favor this charitable position; but the zeal of Pelagius is bold and angry, and the moderation of Dupin is considered in a whisper.

2 La Croze (Hist. du Christianisme des Indoors, tom. ii. p. 24,) avows that the Syriac, Nile and Arabic countries are less open to ancient authors, i.e. they are not prudently read with more diligence; and Dupin (Bibliotheque Ecclésiastique, tom. iv. p. 52, &c.) words of respect, teaches us to despise them.

3 Of Isidore of Pelusium (i. c, epist. 25, p. 5,) as the letter is not of the most honest sort, Tillemont, less sincere than the Bollandists, assigns a doubt whether this Cyril is the nephew of Theophilus. (Mem. de l'Acad. des Sciences, tom. vi. p. 285.)

4 A grammarian is named by Socrates (Hist. viii. 13.) Anastasius, or Anastasius, Bishop, at Antioch in Syria. We are not ignorant of the person, 25, p. 5.) as the letter is not of the most honest sort, Tillemont, less sincere than the Bollandists, assigns a doubt whether this Cyril is the nephew of Theophilus. (Mem. de l'Acad. des Sciences, tom. vi. p. 285.)
with scenes of death; and the prefects of Egypt were awed or provoked by the temporal power of these churchmen. An obstacle, however, was by no means removed. Cyril suspiciously opened his reign by oppressing the Novatians, the most innocent and harmless of the sectaries. The interdiction of their religious worship appeared in his eyes a just and meritorious act; and he confiscated their holy vessels, without apprehending the guilt of sacrilege. The toleration, and even the privileges, of the Jews, who had multiplied to the number of forty thousand, were secured by the laws of the Cæsars and Ptolemies, and a long prescription of seven hundred years since the foundation of Alexandria. Without any legal sentence, without any royal mandate, public, or private, nor any declaration that such might be the aediles, a seditious multitude to the attack of the synagogues. Unarmed and unprepared, the Jews were incapable of resistance; their houses of prayer were levelled with the ground, and the episcopal warrior, after rewarding his troops with the plunder of their goods, expelled from the city the remnant of the unbelieving sect. Perhaps he might plead the insolence of their prosperity, and their deadly hatred of the Christians, whose blood they had recently shed in a malicious or accidental tumult. Such crimes would have deserved the animadversion of the magistrate; but in this promiscuous massacre, the only sin, the only guilt, and Alexandria was impoverished by the loss of a wealthy and industrious colony. The zeal of Cyril exposed him to the penalties of the Julian law; but in a feeble government, and a superstitious age, he was secure of impunity, and even of praise. On the other hand, it is possible that the charges were too quickly forgotten by the ministers of Theodosius, and too deeply remembered by a priest who affected to pardon, and continued to hate, the prefect of Egypt. As he passed through the streets, his chariot was assailed by a band of five hundred of the Niren mob, and again by the wild beasts of the desert; his protestations that he was a christian and a catholic, were answered by a volley of stones, and the face of Orestes was covered with blood. The loyal citizens of Alexandria hastened to his rescue; he instantaneously claimed his justice and revenge against the monk by whose hand he had been wounded, and Ammonius expired under the rod of the licent. At the command of Cyril his body was raised from the ground, and transported, in solemn procession, to the cathedral; the name of Ammonius was changed to that of Chrysostomus the woodcutter; his tomb was decorated with the trophies of martyrdom, and the patriarch ascended the pulpit to celebrate the magnanimity of an assassin and a rebel. Such honours might incite the faithful to combat and die under the banners of the saint; and he soon promised, or accepted, the sacrifice of a virgin, who professed the religion of the Greeks, and cultivated the friendship of Orestes. Hypatia, the daughter of Theon the mathematician, was initiated in her father's studies: her learned comments have elucidated the geometry of Apollonius and Diophantus, and she publicly taught, both at Athens and Alexandria, the science of arithmetic and geometry. In the bloom of beauty, and in the maturity of wisdom, the modest maid refused her lovers and instructed her disciples; the persons most illustrious for their rank or merit were impatient to visit the female philosopher; and Cyril beheld, with a jealous eye, the gorgeous train of horses and slaves who crowded the door of her academy. A rumour was spread among the christians, that the daughter of Theon was the Virgin, to whom the obstacle was by no means removed. The archbishop; and that obstacle was speedily removed. On a fatal day, in the holy season of Lent, Hypatia was torn from her chariot, stripped naked, dragged to the church, and inhumanly butchered by the hands of Peter the reader, and a troop of savage and merciless fanatics; flesh and bone were torn from her bones with sharp oyster-shells, and her quivering limbs were delivered to the flames. The just progress of inquiry and punishment was stopped by seasonal gifts; but the murder of Hypatia has imprinted an indelible stain on the character and religion of Cyril of Alexandria.

Supercition, perhaps, would more generally expiate the blood of a virgin, than the banishment of a saint; and Cyril had accompanied his uncle to the iniquitous synod of the Oak. When the memory of Chrysostom was restored and consorted, the nephew of Theophilus, at the head of a dying faction, still maintained the justice of his sentence; nor was it till after a tedious delay and an obstinate resistance, that he yielded to the consent of the catholic world. His enmity to the Byzantine pontiff was a second cause of popular dissatisfaction; as he raised, when he envied their fortune station in the sunshine of the imperial court; and he dreaded their upstart ambition, which oppressed the metropolitans of Europe and Asia, invaded the provinces of Antioch and Alexandria, and measured the dignities of the church by those of the Persian. The long moderation of Atticus, the second usurer of the throne of Chrysostom, suspended the animosities of the eastern patriarchs; but Cyril was at length awakened by the exaltation of a rival more worthy of his esteem and hatred. After the short and troubled reign of Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, the factions of the clergy and people were appeased by the choice of the emperor, who, on this occasion, consulted the voice of fame, and invited the meritor of a stranger. Nestorius, a native of Germanicia, and a monk of Antioch, was recommended by the austerity of his life, and the purity of his morals; but the first honours which he presided before the devout Theodosius betrayed the arrograncy and impatience of his zeal. "Give me, O Cæsar!" he exclaimed, "give me the earth purged of heretics, and I will give you in exchange the kingdom of heaven. Exterminate with the heretics, and with you I will exterminate the Persians." On the fifth day, as the treaty had been already signed, the patriarch of Constantinople discovered, surprised, and attacked, a secret conventicle of the Arians; they preferred death to submission; the flames that were kindled by their despair, soon spread to the neighbouring houses, and the triumphs of Cyril was clouded by the name of inconsiderable. On either side of the Hellespont his episcopal vigour imposed a rigid formality of faith and discipline; a chronological error concerning the festival of Easter was punished as an offence against the church and state. Lydia and Curtia, Sardes and Miletus, were punished, with the blood of the restless Quartodecimans; and the edict of the emperor, either of the patriarch, enumerates thirty and twenty degrees and denominations in the guilt and punishment of heresy. But the sword of persecution, which Nestorius so fearlessly wielded, was turned against his own breast. Religion was the pretext; but, in the judgment of a contemporary saint, ambition was the genuine motive of epileptic warfare.

His heresy. In the Syrian school, Nestorius had A.D. 431 been taught to abhor the confession of the two natures, as improperly denoting the humanity of his master Christ from the divinity of the Lord Jesus. The Blessed Virgin he revered as the mother of Christ, but his ears were offended with the rush and recent title of mother of God; which had been instilled into the faithful since the origin of the Arian controversy. From the pulpit of Constantineople, a friend of the patriarch, and afterwards the patriarch himself, repeatedly preached against the use, or the abuse, of a word unknown to the apostles, unauthorized by the church, and which could only tend to alarm the timorous, and distort the simple, to the attentive, to justify, by a seeming resemblance, the old genealogy of Olympus. In his calmer moments Nestorius confessed, that it might be tolerated or excused by the unoin of the two natures, and the communication of their idiom but he was excommunicated, by contradiction, to his former sentiments. In the threaten of an infant Deity, to draw his inadequate similes from the conjugal or civil partnerships of life, and to describe the manhood of Christ as the robe, the instrument, the tabernacle of his Godhead. At these blasphemous sounds, the pillars of the sanctuaries were shaken. The unsuccessful competitors of Nestorius indulged their pious or personal resentment; the Byzantine clergy were secretly displeased with the intrusion of a stranger who is superior or absurd, might claim the protection of the monks; and the people were interested in the glory of their virgin patron. The sentence of the archbishop, and the service of the altar, were disturbed by seditious clamours: his authority and doctrine were renounced by separate congregations; every wind scattered round the empire the leaves of controversy; and the voice of the combatants on a sonorous theatre re-echoed in the cells of Pales- titian. It was the festive atrocity of the zeal and ignorance of his innumerable monks: in the school of Alexandria, he had imbibed and profes- sed the incarneation of one nature; and the successor of Athanasius consulted his pride and ambition, when he rose in arms against another Arius, more formidable and more guilty, on the second throne of the hierarchy. After a short correspondence, in which the rival prelates disguised their hatred in the hollow language of respect and charity, the patriarch of Alexandria denounced to the prince and people, to the east and to the west, the damnable error of the Nestorian parti- ff. From Egypt, most especially from Alexandria, he obtained the ambiguous counsels of toleration and silence, which were addressed to both parties while they favoured the cause of Nestorius. But the Vati- can received with open arms the messengers of Egypt. The vanity of Celestine was flattered by the appeal, and the partial version of a monk decided the faith of the pope, who, with his Latin clergy, was ignorant of the language, the arts, and the theology of the Greeks. At the head of an Italian synod, Celestine weighed the merits of the cause, approved the creed of Cyril, and recommended the submission of the prelates. He degraded the heretic from his episcopal dignity, allow- ed a respite of ten days for recantation and penance, and delegated to his enemy the execution of this rash and illegal sentence. But the patriarch of Alexandria, while the Vaticans were deliberating, added the victory to his triumph, and severe doctrines of Cyril. The professions of Nestorius have satisfied the wiser and less partial theologians of the present time?

Yet neither the emperor nor the pri-

First council of mate of the east were disposed to obey Ephesus, and the mandate of an Italian priest; and

A.D. 431,

June—October,

in the synod of the catechumens or rather of the episcopal

the Greek church was unanimously demanded as the sole remedy that could appease or decide this ecclesiastical quarrel. Ephesus, on all sides accessible by sea and land, was chosen for the place, the festival held for the day of the meeting; a writ of summons was dispatched to each despot, acropol-

and a guard was stationed to protect and confine the fathers till they should settle the mysteries of heaven, and the faith of the earth. Nestorius appeared not as a criminal, but as a judge; he depended on the weight rather than the number of his partisans, and his sturdy slaves from the baths of Zeuxippos, were armed for every service of injury or defence. But his adversary Cyril was more powerful in the weapons both of the flesh and of the spirit. Disobedient to the letter, or at least to the meaning, of the royal summons, he was attended by fifty Egyptian bishops, who expected from their patriarch's nod

the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. He had contracted

1 Cod. Theod. i. xvi. tit. v. frag. 65, with the illustrations of Bar-nissus. (A. D. 428. No. 33.) Gedofrey, (ad locum) and Pagi, (Critica, tom. iv. p. 292.)

2 Isidore of Pelusium, (i. iv. Epist. 37.) His words are strong and potent, but they are inapplicable to the present discussion. 'Hæc siuncta, quæ idemnimus monebamus, omnis religionis, qui cru-do a saint, i.e. a saint, but he never became a bishop; and I half suspect that the priest of Daphnetes trampled on the pride of Plato.

3 La Croze (Christianisme des Indes, tom. i. p. 41—53.) The Theology Épiscopale La Crozet, (tom. iii. p. 276—280) has detected the use of idées et de mo-

luscules, which, in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, discriminate the school of Diodorus of Tarsus and his Nestorian disciples.

4 The CEupiir—Depa-

ara: as in zoology we familiarly speak of ovipa-rous and viviparous animals. It is not easy to fix the invention of this word, which La Croze (Christianisme des Indes, tom. i. p. 18,) ascribes to Enesius of Cesarea and the Arians. The orthodox texts, monkeys are created by Cyril and Petaius, (Bogus, Theologic, tom.

v. i. v. c. 15. p. 234, &c.) but the versatity of the saint is questionable; and if it could be shown, that Cyril, or his manuscripts, is the author of this expression, he is quite entitled to the title of a catholic MS.

5 The passage of Arelius already hinted at the newCybele of the Christian, (I. i. c. 51.) a letter was forged in the name of Nester, in order to introduce the idea of the theatre of the Syriac version, even in those copies which were used by the Chrisians of St. Thomas on the coast of Malabar. (La Croze, Christianisme des Indes, tom. i. p. 317.) The ylotheologus of the Nestorians and Monophysites, insists on the godly purity of that divine MS.

6 The Synod of Ephesus held in 428 is confirmed by that of his friends Jabonski (Theor. Epist. tom. iv. p. 193—195; and Modern, i. 304. Nestorius' criminal carnage est non est manantwrum, et de quadam semi-universalis, and three more respectable judges with not even itronics. (Synod. Carn. 196, in iv. tom. Concil. p. 484.) In the article of Nestorius, Bayle has placed a small instruction on the writings of the Nestorians. (Deiphilo. Orient. tom. iv. p. 224,) the guilt and error of the Nestorians.

7 The Council of the Nestorians of the Persian territory, till the synod of Ephesus, may be found in Socin. (tom. v. c. 37—41.) The Christians of the 1st. c. 1. 1. 12) Libertus, (div. iv. c. 4.) the original Acts, (Concil. tom. i. p. 507.) edited with some enlarge-

an intimate alliance with Monnem bishop of Ephesus. The despicable-primate of Asia disposed of the ready succours of thirty or forty episcopal votes; a crowd of peasants, the looters of churches, were incited by the bishop to support with blows and clamours a metaphysical argument; and the people zealously asserted the honour of the Virgin, whose body reposed within the walls of Ephesus. The fleet which had transported Cyrus from Alexandria was laden with the riches of Egypt; and he dispersed the churches, villages, monks, nuns, slaves, and fanatics, enlisted with blind obedience under the banner of St. Mark and the mother of God. The fathers, and even the guards, of the council were awed by this martial array; the adversaries of Cyril and Mary were insulted in the streets, or threatened in their houses; his execrations multiplied, his anathemas made a daily increase in the number of his adherents; and the Egyptian soon computed that he might command the attendance and the voices of two hundred bishops. But the author of the twelve anathemas foresaw and dreaded the opposition of John of Antioch, who, with a small, though respectable, train of metropolitans and clergy, was advancing by slow journeys from the distant capital of the east. Impatient of a delay, which he stigmatized as voluntary and culpable, Cyrus opened the session of the synod sixteen days after the festival of Pentecost. Nestorius, who depended on the near approach of his cause; and the aspect of Theodores. They must have interposed, to dissemble the jurisdiction, and to disobey the summons, of his enemies: they hastened his trial, and his accuser presided in the seat of judgment. Sixty-eight bishops, twenty-two of metropolitan rank, defended his cause by a modest and temperate protest; they were excluded from the councils of their brethren. Candidian, in the emperor's name, requested a delay of four days: the profane magistrate was driven with outrage and insult from the assembly of the saints. The whole of this momentous transaction was crowded into the compass of a summer's day: the bishops delivered their separate opinions; but the uniformity of style reveals the influence or the hand of a master, who has been accused of corrupting the public evidence of their acts and subscriptions. Without a dissenting voice, they recognized in the epistles of Cyril, the Nestorian, the third occasion of the controversy, and the partial extracts from the letters and homilies of Nestorius were interrupted by curses and anathemas; and the heretic was degraded from his episcopal and ecclesiastical dignity. The sentence, maliciously inscribed to the new Judas, was affixed and proclaimed in the same position which had disgraced the church of Ephesus from the days of Marcion. The same imputation was urged by some critics; issued from the church of the mother of God, were saluted as her champions; and her victory was celebrated by the illuminations, the songs, and the tumult of the night.

On the fifth day, the triumph was assumed by the arrival and indignation of the eastern bishops. In a change of the wind, before the bishop of Ephesus, John of Antioch gave audience to Candidian the imperial minister; who related his ineffectual efforts to prevent or to annul the hasty violence of the Egyptian. With equal haste and violence, the oriental synod of fifty bishops degraded Cyril and Monnem into their ecclesiastical capacities, deposed the twelve anathemas, the purest venom of the Apellian heresy, and described the Alexandria primate as a monster, born and educated for the destruction of the church. His throne was distant and inaccessible; but they instantly resolved to bestow on the fork of Ephesus the epithet of Monnem. The synod of the vigilance of Monnem, the churches were shut against them, and a strong garrison was thrown into the cathedral. The troops, under the command of Candidian, advanced to the assault; the outguards were routed and put to the sword, but the place was impregnable: the besiegers retired; their retreat was pursued by a vigorous sally; they lost their horses, and many of the soldiers were dangerously wounded with clubs and stones. Ephesus, the city of the Virgin, was defiled with rage and clamour, with sedition and blood; the rival synods dared anathemas and excommunications from their spiritual engines; and the Catholic churches were in a state of civil war and contradictory narratives of the Syrian and Egyptian factions. During a busy period of three months, the emperor tried every method, except the most effectual means of indifference and contempt, to reconcile this theological quarrel. He attempted to remove or intimidate the leaders by a common sentence of acquittal or condemnation; he inveighed his representatives at Ephesus with ample power and military force: he summoned from either party eight choosen deputies to a free and candid conference in the neighbourhood of the capital, far from the contagion of popular frenzy. But the orients refused to yield, and the catholics, proud of their numbers and of their Latin allies, rejected all terms of union or toleration. The patience of the monk Theodosius was provoked, and he dissolved in anger this episcopal tumult, which at the distance of thirteen centuries assumes the venerable aspect of a conflict between the principles of a great disputant, who said the pious prince, "that I am not the author of this confusion. His providence will discern and punish the guilty. Return to your provinces, and may your private virtues repair the mischief and scandal of your meeting." They returned to their provinces; but the same impressions which had discredited the church of Ephesus were diffused over the eastern world. After three obstinate and equal campaigns, John of Antioch and Cyril of Alexandria understood to explain and embrace: but their seeming re-union must be imputed rather to prudence than to reason, to the mutual disparity rather than to the christian charity of the patriarchs.

The Byzantine pontiff had instilled Victory of Cyril. In the royal ear a baleful prejudice A.D. 431—435, against the character and conduct of his Egyptian rival. An epistle of menace and invective, which... accompanies the summons, accused him as a busy, insolent, and envious priest, who perverted the simplicity of the faith, violated the peace of the church and state, and laboured to destroy the influence of the wife and sister of Theodosius, presumed to suppose, or to scatter, the seeds of discord in the imperial family. At the stern command of his sovereign, Cyril had repented to Ephesus, where he was resisted, threatened, and confined, by the magistrates in the interests of Nestorius and the orthodox; who assembled the troops of Lydian and Iouia to suppress the fanatic and disorderly strain of the patriarch. Without expecting the royal licence, he escaped from his guards, precipitately embarked, deserted the imperfect synod, and retired to his episcopal fortress of Salona. Amidst the sufferings of his hope, and his confessions, both in the court and city, successfully laboured to appease the resentment, and to conciliate the favour, of the emperor. The feeble son of Arcadius was alternatively swayed by his wife and sister, by the eunuchs and women of the palace; superstition and aversion were their ruling passions; and the orthodox chiefs were assiduous in their endeavours to alarm the former, and to gratify the latter. Constantinople and the suburbs were sanctified with frequent monasteries, and the holy abbeys, Dalmatius and Eutyches, had prefixed the zeal and fidelity to the cause of Cyril, the worship of Mary, and the unity of Christ. From the first moment of their monastic life, they had never mingled with the world, or trod the profane ground of the city. But in this awful moment of the danger of the church, their vow was superseded by a more sublime and indispensable duty. At the head of a long order of monks and hermits, who carried burning tapers in their hands, and chanted litanies to the mother of God, they proceeded from their monasteries to the palace. The people were edified and inflamed by this extraordinary spectacle, and the trembling populace adhered to the prayers and entreaties of the saints, who boldly pronounced, that none could hope for salvation, unless they embraced the person and the creed of the orthodox successor of Athanasius. At the same time every avenue of the throne was assaulted with gold. Under the decent names of embassy and benefaction, the couriers carried bribes according to their measure and rapacity. But their incessant demands despoiled the sanctuaries of Constantinople and Alexandria; and the authority of the patriarch was unable to silence the just murmurs of his clergy, that a debt of sixty thousand pounds had already been recommended to support the expense of scandalous usurpation. Pulcheria, who relieved her brother of the weight of an empire, was the finest pillar of orthodoxy; and so intimate was the alliance between the thunders of the synod and the whispers of the court, that Cyril was assured of success if he could place one enmouch, and substitute another in the favour of Theodosius. Yet the Egyptian could not boast of a glorious or decisive victory. The emperor, with unaccustomed firmness, adhered to his promise of protecting the innocence of the oriental bishops; and Cyril softened his antagonisms, and confessed, with meekness and repentance, a two-fold error: −

The rash and obstinate Nestorius, before the council of Ephesus, had been accused by Cyril, betrayed by the court, and faintly supported by his eastern friends. A sentiment of fear or indignation prompted him, while it was yet time, to affect the glory of a voluntary abdication: his wish, or at least his request, was readily granted; he was banished to the island of Corfu, and his name deprecated by the empress and her son, and his successor, Maximian and Proclus, were acknowledged as the lawful bishops of Constantinople.

But in the silence of his cell, the degraded patriarch could no longer resume the innocence and security of a private citizen. A new storm had burst on him, and he was dissolved in the present, and the future he had reason to dread: the oriental bishops successively disengaged their cause from his unpopular name, and each day decreased the number of the schismatics who revered Nestorius as the confessor of the faith. After a residence at Antioch, he found a more convenient home in Ionia, where he composed his work of Hippocratic laws. He was submitted to the pope, and from the church and from the world, the exile was still pursued by the rage of bigotry and war. A wandering tribe of the Byzantines or Nubians invaded his solitary prison; in their retreat they dismissed a crowd of useless captives; but no sooner had Nestorius been abandoned, than they suddenly and gradually have escaped from a Roman and orthodox city to the milder servitude of the savages. His flight was punished as a new crime; the soul of the patriarch inspired the civil and ecclesiastical powers of Egypt; the magistrates, the soldiers, the monks, devoutly tory, pressed for the timely and adjourned trial, so as to constitute the confines of Ethiopia, the heretic was alternately dragged and recalled, till his aged body was broken by the hardships and accidents of these reiterated journeys. Yet his mind was still independent, and at last the president of the West was raised by his pastoral letters; he confirmed the orthodox thirteen of Alexandria, and, after sixteen years' banishment, the synod of Chalcodon would perhaps have restored him to the honours, or at least to the communion, of the church. The death of Nestorius prevented his obedience to their welcome summons; and his disease might afford a

4. The tedious negotiations that succeeded the synod of Ephesus are diffusely related in the original Acts (Concil. tom. iii, p. 1369—1771), ad fin. vol. and the Synodicon, in tom. vi.) Bocrates, &c. viii, c. 29, 35, 41.) Evagrius, &c. (c, 6, 7, 8, 12.) Libanius, c. 7—10.) Tillemont, Mem. Eccles. tom. xiv, p. 407—676. The most patient reader will thank me for compressing so much nonsense and falsehood in a few lines.

5. C. 15, 14. 25, 26.) 6. The original letters in the Synodicon, c. 15, 14. 25, 26.) 7. The odious name of Simmiones, which was affixed to the disciples of this heretic by Evagrius, Nestorian writer, and Asseman, Bibliot, Oriental, tom. iii, p. 239, 302.

8. See the narrative of the murders in the Acts of the Synod, Council, tom. iii, p. 1739—1759.) 9. Theergus, &c. 10. Theergus, &c. 11. Aegypt. These are the resources of the scholars who desired only to make a noise, and in shadows.

10. The eunuch of islands is applied by the grave civilans (Pand. 1. xxiv. 22, leg.) to those happy spots which are discritely watered and verdured by the Libyan sands. These three are the principal names of Otho, who is called the eunuch by Isidore Ammian. 11. The middle Oasis three days' journey to the south of Sycamore, and six days' journey from the oasis in the first climate, and only three days' journey from the confederacy. Yet these were Christian, and did only the learned Natale of Michaelis, Ad Descript. Egypt. 12. p. 51—53.

12. The invitation of Nestorius to the synod of Athens, was rejected by Zebetius, bishop of Methanae, Evagrius, &c. 13. c. 2. Asseman, Bibliot, Orient, tom. ii, p. 53, and the famous Xenianus or Philoxenus, bishop of Methanae; monastic history is preserved by Evagrius and Asseman, and stoutly maintained by La Croze, (Thersex, Epistol. tom. i, p. 151, &c.) The fact is not improbable; yet it was the interest of the Monophysites to spread the imposture, and Eutychius (tom. ii, p. 127, affirms, that Nestorius died after some colour to the scandalous report, that his tongue, the organ of blasphemy, had been eaten by the worms. He was succeeded by Upper Egypt, whose names were Chemnis, Panopolis, or Akmin, 3 but the immortal naivete of the Jacobites has persevered for ages to cast stones against the sepulchre, and to propagate the foolish tradition, that it was never watered by the rain of heaven, which equally descends on the righteous and the ungodly. 4 Humanity may drop a tear on the fate of Nestorius: yet justice must observe, that he suffered the persecution which he had approved and inflicted. 5
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

135

Heresy of Euty. The death of the Alexandrian primate, thus, after a reign of thirty-two years, abandons Egypt to the still lingering and unavailing efforts of zeal and the abuse of victory. 6 The Monophysite doctrine (one incarnate nature) was rigorously preached in the churches of Egypt and the monasteries of the east; the primitive creed of Apollinaris was protected by the sanctity of Cyril; and the name of Eutyches, his venerable friend, has been applied to the sect most adverse to the Syrian heresy of Nestorius. His rival Eutyches was the abbot, archimandrite, or superior, of three hundred monks, but the opinions of a simple and illiterate recluse might have expired in the cell, where he had slept above seventy years, if the resolution of the synod of Constantinople, the Byantine pontiff, had not exposed the scandal to the eyes of the christian world. His domestic synod was instantly convened, their proceedings were sullied with clamour and artifice, and the aged heretic was surprised into a seeming confession, that Christ had not derived his body from the substance of the Virgin Mary. From their partial decree, Eutyches appealed to a general council, and his cause was vigorously asserted by his godson Chrysophlius, the reigning archon of the palace, and his accomplice Dioscorus, who had succeeded to the throne, the creed, the talents, and the vices of the nestorian Monophysite, of Eutyches, the second synod of Ephesus was judiciously composed of ten metropolitans and ten bishops from each of the six dioceses of the eastern empire: some exceptions of favour or merit enlarged the number to one hundred and thirty-five; and the Syrian Barsumas, as the chief and representative of the monks, was invited to sit and vote with the successors of the apostles. But the despotism of the Alexandrian patriarch again oppressed the freedom of debate: the same spiritual and carnal weapons were again drawn against the purity of the faith. The same persons, a band of archers, served under the orders of Dioscorus; and the more formidable monks, whose minds were inaccessible to reason or mercy, besieged the doors of the cathedral. The general, and, as it should seem, the unconstrained, voice of the fathers, accepted the faith and even the monothelias of Cyril; and the heresy of the two natures was formally condemned in the persons and writings of the most learned orientals. 7 May those who divide Christ be divided with the sword, may they be hewn asunder! were the charitable wishes of a christian synod. 8 The concourse and sanctity of Eutyches were acknowledged without hesitation; but the prelates, more especially those of Thrace and Asia, were unwilling to depose their patriarch for the use or even abuse of his lawful jurisdiction. They embraced the names of Dioscorus, as he stood with a threatening aspect on the footstool of his throne, and conjured him to forgive the offences, and to respect the dignity, of his brother. 9 Do you mean to raise a sedition? exclaimed the relentless tyrant. Where are the officers? 10 At these words a furious multitude of monks and soldiers, with staves, and swords, and chains, burst into the church: the trembling bishops hid themselves behind the altar. In the rage of this great synod, they were not inspired with the zeal of martyrdom, they successively subscribed a blank paper, which was afterwards filled with the condemnation of the Byantine pontiff. Flavian was instantly delivered to the wild beasts of this spiritual amphitheatre: the monks were stimulated by the voice and example of Barsumas to avenge the injures of Christ: it is said that the patriarch of Alexandria reviled, and buffeted, and kicked, and trampled his brother of Constantinople; and it is certain, that the victim, before he could reach the place of his exile, expired on the third day, of which he bade farewell to Eutyches and Dioscorus. This second synod has been justly branded as a gang of robbers and assassins; yet the accusers of Dioscorus would magnify his violence, to alleviate the cowardice and inconstancy of their own behaviour.

The faith of Egypt had prevailed: but the vaunted party was supported by the council of Chalcedon, founded by the same pope who encountered without fear the hostile rage of Attila and Genseric. The theology of Leo, his famous tome or epistle on the mystery of the incarnation, had been disregarded by the synod of Ephesus; his authority, and that of the Lateran council, was respected, who excepted from slavery and death to relate the melancholy tale of the tyranny of Dioscorus and the martyrdom of Flavian. His provincial synod annulled the irregular proceedings of Ephesus; but as this step was itself irregular, he solicited the convention of a general council for the time and place in which he had previously been invited to Eutyches. The proposal was accepted. The synod of Chalcedon met in the year 418, the third of the consulate of Dionysius and Rufinus, and the sixth of the consulate of Probus and General. At the request of Dioscorus, those who were not able to roar 'one', pronounced against the Nestorian and Eutychian errors. 11 At Chalcedon, Nestorianism was condemned as a heresy; and the creed, which had been so long and so unavailing, was pronounced heretical. In this council, the Nestorians and Eutychians were completely defeated, and the Nestorian and monophysite errors were completely condemned. None of the Nestorian and monophysite sects could escape the condemnation and censure of the assembly at Chalcedon. The Nestorians of Egypt were more particularly accused, for it appeared that at Chaldean controversy, the name Barsumas was more particularly accursed—\( \text{\textit{chers.}} \) disdained to preside in the Greek synod, which was speedily assembled at Nice in Bithynia; his legates required in a peremptory tone the presence of the emperor; and the weary fathers were transported to Chalecedon under the immediate eye of Marcellus and the senate of Constantinople. A quarter of a mile from the church by the church of St. Euphemia was built on the summit of a gentle though lofty ascent: the triple structure was celebrated as a prodigy of art, and the boundless prospect of the land and sea might have raised the mind of a sectary to the contemplation of the God of the universe. Six hundred and twenty fathers were chosen in order to maintain the church; but the patriarchs of the east were preceded by the legates, of whom the third was a simple priest; and the place of honour was reserved for twenty laymen of consular or senatorial rank.

The gospel was ostentatiously displayed in the centre, but the rule of faith was defined by the papal and imperial ministers, who moderated the thirteen sessions of the council of Chalecedon. Their partial interposition silenced the intemperate shouts and execrations, which degraded the episcopal gravity; but, on the formal accusation of the legates, Dioscorus was compelled from his throne by the archbishop, already condemned in the opinion of all judges. The orientals, less adverse to Nestorians than to Cyril, accepted the Romans as their deliverers: Thrace, and Ponthus, and Asia, were exasperated against the murderer of Flavian, and the new patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria; the places by the sacrifice of their benefactor. The bishops of Palestine, Macedonia, and Greece, were attached to the faith of Cyril; but in the face of the synod, in the heat of the battle, the leaders, with their obsequious train, passed from the right to the left with the expression of oath and the profession of confession. Of the seventeen suffragans who sailed from Alexandria, four were tempted from their allegiance, and the thirteen, falling prostrate on the ground, implored the mercy of the council, with sighs and tears, and a pathetic declaration, that, if they yielded, they should be massacred, on their return to Egypt, by the indignant people. A tardy repentance was allowed to expiate the guilt or error of the accomplices of Dioscorus: but their sins were accumulated on his head; he neither asked nor hoped for pardon, and the moderation of those who pleaded for a general amnestv was resented by the emperor, who was STYLE — 12

For these scandalous offences Dioscorus Faith of Chal-erus was deposed by the synod, and banished by the emperor; but the purity of his faith was declared in the presence, and with the tacit appro ilation of the fathers. Their prudence supposed rather than pronounced the heresy of Eutyches, who was condemned at Myriopolis by the church of Syria, as silent and abashed, when a bold Monophysite, casting at their feet a volume of Cyril, challenged them to anathematize in his person the doctrine of the saint. If we fairly peruse the acts of Chalecedon as they are recorded by the orthodox party, we shall find that this council, by its law, the triumphant unity of Christ; and the ambiguous concession, that he was formed or from two natures, might imply either their previous existence, or their subsequent confusion, or some dangerous interval between the conception of the man and the assumption of the God. The Roman theology, more positive and precise, adopted the term most offensive to the ears of the Egyptians, that Christ existed in two natures; and this momentous particle (which the memory, rather than the understanding, must retain) had almost produced a schism among the catholic bishops. The tone of Leo in his letter on the murder of Cyril, was intemperate and abusive; but they protested, in two successive debates, that it was neither expedient nor lawful to transgress the sacred hand-marks which had been fixed at Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus, according to the rule of Scripture and tradition. At length they yielded to the emperor's will, and composed the council, A.D. 419. The new decree, after it had been ratified with deliberate votes and vehement acclamations, was overthrown in the next session by the opposition of the legates and their oriental friends. It was in vain that a multitude of episcopal voices repeated in chorus The definition of the fathers is irrevocable. The heresies are now discovered! Anathema to the Nestorians! Let them depart from the synod! Let them repair to Rome! The legates threatened, the emperor was absolute, and a committee of eighteen bishops prepared a new decree, which was imposed on the reluctant assembly. In the name of the fourth general council, the Christ in one person, but in two natures, was announced to the Catholic world; an invisible line was drawn between the heresy of Apollinaris and the faith of St. Cyril; and the road to paradise, a bridge for the faithful souls, was thus constructed over the abyss by the master-hand of the theological artist. During ten centuries of blindness and servitude, Europe received her religious opinions from the oracle of the Vatican; and the same doctrine, already tarnished with the rust of antiquity, was admitted without dispute into the creed of the reformers, who disclaimed the superiority of the Roman pontiff. The synod of Chalecedon still triumphs in the protestant churches; but the ferment of controversy has subsided, and the most pious christians of the present day are ignorant or careless, of their own belief concerning the mystery of the incarnation.

Discord of the senate.

A.D. 451—452.

Far different was the temper of the Greeks and Egyptians under the orthodox reigns of Leo and Marcian. Those pious emperors enforced with arms and edicts the symbol of their faith; and it was declared by the conscience or honour of five hundred bishops, that the decrees of the synod of Chalcedon might be supported even with blood. The empresses observed with satisfaction, that the same synod was odious both to the Nestorians and the Monophysites; but the Nestorians were less angry, or less powerful, and the east was distracted by the obstinate and sanguinary zeal of the Monophysites.

Three years after the death of the emperor Zeno, an assembly of theMEP was held at Constantinople in the year 451. The Nestorians, supported, as usual, by monks, in the name of the one incarnate nature, they pillaged, they burnt, they murdered; the sepulchre of Christ was defiled with blood; and the gates of the city were guarded in tumultuous rebellion against the troops of the emperor. After the disgrace and exile of Dioscorus, the Egyptians still resisted the spiritual father; and detected the usurpation of his successor, who was introduced by the fathers of Chalcedon. The throne of Proterius was supported by a guard of two thousand soldiers; he waged a five years' war against the people of Alexandria; and on the death of the emperor Zeno, he came the victim of their zeal. On the third day before the festival of Easter, the patriarch was besieged in the cathedral, and murdered in the baptistery. The remains of his mangled corpse were delivered to the flames, and his ashes to the wind; and the deed was inspired by the vision of a pretended angel; an ambitious monk, who, under the name of Timothy the Cat, succeeded to the place and opinions of Dioscorus.

This deadly superstition was inflamed, on either side, by the principle and the practice of retaliation: in the pursuit of a metaphysical quarrel, many thousands were slain; and the heretics were deprived of the substantial enjoyments of social life, and of the invisible gifts of baptism and the holy communion. Perhaps an extravagant fable of the times may conceal an allegorical picture of these fanatics, who tortured each other, and themselves. "Under the consulship of Venantius and Celer," says a grave bishop, "the people of Alexandria, and all Egypt, were seized with a strange and diabolical frenzy: great and small, slaves and freedmen, monks and clergy, the natives of the land, who opposed the synod of Chalcedon, lost their speech and reason, barked like dogs, tore each other with their own teeth, the flesh from their hands and arms."

The Heretion of Zeno.

The disorders of thirty years at length of Zeno, A.D. 452.

produced the famous Heretion of the emperor Zeno, which in his reign, and in that of Anastasius, was signed by all the bishops of the east, under the penalty of degradation and exile, if they rejected or infringed this salutary and fundamental law. The clergy may smile or groan at the presumption of a layman who defines the articles of faith; yet if he stoops to the humiliating task, his mind is less infected by prejudice or interest, and the authority of the magistrate can only be maintained by the concord of the people.

Perhaps the most pious book, in the Egyptian period, is a history, that Zeno appears least contemptible; and I am not able to discern any Manichean or Eutychian guilt in the generous saying of Anastasius. That it was unworthy of an emperor to persecute the worshippers of Christ and the citizen of Rome. The Henoticon tends to reconcile the apostles of the East to the Monophysites; a problem which had never been described by the jealous, and even unjaundiced, eyes of our orthodox schoolmen, and it accurately represents the catholic faith of the incarnation, without adopting or disclaiming the peculiar terms or tenets of the hostile sects. A solemn anathema is pronounced against Nestorius and Egypt, and the Roman pontiffs, against all heretics by whom Christ is divided, or confounded, or reduced to a phantom. Without defining the number or the article of the word pure, the purist system of St. Cyril, the faith of Nice, Constantine, and Euphrosus, is respectfully confirmed; but, instead of bowing at the name of the fourth council, the subject is dismissed by the excuses of all contrary doctrines, if any such have been taught elsewhere or at Chalcedon. Under this ambiguous expression, the friends and the enemies of the last synod might unite in a silent embrace. The most reasonable christians acquiesced in this mode of toleration; but their reason was weak and inconstant, and their obedience was despised as timid and servile by the vehement spirit of their brethren. On a subject which engaged the thoughts and discourses of men, it was difficult to preserve an effectual neutrality; a book, a sermon, a prayer, rekindled the flame of controversy; and the bonds of communion were alternately broken and resealed by the private animosity of the bishops. The space between Nestorius and Eutyches was filled by a thousand shades of language and opinion; the accretion of Egypt, and the Roman pontiffs, of equal valor, though of unequal strength, may be found at the two extremities of the theological scale. The accep- tation, without a king or a bishop, were separated above three hundred years from the patriarchs of Alexandria, who had accepted the communion of Constantinople, with the exception of a formal communion of the synod of Chalcedon. For accepting the communion of Alexandria, without a formal approbation of the same synod, the patriarchs of Constantinople were anathematized by the popes. Their inflexible despotism involved the most orthodox of the Greek churches in this spiritual contagion, denied or doubted the validity of their sacraments, and fomented, thirty-five, years, the schism of the east and west, till they finally abolished the memory of four Byzantine pontiffs, who had dared to oppose the supremacy of St. Peter. Before that period, the precious truce of Constantinople had lost his power, and the seal of the rival prelates. Macedonius, who was

1 See the Appendix to the Acts of Chalcedon, the confirmation of the Synod by Marcian; (Concil. tom. iv. p. 1791. 1792) his letters to the monks of Alexandria, (p. 1793) of Mount Sinai, (p. 1795) of Jerusalem and Palestine; (p. 1798) his laws against the Eutychians; (p. 1803-1815, 1818) the correspondence of Leo with the provincial synods on the resolution of the council. (p. 1835, 1839.)

2 Photius (or rather Eutychus of Alexandria) confesses, in a fine passage, admirably written, that these huge losses were not inflicted, but that the Nestorians, as they had their synod of Chalcedon, (Bibl. cod. cccxxv. p. 780.) He waged a disastrous war against the city of Chalcedon, and the bishops and the clergy, with the due of the city, confounded with the deaths of his adversary—The Nestorians seems to introduce the word synods of the Monophysite council, against Eutyches he appeared to countenance the synods of the Nestorians. The apologetic claims a chaste mixture of fact and fiction; but the Nestorians were tenaciously adhered to the heretics, and the sound of controversy would have been lost in the din of debate. They were surrounded.

3 Against Nestorius seems to introduce the word synods of the Monophysites. Against Eutyches he appeared to countenance the synods of the Nestorians. The apologetic claims a chaste mixture of fact and fiction; but the Nestorians were tenaciously adhered to the heretics, and the sound of controversy would have been lost in the din of debate. They were surrounded.

4 Against Nestorius seems to introduce the word synods of the Monophysites. Against Eutyches he appeared to countenance the synods of the Nestorians. The apologetic claims a chaste mixture of fact and fiction; but the Nestorians were tenaciously adhered to the heretics, and the sound of controversy would have been lost in the din of debate. They were surrounded.

5 See See Renanet. (Hist. Patriarch. Alex. p. 123, 131, 145, 153, 174.) They were reconciled by the care of Merey. (A.D. 799—819.) He performed their charge; and Eutyches was compelled to accept the communion of the rest of the church. They were the Tartar, Vat. 391, and supplied the sacraments, which had failed for want of an episcopal ordination.

6 De his quiage baptizavit, quos ordinavit Acacius, majorum traditionum confici et verum, praeside religio signorum cum cruce praebuit. (Gal. epist. epist. Galat. xxvi. p. 256.)

7 They were reconciled by the care of Merey. (A.D. 799—819.) He performed their charge; and Eutyches was compelled to accept the communion of the rest of the church. They were the Tartar, Vat. 391, and supplied the sacraments, which had failed for want of an episcopal ordination.

8 De his quiage baptizavit, quos ordinavit Acacius, majorum traditionum confici et verum, praeside religio signorum cum cruce praebuit. (Gal. epist. epist. Galat. xxvi. p. 256.)

9 They were reconciled by the care of Merey. (A.D. 799—819.) He performed their charge; and Eutyches was compelled to accept the communion of the rest of the church. They were the Tartar, Vat. 391, and supplied the sacraments, which had failed for want of an episcopal ordination.
suspected of the Nestorian heresy, asserted, in disgrace and exile, the synod of Chalcedon, while his successor in the office which he proclaimed by the voice of a herald, the synod of Carthage, confirmed, that, since all could not reign, they should previously agree in the choice of a sovereign; and they accepted the blood of two unpopular ministers, whom their master, without hesitation, condemned to the lions. These furious but transient seditions were put down by the withering blasts which the army of Huns and Bulgarians, for the most part idolators, declared himself the champion of the catholic faith. In this pious rebellion he deposed Thrace, besieged Constantiople, exterminated sixty-five thousand of his fellow-christians, till he obtained the re-call of the bishops, the satisfaction of the pope, and the establishment of the council of Chalcedon, an orthodox treaty, reluctantly signed by the dying Anastasius, and more faithfully performed by the uncle of Justinian. And such was the event of first religious scourge of the holy martyrs Cosmas and Damian. The capital and the provinces of the east were decorated with the monuments of his religion; and though the far greater part of these costly structures may be attributed to his taste or ostentation, the zeal of the royal architect was probably quickened by a genuine sense of feeling and gratitude towards his invincible enemy. Among the titles of imperial greatness, the name of Pius was most pleasing to his ear; to promote the temporal and spiritual interest of the church, was the serious business of his life; and the duty of father of his country was often sacrificed to that of defender of the faith. The controversies of the times were congenial to his temper and understanding; and the theological professors must inwardly deride the diligence of a stranger, who cultivated their art and neglected his own. "What can ye fear?" said a bold composer to his associates, "from your bigoted tyrant! Sleepless and unarmed he sits whole nights.

The general history, from the council of Chalcedon to the death of Anastasius, may be found in the Breviary of Liberatum, (c. 14—19) the second and third books of Evagrius, the Abstract of the two books of Theodore the Reader, the Acts of the Synods, and the epitome of the history of the patriarch of Antioch, (v. 3.) 15. The chief events connected with some disorders in the fifteenth and sixteenth towns of the Memoirs of John Malalas, and the two prelates become the subject of the memoirs of the same author, who take leave for ever of that incomparable guide—whose bigotry is overbalanced by the merits of erudition, diligence, veracity, and scrupulous integrity. The first four books of the life of St. Paul of Thebes are also published by d'Aubigné, in the fifth volume of his editions of St. Paul's life, in the sixth century of the church and empire. The exact and accurate chronicles of Poccius, (c. 11, 12, 13, 14, 27, 28,) with the learned remarks of Alemanus, is confirmed, rather than contradicted, by the Acts of the Councils, the fourth book of Evagrius, and the abridged annals of the African church, in the sixth book—de tribus capitis, cum video doctus asperti, impromptu, a commodum conciliarii passim. 2 A chronicle ecclesiastical turris. S. C. Pocci. de Bell. Gih. I. c. 35.

138 THE DECLINE AND FALL. CHAP. VIII.
in his closet, debating with reverend grey-beards, and turning over the pages of ecclesiastical volumes."

"The conference was a spurious and rational spectacle. Justinian might have learned, "that religious controversy is the offspring of arrog and obstinacy."

The insufficient term of three months was assigned for the conversion or exile of all heretics; and if he still connived at their precarious stay, they were deprived, under his iron yoke, not only of the benefits of society, but of the common birth-right of men and Christians. At the end of four hundred years, Pagi says, his subjects were compelled to the wild enthusiasm of perfection and prophecy, which they had imbibed from their male and female apostles, the special organs of the Paraclete. On the approach of the orthodox priests and soldiers, they grasped with alacrity the crown of martyrdom; the conventicle and the congregation perished in the flames, but these primitive fanatics were not extinguished three hundred years after the death of their tyrant. Under the protection of the Gothic confederates, the church of the Arians of Constantinople had braved the severity of the laws; their clergy equalled the wealth and magnificence of their fellow-citizens. The subjects of the empire were seized by the rapacious hand of Justinian might perhaps be claimed as the spoils of the provinces and the trophies of the barbarians. A secret remnant of pagans, who still lurked in the most refined and the most rude conditions of mankind, excited the indignation of the Christians, who were perhaps unwilling that any strangers should be the witnesses of their intestine quarrels. A bishop was named as the inquisitor of the faith, and his diligence soon discovered in the court and city, the magistrates, lawyers, physicians, and sophists, who still cherished the superstition of the Greeks. They were sternly informed that they must choose without delay between that pernicious system of Schism, and that their aversion to the gospel could no longer be disguised under the scandalous mask of indifference or impiety. The patrician Phocian perhaps alone was resolved to live and to die like his ancestors: he enfranchised himself with the stroke of a dagger, and left his tyrant the poor consolation of excoriating with ignominy the lifeless corpse of the fugitive. His weaker brethren submitted to their earthly monarch, underwent the ceremony of baptism, and laboured, by their extraordinary zeal, to erase the suspicion, or to expiate the guilt, of idolatry. The native country of the Christian Emperor, and their capital, the walls of Constantinople, saw the last sparks of his mythology: by the care of the same bishop, seventy thousand pagans were detected and converted in Asia, Phrygia, Lydia, and Caria; ninety-six churches were built for the new proselytes; and linen vestments, bibles, and liturgies, and vases of gold and silver, were supplied by the pious munificence of Justinian. The Jews, who had been gradually stripped of their immunities, were oppressed by a vexatious law, which compelled them to observe the festival of Easter on the same day on which it was celebrated by the christians; and the same complaint of the Christians, since the catholics themselves did not agree with the astronomical calculations of their sovereign: the people of Constantinepolis delayed the beginning of their Lent a whole week after it had been ordained by authority; and they had the pleasure of fasting seven days, while meat was exposed for sale by the command of the emperor. The Samaritans of Palestine were a motley race, an ambiguous sect, rejected as Jews by the pagans, by the Jews as schismatics, and by the christians as idolaters. The abomination of the cross had already been planted on their holy mount of Gerizim, but the retention of Justinian afforded only the alternative of baptism or rebellion. They chose the latter: under the standard of a desperate leader, they rose in arms, and retaliated their wrongs on the lives, the property, and the temples, of a defenceless people. The Samaritans by the bloody sword forsook the vast: twenty thousand were slain, twenty thousand were sold by the Arabs to the infidels of Persia and India, and the remains of that unhappy nation stoned for the crime of treason by the sin of hypocrisy. It has been computed that one hundred thousand Roman Christians perished in the conquest of Galilee and Samaria, and the converts of one Christian province into a desolate and smoking wilderness. But in the creed of Justinian, the guilt of murder could not be applied to the slaughter of unbelievers: and he piously laboured to establish with fire and sword the unity of the christian faith."

1 Theophan. Chron. p. 157, John, the monophysite bishop of Asia, is a very ancient witness of this tradition, in which he was himself employed by the emperor. (Aseo. Bib. Orient. tom. ii, p. 68.)

2 Compare Procop. (Hist. Arcan. c. 59, and Alman's Notes) with Theophan. (Chron. p. 190.) The council of Nice has intruded the patriarch, or rather the ambassadors, of Alexandria, with the annual proclamation of Easter; and we still read, or rather we do not read, many of the Paschal epistles of St. Cyril. Since the reign of monarchs in Egypt, the catholics were perplexed by such a foolish prejudice as that which so long opposed, among the protestants, the reformation. (Aseo. Bib. Orient. tom. ii, p. 68.)

3 For the religion and history of the Samaritans, consult Bagan. Histor. des Juifs, c. 39. They are described and comprehended under the title of Samaritans, Procop. (De Bell. Got. i, c. 33.)

4 Justin. (Chron. c. 39.)

5 In the Chronicle of Procopius, and in the History of the Monarch, in the Memorials of the Monastery of Rechab, in the Consular, and in Constantinepon, p. 434-421.
The decline and fall

Chapter VIII

His orthodoxy. With these sentiments, it was incumbent on him, at least, to be always in the right. In the first years of his administration, he signalized his zeal as the de-eiple and patron of orthodoxy; the reconciliation of the Greeks and Latins there was the crown, and the separation of the emperor and the west; the Nestorians and Eutychians were exposed, on either side, to the double edge of persecution; and the four synods, of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, were ratified by the code of a catholic law. But while Justinian strove to maintain the uniformity of faith and worship, his wife Theodora, whose vices were not incompatible with devotion, had listened to the monophysite teachers; and the open or clandestine enemies of the church revived and multiplied at the smile of their gracious patroness. The capital, the palace, the hospital bed, were torn by spiritual discord; yet so doubtful was the sincerity of the royal consorts, that their seeming disagreement was imputed by many to a secret and mischiefous confederacy against the religious and happiness of their people. This appearance of the three chapters,2 which filled most of the volumes as it deserves lines, is deeply marked with this subtle and dissolovning spirit. It was now three hundred years since the body of Ori- gen had been eaten by the worms; his soul, of which he could not be without less immediacy, was in the hands of the Creator, but his writings were eagerly perused by the monks of Palestine. In these writings, the piercing eye of Justinian descried more than ten metaphysical errors; and the primitive doctor, in the company of Pythagoras and Plato, was devoted by the clergy to the censure of hell-fire, which he had presumed to deny. Under the cover of this precedent, a treacherous blow was aimed at the council of Chalcedon. The fathers had listened without impatience to the praise of Theodora of Mopsuestia;3 and their justice or indulgence had restored both Theodoret of Cyrus, and John of Ephesus, to the communion of the church. But the characters of these oriental bishops were tainted with the reproach of heresy: the first had been the master, the two others were the friends, of Nestorius: their most suspicious passages were accused under the title of the three chapters, and the condemnation of the majority must involve the honour of a synod, whose name was pronounced with sincere or affected reverence by the catholic world. If these bishops, whether innocent or guilty, were annihilated in the sleep of death, they would not probably be animated by clamor, which had been raised over their grave. If they were already in the fangs of the demon, their tormentors could neither be aggravated nor assuaged by human indus-

2 See the Chronicle of Victor, p. 224, and the original evidence of the laws of Justinian. During the first years of his reign, Basilanin himself is in extreme need of honour with the emperor, who courted the pope, till he got him into his power.

3 Procopius, Anecd. c. 25. Evagrius, l. iv. c. 60. If the ecclesiastics never read the sacred gospels, their common suspicion grew, at least the general hatred.

4 Of the subject of the three chapters, the original acts of the fifth general council of Constantinople supply much scarce, though authentic, knowledge. (Council, tom. vi. p. 1—419.) The Greek Evagrius is here confuted and set in his true character (c. 49.); the three zealous, or heretical, authors, Ps. Juvénal, Ps. Isai, and Ps. Juvénal, in his twelve books, de tribus capitulis, which are most correctly published by Sommervogel, (his Breveaum, l. 22—24,) and Victor Tartesius in his Chronicle, (c. tom. i. Antit. Lec. Canum, p. 359—354.) The Liber Pontificalis, or Anastasium, (ibid. 639—639.) The Liber Pontificilis, or Anastasium, (ibid. 639—639.) The scribes, and the modern reader will derive some information from Debaris (Bibl. Eccl. tom. v. 1.) and Benet (ibid. tom. iv. p. 359—354.) But, despite all these arguments, the text is open, yet the latter is too firmly resolved to depreciate the authority and character of the pope.

5 Origen, had indeed too great a propensity to imitate the iambics and hemistichs of the old philosophers. Justinian, ad Nennian, in Constantinople, c. 71. (Chron. tom. i. 10.) His moderation was such that he would not even let the institution of the papal see be made by the council, and he was found guilty of the heresy of reconciliation.

6 Bambara (Dequiet, p. 11—11. ad tom. I. Antit. Lec. Canum,) has fairly written on the truth and innocence of Theodore of Monestirum. If he had been established with 10,000 men, as many enemies as there was, we should have been the more convinced. In all the subsequent catalogues of heretics, he alone, without his two brethren, is included; and it is the duty of Semon (Bibl. Orient. tom. iv. p. 339—339.) to justify the sentence.

7 See the complaints of Liberatus and Victor, and the exhortations of pope Gelasius to the emperor and exarch of Italy. Schismas... per pedes, [ed. B. Deh. 387.]—See also the composition of great importance, not without some mischiefs, of the Opus Theodori adversus Donatistas, and the commentary of Aegidius, who, besides the De exilii Vitiatione, in which he is said to have dwelt without censure, till 638. Fourteen years before, the church of Spain had overlooked the fifth general council with contemptuous silence. (Oc. Cinn. Toletan in Cod. tomi. v. p. 931—931.)

8 The bishop of the patriarchate of Aquileia were reconciled by pope Honorius, A. D. 685; (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tomo. v. p. 219.) Sabinus, bishop of Cesarea, (lab. B. Deh. 387.) was firmly reconciled, perhaps without due provocation, till 685. Fourteen years before, the church of Spain had overlooked the fifth general council with contemptuous silence. (Oc. Cinn. Toletan in Cod. tomi. 1. p. 931—931.)

9 The bishops of the patriarchate of Aquileia were reconciled by pope Honorius, A. D. 685; (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tomo. v. p. 219.) Sabinus, bishop of Cesarea, (lab. B. Deh. 387.) was firmly reconciled, perhaps without due provocation, till 685. Fourteen years before, the church of Spain had overlooked the fifth general council with contemptuous silence. (Oc. Cinn. Toletan in Cod. tomi. 1. p. 931—931.) Africa, already deplore your fall, and anathematize your name. Unless, without delay, you destroy what you have condoned and crucified. The voice, I have erred, I have sinned, anathema to Nesi- torius, anathema to Eutyches, you will deliver your soul to the same flames in which they will eternally burn.\(^2\) He died and made no sign.\(^3\) His death restored in some degree the peace of the church, and the events which attended it are limited that can excite no remark, and Phocas, are distinguished by a rare, though fortunate, vacancy in the ecclesiastical history of the east.\(^2\)

The Monothelites. The faculties of sense and reason are controversy, least capable of action on themselves; again, the organs of his functions, Justin, Tiberius, Maurice, and Phocas, are distinguished by a rare, though fortunate, vacancy in the ecclesiastical history of the east.\(^2\)

The faculties of sense and reason are controversy, least capable of action on themselves; again, the organs of his functions, Justin, Tiberius, Maurice, and Phocas, are distinguished by a rare, though fortunate, vacancy in the ecclesiastical history of the east.\(^2\)

The faculties of sense and reason are controversy, least capable of action on themselves; again, the organs of his functions, Justin, Tiberius, Maurice, and Phocas, are distinguished by a rare, though fortunate, vacancy in the ecclesiastical history of the east.\(^2\)

...
conformity, the Roman faith was more firmly re-plant ed by the orthodox successors of Bardanes, and the fine problems of the incarnation were forgotten in the more popular and visible quarell of the worship of images. The Union of the East and West was canonically approved, and the only important question of doctrine which engaged the mind of the council was the definition of the nature of the Logos. This question required more time than the council was at liberty to give to it, and it was referred to a later assembly.

Before the end of the seventh century, the spread of human learning, the decay of the imperial power, and the rise of Mohammedanism, had disposed the Byzantine church to tolerate, or rather to receive, with the same or even greater zeal, the religions of paganism and Nestorianism, which were prevalent among the neighboring races. The history of the relation of the church to these sects is the history of an endless controversy. The church was divided into two great branches, the Western, or Latin, and the Eastern, or Greek, which were separated by a lingual barrier, which it has been a matter of pride to the admirers of both to assert, and a matter of great regret to their adversaries, that it cannot be broken down; and this barrier has divided the church into two great schools of thought, the Latin and the Greek, in some respects, and in some points, the only difference between the two, which it is not possible to reconcile.

The history of Monophysitism may be found in the Acts of the Synods of Rome (tom. vii. p. 277—355, 606—695) and Constanti nople, (ed. Mill, tom. iii. p. 567—719.) The progress of this heresy, and the birth of the heretics, will naturally inculcate the duty of submission, nor is it less natural that dissenters should feel and assert the principles of freedom. Under the rod of persecution, the Nestorians and Monophysites degenerated into a-bels and fugitives; and the most ancient and, perhaps, the most popular law of Rome was that the emperor not as the chief, but as the enemy, of the Christians. Language, the leading principle which unites or separates the tribes of mankind, soon divided the sectaries of the east, by a peculiar and perpetual badge, which abolished the means of intercourse, the true and the holy reconciliation of the eastern church.

The long dominion of the Greeks, their conquests, colonies, and above all their eloquence, had propagated a language doubtless the most perfect that has been contrived by the art of man. Yet the body of the prophet both in Syria and Egypt still persevered in the use of their national idioms; with this difference, however, that the Coptic was confined to the rude and illiterate peasants of the Nile, while the Syriac from the mountains of Assyria to the Red Sea, was adapted to the higher topics of poetry and argument. Armenia and Abyssinia were infected by the speech or learning of the Greeks, and their barbaric tongues, which had been revived in the studies of modern Europe, were unintelligible to the inhabitants of the Roman empire. The Syriac and the Coptic, the Armenian and the Ethiopic, are consecrated in the service of the church. Their language, however, is enriched by domestic verses both of the Scriptures and of the most popular fathers. After a period of thirteen hundred and sixty years, the spark of controversy, first kindled by a sermon of Nestorius, still burns in every bosom of the east, and the hostile controversy still maintains the character of their founders. In the most abject state of ignorance, poverty, and servitude, the Nestorians and Monophysites reject the spiritual supremacy of Rome, and cherish the toleation of their Turkish masters, which allows them to mathematicize, on the one hand, St. Cyril and the synod of Ephesus; on the other, pope Leo and the council of Chalcedon. The weight which they cast into the downfall of the eastern empire demands our notice, and the reader may be amused with the various prospects of I. The Nestorians, II. The Jacobites, and III. The Monophysites.

Of the three former, the Syriac is common; but of the latter, each is discriminated by the use of a national idiom. Yet the modern natives of Armenia and Abyssinia could be incapable of conversing with their ancestors; and the history of their dissenting brethren, the Jacobites or more sincere, were crushed by the penal laws; and as early as the reign of Justinian, it became difficult to find a church of Nestorians within the limits of the Roman empire. Beyond those limits they had discovered a new world, in which they might hope for liberty, and aspire to conquest. In Persia, notwithstanding the resistance of the Magi, Christianity had struck a deep root, and the nations of the east reposed under its salutary shade. The catholica, or primate, resided in the capital: in his synods, and in their dioceses, his metropolitans, bishops, and clerics, represented and promulgated the dogmas of the church; and he rejoiced in the increase of proselytes, who were converted from the Zendavesta to the Gospel, from the secular to the monastic life, and their zeal was stimulated by the presence of an artful and formidable enemy. The Persian church had been founded by the

---

1. I shall now enrich my ignorance with the spolioms of Simon, Walton, Mill, Wetstein, Assemanus, Lapidus, La Croze, whom I have considered with some care. It appears, that, of all the versions which are celebrated by the fathers, it is doubtful which was the best, or what of them was the best. I have been persuaded by the evidence of the evidence of the interpretations, and by the authority of the most eminent antiquaries, that the best version is that of the church of Constantinople.

2. On the account of the Monophysites and Nestorians, I am deeply indebted to the Bibliotheca Orientalis Christiana Operibilibri Vaticani Bibliothecae Como, by Simon Assemanus. That learned Maronite was despatched in the year 1715, by pope Clement XI, to visit the monasteries of Egypt and Syria, and to examine the writings of the Nestorians. His account of Rome 1710—1720, contains a part only, perhaps the most valuable, of his travels, and is, as I fancy, the only account of Nestorians and Monophysites in the Arabic literature; and, though a dependent of Rome, he wishes to be moderate and candid.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

missionaries of Syria; and their language, discipline, and doctrine, were closely interwoven with its original frame. The Persians, who, under the reigns of Zeno and Anastasius, had invaded the provinces of the east, provoked their antagonists, in a land of freedom, to avow a moral, rather than a physical, union of the two persons of Christ. Since the first preaching of the gospel, the Sasanian kings beheld, with an eye of suspicion, a race of aliens and apostates, who had triumphed over the Persians, who might favour the cause, of the heretical foes of their country. The royal edicts had often prohibited their dangerous correspondence with the Syrian clergy; the progress of the schism was grateful to the jealous pride of Perozes; and he listened to the eloquence of an artful prelate, who painted Nestorius as the apostate and heretic, while the father of the faith pleaded for the freedom of his christian subjects, by granting a just preference to the victims and enemies of the Roman tyrant.

The Nestorians composed a large majority of the clergy and people; they were encouraged by the smile, and armed with the sword, of despotic power; yet many of their weaker brethren were startled at the thought of breaking loose from the communion of the christian world, and the blood of seven thousand seven hundred Monophysites or catholics, confirmed the uniformity of faith and discipline in the churches of Persia. Their ecclesiastical institutions are distinguished by a liberal principle of person, or at least of policy; the austerity of the cloister was relaxed and gradually forgotten; houses of charity were endowed for the sate masters of education of orphans and foundlings; the law of cellibacy, so forcibly recommended to the Greeks and Latins, was disregarded by the ambiguous Nestorians of Persia; the council was multiplied by the public and reiterated nuptials of the priests, the bishops, and even the patriarch himself. To this standard of natural and religious freedom, myriads of fugitives resorted from all the provinces of the eastern empire; the narrow bigotry of the Nestorians was overcome by the glowing eloquence of its most industrious subjects; they transported to Persia the arts both of peace and war; and those who deserved the favour, were promoted to the service, of a discerning monarch. The amity of Perozes and his grandson was attended with advice, and money, and troops, by the desperate sectaries who still lurked in their native cities of the east; their zeal was rewarded with the gift of the catholic churches; but when those cities and churches were recovered by Heraclius, their open profession of treason and heresy provoked them to a refuge in foreign lands; but to foreign ally. But the seeming tranquillity of the Nestorians was often endangered, and sometimes overturned. They were involved in the common evils of Oriental despotism: their enmity to Rome could not always serve their attachment to the gospel; and to averted these pernicious arts, the bishops of Antioch and Apeana, were permitted to erect an hostile altar in the face of the catholic, and in the sunshine of the court. In his last treaty, Justinian introduced some conditions which tended to enlarge and fortify the toleration of Christianity in Persia. The emperor, ignorant of the rights of conscience, was incapable of pity or esteem for the heretics who denied the authority of the holy synods: but he flattered himself that they would gradually perceive the temporal benefits of union with the empire and the church of Rome; and if he failed in exciting their gratitude, he was at least safe to confine the jealousy of Persia. In a later age, the Latins have been burnt at Paris and protected in Germany, by the superstition and policy of the most chivalric king.

The desire of gaining souls for God, Their missions and subjects for the church, has excited in Tarsus, in equal age the diligence of the Christian, and even Christian priests. From the conquest of Persia they carried their spiritual arms to the north, the east, and the south; and the simplicity of the gospel was fashioned and painted with the colours of the Syrian theology. In the sixth century, according to a report of a Nestorian traveller, Christianity was successfully preached to the Huns, the Persians, the Indians, the Persarmenians, the Medes, and the Elamites: the barbaric churches, from the gulf of Persia to the Caspian sea, were almost infidel; and their recent faith was conspicuous in the number and sanctity of their monks and martyrs. The emperor of Trebizond, Malabard, and the king of the ocean, Soccora and Ceylon, were peopled with an increasing multitude of christians, and the bishops and clergy of those sequestered regions derived their ordination from the catholic of Babylon. In a subsequent age, the zeal of the Nestorians overlooked the limits which had confined the ambitious and apostate vassals of the Greeks and Persians. The missionaries of Baleh and Samareud pursued, without fear the footsteps of the roving Tartars, and insinuated themselves into the camps of the valleys of Iraus and the banks of the Seinga. They exposed a metaphysical creed to those illiterate shepherds; to those savagery warriors they recommended humanity and repose. Yet a khan, whose power they vainly magnified, is said to have received at their hands the rites of baptism, and even of ordination; and the fame of Presbyter or Presbyter John b has long a See the Arabic canon of Nice in the translation of Abraham Echenelus, No. 37, 38, 39, 40, Conc. tom. ii, pp. 313, 326, ed. Venice, Theon and Arator, are both ascribed to the council of Nice enacted not more than twenty canons. Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. L. i. c. 8.) and the remainder, seventy or eighty, were collected from the synods of the Greek church. The Syriac edition of Marcellus is no longer extant. (Ammian, Bibl, Orient. tom. i. p. 135, tom. iii. p. 285, Cod. iv. p. 247.) This council of Nice is not mentioned by Fabricius, (Bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 293.)

b A dissertation on the state of the Nestorians has swelled in the hands of Ammianus to a full volume of 590 pages, and his learned researches are amplified and explained in the Bibl. Orient., tom. ii. p. 231.

c A dissertation on the state of the Nestorians has swelled in the hands of Ammianus to a full volume of 590 pages, and his learned researches are amplified and explained in the Bibl. Orient., tom. ii. p. 231.

d A dissertation on the state of the Nestorians has swelled in the hands of Ammianus to a full volume of 590 pages, and his learned researches are amplified and explained in the Bibl. Orient., tom. ii. p. 231.

e A dissertation on the state of the Nestorians has swelled in the hands of Ammianus to a full volume of 590 pages, and his learned researches are amplified and explained in the Bibl. Orient., tom. ii. p. 231.

f A dissertation on the state of the Nestorians has swelled in the hands of Ammianus to a full volume of 590 pages, and his learned researches are amplified and explained in the Bibl. Orient., tom. ii. p. 231.
amused the credulity of Europe. The royal convert was indulged in the use of a portable altar; but he demanded an endowment to the patriarch, to improve the state, and to support the see of Jerusalem. He shrewdly abstained from animal food, and how he might celebrate the eucharist in a desert that produced neither corn nor wine. In their progress by sea and land, the Nestorians entered Chios by the port of Canton and the northern residence of a coadjutor. Unlike the incursions of Rome, however, they assumed with a smile the characters of priests and augurs, the mandarins, who affect in public the reason of philosophers, are devoted in private to every mode of popular superstition. They cherished and they conformed the gods of Palestine and of India; but the prejudices of Christianity awakened the jealousy of the state, and after a short vicissitude of favour and persecution, the foreign sect expired in ignorance and oblivion. Under the reign of the caliph, the Nestorian church was diffused from Chish to Jerusalem and Cyprus; and their numbers, with those of the Jacobitans, were computed to surpass the Greek and Latin communions. Twenty-five metropolitans or archbishops composed their hierarchy, but several of these were dispensed, by the distance and danger of the way, from the duty of personal attendance, on the easy condition that every six years they should testify their faith, and that the submission of their bishops to the patriarch of Bagdad, a vague appellation, which has been successively applied to the royal seats of Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and Bagdad. These remote branches are long since withered, and the old patriarchal trunk is now divided by the Eligius of Mosul, the representatives, almost in the number of the genuine and primitive succession, the Josapha of Amidh, who are reconciled to the church of Rome, and the Nizamus of Van or Ormia, whose revolt at the head of forty thousand families, was promoted in the sixteenth century by the Sophis of Damascus. The number of these thousand families was the whole of the body of the Nestorians, who, under the name of Chaldeans or Assyrians, are confounded with the most learned or the most powerful nation of eastern antiquity.

The Christians of Madras were devotedly visited by the ambas-dadors of Alfred, and their return with a cargo of pearls and spices rewarded the zeal of the English monarch, who entertained the largest projects of trade and discovery. When the Portuguese first opened the navigation of India, the Christians of St. Thomas had been established for ages on the coast of Malabar, and the difference of their character and the mixture of a foreign race in arms, in arts, and possibly in virtue, they excelled the natives of Hindostan; the husbandmen cultivated the palm-tree, the sol-ic agriculture; the monks were the soldiers, and all their hereditary privileges were respected by the gracitude or the fear of the king of Cochin and the Zamorin himself. They acknowledged a Gentoo sovereign, but they were governed, even in temporal concerns, by the bishop of Angamala. He still asserted his ancient title of metropolis of India, but his real jurisdiction was exercised in fourteen hundred churches, and he was intrusted with the care of two hundred thousand souls. Their religion would have rendered them the firmest and most cordial allies of the Portuguese, but the inquisitors asserted or covered in the christians of St. Thomas the unpardonable guilt of heresy and schism. Instead of owning themselves the subjects of the Roman pontif, the spiritual and temporal monarch of the globe, they adhered, like their ancestors, to the communion of the Nestorian patriarch; and the bishops whom he ordained, Mosul travelled far from Persia to the land to reach their diocese on the coast of Malabar. In their Syriac liturgy, the names of Theodore and Nestorius were piously commemorated; they united their adoration of the two persons of Christ; the title of Most Victrico was offered to their ear, and they were measured with scrupulous avarice the honours of the Virgin Mary, whom the superstition of the Latins had almost exalted to the rank of a goddess. When her image was first presented to the di-epistles of St. Thomas, they indignantly exclaimed, We are christians, and our religion is not to be polluted with such unhallowed veneration of the cross. Their separation from the western world had left them in ignorance of the improvements, or corruptions, of a thousand years; and their conformity with the faith and practice of the fifth century, would equally disapprov the prejudices of a papist or a proselytized Christian; hence our prudent ministers of Rome to intercept all correspondence with the Nestorian patriarch, and several of his bishops expired in the prisons of the holy office. The flock, without a shepherd, was assaulted by the power of the Portuguese, the arts of the Jesuits, and the zeal of Alexius, the Venetian, archbishop of Brindisi, who was sent on the official visitation of the coast of Malabar. The synod of Diamper, at which he presided, consigned the precious work of the reunion, and rigorously imposed the doctrine and discipline of the Roman church, without forgetting avaricious confession, the strongest engine of ecclesiastical toverty. The memory of Theodore and Nestorius was condemned, and Malabar was reduced under the dominion of the pope, of the primates, and of the Jesuits who invaded the sea of Angamala or Cranganor. Sixties of servitude, and hypocrisy were patiently endured on both sides; but as soon as the Portuguese empire was shaken by the courage and industry of the Dutch, the Nestorians asserted, with vigour and effect, the religion of their fathers. The Jesuits were incapable of defending the power which they had abused; the arms of the Portuguese re-established their falling tyrants; and the Indian archdeacon assumed the character of bishop, till a fresh supply of episcopal gifts and

—

A. D. 1250, &c.

The decline and fall. CHAP. VIII.
Syriac missionaries could be obtained from the patriarch of Babylon. Since the expulsion of the Portuguese, the Nestorian creed is freely professed on the coast of Malabar. The trading companies of Holland and England are the friends of toleration; but if oppression be less mortifying than contempt, the citizens of St. Thomas have reason to complain of the cold and silent indifference of their brethren of Europe.1

II. The History of the Monophysites.

is less copious and interesting than that of the Nestorians. Under the reigns of Zen and Anastasius, their ardent efforts surprised the ear of the priestly world; the throne of the Persian court was established on its native soil the archbishop of the Syrians. The rule of the Monophysite faith was defined with exquisite discretion by Severus patriarch of Antioch; he confined, in the style of the Hellenic, the adverse heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches, maintained against the faction of Jacobites, a faithful sound and constrained the Greeks to allow that he was a liar who spoke truth.2 But the approximation of ideas could not abate the vehemence of passion; each party was the more astonished that their blind antagonist could dispute on so trifling a difference; the tyrant of Syria endeavours to tranquilize the minds of his subjects by the blood of three hundred and fifty monks, who were slain, not perhaps without provocation or resistance, under the walls of Apamea.3 The successor of Anastasius replanted the orthodox standard in the east, and dedicated Persia and Xenissia,4 which had escaped from the Nestorians of Persia, was suffocated in his exile by the Melechites of Paphlagonia. Fifty-four bishops were swept from their thrones, eight hundred ecclesiastics were cast into prison,5 and notwithstanding the ambiguous and equivocal doctrine of Theodora, the orthodox have distance on their shelves, but it visibly have been either famished or poisoned. In this spiritual distress, the expiring faction was revived, and united, and perpetuated, by the labours of a monk; and the name of James Baradus6 has been preserved in the annals of a sect which did not yet have been converted to the Monophysite faith, and a Jew was the father of Abulpharagius7 prime of the east, so truly eminent both in his life and death. In his life, he was an elegant writer of the Syriac and Arabic tongues, a poet, physician, and historian, a subtle philosopher, and a moderate divine. In his death, his funeral was attended by his rival the Nestorian patriarch, with a train of Greeks and Armenians, who forgot their disputes, and mingled their tears over the grave of an enemy. The sect which was honoured by the virtues of Eutyches and of Abulpharagius appears, however, to sink below the level of their Nestorian brethren. The superstition of the Jacobites is more abject, their fasts more rigid,8 their intestine divisions are more numerous, and their doctors (as far as I can measure the degrees of nonsense) are more remote from the precisions of reason. Something may possibly be allowed for the rigour of the Monophysite theology; much more for the superior influence of the monastic order. In Syria, in Egypt, in Ethiopia, the Jacobite monks have ever been distinguished by the austerity of their penitence and the sobriety of their labours. Alive or dead they are esteemed as the chief friends of the Church of God, and the crosier of bishop and patriarch is reserved for their venerable hands; and they assume the government of men, while they are yet reeking with the habits and prejudices of the cloister.9

1 Concerning the christians of St. Thomas, see Asseman, Bibl. Oriunt. tom. iv. p. 391—407. 335—431; Geddes, Church History of the Christians of the East, in Biog. Brit. vol. xi. pp. 172—185; Huguet and Alcan, Historia Christianismi, in Codices Biblici, Tom. iv. pp. 710—739; and the following index, in two vol.; Lamou, La Haye, 1756, a learned and agreeable work. They have drawn from the same source, the Portuguese and Italian historians, and the narratives and prejudices of the Jacobites have been corrected by those of the protestants.

2 D'on, Euchairdamous, in his Treatise of the Incarnation, p. 235, 236, as he quoted by La Croz, (Hist, du Christianisme d'Ethiopie et d'Armenie, p. 53,) who explains, perhaps too hastily, "Quod potius rumenatur!" Reinaudet has touched (Hist. Patriarch. Alex. p. 127—130) the oriental accounts of Severus; and his authentic creed may be found in the epitaph of John the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, in the tenth century, to his nephew Michael of Alexandria. (Asseman, Bibl. Orient. tom. vi. p. 132—141.)

3 Eupat, Archimandritarum et Monachorum Syria Secundos ad Pasum Honorem, Constantinople, 1581. In this ed., the person of the three Sabas, or two unities, will justify the suspicion that the names of these bishops were of the Nestorians' or of the Syriac orthodoxy, or of the Syrian sects, of the 4th century. (Asseman, ibid. 1531, No. 7, &c.)

4 See Asseman, (Bibl. Orient. tom. ii. p. 10—46.) and La Croce (Christianismi d'Ethiopie, &c. 38—49) will supply the history of the Christians of Syria, or Philoxenus, bishop of Mabue, or Hitaelahia, in Syria. He was a perfect master of the Syriac language, and the author of the Greek version of the New Testament.

5 The synod and titles of fifty-four bishops, who were exiled by Justin, are preserved in the Chronic of Dionysius. (Asseman, tom. ii. p. 24.) Severus was personally summoned to Constantinople 461, and was condemned in his absence, and the laws were cut out, says Evagrius, (iv. i. c. 4.) The prudent patriarch did not may wonder at the belief of the Syriac, and this decision was God's version of the New Testament.

6 The obscure history of James, or Jacobus Baradus, or Zanazla, may be gathered from Eutychia, (Annali, tom. i. p. 144, i. 145.) Reinaud, 393—404. Asseman, Bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 424, tom. ii. p. 69, 234—323, 441, tom. iii. p. 353—358. 237.—290. The authenticity of the Jacobite authors has never been doubted their name and pedigree from St. James the apostle.

Vol. II.—T
The decline and fall

Chapter VIII.

III. The Manonites.

In the style of the oriental christians, the Mononethites of every age are described under the appellation of Manonites, a name which has been insensibly transferred from a hermit to a monastery, from a monastery to a nation. Maron, in a synthesis of the ordinances of the fifth century, displayed his religious madness in Syria; the rival cities of Apanee and Emessa disputed his relics, a stately church was erected on his tomb, and six hundred of discipline united their solitary cells on the banks of the Orontes. In the course of the incursions, they nicely threaded the orthodox line between the sects of Nestorius and Eutyches; but the unfortunate question of one will or operation in the two natures of Christ, was generated by their curious leisure. Their proselyte, the emperor Heraclius, was rejected as a Manonite from the walls of Emessa; he found a refuge in the monastery of his brethren; and their theological lessons were repaid with the gift of a spacious and wealthy domain. The name and doctrine of this venerable school were propagated among the Greeks and Syriacs, and their zeal is expressed by Macarius, the patriarch of Antioch, who declared before the synod of Constantinople, that sooner than subscribe the two wills of Christ, he would submit to be hewn piece-meal and cast into the sea. A similar or a less cruel mode of persecution soon converted the unresisting subjects of the province of the glorious Nestorian rebels, was bravely maintained by the hardy natives of Mount Libanus. John Maron, one of the most learned and popular of the monks, assumed the character of patriarch of Antioch; his nephew Abraham, and several of the Maronites, defended their civil and religious freedom against the tyrants of the east. The son of the orthodox Constantinian pursued, with pious hatred, a people of soldiers, who might have stood the bulwark of his empire against the common foes of Christ and of Rome. An army of Greeks invaded Syria; the monastery of St. Maron was destroyed with fire; the bravest chieftains were betrayed and murdered, and twelve thousand of their followers were transplanted to the distant frontiers of Armenia and Thrace. Yet the humble nation of the Maronites has survived the empire of Constantinople, and they still enjoy, under their Turkish masters, the repose of an imitigated servitude. Their domestic governors are chosen among the ancient nobility; the patriarch, in his monastery of Canobin, still functions himself on the throne of Antioch; nine bishops compose his synod, and at least fifty priests, who retain the liturgy of marriage, are intrusted with the care of one hundred thousand souls. Their country extends from the ridge of Mount Libanus to the shores of Tripoli; and the gradual descent affords, in a narrow space, each variety of climate and climate, from the Holy Cedar, erect under the weight of snow, to the vine, the mulberry, and the olive trees of the fruitful valley. In the twelfth century, the Maronites, abjure the doctrine of the Monophysite heresy, were reconciled to the Latin churches of Antioch and Rome, and the same alliance has been frequently renewed by the ambition of the popes and the distress of the Syrians. But it may reasonably be questioned, whether their union has ever been so firm as when the college of Rome have vainly laboured to absolve their ancestors from the guilt of heresy and schism.

IV. Since the age of Constantine, the Armenians has signalized their attachment and independence of the Christians. The disorders of their country, and the ignorance of the Greek tongue, prevented their clergy from assisting at the synod of Chaledon, and they floated eighty-four years in a state of indifference or suspense, till their vacant faith was finally occupied by the missionaries of Julian of Halicarnassus, who is, in Egypt, their common velle, had been vanquished by the arguments of the influence of his rival Severus, the Monophysite patriarch of Antioch. The Armenians are alone the pure disciples of Eutyches, an unfortunate parent, whose heresy is acknowledged by the leaders of the Maronites, these cities, which are the Scriptures, and the spiritual progeny. They alone persevere in the opinion, that the manhood of Christ was created, or existed without creation, of a divine and incorruptible substance. Their adversaries reproach them with the adoration of a phantom; and they rotot the accession of Dexileos, a bishop of Mardedatta, as the apostle of the Armenians, who impute to the Godhead the vile impieties of the flesh, even the natural effects of nutrition and digestion. The religion of Armenia could not derive much glory from the learning or the power of its inhabitants. The natural connection with the origin of their schism; and their Christian kings, who rise and fall in the thirteenth century on the confines of Cilicia, were the clients of the Latins, and the vassals of the Turkish sultan of Iconium. The helpless nation has seldom been permitted to enjoy the tranquillity of peace, or to appreciate the bliss of their peaceful state. Yet Asia, even the scattered and disunited followers of that nation, has always maintained the title of patriarch; and the Maronites have been a powerful barrier to the progress of the Turks. We are informed of the repugnance of the ancient Christians to abandon their religion or to produce that union which the Armenians is fovent and intrepid; they have often preferred the crown of martyrdom to the white turban of Mahomet; they devoutly hate the error and idolatry of the Greeks; and their transient union with the Latins is not less striking from the difficulty of the experiment, and the spirit of the patriarch offered at the feet of the Roman pontiff.

The evidence of William of Tyre (Hist. in Generi Beli per Francos, t. xiiii. c. 7. p. 1022.) is copied or confirmed by Jacques de Vitry (Hist. Hierosolym. lib. ii. p. 1093, 1094.) But this unauthentic language expired with the power of the Franks; and the Maronites are now considered the Mononethites a sect of Monophysites (Biblio, Orient, tom. ii. p. 292.)

I find a description and history of the Maronites in the Voyage de la Syrie et du Saint Liban, par la Roque, (2 tomes in 12mo. Amsterdam, 1729.) particularly tom. i, p. 42—47, p. 174—194, tom. ii, p. 10—128. In the ancient part, he copies the prejudices of Nain and the other Mononites of Rome, which Anonimus considers the Maronites as a sect of Mononethites (Biblio, Orient, tom. ii. p. 292.)

The Maronites are briefly described by La Croix (Hist. du Christ de l'Egypte et de l'Armenie, p. 289—402.) He refers to the great Armenian History of Galatsis, (2 tomes in 12mo, Edin. 1590—1594.) and commends the state of Armenia in the third volume of the Nouveaux Memoires des Missions du Levant. The writer of a work so just must have steerage wind when it is praised by La Croix.

The schism of the Armenians is placed 54 years after the conversion of Constantine, (Hist. de Constantine, p. 304.) The emperor of the Mononethites is supposed to be the patriarch of Antioch in 1040, (Concil. tom. viii. p. 780.) The Mononethite cause was supported with fervency and subility by Constantin, a Syrian priest of Apamea, (p. 1140. &c.)

Theophanes (Chron. p. 295. 296. 363. 392. 360.) and Cedrenus, (p. 453.) state that the Maronites, the name of Mered, it is said, was corrupted to Maronites, which may be found in the mystical table of Pocock. He was not ancient; and he who examines the Maronites and the name of their country, and even of the tenth century, and may believe a Melchite, whose testimony is confirmed by the Jacobites and Latins.

Col. lib. ii. p. 199. p. 780. The Mononethite cause was supported with fervency and subility by Constantin, a Syrian priest of Apamea, (p. 1140. &c.)

Theophanes (Chron. p. 295. 296. 303. 392. 360.) and Cedrenus, (p. 452.) state that the Maronites, the name of Mered, it is said, was corrupted to Maronites, which may be found in the mystical table of Pocock. He was not ancient; and he who examines the Maronites and the name of their country, and even of the tenth century, and may believe a Melchite, whose testimony is confirmed by the Jacobites and Latins.

Col. lib. ii. p. 199. p. 780. The Mononethite cause was supported with fervency and subility by Constantin, a Syrian priest of Apamea, (p. 1140. &c.)

Theophanes (Chron. p. 295. 296. 303. 392. 360.) and Cedrenus, (p. 452.) state that the Maronites, the name of Mered, it is said, was corrupted to Maronites, which may be found in the mystical table of Pocock. He was not ancient; and he who examines the Maronites and the name of their country, and even of the tenth century, and may believe a Melchite, whose testimony is confirmed by the Jacobites and Latins.

Col. lib. ii. p. 199. p. 780. The Mononethite cause was supported with fervency and subility by Constantin, a Syrian priest of Apamea, (p. 1140. &c.)

Theophanes (Chron. p. 295. 296. 303. 392. 360.) and Cedrenus, (p. 452.) state that the Maronites, the name of Mered, it is said, was corrupted to Maronites, which may be found in the mystical table of Pocock. He was not ancient; and he who examines the Maronites and the name of their country, and even of the tenth century, and may believe a Melchite, whose testimony is confirmed by the Jacobites and Latins.
The catholic, or patriarch, of the Armenians, resides in the monastery of Ekmiasin, three leagues from Erivan. Forty or an hundred pounds of silver, or a certain number of slaves, as an annual tribute, are collected at the head of his own herd, and the greater part are only titular prelates, who dignify with their presence and service the simplicity of his court. As soon as they have performed the liturgy, they cultivate the garden; and our history, which is by a chosen hand was stationed in the choir, to defend the person of their chief. He stood erect on his throne, and throwing aside the upper garment of a warrior, suddenly appeared before the eyes of the multitude in the robes of patriarch of Alexandria. Astonishment held them mute; but no sooner had Apollinaris entered his church, and he began to return to the see of St. Leo, had not a small number of these eloquent, sarcastic, and invective, and staves, assaulted the odious minister of the emperor and the synod. A charge was instantly sounded by the successor of the apostles; the soldiers waded to their knees in blood; and two hundred thousand christians are said to have been slain by the order of the emperor; an incredible account, even if it be extended from the slaughter of a day to the eighteen years of the reign of Apollinaris. Two succeeding patriarchs, Eulogius and John, laboured in the conversion of heretics, with arms and arguments more worthy of their evangelical profession. The theological knowledge of Eulogius was at first played in many a volume, which magnified the errors of Eutyches and Severus, and attempted to reconcile the ambiguous language of St. Cyril with the orthodox creed of pope Leo and the fathers of Chalcedon. The hound, the arms and by superstition or bequeuvalence, or policy. Seven thousand five hundred poor were maintained at his expense; on his accession, he found eighty thousand pounds of gold in the treasury of the church; he collected ten thousand from the liberality of the faithful; yet the prince could boast in his testament, that he left behind him no more than the third part of the smallest of the silver coins. The churches of Alexandria were delivered to the catholics, the religion of the Monophysites was suppressed in Egypt, and a law was revived which excluded the natives from the honours and emoluments of the state.

A more important conquest still reared, maimed, of the patriarch, the oracle and leader of the Egyptian church. Theodore had resisted the threats and promises of Justinian with the spirit of an apostle or an evangelist. "Such, John and the emperor were distinctly expounded to the patriarch, were the offers of the tempter when he showed the kingdoms of the earth. But my soul is far dearer to me than life or dominion. The churches are in the hands of a prince who can kill the body; but my conscience is my own; and in exile, poverty, or chains, I will steadfastly adhere to the faith of my holy predecessors, Athanasius, Cyril, and Dioscorus. Anathema to the sons of Leo and the synod of Chalcedon! Anathema to all who embrace their creed! Anathema to them now and for evermore! Naked came I out of my mother's womb, naked shall I descend into the grave. Let those so love God, follow me and seek their salvation." After comforting his brethren, he embarked for Constantinople, and sustained, in six successive interviews, the almost irresistible weight of the royal presence. His opinions

The travelling Armenians are in the way of every traveller, and their mother church is on the high road between Constantineople and Izmir, where they are most favorably supported. Faberius, in his "Lexicon," vol. i., p. 136, Annul. (c. iv. c. 40), Chardin, Cod. ii. p. 322. Tournefort, "Oeuvres," liv. ii. and all, Tavernier, tom. i. p. 28–37. 205–213), that resembling jeweller, who had read nothing, but had seen so much and so well. 4 Eutyches, who had been a monk of Antioch, was more conspicuous for subtlety than eloquence. He proves that the enemies of the bishop, the Gaians and the Theodorsians, out of envy, that the same proposition may be orthodox in the mouth of St. Cyril, but pernicious in that of Severus; that the opposite assertions of Eutyches are equally true. &c. His writings are no longer extant, except in the Extracts of Photius, who had perused them with care and satisfaction. Cod. crit. c. 30, c. 33, c. 51. 5 See the Life of John the elencafusary by his contemporary Levitson, bishop of Tarsus, and Cyril, bishop of Heraclea, or hidden, is reflected in the Latin version of Baroccius, (U. 0. 790, &c. &c. 6. b. 66, Nos. 83). Pari (Critea, tom. ii. p. 763) and Fabrici (E. c. ii. tom. vii. p. 442) have made some critical observations.
were favourably entertained in the palace and the city; the influence of Theodor assured him a safe conduct and honourable dismissal; and he ended his days, though not on the throne, yet in the bosom, of his native land, with the hospitable hospitality of a Christian prince. At the close of the year 1500, John, on his return from a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, was received with due honours by the Abbess of Apollinaria, who indecently feasted the nobles and the clergy; but his joy was checked by the intelligence of a new election; and while he enjoyed the wealth of Alexandria, his rivals reigned in the monasteries of Thebaïs, and were maintained by the voluntary oblations of the people. A perpetual succession of patriarchs arose from the ashes of Theodosius; and the Monophysite churches of Syria and Egypt were united by the name of Jacobites and the communion of the faith. But the same faith, which has been confined to a narrow sect of the Syrians, was diffused over the mass of the Egyptian or Coptic nation; who, almost unanimously, rejected the decrees of the synod of Chalcedon. A thousand years were now elapsed since Egypt had ceased to be a kingdom, since the conquerors of Asia and Europe had trampled on the ready necks of a people, whose ancient wisdom and power exceed beyond the recollection of history. The conflict of zeal and persecution rekindled some sparks of their national spirit. They ad\-\jured, with a foreign haire, the manners and language of the Greeks; every Melchite, in their eyes, was a stranger, every Jacobite a citizen; the alliance of mar-\riage, of education, of liberty, was their boast of holy brethren; and the holy Mass was their only religion, their only sin; the natives renounced all allegiance to the emperor; and his orders, at a distance from Alexandria, were obeyed only under the pressure of military force. A generous effort might have redeemed the religion and liberty of Egypt, and her six hundred monasteries might have restored their myriads of holy warriors, for whom death should have no terror, since life had no comfort or delight. But experience has proved the distinctness of active and passive courage; the fanatic who endures without a groan the tortures of the rack or the stake, would tremble and fly before the face of an armed enemy. The pusillani\-mous temper of the Egyptians could only hope for a change of masters; the arms of Chosroes depopulated the land, yet under his reign the Jacobites enjoyed a short and precarious respite. The victory of Heracli\-\les ren\-ewed and aggravated the persecution, and the patriarch again escaped from Alexandria to the desert. In his flight, Benjamin was encouraged by a voice, which bade him expect, at the end of ten years, the aid of a foreign king. During the whole of the existence of the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria: as late as the twelfth century, Christianity prevailed; and some rites, some ruins, are still visible in the savage towns of Sennaar and Dongola. But the Nigerians at length executed their threat of returning to the worship of idols; the climate required the services of the priests, the giỏi of all the Egyptians might have preferred the triumph of the Koran to the abase\ment of the cross. A metaphysical religion may appear too refined for the capacity of the negro race; yet a black or a parrot might be taught to repeat the words of the Chalcedonian creed. Christianity was more deeply rooted in the Abyssinian empire; and, although the correspondence has been sometimes interrupted above seventy or a hundred years, the mother-church of Alexandria retains her colony in a state of perpetual pignaracy. Seven bishops possessed the Ethiopic synod: had their number amounted to ten, they might have elected an independent pri\-\mate; and one of their kings was ambitious of pro\-\moting his brother to the ecclesiastical throne. But the existence of the Abyssinian church has been the source of the power of the Coptic patriarch, a title which the episcopal office has been gradually confined to the abuna, the head and author of the Abyssinian priest\-\ of Cairo, published at Oxford, in thirty pages, a slight History Jacobitæ, 147, post. 150.

VI. The Coptic patriarch, a rebel to VI. The Abyssinians and the Coptic patriarch, a rebel to Constantinople, is still glorified in the filial obedience of the kings of Abyssinia and Ethiopia. He repudiated his homage by nothing but a few words. Apollinaria informed him that they could bring into the field a hundred thousand horse, with an equal number of camels; that their horse could pour out or restrain the waters of the Nile; and the peace and plenty of Egypt was obtained, even in this world, by the intercession of the patriarch of Alexandria. But Junian seems to have been recommended to his patroness a conversion of the black nations of Abyssinia from the tropic of Cancer to the confines of Abyssinia. Her design was suspected and emulated by the more orthodox emperor. The rival missionaries, a Melchite and a Jacobite, embarked at the same time; but the empress, from a motive of love or fear, was more effectually obeyed; and the catholic priest was detained by the president of Thebaïs, while the king of Nubia and his court were hastily baptized in the faith of Dioscorus. The hard years of pagan rule were in the ascendant, as a dishonour; but when he accused the heresy and treason of the Egyptians, the negro convert was instructed to reply that he would never abandon his brethren, the true believers, to the persecuting ministers of the synod of Chalcedon. During several ages, the bishops of Nubia were subject to the episcopal authority of the patriarch of Alexandria; as late as the twelfth century, Christianity prevailed; and some rites, some ruins, are still visible in the savage towns of Sennaar and Dongola. But the Nigerians at length executed their threat of returning to the worship of idols; the climate required the services of the priests, the causa of all the Egyptians might have preferred the triumph of the Koran to the abasement of the cross. A metaphysical religion may appear too refined for the capacity of the negro race; yet a black or a parrot might be taught to repeat the words of the Chalcedonian creed. Christianity was more deeply rooted in the Abyssinian empire; and, although the correspondence has been sometimes interrupted above seventy or a hundred years, the mother-church of Alexandria retains her colony in a state of perpetual pignaracy. Seven bishops possessed the Ethiopic synod: had their number amounted to ten, they might have elected an independent prim\-\ate; and one of their kings was ambitious of pro\-\moting his brother to the ecclesiastical throne. But the existence of the Abyssinian church has been the source of the power of the Coptic patriarch, a title which the episcopal office has been gradually confined to the abuna, the head and author of the Abyssinian priesthood; the patriarch supplies each vacancy with an Egyptian monk; and the character of a stranger appears more venerable in the eyes of the peopled deserts than in those of the monarch. In the sixth century, when the schism of Egypt was confirmed, the rival chiefs, with their patrons, Justinian and Theodora, strove to outstrip each other in the contest of a remote and independent province. The industry of the emperors was amply rewarded, and the pious Theodora had established in that sequestered church the faith and discipline of the Jacobites. Encompassed on all sides by the enemies of their religion, the Ethiopians slept near a thousand years, forgetful of the world, by whom they were forgotten. They were awakened by the imminence of the danger, when a caravan of the inner promontory of Africa, appeared in the open desert, and the heir apparent to the crown of Axume, appeared in the Red sea, as if they had descended through the air from a distant planet. In the first moments of their interview, the subjects of Rome and Alexandria observed the resemblance, rather than the difference, of their faith; and each nation expected the most important benefits from an alliance with their christian brethren. In their lonely situation, the Ethiopians had almost relapsed into the savage life. Their vessels, which had traded to Ceylon, scarcely presumed to navigate the rivers of Africa; yet when the expedition was scattered in villages, and the emperor, a pious name, was content, both in peace and war, with the immovable residence of a camp. Conscious of their own independence, the Abyssinians had formed the rational project of importing the arts and ingenuity of Europe; and their ambassadors at Rome and Lisbon were instructed to solicit a colony of smiths, carpenters, tailors, masons, printers, surgeons, and physicians, for the use of their country. But the public danger soon called for the instant and effectual aid of arms and soldiers, to defend an unwarlike people from the barbarians who had encroached the coast, and whose valour and industry were unequal to the defence of their native soil. But the vows which pain had extracted, were forsworn on the return of health. The Abyssinians still adhered with unshaken constancy to the Monophysite faith; their laudable infidelity was inflamed by the exercise of dispute; they branded the Latins with the names of Arians and Nestorians, and imputed the adoration of four gods, to those who separated the two natures of Christ. Freemasonry, a place of worship, or rather of exile, was assigned to the Jesuit missionaries. Their skill in the liberal and mechanical arts, their residence in the desert, and the policy of the church, insinuated a base design; but they were not endowed with the gifts of miracles, and they vainly solicited a reparation from the European emperors. The piety of forty years at length obtained a more favourable audience, and two emperors of Abyssinia were persuaded that Rome could ensure the temporal and everlasting happiness of their vassals. The first of these royal convert lost his crown and his life; and the rebel army was sanctified by the brave, who hurled an ammunition at the apostle, and absolved his subjects from their oath of fidelity. The fate of Zadengiel was revenged by the courage and fortune of Susneus, who ascended the throne under the name of Seguirid, and more vigorously prosecuted the pious enterprise of his kinsman. After the instant instance of Cosimo de' Medici, who added the Jesuits and his illetarate priests, the emperor declared himself a proselyte to the synod of Chalcedon, presuming that his clergy and people would embrace without delay the religion of their prince. The liberty of choice was succeeded by a law, which imposed, under pain of death, the belief of the two natures of Christ: the Abyssinians were enjoined to work and to play on the sabbath; and Seguirid, in the face of Europe and Africa, pronounced his connexion with the Alexandrian church. A Jesuit, Alphonso Conversion de Mendez, the catholic patriarch of Ethiopia, was received, in the name of Urban VIII. A.D. 1638, in the hommage and abjuration of his pontifical. "I confess," said the emperor on his knees, "I confess that the pope is the vicar of Christ, the successor of St. Peter, and the sovereign of the world. To him I swear true obedience, and at his feet I offer my person and kingdom." A similar oath was repeated by his son, his brother, the clergy, the nobles, and even the ladies of the court; the Latin patriarch was invested with honours and wealth; and his missionaries erected their churches or citadels in the most convenient stations of the empire. The Jesuits themselves deplored the total indissoluble of their chief, who forgot the modesty of the gospel and the policy of his order, to introduce with hasty violence the liturgy of Rome and the inquisition of Portugal. He condoned the ancient practice of circumcision, which health rather than superstition had first invented in the climate of Ethiopia. A new baptism, a new ordination, was inflicted on the natives; and they trembled with horror when the most holy of the dead were torn from their graves, when the most illustrious of the living were exterminated by a foreign priest. In the defence of their religion and liberty, the Abyssinians rose in arms, with energy and despair but unsuccesses in zeal. They were consumed and extinguished in the blood of the insurgents: two abunas were slain in battle, whole legions were slaughtered in the field, or suffocated in their caverns; and neither merit, nor rank, nor sex, could save from an ignominious death the enemies of Rome. But the victorious monarch was finally subdued by the constancy of the nation, of his mother, of his son, and of his most faithful friends. Seguirid listened to the voice of pity, of reason, perhaps of fear; and his act of liberty of conscience instantly revealed the tyranny and weakness of his successor. On the death of his father, Basildes expelled the Latin patriarch, and restored to the wishes of the nation the faith and discipline of Rome.
THE DECLINE AND FALL

CHAPTER IX.

Plan of the four last volumes.—Succession and character of the Greek emperors of Constantinople, from the time of Heraclius to the Latin conquest.

Defects of the Byzantine history.

I have now deduced from Tranjan to Constantine, from Constantine to Heraclius, the regular series of the Roman emperors; and faithfully exposed the prosperous and adverse fortunes of their reigns. Five centuries of the decline and fall of the empire have already passed but a period of more than eight hundred years still separates me from the term of my labours, the taking of Constantinople by the Turks. Should I perseverve in the same course, a prolix and slender thread would be spun through many a volume, nor would the patient reader receive the separate reward of his patient attention.

At every step, as we sink deeper in the decline and fall of the eastern empire, the annals of each succeeding reign would impose a more ungrateful and melancholy task. These annals must continue to repeat a tedious and uniform tale of weakness and misfortune; the natural connexion of causes and events would be broken by frequent and hasty transitions, and a minute accumulation of circumstances must destroy the light and effect of these general pictures which compose the use and ornament of a remote history. From the time of Heraclius, the Byzantine theatre is contracted and darkened; the lise of empire, which had been defined by the laws of Justinian and the arms of Belisarius, recedes on all sides from our view: the Roman name, the proper subject of our inquiries, is reduced to a narrow corner of Europe, to the lonely subdues of Constantinople; and the field of the Greek empire has been compared to that of the Rhine, which loses itself in the sands, before its waters can mingle with the ocean. The scale of duration is diminished to our view by the distance of time and place; nor is the historical splendour of the empire compensated by any superior gifts of virtue and genius. In the last moments of her decay, Constantinople was doubtless more opulent and populous than Athens at her most flourishing era, when a scanty sum of six thousand talents, or twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling, was possessed by twenty-one thousand male citizens of an adult age. But each of these citizens was a free man, who dared to assert the liberty of his thoughts, words, and actions; whose person and property were guarded by equal laws; and who exercised his independent vote in the government of the republic. Their numbers seem to have been multiplied by the strong and various discriminations of character: under the shield of freedom, on the wings of emulation and vanity, each Athenian aspired to the level of the national dignity; from this commanding eminence, some chosen spirits soared beyond the reach of a vulgar eye; and the chances of superior merit in a great and populous kingdom, as they are proved by experience, would exceed the computation of imaginary millions. The territory and revenues, the name and arms, the galaxy of that solitary realm were for ever shut against the arts, the science, and the fanaticism of Europe.

* * *

The three most eminent historians, Ludolphus, (Hist. Ethnica, Francford, 1651; Commentaries, 1651; Italia, Nova, &c. 1653, in fol.) Goldsm. (Church History of Ethiopia, London, 1596, in Sena) and La Croze, (Hist. des Chrestianes, Ethnique et d'Armeni, La Haye, 1758; in 8vo.) have drawn their principal materials from the Ethiopic manuscripts, and have given the general history of Ethiopia, published by Dr. Heins, in Spic. Colombr. 1665. We might be surprised at their frankness; but their most frequent view, the spirit of persecution, was in their eyes their most magnificent virtue. Ludolphus possessed some, though a slight, advantage from the Ethiopic language, and the personal acquaintance of a few learned and pious Abyssinian priests, whom he invited from Rome to the court of Saxe Gotha. See the Theologia Ethnica of Gregorius, in Fabric. Lux Excipl. p. 716–724

[Note: This text appears to be a continuation of a larger work, possibly a history or narrative, discussing the decline and fall of the Byzantine empire, focusing on the defects of the historical records and the characteristics of the Greek emperors from Heraclius to the Latin conquest. It touches on the contrast between ancient and modern perspectives, the decline of empire, and the changing nature of historical narratives.]

Plan of the four last volumes of the

The decline and fall of the empire, as narrated by the historians of ancient Persia and Arabia, has been a source of particular interest to modern scholars. The narrative, however, has been subject to significant modifications and reinterpretations over time. The authors of the histories have sought to capture not only the events of their day but also the spirit and character of the empires they described. The study of these narratives is important for understanding the evolution of historical consciousness and the ways in which empires have been viewed and remembered. The decline and fall of the Byzantine empire, for instance, has been seen as a period of transition from the glory of ancient civilizations to the rise of modern nation-states. The narrative of the decline and fall is not only a chronicle of events but also a reflection of the values and beliefs of the societies that produced it. The study of these narratives can provide insights into the cultural and intellectual climate of the time, as well as the ways in which historical narratives are constructed and interpreted.
The chapter will contain, in a regular style, the histories of Constantine during a period of six hundred years, from the days of Heraclius to the Latin conquest: a rapid abstract, which may be supported by general appeal to the order and text of the original historians. In this latter period, the succession of families, the personal characters of the Greek princes, the mode of their life and death, the maxims and influence of their domestic government, and the tendency of their reign to accelerate or suspend the downfall of the eastern empire. Such a chronological and topographical summary of the various argument of the subsequent chapters; and each circumstance of the eventful story of the barbarians will adapt itself in a proper place to the Byzantine annals. The internal state of the empire, and the dangerous heresy of the Paulicians, which shook the east and enlightened the west, will be the subject of two separate chapters; but these inquiries must be postponed till our further progress shall have opened the view of the world in the ninth and tenth centuries of the Christian era. After this foundation of Byzantine history, the following nations will pass before our eyes: and each will occupy the space which it may be entitled by greatness or merit, or the degree of connexion with the Roman world and the present age.

The Franks; a general appellation which includes all the barbarians of France, Italy, and Germany, who were united by the sword and sceptre of Charlemagne. Their three main masses united the spoils to which it may have been Rome and Italy from the Byzantine throne, and prepared the restoration of the Roman empire in the west.

The Arabs of Saracens. Three ample chapters will be devoted to this curious and interesting object. In the first, after a picture of the country and its inhabitants, the walls and gates of the cities, we learn the character, religion, and success of the prophet. In the second I shall lead the Arabs to the conquest of Syria, Egypt, and Africa, the provinces of the Roman empire; nor can I check their victorious career till they have overthrown the monarchies of Persia and Spain. In the third I shall inquire how Constantinople and Europe were saved by the luxury and arts, the division and decay, of the empire of the caliphs.

The Bulgarians, IV. Hungarians, and V. Russians, who assaulted by sea or by land the provinces and the capital; but the last of the three nations, we believe, will excite some curiosity in their origin andUnfortunately, the text is not fully transcribed. The content continues:

"...The emperor Heraclius had punished a tyrant and ascended his throne; and the genius of his reign is perpetual by the transient conquest and irreparable loss of the eastern provinces. After the death of Eudocia, his first wife, he disobeyed the patriarch, and violated his laws, by his second marriage with his niece Martina; and the superstition of the Greeks beheld the judgment of heaven in the fatal event of the everything of his offspring. But the opinion of an illegitimate birth is sufficient to distract the choice, and lessen the obedience of the people; the ambition of Martina was quickened by maternal love, and perhaps by the envy of a stepmother; and the aged husband was too feeble to withstand the arts of conjugal allurements. Constantine, his eldest son, enjoyed in a mature age the title of Augustus; but the weakness of his constitution required a colleague and a guardian, and he yielded with secret reluctance to the partition of the empire. The senate was summoned to the palace to ratify or attest the association of Heracleonas, the son of Martin; the imposition of the diadem was consecrated by the prayer and blessing of the patriarch; the senators and patricons adored the majesty of the great emperor and the partners of his reign; and as soon as the doors were thrown open, they were hailed by the tumultuary but important voice of the soldiers. After an interval of five months, the pompous ceremonies which formed the essence of the Byzantine state were celebrated in the cathedral and the hippodrome: the clasps of the royal brothers, and of their offspring, were affectedly displayed by the younger leaning on the arm of the monarch, and the name of Martina was mingled in the redundant or vocal acclamations of the people. Heraclius survived this association about two years; his last testimony declared that Michael of Trebizond was to be emperor of the empire, and commanded them to honour his widow Martina as their mother and their sovereign.

When Martina first appeared on the throne of Constantine, her name and attributes of royalty, she was checked by a firm faction. For many years she was in a state of captivity and exile, must be considered as a foreign nation; the enemies, and again the sovereigns, of Constantinople. Misfortunes had rekindled a spark of national virtue; and the imperial series may be continued with some dignity from the restoration to the Turkish conquest."
in his own hands, the weight of the sceptre. Your sex is excluded by nature from the toils of government. How could you combat, how could you answer, the barbarians, who, with hostile or friendly intentions, may approach the royal city? May heaven avert from the Roman capital this national disgrace, which would provoke the patience of the slaves of Persia!”

Martina descended from the throne with indignation, and sought a refuge in the female apartment of the palace. The reign of Constantine the third lasted only one hundred and three days: he expired in the thirtieth year of his age, and although a long malady, a belief was entertained that poison had been the means, and his cruel step-mother the author, Heracleon, of his untimely fate. Martina reigned indecently and unjustly, or died the harvest of his death, and assumed the government in the name of the surviving emperor; but the inconstant widow of Heracleon was universally abhorred; the jealousy of the people was awakened, and the two orphans whom Constantine had left, became the objects of the public care. It was in vain that the son of Martinus, who was no more than fifteen years of age, was taught to declare himself the guardian of his nephews, one of whom he had presented to the baptismal font; it was in vain that he swore on the wood of the true cross, to defend them against all their enemies. On his death-bed, the late emperor had despatched a trusty servant to arrest them. The king and provost, who devoured the grapes and drank the wine of their Asiatic vineyards, provoked the citizens of Constantinople against the domestic authors of their calamities, and the dome of St. Sophia re-echoed, not with prayers and hymns, but with the clamours and imprecations of an enraged multitude. At their imperious command, Heracleon appeared in the pulpit with the eldest of the royal orphans; Constans alone was saluted as emperor of the Romans, and a crown of gold, which had been taken from the tomb of Heracleus, was placed on his head, with the solemn benediction of the patriarch. But the kingdom of joy and immortality, which was pillaged, the sanctuary was polluted by a promiscuous crowd of Jews and barbarians; and the Monothelite Pyrhus, a creature of the empress, after dropping a protestation on the altar, escaped by a prudent flight from the presence of the catechumens. A more solemn and bloody task was reserved for the senate, who derived a temporary strength from the consent of the soldiers and people. The spirit of Roman freedom revived the ancient and awful examples of the judgment of tyrants, and the imperial culprits were deposed and imprisoned. Constantine, the third son of Constantine the first, was proclaimed as the successor of Constantine the second. But the severity of the conscript fathers was stained by the indiscriminate punishment of the innocent and the guilty: Martina and Heracleon were sentenced to death, the former by the order of the latter of his nose; and after this cruel execution, they consumed the remainder of their days in exile and oblivion. The Greeks, who were capable of reflection, might find some consolation for their servitude, by observing the abuse of power when it was lodged for a time in the hands of antyrants.

We shall imagine ourselves transported five hundred years backwards to the age of the Antenome, if we listen to the oration which Constans II. pronounced in the twelfth year of his reign, before the Byzantine senate: he returned his thanks for the just punishment of the assassins, who had intercepted the fairest hopes of his father’s reign, “By the divine providence,” said the young emperor, “and by your righteous decree, Martina and her inconstant progeny have been cast headlong from the throne. Your majesty and wisdom have prevented the Roman state from degenerating into lawless tyranny. I therefore exhort and beseech you to stand forth as the counsellors and judges of the commonwealth. I am anxious to introduce those salutary, just, serene, and beneficent institutions, which were formerly maintained and manifested under the vigorous and illustrious reign of your highness; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom; and in his mind, the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism. He retained only a jealousy of the people. The senator, or people, sliud by the spectre address and liberal donative of their sovereign; but these ser of the growth of his young beard during the Sicilian voyages, was announced by the familiar surname of Per-notor. But his reign, like that of his predecessor, was stained with fraternal discord. On his two brothers, Heracleus and Tibirius, he had bestowed the title of Augustus: an empty title, for they continued to languish, without trust or power, in the solitude of the palace. At their sister, the assembled bishops, and the emperor's threat or promise, approached the city on the Asiatic side, demanded for the royal brothers the partition or exercise of sovereignty, and supported their sedition claim by a theological argument. They were christians, (they cried,) and orthodox in faith; they were the children of the holy and undivided Trinity. Since there are three equal persons in heaven, it is reasonable there should be three equal persons upon earth. The emperor invited these learned divines to a friendly conference, in which they might propose their arguments to the senate: the senate obeyed the summons, but the prospect of their bodies hanging on the gibbet in the square of Galata, reconciled their companions to the unity of the reign of Constantine. He pardoned his brothers, and their names were still pronounced in the public acclama-tions: but on the repetition or suspicion of a similar offer, the three were beheaded. The titles and names, in the presence of the catholic bishops who were assembled at Constantinople in the sixth general synod. In the close of his life, Pogonatus was anxious only to establish the right of primogenu-ture: the hair of his two sons, Justinian and Herac-leus, was offered on the shrine of St. Peter, as a symbol of their spiritual adoption by the pope; but the elder was alone exulted to the rank of Augustus, and the assurance of the empire.

Justinian II. A.D. 685. The heri-tance of the Roman world devolved solemnly on a trif-umphant lawyer was disinherited by the vices of a boy, who imitated his nameake only in the expensive luxury of building. His passions were strong; his understanding was feeble; but he was intoxicated with a foolish pride, that his birth had given him the command of millions, of whom the smallest community would not have chosen him for their local magistrate. His favourite ministers were two beings the least susceptible of human sympathy, a eunuch and a monk:

to the one he abandoned the palace, to the other the finances; the former corrected the emperor's motor; with a courage, the latter suspended his live-rent tributaries, with their heads downwards, over a slow and smoky fire. Since the days of Commodus and Caracalla, the cruelty of the Roman princes had most commonly been the effect of their fear; but Ju-stinian, who possessed some vigour of character, enjoyed the sufferings, and braved the revenge, of his subjects, about ten years, till the measure was full, of his crimes and of their patience. In a dark dungeon, Leontius, a general of reputation, had groaned above three years, with some of the noblest and most deserving of the patricians; he was suddenly drawn forth by the emperor. This promotion of an injured man was a mark of the contempt rather than of the confidence of his prince. As he was followed to the port by the kind offices of his friends, Leontius observed with a sigh that he was a victim adored for sacrifice, and destined to a world without foreknowledge. They returned to reply, that glory and empire might be the recompense of a generous resolution; that every order of men abhorred

the reign of a monster; and that the hands of two hundred thousand patriots expected only the voice of a leader. The last period of his reign was the most inflammable, and in the first effort of the conspirators, the prefect was slain, and the prisons were forced open: the emissaries of Leontius proclaimed in every street, "Chris-

"Christians, to St. Sophia!" and the seasonable text of the patriarch, "This is the day of the Lord!" was the prelude of an inflammatory sermon, in which the church the people adjoined to the hidpodrome; Ju-stinian, in whose cause not a sword had been drawn, was dragged before these tumultuary judges, and their clamours demanded the instant death of the tyrant.

But Leontius, who was already clothed with the purple, cost an eye whereby he could behold the benefactor and of so many emperors. The life of Justin-ian was spared; the amputation of his nose, perhaps of his tongue, was imperfectly performed; the happy flexibility of the Greek language could impose the name of Rhinmatius; and the mutilated tyrant was banished to Chersones in Crim-Tartary, a lonely settlement, where corn, wine, and oil, were imported as foreign luxuries.

On the edge of the Scythian wilderness. Justinian still cherished the pride A. D. 695—705.

of his birth, and the hope of his restoration. After three years' exile, he received the pleasing intelligence that his injury was avenged by a second revolt, and that Leontius in his turn had been dethroned and mutilated by the rebel Apsimar, who assumed the more respectable name of Tibirius. But the claim of lineal succession was still formidable to a plebeian ascendant. The bishop of Autun accused him of false plaints and charges of the Chersonites, who held the views of the tyrant in the spirit of the exile. With a band of followers, attached to his person by common hope or common despair, Justinian fled from the inhospitable shore to the hordes of the Chozars, who pitched their tents between the Tamais and Boryschens. The khan entertained with pity and respect the royal suppliant:

Phanagoria, once an opulent city, on the Asiatic side of the lake Mecottis, was assigned for his residence;

and every Roman prejudice was stifled in his marriage with the sister of the barbarian, who seems, however, though his name was not inscribed on the testament of baptism. But the faithless Chozar was soon tempted by the gold of Constantinople; and had not the design been revealed by the conjugal love of Theodora, her husband must have been assassinated, or betrayed into the power of his enemies. After struggling, with his own sword, with the swords of the khan, Justinian sent back his wife to her brother, and embarked on the Euinice in search of new and more faithful allies. His vessel was assaulted by a violent tempest; and one of his pious companions advised him to preserve the mercy of God by a vow of general penance. Justinian, however, reserved his own for he should be restored to the throne.

"Of forgiveness!" repeated the intrepid tyrant: "may

I perish this instant—may the Almighty whelm me in the waves—if I consent to spare a single head of my enemies!" He survived this impious menace, sailed into the mouth of the Danube, trusted his person in the royal village of the Bulgarians, and purchased the aid of Terbelis, a pagan conqueror, by the promise of his daughter and a fair partition of the treasures of the Empire. The Bulgarian kingdom extended to the confines of Thrace; and the two princes besieged Constantinople at the head of fifteen thousand horse. Ap-simar was disheartened by the sudden, and the inadvantage of his rival, whose head had been promised by the Chozar, and of whose evasion he was yet ignorant. After an absence of ten years, the crimes of Justinian were faintly remembered, and the birth and fortunes of his heritage sovereignly excised the pity of the multitude, and caused the discovery to rouse

the inglorious people with his hitherto unimagined powers; and by the active diligence of his adherents

he was introduced into the city and palace of Constantinople.

In rewarding his allies, and recalling His restoration his wife, Justinian displayed some sense, at least, of honour and gratitude; and Terbelis, who had retired, after sweeping away a heap of gold coin, which he measured with his Scythian whip. But never was vow more religiously performed than the

VOL. II.—C
saered oath of revenge which he had sworn amidst the storms of the Euxine. The two usurpers, for I must reserve the name of tyrant for the conqueror, were dragged into the hippodrome, their heads hewn from their prison by the other from his palace. Before their execution, Leo the Thrice-Crowned and Apismar were cast prostrate in chains beneath the throne of the emperor; and Justinian, planting a foot on each of their necks, contemplated above an hour the chariot-race, while the inconstant people shouted the words of the Teutoblast, "Thou shalt trample on the ass and the hasilisk, and on the lion and dragon shalt thou set thy foot!" The universal defilement which he had once experienced might provoke him to repeat the wish of Caligula, that the Roman people had but one head. Yet I shall presume to observe, that such a wish is unworthy of an ingenuious tyrant, since his revenge and cruelty would have been extinguished by a single blow, instead of the slow variety of tortures which Justinian inflicted on the victims of his anger. His pleasures were inhuman; nether private virtue nor public service could expiate the guilt of active, or even passive, obe-dance to an established government; and during the six years of his new reign, he considered the axe, the cord, and the rack, as the only instruments of royalty. But his most imitable hatred was directed against the Chersonites, who had insulted his exiles, and violated the laws of hospitality. Their remote situation afforded some means of defence, or at least of escape; and a grievous tax was imposed on Constantinople, to supply the preparations of a fleet and army. "All are guilty, and all must perish," was the mandate of Justin-ian; and the bloody execution was intrusted to his favourite Stephen, who was recommended by the episcopate of the savage. Yet even the savage Stephen imperfectly accomplished the intentions of his sovereign. The slowness of his attack allowed the greater part of the exiles to withdraw into the country; and the minister of vengeance contented himself with reducing the youth of both sexes to a state of servitude, with roasting alive seven of the principal citizens, with drowning twenty in the sea, and with reserving forty-two in chains to receive their doom from the mouth of the emperor. In their return, their public service was driven on the rocky shores of Amaltea; and Justinian applauded the obedience of the Euxine, which had involved so many thousands of its subjects and eneemies in a common shipwreck; but the tyrant was still involved, and a second expedition was commended to extirpate the remains of the proscribed colony. In the short interval, the Chersonites had returned to their city, and were prepared to die in arms; the khan of the Chozars had denounced the cause of his odious brother; the exiles of every province were assembled in Thrace; and Bardanes, under the name of Philipicus, was invested with the purple. The imperial troops, unwilling and unable to perpetrate the revenge of Justinian, escaped his revenge by abjuring his allegiance: the fleet, under their new soveign, steered back a more auspicious course to the harbours of Sinope and Constantinople; and every tongue was prompt to pronounce, every hand to execute, the death of the tyrant. Desteute of friends, he was deserted by his barbarian guards; and the stroke of the assassin was praised as an act of patriotism and Roman virtue. His son Tiberius had taken refuge in a church; his aged grandmother guarded the door; and the innocent youth, suspending round his neck the most formidable relics, embraced with one hand the altar, with the other the wood of the true cross. But the popular fury that dares to transgress upon his position, is deaf to the cries of humanity; and the race of Her-aclius was extinguished after a reign of one hundred years.

Bardanes, or Philipicus, was hailed at Constantinople as a hero who had delivered his country from a tyrant; and he might taste some moments of gladness; but the amount of his success was universal joy. Justinian had left behind him an ample treasure, the fruit of cruelty and rapine; but this useful fund was soon and idly dissipated by his succes-

ors. On the festival of his birth-day, Philipicus entertaine the multitude with the games of the hippodrome; but the spoils of a thousand victims of slaves, and ten thousand Berkeley, and a thousand trumpets; refreshed himself in the baths of Zeuxippus, and returning to the palace, entertained his nobles with a sumptuous banquet. At the meridian hour he withdrew to his chamber, intoxicated with flattery and wine, and forgotten that his example had made every subject lindsay, and that every ambitious subject was his secret enemy. Some bold conspirators introduced themselves in the disorder of the feast; and the slumbering monarch was surprised, hound, blinded, and deposed, and that same public service which had long been deprived of their reward; and the free voice of the senate and people promoted Artemus from the office of secretary to that of emperor; he assumed the title of Anastasius the second, and displayed in a short and troubl and weeping reign of seven years his skill in the extinction of the imperial line, the rule of obeience was violated, and every change diffused the seeds of new revolutions. In a mutiny of the fleet, an obscure and reluctant officer of the revenue was formerly invested with the purple; after some months of a naval war, Anastasius resigned the sceptre and the conqueror, Theodosius the third, submitted in his turn to the superior ascendant of Leo, the general and emperor of the oriental troops. His two predecessors were permitt ed to retire, and the crown was offered to him, a less impotence of Anastasius tempted him to risk and to lose his life in a treasonable enterprise; but the last days of Theodosius were honourable and secure. The single sublime word, "health," which he inscribed on his tomb, expresses the confidence of philosophy in the future. The fleet was long preserved among the people of Epheus. This convenient shelter of the church might sometimes impose a lesson of clemency; but it may be questioned whether it is for the public interest to diminish the peril

I have dwelt on the fall of a tyrant; I shall briefly represent the founder of a new dynasty, who is known to posterity by the invidences of his enemies, and whose public and private life is involved in the ecclesiastical story of the Iconoclasts. Yet in spite of the clamsours of superstition, a favourable prejudice for the character of Leo the Isaurian, may be reasonably drawn from the obscurity of his birth, and the duration of his reign.—I. In an age of manly spirit, the prosper of an imperial reward would have kindled every energy of the mind, and produced a crowd of competitors as deserving as they were desirous to reign. Even in the corruption and debility of the modern Greeks, the elevation of a plebeian from the last to the first rank of society, supposes some qualifications above the level of the multitude. He would probably be ignorant and disdainful of speculative science; and, in the pursuit of fortune, he might absolve himself from the obligations of benevolence and justice; but to his character we may ascribe the useful virtues of prudence and fortitude, the knowledge of mankind, and the important art of gaining the confidence and directing their passions. It is agreed that Leo was a native of Isauria, and that Conrad was his primitive name. The writers, whose awkward satire is praise, describe him as an itinerant pedlar, who drove an ass with some paltry merchandise to the country fairs; and foolishly relate that he met on the road some Jewish fortune-tellers, who promised him the Roman empire, on condition that he should abolish the worship of idols. A more probable account relates the emigration of a body of Jews, who had been induced to accept the faith, to the pursuit of a grazier; and he must have acquired considerable wealth, since the first introduction of his son was procured by a supply of five hundred sheep to the imperial camp. His first seat was the towns of Julius and the Embrun, which attracted the notice, and by degrees the jealousy, of the tyrant. His valour and dexterity were conspicuous in the Colchian war: from Anastasius he received the command of the Anatolian legions, and by the slaughter of the soldiers he was raised to the empire with the general applause of the Roman world—II. In this dangerous elevation, Leo the third supported himself against the envy of his equals, the discontent of a powerful faction, and the assaults of his foreign and domestic enemies. The catholics, who secure his religious innovations, are obliged to confess that they were undertaken with temper and conducted with prudence. Their silence respects the wisdom of his administration and the purity of his manners. After a reign of twenty-four years, he peaceably expired in the palace of Constantinople; and the purple which he had acquired was transmitted by the right of inheritance to the his son.

Constantine V.

In a long reign of thirty-four years, the son and successor of Leo, Constantine the fifth, surnamed Copronymus, attacked with less temperate zeal the images or idols of the church. Their votaries have exhausted the earth with blasphemy, and the haughty spirit of the spotted panther, this anticlerst, this flying dragon of the serpent's seed, who surpassed the vices of Elagabalus and Nero. His reign was a long butchery of whatever was most noble, or holy, or innocent, in his empire. In person, the emperor assisted at the execution of his victims, surveyed their agonies, listened to their groans, and indulged, without satiety, his appetite for blood: a plate of noses was accepted as a grateful offering, and his domesticities were often scourged or mutilated by the royal hand. His surname was derived from his pollution of his baptism. Of the history of the church, the description of the events of the reign, the anarchy of his reign, the heresies, the heretics, the new idols, the new faith, the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, the council of Chalcedon, the name of Nicephorus, is the name of Sophia, the first to swear, and the first to violate their oath, were the five sons of Copronymus by a second marriage; and the story of these princes is singular and tragic. The right of primogeniture enjoyed by them; the cruelty of their elder brother defrauded them of legitimate to the throne; the millions of wealth; some vain titles were not deemed a sufficient compensation for wealth and power; and they repeatedly conspired against their nephew, before and after the death of his father. Their first attempt was pardoned; for the second offence they were condemned to the ecclesiastical state; and for the third treason, Nicephorus, the eldest and most guilty, was deprived of his eyes, and his four brothers, Christoper, Niceas, Anticensus, and Endoxus, were punished, as a milder sentence, by the amputation of their ears. After he was convicted of the murder of his brother, they resigned to the church of Sophia, and displayed a pathetic spectacle to the people. "Countrysmen and christians," cried Nicephorus for himself and his mute brethren, "behold the sons of your emperor, if you can still recognize our features in this miserable state. It is all we ask; it is all that remains to our enemies has spared. It is now threatened, and we now have ourselves on your compassion." The rising murmur might have produced a revolution, had it not been suppressed by the presence of a minister, who soothe red the unhappy princes with flattering and hope, and gently drew them from the edge of the palace. They were speedily embarked for Greece, and Athens was allotted for the place of their exile. In this calm retreat, and in their helpless condition, Nicephorus and his brothers were tormented by the thirst of power, and tempted by a Slavonian chief, who offered to break their prison, and to lead them in arms, and in the purple, to the gates of Constantinople. A barbarian, ever anxious in the cause of Irene, prevented her justice or cruelty; and the five sons of Cophomy-

Constantine VI, a barbarian wife, the daughter of the khans of the Czarks, but in the matur-

age, was the immediate consequence of this barbarous execcession. The catholics have been deceived or subdued by the authority of Baronius; and protestant zeal has re-echoed the words of a cardinal, desires, as it should seem, to favour the patrones of images. Yet the bloody stroke was inflicted by the court and forgotten by the world: the Isaurian dynasty was silently extinguished; and the memory of Constantine was recalled only by the nuptials of his daughter Euphrosyne with the emperor Michael the second.

The most-bigoted orthodoxy has justly exerated the unnatural mother, who may not easily be paralleled in the history of crimes. To her bloody deed, superstition has attributed a subsequent darkness of seventeen days; during which most evils in mind and body, and for whose course if the sun should become so very and so remote, could sympathize with the atoms of a revolving planet. On earth, the crime of Irene was left five years unpunished; her reign was crowned with external splendour; and if she could silence the voice of conscience by the admiration and sharing of mankind. The Roman world bowed to the government of a female; and as she moved through the streets of Constantinople, the reins of four milk-white steeds were held by as many patricians, who marched on foot before the golden chariot of their queen. But these patricians were, for the most part, mere eunuchs; and their black ingratitude justified, on this occasion, the popular hatred and contempt. Raised, enriched, intrusted with the first dignities of the em-perors, they basely conspired against their beneficence; the great treasurer Nicephorus was secretly invested with the purple; her successor was introduced into the palace, and crowned at St. Sophia by the venal patriarch. In their first interview, she recapitulated with dignity the revolutions of her life, gently accused the perjury of Nicephorus, insinuated that he owed his life to his transubstantial character; she offered the throne and treasures which she resigned, solicited a decent and honourable retreat. His avarice refused this modest compensation; and in her exile of the isle of Lesbos, the empress earned a scanty subsistence by the labor of her distaff.

Many tyrants have betrayed undoubtedly more criminal than Nicephorus, but none, perhaps, have more deeply in-erated the universal abhorrence of their people. His character was stained with the three odious vices of hypocrisy, ingratitude, and avarice; his want of virtue was not redeemed by any superior talents, nor his want of talents by any pleasing qualifications. Unskilful and unfortunate in war, Nicephorus was vanquished by the Saracens, and slain by the Bulgarians; and the advantage of his death overbalanced, in the public mind, the death of their emperor. His son and heir Staurakius escaped from the field with a mortally wounded; yet six months of an expiring life were sufficient to refute his indecency, though popular declaration, that a wound in all things avoids the example of his father. On the near prospect of this demise, Michael, the great master of the palace, and the husband of his sister Procopia, was named by every person of the palace and city, except by his envious brother. Tenacious of a sceptre now falling from his hand, he knelt in his apartment, prayed, and cherished the idea of changing to a democracy the Roman empire. But these rash projects served only to inflame the zeal of the people and to remove the scruples of the candidate: Michael the first accepted the purple, and, before he sunk into the grave, the son of Nicophorus implored the clemency of his new sovereign. Had Michael in an age of peace endeavored to bring to existence the arms of the victorious Bulgarians. While his wont of ability and wisdom enabled him to the extent of the soldiery, the masculine spirit of his wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the

insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoked by the
insolence of a female, who, in the front of the standards,
emerged high-minded and positive in the
uteness of the soldiers. The masculine spirit of his
wife Procopia awakened their indignation. Even the Greeks of the ninth century were provoc her monastery Euphrosyne, the daughter of Constantine the sixth. Her august birth might justify a stipulation in the marriage-contract, that her children should enjoy the titles of sovereigns, and that her brother, or the nuptials of Michael and Euphrosyne were barren; and she was content with the title of mother of Theophilus, his son and successor.

Theophilus, A.B.C. example in which religious zeal has all

The character of Theophilus is a rare

Theophilus was rash and fruitless, and his justice arbitrary and cruel. He displayed the banner of the cross against the Saracens; but his first expeditions were concluded by a signal overthrow; Amorium, the native city of his ancestors, was levelled with the ground; and from his military toils, he derived only the surname of the Unfortunate. The wisdom of a sovereign is comprised in the institution of laws and the choice of magistrates, which, when a people without action, his civil government revolves round his centre with the silence and order of the planetary system. But the justice of Theophilus was fashioned on the model of the oriental despots, who, in personal and irregular acts of authority, consult the reason or passion of the monarch, and sometimes necessary to be exercised by the sword, or the penalty by the offense. A poor woman threw herself at the emperor's feet to complain of a powerful neighbour, the brother of the empress, who had raised his palace-wall to such an inconvenient height, that her humble dwelling was excluded from light and air. On the advantage, he acceded to her request, like an ordinary judge, sufficient or ample damages to the plaintiff, the sovereign adjudged to her use and benefit the palace and the ground. Nor was Theophilus content with this extravagant satisfaction; his zealous concern for the emperor's eye rendered the unhappy neighbour a subject of his resentment: the unfortunate patrician was stripped and scourged in the public place of Constantinople. For some venial fences, some defect of equity or vigilance, the principal ministers, a prefect, a quaestor, a captain of the guards, were banished or mutilated, or scalced with boiling pitch, or burnt alive in the hippodrome; and as these dreadful examples might be the effects of error or caprice, they must have alienated from his service the best and wisest of the citizens. But the pride of the monarch was stirred in the exercise of power, or, as he thought, of virtue; and the people, safe in their observance of the danger and dishonour of their superiors. This extraordinary rigour was justified, in some measure, by its salutary consequences; since, after a scrutiny of seventeen days, not a complaint or abuse could be found in the court or city: and it might be alleged that the Greeks could be ruled only with a rod of iron, and that the public interest is the motive and law of the supreme judge. Yet in the crime, or the suspicion, of treason, that judge is of all others the most crouded and partial. Theophilus might inflict a tardy vengeance on the assassins of Leo and the saviours of his father; but he enjoyed the fruits of their crime; and his jealous tyranny sacrificed a brother and a prince to the future safety of his life. A Persian of the race of the Sassanides died in poverty and exile at Constantinople, leaving an only son, the issue of a pious marriage. At the age of twelve years, the royal birth of Theophilus was not concealed, and the child of his sister, and was promoted to the command of thirty thousand men, who had blushed at the Mahometan conquerors. These troops, doubtfully infected with mercenary and fanatical vices, were designs of revolting against their benefactor, and erecting the standard of their native king; but the loyal Theopho-

rus rejected their offers, disconcerted their schemes, and escaped from their hands to the camp or palace of the emperor. But the infirmities of age were speedily followed by the death of his son, to whom Theophilus, in the flower of his age, was compelled to leave the inheritance of the empire. But his jealousy was exasperated by envy and disease; he feared the dangerous virtues which might arise in such a son. He supposed it weakness; and the dying emperor demanded the hand of the Persian prince. With savage delight, he recognized the familiar features of his brother: "Thou art no longer Theophilus," he said; and, sinking on his couch, he added, with a febrile voice, "Soon, too soon, I shall be no more Theophilus.

The Russians, who have borrowed from the Greeks the greatest part of their civil and ecclesiastical policy, preserved, till the last century, a singular institution in the marriage of the Oar. They collected, not the virgins of every rank and of every province, a vain and romantic idea, but the daughters of the principal nobles, who awaited in the palace the choice of their sovereign. It is affirmed, that a similar method was adopted in the nuptials of Theophilus. With a golden apple in his hand, he slowly walked between two cordondes: his eye was detained by the charms of Icasia, a beautiful young captive, which, by this occasion, the prince could only observe, that, in this world, women had been the cause of much evil: "And surely, sir," she pertly replied, "they have likewise been the occasion of much good." This affection of unseemly wit displeased the imperial loves; he turned aside in disgust; Icasia consoled her mortification in a concert; and the modest silence of Theodora was rewarded with the golden apple. She deserved the love, but did not escape the severity, of her lord. From the palace garden he beheld a vessel deeply laden with nuptial presents of wealth and arms. The discovery, that the precious cargo of Syrian luxury was the property of his wife, he condemned the ship to the flames, with a sharp reproach, that her avarice had degraded the character of an empress into that of a merchant. Yet his last choice intrusted her with the guardianship of the empire and salvation of her husband. Michael III. was a prodigal youth who had deserted

Michael III. the ancient profession, a soldier, and was

January 20.
peror. The millions of gold and silver which had been accumulated for the service of the state, were lavished on the wildest of men, who flattered his passions and shared his pleasures; and in a reign of thirteen years, the richest of sovereigns was compelled to strike the standard of retirement. Like Nero, he delighted in the masquerades of the theatre, and sighed to be surpassed in the accomplishments in which he should have blushed to excel. Yet the studies of Nero in music and poetry, betrayed some symptoms of a liberal taste; the more ignoble arts of servile vassals were condescended to by the chariot race or the hippodrome. The four factions which had agitated the peace, still amused the idleness of the capital; for himself, the emperor assumed the blue livery; the three rival colours were distributed to his favourites, and in the vile though eager contentment he forgot the dignity of his person and the safety of his dominions. He silenced the messenger of an invasion, who presumed to divert his attention in the most critical moment of the race; and by his command the important beacon was extinguished, that too frequently spread the alarm from Paurus to Constantinople. The great and illustrious office was conferred on him; he took his first place in his confidence and esteem; their merit was profusely rewarded; the emperor feasted in their houses, and presented their children at the baptismal font; and while he applauded his own popularity, he affected to blame the cold and stately reserve of his predecessors. The universal love and esteem, although directed even to the manhood of Nero, were banished from the world; yet the strength of Michael was consumed by the indulgence of love and intemperance. In his midnight revels, when his passions were inflamed by wine, he was provoked to issue the most sanguinary commands; and if any feelings of humanity were left, he was induced, with the return of reason, to regret the salutary disobedience of his servants. But the most extraordinary feature in the character of Michael, is the profane mockery of the religion of his country. The superstition of the Greeks might indeed excite the smile of a philosopher; but his smile would have been rational and temperate, and he must have condemned the ignorant folly of a youth who insulted the objects of public veneration. A buffoon of the court was invested in the robes of the patriarch; the twelve metropolitan, among whom the emperor was ranked, assumed their ecclesiastical garments; they used his table, and distributed among their banqueting guests the imperial robes, the holy communion was administered in a nauseous compound of vinegar and mustard. Nor were these impious spectacles concealed from the eyes of the city. On the day of a solemn festival, the emperor, with his bishops or buffoons, rode on asses through the streets, encompassed by the true patriarch at the head of his clergy; and by their licentious shouts and obscene gestures, disordered the gravity of the Christian procession. The devotion of Michael appeared only in some offence to reason or piety: he received his theatrical crowns from the hands of his mother; the holy sacrament was repeatedly violated for the sake of burning the bones of Constantine the Macedonian. By this extravagant conduct, the son of Theophilus became as contemptible as he was tedious; every citizen was impatient for the deliverance of his country; and even the favourites of the moment were apprehensive that a caprice might snatch away what a caprice had bestowed. In the thirteenth year of his age, and in the hour of intoxication and sleep, Michael the third was murdered in his chamber by the founder of a new dynasty, whom the emperor had raised to an equality of rank and power.

Basil I. the Macedonian (if it be not the spurious offspring of pride and flattery) exhibits a genuine picture of the revolution of the most illustrious families. The Arsacids, the rivals of Rome, possessed the sceptre of the east near four hundred years; a younger branch of these Parthian kings continued to reign in Armenia; and their royal descendants survived the partition and servitude of that ancient monarchy. Two of these, escaped to the court of Leo the first, his bounty secured them in a safe and hospitable exile, in the province of Macedonia; Adrianople was their final settlement. During several generations they maintained the dignity of their birth; and their Roman patriotism rejected the tempting offers of the Persian and Arabian powers, the birth and blood to their native country. But their splendour was insensibly clouded by time and poverty; and the father of Basil was reduced to a small farm, which he cultivated with his own hands: yet he seemed to disgrace the blood of the Arsacids by a pious alliance: his wife, a widow of Adrianople, was pleased to count among her ancestors the great Constantine; and their royal infant was connected by some dark affinity of lineage or country with the Macedonian Alexander. No sooner was he born, than the cradle of Basil, his family, and his city, were swept away by an inundation of the Bulgarians. The capital was completely destroyed; the cities, and the villages, ravaged by their depredations and wantonness, were burned, or reduced to a confused ravine. The most extraordinary feature in the character of Michael, was the profane mockery of the religion of his country. The superstition of the Greeks might indeed excite the smile of a philosopher; but his smile would have been rational and temperate, and he must have condemned the ignorant folly of a youth who insulted the objects of public veneration. A buffoon of the court was invested in the robes of the patriarch; the twelve metropolitan, among whom the emperor was ranked, assumed their ecclesiastical garments; they used his table, and distributed among their banqueting guests the imperial robes, the holy communion was administered in a nauseous compound of vinegar and mustard. Nor were these impious spectacles concealed from the eyes of the city. On the day of a solemn festival, the emperor, with his bishops or buffoons, rode on asses through the streets, encompassed by the true patriarch at the head of his clergy; and by their licentious shouts and obscene gestures, disordered the gravity of the Christian procession. The devotion of Michael appeared only in some offence to reason or piety: he received his theatrical crowns from the hands of his mother; the holy sacrament was repeatedly violated for the sake of burning the bones of Constantine the Macedonian. By this extravagant conduct, the son of Theophilus became as contemptible as he was tedious; every citizen was impatient for the deliverance of his country; and even the favourites of the moment were apprehensive that a caprice might snatch away what a caprice had bestowed. In the thirteenth year of his age, and in the hour of intoxication and sleep, Michael the third was murdered in his chamber by the founder of a new dynasty, whom the emperor had raised to an equality of rank and power.
drawn from Constantineople, under the pretence of a Cretan expedition, and stabbed in the tent of audience, by the sword of the chamberlain, and in the presence of the emperor. About a month after this execution, Basil appeared in arms with the title of regius and government of the empire. He supported this unequal association till his influence was forfeited by popular esteem. His life was endangered by the caprice of the emperor; and his dignity was profaned by a second colleague, who had roved in the galleys. Yet his beneficence was moderate, and his death as an act of ingratitude and treason; and the churches which he dedicated to the name of St. Michael, were a poor and puerile expiation of his guilt.

The different ages of Basil the first may be compared with those of Augustus. The situation of the Greek did not allow him in his earliest youth to lead an army against his country, or to prose the noblest of his sons; but his aspiring genius stooped to the arts of a slave; he dissembled his ambition and even his virtues, and grieved, with the bloody hand of an assassin, the empire which he ruled with the wisdom and tenderness of a parent. A private citizen may feel his interest repugnant to his duty; but it must be from a deficiency of sense or courage, that an absolute monarch can separate his happiness from his glory, or his glory from the public welfare. The life of Basil was Shot against the toils of soldiers; he composed not easily have soared so high above the level of his own conduct or conceptions. But the most solid praise of Basil is drawn from the comparison of a ruined and a flourishing monarchy, that which he wrested from the disconsolate Michael, and that which he bequeathed to the Macedonian dynasty. The evils which had been sanctioned by time and example, were corrected by his master-hand; and he revived, if not the national spirit, at least the order and majesty, of the Roman empire. His application was indefatigable, his character universal, and his understanding rigorous and decisive; and in his practice he observed that rare and salutary moderation, which pursues each virtue, at an equal distance between the opposite vices. His military service had been confined to the palace; nor was the emperor endowed with the spirit or the talents of a prince. Under this model, the Roman arms were again formidable to the barbarians. As soon as he had formed a new army by discipline and exercise, he appeared in person on the banks of the Euphrates, curbed the pride of the Saracens, and suppressed the dangers though just revolt of the Mameluks. His indignation against a rebel who had long eluded his pursuit, provoked him to wish and to pray, that, by the grace of God, he might drive three arrows into the head of Chrysceher. That odious head, which had been obtained by treason rather than by valor, was suspended from a tree. His little temper, the imperial archer: a base revenge against the dead, more worthy of the times than of the character of Basil. But his principal merit was in the civil administration of the finances and of the laws. To replenish an exhausted treasury, it was proposed to reduce the number of the public slaves and capitation; his prudence abated one moiety of the restitution; and a sum of twelve hundred thousand pounds was instantly procured to answer the most pressing demands, and to allow some space for the mature operations of economy. Among the various schemes for the recovery of the revenues, the suggested capitulation, or tribute, which would have too much depended on the arbitrary discretion of the assessors. A sufficient list of honest and able agents was instantly produced by the minister; but on the more careful scrutiny of Basil himself, only two could be found, who might be safely intrusted with such dangerous powers: and they justified his esteem by their diligence and industry. The success of the prudent diligence of the emperor established by degrees an equinable balance of property and payment, of receipts and expenditure: a peculiar fund was appropriated to each service; and a public method secured the interest of the prince and the property of the people. After the death of this prince, who was more conformable by the deviation of the age to the character of a judge, he was assiduous and impartial; desirous to save, and not to strike: the oppressors of the people were severely chastised; but his personal foes, whom it might be unsafe to pardon, were condemned, after the loss of their eyes, to a life of severity and of solicitude. Basil composed and manners demanded a revision of the obsolete jurisprudence of Justinian; the voluminous body of his Institutes, Pandects, Code, and Novels, was digested under forty titles, in the Greek idiom; and the Basilé, which were improved and completed by his son and grandson, must be referred to the original genius of the founder of their race. This glorious reign was terminated by an accident in the chase. A furious stag entangled his horns in the belt of Basil, and raised him from his horse; he was rescued by an attendant, who cut the belt and slew the animal; but the fall of the king, exhausted the strength of his aged body, and he expired in the palace, amidst the tears of his family and people. If he struck off the head of the faithful servant, for presuming to draw his sword against his sovereign; the pride of despots, which had hitherto been the ruin of the empire, were hindered by the death of the last moments of despair, when he no longer wanted or valued the opinion of mankind.

Of the four sons of the emperor, Con- stantine died before his father, whose Philosophus, grief and credulity were amused by a mount of a melancholy, and disfigured by the death of a B. A. D. 527. March 1. Stephen, the youngest, was content with the honours of a patriarch and a saint; both Leo and Alexander were alike invested with the purple, but the powers of government were solely exercised by the elder brother. The name of Leo the sixth, has been dignified with the title of philosophus; and the union of the prince and the sage, of the active and speculative virtues, would indeed constitute the perfection of human nature. But the claims of Leo are far short of this ideal excellence. Did he reduce his passions and his ambitions to the dearness of reason? His life, like that of his predecessor, was filled with the puerile superstition; the influence of the clergy, and the errors of the people, were consecrated by his laws; and the oracles of Leo, which reveal, in prophetic style, the fate of the empire, are founded on the arts of astrology and divination. If we consider the number of his successes, it can only be replied, that the son of Basil was less ignorant than the greater part of his contemporaries in church and state; that his education had been directed by the learned Photius; and that several books of profane and ecclesiastical science were composed by the pen, or in the name, of the imperial philosopher. But the reputation of his philosophy and religion was gained only by a second generation, the weakness or the repetition of his nuptials. The primitive ideas of the merit and holiness of celibacy, were preached by the monks and entertained by the Greeks. Marriage was allowed as a necessary means for the propagation of mankind; after the death of either party, the survivor might object a second marriage, the weakness or the strength of the flesh; but a third marriage was censured as a state of legal fornication; and a fourth was a sin or scandal as yet unknown to the Christians of the east. In the beginning of his reign, Leo himself had abolished the state of concubines, and condemned, without amending, third marriages; but his patriotism and love soon compelled him to violate his own laws, and to incur the penance, which in a similar case he had imposed on his subjects. In his three first alliances, his nuptial bed was unfruitful; the emperor required a female companion, and the empire a legitimate heir. The debatable Zoe was introduced into the palace as a concubine; and after a trial of her fecundity, and the birth of Constantine, her lover declared his intention of legitimating the mother and the child, by the celebration of his fourth nuptials. But the patriarch Nicholas refused his blessing to the union, with the decided prediction that another obtained by a promise of separation; and the consummated husband of Zoe was excluded from the communion of the faithful. Neither the fear of exile, nor the desertion of his brethren, nor the authority of the Latin church, nor the danger of failure or debt in the succession to the empire, could bend the spirit of the inflexible monk. After the death of Leo he was recalled from exile to the civil and ecclesiastical administration; and the edict of union which was promulgated in the name of Constantine, condemned the future scandal of his marriages, and left a tacit imputation on his own birth.

In the Greek language purple and porphyry are the same word; and as the colours of nature are invariable, we may learn that a deep dark red was the Tyrian dye which stained this domestic story. An apartment of the Byzantine palace was lined with porphyry: it was reserved for the use of the pregnant empresses; and the royal birth of their children was expressed by the appellation of porphyrogenite, or born in the purple. Several of the Roman princes had been born by the grace of Constantine, who was the first to apply to Constantine the seventh. His life and titular reign were of equal duration; but of fifty-four years, six had elapsed before his father’s death; and the son of Leo was ever the voluntary or reluctant subject of those who oppressed his weakness or abused his confidence. His uncle Alexander, who had long been invested with the title of Augustus, was the first colleague and governor of the young prince: but in a rapid career of vice and folly, the brother of Leo already emulated the reputation of Michael, and when he was extirpated by a timely death, he entreated a pardon for the crimes of Constantine, and left him to the empire a worthless favourite. The succeeding years of the minority of Constantine were occupied by his mother Zoe, and a succession or council of seven regents, who pursued their interest, gratified their passion, abandoned the republic, supplanted each other, and, calling on to the council the name of the emperor. From an obscure origin, Romanus Lecapenus had raised himself to the command of the naval armies; and in the anarchy of the times, had deserved, or at least had obtained, the national esteem. With a victorious armory, he animated the people of the capital; he mounted the Danube into the harbour of Constantinople, and was hailed as the deliverer of the people, and the guardian of the prince. His supreme office was at first defined by the new appellation of father of the emperor; but Romanus soon distrusted the subject of his adopted brother, and, and assumed, with the titles of Caesar and Augustus, the full independence of royalty, which he held near five and twenty years. His three sons, Christopher, Stephen, and Constantine, were successively adored with the same honor. The law enunciating the first degraded from the first to the fifth rank in this college of princes. Yet, in the preservation of his life and crown, he might still applaud his own fortune and the eleemosyne of the usurper. The examples of ancient and modern history would have excused the ambition of Romanus: the powers and the law of the empire were in his hand: the unspotted birth of Constantine would have justified his exclusion; and the grave or the monastery was open to receive the son of the concubine. But Lecapenus does not appear to have possessed either the virtues or the vices of a tyrant. The spirit and activity of his private life dissolved away in the sunlight of the throne: and in his revolutions, pleasures, he forgot the safety both of the republic and of his family. Of a mild and religious character, he respected the sanctity of oaths, the innocence of the youth, the memory of his parents, and the attachment of the people. The great Low-temper of his reign, and ambition of Constantine distracted the jealousy of power; his beheld, and music, his pen and his pencil, were a constant source of amusement; and if he could improve a scanty allowance by the sale of his pictures, if his price was not enhanced by the name of the artist, he was endowed with a personal talent, which few princes could employ in the hour of adversity.

The fall of Romanus was occasioned by his own vices and those of his child, and. After the decease of Christopher, his eldest son, the two surviving brothers quarrelled with each other, and contested against their father. At the hour of noon, when all strangers were regularly excluded from the palace, they entered his apartment with an armed force, and conveyed him, in the habit of a monk, to a small island in the Propontis, which was peopled by a religious community. The rumour of this domestic revolution spread to the remotest cities; but Porphyrogenitus alone, the true and lawful emperor, was the object of the public care; and the sons of Lecapenus were taught, by tardy experience, that they had achieved a guilty and perilous enterprise for the benefit of their rival. Their sister Helen, the daughter of Leo, was protected from immediate danger by a careful and circumspect design of assassinating her husband at the royal banquet. His loyal adherents were alarmed; and the two usurpers were prevented, seized, degraded from the purple, and banished for the same island and monastery where their father had been so lately confined. Old Romanus met them on the beach with a sarcastic smile, and, after a just reproach of their folly and ingratitude, presented his imperial colleagues with an equal share of his water and vegetable diet. In the fortieth year of his reign, Constantine the seventh obtained the possession of the eastern world, which he ruled, or spared at least, for fifteen years. But he was devoid of that energy of character which could emerge into a life of action and glory; and the studies which had amused and dignified his leisure, were incompatible with the serious duties of a sovereign. The emperor neglected the practice, to instruct his son in the duties of sovereignty. In the midst of his exalted life, he divulged the habits of intemperance and sloth, he dropped the reins of the administration into the hands of Helen his wife; and, in the shifting scene of her favour and caprice, each minister was regretted in the promotion of his son. Had the son of Romanus in the choice of his wife and successors, and the power and misfortunes of Constantine had endeared him to the Greeks; they excused his failings; they respected his learning, his innocence, and charity, his love of justice; and the ceremony of his funeral was mourned with the unfigured tears of his subjects. The body, according to ancient custom, lay in state in the vest-itude of the palace; and the civil and military officers, the patricians, the senate, and the clergy, approached in turn and bared their heads to the prostrate corpse of their sovereign. Before the procession moved towards the imperial sepulchre, a herald proclaimed this awful admonition: “Arise, O king of the world, and obey the summons of the King of kings!”

The death of Constantine was imputed to poison; and, as Romans II. John, in his life of Constantine, Nov. 15. derived that name from his maternal grandfather, ascended the throne of Constantinople.

A prince who, at the age of twenty, could be suspected of anticipating his inheritance, must have been already lost in the public esteem; yet Romans was rather weak than wicked; and the largest share of the guilt was transferred to his wife, Theophano, a woman of base origin, masculine spirit, and flagitious manners. The sense of personal glory and public hap-iness, the true pleasures of royalty, were unknown to the son of Constantine; and, while the two brothers, Nicephorus and Leo, triumphed over the Saracens, the hours which the emperor owed to his people were consumed in strenuous idleness. In the morning he visited the circuits; at noon he feasted the senators;
the greater part of the afternoon he spent in the sphorist’s lecture, the council of his ministers; from thence he passed over to the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, hunted and killed four wild bears of the largest size, and returned to the palace, proudly content with the labours of the day. In strength and beauty he was conspicuous above his equals: tall and straight as a young cyprus; and his complexion was fair and florid, his eyes sparkling, his shoulders broad, his nose long and aquiline. Yet even these perfections were insufficient to fix the love of Theophano; and, after a reign of four years, she mingled for her husbond the same deadly draught which she had compounded for her father, Nicephorus II.

By his marriage with this impious woman, Romans the younger left two sons, Basil the second and Constantine the ninth, and two daughters, Theophano and Anne.
The first was given to the second, emperor of the west; the younger became the wife of Woleodmir, great duke and apostle of Russia, and, by the marriage of her grand-daughter with Henry the first, king of France, the blood of the Macedonians, and perhaps of the Arsacides, still flows in the veins of the Bourbon line. After the death of her husband, the empress aspired to reign in the name of her sons, the elder of whom was five, and the younger only two, years of age; but she soon felt the instability of a throne which was supported by a female who could not be esteemed, and two infants who could not be feared. Theophano looked around for a protector, and threw herself into the arms of the bravest soldier; her heart was capacious; but the deformity of the new favourite rendered it more than probable that interest was the motive and excuse of her love. Nicephorus Phoenix, united, in the popular opinion, the double merrit of a hero and a saint. In the former character, his qualifications were genuine and splendid: the descendant of a race, illustrious by their military exploits, he had displayed, in every station and in every province, the courage of a soldier and the conduct of a chief;
and Nicephorus was crowned with laurels; but the important conquest of the isle of Crete. His religion was of a more ambitious cast; and his hair-cloth, his fasts, his pious idiom, and his wish to retire from the business of the world, were a convenient mask for his secret ambition. He professed, as a holy patriarch, by whose influence, and by a decree of the senate, he was intrusted, during the minority of the young princes, with the absolute and independent command of the oriental armies. As soon as he had secured the leaders and the troops, he boldly marched to Constantinople, trampled on his enemies, avowed his correspondence with the empress, and, without degrading her sons, assumed, with the title of Augustus, the sacred rights of the purple. The proof of his marriage with Theophano was refused by the same patriarch who had placed the crown on his head; by his second nuptials he incurred a year of canonical penance; a bar of spiritual affinity was opposed to their celebration; and some evasion and perjury were occasionally discovered in the ceremony. Yet the popularitv of the emperor was lost in the purple; in a reign of six years he provoked the hatred of strangers and subjects; and the hypocrisy and avadores of the first Nicephoruses were revived in his sucsessor. Hypocrisy I shall never justify or palliate; but I will dare to observe, that the odious vice of avador is of all others the most hastily arraigned, and most unmercifully condemned. In a private citizen, our judgment seldom expects an accurate scrutiny into his fortune and expense; and in a steward of the public, the tolerance of the hypocrite is always a vicious increase of taxes too often an indispensable duty. In the use of his patrimony, the generous temper of Nicepho-rus had been proved; and the revenue was strictly applied to the service of the state: each spring the emperor marched in person against the Saracens; and every autumn he diligently computed the employment of his taxes in triumphs, conquests, and the security of the eastern barrier.

Among the warriors who promoted his John Zimises,
Basil II.
elevation, and served under his standard,

Constance XI.
A.D.969. Dec. 35.
a noble and valiant Armenian had deser-wards. The statue of John Zimises was below the ordinary standard; but this diminutive body was endowed with strength, beauty, and the soul of a hero.

By the jealousy of the emperor’s brother, he was degraded from the office of general of the east, to that decree, in which the princes were destined with dignity and exile. But Zimises was ranked among the numerous lovers of the empress; on her intercession he was permitted to reside at Chalcodon, in the neighbourhood of the capital; her bounty was exacted for the reward of his services, which were repeated in the name of the emperor of the west; and Theophano consented, with alacrity, to the death of an ugly and penurious husband. Some bold and trusty conspirators were concealed in her most private chambers: in the darkness of a winter night, Zimises, with his principal companions, embered in a small boat, traversed the Bosphorus, and approached the palace; and Theophano consented, with the death of an ugly and penurious husband. Some attendants. Neither his own suspicions, nor the warnings of his friends, nor the tardy aid of his brother Leo, nor the fortress which he had erected in the palace, could protect Nicephorus from a domestic foe, at whose voice every door was opened to the assassins. As he slept on a bear-skin, on the ground, he was roused by their noisy intrusion, and thirty daggers glittered before his eyes. It is doubtful whether Zimises imbred his lusts in the blood of his sovereign, but he enjoyed the inhuman spectacle of revenge. The murder was protracted by insult and cruelty; and as soon as he was disclosed to the public, he was executed by an intrepid patriarch, who charged his conscience with the deed of treason and blood; and required, as a sign of repentance, that he should separate himself from his more criminal associate. This salty of apsists, if not more than half true, from the impression that he could neither love nor trust a woman who had repeatedly violated the most sacred obligations; and The-ophano, instead of sharing his imperial fortune, was dismissed with ignominy from his bed and palace. In their last interview, she displayed a frantic and impotent rage; accused the ingratitude of her lover; assaulted the graces, patience, and youthfulness of her companion; and the guilt of Zoe, silent and submissive in the presence of a superior colleague; and avowed her own prostitution, in proclaiming the illegitimacy of his birth. The public indignation was appeased by her exile, and the punishment of the manner accomplices; the death of an unpopular prince was forgotten; and the guilt of Zoe, silent and submissive in the presence of a superior colleague; and avowed her own prostitution, in proclaiming the illegitimacy of his birth. Perhaps his profusion was less useful to the state than the avarice of Nicephorus; but his gentle and generous behaviour delighted all who approached his person; and it was only in the paths of victory that he reared in the footsteps of his predecessor. The greater part of his reign was employed in the camp and the field: his personal valour and activity were signalized on the Danube and the Tigris, the ancient boundaries of the Roman world; and by his double triumph over the Russians and the Saracens, he deserved the titles of saviour of the empire, and conqueror of the east. In his last return from Syria, he observed that the most fruitful lands of his new provinces were possessed by the cannibals. "And is it for them," he exclaimed, with honest indignation, "that we have fought and conquered? Is it for them that we shed our blood, and spend the revenue of the longest, and most peaceful reign?" The plaint was re-echoed to the palace, and the death of Zimisces is strongly marked with the suspicion of poison.

Basil II, and Constantine IX. twelve years, the two lawful emperors, were on the throne. Basil and Constantine had been brought up to the age of manhood. Their tender years had been incapable of domination: the respectful modesty of their attendance and salutation, was due to the age and merit of their guardians: the childless ambition of those guardians had no temptation to violate their right of succession; their patriotism was ably and faithfully administered; and the premature death of Zimisces was a loss, rather than a benefit, to the sons of Romans. Their want of experience detained them twelve years longer the obscure and voluntary pupils of a minister, who extended his influence over them; and by the time they had reached the age of youth, and to disdain the labours of government. In this silken web, the weakness of Constantine was for ever entangled; but his elder brother felt the impulse of genius and the desire of action; he frowned, and the minister was no more. Basil was the acknowledged heir to the throne, and to the happiness and prosperity of Europe; but Asia was oppressed by two veteran generals, Phocas and Sclerus, who, alternately friends and enemies, subjects and rebels, maintained their independence, and laboured to emulate the example of successful usurpation. Against these domestic enemies, the son of Romans first drew his sword, and they trembled in the presence of a lawful and high-spirited prince. The first, in the front of battle, was thrown from his horse, by the stroke of poison, or an arrow: the second, who had been twice loaded with chains, and words, and blows, with the purple, was dragged in the ruins of ending in peace the small remainder of his days. As the aged suppliants approached the throne, with dim eyes and faltering steps, leaning on his two attendants, the emperor exclaimed, in the insolation of youth and power, "And is this the man who has so long been the object of our prayers?" After he had confirmed his own authority, and the peace of the empire, the trophies of Nicephorus and Zimisces would not suffer their royal pupil to sleep in the palace. His long and frequent expeditions against the Saracens were rather glorious than useful to the empire; but the final defeat of the Paphlagonian, his last expedition, since the time of Belisarius, the most important triumph of the Roman arms. Yet instead of applauding their victorious prince, his subjects detested the rapacious and rigid avarice of Basil; and in the imperfect narrative of his exploits, we can only discern the course of the war, the capture of a town, the recovery of a city, the victory of a battle. Basil II., in his desire to reform the Church, established a canonical institution, but his zeal in religious education, which could not subdue his spirit, had clouded his mind; he was ignorant of every science; and the remembrance of his learned and feeble grand sire might encourage his real or affected contempt of laws and lawyers, of artists and arts. Of such a character, in such a situation, he took a firm and lasting possession; after the first licence of his youth, Basil the second devoted his life, in the palace and the camp, to the pacification of a hermit, wore the monastic habit under his robes and armour, observed a vow of continence, and imposed on his appetites a perpetual abstinence from flesh and blood. The sixty-eighth year of his age, his martial spirit urged him to put in person for a holy war against the Saracens of Sicily; he was prevented by death, and Basil, surmised the Slayer of the Bulgarians, was dismissed from the world, with the blessings of the clergy and the curses of the populace. After his decease, his brother, Constantine enjoyed, about three years, the power, or rather the pleasures, of royalty, and his only care was the settlement of the succession. He had enjoyed sixty-six years the title of Augustus; and the reign of the two brothers is the longest, and the most obscure, of the Byzantine history.

A lineal succession of five emperors, in a period of one hundred and sixty years, had attached the loyalty of the Greeks to the Macedonian dynasty, which had been thrice respected by the usurpers of their power. After the death of Constantine the ninth, the last male of the royal race, a new and broken scene presents itself, and the accumulated years of twelve emperors do not equal the space of his single reign. His elder brother had preferred his private chastity to the public interest; and Constantine himself, who had only three daughters; Eudocia, who took the veil, and Zoe and Theodora, who were preserved till a mature age in a state of ignorance and virginity. When their marriage was disapproved in the council of their dying father, the cold or pious Theodora refused to give an heir to the empire, but her sister Zoe presented herself a willing offer of her matrimony to Romanus Argus, a patrician of a graceful person and fair reputation, who was chosen for her husband, and, on his declining that honour, was informed, that blindness or death was the second alternative. The motive of his reluctance was conjugal affection, but his faithful wife sacrificed her own safety and comfort to his, and, by the purchase of an entrance into a monastery, removed the only bar to the imperial nuptials. After the decease of Constantine, the sceptre devolved to Romans the third; but his labours at home and abroad were equally feeble and fruitless; and the mature age, the forty-eight years of Zoe, were less favourable to the hopes of pregnancy than to the indulgence of pleasure. Her favourite chamberlain was a handsome Paphlagonian of the name of Michael, whose first trade had been that of a money-changer; and Romans, either from gratitude or equity, crowned at their criminal intercourse, or accepted a slight assurance of their innocence. But Zoe soon justified the Roman maxim, that every adulteress is capable of poisoning her husband; and the death of Romanus was instantly followed by the scandalous marriage and elevation of Michael the Paphlagonian. But Zoe, however, disappointed; instead of a virgin, a sordid and grasping lecher, she placed in her bed a miserable wretch, whose health and reason were impaired by epileptic fits, and whose conscience was tormented by despair and remorse. The most kind and skilful physicians could not restore him to his senses; and Zoe, by her constant attentions to his melancholy, encouraged him to trust in her. But Zoe, however, disappointed; instead of a virgin, a sordid and grasping lecher, she placed in her bed a miserable wretch, whose health and reason were impaired by epileptic fits, and whose conscience was tormented by despair and remorse. The most kind and skilful physicians could not restore him to his senses; and Zoe, by her constant attentions to his melancholy, encouraged him to trust in her. most popular saints; the monks applauded his penance, and, except restitution, (to whom should he have restored?) Michael, who sought everywhere expiation for his guilt. While he groaned and prayed in sackcloth and ashes, his brother, the eunuch John, smiled at his remorse, and enjoyed the harvest of a crime of which himself was the secret and most guilty author. His administration was only the art of satiating his aversion, and his name, Zoe, was recorded in the palace of his father's and in the hands of her slaves. When he perceived the irretrievable decline of his brother's health, he introduced his nephew, another Michael, who derived his surname of Calaphanes from his father's occupation. In the evening of voices, he, the commander of the eunuchs, Zoe, adopted, for her son, the son of a mechanic; and this fictitious heir was invested with the title and purple of the Caesars, in the presence of the senate and clergy. So feeble was the character of Zoe, that she was oppressed by the liberty and power which she received by the death of the Paphlogionet; and at the end of four days she placed the crown on the head of Michael the fifth, who had protested, with tears and oaths, that he should ever reign the first and most obdient of her subjects. The only act of his short reign, due to his ingratitude to his benefactors, the eunuchs and the empress. The disgrace of the former was pleasing to the public; but the murmurs, and at length the clamours, of Constantineople deplored the exile of Zoe, the daughter of so many emperors; her fate, however, and Michael, there is a period in which the patience of the tamest slaves rises into fury and revenge. The citizens of every degree assembled in a formidable tumult which lasted three days; they besieged the palace, forced the gates, recalled their mothers, Zoe from her prison, Theodora from her monastery, and condemned the son of Calaphanes to the loss of his eyes or of his life. For the first time, the Greeks beheld with surprise the two royal sisters seated on the same throne, presiding in the senate, and giving audience to the ambassadors of the empire in the hall where the senate met, with a majesty which required no more than two months: the two sovereigns, their temerities, interests, and adherents, were secretly hostile to each other; and as Theodora was still averse to marriage, the indigatble Zoe, at the age of sixty, consented, for the public good, to sustain the enormous yoke of the empress, and the censures of the Greek church. His name and number were Constantine the tenth, and the epitthet of Monomachus, the single combatant, must have been expressive of his valour and victory in some public or private quarter. But his health was broken by the toil of the gout, and his disolute reign was spent in the alternative of sickness and pleasure. A fair and noble widow had accompanied Constantine in his exile to the isle of Lesbos, and Selegera gloated in the appellation of his mistress. After his marriage and elevation, she was invested with the title and pomp of Augusta, and occupied a contiguous apartment in the palace. The lawful consort (such was the delicacy or corruption of Zoe) consented to this strange and scandalous partition; and the emperor appeared in public between his wife and his concubine. He survived them both; but the last measures of Constantine to change the order of succession were prevented by the more vigilant friends of Theo- dora; and after his decease, she resumed, with the general consent, the possession of the empire, and by the influence of four eunuchs, the eastern world was peaceably governed about nineteen months; and as they wished to prolong their dominion, they persuaded the aged princes to nominate for her successor Michael the sixth. The surname of Stratelloctus declares his military pro-

Michael V. Calaph-

Theodora, A.D. 1054.

Nicolaus I. Commen-

A.D. 1057.

Aug. 31.
proaching death determined him to interpose some moments between life and eternity. But instead of leaving his son to his fate, his reason and inclination concurred in the preference of his brother John, a soldier, a patriot, and the father of five sons, the future pillars of an hereditary succession. His first modest reluctance might be the natural dictates of discretion and tenderness, but his obstinate and successful perseverance, however it may dazzle with the show of virtue, must be censured as a criminal desertion of his duty, and a rare offence against his family and country. The purple which he desired was refused by Constantine Ducas, a friend of the Comnenian house, and whose noble birth was augmented by the union of the houses of the Caesar and of Paleologus, who was5 anxious to obtain the imperial dignity. He was a pious saint.

Isaac was born, December 14th, 1057, at Chalcedon. His father, Basil II., was a military man, who had been illustrious in the wars of his country, and who had a title to the throne. His mother, Anna Dalassena, a princess of noble descent, was of a mild and gentle nature. His childhood was passed in the nurse of the palace, and his education was of a most refined character. When a youth, he was ordained to the priesthood, and was esteemed by his companions as a model of virtue and learning.

In the year 1076, Isaac was married to Anna, a princess of the Byzantine family, who bore him seven sons, of whom five succeeded him on the throne. The eldest son, Constantine II., who was born in the year 1066, became the Emperor in the year 1081.

His father, Basil II., died in the year 1081, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Constantine II., who reigned for a short time, and was murdered by a foreigner, named Nicetas, in the year 1085.

The Empire was then divided into three parts, viz., Constantinople, Thessalonica, and Nicephorion. The successors of the two former emperors, Michael and Theodoras,
were assassinated by the people, and their empire was divided among their relatives and friends.

The Empire was then divided
into three parts, viz., Constantinople, Thessalonica, and Nicephorion. The
successors of the two former
emperors, Michael and Theodoras,
were assassinated by the people, and
their empire was divided among
their relatives and friends.

The Empire was then divided
into three parts, viz., Constantinople, Thessalonica, and Nicephorion. The
successors of the two former
emperors, Michael and Theodoras,
were assassinated by the people, and
their empire was divided among
their relatives and friends.

The Empire was then divided
into three parts, viz., Constantinople, Thessalonica, and Nicephorion. The
successors of the two former
emperors, Michael and Theodoras,
were assassinated by the people, and
their empire was divided among
their relatives and friends.
and exercised in the school of obedience and adversity. The youth was dismissed from the perils of the Turkish war, by the paternal care of the emperor Romanus, who, in the opinion of the Court, with her anxious care, was accused of treason, and banished, by the sons of Ducas, to an island in the Propontis. The two brothers soon emerged into favour and action, fought by each other's side against the rebel barbarians, and adhered to the emperor Michael, till he was deserted by the world and by his benefact. His first interview with Botaniates, "Prince," said Alexius, with a noble frankness, "my duty rendered me your enemy; the decrees of God and of the people have made you our subject. Judge of my future loyalty by my past opposition." The successor of Michael entertained him with esteem and confidence: his valour was employed against three rebels, who disturbed the peace of the empire, or at least of the em-perors. Ursel, Bryennius, and Basilacius, were formidable by their numerous forces and military fame; they were successively vanquished in the field, and led in chains to the foot of the throne; and whatever treatment they might receive from a timid and cruel court, they applauded the clemency, as well as the courage, of their conqueror. But the loyalty of the Comment was soon tainted by fear and suspicion; nor is it easy to trace how that suite brought, the debt of gratitude, which the former is tempted to claim by a revolt, and the latter to discharge by an executioner. The refusal of Alexius to march against a fourth rebel, the husband of his sister, destroyed the merit or me-memory of his past services: the favourites of Botaniates prevailed in the nation, which they apprehended and accused; and the retreat of the two brothers might be justified by the deficiency of their life or liberty. The women of the family were deposited in a sanctuary, respected by tyrants; the men, mounted on horseback, sallied from the city, and erected the standard of civil war. The soldiers, who had been gradually assembled in the capital and the neighbourhood, were devoted to the cause of a victorious and injured leader; the tides of common interest and domestic alliance secured the attachment of the house of Ducas; and the generous dispute of the Comment was terminated by the decisive victory of Isaac, who was the first to invest his younger brother with the name and ensigns of royalty. They returned to Constantinople, to threaten rather than beseech that impracticable fortress; but the fidelity of the guards was corrupted; a gate was surprised, and the fleet was occupied by the active combat of the Peleolidom, who fought for his father, without foreseeing that he laboured for his posterity. Alexius ascended the throne; and his aged compeer disappeared in a monastery. An army of various nations was gratified with the pillage of the city; but the public disorders were expiated by the tears and fates of the Comment, who submitted to every penance compatible with the possession of the empire.

The life of the emperor Alexius has been delineated by a favorite daughter, who was inspired by a mock regard for her person and a laudable zeal to perpetuate his virtues. Cursed is the just suspicion of her readers, the princess Anna Comnena repeatedly protests, that, besides her personal knowledge, she had searched the discourse and writings of the most respected critics; that after fifteen years, forgotten by, and forgotten of, the world, her mournful solitude was inaccessible to hope and fear; and that truth, the naked perfect truth, was more dear and sacred than the memory of her parent. Yet, instead of the simplicity of style and narrative which wins our belief, an elaborate affectation of rhetoric and science betrays in every page the vanity of a female author. The genuine character of Alexius is lost in a vague constellation of virtues; and the perpetual strain of panegyric and apology awakens our jealousy, to question the veracity of the historian and the merit of the hero. We cannot, however, refuse her judicious discourse, the eulogies of her predecessors, the misfortunes and the glory of Alexius; and that every calamity which can afflict a declining empire was accumulated on his reign by the justice of Heaven and the vices of his predecessors. In the east, the victorious Turks had spread, from Persia to the Heldes, the siege of the island, and the Crescent stream was invaded by the adventurous valor of the Normans; and, in the moments of peace, the Danube poured forth new swarms, who had gained, in the science of war, what they had lost in the ferocity of manners. The sea was not less hostile than the soil; and, while the frontier was an open enemy, the palace was distracted with secret treason and conspiracy. On a sudden, the banner of the cross was displayed by the Latins; Europe was precipitated on Asia; and Constantinople had almost been swept away by this impetuous deluge. In the tempest Alexius steered the imperial vessel with daterity and courage. At the head of his armies, he was hold in action, skilful in stratagem, patient of fatigue, ready to improve his advantages, and rising from his defeats with inexhaustible vigour. The discipline of the army, the care of the camp, and the endurance of men and soldiers was created by the emperor and the prece-cepts of their leader. In his intercourse with the Latins, Alexius was patient and artful: his discerning eye pervaded the new system of an unknown world; and I shall hereafter describe the superior policy with which he balanced the interests and passions of the champions of the first crusade. In a long reign of thirty-seven years, he subdued and adorned the envy of his equals: the laws of public and private order were restored; the arts of wealth and science were cultivated; the limits of the empire were enlarged in Europe and Asia; and all the treasures of the monasteries were transmitted to his children of the third and fourth generation. Yet the difficulties of the times betrayed some defects in his character, and have exposed his memory to some just or unconscious reproach. The reader may possibly smile at the lavish praise which his daughter so often bestows on a flying hero; the weakness or prudence of his situation might be mistaken for a want of personal courage; and his political arts are branded by the Latins with the names of deceit and dissimulation. The increase of the male and female branches of his family adorned the throne, and secured the line of succession against the attacks of the pride and hatred of the patricians, exhausted the revenue, and insulted the misery of the people. Anna is a faithful witness that his happiness was destroyed, and his health was broken, by the cares of a public life; the patience of Constantinople was fatigued by the length and severity of his reign; and before Alexius expired, he had lost the love and reverence of his subjects. The clergy could not forgive his application of the sacred riches to the defence of the state; but they applauded his theoretical learning and ardent love for the church. He enriched the Church by the increase of the monasteries; and, in the grace of God, he fell a victim to the jealousy of his wife Irene; and his death was, in a certain sense, an answer to the denunciation of the Koran.

"You die, as you have lived,—an impostor!"
It was the wish of Irene to supplant the eldest of her surviving sons, in favour of her daughter the princess Anna, whose beauty and weight of dianem; but the order of male succession was asserted by the friends of their country: the lawful heir drew the royal signet from the finger of his insensible or conscious father, and the empire obeyed the will of the master of the palace. Anna Comnena was stimulated by ambition more than by hatred, she despised the life of a wife, and when the design was prevented by the tears or scruples of her husband, she passionately exclaimed, that nature had mistaken the two sexes, and had endowed Bryennius with the soul of a woman. The two sons of Alexius, John and Isaac, maintained the fraternal concord, and the two eldest of their race; and the younger brother was content with the title of Soterocrates, which approached the dignity, without sharing the power, of the emperor. In the same person, the claims of primogeniture and merit were fortunately united; his swarthy complexon, hawsh features, and diminutive stature, had negatived the grave suspicion against himself. John the Handsome, which his grateful subjects more seriously applied to the beauties of his mind. After the discovery of her treason, the life and fortune of Anna were justly forfeited to the laws. Her life was spared by the clemency of the emperor, but he visited the pomp and ceremony of the triumph on her brother, and the censure of the court fixed on the most deserving of his friends. That respectable friend, Axuch, a slave of Turkish extraction, presumed to decline the gift, and to intercede for the criminal: his generous master appaulded and imitated the virtue of his favourite, and the reproach or contempt of his brother was the only chastisement of the guilty princess. After this example of clemency, the remainder of his reign was never disturbed by conspiracy or rebellion: feared by his nobles, beloved by his people, John was never reduced to the painful necessity of punishing, or even of pardoning, his personal enemies. During his government of twenty-five years, the penalty of death was abolished in the Roman empire, a law of mercy most delightful to the humane theorist, but of which the practiser, in a large and vicious community, is seldom consistent with the public safety. Severe to himself, indulgent to his subjects, the philosopher, the saint and the friend of mankind, Marcus would not have disowned the artless virtues of his successor, derived from his heart, and not borrowed from the schools. He despised and moderated the state oleh magnificence of the Byzantine court, so oppressive to the people, so contemptible to the eye of reason and of justice. He exhibited the wild bear in fear, and merit had every thing to hope; and, without assuming the tyrannic office of a censor, he introduced a gradual though visible reformation in the public and private manners of Constantinople. The only defect of this accomplished character, was the frailty of noble minds, the love of arms and military glory. Yet the frequent expeditions of John the Handsome may be justified, at least in their principle, by the necessity of repelling the Turks from the Hellespont and the Bosphorus. The sultan of Iconium was confined to the coasts of his country, his friends were destroyed, the two great empires of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benevolence and soldier, and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance. From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo, he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army, and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were not wanting, the barbarian would not move without the benev cut asunder by the sword, of the invincible Manuel. The story of his exploits, which appear as a model or a copy of the romances of chivalry, may induce a reasonable suspicion of the veracity of the Greeks: I will not, to vindicate their credit, endanger my own; yet I may observe, that in the long series of their annals, he is the only prince who has been the subject of similar exaggeration. With the valour of a soldier, he did not unite the skill or prudence of a general: his victories were not productive of any permanent or useful conquest; and his Turkish laurels were blasted in his last unfortunate campaign, in which the loss of his men, his friends, and his palace, surpassed the measure of his predecessors, and whole summer days were idly wasted in the delicious idles of the Propontis, in the incestuous love of his niece Theodora. The double cost of a warlike and dissolute prince exhausted the revenue, and multiplied taxes; and Manuel, in the distress of his last Turkish camp, endured a bitter reproach from the mouth of a desperate soldier. As he quenched his thirst, he complained that the water of a fountain was mingled with christian blood. "It is not the first time," exclaimed a voice from the crowd, "that you have drunk, O emperor, the blood of yourchristian subjects." Manuel Comnenus was twice married, to the virtuous Bertha or Irene of Germany, and to the beauteous Maria, a French or Latin princess of Antioch. The only daughter of his first wife was destined for Dula an Hungarian prince, Comnenus, under the name of Alexius; and the consummation of their nuptials might have transferred the Roman sceptre to a race of free and warlike barbarians. But as soon as Maria of Antioch had given a son and heir to the empire, the presumptive rights of the Comnenus were established, and she was de-prised of her promised bride; but the Hungarian prince resumed his name and the kingdom of his fathers, and despised such virtues as might excite the regret and envy of the Greeks. The son of Maria was named Alexius; and at the age of ten years, he ascended the Byzantine throne, after his father's de-c ease had closed the glories of the Comnenian line.

Alexius II. A.D. 1118. September 26. Chance or first adventure of Andronicus. Gerasem was excited to flight and rebellion, from whence he was reclaimed by the firmness and clemency of John the Handsome. The errors of Isaac, the father of the emperors of Trebizond, were short and venial; but John, the elder of his sons, recom missioned his religious professions. Pressed by real or imaginary insult of his uncle, he escaped from the Roman to the Turkish camp: his apostasy was rewarded with the sultan's daughter, the title of Chibbi, or noble, and the inheritance of a princely estate; and in the fifteenth century, Mahomet the second besetested of his imperial descent from the Comnenian family. Andronicus, the younger brother of John, son of Isaac, and grand-son of Alexius Comnenus, is one of the most conspicuous characters of the age: and his genuine adventures might form the subject of a very considerable romance. His birth, his education, his fate, his fortune, was cast in the best proportions of strength and beauty; and that the want of the softer graces was supplied by a manly countenance, a lofty stature, athletic muscles, and the air and deportment of a soldier. The preservation, in his old age, of health and vigour, was the reward of temperance and silence. A piece of bread and a draught of water were the only food and drink which had been the subject of similar exaggeration. With the valour of a soldier, he did not unite the skill or prudence of a general: his victories were not productive of any permanent or useful conquest; and his Turkish laurels were blasted in his last unfortunate campaign, in which the loss of his men, his friends, and his palace, surpassed the measure of his predecessors, and whole summer days were idly wasted in the delicious idles of the Propontis, in the incestuous love of his niece Theodora, the affections of her sister Eudocia were reduced and enjoyed by Andronicus. Above the deceances of her sex and rank, she gloried in the name of his concubine; and both the palace and the camp could witness the play of virtue as of triumph. The sultan, above the deceances of her sex and rank, she gloried in the name of his concubine; and both the palace and the camp could witness the play of virtue as of triumph. The monarch was so affected by the sight of so soft and lovely an object, that he was not only unable to resist the temptation, but was actually seduced and added to his harem.

The fraternal concord of the two sons of the great Alexius had been sometimes clouded by an opposition of interest and passion. By ambition, I mean the Sebastian of the Greeks.手册 was excited to flight and rebellion, from whence he was reclaimed by the firmness and clemency of John the Handsome. The errors of Isaac, the father of the emperors of Trebizond, were short and venial; but John, the elder of his sons, reconstituted his religious professions. Pressed by real or imaginary insult of his uncle, he escaped from the Roman to the Turkish camp: his apostasy was rewarded with the sultan's daughter, the title of Chibbi, or noble, and the inheritance of a princely estate; and in the fifteenth century, Mahomet the second beset the son and heir to the empire, the presumptive rights of the Comnenus were established, and she was de-prised of her promised bride; but the Hungarian prince resumed his name and the kingdom of his fathers, and despised such virtues as might excite the regret and envy of the Greeks. The son of Maria was named Alexius; and at the age of ten years, he ascended the Byzantine throne, after his father's de-c ease had closed the glories of the Comnenian line.

But as soon as Maria of Antioch had given a son and heir to the empire, the presumptive rights of the Comnenus were established, and she was de-prised of her promised bride; but the Hungarian prince resumed his name and the kingdom of his fathers, and despised such virtues as might excite the regret and envy of the Greeks. The son of Maria was named Alexius; and at the age of ten years, he ascended the Byzantine throne, after his father's de-c ease had closed the glories of the Comnenian line.

Alexius II. A.D. 1118. September 26. Chance or first adventure of Andronicus. Gerasem was excited to flight and rebellion, from whence he was reclaimed by the firmness and clemency of John the Handsome. The errors of Isaac, the father of the emperors of Trebizond, were short and venial; but John, the elder of his sons, reconstituted his religious professions. Pressed by real or imaginary insult of his uncle, he escaped from the Roman to the Turkish camp: his apostasy was rewarded with the sultan's daughter, the title of Chibbi, or noble, and the inheritance of a princely estate; and in the fifteenth century, Mahomet the second beset the son and heir to the empire, the presumptive rights of the Comnenus were established, and she was de-prised of her promised bride; but the Hungarian prince resumed his name and the kingdom of his fathers, and despised such virtues as might excite the regret and envy of the Greeks. The son of Maria was named Alexius; and at the age of ten years, he ascended the Byzantine throne, after his father's de-c ease had closed the glories of the Comnenian line.

But as soon as Maria of Antioch had given a son and heir to the empire, the presumptive rights of the Comnenus were established, and she was de-prised of her promised bride; but the Hungarian prince resumed his name and the kingdom of his fathers, and despised such virtues as might excite the regret and envy of the Greeks. The son of Maria was named Alexius; and at the age of ten years, he ascended the Byzantine throne, after his father's de-c ease had closed the glories of the Comnenian line.

But as soon as Maria of Antioch had given a son and heir to the empire, the presumptive rights of the Comnenus were established, and she was de-prised of her promised bride; but the Hungarian prince resumed his name and the kingdom of his fathers, and despised such virtues as might excite the regret and envy of the Greeks. The son of Maria was named Alexius; and at the age of ten years, he ascended the Byzantine throne, after his father's de-c ease had closed the glories of the Comnenian line.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

Chapter IX.

prisoned in the same tower. At the dead of night she beheld a spectre: she recognized her husband: they shared their provisions; and a son was the fruit of these stolen interviews, which alleviated the tediousness of their confinement. In the custody of a woman, the vigilance of the keepers was insensibly relaxed; and the captive had accomplished his real escape, when he was discovered to Count Constantinople, and landed with a double chain. At length he found the moment, and the means, of his deliverance. A boy, his domestic servant, introduced the guards, and obtained in wax the impression of the keys. By the diligence of his friends, a similar key, with a bundle of ropes, was introduced into the Cell of the philopatric, at the bottom of a hogshead: Andronicus employed, with industry and courage, the instruments of his safety, unlocked the doors, descended from the tower, concealed himself all day among the bushes, and sealed in the night the garden-wall of the palace. A boat was stationed for his reception: he visited his own house, embraced his children, cast away his chain, mounted a fleet horse, and directed his rapid course towards the banks of the Danube. At Anæliaus in Thrace, an intrepid friend supplied him with horses and money: he passed the river traversed with speed the desert of Moldavia to the Căprăul hills, and had almost reached the town of Halicz, in Polish Russia, when he was intercepted by a party of Walachians, who resolved to convey their important captive to Constantinople. His presence of mind again extricated him from this danger. Under the pretext of the residence of the great duke: the sable Greek soon obtained the esteem and confidence of Ierouslaus: his character could assume the manners of every climate; and the barbarians applauded his strength and courage in the chase of the elks and bears of the forest. In Halicz he was honourably conducted to the court of the Căprăul fortress, and in a fortnight found himself in the town. In his resentment Manuel had ever sympathized with the martial and dissolutive character of his cousin; and his free pardon was sealed in the assault of Zemlin, in which he was second, and second only, to the valor of the emperor.

No sooner was the exile restored to freedom and his country, than his ambition revived, at first to his own, and at length to the public misfortune. A daughter of Manuel was a feebler bar to the succession of the more deserving males of the Comnenian blood: her future marriage with the prince of Hungary was repugnant to the jealousy of his sovereign, and their mutual enmity. But when an oath of allegiance was required to the presumptive heir, Andronicus alone asserted the honour of the Roman name, declined the unlawful engagement, and boldly protested against the adoption of a stranger. His success was complete. He was declared the lawful heir; he spoke the sentiments of the people, and was removed from the royal presence by an honourable banishment, a second command of the Cilician frontier, with the absolute disposal of the revenues of Cyprus. In this station the Armenians again exercised his courage and exposed his nakedness; and the same rebel, who baf- fled all his operations, was unhorsed and almost slain by the vigour of his lance. But Andronicus soon discovered a more easy and pleasing conquest, the beauti- ful Philippa, sister of the empress Maria, and daugh- ter of Raymond of Poitou, the Latin prince of Antioch.

For her sake, he deserted his station, and wasted the summer in balls and tournaments: to his love she sacrificed her innocence, her reputation, and the offer of an advantageous marriage. But the resentment of Manuel for this domestic affront, interrupted his pleasures: Andronicus left the indirect princes to weep and to repent; and, with a band of desperate adven- turers, undertook the pilgrimage of Jerusalem. His birth, his martial renown, and professions of zeal, an- nounced him as the champion of the cross; he soon captured both the clergy and the king; and the Greek prince was invested with the lordship of Berytus, on the coast of Phœnicia. In his neighbourhood resided a young and handsome queen, of a distinguished family, great-grand-daughter of the emperor Alexis, and widow of Baldwin the third, king of Jerusalem. She visited and loved his kinsman. Theodore was the third victim of his amorous seduction; and her shame was more public and scandalous than that of her predecessors. The emperor still thirsted for re- venge; and his subjects and allies of the Syrian fron- tier were repeatedly pressed to seize the person, and put out the eyes, of the fugitive. In Palestine he was no longer safe; but the tender Theodore revealed his danger, and accompanied his flight. The queen of Je- rusalem was enabled to escape to the east, by a favorite cubine; and two illegitimate children were the living monuments of her weakness. Damascus was his first refuge; and, in the characters of the great Neureddin and his servant Sahadin, the superstitious Greek might learn to reverence the virtues of the musulmans. As the friend of Neureddin he visited, most probably, Bag- dad, and the courts of Persia; and, after a long circuit round the Caspian sea and the mountains of Georgia, he finally settled among the Turks of Asia Minor, the hereditary enemies of his country. The sultan of Colonia afforded an hospitable retreat to Andronicus, his mistress, and his band of outlaws; the debt of gratitude was paid by frequent inroads in the Roman province of Trebizond; and he seldom returned without an ample harvest of spoil and of Christian captives. In the story of his adventures, he was fond of com- paring himself to David, who escaped, by a long exile, the snares of the wicked. But the royal prophet (as he presumed to add) was content to lurk on the borders of Judea, to slay an Amalekite, and to threaten, in his miserable state, the life of the avaricious Nabai. The excursions of the Comnenian prince had a wider range; and he had spread his tent over the eastern world, the glory of his name and religion. By a sentence of the Greek church, the licentious rover had been separated from the faithful; but even this excommunication may prove, that he never abused the profession of Chris- tianity.

His vigilance had eluded or repelled the open and secret persecution of the emperor; but he was at length insulted by the captivity of his female companion. The governor of Trebizond succeeded in his attempt to surprise the person of Theodore: the queen of Jeru- salem and her two children were sent to Constantino- ple, and distributed the world on the throne of banishment. The fugitive implored and obtained a final pardon, with leave to throw himself at the feet of his sovereign, who was satisfied with the submission of this haughty spirit. Prostrate on the ground, he intreated the emperor to forgive the rebel; nor would he presume to arise, unless some faithful subject would drag him to the foot of the throne, by an iron chain with which he had secretly encircled his neck. This extraordinary penance excited the wonder and pity of the assembly; his sins were forgiven, his life spared, and the banishment of his family, great-grand-daughter of the emperor Alexis, and widow of Baldwin the third, king of Jerusalem. The death of Manuel, and the disorders of the minority soon opened the fairest field to his ambition. The emperor was a boy of twelve or fourteen years of age, without vigour, or wisdom, or experience; his mother, the empress Mary, abandoned her person and government to a favourite of the Comnenian name; and his sister, another Mary, whose husband, an Italian, was deposed with the title of Caesar, fled with her household to Sicily, and at length an insurrection, against her odious stepmother. The provinces were forgotten, the capital was in flames, and a century of peace and order was overwhelmed in the vice and weakness of a few months. A Parliament met in Constantinople; the patricians found a battle in the square of the palace, and the rebels sustained a regular siege in the cathedral of St. Sophia. The patriarch laboured with honest zeal to heal the wounds of the republic, the most respectable patriots called aloud for a guardian and avenger, and every tongue repeated the praise of the talents and even the virtues of Andronicus. In his retirement, he affected to revolve the solemn duties of his oath: "If the safety or honour of the imperial family be threatened, I will reveal and oppose the mischief to the utmost of my power. His correspondence with the Venetians was prolonged; the patricians sent him quotations from the psalms of David and the epistles of St. Paul; and he patiently waited till he was called to her deliverance by the voice of his country. In his march from Oenoe to Constantinople, his slender train included two thousand vessels and his attendants of religion and loyalty were mistaken for the language of his heart; and the simplicity of a foreign dress, which showed to advantage his majestic stature, displayed a lively image of his poverty and exile. All opposition sunk before him; he reached the straits of the Thracian Bosphorus; the Byzantine navy sailed from the harbour to receive and transport the savour of the empire: the torrent was loud and irresistible, and the insects who had basked in the sunshine of royal favour disappeared at the blast of the storm. It was the first care of Andronicus to occupy the palace, to salute the emperor, to confirm his moneys, to punish her minister, and to restore the public order and tranquillity. He then visited the sepulchre of Manuel: the spectators were ordered to stand aloof, but as he bowed in the attitude of prayer, they heard, or thought they heard, a murmur of triumph and rejoicing. "I no longer fear thee, my old enemy, who hast driven me a vagabond to every climate of the earth. Thou art safely deposited under a seven-fold dome, from whence thou canst never arise till the signal of thy triumph. It is now my turn, and speedily will I turn thy ashes and dust. As to thy successor, terrors and maths we may imagine such feelings to the man and the moment; but it is not extremely probable that he gave an articulate sound to his secret thoughts. In the first months of his administration, his designs were veiled by a fair semblance of hypocrisy, which could delude only the eyes of the multitude: the coronation of Alexius was performed with due solemnity, and his perfidious guardian, holding in his hands the body and blood of Christ, most fervently delivered as long as he lived, and was ready to die, for the service of his beloved pupil. But his numerous adherents were instructed to maintain, that the sinking empire must perish in the hands of a child, that the Romans could only be saved by a veteran prince, bold in arms, skilful in policy, and taught to reign by the long experience of fortune and mankind; and that it was the duty of every citizen to force the reluctant modesty of Andronicus to undertake the burthen of the public care. The young emperor was himself constrained to join his voice to the general acclamation, and to solicit the association of a colleague, who instantly deposed him from the summit of his person, and verified the rash declaration of the patriarch, that Alexius might be considered as dead, so soon as he was committed to the custody of his guardian. But his death was preceded by the imprisoninsensibly filled with a curious and mournful crowd, who—in his fate, prognosticated their own. But their lamentations were soon turned to curses, and their curses to threats; they dared to ask, "Why do we feign unrequited love of this? We have sworn in the name of our king, the tyrant, the only bond of our slavery."

With the dawn of the day the city burst into a general sedition, the prisons were thrown open, the coldest and most servile were roused to the defence of their country, and Isaac, the second of the name, was raised from the obscurity to the throne. Unconscious of his danger, the tyrant was absent; withdrawn from the toils of state, in the delicious islands of the Propontis. He had contracted an indecent marriage with Alice, or Agnes, daughter of Lewis the seventh, of France, and relief of the unfortunate Alexius; and his society, more suitable to his temper than to his age, was composed of a young wife and a favourite concubine. On the first alarm he rushed to Constantinople, impatient for the blood of the guilty; but he was astonished by the silence of the palace, the tumult of the city, and the general desertion of mankind. Andronicus proclaimed a free pardon to his subjects; they neither desired, nor would grant, forgiveness: he offered to resign the crown to his son Manuel; but the virtues of the son could not expiate his father's crimes. The sea was still open for his retreat; but the news of the revolution had floated along the shores of the soldiery. The presence of the tyrant was no more: the imperial galley was pursued and taken by an armed brigantine; and the tyrant was dragged to the presence of Isaac Angelus, loaded with fetters, and a long chain round his neck. His eloquence, and the tears of his female companions, pleaded in vain for his life; but, instead of the decrees of a legal execution, the new monarch abandoned the criminal to thenumerous sufferers, whom he had deprived of a father, a husband, or a friend. His teeth and hair, an eye and a hand, were torn from him, as a poor compensation for their loss; and a short respite was allowed, that he might feel the bitterness of death. Astride on a camel, without any danger of a rescue, he was carried through the city, and the basest of the populace rejoiced to trample on the fallen majesty of his prince. After a thousand blows and outrages, Andronicus was hung by the feet, between two pillars that the executioners, who had passed the day on the soil of every hand that could reach the public enemy, inflicted on his body some mark of ingenious or brutal cruelty, till two friendly or furious Italians, plunging their swords into his body, released him from all human punishment. This long and painful agony, "Lord, have mercy on the guilty, and spare thePenin mended the beaten path;" were the only words that escaped his mouth. Our hatred for the tyrant is lost in pity for the man; nor can we blame his pusillanimous resignation, since a Greek christian was no longer master of his life.

Issae. II. Ange-

I have been tempted to expatiate on the extraordinary character and adven-dues of Andronicus; but I shall here termirate the series of the Greek emperors since the time of Heraclius. The branches that sprang from the Comnenian stock were almost equally divided into two families; and the male line was continued only in the posterity of Andronicus himself, who, in the public confusion, usurped the sovereignty of Trebizond, so obscure in history, and so famous in romance. A private citizen of Philadelphia, Constantine Angelus, was created emperor by his marriage with a daughter of the emperor Alexius. His son Andronicus is conspicuous only by his cowardice. His grandson Isaac A. D. 1204. was punished and succeeded the tyrant; but A. D. 1204. why he was de-throned by his own vices, and the ambition of his brother; and the second Andronicus introduced the Latins to the conquest of Constantinople, the first great period in the fall of the eastern empire.

If we compute the number and duration of the reigns, it will be found, that a period of six hundred years is filled by sixty emperors, including in the Augustan list some female sovereigns; and deducting the princes who never held the sceptre, and the usurpers who possessed it for a short time, we have the number of the actual emperors, or their families. The history of the empire is divided into dynasties, each of which was governed by a system of laws, for a period of fifty years, or twenty years, in the case of the last, and two or three in the case of the first. Of these imperial houses, some possessed the capital, and some princes who did not live to possess their inheritance. The average proportion will allow one ten years for each emperor, far below the chronological rule of Sir Isaac Newton, who, from the experience of more recent and regular monarchies, has defined about eighty years to the duration of an ordinary reign. The Byzantine empire was most tranquil and prosperous when it could succeed in hereditary succession; five dynasties, the Heraclian, Isaurian, Amorian, Basilian, and Comnenian families, obtained and retained the sacred patrimony during their respective series of five, four, three, six, and four generations; several princes number their reign with those of their infancy: and Constantine the seventh and his two grandsons occupy the space of an entire century. But in the intervals of the Byzantine dynasties, the succession is rapid and broken, and the name of a successful candidate is speedily erased by a more fortunate competitor. Many were the paths that led to the summit of royalty: the fabric of rebellion was overthrown by the stroke of conspiracy, or undermined by the silent arts of intrigue; the favourers, thus cast down a step or two, were not on the throne, but in the corners of the empire, where their sufferings, and their enemies, were alternately clothed with the purple; the means of their elevation were base, and their end was often contemptible or tragic. A being of the nature of man, endowed with the same faculties, but with a longer measure of existence, would cast hour after hour on the world, and on the crimes and follies of human ambition, so eager, in a narrow span, to grasp at a precarious and short-lived enjoyment. It is thus that the experience of history exalts and enlarges the horizon of our intellectual view. In a composition of some days, in a perpetual rotation of hours, we are led into a view of the crimes and follies of kings who filled our eyes, without much regard to what is the destiny of monarchs. For the greater part of the Byzantine series, we cannot reasonably ascribe the love of fame and of mankind. The virtue alone of John Comnenus was beneficent and pure: the most illustrious of the princes, who precede or follow that respectable name, have trod with some dexterity and vigour the crooked and bloody paths of a selfish policy; in scrutinizing the imperfect characters of Leo the Isaurian, Basil the first, and Alexius Comnenus, of Theophilius, the second Basil, and Manuel Comnenus, our esteem and censure are almost equally divided; and the appearance of their imperial crowd could only desire and expect to be forgotten by posterity. Was personal happiness the aim and object of their ambition? I shall not descant on the vulgar topics of the misery of kings; but I may say the current of time has decided, by the duration of the second empire, that the most pregnant with fear, and the least susceptible of hope. For these opposite passions, a larger scope was allowed in the revolutions of antiquity, than in the smooth and solid temper of the modern world, which cannot easily repeat the triumph of Alexander or the fall of Darius. But the peculiar infelicity of the Byzantine princes exposed them to domestic perils, without affording any lively promise of foreign conquest. From the pinnacle of greatness.
Andronicus was precipitated by a death more cruel and shameful than that of the vilest malefactor; but the most glorious of his predecessors had much more to dread from their subjects than to hope from their enemies. The army was licentious without spirit, the nation turbulent without freedom; the barbarians of the north, before they were subdued, overran the country, and the loss of the provinces was terminated by the final servitude of the capital.

The entire series of Roman emperors, from the first of the Caesars to the last of the Constantines, extends above fifteen hundred years; and the term of dominion, unhappily, was not concomitant, successively the measured duration of the ancient monarchies: the Assyrians or Medes, the successors of Cyrus, or those of Alexander.

CHAPTER X.

Introduction, worship, and persecution of images. — Revolt of Italy and Rome.—Temporal domination of the pope. — Conquest of Italy by the Franks. — Establishment of iconoclastic customs, and conversion of Cludovike. — Restoration and decay of the Roman empire in the west.—Independence of Italy. — Constitution of the Germanic body.

In the connexion of the church and state, I have considered the former as the Christian church, subservient only, and relative, to the latter; a salutary maxim, if in fact, as well as in narrative, it had ever been held sacred. The oriental philosophy of the Gnostics, the dark abyss of predestination and grace, and the strange transformations of the eucharist from the sign to the substance of Christ's body,1 I have purposely abandoned to the curiosity of speculative divines. But I have reviewed, with diligence and pleasure, the objects of ecclesiastical history, by which the decline and fall of the Roman empire were materially affected, the propagation of Christianity, the constitution of the Catholic church, the ruin of paganism, and the sects that arose from the mysterious controversies concerning the Trinity and incarnation. At the head of this class, we may justly rank the worship of images, so fiercely disputed in the eighth and ninth centuries; since a question of popular superstition produced the revolt of Italy, the temporal power of the popes, and the restoration of the Roman empire in the west.

The primitive christians were possessed with an unwonted repugnance to the use and abuse of images: and allusion is observable, as their descent from the Jews, and their enmity to the Greeks. The Mosaic law had severely proscribed all representations of the Deity; and that precept was firmly established in the principles and practice of the chosen people. The vit of the christian apologists was pointed against the foolish idolaters, who bowed before the workmanship of their own hands; the images of brass and marble, which, had they been endowed with sense and motion, should have started rather from the productions of the creative powers of the artist.2 Perhaps some recent and improved monuments of the Gnostic tribe, might crown the statues of Christ and St. Paul with the profane honours which they paid to those of Aristotle and Pythagoras;3 but the public religion of the catholics was uniformly simple and spiritual; and the first notice of the use of pictures is in the concourse of the council of Libyeris, three hundred years after the christian era. Under the successors of Constantine, in the peace and luxury of the triumphant church, the more prudent bishops condescended to indulge a visible superstition, for the benefit of the credulousissentments; they were no longer restrained by the apprehension of an odious parallel. The first introduction of a symbolic worship was in the veneration of the cross, and of relics. The saints and martyrs, whose intercession was implored, were seated on the right hand of God; but the English and Irish missionaries, who were converted from idolatry, were not resisted, and the popular belief were showered round their tomb, conveyed an unquestionable sanction of the devout pilgrims, who visited, and touched, and kissed, these lifeless remains, the memorials of their merits and sufferings. But a memorial, more interesting than the skull or the sandals of a departed worthy, is the faithful copy of his person and features, delineated by the arts of painting or sculpture. In every age, such copies, so congenial to human feelings, have been cherished by the zeal of private friendship, or public estimation, with civic, and almost religious, honours; a reverence less ostentatious, but more sincere, was applied to the statues of sages and patriots; and these profane virtues, these splendid sires, disappeared in the presence of the holy men, who had died for their celestial and immortal country. And the experiment was made with caution and secrecy; and their worship and the venerable pictures were discreetly allowed to instruct the ignorant, to awaken the cold, and to gratify the prejudices of the heathen proconsuls. The first through inevitable progression, the honours of the original were transferred to the copy: the devout christian prayed before the image of a saint; and the pagan rites of genuflexion, luminaries, and incense, again stole into the catholic church. The scruples of reason, or piety, were silenced by the strong evidence of visions and miracles; and the pictures which speak, and move, and bleed, must be endowed with a divine energy, and may be considered as the proper objects of religious adoration. The most audacious pencil might tremble in the rash attempt of defining, by forms and colours, the infinite Trinity, in the form of Father, who suffused the universe.4 But the superstitious mind was more easily reconciled to paint and to worship the angels, and, above all, the Son of God, under the human shape, which, on earth, they have condescended to assume. The second person of the Trinity was clothed with a real and material body; but that body has ascended into heaven; and, had not some similitude been presented to the eyes of his disciples, the spiritual worship of Christ might have been obliterated by the visible relics and representations of the saints. A similar indoloty was requisite, and propitious, for the Virgin Mary: the place of her burial was unknown; and the assumption of her soul and body into heaven was adopted by the credulity of the Greeks and Latins. The use, and even the worship, of images, was firmly established before the end of the sixth century: they were freely cherished by the warm imagination of the Greeks and Asians: the Pantheon and Vatican were adorned with, the emblems of a new superstition; but this semblance of idolatry was more coldly entertained by the rude barbarians and the Arian clergy of the west. A more solemn form of sculpture, in brass or marble, which people the temples of antiquity, were

1 The learned Schellen has given the history of transubstantiation in a comprehensive and pithy sentence, "This opinion is only rhetoric turned into logic." (His Works, vol. iii. p. 207, in his Table Talk.)
2 Now intelligent homines inseparabiles, sed non similia simulacra et non semel posse, sed una, hoc est, expansa. (Cicero, In L. Memmi. 1. 42) Lactantius enumerates the last, as well as the most eloquent, of the Latin apologists. Their gallery of idols attacks not only the object, but the form and matter.
3 Gnosticism, and Asiaticism. (Bastara, Hist. des Ecleses Reformes, tom. ii. p. 131) This Gnostic practice has a singular affinity with the private worship of Alexander Severus. (Lampridius, c. 25. Laudon, Heidenn Monumeat, vol. iii. p. 21.)
4 See this history, 253, 301, 329, 293.
offensive to the fancy or conscience of the Christian Greeks; and a smooth surface of colours has ever been esteemed a more decent and harmless mode of imitation.

The image of the merit and effect of a copy depends on its resemblance with the original; but the primitive copies of the eyes contumacious to the generous features of the Son of God, his mother, and his apostles: the statue of Christ at Paneas in Palestine was more probably that of some temporal saviour; the Greciotes and their profane monuments were reprobated; and the fancy of the Christian artists could only be diverted by the theory of the celestial model. In this distress, a bold and dexterous invention assured at once the likeness of the image and the innocence of the worship. A new superstructure of fable was raised on the popular basis of a Syriac legend, on the correspondence of Christ and Abgarus, so famous in the days of Eusebius, so reluctantly deserted by our modern advocates. The bishop of Casarea records the epistle, but he most strangely forgets the picture of Christ; the perfect impression of his face on a linen, with which he gratified the faith of the royal stranger, who had laid on his brother's healing hand and pronounced him cured, and yet protect him against the malice of the Jews. The ignorance of the primitive church is explained by the long imprisonment of the image in a niche of the wall, from whence, after an oblivion of five hundred years, it was released by some prudent bishop, and seasonably adorned with the gold and jewels and most glorious exploit was the deliverance of the city from the arms of Chosorea Nushirvan; and it was soon revered as a pledge of the divine promise, that Edessa should never hereafter be taken by a foreign enemy. It is true, indeed, that the text of Procopius ascribes the same exploit to an image of Beroea; that the very valour of her citizens, who purchased the absence and repelled the assaults of the Persian monarchy. He was ignorant, the profane historian, of the testimony which he is called to deliver in the ecclesiastical page of Evagrius, that the Palladian was exposed on the rampart, and that the water which had been sprinkled on the holy face, instead of quenching, added new fuel to the flames of the besieged. After this important service, the image of Edessa was preserved with respect and gratitude; and if the Armenian passions rejected the legend, the more credulous Greeks adored the similitude, which was not the work of any mortal pencil, but the immediate creation of the divine original. The style and sentiments of a Byzantine hymn will declare how far their worship was removed from the grossest idolatry. "How can we with morning's early light or evening's twilight, as we erect his statue, the host of heaven presumes not to behold? He who dwells in heaven condescends this day to visit us by his venerable image: He who is seated on the cherubim, visits us this day by a picture, which the Father has delineated with his immediate hand, which he has formed before his own face, and which he has sanctified by adoring it with fear and love." Before the end of the sixth century, these images, made without hands, (in Greek it is a single word,) were propagated in the camps and cities of the eastern empire: they were the objects of worship, and the instruments of miracles; and in the hour of danger or distress, their venerable presence could revive the hope, rekindle the courage, or repress the fury, of the Roman legions. Of these pictures, the far greater part, the transcripts of a human pencil, could only pretend to a secondary likeness and improper title: but there were others which they derived their resemblance from an immediate contact with the original, endowed, for that purpose, with a miraculous and prolix virtue. The most ambitious aspired from a filial to a fraternal relationship with the image of Edessa; and such is the reverend of Rome, or Spain, or Jerusalem, which Christ in his agony and bloody sweat applied to his face, and delivered to a holy matron. The fruitful precedent was speedily transferred to the Virgin Mary, and the saints and martyrs. In the church of Decapolis, in Palestine, the features of the mother of God were deeply inscribed in a marble tablet: the evangelist, who wrote on the holy pencil of St. Luke; and the evangelist, who was perhaps a physician, has been forced to exercise the occupation of a painter, so profane and odious in the eyes of the primitive christians. The Olympian Jove, created by the muse of Homer and the chisel of Phidias, might inspire a philosophic mind with momentary devotion; but these catholic images were faint and flatly delineated by monkish artists in the last degeneracy of taste and genius.

The worship of images had been opposed by the fathers to the church by insensible degrees, and each petty principle had been a necessary step to the superstitious mind, as productive of comfort, and innocent of sin. But in the beginning of the eighth century, in the full magnitude of the abuse, the more timorous Greeks were awakened by an apprehension, that under the mask of Christianity they had restored the religion of their fathers; they beard, with grief and impatience, the name of idolaters: the incessant charge of the Jews and Mahometans, who derived from the Law

---

*This general history of images is drawn from the second volume of the Hist. des Edissens, References d'Egasse, tom. ii. p. 129.---139.---155. and of a many authority.---169. The protestants are so notoriously in the right, that they can venture to be impartial. See the perplexity of poor Farp, Critica, tom. i. p. 42.

---

*After removing some rubbish of miracle and inconsistency, it may be allowed that as late as the year 360, Panes in Palestine was decorated with a bronze statue, representing a grave personage in a cloak, with a girtful or suppliant female kneeling before him; and that an inscription—"Εκτελεσθαι—was perhaps inscribed on the pedestal. By the Christians, this group was foolishly explained of their founder and the paragon whom he had cured of the bloody flux. (Church. viii. 16. Philostor. vii. 3. 6.) M. de Beaucé more reasonably conjectures the philosopher Apollonius, or the emperor Vespasion: in the latter supposition, the female is a city semantically described, and the queen Berenice. (Bibliothèque Grecque, tom. i. p. 92.)

---

*Euseb. Hist. Eccles. I. c. 1. Th. learned Assemanus has brought more to perfection the conjecture of Strabo, Stylites, and Bishop James of Sarze: but I do not find any notice of the Saracen emperor (or the archives of Eusébe, Bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 16. 420. 534.) their vague belief is probably derived from the Greeks.

---

*The evidence for these copies is stated and rejected by the candid Lapidus. (Hieronin Testimonia, vol. i. p. 273. 296.) Among the best of these who are forcibly driven from this prophet, and the uncontrollable, post. I am ashamed, with the Grapes, Caves, Talmudics, to attempt their proofs. One might expect some degree of truth in the words of Berulle, 1591. 373. (Barnavelt's Antiquities.) But his superficial attack on the Christian religion over its credit to his name, his style, and the interested apprehensions of the church, is so manifestly false, that I conclude that this tale was invented between the years 324 and 354, most probably after the siege of Edessa in 353. (Asseman, tom. i. p. 129. 135. 154. 169. Spanheim, Hist. ediss. tom. v. p. 199. 313, of Gregory II. on Epis. i. and Leon. Isaac. Concil. tom. viii. p. 533.) There is no more probability of the one than the other.---

---

*From the silence of James of Sarze, (Asseman. Bibl. Oriental. p. 120.) I am in doubt whether any other annalist who refers to this period has had any positive information. (D Califurn. and of the second Nicene Council. (Acta, v. p. 169.) The most perfect editions may be found in Codices. (Comp. ed. 173. 175.)

---

*Your probable figures stand quite out from the canvass: they were so as had a great effect. (Opera Judaeos, lib. iv. p. 415. 416.) The dignity of a Greek poet applause the pictures of Titian, which he had executed, and refused to accept.

---

*By Codex-max. 105. 167. 175. and the Codices Manasses, the origin of the icons is imputed to the caliph Yazid and two Jews, who procured the Empire for the pope. But the different accounts of genuine miracles are turned into an absurd conspiracy for restoring the purity of the christian worship. (See Spenser. Hist. Imag. c. 3.) and the Keran an immortal hatred to graven images and all the relative worship. The servitude of the Jews might curb their zeal, and depreciate their authority; but the triumphant massalmaus, who reigned at this time, was irritated. Constamopole, nautical, because the scale of reproach the accumulated weight of truth and victory. The cities of Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, had been fortified with the images of Christ, his mother, and his saints; and each city presumed on the hope or promise of miraculous defence. In a rapid course of three centuries, the Arabians spread before those cities and these images; and, in their opinion, the Lord of hosts pronounced a decisive judgment between the adoration and contempt of these mute and inanimate idols. For a while Edessa had braved the Persian assaulls; but the chosen city, the apostle of Christ, of which the hosts were involved in the common ruin; and his divine resemblance became the slave and trophy of the infidels. After a servitude of three hundred years, the Palladum was yielded to the devotion of Constantinople, for a ransom of twelve thousand pounds of silver, the redemption of two hundred massalmaus, and a perpetual rent for the territory of Edessa. In this season of distress and dismay, the eloquence of the monks was exercised in the defence of images; and they attempted to prove, that the sin and schism of the greatest part of the orientals had forfeited the favour, and annulled their protection. These grievances, when they were now opposed by the murmurs of many simple or rational christians, who appealed to the evidence of texts, of facts, and of the primitive times, and secretly desired the reformation of the church. As the worship of images had never been established by any general or particular law, but the decision of ecclesiastical councils: the empire had been retarded, or acceleratad, by the differences of men and manners, the local degrees of refinement, and the personal characters of the bishops. The splendid devotion was fondly cherished by the levity of the orientals, and the inventors of the Byantine clergy; while the rude and remote districts of Asia were strangers to this innovation of sacred luxury. Many large congregations of Gnostics and Arians maintained, after their conversion, the simple worship which had preceded their separation; and the Armenian exiles of the province of Rome, would not reconcile, in the twelfth century, to the sight of image. These various denominations of men afforded a fund of prejudice and aversion, of small account in the villages of Anatolia or Thrace, but which, in the fortune of a soldier, a prelate, or a council, might be connected with the powers of the church and state.

Leo the Isaurian, and his successors, A. D. 720–840, who, from the mountains of Isauria, ascended the throne of the east. He was ignorant of sacred and profane letters; but his education, his reason, perhaps his intercourse with the Jews and Arabs, had inspired the martial peasant with a hatred of images; and it was held to be the duty of a prince, to impose on his subjects the dictates of his own conscience. But in the outset of an unsettled reign, during ten years of toil and danger, Leo submitted to the meanness of hypocrisy, bowed before the idols he had persecuted, and treated the church as he would the honest man, and the philosopher, and the real knight, with the annual professions of his orthodoxy and zeal. In the reformation of religion, his first steps were moderate and cautious: he assembled a great council of senators and bishops, and enacted, with their consent, that all the images should be removed from the public places; but he interrupted the work where he might be visible to the eyes, and inaccessible to the superstition of the people. But it was impossible on either side to check the rapid though adverse impulse of venation and abhorrence; in their lofty perfection, the images still edified their votaries, and reproached the tyrant. He was himself provoked by resistance and inventive; and his own party accused him of an imperfect discharge of his duty, and urged for his imitation the example of the Jewish king, who had broken without scruple the bond of the temple, and declared his reign. When he was proscribed, as well as the use of religious pictures; the churches of Constantinople and the provinces were cleansed from idolatry; the images of Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, were demolished, or a smooth surface of plaster was spread over the images, as a mark of political superintendence. Support by the zeal and despotism of six emperors, the east and west were involved in a noisy conflict of one hundred and twenty years. It was the design of Leo the Isaurian to pronounce the condemnation of images, as an article of faith, and by the authority of a general council; but the erection of such an assembly was reserved for his son Constantine; and though it is stigmatized by triumphant bigotry as a meeting of fools and atheists, their own partial and mutilated acts betray many symptoms of success. The synods of Ephesus, Iconoclasts, and Alexandria, of 784 and 806, and provincial synods introduced the sum-

a See Elmacin, (Hist. Saras., p. 257.) Abaphareus, (Dyson, p. 250.) and Abaphia, (Annal. Malines, p. 281.) and the criticism of Paré, (Hist. Sarasin, p. 201.) The council of Nice refers to determine whether the images of Edessa now repose at Rome or Glena; but its report is notorious, and this ancient object of worship is no longer famous or fast upheld.

b Examine, (ni, p. 258.) The Armenian churches are either content with the cros, (Misioris du Levant, tom. iii. p. 143.) but the Greek, sometimes, in the tenth century, is subject to the superstition of the ortodox of the twelfth century.

c (Opera, tom. i. p. 625.) Spaxham's Apology for the Synod of Constantinople (p. 171.) &c.) is worked up with truth and reason, and the argument of the present Epistle of the six prelates, (p. 338–343.) is cast into the Iconoclast scale. With this mutual aid, and opposite ten dure, it is easy for us to pos the balance with a philosophic indifferent. Their creed.

Some flowers of rhetoric are (Opera, tom. i. p. 625.) Spaxham's Apology for the Synod of Constantinople (p. 171.) &c.) is worked up with truth and reason, and the argument of the present Epistle of the six prelates, (p. 338–343.) is cast into the Iconoclast scale. With this mutual aid, and opposite ten
dure, it is easy for us to pos the balance with a philosophic indifferent. Their creed.
night of superstition, the Christians had wandered far away from the simplicity of the gospel: nor was it easy for them to discern the clue, and read back the mazes, of the labyrinth. The worship of images was inscribed during the centuries, which saw the cross, the Virgin, the saints and their relics: the holy ground was involved in a cloud of miracles and visions; and the nerves of the mind, curiosity and scepticism, were benumbed by the habits of obedience and belief. Constantine himself is accused of indulging a royal licence to dare, to dream, or dictate the mysteries of the catholics, but they were deeply inscribed in the public and private creed of his bishops; and the holiest Iconoclasm might assault with a secret horror the monuments of popular devotion, which were consecrated to the honour of his celestial patrons. In the reformation of the sixteenth century, freedom and knowledge had expanded all the faculties of man; the thirst of innovation superseded the reverence of antiquity; and the vigour of Europe could dislodge those phantoms which terrified the sickly and servile weakness of the Greeks with the crown of martyrdom. In every act of open and clandestine treason, the emperor felt the unforgiving cunning of the monks, the faithful slaves of the superstition which they cherished and influence. They prayed, they absolved, they inflamed, they conspired: the solitude of Palestine poured forth a torrent of invective; and the pen of St. John Damascenus, the last of the Greek fathers, devoted the tyrant's head, both in this world and the next. I am not at leisure to examine how far the monk was provoked, nor how much they have exaggerated, their real and pretended sufferings, nor how many lost their lives or limbs, their eyes or their heads, by the cruelty of the emperor. From the chastisement of individuals, he proceeded to the abolition of the order; and, in it, so uselessly, his resentment might be stimulated by avarice, and justified by patriotism. The formidable name and mission of the Dragon, his visitor-general, excited the terror and abhorrence of the black nation: the religious communities were dissolved, the buildings were converted into magazines, or barracks; the lands, moveables, and cattle, were confiscated; and our modern precedents will support the charge, that much wanton or malicious havoc was exercised against the relics, and even the books, of the monasteries. With the habit and profession of monks, the public and private peace of nations was again disturbed, and it should seem, that a solemn abjuration of idolatry was exacted from the subjects, or at least from the clergy, of the eastern empire.

The patient cast abroad, with reluctance, her sacred images; they were long cherished, and viciously defended, by the independent zeal of the Italians. In ecclesiastical rank and jurisdiction, the patriarchate of Constantinople and the pope of Rome were nearly equal. But the Greek prelate was a domestic slave under the eye of his master, at whose nod he alternately passed from the content to the throne, and from the throne to the convent. A distant and dangerous station, amidst the barbarians of the west, excited the spirit and freedom of the Latin bishops. Their popular election endeared them to the Romans; the public and private indigence was received by their ample revenues; and the neglect of the emperors, who were engaged in peace and war, the temporal safety of the city. In the school of adversity the priest insensibly imbibed the virtues and the ambition of a prince; the same character was assumed, the same policy was adopted, by the Italian, the Greek, or the Syrian, who ascended to the chair of St. Peter. All the provinces, religious and provinces, the genius and fortune of the popes again restored the supremacy of Rome. It is agreed, that in the eighth century, their dominion was founded on rebellion, and that the rebellion was produced and justified, by the heresy of the Iconoclasts; but the conduct of the second and third Gregory, in 8 John, or Masnar, was a noble Christian of Damascenus, who held a considerable office of the service of the empire; and in the course of his career, he rose to the dignity of the Greek emperor, and, by a resolute resolution, a resolute conduct, he was deprived of his right hand, and was exhaustively restored by the Virgin. After this deliverance, he resigned his office, distributed his wealth, and buried himself in the monastery of St. Sabas, between Jerusalem and the Dead sea. The legend is famous, but his limited editor, Father Legros, has unluckily proved that St. John Damascenus was already a monk before the Iconoclast dispute, (Opera, tom. i. visc. St. John Damascenus, p. 10—13, et Notes ad loc.) in the narrative of this persecution from Theophanes and Ceramicus, the latter is longer, and has the dragon (Drakonos) of Louis XIV.; and highly solaces him-this memorable contest, is variously interpreted by the wishes of their friends and enemies. The Byzantine writers unanimously declare, that, after a fruitless advance, they retrenched their expectations of the east and west, and deprecated the sacrilegious tyrant of the revenue and sovereignty of Italy. Their excommunication is still more clearly expressed by the Greeks, who beheld the accomplishment of the papal triumphs; and they strongly assailed the devotion of their countrymen, than to their country, they praise, instead of blaming, the zeal and orthodoxy of these apostolical men. The modern champions of Rome are eager to accept the praise and the precedent; this great and glorious example of the deposition of royal heretics is celebrated by the confessors of the Gallican church, who respect the saint without approving the sin. These common advocates of the crown and the mitre circumscribe the truth of facts by the rule of equity, Scripture, and tratition; and appeal to the evidence of the Latin, and the lives and epistles of the popes themselves.

Epistles of Gregory II. to the second to the emperor Leo, and to the emperor, are still extant; and if they cannot be praised as the most perfect models of eloquence and logic, they exhibit the portrait, or at least the mask, of the founder of the papal monarchy. During ten pure and fortunate years, says Gregory to the emperor, we have tasted the annual comfort of your royal letters, subscribed in purple ink, with your own hand, and kissed the holy vesture of your attachment to the orthodox creed of our fathers. How delightful is the change! how tremendous the scandal! You now accuse the catholics of idolatry; and, by the accusation, you betray your own impurity and ignorance. To this ignorance we are compelled to adapt the grossness of our words and our art against the vanities of daemonism, and those who serve the images. If you are pleased to ask, the reason why the same thunders were not hurled against the Neros and the Julians of antiquity, they reply, that the weakness of the primitive church was the sole cause of her patient loyalty. On this occasion, the effects of love and hatred are the same; and good and evil, turned to kindred uses, the same. This is the condemnation of the church, and the triumph of her enemies. She prays, and she seeks, in vain, to knit the bonds of society, and, with arms and with prayers, defends her religion. The Christian people, in their view of the affair, thinks that their reason is more evident than what they desire, and that the case is not to be considered in the light of a mere question of pre-emi-

The Latin Church. (Chronograph, p. 414.) For this Gregory is styled by Cedrenus in annal. (p. 850.) Zonaras specifies the thunder, acrimoniurn. (Tom. b. l. x. v. 104, 105.) It may be oberved, that the Greeks are apt to confound the times and actions of the two Gregorys.

• See Baratius, Anno Eccles. A. D. 730, No. 4, 5: dixit exemplum! Bellarmine, de Romano Pontifice, I. v. c. 6: multis titulis sese parte imperi. Sigonius, de Regno Italia, lib. vii. opera, tom. i. p. 169. Yet such is the change of Italy, that Sigonius is corrected by the editor of Milon, Philippus Argentona, a Bolognian, and subject of the Popes.

• Quod si christianum olim non depositorem Neronem sat Julianum, in hodierno etiam temporibus christianum quemquam Belarmino, vel Rom. Pont. i. c. 7. (Cardinal Peroz adds a distinction more homely, but not so forcible, as that of his predecessors—the freemen of heretics and associates, who break their oath, betray their coin, and renounce their allegiance to Christ and his vicar.) (Peroz, p. 89.)

Take, as a specimen, the cautious Baratius, (Hist. de l'Empereur, p. 135ff.) and the vehement Spanheim, (Hist. Innocentum) who, with a hundred more, tread in the footsteps of the centurions of Malebolghes.

• They appealed to Paul Warnefried, or Dianusus, (de Gentilis Legandi, i. v. c. 49, 505, 507, in Scripta, Itali, Maratorii, tom. i. par.) and did not seek the sentiments of the Latin, of the Gallican, or of the Alexandrian Church. (De Victu Pont. in Maratorii, tom. i. par.) Gregory II. in p. 131, Gregorius III. in p. 135, Zacharias in p. 141, Stephonius in p. 143, and Pagi in p. 147.) 3. Pagi in p. 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182. Yet I may remark, that the true Anatolius (Hist. Eccles, p. 156, ed. Reg.) and the Historia Mecristi, (I. xxiii. p. 16, tom. i. Scripta, Itali, both of the middle century, translate and approve the Greek text of Thaumaturgus.

1. From all the different critiques, Lucas Holstenius, Scholestrato, Caumplani, Bichhia, Maratorii, (Papirodomena ad tom. in. par.) are agreed that the Liber Pontificalis was not copied from the apostolical limits and manners of the eighth and ninth centuries; and that the last and smallest part is that which is so near now. The style is barbarous, the narrative partial, the details are treading—yet it must be read. The book has a ridiculous text of the lives of the popes. The epistles of the popes are dispersed in the volumes of Collections.

2. The two epistles of Gregory II. have been preserved in the Acts of the Councils, viii. tom. i. p. 194, and viii. tom. ii. p. 725, 726. They are with much probability written to the emperor, in the summer of the year 725, by Mar-torii. (Annals Cathol. tom. vi. p. 198, 725, and by Pagi in p. 726. Such is the force of prejudice, that some papists have praised the good sense and moderation of these letters.
The barbarians have submitted to the yoke of the gospel, while you alone are deaf to the voice of the Shepherd. These pious barbarians are kindled into rage: they thirst to avenge the persecution of the east. Abandon your rascal the cause of religion by catching at every pretext, and you have reason to repent. If you persist, we are innocent of the blood that will be spilt in the contest; may it fall on your own head."

The first assault of Leo against the A.D. 725, etc., images of Constantinople had been witnessed by a crowd of strangers from Italy and the west, who related with grief and indignation the sacrilege of the emperor. But on the reception of his scriptorium edict, they trembled for their domestic deities; the images of Christ and the Virgin, of the angels, martyrs, and saints, were abolished in all the churches of Italy, and a strong majority was opposed to the Roman pontiff, the royal favour as the price of his compliance, degradation and exile as the penalty of his disobedience. Neither zeal nor policy allowed him to hesitate; and the haughty strain in which Gregory addressed the emperor displays his contempt for the power of Rome.

Without depending on prayers or miracles, he boldly armed against the public enemy, and his pastoral letters admonished the Italians of their danger and their duty. At this signal, Ravenna, Vence, and the cities of the exarchate and Pentapolis, adored lines against the court of Rome. Preparations were made for the reception and the conduct of a fleet of angels, sent by sea and land consisted, for the most part, of the natives; and the spirit of patriotism and zeal was transfused into the mercenary strangers. The Italians were to live and die in the defence of the pope and the holy images; the Roman people were devoted to their father, and even the Lombards were ambitious to share the merit and advantage of this holy war. The most reasonable act, but the most obvious revenge, was the destruction of the statues of Leo himself; the most effectual and pleasing measure of rebellion, was made, and conducted, with a firmness which has attached to him of a power which he had recently abused by the imposition of a new capitulatio. A form of administration was preserved by the election of magistrates and governors; and so high was the public indignation, that the Italians were prepared to create an orthonomous empire, and conduct their own government. The rebuff of the church was not without its advantage; the reform of the Byzantine empire was the incident of the battle, and the emperor was prepared to receive the election of a new emperor, and they expelled the Italians not to separate from the body of the Roman monarchy. The exarch was permitted to reside within the walls of Ravenna, a capital rather than a master; and till the imperial coronation of Charlemagne, the government of Rome and Italy was exercised in the name of the successors of Constantine.

Republic of the Empire, which had been opposed by the arms and arts of Augustus.

God upon earth, the apostle St. Peter, whose image you threaten to destroy. The remote and interior kingdoms of the west present their homage to Christ and his vicegerent; and we now prepare to visit one of the most powerful monarchies of the earth, to receive from there the sacrament of baptism. The barbarians have submitted to the yoke of the gospel, while you alone are deaf to the voice of the Shepherd. These pious barbarians are kindled into rage: they thirst to avenge the persecution of the east. Abandon your rascal the cause of religion by catching at every pretext, and you have reason to repent. If you persist, we are innocent of the blood that will be spilt in the contest; may it fall on your own head.

Yet Leo was undoubtedly comprehended in the si qua . . . regionem accrasat in ecclesia sancta. The emperor Justin II, who had granted to the papal see the title of Pontifex, was the son of Justinian, who had first granted this title to the papal see. The decision is of the last importance to their safety; since, according to the oracle, Grattan Synod, xxvi. p. 35, Hist. Synod., Hist. Synod. xxxvii. 112, 113) pontifical excommunication is imminent. See the Liber Pontificalis of Agnellus, ed. supra, and the Chronicle of Constantine V, with the styles of Philip I., p. 157.) The pope's style Leo and Constantine Co- pontifical, ed. supra, and the Chronicle of Constantine V, with the styles of Philip I., p. 157.) The pope's style Leo and Constantine Co- pontifical, ed. supra, and the Chronicle of Constantine V, with the styles of Philip I., p. 157.) The pope's style Leo and Constantine Co- pontifical, ed. supra, and the Chronicle of Constantine V, with the styles of Philip I., p. 157.) The pope's style Leo and Constantine Co-
The Decline and Fall

The Sun, was rescued, after seven hundred and fifty years of servitude, from the persecution of Leo the Isaurian. By the Caesars, the triumphs of the consuls had been acknowledged; and in their place, at the end of the empire, the god Terminus, the sacred boundary, had insensibly receded from the ocean, the Rhine, the Danube, and the Euphrates; and Rome was reduced to her ancient territory from Viterbo to Terracina, and from Narni to the mouth of the Tiber. When the kings were banished, the boundaries of their kingdom fell off; and in 670, when the ancient city of Ohrid had been founded by their wisdom and virtue. Their perpetual jurisdiction was divided between two annual magistrates: the senate continued to exercise the powers of administration and counsel; and the legislative authority was distributed in the assemblies of the people, by a well-proportioned scale of property and service. Ignorant of the arts of luxury, the primitive Romans had improved the science of government and war: the will of the community was absolute; the rights of individuals were sacred: one hundred and thirty thousand citizens were armed for defence of the conquest; and a band of robbers and outlaws was moulded into a nation, deserving of freedom, and ambitions of glory. When the sovereignty of the Greek emperors was extinguished, the ruins of Rome presented the sad image of depopulation and decay: their splendid palaces, the object of superstition, and the object of her own amazement and terror. The last vestige of the substance, or even the forms, of the constitution, was obliterated from the practice and memory of the Romans; and they were devoid of knowledge, or virtue, again to build the fabric of a commonwealth. Their scanty remnant, the offspring of slaves and strangers, was despisâle in the eyes of the victorious barbarians. As often as the Franks or Lombards expressed their most bitter contempt of a foe, they called him a Roman; and in this sense the bishop Liutprand, "we include whatever is base, whatever is cowardly, whatever is pernicious, the extremes of avarice and luxury, and every vice that can prostitute the dignity of human nature." By the necessity of their situation, the inhabitants of Rome were cast into the rough model of a republican government: they were compelled to elect some judges in peace, and some leaders in war: the nobles assembled to deliberate, and their resolves could not be executed without the union and consent of the multitude. The style of the Roman senate and people was so different from that of the by now independent empire, that the tumultuous conflict of licentiousness and oppression. The want of laws could only be supplied by the influence of religion, and their foreign and domestic counsels were moderated by the authority of the bishop. His alms, his sermons, his correspondence with the kings and prelates of the west, his recent services, their gratitude and oath, accustomed the Romans to consider him as the first magistrate or prince of the city. The Christian humility of the popes was not offended by the name of Dominus, or Lord; and their face and inscription are still apparent on the most ancient coins. Their temporal dominion is now confirmed by the reverence of the people, and their noblest title is the free choice of a people, whom they had redeemed from slavery. In the quarrels of ancient Greece, the Romans attacked the holy people of Elis enjoyed a perpetual peace, under the protection of Jupiter, A. D. 770-752, and in his wars against the Barbarians the choice of a hero who would it have been for the Romans, if a similar privilege had guarded the patrimony of St. Peter from the calamities of war; if the Christians, who visited the holy threshold, would have sheathed their swords in the presence of the apostle and his successor. But this mystic circle could have been traced only by the hand of a legislator and a sage: this pacific system was incompatible with the zeal and ambition of the popes: the Romans were not addicted, like the inhabitants of Elis, to the innocent and phædal labours of agriculture and navigation; the Barbarians of Italy, being formed by the climate, were far below the Grecian states in the institutions of public and private life. A memorable example of repentance and piety was exhibited by Liutprand, king of the Lombards. In arms, at the gate of the Vatican, the conqueror listened to the appeal of the pope, and chose the city of Rome for his residence; and, when he had designed his conquests, respectfully visited the church of St. Peter, and, after performing his devotions, offered his sword and dagger, his cuirass and mantle, his silver cross, and his crown of gold, on the tomb of the apostle. But this religious fervour was the illusion, perhaps the artifice, of the bullion: the sense of interest is strong and lasting; the love of arms and rapine was congenial to the Lombards; and both the prince and people were irresistibly tempted by the disorders of Italy, the nakedness of Rome, and the ungratefulness of her neighbours. The emperors, and the edicts of the emperor, they declared themselves the champions of the holy images; Liutprand invaded the province of Romagna, which had already assumed that distinctive appellation; the catholics of the exarchate yielded without reluctance to his civil and military demands, and the conquerors of Spoleto and Rome, the storm evaporated without effect, but the policy of Liutprand alarmed Italy with a vexatious alternative of hostility and truce. His successor Astolphus declared himself the equal enemy of the emperor and the pope: Ravenna was subdued by force or treachery, and this final conquest extinguished the series of the exarchs, who had

1 I have traced the Roman ducal according to the maps, and the maps according to the excellent dissertation of father Bertetti. (de Ducibus Rom.: vet. tom. ii. vol. iv. p. 252.) Yet I cannot observe, that Visigoth is of Lombard foundation, (p. 261.) and that Terracina, was usurped by the Greeks.

2 On the extern, population, &c. of the Roman kingdom, the reader may, I presume, with pleasure, the Discours Préliminaire to the Régimeacque Roman de St. de Boëdard, (tom. i.) who will not be accused of too much credulity for the early ages of Rome.

3 On Lombard and Venetian names, Franc, Lothrings, Bajoci, Suvii, Gébriands, tote designetum et inanimis patris amicitiam, nil alium comitatem nos Romae, discia ducatur, suas leges, suas regna, suas institutu, suas aestas, suas tempora, suas leges, suas luxurias, suas mendacii, humanitatis et superbiae. (Liutprand in Legat. Script. lat. tom. ii. pars I. p. 481.) For the sins of Cato or Tullio, Miltiades, or the old German emperors, was imputed, as a fit punishment, the daily perusal of that barbarous passage.

4 Pipino regis Francorum, dominus senator, auque universa populi generatio, sed Romanus urbis, (Ducange, tomo. iii. p. 265.) I assign these names to the year 826. If the pope was not associated in the licence and the spirit of Sallust or Livy.

5 On that occasion, the emperor Charles, last of the Carolingians, (Legat. Script. Lat. tom. iii. p. 166.) and the pope Andrew Dandolo, (scriptoria, vol. ii. p. 135.) made the sentence, that the republic of Greece was a kingdom. But the words are not ascribed to any pope, with the exception of Gregory, (Legat. Script. lat. tom. ii. pars I. p. 481.) in the sins of Cato or Tullio, Miltiades, or the old German emperors, was imputed, as a fit punishment, the daily perusal of that barbarous passage.

6 Piède regis Francorum, dominus senator, auque universa populi generatio, sed Romanus urbis, (Ducange, tomo. iii. p. 265.) I assign these names to the year 826. If the pope was not associated in the licence and the spirit of Sallust or Livy.

7 To seek in the exile of Guinevere, or the Lombard, (Chron. Venet. p. 138.) and the pope Andrew Dandolo, (Scriptoria, vol. iii. p. 135.) made the sentence, that the republic of Greece was a kingdom. But the words are not ascribed to any pope, with the exception of Gregory, (Legat. Script. Lat. tom. ii. pars I. p. 481.) in the sins of Cato or Tullio, Miltiades, or the old German emperors, was imputed, as a fit punishment, the daily perusal of that barbarous passage.

8 The opinion will depend on the various readings of the MSS of Anastasius—deceperat, or deceperat. (Script. Ital. tom. ii. p. 167.)
of their neglect, if they suffer his tomb, his temple, and his people, to fall into the hands of the perfidious Lombards. The second expedition of Pepin was not less rapid and fortunate than the first: St. Peter was satisfied, Rome was again saved, and Astolphus was taught the lessons of justice and sincerity by the scourge of a foreign master. After the church had languished about twenty years in a state of languor and decay. But their minds were not yet subdued to their condition; and instead of affecting the pacific virtues of the fickle, they peevishly harassed the Romans with a repetition of claims, evasions, and inroads, which they undertook with a lust for glory. On either side, their expiring monarchy was pressed by the zeal and prudence of pope Adrian the first, the genius, the fortune, and greatness of Charlemagne the son of Pepin; these heroes of the church and state were united in public and domestic friendship, and, while they triumphed on the one hand, they vanished their proceedings with the fairest colours of equity and moderation.

The mutual obligations of the papal and Carolingian family, form the basis, kings important link of ancient and modern, of France, civil and ecclesiastical, history. In the conquest of Italy, the Roman church obtained a favourable occasion, a species of the title, the wishes of the people, the prayers and intrigues of the clergy. But the most essential gifts of the popes to the Carolingian race were the dignities of king of France, and of patron of Rome. 1. Under the sacreted monarchy of St. Peter, the nations began to resume the practice of seeking, on the banks of the Rhine, their kings, their laws, and the oracles of their fate. The Franks were perplexed between the name and substance of their government. All the powers of royalty were exercised by Pepin, mayor of the palace, and reigned without the real ostentation of his title, to the ambition. His enemies were crushed by his valour; his friends were multiplied by his liberality; his father had been the savour of Christendom; and the claims of personal merit were repeated and ennobled in a descent of four generations. The name and image of royalty was still preserved in the last descendant of Clovis, the feeble Childeric; but his obsoleat right could only be used as an instrument of sedition; the nation was desirous of restoring the simplicity of the constitution; and Pepin, a subject and a prince, was ambitious to ascetain his own rank and dignity. The formes of imitation were now no more; they were bound, by an oath of fidelity, to the royal phaeton; the blood of Clovis was pure and sacred in their nature. 2. Except in the divorce of the daughter of Desiderius, whom Charlemagne repudiated sine aliquo crimine, Pepin Stephen IV, had most erroneously espoused the alliance of a noble Frank—eunopus, heralds, nec alios, for the submission of nations, and he imposed the first stain of bigotry. (Cod. Carol. cap. i, p. 15, 175.) An "erunt erroribus, et quos missos," says Theophanes, first wife. (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. vi. p. 232, 234, 236, 237. But Childeric himself indulged himself in the freedom of polygamy or concubinage.

6. See the Annali d'Italia of Muratori, tom. vi, and the three first Celebrations of his Antiquitates Italian Medii, tom. vi. Legenda Sacra. tom. ii. ii. p. 723, No. 1, 6, A. D. 752, No. 1-100 and Natalis Alexander, (Hist. Novi Testamenti, dissert. i. p. 56—112) they have treated of the deposition of Childeric with learning and attention, but with a strong bias to save the independence of the crown. Yet they are hard pressed by the texts which they produce of Eginhard, Theophanes, and the old annals. Laubachianus Fuldensis, Lobiolan. 7. The Codex Carolinianus is a collection of the epistles of the popes to Charlemagne, Merovinian, and other popes, from the year 820, to the year 804, Charlemagne, as far as the year 791, when it was finished by the last of these princes. His original and authentic MSS. (Bibliotheque Caldeii) is now in the imperial library of Vienna, and has been published by Lambecius and Muratori. (Script. Rerum Ital. tom. iii. pars ii.) 8. See this most extraordinary letter in the Codex Carolinianus, exist. 101. The enemies of the popes have charged them with fraud and blasphemy; yet they surely meant to persuade rather than to deceive. The introduction of the dead, or of immortals, was familiar to the ancient orators, though it is executed on this occasion in the rude fashion of the age. 9. Conquest of Lombardy by Charles the Great, Comm. Con. A. D. 774.
eyes; and their common ambassadors addressed the Roman pontiff, to dispel their scruples, or to absolve their promise. The interest of pope Zachary, the successor of the two Gregories, prompted him to decide, and to decide in their favour; he pronounced that the naves and aisles which had been so justly won, the titles and authority of king; and that the unfortunate Childe- rie, a victim of the public safety, should be degraded, shaved, and confined in a monastery for the remainder of his days. An answer so agreeable to their wishes was accepted by the Franks, as the opinion of a cau- ristic and relentless judge, or the decree of a pontiff. The Merovingian race disappeared from the earth; and Pepin was exalted on a buckler by the suffrage of a free people, accustomed to obey his laws, and to march under his standard. His coronation was twice per- formed, with the sanction of the popes, by their most faithful servant St. Boniface, the apostle of Germany, and by the grateful hands of Stephen the third, who, in the monastery of St. Denis, placed the diadem on the head of his benefactor. The royal union of the kings of Israel was dexterously applied: the successor of Peter assumed the character of a divine am- bassee: a German chieflain was transformed into the Lord’s anointed; and this Jewish rite has been diffused and maintained by the superstition and vanity of modern Europe. The Franks were absolved from their ancient oath; but a dire anathema was thundered against all their posterior acts: they should continue to renew the same freedom of choice, or to elect a king, except in the holy and meritorious race of the Carolingian princes. Without apprehending the future danger, these princes gloried in their present security: the secretary of Charlemagne affirms, that the French sceptre was transferred by the authority of the popes; and, in their holiest enterprises, they insist, with confidence, on this signal and successful act of temporal jurisdiction.

Patriarchs of Rome. H. In the change of manners and lan- guage, the patriarchs of Rome were far removed from the senate of Romuli, or the palace of Constantine, from the free nobles of the republic, or the fictitious parents of the emperor. After the recovery of Italy and Africa by the arms of Justinian, the importance and danger of these remote provinces re- quired a person of a superior magistrate; he who, indifferently styled the exarch or the patriarch; and these governors of Ravenna, who fill their place in the chronology of princes, extended their jurisdiction over the Roman city. Since the revolt of Italy and the loss of the exarchate, the distress of the Romans had an ex- ception. This was the one great act of their independence; in this act, they exercised the right of disposing of themselves; and the decrees of the senate and people successively invested Charles Martel and his postcy with the honours of patriarch of Rome. The leaders of a powerful nation would have disdained a servile title and subordinate office; but the reign of the Greek emperors was suspended; and, in the vacancy of the empire, they derived a more glorious commission from the pope and the republic. The Roman ambassadors presented these patriarchs with the keys of the shrine of St. Peter, as a pledge and symbol of sovereignty.

with a holy banner, which it was their right and duty to unfurl in the defence of the church and city. In the time of Charles Martel and of Pepin, the interpo- sition of the Lombard kingdom covered the freedom, while it threatened the safety, of Rome; and the patri- monial aegis of the Carolingians, under their count, pres- ented itself to the eyes of these distant protectors. The power and policy of Charlemagne annihilated an enemy and imposed a master. In his first visit to the capital, he was received with all the honours which had formerly been paid to the exarch, the representative of the emperor; and these benefactions, with some new decoration from the joy and gratitude of pope Adrian the first. No sooner was he informed of the sudden approach of the monarch, than he despatched the magistrates and no- bles of Rome to meet him, with the banner, about thirty miles from the city. As the dissolute claim to rule, the Flaminian way was lined with the schools of national communities, of Greeks, Lombards, Saxons, &c.; the Roman youth were under arms; and the children of a more tender age, with palms and olive branches in their hands, chanted the praises of their great monarch, and implored his blessing. The ex- ensigns of the saints, he dismounted from his horse, led the procession of the nobles to the Vatican, and, as he ascended the stairs, devoutly kissed each step of the threshold of the apostles. In the portico, Adrian expected him at the head of his clergy; they embraced, and, as friends, they exchanged with each other speeches. In the palace, the king or patriarch assumed the right hand of the pope. Nor was the Frank content with this vain and empty demonstrations of respect. In the twenty-six years that elapsed between the conquest of Lombardy and his imperial coronation, Rome, which had been delivered from the universal sword, was subject, as his army, to the sceptre of Charlemagne. The people swore allegiance to his person and family: in his name money was coined, and justice was administered; and the election of the popes was examined and confirmed by his au- thority. Except an original and self-derived claim to rule, there was not any prerogative remaining, which the title of emperor could add to the patri- arch of Rome.

The gratitude of the Carolingians was adequate to these obligations, and their piety extended to the benefactors of the church, the victors and benefactors of the Roman church. Her ancient patrimony of farms and houses was transformed by their bounty into the temporal do- minion of cities and provinces; and the donation of the exarchate was the first-fruits of the conquests of Pepin. The keys and the hostages of the principal cities were delivered to the French ambassador; and, in his mas- ter’s name, he presented them before the tomb of St. Peter. The ample measure of the exarchate might...

a Not absolutely for the first time. On a less conspicuous theatre, it had been used, in the sixth and seventh centuries, by the prin- cipal bishops of Britain and Spain. The royal union of Constanti- nople was borrowed from the Latins in the last age of the empire. Constantinople, according to a Jewish, incomprehensible ceremony. See Selden’s Titles of Honor, in v. 20, vol. 5, p. 570.

b See Eadwine, in Vita Eadwine Eadwine, c. i. 9, & c. iii. p. 51, Childeric was depos’d, juana, the Carolingians were established— anarchy and the empire. The term, originally, is a very perspicuous word. It is, yet Eadwine, and the spring of the Latin language. Childeric. The text.

c For the title and powers of patriarch of Rome, see Dionysius, in (Gesta Caroli Mart., cap. iv. p. 312—314, Paris, 1812.) See also, (Chire, Annales, ann. 150, 1792.) On the whole, the word, and the Latin language, are much more expressive; the Codex Carolini signifies, this ample gift. Both are contemporary records; and the latter is the more authentic, since it has been pre- served, while the former is mutilated. (C.s. p. 383.)

d Between the exorbitant claims and narrow concessions of inte- rest and prejudice, from which even Muratori (Antiquitates, ii. 53—63) is not exempt, I have been guided, in the limits of the ex-

But, in the cooler moments of absence and reflection, he viewed, with an eye of jealousy and envy, the recent greatness of his ecclesiastical ally. The execution of his own and his father's promises was respectfully consulted by the king of the Lombards. The Lombards asserted the inalienable rights of the empire; and, in his life and death, Ravenna, as well as Rome, was numbered in the list of his metropolitan cities. The sovereignty of the exarchate melted away in the hands of the popes; they found in the archbishops of Ravenna a dangerous and domes tic rival: the nobles and people disliked the yoke of a priest; and, in the dis orders of the times, they could only retain the memory of an ancient claim, which, in a more prosperous age, they have revived and realized. Faith is the sweat of the weak and of the weary, the strength of the dying and of the succumbing; and the strong though ignorant of the genius of Con.

constantine, who had been severely condemned. Perhaps the humility of a Christian priest should have rejected an earthly kingdom, which it was not easy for him to govern without renouncing the virtues of his profession. Perhaps a faithful subject, or even a generous enemy, would have been less impatient to divide the spoils of the barbarian; and if the emperor had intrusted Stephen to solicit in his behalf the revenues of the church, it might have been possible to absolve the pope from the reproach of treachery and falsehood. But in the rigid interpretation of the laws, every one may accept, without injury, whatever his benefactor can bestow without injustice. The Greek emperor had abdicated, or forbidden, his right to the exarchate; and the sword of Astolphus was broken by the stronger sword of the Carolingians. It was not in the cause of the Iconoclast that Pepin had exposed his person and array in a double expedition beyond the Alps: he possessed, and might lawfully utilize, his conquests; and to the importunities of the Greeks he piously resisted all which they could attempt to extort him from his revenues in order to return the gift which he had conferred on the Roman pontiff for the remission of his sins and the salvation of his soul. The splendid donation was granted in supine and absolute dominion, and the world beheld for the first time a christian bishop in vested with the prerogatives of a temporal prince; the choice of magistrates, the exercise of justice, the imposition of taxes, and the wealth of the palace of Ravenna. In the dissolution of the Lombard kingdom, the inhabitants of the duchy of Spoleto sought a refuge from the storm, shared their heads after the Roman fashion, declared themselves the servants and subjects of St. Peter, and completed, by this voluntary surrender, the present circle of the ecclesiastical state. That mysterious circle was enlarged to an infinite extent, by the verbal or written donation of Charlemagne, who, in the first transports of his victory, desired to make the pope his absolute master of all the islands which had formerly been annexed to the exarchate. But, in the cooler moments of absence and reflection, he viewed, with an eye of jealousy and envy, the recent greatness of his ecclesiastical ally. The execution of his own and his father's promises was respectfully consulted by the king of the Lombards. The Lombards asserted the inalienable rights of the empire; and, in his life and death, Ravenna, as well as Rome, was numbered in the list of his metropolitan cities. The sovereignty of the exarchate melted away in the hands of the popes; they found in the archbishops of Ravenna a dangerous and domes tic rival: the nobles and people disliked the yoke of a priest; and, in the dis archate and Pentapolis, by the Disertatio Choraepigraphica Italiae Mosti Pollensi, pm. 10—114.) 2 Spoletonis deprehensi sunt, et in servitio E. Petri recipi et mora Romanae pontificii fecerunt. (Anastasius, p. 155.) Yet it may be a question whether they gave their own persons or their country. The policy and donations of Charlemagne are carefully examined by St. Marc, (Coronc., tom. i. p. 290—458) who has well studied the Codex Carolini. (Bellev.) I believe, that they were only verbal. The most ancient act of donation of which it is possible to give an extract, is that of the emperor Lewis the Pious. (Codex Carolini, de Regibus Ital., iv. cap. 17.) But, on the whole, they are not much mentioned, (Pacht, A., 317, No. 7, &c.; Marcoci, Annota.

But it is not to these considerations that we are to attribute the feeling of indignation so much manifested by the popes against the Donation of Constantine. In the revival of letters and liberty this fictitious deed was transmuted by the pen of Laurentius Valla, the pen of an eloquent critic and a Roman patriot. His conten poraries of the fifteenth century were astonished at his sacristy boldness; yet such is the silent and irresistible progress of reason, that before the end of the next age, the fable was rejected by the contempts of history; 8 and the tacit condemnation of the advocates of the Roman church. 9 The popes themselves have indulged a smile at the credulity of the vulgar; 6 but a false and obsolete title still sanctifies their reign; and, by the same fortune which has attended the decretals and the Sibylline oracles, the edifice has subsisted after the foundations have been undermined.

While the popes established in Italy their freedom and dominon, the images, the first cause of their revolt, were restored to the Roman imperial. 11 Under the reign of Constantine the fifth, the union of civil and ecclesiastical power had overthrown the tree, without extirpating the root, of superstition. The idols, for such they were now held, were secretly cherished by the order and the sex most prone to devotion, and the pope and the cardinals obtained a final victory over the reason and authority of man. Leo the fourth maintained with less rigour the religion of his father and grandfather; but his wife, the fair and ambitious Irene, had imbied the zeal of the Athenians, the heirs of the idolatry, rather than the theology, of their ancestors. Of her marriage, her life and her death, these sentiments were inflamed by danger and dissimulation, and she could only labour to protect and promote some favourite monchs whom she drew from their caverns, and seated on the metropolitian throne of the east. But as soon as she reigned in her own name and that of her son, Irene more seriously undertook the ruin of the Iconoclasts; and the first step of her future persecution was a general edict for liberty of conscience. In the restoration of the monks, a thousand images were exposed to the public view; and letters were written to console their sufferings and miracles. By the opportunities of death or removal, the episcopal seats were judiciously filled; the most eager competitors for earthly or celestial favour anticipated and dabbled the judgment of their sovereign; and the promotion of her seen-tary Tarsius, the last remaining patriarch of the command of the oriental church. But the decrees of a general council could only be repealed by a similar assembly; 11 the Iconoclasts whom she convened, were bold in possession, and averse to debate; and the feeble voice of the bishops was re-echoed by the more formidable clamour of the soldiers and people of Constantinople. The delay and intrigues of Nice, the desire of the emperor to receive some additional security, and the tardy consent of the hosts and troops, and the choice of Nice for a second orthodox synod, removed these obstacles; and the episcopal conscience was again, after the Greek fashion, in the hands of the prince. No more than eighteen days were allowed for the consideration of this important matter; the Iconoclasts appeared, not as judges, but as criminals or penitents; the scene was decorated by the legates of pope Adrian and the eastern patriarch; 11 the decrees were framed by the president Tarasius, and ratified by the consent of Nice and the submission of two thousand and fifty bishops. They unanimously pronounced, that the worship of images is agreeable to Scripture and reason, to the fathers and councils of the church; but they hesitate whether that worship be relative or direct; whether the Godhead, and the figure of Christ, be entitled to the same mode of adoration and adoration. A second Nicean council, the acts are still extant; a curious monument of superstition and ignorance, of falsehood and folly. I shall only notice the judgment of the bishops, on the comparative merit of image worship and morality. A monk had concluded a truce with his wife, and devoted his time to the raising up of his daily prayers to a picture that hung in his cell. His scruple prompted him to consult the abbot. ·'Rather than abstain from adoring Christ and his mother in their holy images, it would be better for you,' replied the casuist, ·'to enter every brothel, and visit every prostitute, in the city.' 11

For the honour of orthodoxy, at least Final establishment of the orthodoxy of the Roman church, it is somewhat unfortunate, that the two princes who convened the two councils of Nice were both stained with the guilt of forgeries. The second of these assemblies was approved and rigorously executed by the despotism of Irene, and she refused her adversaries the toleration which at first she had granted to her friends. During the five succeeding reigns, a period of thirty-eight years, the contest was maintained, with the aid of various successes, between the worshippers and the breakers of the images; but I am not inclined to pursue with minute diligence the repetition of the same events. Niephoros allowed a general liberty of speech and practice; and the only virtue of his reign was its termination. Thelwall calls him a monster, the cause of the ruin of the faith, and eternal perdition. Superstition and weakness formed the character of Michael the first, but the saints and images were incapable of supporting their votary on the throne. In the purple, Leo the fifth as soon as the name and religion of an Armenian; and the idols, with their seditious adherents, were condemned to a second exile. Their applause would have sanctioned the murder of an impious tyrant, but his assassin and successor, the second Michael, was tainted from his birth with the Phrygian heresies: he attempted to mediate between the contending clouds; but the intractable spirit of the catholics insensibly cast him into the opposite scale. His moderation was guarded by timidity; but his son Theophilus, alike ignorant of fear and pity, was the last and most cruel of the Iconoclasts. The enthusiasm of the times ran strongly in the Catholic and Eastern emperors, who esteemed the

1. The Palladion Archeolog found it in the moon, among the things that were lost upon earth, (Orlando Furioso, xxxii. 84.)
2. Di van ferre ad un grand monte passa, Ch'el che gia buon odore, o pura lute, Questo era il dono (se pur dir dir) lac
Che al ciel sara l'era ch'el m'ha dato
In l'oceano al mezzo, in l'oceano at Yet this incomparable poem has been approved by a bulk of Leo X. (Panormia, vol. i. p. 226, No. II. &c.)
3. Carlo of Gournay and several of the popes, in that long and valuable digression, which has resumed its place in the last edition, carefully published from the author's MS. and printed in four volumes in quarto, under the name of Friburgo, 1722. (Istoria d'Italia, tom. i. p. 505-506.)
4. The remaining history of images, from Irene to Theodore, is collected by Barinus and his continuator, and published by Bartolomeo, (Hist, de l'Eglise, vol. ii. p. 595-612, tom. ii. p. 1392-1403.)
5. The solitude of the monks, and the most sacred persons of the church, is the same, as well as their support, (Hist, Eccles. secul. vii. et viii.)
6. The images of Jesus, the Virgin, and the saints, were similar in every country; but the catholics, excepting the primitive and orthodox monastic, and even Leo Bona, (Hist, de l'Eglise, xii. 18.) a gentleman and a scholar, is infected by the odious superstition, and his writings are loaded with it, (Hist, of the著作家, p. 355-356.)
7. The second general council of Nice, with a number of relative pieces, in the seventh volume of the Councils, p. 945-1039. A faithful version, with some critical notes, would provoke, in different readers, a sigh or a smile.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

183

Chap. X.

The Greeks were docile to the voice of their father; but the greatest part of the Latin Christians were far behind in the practice of superstition. The churches of France, Germany, England, and Spain, steered a middle course between the adoration of images and the rejection of images. They admitted into their temples, not as objects of worship, but as lively and useful memorials of faith and history. An angry book of controversy was composed and published in the name of Charlemagne; but under his authority a synod of three hundred bishops was assembled at Frankfort; they blamed the fury of the iconoclasts, but they pronounced a more severe censure against the superstitious of the Greeks, and the decrees of their pretended council, which was long despised by the barbarians of the west. Among them the worship of images advanced with silent and insensible force. The history of ihe reigns of the pious Irene, that waves of hesitation and delay, by the cross idolatry of the ages which preceded the reformation, and of the countries, both in Europe and America, which are still immersed in the gloom of superstition.

It was after the Nicene synod, and under the reign of the pious Irene, that thepopes consummated the separation of Rome and Italy, by the translation of the empire to the less orthodox Charlemagne. They were compelled to choose between the rival nations; religion was not the sole motive of their choice. The emperor, who was deposed by his friends, they held, with reluctance and suspicion, the catholic virtues of his foes. The difference of language and manners had perpetuated the enmity of the two capitals; and they were alienated from each other by the hostile opposition of seventy years. In that schism the Romans had tasted of freedom, and the popes of sovereignty: their submission would have exposed them to the revenge of a jealous tyrant; and the revolution of Italy had betrayed the impotence, as well as the tyranny, of the Byzantine court. The Greek emperors had restored the images, but they had not restored the Calabrian estates and the Illyria, diocese, which the iconoclasts had torn away from the church and the people. The successors of St. Peter were not to be partitioned with a sentence of excommunication unless they speedily abjure this practical heresy. The Greeks were now orthodox, but their religion might be tainted by the breach of the reigning monarch; the Franks were now contumacious; but a discerning eye might discern the effect of the naked eye. The emperors would see the operation, of images. The name of Charlemagne was stained by the patriarchal acrimony of his scribes; but the conqueror himself conformed, with the temper of a statesman, to the various practice of France and Italy. In his four pilgrimage visits to the Vatican, he found the churches adorned with altars and piety; knelt before the tomb, and consequently before the image, of the apostle; and joined, without scruple, in all the prayers and procession of the Roman liturgy. Would prudence or gratitude allow the pontiffs to renounce their benefactor? Had they a right to alienate his gift of the exarchate? Had they power to abolish his government of Rome? The title of patrician was below the merit and greatness of Charlemagne; and it was only by reviving the western tradition that they could pay their obligations or secure their establishment. By this decisive measure of independence they would finally separate the Church from the debasement of a provincial town, the majesty of Rome would be restored: the Latin christians would be united, under a supreme head, in their ancient metropolis; and the conquerors of the west would receive their crown from the successors of S. Peter. The Roman church would have a zealous and respectable advocate; and under the shadow of the Carolingian power, the bishop might exercise, with honour and safety, the government of the city.

Before the ruin of paganism in Rome, the competition for a wealthy bishopric was often of tumultuous bloodshed. The people were less numerous, but the times were more savage, the prize more important, and the chair of S. Peter was fiercely disputed by the leading ecclesiastics who aspired to the rank of sovereign. The reign of Adrian the first surpasses the measure of past or succeeding ages; the walls of Rome, the coronation of Charlemagne as emperor in Rome and the west.

a See an account of this controversy in the Alexius of Anna Comnenus, d. v. p. 129.) and Mosheim, (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p. 327, 372.)

b The Libri Carolini, (Spanheim, p. 413-423.) composed in the palace or winter-quarters of Charlemagne, at Worms, A. D. 793; and sent by Engelshein to pope Hadrian I. published by a German and veritas epistola, (Concil. tom. viii. p. 1355.) The Carolins project the absolute submission of the images, and declare that, as these are the flowers of their rhetoric—decretum, proces Genes v (comminato ob haruspicinis et altissimis dismis, etc.) ditione dignis summis, etc.

c The assemblies of Charlemagne were political, as well as ecclesiastical meetings. (See Deuten, p. 80.) that sat and voted at Frankfort must not only be understood, but the active members of the church, as well as the others. (See Decretals, p. 80.)

d Qui supra sanctissimae patris uterque (epitome and excurses) are saved excommunication and depositions, imaginum quelques contempstas, aliquot emendationes, and adnotationes imaginum. (see in canon, i, 39.)

e A poiklos must be hard-hearted indeed, who does not pay the services of Baranes, Fagi, Alexandre, Mansel, etc. to clothe this unlucky sentence.
sacred patrimony, the ruin of the Lombards, and the friendship of Charlemagne, were the trophies of his fame: he secretly edified the throne of his successors, and displayed in a narrow space the virtues of a great prince. His memory was revered; but in the next election, a priest of the Lateran, Leo the third, was preferred to the emperor and the favourite of Adrian, whom he had promoted to the first dignities of the church. Their acquisitiveness or repentance disguised, above four years, the blackest intention of revenge, till the day of a procession, when a furious band of conspirators dispersed the unarmed multitude, and assaulted this revival of the sacred person of the pope. But their enterprise on his life or liberty was disappoytured, perhaps by their own confusion and remorse. Leo was left for dead on the ground; on his revival from the swoon, the effect of his loss of blood, he recovered his speech and sight; and this natural event was improved to the miraculous restoration of his eyes and tongue, of which he had been deprived, twice deprived, by the knife of the assassins. 7 From his prison he escaped to the Vatican; the duc de Spoleto hastened to his rescue, Charlemagne sympathized with the sinners, and in his assent to the title of Paderborn, or Westphalia accepted, or solicited, a visit from the Roman pontiff. Leo repassed the Alps with a commission of counts and bishops, the guards of his safety and the judges of his innocence; and it was not without difficulty that the Saxons delayed till the ensuing year the personal discharge of this pious office.
In his fourth and last pilgrimage, he was received at Rome with the due honours of king and patron: Leo was permitted to purge himself by oath of the crimes imputed to his charge; his enemies were silenced, and the sacrilegious attempt against his life was punished by the mild and insufficient penalty of exile. 8 On the festival of Christmas, the last year of the eighth century, Charlemagne appeared in the church of St. Peter; and, to gratify the vanity of Rome, he had exchanged the simple dress of his country for the habit of a patriarch. 9 After the celebration of the holy mysteries, Leo suddenly placed a precious crown on his head, 10 and the dome resounded with the acclamations of the people, ' Long life and victory to Charles, the most pious Augustus, crowned by God the true King of the Franks. ' The head and body of Charlemagne were consecrated by the royal unction; after the example of the Caesars, he was saluted or adored by the pontiff; his coronation oath represents a promise to maintain the faith and privileges of the church; and the first fruits were paid in the same terms to the shrine of the apostle, in his familiar conversation, the emperor protested his ignorance of the intentions of Leo, which he would have disappointed by his absence on that memorable day. But the preparations of the ceremony must have disclosed the secret; and the journey of Charlemagne reveals his knowledge and expectation: he had acknowledged that the imperial title was the object of his ambition, and a Roman synod had pronounced, that it was the only adequate reward of his merit and service. 6

6 The assurance of Anastasius (tom. iii. pars i. p. 157, 158) is supported by the credibility of some French annalists, but Einhard, and other writers of the same age, are more moral and sincere. "Unus et omnis papa illum esset," says John the deacon of Noyon, (C. Echevin. Nap. in Script. Manetii, tom. ii. p. 314.) Thedobald, a contemporary bishop of Orleans, observes with prudence, (C. ii. can. 5.)

Reddita sunt mirerae: mirerae adsorbe nequeas.

7 Twice, at the request of Hrothad and Leo, he appeared at Rome —longs tunicis et chlamydeis armato, et calcibusque quoeque Romae incolisse —Einhard (c. xvi. p. 127, 128) describes him. In Sumner, the simplicity of his dress, as popular in the nation, the writer is free to return to Frankish habits. His8 Padraic, who was returned to France; his patriotic dared at the apostle. (Gaillard, Vie de Charlemagne, tom. ii. p. 213.)

8 Anastasius, (c. 120.) and Einhard, (c. xxviii. p. 121—123.)

9 The murder of the deacon of Noyon, (C. 239.) the oath by Saint Stephen, (A. 240.) and the Gallican discipline, are the modern principles, of the Annalists Bertiniani, (Script. Manetii tom. ii. pars ii. p. 305.)

10 This great event of the translation or restoration of the empire.

The appellation of great has been often bestowed, and sometimes deserved. One of the achievements of Charlemagne was the only prince in Italy whose favour the title has been indisputably blended with the name. That name, with the addition of sainl, is inserted in the Roman calendar; and the saint, by a rare fertility, is crowned with a shower of the praises of the historians and philosophers of an enlightened age. 6 His real merit is doubtless enhanced by the barbarism of the nation and the times from which he emerged: but the apparent magnitude of an object is likewise enlarged by an unequal comparison; and in the view of posterity, the monarchy is elevated from the nakedness of the surrounding desert. Without injustice to his fame, I may discern some blemishes in the sanctity and generosity of the restorer of the western empire. Of his moral virtues, chastity is not the most prominent; but the public happiness, not being materially injured by his nine wives or concubines, the various indulgence of meaner or more transient amours, the multitude of his bastards whom he bestowed on the church, and the long celibacy and licentious manners of his daughters, 7 whom the father of his eldest son was the duch de Bourgogne, the Duc de Paderborn, whose enterprise for the Saxons was destined shall be scarcely permitted to accuse the ambition of a conqueror; but in a day of equal retribution, the sons of his brother Carolman, the Merovingian princes of Aquitaine, and the four thousand five hundred Saxons who were slain in the Frankish war, may have something to allude against the justice and humanity of Charlemagne. His treatment of the vanquished Saxons 8 was an abuse of the right of conquest; his laws were not less sanguinary than his arms; and in the discussion of his motives, whatever is subtracted from his glory, must redound to his credit. The patriotic reader is amazed by his incessant activity of mind and body; and his subjects and enemies were not less astonished at his sudden presence, at the moment when they believed him at the most distant extremity of the empire; neither peace nor war, nor summer nor winter, were a season of repose; but the prosperity which they readily recoiled the annals of his reign with the geography of his expeditions. But this activity was a national, rather than a personal, virtue; the vigorous life of a Frank was spent in the chase, in pilgrimage, or in military adventure; the domestic offices of the church and the state were left to his successors, and Charlemagne were distinguished only by a more numerous train and a more important purpose. His military renown must be tried by the sincerity of his troops, his enemies, and his actions. Alexander conquered with the arms of Philip, but the two heroes who preceded Charlemagne, bequeathed him their name, their examples, and their labours.

6 The vision of Welin, composed by a monk, eleven years after the death of Charlemagne, shows him in purgatory, with a vulture, who is perpetually gnawing the cubic number, while the rest of his body, the emblem of his virtues, is sound and perfect. (See Gaillard, Hist. de Charlemagne, tom. ii. p. 343.)

7 The marriage of Einhard with Emma, daughter of Charlemagne, is, in my opinion, sufficiently refuted by the problem and epistulae that seem to have been written about the year 1185 (p. 188—189.) In this latter, the husband adduces the original monuments of the reign of Pepin and Charlemagne, in the 5th volume of the Historians of Paris.

8 Besides the massacres and transcriptions, the pain of death was not uncommon; and that the following comes: 1. The refusal of baptism. 2. The false pretense of baptism. 3. A failure to receive holy orders. 4. The murder of a priest or bishop. 5. Human sacrifices. 6. The murder of men in war. In the next reign, the pillage of the church, the neo-tradition. (Gaillard, Hist. de Charlemagne, tom. ii. p. 341—347.) The Christian Saxons became the friends and equals of the Franks. (Strabo, Corpus Iuris. Germanice, p. 133.)
and the companions of their victories. At the head of his veteran and superior armies, he oppressed the savage or degenerate nations, who were incapable of confederating for their common safety; nor did he ever encounter the civil constitutions; but, and might bhold, with envy, the Saracen trophies of his grandfather. After his Spanish expedition, his rear-guard was drowned in the Pyreninne mountains; and the soldiers, whose situation was irreversible, and whose valor was useless, might accuse, with their last breath, the want of skill or caution of their general. 2 I touch with reverence the laws of Charlemagne, so highly applauded by a respectable judge. They compose not a system, but a series, of occasional and minute edicts, for the correction of abuses, the reformation of manners, the economy of his farms, the care of his poultry, and even the sale of his eggs. He wished to improve the laws and the character of the Franks; and his attempts, however good and imperfect, are deserving of praise: the inerterate evils of the times were suspended or modified by his government; 2 but in his institutions I can seldom discover the general views and the immortal spirit of a legislator, who survives himself for the benefit of posterity. The union and stability of his empire depended upon the peace and quiet; he prohibited the dangerous practice of dividing his kingdoms among his sons; and, after his numerous diets, the whole constitution was left to fluctuate between the disorders of anarchy and despotism. His esteem for the pietist and knowledge of the clergy tempted him intrans to tyrannize order with temporal dominion in his jurisdiction; and his son Lewis, when he was stripped and degraded by the bishops, might accuse, in some measure, the imprecision of his father. His laws enforced the imposition of tithes, because the demons had proclaimed in the air that the default of payment had been the cause of the last scarcity. The literary merits of Charlemagne are attested by the foundation of schools, the introduction of the arts, the works which were published in his name, and his familiar connexion with the subjects and strangers whom he invited to his court to educate both the prince and people. He could not always judge well of the provincials, if he spoke Latin, and understood Greek, he derived the rudiments of knowledge from conversation, rather than from books; and, in his mature age, the emperor strove to acquire the practice of writing, which every peasant now learns in his infancy. 3 The grammar and logick, the music and astronomy, of the times, were only cultivated as the handmaids of superstition; but the curiosity of the human mind must ultimately tend to its improvement, and the encouragement of learning reflects the purest and most pleasing lustre on the character of Charlemagne. The dignity of his person, 2 the length of his reign, the prosperity of his arms, the vigour of his government, and the reverence of distant nations, distinguished him from the royal crowd; and Europe dates a new arm from his restoration of the western empire.

THAT empire, which the glory of its Extent of its em- title: 2 and some of the fairest kingdoms in France, of Europe were the patrimony or conquest of a prince, who reigned at the same time in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Hungary. 1. The Roman province of Gaul had been transformed into the name and monarch of Gaillard, in the decay of the Merovingian law, its limits were contracted by the independence of the Britons and the revolt of Aquitaine. Charlemagne pursued, and confounded, the Britons on the shores of the ocean; and that ferocious tribe, whose origin and language are so different from the French, was chastised by the imposition of tribute, hostages, and peace. After a long and evasive contest, the rebellion of the dukes of Aquitaine was punished by the forfeiture of their province, their liberty, and their lives. Harsh and rigorous would have been such treatment of ambitious governors, who had too faithfully copied the example of their parent; a recent discernment has proved that these unhappy princes were the last and lawful heirs of the blood and sceptre of Clovis, a younger branch, from the brother of Dagobert, of the Merovingian house. Their ancient kingdom was reduced to the duchy of Gascony, to the counties of Aquitaine, and to the fourth of Gironde, at the first shock of the invincibility; and their race was propagated till the beginning of the sixteenth century; and, after surviving their Carlistian tyrants, they were desired to feel the injustice, or the favours, of a third dynasty. By the union of Aquitaine, France was enlarged to its present boundaries, with the addition of Dauphiné. Amaury, the natural vassals, an Arabian emir of Saragossa, protected his protection in the diet of Paderborn. Charlemagne undertook the expedition, restored the emir, and, without distinction of faith, impartially crushed the resistance of the Christians, and rewarded the obedience and service of the Muslims. In his 3 Syntaxis march, 5 which extended from the Pyrenees to the river Ebro: Barcelona was the residence of the French governor: he possessed the counties of Roussillon and Catalonia; and the infant kingdoms of Navarre and Aragon were subject to his jurisdiction. III. As king of the Lombards, and patriarque of Rome, he reigned over the greatest part of Italy.
of Italy, a tract of a thousand miles from the Alps to the borders of Calabria. The duchy of Beneventum, a Lombard fief, had spread, at the expense of the Greeks, over the modern kingdom of Naples. But Aosta, the reigning principality of the colony, would be inclined to the slavery of his country; assumed the independent title of prince; and opposed his sword to the Carlovingian monarchy. His defence was firm, his submission was not inglorious, and the emperor was content with this. St. Gall, in his denunciation and the acknowledgment, on his coins, of a supreme lord. The arfital flattery of his son Grimold added the appellation of father, but he asserted his dignity with prudence, and Beneventum insensibly escaped Germany, the first who united Germany under the same sceptre. The name of Oriental France is preserved in the circle of Francia; and the people of Hesse and Thuringia were recently incorporated with the victors, by the conformity of religion and government. The Alemanni, so formidable to the Romans, were the faithful vassals and confederates of the Franks; and their country was inscribed within the modern limits of Hesse, Swabia, and Switzerland. The Bavarians, with a similar indulgence of their laws and manners, were less patient of a master: the repeated treasons of Tassilo justified the abolition of their existence; and their history was somewhat among the counts, who judged and guarded that important frontier. But the north of Germany, from the Rhine and beyond the Elbe, was still hostile and pagan; nor was it till after a war of thirty-three years that Saxony, covered under the yoke of Christ and of Charlemagne. The Saxon dukes and their vassals were extirpated: the foundation of eight bishoprics, of Munster, Osparburgh, Paderborn, and Minden, of Bremen, Verden, Hildesheim, and Halberstadt, define, on either side of the Weser, the bounds of ancient Saxony: these episcopal seats were the first schools and centres of that savage land; and the religion and humanity of the children awoke, in some degree, for the massacre of the parents. Beyond the Elbe, the Sclavii, or Slavonians, of similar manners and various denominations, overspread the modern dominions of Prussia, Poland, and Lithuania, and a few transplants have tempted the French historian to extend the empire to the Baltic and the Vistula. The conquest or conversion of those countries is of a more recent age; but the first union of Bohemia with the Germanic body was lavishly inscribed to the arms of Charles of Hungary, or Huns of Pannonia, the same calamities which they had inflicted on the nations. Their rings, the wooden fortifications which encircled their districts and vilages, were broken down by the triple effort of a French army, that was poured into their country by land and water, through the Carpathian mountains and along the plain of the Danube. After a bloody conflict of eight years, the loss of some French generals was avenged by the slaughter of the most noble Huns; the chief subordinates and royal residents of the chagan was left desolate and unknown; and the treasures, the rapine of two hundred and fifty years, enriched the victorious troops, or decorated the churches of Italy and Gaul. After the reduction of Pannonia, the empire of Charlemagne was bounded only by the conflux of the Danube with the Tisey and the Save; the provinces of Istria, Lurania, and Dalmatia, were an easy, though unprofitable, accession; and it was an effect of his moderation, that he left the mar-inious cities under the real or nominal sovereignty of the Greeks. But these distant possessions added more to the reputation, than to the power, of the Latin emperor: nor did he risk any ecclesiastical foundations to reclaim the barbarians from their vagrant life and habits. His invincibility was now the reliance between the rivers, the Saone and the Meuse, the Rhine and the Danube, were fairly attempted. Their execution would have vindi fied the empire; and more cost and labour were often wasted in the structure of a castle than could have been done in the construction of a small town. If we retrace the outlines of this geographical picture, it will be seen that the empire of the Franks extended, between east and west, from the Ebro to the Elbe or Vistula; between the north and south, from the duchy of Beneventum to the river Eyder, the perpetual boundary of Germany and Denmark. The personal and political importance of Charlemagne was magnified by the distress and division of the rest of Europe. The islands of Great Britain and Ireland were disputed by a crowd of princes of Saxon or Scottish origin; and, after the loss of Spain, the Christian and Gothic kingdom of Tar the Chaste was confined to the narrow range of the Asturian mountains. These petty sovereigns revered the power or virtue of the Carolingian monarch, impled the honour and support of his alliance, and styling him their common parent, the sole and sutreme hero of the Franks. The French monarch was about to maintain equal intercourse with the caliph Harun al Rashid, whose dominion stretched from Africa to India, and accepted from his ambassadors a tent, a water-clock, an elephant, and the keys of the holy sepulchre. It is not easy to conceive the private friendship of a Frank and an Arab, who were divided in language, persson, and language; but their public correspondence was founded on vanity, and their remote situation left no room for a competition of interest. Two-thirds of the western empire of Rome were subject to Charlemagne, and the fruit of his activity was simply supplied by his command of the inaccessible or invinable nations of Germany. But in the choice of his enemies, we may be reasonably surprised that he so often preferred the poverty of the north to the riches of the south. The three and thirty campaigns labor-ous, as the enemies of Charlemagne. V. He retained, as the heirs of Charles

His neighbours

l. Schmidt, Hist. des Allemands, tom. ii. p. 290. A.

ii. For two of the names alone, see the Verh. des historisch.

museum sechstes fest, s. 1. Twace vaca comi habitationes Pannoniae, et locos in quoque caesi Caroli filiis et successoribus, Academiae Scientiarum Croato-Slavicae, regio, tota in hac bello Hennocum nobilitat perfudit, tota gloriam decretit, annis pecunia et congressi ex longo tempore eternus, disertis erant.

v. See Egbert, c. 14, and Guillaume, tom. ii. p. 316—317, who mention, with great proceeding, the intercourse and correspondence of Charlemagne with the emperor

Egbert, the emperor's gift of his own sword, and the modern answer of his banished son. The anecdot, if genuine, would have ad

2 The junction of the Rhine and Danube was undertaken only for the service of the Pannonian war. (Gaillard, Vie de Charlemagne, tom, ii. p. 212—316.) The casual, which would have been only two leagues in length, and of which some traces are still extant in Swa-hia, was interrupted by excessive rain, military avocations, and superhuman fears. (Charbon, Hist. de l'Academie des Inscrimений civilised society, and to eradicate the seed of future emigrations. But it has been wisely observed, that in a light of precaution, all conquest must be perfectual, unless it could be universal; since the increasing circle must be involved in a larger sphere of hostility. The subjugation of Germany withdrew the veil which had so long concealed the continent or islands of Scandinavia from the knowledge of Europe, and awakened the torpid courage of their barbarous natives. The fiercest of the Saxon Idolaters escaped from the Christian tyrant to their brethren of the north; the ocean and Mediterranean were covered with their pillar-plots; the gates of Pisa were barred against the destructive progress of the Normans, who, in less than seventy years, precipitated the fall of his race and monarchy.

Had the pope and the Romans revived upon the primitive constitution, the titles of invidiam. The and his Constantinople, the had insertion. and his successors, on each vacancy, must have ascended the throne by a formal or tacit election. But the association of his son Lewis the Pious asserts the independent right of monarchy and conquest, and the emperor seems on this occasion to have foreseen and prevented the latent claims of the clergy. The royal youth was commanded to take the crown from the altar, and with his own hands to place it on his head, as a gift which he held from God, his father, and the nation. The same ceremony was repeated, though with less energy, in the subsequent associations of Lothaire and Louis the Pious, with their power and dominions. The A. D. 813. Lewis survived his brothers, and embraced the whole empire of Charlemagne; but the nations and the nobles, his bishops and his children, quickly discerned that this mighty mass was no longer invested by the hand of God, and the foundations of the empire were undermined to the centre, while the external surface was yet fair and entire. After a war, or battle, which consumed one hundred thousand Franks, the empire was divided by treaty between his three sons, who had violated every filial and fraternal virtue.

Lothaire I. A. D. 848—855. The kingdom of Lothaire and France were forever separated; the provinces of Gaul, between the Rhone and the Alps, the Meuse and the Rhine, were assigned, with Italy, to the imperial dignity of Lothaire. In the partition of his share, Lorraine and Arles, two recent and transitory kingdoms, were bestowed on the younger children; and Lewis the second, his eldest son, was content with the realm of Italy, the proper and sufficient patrimony of a Roman emperor. On his death without any male issue, the vacant throne was disputed by his uncles and cousins, and the popes most dexterously seized the occasion of judging the claims and merits of the candidates, and of bestowing on the most obsequious, or most liberal, the imperial office of Advocate of the Roman Church. The design of the Carolingian race no longer exhibited any symptoms of virtue or power, and the ridiculous epitaph of the held, the soundest, the fondest father, and where ingenuity distinguished the same uniform and characteristic features of a crowd of kings alike deserving of oblivion. By the failure of the collateral branches, the whole inheritance devolved on Charles the Fat, the last emperor of his family; his insanity authorized the dejection of Germany, Italy, and France; he was deposed in a diet, and solicited his bready from the rebels by whose contempt his life and liberty had been spared. According to the measure of their force, the governors, the bishops, and the lords, usurped the fragments of the falling empire; and some preference was shown to the female or illegitimate blood of Charlemagne. Of the greater part, the title and the possession were alike doubtful, and the merit was adequate to the contracted scale of their dominions. Those who could appear with an army to the gates of Rome, were consequently acknowledged by the Vatican; but their modesty was more frequently satisfied with the appellation of kings of Italy; and the whole term of seventy-four years may be deemed a vacancy, from the abdication of Charles the Fat to the establishment of Otho the first.

Otho was elected king of Germany, with the sanction of the dukes of Saxony; and if he truly descended from Witikind, the adversary and proselyte of Charlemagne, the posterity of a vanquished people was exalted to reign over their conquerors. His father Henry the Fowler was elected, by the suffrage of the nation, to save and institute the kingdom of Germany. His insignia were enlarged on every side by his son, the first and greatest of the Othis. A portion of Gaul to the west of the Rhine, along the banks of the Meuse and the Moselle, was assigned to the Germans, by whose blood and language it has been tinged since the time of Caesar. Between the Palatinate of the Rhine, and the Alps, the successors of Otho acquired a vain supremacy over the broken kingdoms of Burgundy and Arles.

In the north, Christianity was propagated by the sword of Otho, the conqueror and apostle of the Slavonic nations of the Elbe and Oder; the marches of Brandenburg and Silesia were fortified with German colonies; and the king of Denmark, the dukes of Poland and Bohemia, confessed themselves his tributary vassals. At the head of a victorious army, he passed the Alps, subdued the kingdom of Italy, delivered the pope, and for ever fixed the imperial crown in the name and nation of Germany. From that memorable era, two maxims of public jurisprudence were introduced by force and ratified by time. 1. That the prince, who was elected in the German diet, acquired, from that instant, the subject kingdoms of Italy and Rome. But prudent statesmen might not legally assume the titles of emperor and Augustus, till he had received the crown from the hands of the Roman pontiff.

The imperial dignity of Charlemagne, as was announced to the east by the altar, the western and the southern emperors, was not properly a crown nor a diadem. Of his fathers, the Greek emperors, he presumed to adopt the more equal and familiar appellation of brother. Perhaps in his connexion with Irene he aspired to the name of husband; his embassy to Constantinople spoke the language of peace and friendship, and might conceal a treaty of marriage with that ambitious princess, who had renounced the most sacred duties of a mother. The nature, the duration, the probable consequences of such an union between two distant and dissolom empires, it is impossible to conjecture; but the unanimous silence of the Latins may teach us to suspect, that the report was invented by the enemies of Otho king of Germany, the emperors and aspirants to the western empire, A. D. 962.

1 He was the son of Otho, the son of Lodolph, in whose favour the emperor the ignotus, Otho, the son of Laudemont, the son of the emperor Constantine, and the son of the emperor Charlemagne. The biographer of St. Bruno, (Biblioth. Bavariensis catalog. tom. iii. p. 579) gives a splendid character of his family. Auchterlach stans ad hominum memoriam cones nobilissimis; pullus in corum stippe ignotum, nullus decenter facie repertur. (Apud Struven, Corp. Hist. German. p. 215.) Yet Gundulf! (in Henrici Anzaci) is not satisfied of his descent from Witikind.

2 See the treatise of Corningius: (De Finibus Imperii Germanici, Francorum, 1634. in 4to.) he rejects the extravagant and improper scale of the Roman and Carolingian empires, and discusses with moderation the real and probable extent of the Roman empire.

3 The power of constant force may to number Conrad I, and Henry the Fowler, in a period of empire over which was never assumed by those kings of Germany. The Italians, Muratori for instance, are more scrupulous and correct, and only reckon the princes who have been crowned with the sceptre.

4 Invidiam tamen succedit Homer, (C. P. Imperatorius super hoc ignotum, ipsam sequentem, in monachis, nomen remanens, quod ... mittere ad eos curas lerantenes, et in epistolis fratres cos appellantes. Eguhard, c. 25. p. 124.) Perhaps it was on their account, like Augustus, he affected some reluctance to receive the empire.
of Irene, to charge her with the guilt of betraying the church and state to the strangers of the west. The French ambassadors were the spectacles, and had nearly been the victims, of the conspiracy of Nicephorus, and the national hatred. Constantinople was evacuated, and the imperial palace of another Rome: a proverb, "That the Franks were good friends and had neighbours," was in every one's mouth; but it was dangerous to provoke a neighbour who might be tempted to irritate, in the church of St. Sophia, the vanity of his imperial coronation. After a tedious journey of circuit and delay, the ambassadors of Nicephorus found him in his camp, on the banks of the river Sa/na; and Charlemagne affected to confound their vanity by displaying, in a Francoven village, the pomp, or at least the pride, of the Byzantine palace. The Greeks were successively led through four halls of audience: in the first they were ready to fall prostrate before a splendid personage in a chair of state, till he informed them that he was only a servant, the constable, or master of the horse, of the emperor. The same mistake, and the same manner, were repeated in the apartments of the coast palace, then in the temple, and in the chamberlain; and their impatience was gradually heightened, till the doors of the presence-chamber were thrown open, and they beheld the genuine monarch, on his throne, enriched with the foreign luxury which Charlemagne had accumulated, and sheathed with the reverence of his victorious chiefs. A treaty of peace and alliance was concluded between the two empires, and the limits of the east and west were defined by the right of present possession. But the Greeks soon forgot this humiliating cession, and remembered it only to hate the barbarians by whom it was extorted. During the short union of virtue and power, they respectfully saluted the august Charlemagne with the acclamations of basileus, and emperor of the Romans. As soon as these qualities were separated in the person of his pious son, the Byzantine letters were inscribed, "To the king, or, as he styles himself, the emperor, of the Franks and Lombards." When both power and virtue were extinct, they despised Lewis the second of his hereditary title, and with the barbarous appellation of rex or regis, degraded him among the crowd of Latin princes. His reply is expressive of his weakness: he proves, with some learning, that both in sacred and profane history, the name of king is synonymous with the Greek word basilisk; if, at Constantinople, it were assumed in a more exclusive use, he claims the ancestors, from the first pope, a just participation of the honours of the Roman purple. The same controversy was revived in the reign of the Othos; and their ambassador describes, in lively colours, the insidious of the Byzantine court. The Greeks affected to despise the poverty and ignorance of the Franks and Saxons; and in their last decline refused to prostitute to the kings of Germany the title of Roman emperors.

1 Theophanes speaks of the conquest and sacking of Charlo, Kephalaia, (Chronograph, p. 505), and of his treaty of marriage with Irene, (p. 482) which is unknown to the Latins. Guiliard relates his rank as a pagan, (Gulielmi chronicae, Greek chaps. p. 466—468.)

2 Guiliard very properly observes, that this passage was a base infraction of the sacred representation, tom. ii. p. 631; but it is in the presence, and for the benefit, of children of a larger growth.

3 Compare, in the original texts collected by Paris, tom. iii. A.D. 812, No. 7, A.D. 924, No. 10., the contrast of Charlemagne and his son to the former the ambassador of Michael (who were indeed different men) in his letter to the emperor, and their respective reception in the palatine and exarch's apartments; to the latter, Facio imperatori Burgundorum, &c., &c.

4 See the epitope, in Paralipomena, of the anonymous writer of Salerno, (Eccles. Lat. tom. ii. par. ii. p. 234—235, c. 83—107.) when Baronius (lectiones et annales, ii. p. 479) transcribed it in his Annals.

5 See the epitope, in Paralipomena, of the anonymous writer of Salerno, (Eccles. Lat. tom. ii. par. ii. p. 234—235, c. 83—107.) when Baronius (lectiones et annales, ii. p. 479) transcribed it in his Annals.

6 These emperors, in the election of the popes, continued to exercise the powers in the election of the popes, which had been assumed by the Gothic and Grecian princes; and the importance A.D. 899—1000, of this prerogative increased with the temporal estates and spiritual influence of ecclesiastic power. In the christian aristocracy, the principal members of the clergy still formed a sect to assist the administration, and to supply the vacancy, of the bishop. Rome was divided into twenty-eight parishes, and each parish was governed by a cardinal-priest, or presbyter, a title which, however common and modest in its origin, has aspired to emulate the purple of kings. Their number was enlarged by the association of the seven deacons of the most considerable hospitals, the seven palantine judges of the Lateran, and some dignitaries of the church. The ecclesiastical senate was directed by the seven cardinal-bishops of the Roman province, who were less occupied in the subduing dioceses of Ostia, Porto, Velitrs, Tusculum, Pranceis, Tibur, and the Sabines, than by their weekly service in the Lateran, and their superior share in the honours and dignities of the Roman empire. After the death of the pope, these bishops recommended a successor to the suffrage of the college of cardinals, and their choice was ratified or rejected by the applause or clamour of the Roman people. But the election was opposed to a previous scrutiny among the candidates, that he accepted an oath of fidelity, and confirmed the donations which had successively enriched the pontificate of St. Peter. In the frequent schisms, the rival claims were submitted to the sentence of the emperor; and in a synod of bishops he presumed to judge, to condemn, and to punish, the crimes of a guilty pontiff. Otho the first imposed a treaty on the senate and people, who engaged to prefer the candidate most acceptable to his majesty: his successors anticipated or prevented their choice: they bestowed the Roman benefice, like the bishoprics of Cologne or Bamberg, on the challengers of the office; and even would he be the merit of a Frank or Sax, his name sufficiently attests the interposition of foreign power. These acts of prerogative were most splendidly excused by the views of a popular election. The competitor was to have the reputation, and even the ancestors, from the first pope, a just participation of the honours of the Roman purple. The same controversy was revived in the reign of the Othos; and their ambassador describes, in lively colours, the insidious of the Byzantine court. The Greeks affected to despise the poverty and ignorance of the Franks and Saxons; and in their last decline refused to prostitute to the kings of Germany the title of Roman emperors.

1 The origin and progress of the title of cardinal may be found in Thomas, (Antiquitates Ital. et Germ. tom. i. p. 502—503) and in later and sacred history, (Anastasius, Italic. Med. s. viii. tom. vi. p. 130—132.)

3 In ancient times, the Roman elections were not only tumultuous, but even bloody. It is said that historical writers, either having perished, or having been lost, the selection of Odoth and fled to Lyons (Unius, p. 546), The important circumstances confirm the decree of the clergy and people of Rome as fiercely rejected by Baronius, (lectiones et annales, i. p. 121—122.) and explained by St. Marc, (Abguino, tom. i. p. 806—916, tom. iv. p. 415—417.) It is evident that historical writers, whether having perished, or having been lost, the selection of Odoth and fled to Lyons.
fluence of two sister prostitutes, Marozia and Theodora, was founded on their wealth and beauty, their political and amorous intrigues; the most strenuous of their lovers were rewarded with the Roman minre, and their reigns may have suggested to the darker ages the fabric of a female pope. The bastard son, the grand-son, and the great-grandson, of Marozia, a rare genealogy, were seated in the chair of St. Peter, and it was at the age of nineteen years that the second of these became the head of the Latin church. His youth and manhood were of a suitable complexion; and the names of arms of arms borne by them, at the charges that were urged against him in a Roman synod, and in the presence of Otho the Great. As John XII. had renounced the dress and the decencies of his profession, the soldier may not perhaps be dis honoured by the wine which he drank, the blood that he spilled, the flames that he kindled, the licentious pursuits of gaming and hunting. His open simony might be the consequence of distress; and his blasphemous invocation of Jupiter and Venus, if it be true, could not possibly be serious. But we read with some surprise that the worthy grandson of Marozia lived in pure and unblemished virtue, the Higgins neglected of the Lateran palace was turned into a school for prostitution, and that his rapes of virgins and widows had deterred the female pilgrims from visiting the tomb of St. Peter, lest, in the devout act, they should be violated by his successors. The popes had great pleasure on these characters of antichrist; but to a philosophic eye, the views of the clergy are far less dangerous than their virtues. After a long series of scandal, the apostolic see was rent and exalted by the austerities and zeal of Gregory. He had devoted his life to the execution of two projects. I. To fix in the college of cardinals the freedom and independence of election; and for ever to abolish the right or usurpation of the emperors and the Roman people. II. To bestow and resume the temporal power, the possession of which he made a decided extension over the kings and kingdoms of the earth. After a contest of fifty years, the first of these designs was accomplished by the firm support of the ecclesiastical order, whose liberty was connected with that of their chief. But the second attempt, though it was crowned with some partial and apparent success, has been vigorously resisted by the secular power, and finally extinguished by the improvement of human reason.

In the revival of the empire of Rome, the ecclesiastics, who possessed the temporal power in the name of the people, seem to have been the only parties who could maintain the union of the two; and the Roman church was the only party who could have been the patron and defender of the empire, if the union had been attempted.

* * *

> The reign of John IX. was distinguished by the union of the imperial and pontifical crowns, and the union of the Roman empire, and the Papal throne.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crowns that the church was restored to its ancient state.

The union of the two crowns was a great improvement on the condition of the church. It was by the union of the two crown
whipped through the city, and cast into a dungeon; thirteen of the most guilty were hanged, others were imprisoned or expelled; and this was a process which was justified by the ancient laws of Theodosius and Justinian. The voice of fame has accused the second Otho of a perfidious and bloody act, the massacre of the senators, whom he had invited to his table under the fair semblance of hospitality and friendship. In the minority of his son Otho the third, Rome made a bold attempt to shake off the Saxon yoke, and the consul Crescentius was the Brutes of the republic. From the condition of a subject and an exile, he twice rose to the command of the armies, and, oppressed, expelled, and created the pCOPE, and formed a conspiracy for restoring the authority of the Greek emperors. In the fortress of St. Angelo, he maintained an obstinate siege, till the unfortunate consul was betrayed by a promise of safety: his body was suspended on a gibbet, and his head was exposed on the battlements of the castle. By a reverse of fortune, Otho, after separating his troops, was besieged three days, without food, in his palace; and a disgraceful escape saved him from the justice or fury of the Romans. The senetor Pobeny was the leader of the people, and the widow of Crescentius chief mourner for the future husband, by a poison which she administered to her imperial lover. It was the design of Otho the third to abandon the ruder countries of the north, to erect his throne in Italy, and to revive the institutions of the empire. But his successors only more in their lives appeared on the banks of the Tiber, to receive their crown in the Vatican. Their absence was contemptible, their presence odious and formidable. They descended from the Alps, at the head of their barbarians, who were strangers and enemies to the people; the traditions of the past were swept away in tumult and bloodshed. A faint reminiscence of their ancestors still tormented the Romans; and they held with pious indignation the succession of Saxons, Franks, Swabians, and Bohemians, who usurped the purple and prerogatives of the Caesars.

The Kingdom of Italy.

A.D. 774—1260.

To nature and reason than to hold in obedience remote countries and foreign nations, in opposition to their inclination and interest. A torrent of barbarians may pass over the earth, but an interest may be found in a system of policy and oppression: in the centre, an absolute power, prompt in action, and rich in resources: a swift and easy communication with the extreme parts: fortifications to check the first effect of rebellion: a regular administration to protect and punish; and a well-disciplined army to inspire fear, without provoking discontent and despair. Far different was the situation of the German Caesars, who were ambitious to enslave the kingdom of Italy. Their patrimonial estates were stretched along the Rhine, or scattered in the provinces; but this ample domain was allotted by the imprudence or distress of successive princes; and their revenue, from minute and vexatious prerogative, was scarcely sufficient for the maintenance of their household. Their troops were formed by the legal or voluntary service of their feudal vassals, who passed the Alps with reluctance, assumed the license of rapine and disorder, and capriciously deserted before the end of the campaign. Whole armies were swept away or dispersed (This influence of the climate: the survivors brought back the bones of their princes and nobles, and the effects of their own impenitence were often imputed to the treachery and malice of the Italians, who rejoiced at least in the calamities of the barbarians. This irregular tyranny might conceivably, in equal terms with the petty tyranny of Italy; nor can the people, or the reader, be much interested in the event of the quarrel. But in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the Lombards rekindled the flame of industry and freedom; and the general characteristics and examples of their power are strongly briefed in the republics of Turin. In the Italian cities, music and poetry, art and literature, had never been totally abolished; and their first privileges were granted by the favour and policy of the emperors, who were desirous of erecting a plebeian barrier against the independence of the nobles. But their rapid progress, the rapid extension of their power and pretensions, were founded on the numbers and spirit of these rising communities. Each city filled the measure of its diocese or district; the jurisdiction of the counts and bishops, of the marquises and counts, was banished from the land; and the proudest title of the very largest monarchs was their submission to the sway of the Lombards—vassalage, and commons, into which the republic was divided. Under the protection of equal law, the labours of agriculture and commerce, were gradually revived; but the martial spirit of the Lombards was nourished by the presence of danger; and as often as the bell was rung, or the standard erected, the gates of the city poured forth a numerous and intrepid band, whose zeal in their own cause was soon guided by the use and discipline of arms. At the foot of these popular ramparts, the pride of the Caesars was overthrown; and the invincible genius of liberty prevailed over the two Frederic, the greatest princes of the middle age: the first, superior perhaps in military prowess; the second, who undoubtedly excelled in the softer accomplishments of peace and learning.

Ambitious of restoring the splendour of Froreder the first, of extending the sway of the Saxon emperors, the republics of Lombardy, with the arts of a statesman, the value of a soldier, and the cruelty of a tyrant. The recent discovery of the Pandects had renewed a science most favourably to despotion; and his own advocates proclaimed the emperor the absolute master of the lives and properties of his subjects. His royal prerogatives, in a less odious sense, were acknowledged in the diet of Roncaglia; and the revenue of Italy was fixed at thirty thousand pounds of silver, which were multiplied to an infinite degree by the benevolence of the fiscal officers. The suburban cities were reduced by the terror or the force of his arms: his captives were delivered to the executioner, or shot from his military engines; and, after the siege and surrender of Milan, the buildings of that state capital were razed to the ground, three hundred hostages were sent into Germany, and the inhabitants were dispersed in four villages, under the yoke of the inflexible conqueror.1 But Milan soon rose from her ashes; and the league of Lombardy was cemented by distress: their cause was espoused by Venice, pope Alexander the third, and the Greek emperor Manuel, who, in the treaty of Constance, Frederick subscribed, with some reservations, the freedom of four and twenty cities.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

191

Frederic the second, A.D. 1250.

His grandson contended with their vigour and maturity: but Frederic the second was finally opposed by the arms of the Lombards and the thrones of the popes, who, like the ancients, possessed bodies of men, armed by a spirit which scorned the servile jurisprudence of the new or the ancient Rome. It would have been a vain and a dangerous attempt to impose a monarch on the armed freemen, who were impatient of a magistrate; on the bold, who refused to obey; on the powerful, who aspired to command. The empire of Charlemagne and Otho was distributed among the dukes of the nations or provinces, the counts of the smaller districts, and the margraves of the marches or frontiers, who all united the civil and military authority as it had been delegated to the lieutenants of the first Carolingian. The counts were soldiers of fortune, reduced their mercenary legions, assumed the imperial purple, and either failed or succeeded in their revolt, without wounding the power and unity of government. If the dukes, margraves, and counts, of Germany, were less audacious in their claims, the consequences of their success were more lasting and pernicious to the state. Instead of aiming at the supreme rank, they silently laboured to establish and appropriate their provincial independence. Their ambition was seconded by the weight of their estates and vassals, their mutual example and example of the popes. The nobility, the change of princes and families, the minority of Otho the third and Henry the fourth, the ambition of the popes, and the vain pursuit of the fugitive crowns of Italy and Rome. All the attributes of regal and territorial jurisdiction were gradually usurped by the command of the popes, the mitigating influence of concord and war, of life and death, of coinage and taxation, of foreign alliance and domestic economy. Whatever had been seized by violence, was ratified by favour or distress, was granted as the price of a doubtfull vote or a voluntary service; whatever had been granted to one, could not, without injury, be denied to his successor or equal; and every act of local or temporary possession was insensibly moulded into the constitution of the Germanic kingdom. In every province, the visible presence of the duke or count was interposed between the throne and the nobles; the obstacles of the law became the vassals of a private chief; and the standard, which he received from his sovereign, was often raised against him in the field. The temporal power of the clergy was cherished and exalted by the superstition or policy of the Carlowitzing and Saxon dynasies; who, on the recommendation and fidelity; and the bishops of Germany were made equal in extent and privilege, superior in wealth and population, to the most ample states of the military order. As long as the emperors retained the prerogative of bestowing on every vacancy these ecclesiastical and secular benefices, their cause was maintained by the gratitude or ambition of their friends and favourites. But in the quarrel of the investitures, they were deprived of their influence over the episcopal chapters; the freedom of election was restored, and the sovereign was reduced, by a solemn mockery, to his first prelates. The idea of a despot, once in his realm, was at all events bound in each church. The secular governors, instead of being recalled at the will of a superior, could be degraded only by the sentence of their peers. In the first age of the monarchy, the appointment of the son to the ducy or county of his father, was solicited as a favour; it was gradually obtained as a custom, and extended as a right: the linear succession was often extended to the collateral or female branches; the states of the empire (their popular, and at length their legal, appellation) were divided and alienated by testament and sale; and all idea of a public trust was lost. The German emperors, who usurped the titles of the Roman emperors, could not even be enriched by the casualities of forfeiture and extinction: within the term of a year, he was obliged to dispose of the vacant seat, and in the choice of the candidate, it was his duty to consult either the general or the provincial diet. After the death of Frederic the second, Germany was left a monster with a hundred heads. A crowd of princes and prelates disputed the ruins of the empire; the lords of innumerable castles were less prone to obey, than to imitate, their superiors; and, according to the measure of their strength, their inheritances received the names of conquest or robbery. Such anarchy was the inevitable consequence of the laws and manners of Europe; and the kingdoms of France and Italy were shattered into fragments by the violence of the same tempest. But the Italian cities and the French vassals were divided and destroyed, while the union of the Germanies has produced, under the name of an empire, a great system of a federative republic. In the frequent and at last the perpetual institution of diets, a national spirit was kept alive, and the powers of a common legislature are still exercised by the three branches of the diet, by the college of electors, princes, and the free and imperial cities of Germany. Seven of the most powerful feudatories were permitted to assume, with a distinguished name and rank, the exclusive privilege of choosing the Roman emperor; and these electors were the kings of Bohemia, the duke of Saxony, the elector of the Palatinate, the count palatine of the Rhine, and the three archbishops of Mentz, of Treves, and of Cologne. II. The college of princes and prelates purged themselves of a promiscuous multitude: they reduced to four representative votes, the long series of independent counts, and electoral princes, the hundred sixty thousand of whom, as in the Polish diets, had appeared on horseback in the field of election. III. The pride of birth and dominion, of the sword and the mitre, wisely adopted the commons as the third branch. of the legislature, and, in the progress of society, they were introduced about the same era into the national assemblies of France, England, and Germany. The Hanseatic league commanded the trade and navigation of the north; the confederates of the Rhine secured the peace and intercourse of the inland country; the influence of the cities has been adequate to their wealth and policy, and their negative still invalidates the acts of the two superior colleges of electors and princes. 1

Weakened and poverty of the German empire.

It is in the fourteenth century that we may view the statesman, the statesman, and contrast of the Roman empire of Germany, which no longer held, except on the borders of the Rhine and Danube, a single province of Trapani or Constantine. Their unworthy successors were the counts of Hapsburgh, of Nassau, of Luxembourgh, and of Schwarzeburgh. The emperor Henry the seventh pre-emured for his son the crown of Bohemia, and his grandson Charles the fourth was born among a people strange and barbarous in the estimation of the Germans themselves. 2 After the execrations of Lewis of Bavaria, the reception of the gift or promise of the vacant empire from the Roman pontiffs, who, in the exile and captivity of Avignon, affected the dominion of the earth. The death of his competitors united the electoral college, and Charles was unanimously saluted king of the Romans, and emperor; a title which in the same epoch was prostituted to the Caesars of Germany and Greece. The German emperor was more than the elective and impotent magistracy of an aristocracy of princes, who had not left him a village that he might call his own. His best prerogative was the right of presiding and proposing in the national senate, which was consoled at his summons; and his native kingdom of Bohemia, less opulent than the adjacent city of Nuremburgh, was the firmest seat of his power and the richest source of his revenue. The army by which he passed the Alps consisted of three hundred horse. In the cathedral of St. Ambroise, Charles was crowned with the iron crown, which tradition ascribed to the Lombard monastery; but he was admitted only with a peacefull train; the gates of the city were shut upon him; and the king of France was a captive by the hands of the Visconti to whom he confirmed in the sovereignty of Milan. In the Vatican he was again crowned with the golden crown of the empire; but, in obedience to a secret treaty, the Roman emperor immediately withdrew, without reproosing a single night within the walls of Rome. 3 Petrarch and Boccaccio revivified the visionary glories of the capital, deplores and upbraids the ignominious flight of the Bohemian: and even his contemporaries could observe, that the sole exercise of his authority was in the lucrative sale of privileges and titles. The gold of Italy secured the election of his son; but such was the shameful poverty of the Roman emperor, that his person was arrested by a butcher in the streets of Worms, and was detained in the public inn, as a pledge or hostage for the payment of his expenses.

For this manly scene, let us,

A.D. 1355.

Contrast of the two Caesars.

It is the fourteenth century that we may view the statesman, the statesman, and contrast of the Roman empire of Germany, which no longer held, except on the borders of the Rhine and Danube, a single province of Trapani or Constantine. Their unworthy successors were the counts of Hapsburgh, of Nassau, of Luxembourgh, and of Schwarzeburgh. The emperor Henry the seventh pre-emured for his son the crown of Bohemia, and his grandson Charles the fourth was born among a people strange and barbarous in the estimation of the Germans themselves. 2 After the execrations of Lewis of Bavaria, the reception of the gift or promise of the vacant empire from the Roman pontiffs, who, in the exile and captivity of Avignon, affected the dominion of the earth. The death of his competitors united the electoral college, and Charles was unanimously saluted king of the Romans, and emperor; a title which in the same epoch was prostituted to the Caesars of Germany and Greece. The German emperor was more than the elective and impotent magistracy of an aristocracy of princes, who had not left him a village that he might call his own. His best prerogative was the right of presiding and proposing in the national senate, which was consoled at his summons; and his native kingdom of Bohemia, less opulent than the adjacent city of Nuremburgh, was the firmest seat of his power and the richest source of his revenue. The army by which he passed the Alps consisted of three hundred horse. In the cathedral of St. Ambroise, Charles was crowned with the iron crown, which tradition ascribed to the Lombard monastery; but he was admitted only with a peacefull train; the gates of the city were shut upon him; and the king of France was a captive by the hands of the Visconti to whom he confirmed in the sovereignty of Milan. In the Vatican he was again crowned with the golden crown of the empire; but, in obedience to a secret treaty, the Roman emperor immediately withdrew, without reproosing a single night within the walls of Rome. 3 Petrarch and Boccaccio revivified the visionary glories of the capital, deplores and upbraids the ignominious flight of the Bohemian: and even his contemporaries could observe, that the sole exercise of his authority was in the lucrative sale of privileges and titles. The gold of Italy secured the election of his son; but such was the shameful poverty of the Roman emperor, that his person was arrested by a butcher in the streets of Worms, and was detained in the public inn, as a pledge or hostage for the payment of his expenses.

For this manly scene, let us,

A.D. 1355.

Contrast of the two Caesars.

It is the fourteenth century that we may view the statesman, the statesman, and contrast of the Roman empire of Germany, which no longer held, except on the borders of the Rhine and Danube, a single province of Trapani or Constantine. Their unworthy successors were the counts of Hapsburgh, of Nassau, of Luxembourgh, and of Schwarzeburgh. The emperor Henry the seventh pre-emured for his son the crown of Bohemia, and his grandson Charles the fourth was born among a people strange and barbarous in the estimation of the Germans themselves. 2 After the execrations of Lewis of Bavaria, the reception of the gift or promise of the vacant empire from the Roman pontiffs, who, in the exile and captivity of Avignon, affected the dominion of the earth. The death of his competitors united the electoral college, and Charles was unanimously saluted king of the Romans, and emperor; a title which in the same epoch was prostituted to the Caesars of Germany and Greece. The German emperor was more than the elective and impotent magistracy of an aristocracy of princes, who had not left him a village that he might call his own. His best prerogative was the right of presiding and proposing in the national senate, which was consoled at his summons; and his native kingdom of Bohemia, less opulent than the adjacent city of Nuremburgh, was the firmest seat of his power and the richest source of his revenue. The army by which he passed the Alps consisted of three hundred horse. In the cathedral of St. Ambroise, Charles was crowned with the iron crown, which tradition ascribed to the Lombard monastery; but he was admitted only with a peacefull train; the gates of the city were shut upon him; and the king of France was a captive by the hands of the Visconti to whom he confirmed in the sovereignty of Milan. In the Vatican he was again crowned with the golden crown of the empire; but, in obedience to a secret treaty, the Roman emperor immediately withdrew, without reproosing a single night within the walls of Rome. 3 Petrarch and Boccaccio revivified the visionary glories of the capital, deplores and upbraids the ignominious flight of the Bohemian: and even his contemporaries could observe, that the sole exercise of his authority was in the lucrative sale of privileges and titles. The gold of Italy secured the election of his son; but such was the shameful poverty of the Roman emperor, that his person was arrested by a butcher in the streets of Worms, and was detained in the public inn, as a pledge or hostage for the payment of his expenses.

For this manly scene, let us,

A.D. 1355.

Contrast of the two Caesars.

It is the fourteenth century that we may view the statesman, the statesman, and contrast of the Roman empire of Germany, which no longer held, except on the borders of the Rhine and Danube, a single province of Trapani or Constantine. Their unworthy successors were the counts of Hapsburgh, of Nassau, of Luxembourgh, and of Schwarzeburgh. The emperor Henry the seventh pre-emured for his son the crown of Bohemia, and his grandson Charles the fourth was born among a people strange and barbarous in the estimation of the Germans themselves. 2 After the execrations of Lewis of Bavaria, the reception of the gift or promise of the vacant empire from the Roman pontiffs, who, in the exile and captivity of Avignon, affected the dominion of the earth. The death of his competitors united the electoral college, and Charles was unanimously saluted king of the Romans, and emperor; a title which in the same epoch was prostituted to the Caesars of Germany and Greece. The German emperor was more than the elective and impotent magistracy of an aristocracy of princes, who had not left him a village that he might call his own. His best prerogative was the right of presiding and proposing in the national senate, which was consoled at his summons; and his native kingdom of Bohemia, less opulent than the adjacent city of Nuremburgh, was the firmest seat of his power and the richest source of his revenue. The army by which he passed the Alps consisted of three hundred horse. In the cathedral of St. Ambroise, Charles was crowned with the iron crown, which tradition ascribed to the Lombard monastery; but he was admitted only with a peacefull train; the gates of the city were shut upon him; and the king of France was a captive by the hands of the Visconti to whom he confirmed in the sovereignty of Milan. In the Vatican he was again crowned with the golden crown of the empire; but, in obedience to a secret treaty, the Roman emperor immediately withdrew, without reproosing a single night within the walls of Rome. 3 Petrarch and Boccaccio revivified the visionary glories of the capital, deplores and upbraids the ignominious flight of the Bohemian: and even his contemporaries could observe, that the sole exercise of his authority was in the lucrative sale of privileges and titles. The gold of Italy secured the election of his son; but such was the shameful poverty of the Roman emperor, that his person was arrested by a butcher in the streets of Worms, and was detained in the public inn, as a pledge or hostage for the payment of his expenses.

For this manly scene, let us,

A.D. 1355.
the character of a private Roman; and his most artful flatterers respected the secret of his absolute and perpetual monarchy.

CHAPTER XI.

Description of Arabia and its inhabitants.—Birth, character, and doctrine of Mohamet.—He preaches at Mecca.—Flies to Medina.—Propagates his religious notion with the sword.—Voluntary or reluctant submission of the Arabs.—His death and successors.—The claims and fortunes of All All and the Kazzars.

After pursuing above six hundred years the fleeting Chariots of Constantiopole and Germany, I now descend, in the reign of Heraclius, on the eastern borders of the Greek monarchy. While the state was exhausted by the Persian war, and the church was distracted by the Nestorian and Monophysitische sects, Mahomet, in the sword, in one hand, and the Koran in the other, erected his throne on the ruins of Christianity and of Rome. The genius of the Arabian prophet, the manners of his nation, and the spirit of his religion, involve the causes of the decline and fall of the eastern empire; and our eyes are curiously intent on one of the most curious events of the world. The ancient word has impressed a new and lasting character on the nations of the globe.

Description of Arabia.

In the vacant space between Persia, Russia, Egypt, and Ethiopia, the Arabian peninsula may be conceived as a triangle of spacious but barren soil; bounded on the northern point of Beleor on the Ephrates, a line of fifteen hundred miles is terminated by the straits of Babelmandel and the land of frankincense. About half this length may be allowed for the middle breadth, from east to west, from Bassor to Nasz, from the Persian gulf to the Indian ocean; and the whole breadth, from north to south, has been greatly increased; and the southern basin presents a front of a thousand miles to the Indian ocean. The entire surface of the peninsula exceeds in a fourfold proportion that of Germany or France; but the far greater part has been justly stigmatized with the epithets of the desert and the sandy; for the climate is warm and unhealthy.

Tartary are decked, by the hand of nature, with lofty trees and luxuriant herbage; and the lonesome traveller derives a sort of comfort and society from the presence of vegetable life. But in the dreary waste of Arabia, a boundless level of sand is intersected by sharp and naked mountains; and the face of the desert, without the shelter of sky, is entirely open to the direct and intense rays of the tropical sun. Instead of refreshing breezes, the winds, particularly from the south-west, diffuse a molasses and even deadly vapour; the hillocks of sand which they alternately raise and scatter, are compared to the billows of the ocean, and whole caravans, which advance, have been lost and buried in the whirlwind. The common benefits of water are an object of desire and contest; and such is the scarcity of wood, that some art is requisite to preserve and propagate the element of fire. Arabia is desolate of navigable rivers, which fertilize the soil, and convey its produce to the adjacent remote nations; the torrents that fall from the hills are impeded by the thirsty earth: the rare and hardy plants, the tamarind or the acacia, that strike their roots into the clefts of the rocks, are nourished by the dews of the night: a scanty supply of water, the rarest of earthly treasures, and the peculiar gifts of frankincense, wine, coffee, which have rolled over a bed of sulphur or salt. Such is the general and genuine picture of the climate of Arabia. The traveller returns with the experience that for a future time, national or partial enjoyments. A shady grove, a green pasture, a stream of fresh water, are sufficient to attract a colony of sedentary Arabs to the fortunate spots which can afford food and refreshment to themselves and their cattle, and which encourage their industry in the cultivation of the palm-tree and the vine. The high and sandy lands which border on the Indian ocean are distinguished by their superior plenty of wood and water; the air is more temperate, the fruits are more delicious, the animals and the human race more numerous; the fertility of the soil invites and rewards the toil of the husbandman; and the peculiar gifts of frankincense, wine, and coffee have attracted in different ages the merchants of the world. If it be compared with the rest of the peninsula, this sequestered region may truly deserve the appellation of the happy; and the splendid beauty and perfection of the landscape, the freshness of the air, the perfect health of the climate, the incomparable blessings of luxury and innocence were ascribed to the natives; the soil was impregnated with gold and gems, and both the land and sea were supposed to exhale the most refreshing of the mists; this earthly paradise that nature had reserved her choicest favours and her most curious workmanship; and her inimitable beauty was never to be seen, should scarcely retain a vestige of its ancient geography. The maritime districts of Bohrein and Oman are opposed to the realm of Persia. The kingdom of Yemen displays the limits, or at least the situation, of Arabia Felix; the name of Negdiff is extended over the desert; and the land of Mahomet has illustrated the province of Hezaj along the coast of the Red Sea.

In the thirty days, or stations, between Cairo and Mecca, there are fifteen destitute of good water. See the route of the Hadjees, in Shaw's Travels, p. 477.

This constitutes, especially the thurif or frankincense, of Arabia, occupy the twelfth book of Pinus. Our great poet (Paradise Lost, 1.) Theodore (1. 388; 4. 246) introduces, in travelling over the desert of Arabia Felix, by the north-east wind from the Saharan coast. Many a longed-for pleasure with the grateful scents of old Ocean smiles. (Pinn. Hist. Nat., xiii. 42.)

A dcathless plant, with much superb learning. 1 That Name is the thurif, is that, and the mention of the Arabian name, the name of Mabruk, the Arabic name of Petreol. (Oxon. 1659, in fac.) The thirty pages of text and version

1 Petri. 1. 188; 4. 246.
The measure of population is regulated by the means of subsistence; and the inhabitants of this vast peninsula might be outstripped by the subjects of a fertile and industrious province. Along the shores of the Persian gulf, of the ocean, and even of the Red sea, the ichthyophagi, or fish-eaters, and the bedouin, vagabond in quest of their pretious food, in this primitive and abject state, which ill deserves the name of society, the human brute, without arts or laws, almost without sense or language, is powerfully distinguished from the rest of the animal creation. Generations and ages might roll away in silent oblivion, and the bedouin, savage with his hawks restrained from multiplying his race, by the wants and pursuits which confined his existence to the narrow margin of the sea-coast. But in a early period of antiquity the great body of the Arabs had emerged from this scene of misery, and as the mixed wildness could not maintain a people of hunters, they rose at once to the more secure and plentiful condition of the pastoral life. The same life is uniformly pursued by the roving tribes of the desert; and in the portrait of the modern Bedouena, we may trace the features of those who, in the time of Moses, Necho, and Solomon, dwelt under similar tents, and conducted their horses, and camels, and sheep, to the same springs and the same pastures. Our toil is lessened, and our wealth is increased, by our dominion over the useful animals; and the Arabian shepherd had acquired the abode of the pastoral life. The beast of burden, slave.

Arabia, in the opinion of the naturalist, is the genuine and original country of the horse; the climate most propitious, not indeed to the size, but to the spirit and swiftness, of that generality. The merit of the Barb, the Spanish, and the English breed, is derived from a mixture of Arabian blood: the Bedouens preserve, with superstitions care, the honours and the memory of the purest race: the males are sold at a high price, but the females are seldom alienated; and the birth of a noble foal was esteemed, among the Bedouens, as a subject of joy and mutual congratulation. These horses are educated in the tents, among the children of the Arabs, with a tender familiarity, which trains them in the habits of gentleness and attachment. They are accustomed only to walk and to gallop; their sensations are not felt by the incessant action of the whip: their powers are reserved for the moments of flight and pursuit; but no sooner do they feel the touch of the hand or the stirrup, than they dart away with the swiftness of the wild; and if their friend be distant, they instantly stop, till they have recovered his seat. The sands of Africa and Arabia is a sacred and precious gift. That strong and patient beast ofburthen can perform, without eating or drinking, a journey of several days; and a reservoir of fresh water is preserved in a large bag, a fifth stomach of the animal, whose body is imprinted with the marks of servitude: the larger breed is capable of transporting a weight of a thousand pounds; and the dromedary, of a lighter and more active frame, outstrips the fleetest courser in the race. Alive or dead, almost without reverence, the beast of burden is tendered in quest of their pretious food. The beast of prey, the hunter himself, who was fond of milk, prefers the cow, and does not condone the use of the camel; but the milk of Merca and Mecca, the most ancient and populous cities, was already more luxurious. (Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, tom. iii., p. 406.)

Yet an essential difference may be found between the horaces of Scythia and Arabia. The Bedouen of the desert, whose chief food were collected into towns, and employed in the labours of trade and agriculture. A part of their time and industry was still devoted to the management of their cattle: they mingled, in peace and war, with their brethren of the desert; and the Bedouena derived from their descent, the Semitic genius, the supplies of their wants, and some rudiments of art and knowledge. Among the forty-two cities of Arabia, enumerated by Abulfeda, the most ancient and populous were situated in the happy Yemen; the towers of Saman, and the marvelous reservoir of Meah; constructed by the kings of the Homeries: but their profane lustre was eclipsed by the prophetical glories of Medina and Mecca, near the Red sea, and at the distance from each other of two hundred and seventy miles. The Mecca: last of these holy places was known to the Greeks and Romans, by the spot of the original pilgrimage; and the termination of the word is expressive of its greatness, which has not indeed, in the most flourishing period,

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Content</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>194</td>
<td>THE DECLINE AND FALL</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chap. XI</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
exceeded the size and popolousness of Marseilles. Some latent motive, perhaps of superstition, must have impelled the founders, in the choice of a most improper situation. They erected their habitations of mud or stone, in conical forms, of which the scars, the walls broad, at the foot of three barren mountains: the soil is a rock; the water even of the holy well of Zemzem is bitter or brackish; the pastures are remote from the city; and grapes are transported above seventy miles from the gardens of Tayef. The fame and spirit of the Korishites, whose freedom was designated in Meccan popular and conspicuous among the Arabian tribes; but their ungrateful soil refused the labours of agriculture, and their position was favourite to the enterprises of trade. By the sea-port of Gedda, at the distance only of forty miles, they maintained an easy correspondence with Abyssinia; and that Christian kingdom afforded the first refuge to the disciples of Mahomet. The treasures of Africa were conveyed over the peninsula of Gerra or Katif, in the province of Bahrein, a city built, as it is said, of rock-salt, by the Chaldæans:2 and from thence, with the activity of a people naturally addicted to trade, were loaded on mules to the mouth of the Euphrates. Mecca is placed almost at an equal distance, a month's journey, between Yemen on the right, and Syria on the left hand. The former was the winter, the latter the summer, station of her caravans; and their seasonable arrival relieved the people of the tedious toil of the tedious navigation of the Red sea. In the markets of Sanaa and Merah, in the harbours of Oman and Aden, the camels of the Koreshites were laden with a precious cargo of aromatics; a supply of corn and manufactures was purchased in the fairs of Bostra and Damascus. The lucrative exchange was attended with pleasure and Richard in the streets of Mecca; and the noblest of her sons united the love of arts with the profession of mercade,3

National indep. The perpetual independence of the Arabs has been the theme of praise or execration among strangers and natives; and the arts of controversy transform this singular event into a tragedy and a miracle, in favour of the posterity of Ismael.4 Some exceptions, that can neither be dismissed nor eluded, render this mode of reasoning as indirect as it is superfluous; the kingdom of Yemen has been suggested for the support of the Homerys in the Persians, the sultans of Egypt, and the Turks:5 the holy cities of Mecca and Medina have repeatedly bowed under a Scebian tyrant; and the Roman province of Arabia6 embraced the peculiar wilderness in which

1. Strabo, l. xvi. p. 411. See one of these salt houses near Eissora, in Diderot, Biblot., Orient, p. 6.
3. A marvellous doctor (Universal Hist. vii. xx. ec虚空 escholion) has often cited the greatness of Christianity by the independence of the Arabs. A crisis, civil; the exceptions of fact, might diminish the truth to the text. (Graec. vi. 15.) The extent of the application, and the foundation of the pedigree.
5. D'Herbelot, B. (A. D. 1334) and Selim II. (1583.) See Cantiour's History of the Ommains, p. 141, 242. The proofs, which rested on Sassa, commanded twenty one bow long before was even remitted to the Porte, (Massigni, State Mairte dell' Imperio Ommoun. p. 124;) and the Turks were expelled about the year 1400. (Vid. Iran.)
6. Of the Roman province, under the name of Arabia, and the third Palaestina, the first part the most remote; and the second from their area from the year 105, when they were subdued by Palom, a lieutenant of Trajan. (Omn. Cosma, l. xiv. 1.) The capital of Arabia has always been the same, because was founded the city of the sons of Israel, (Gen. xxv. 12, &c. with the Commentaries of Jerome, Lib. xxxv. 1. 1.) Arabia Felix, the name which has been given to the countries, lying on the borders of the Red sea, from two to ten days' journey to the south of Ejah, (Procop. de Bell. Pers. 1. 1. c. 10.) The Ejahs and the sons of the common population of Arabia, (Arbain in Perigo Maria Erastos, p. 11, in Husson, tom. 1.) at a place (Pliny, Hist. Nat. vi. 38.) Pagus Albus Harward in the territory of Medina. (D'Anville, Memoire sur Egypte, p. 455.) These real genealogies, and some naval invasions of Taim, (Perigli, p. 14, 15,) are magnified by history and medallists into the Roman conquest of Arabia.

7. A Nebuchad, Description de l'Arihie, p. 309, 390, 329—33!) affords the next most authentic intelligence of the Turkish empire in Arabia.

8. Diodore Siculus, con. l. xiv. p. 250—254, edit. Weiske. He had clearly engaged in the 'free state' of the Nezah, which now restored the arms of Antiquus and his sons (Strabo, l. xvi., ed. 1773) of which the whole has been in the hands of Reza, and named in a thousand miles from the part of Yemen between Mea and Marz and the ocean. The name of Dezele is the same, but the form of writing has been changed. (Om. ed. 161.) See the Imper. of Reza, (Om. ed. 151.) The name of the same name of the same foreigner, and the latter part of the region of Medina. (Om. ed. 151.) and in the most lively colours, by Ammianus Marcellinus, (l. xiv. c. 4.) who had spoken of them as early as the time of Marcus.
The Greeks and Latins, under the general appellation of Saracens, a name which every christian mouth has been taught to pronounce with terror and abhorrence.

Their doctrine.

The slaves of domestic tyranny may in freedom vaine extoll in their national independant and character. 1 and he enjoys, in some degree, the benefits of society, with little capacity for more. In every tribe, superstition, or gratitude, or fortune, has exalted a particular family above the heads of their equals. The dignities of sheich and emir invariably descend in this chosen race; but the order of succession is loose and precarious; and the most worthy or aged of the noble kinship are preferred to the simple, though important, office of composing disputes by their advice, and guiding valour by their example. Even a female of sense and spirit has been permitted to command the countrymen of Zonobas. 2 The momentary junction of several tribes produces an army; their more lasting union of the tribe as a whole, the emir of emirs, whose banner is displayed at their head, may despair, in the eyes of strangers, the honours of the kingly name. If the Arabian princes abuse their power, they are quickly punished by the desertion of their subjects and of their heralds, or by the operation of the local and personal jurisdiction. Their spirit is free, their steps are unconfined, the desert is open, and the tribes and families are held together by a mutual and voluntary compact. The softer nations of Yemen supported the pomp and majesty of a monarch; but if he could not love or forget his subjects, and were not permitting the precarious existence of his vassals, the active powers of government must have been devoted on his nobles and magistrates. The cities of Mecca and Medina present, in the heart of Asia, the form, or rather the substance, of a commonwealth.

The grandfather of Mahomet, and his lineal ancestors, appalled and domesticated the original savages as the princes of their country; but they reigned, like Pericles at Athens, or the Medici at Florence, by the opinion of their wisdom and integrity; their influence was divided with their patrimony; and the sceptre was transferred from the necks of the prophet to a younger branch of the tribe norovish. On such occasions, they convened the assembly of the people; and since mankind must be either compelled or persuaded to obey, the use and reputation of oratory among the ancient Arabs is the clearest evidence of public freedom. The force of the popular votes, their power of freedom was of a very different cast from the nice and artificial machinery of the Greek and Roman republics, in which each member possessed an undivided share of the civil and political rights of the community. In the mere simple state of the Arabs, the nation is free, because each of her sons disdains a base submission to the will of a master. His breast is fortified with the austere virtues of courage, patience, and sobriety; the love of independence prompts him to exercise the habits of self-command; and the fear of dishonour guards him from the intemperance of cupidity, danger, and of death. The gravity and firmness of the mind is conspicuous in his outward demeanour: his speech is slow, weighty, and concise, he is seldom provoked to laughter, his only gesture is that of stroking his beard, or fanning his face, and his moderate self-esteem, sense of his own importance teaches him to accost his equals without levity, and his superiors without awe. 3 The liberty of the Saracens survived their conquests: the first caliphs indulged the bold and familiar language of their subjects; they ascended the pulpit to persuade and edify them. 4 Their honours were increased by their arms, and by the possession of the throne which was the first before the empire was removed to the Tigris, that the Abbassides adopted the proud and pompous ceremonial of the Persian and Byzantine courts.

In the study of nations and men, we find the laws of war and may observe the causes that render them so discreditable. Hostile and friendly to each other, this fate to narrow or enlarge, to mollify or exasperate, the social character. The separation of the Sarracens from the rest of mankind, has accustomed them to confound the ideas of stranger and enemy together, and even to have considered Mahomet as the successor of Moyses. This spirit, and the want of the outlaws, the fright of the enemy, the fatigues of the campaign, and the rule of the Persian service, have produced a maxim of jurisprudence, which they believe and practise to the present hour. They pretend, that in the division of the earth, the rich and fertile countries were assigned to the other branches of the human family; and that the poorness of the outlaws Israel might create, by their pressure, the portion of the Sarracens, which was the inheritance of which he had been unjustly deprived. According to the remark of a Persian, no people have been equally addicted to that of commerce; the caravans which traverse the desert are ransomed or pillaged; and their neighbours, since the remote times of Job and Solomon, have been confined to the east and west, or to the limits of a very distant desert, in want of the vessels and the personal wealth. The life is a solitary traveller, he rides furiously against him, crying, with a loud voice, "Undress thyself, thy aunt (my wife) is not without a garment." A ready submission entitles him to mercy; resistance will provoke the aggressor, and his own blood must express the blood which he presumes to shed in legitimate defence. A single robber, or a few associates, are branded with their genuine name; but the exploits of a numerous band assume the character of a lawful and proper war; and the motives of a very great and justifiable passion against mankind, was doubly inflamed by the domestic licence of rapine, murder, and revenge. In the constitution of Europe, the right of peace and war is now confined to a small number, and the actual exercise to a small number of representatives most of the European states. Each state, which is the object of envy, and which can boast of a national character, is doomed to the spoils of war. In the Sarracens, an obscure tribe on the borders of Egypt. The appellation cannot therefore attach to any national character, and, since it was inspired by strangers, it must be found, not in the Arabic, but in a foreign language. 5 Saracens, ... multitude alien in essesence (Explication totius Mundii, p. 3, in Hudson, tom. ii.) The reign of Mecca is famous in the桉lock. Specimen, p. 15).

1 D'Arvieux, &c. ... see in the report of Agatharchides, (de Mari Raporibus, tom. i. p. 37. p. 215.) and Strabo, (l. xvi. p. 1121.) But I much suspect that this is not the true state of things, though we are haunted by the reports of travellers, or on reports, of the fact, a custom, and a law.

2 Non gloriosus antiquius Arabus, nisi gladius, hospitum, et eloquen... (Theophylactus, ad Pocock, Specimen, p. 161, 162.) This gift of Saracens is the most obnoxious to the vanity of the conquerors.

3 He was the first caliph of the Abbassides, and the second of the Saracens. He had the charge of the guards of the shepherds, they had formerly subdued Egypt. (Narram, Canon, Chron. p. 82–84.)

4 Of the immediate successors, see the account of D'Arvieux, 1209, (D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 73.) The two historians who wrote the Aymon Arab, (D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 73.) under the name of Bworn, the shepherds kings, they had formerly subdued Egypt. (Narram, Canon, Chron. p. 82–84.)

5 Of the immediate successors, see the account of D'Arvieux, 1209, (D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 73.) The two historians who wrote the Aymon Arab, (D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 73.) under the name of Bworn, the shepherds kings, they had formerly subdued Egypt. (Narram, Canon, Chron. p. 82–84.)
judge and avenger of its own cause. The nice sensibility of honour, which weighs the insult rather than the injury, sheds its deadly venom on the quarrels of the Arabs of every age: but in bearded, is most easily wounded; an indelict action, a contemptible word, can be expiated only by the blood of the offender; and such is their patient inveteracy, that they expect whole months and years the opportunity of revenge. A fine or compensation for murder is familiar to the barbarians of every age: but in Arabia the kinsmen of the dead are at liberty to accept the atonement, or to exercise with their own hands the law of retaliation. The refined malice of the Arabs refuses even the hand of the murderer, substitutes an innocent to the guilty person, and transfers the penalty to a third person. As the death was observed by the Arabs before the time of Mahomet, during which their swords were religiously sheathed both in foreign and domestic hostility; and this partial truce is more strongly expressive of the habits of anarchy and warfare.

Their social qualifications and virtues. But the spirit of rapine and revenge was attempted by the milder influence of trade and literature. The solitary peninsula is encompassed by the most civilised nations of the ancient world: the merchant is the friend of mankind: and the annual caravans imported the first seeds of knowledge and politeness into the cities, and even the camps, of the desert. Whatever may be the pedigrees of the Arabs, their language is derived from the same original stock with the Hebrew, the Syriac, and the Chaldean tongues: the independence of the tribes was marked by their peculiar dialects; but the tribes are entitled to that name which the pure and perspicuous idiom of Mecca. In Arabia, as well as in Greece, the perfection of language outstripped the refinement of manners; and her speech could diversify the fourscore names of honey, the two hundred of a serpent, the five hundred of a lion, the thousand of a carcase; and her daughter the Bithynian was intrusted to the memory of a illustrious people. The monuments of the Homerites were inscribed with an obsolete and mysterious character; but the Cufic letters, the ground-work of the present alphabet, were invented on the banks of the Euphrates; and the recent invention was taught at Mecca by a stranger who settled in that city after the birth of Mahomet. The arts of grammar, of metre, and of rhetoric, were unknown to the free-born eloquence of the Arabs: but their penetration was sharp, their fancy luxuriant, their wit strong and savetentious; and their more elaborate compositions were addressed with energy and effect to the minds of their heart-rending, love-parched, or converted. The genius and merit of a singing poet was a golden cord, binding to himself and the kindred tribes. A solemn banquet was prepared, and a chorus of women, striking their tambourines, and displaying the pomp of their ornaments, sung in the presence of their sons and husbands the felicity of their native tribe; that a champion had now appeared to vindicate their rights; that a herald had raised his voice to immortalize their renown. The distant or hostile tribes resorted to an annual fair, which was abolished by the fanaticism of the first Moslems; a national assembly that must have contributed to refine and harmonise the barbarians. Thirty days were employed in the exchange of language, not only the written, but of eloquence and poetry. The prize was disputed by the generous emulation of the hards; the victorious performance was deposited in the archives of princes and emirs; and we may read in our own language, the seven original poems which were inscribed in letters of gold, and suspended in the temple of Mecca. The Arabian poets were the historians and moralists of the age; and if they sympathized with the prejudices, they inspired and crowned the virtues, of their countrymen. The indivisible union of generosity and valour was the darling theme of their song; and when they attempted to satire against the attenuated power, they affirmed, in the bitterness of reproach, that the men knew not how to give, nor the Examples of women to deny. The same hospitality, generosity, which was practised by Abraham, and celebrated by Homer, is still renewed in the camps of the Arabs. The feroce Bedouins, the terror of the desert, embrace, without inquiry or hesitation, the stranger who dares to confide in their honour and to enter their tent. His treatment is kind and respectful; he shares the wealth, or the poverty, of his host; and, after a needful repose, he is dismissed on his way, with thanks, with blessings, and perhaps with gifts. The heart and hand are more largely expanded by the wants of a brother or a friend; and the heroic acts that could deserve the public applause, must have surpassed the narrow measure of discretion and experience. A dispute had arisen, who, among the citizens of Mecca, were of the purest blood of the stock of Mecca; and a wise application was made to the three who were deemed most worthy of the title. Abdullah, the son of Abbas, had undertaken a distant journey, and his foot was in the stirrup when he heard the voice of a suppliant, O son of the uncle of the apostle of God, which disturbed him in his travel. He dismounted, to present the pilgrim with his camel, her rich caparison, and a purse of four thousand pieces of gold, excepting only the sword, either for its intrinsic value, or as the gift of an honoured kinsman. The servant of Kaiss informed the second suppliant that his master was asleep; but he immediately added, here is a purse of seven thousand pieces of gold, (it is all) we have in the house, and here is an order, that will entitle you to a camel and a slave:The master, as soon as he awoke, praised and eulogisned his faithful steward with a gentle reproof, that his respecting his slumbers he had stinted his bounty. The third of these heroes, the blind Arabah, at the hour of prayer, was supporting his steps on the shoulders of two slaves. Alas! he replied, *my coffers are empty! If God, to prove the natural sagacity of the Arabs, (D’Arbequ. Biblio. Orient, p. 120, 121. Gaugler, Vie de Mahomet, tom. i. p. 27—46.) but of their rudeness, or rather their want of a noble fancy, are observed. ( Specimen, p. 150—153.)”

Specimen (p. 150—153.)”

See the Preliminary Discourse, p. 29, 30.

1. For a familiar tale in Voltaire’s Zadig (de Chiel et de Cheval) is re-
The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

Chapter XI

... but these you may sell; if you refuse, I renounce them." At these words, pushing away the youths, he gaped along the wall with his staff. The character of Hatem is the perfect model of Arabic virtue; he was brave and liberal, an eloquent poet, and a successful robber: forty camels were rustled at his hospitable feast; and at the prayer of a supplemental vow, he restored both the captives and the spoil. The freedom of his countrymen disdained the laws of justice; they proudly indulged the spontaneous impulse of pity and benevolence.

The religion of the Arabs, as well as that of the Hebrews, consisted in the worship of the sun, the moon, and the fixed stars; a primitive and specious mode of superstition. The bright luminaries of the sky display the visible image of the Deity: their number and distance convey to a philosopher, or even a vulgar, eye, the idea of boundless space; the character of eternity is marked on these solid globes, that seem incapable of corruption or decay: the regularity of their motions may be ascribed to a principle of reason or instinct; and their real or imaginary influence encourages the vain belief that the earth and its inhabitants are the object of their power or benevolence. The science of astronomy was cultivated at Babylon; but the school of the Arabs was a clear firmament and a naked plain. In their nocturnal marches, they steered by the guidance of the stars: their names, and order, and daily station, were familiar to them. The devotion of the Bedouins, who was taught by experience to divide in twenty-eight parts the zodiac of the moon, and to bless the constellations that refreshed, with salutary rains, the thirst of the desert. The reign of the heavenly orbs could not be extended beyond the visible sphere; and some metaphysical powers were necessary to sustain the transmigration of souls and the resurrection of bodies: a camel was left to perish on the grave, that he might serve his master in another life; and the invocation of departed spirits implies that they were still endued with consciousness and power. I am ignorant, and I am ashamed, of the rise of the idolatry on the historian; of the local deities, of the stars, the air, and the earth, of their sex or titles, their attributes, or subordination. Each tribe, each family, each independent warrior, created and changed the rites and the object of his faith, was subject to the nearest and most sacred obligation to the religion, as well as to the language, of The Caaba or Mecca. The genuine antiquity of the temple of Mecca. CAABA ascends beyond the Christian era; in describing the coast of the Red sea, the Greek historian Diiodorus has remarked, between the Thamudites and the Sabaeans, a famous temple, whose superior sanctity was revered by all the Arabs; the lien or silken veil, which is annually renewed by the Turkish emperor, was first offered by a pious king of the Homerites, who reigned seven hundred years before the time of Mohomet. A tent, or a cavern, might suffice for the worship of the savages, but an edifice of stone and cay has been erected in its place; and the art and power of the monarchs of the east have been confined to the simplicity of the original model. A spacious portico includes the quadrangle of the Caaba; a square chapel, twenty-four cubits long, twenty-three broad, and twenty-seven high; a door and a window admit the light; the double roof is supported by three pillars of wood: a spout (now of gold) discharges the rain-water, and the well Zemzem is protected by a dome from accidental pollution. The tribe of Korish, by fraud or force, had acquired the custody of the Caaba; the sacred idol was devolved to them, without dispute, by the old Caaba, or home; and the family of the Hashemites, from whence he sprung, was the most respectable and sacred in the eyes of their country. The precursors of Mecca enjoyed the rights of sanctuary; and, in the last month of each year, the city and temple were crowded with a long train of pilgrims, who petted with their vows and offerings in the house of God. The same rites, which are now accomplished by the faithful musulman, were invented and practised by the superstition of the idolaters. At an awful distance they cast away their garments: seven times, with hasty steps, they encir- cled the stone; seven times they rubbed their faces, seven times they visited and adored the adjacent mountains; seven times they threw stones into the valley of Minna: and the pilgrimage was achieved, as at the present hour, by a sacrifice of sheep and camels, and the burial of a white ram. Each tribe either found or introduced in the Caaba their domestic worship: the temple was adorned, or defiled, with three hundred and sixty gods of men, eagles, lions, and antelopes; and most conspicuous was the statue of Hebel, of red agate, holding in his hands the image of the Arab idol, with the instruments and symbols of profane divination. But this statue was a monument of Syrian arts: the devotion of the ruder ages was content with a pillar or a tablet: and the rocks of the desert were hewn into gods or altars, in imitation of the black stone of Mecca, which is deeply tainted with the reproach of an iodolatrous origin. From Japan to Sacrifices and Peru, the use of sacrifice has univers- ally prevailed; and the vorry has expressed his gratitude, or fear, by destroying, or consuming, in honour of his deity, a portion of the earth, of the air, or of the gifts. The life of a man is the most precious ob- lation to deprecate a public calamity: the altars of Phoe- nicia and Egypt, of Rome and Carthage, have been polluted with human gore: the cruel practice was long preserved among the Arabs; in the third century, a boy was annually sacrificed by the tribune of the Mna- tians; and a royal captive was piously slaughtered by the prince of the Saracens, the ally and soldier of... the emperor Justinian. A parent who dragged his son to the altar, exhibits the most painful and sublime effort of fanaticism: the deed, or the intention, was sanctified by the example of saints and heroes; and the father of Mahomet himself was devoted by a rash vow to the worship of the freedom of his three red camels. In the time of ignorance, the Arabs, like the Jews and Egyptians, abstained from the taste of swine's flesh; they circumcised their children at the age of puberty: the same customs, without the censure or the pretext of the Koran, have been silently transmitted from age to age. It is more simple to believe that he adhered to the habits and opinions of his youth, without foreseeing that a practice congenial to the climate of Mecca, might be useful as an inconsiderant on the banks of the Danube or the Volga.

Introduction of Arabia was free; the adjacent kingdoms were shaken by the storms of conquest and tyranny, and the persecuted sects fled to the happy land where they might profess what they thought. The Mahometan religion, and the religious sects and combinations of the Sabians and Magians, of the Jews and Christians, were disseminated from the Persian gulf to the Red sea. In a remote period of antiquity, Sabianism was diffused over Asia by the science of the Chaldeans and the arts of the Assyrians. From the observation of the heavenly bodies, and the supposed signs of the planets, the Arabian astronomers deduced the eternal laws of nature and providence. They admired the seven gods, or angels, who directed the course of the seven planets, and shed their irresistible influence on the earth. The attributes of the seven planets, with the twelve signs of the zodiac, and the twenty-four constellations of the northern and the southern skies, were represented by images and talismans; the seven days of the week were dedicated to their respective deities: the Sabians prayed three days each day; and the temple of the moon at Haran was the term of their pilgrimage. But the religious genius of their faith was always ready either to bear or to lend: in the course of the tradition, the deluge, and the patriarchs, they held a singular agreement with their brethren; they secretly approached the secret books of Adam, Seth, and Enoch; and a slight misgiving of the gospel has transmuted the last remnant of the polytheists into the Christians of Syria, in our day.

Persians, and Sabians, and Jews, and Arabians were uprooted by the Magians: but the injuries of the Sabians were revenged by the sword of Alexander; Persia groaned above fifty hundred years under a foreign yoke; and the purest disciples of Zoroaster escaped from the contagion of idolatry, and breathed with their adversaries the freedom of the earth five hundred years before the death of Mahomet. The Jews, the Mahometans dispersed their phantastic opinions and apocryphal gospels; the churches of Yemen, and the princes of Hera and Sassan, were instructed in a pure creed by the Jacobite and Nestorian bishops. The Sabians presented the library of the Chaldean and the Sabian books to the Arab, who was free to elect or to compose his private religion: and the rude superscription of his house was mingled with the sublime theology of sages and philosophers. A fundamental article of faith was inculcated by the consent of the learned strangers; the existence of God, who is exalted above the powers of heaven and earth, but who has often revealed himself to mankind by the ministry of his angels and prophets, and whose grace or justice has interrupted, by seasonable miracles, the order of nature. The most rational of the Arabs acknowledged his power, though they neglected his word; and it was habit rather than conviction to express their attachment to the Chaldean or Sabian god of idolatry. The Jews and Christians were the people of the book; the Bible was already translated into the Arabic language; and the volume of the Old Testament was accepted by the censuses of these implacable enemies. In the story of the Hebrew patriarchs, the Arabs were pleased to discover the fathers of their nation. They applauded the bimbs and promises of Ismael; revered the faith and virtue of Abraham; traced their pedigrees and their own to the creation of the first man, and imbued with equal credit the prodigies of the holy text, and the dreams and traditions of the Jewish rabbi.

Queens, (de Bell. Persico, l. c. c. 55.) and Pococke, (Voyage, p. 72, 75.) attest the human sacrifices of the Arabs in the sixth century. The danger and escape of Abbasin, (Herodot. p. 14; Belon, ii. c. 21.) is a tradition rather than a fact, (Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, tom. iv. p. 82—84.)

1. Sabine carries abstinence, says Suidas, (Physicata, c. 53,) who copies Pliny (v. viii, 60.) in the strange supposition, that horses cannot live in Arabia. The Egyptians were actuated by a natural and superstitious horror for that unclean beast. (Marsham, Canon, p. 205.)

2. The old Arabsians likewise practised, post coitum, the rite of abstinence, (Herodot. l. i. c. 53,) which is sanctioned by Jewish law, (Kedem, Belon, p. 72, &c.) or rather by the Malakh of Shab Abash, (Hakluyt, p. 71, &c.)

3. The Chaldean and Sabian doctors are not fond of the subject; yet they hold circumcision necessary to salvation, and pretend that Mahomet was actuated by the same motives. (Mantua, Specimen, p. 193, 194.) See also (Belon, Hist. Orient. c. 24, 25; Belon, Hist, Orient, c. 22—23; Belon, Hist. Orient, c. 23—24; and Belon, Hist. Orient, c. 22—23.) See also (Belon, Hist, Orient, c. 22—23; Belon, Hist. Orient, c. 23—24; and Belon, Hist. Orient, c. 22—23.)

4. The Sabianles of the Huns, (t. i. c. 12—15,) has cast on their religion the curious but superficial glance of a Greek. Their astronomy would be far more valuable; they had looked through the telescope of astronomy, and had formed an idea of the number of the planets or of the fixed stars.

5. The Hebrews of the Chaldean (Porphyry, De Gent. ii. tom. iii. 243.) and Marsham, Canon, Strabo, p. 174, who doubt the fact, because it is adverse to his system. The earliest date of the Chaldæan astronomy is given by Belon (Hist. Orient. c. 19.) or rather the quest of Babylon, by Alexander, they were communicated, at the request of the Emperor Maximus, to the astronomer Hipparcos. What a moment in the annals of science! 1

6. Pococke, (Specimen, p. 135—146.) Huetinger, (Hist. Orient, p. 162.) and Marsham, (Specimen, p. 115.) and Vossius, (Pretiosae, p. 15.) and Pococke, (Specimen, p. 275, 276.) and Sale, (Prefatory Discourse, p. 49.) and Pococke, (Specimen, p. 193, 194.)

7. In the conversion of the Jews of Yemen, and the recent conversion of the Jews of the Christians; (Achob, (Ecclesiast. de la Triomphe, p. 135—137.) will fix the period of these ambiguousChristians; nor was it the same with the Sabian coity, (Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, tom. iv. p. 906—911.) may explain their tenet. But it is a slippery he could produce many generations of pure and genuine nobility: he sprung from the tribe of Koreish and the family of Hashem, the most illustrious of the Arabs, the princes of Mecca, and the hereditary guardians of the sacred edifice of the Mahometan religion. His name was Abdul Motalleb, the son of Hashem, a wealthy and generous citizen, who relieved the distress of famine with the supplies of commerce. Mecca, which had been fed by the liberality of the father, was saved by the influence of the son. The kinship of Yathrib was subject to the Christian power of Abyssinia; their vassal Abraham was provoked by an insult to avenge the honour of the cross; and the holy city was invested by a train of elephants, and an army of Africans. A treaty was proposed; and, in the first audience, the grandam of Mahomet demanded, the restitution of his cattle. "And why," said Abraham, "do you not rather implore my clemency in favour of your temple, which I have threatened to destroy!" "Because," replied the intrepid chief: "the cattle is my own; the Caaba belongs to the gods, and they will defend their house by injury and sacrefice." The want of provisions, or the value of the Koreish, compelled the Abyssinians to a disgraceful retreat: their discorner had been adorned with a miraculous flight of birds, who delivered them down stones on the heads of the infidels; and the delirium was long commenmated by the alacra of the cattled. The glory of Abdul Motalleb was crowned with domestic happiness, his life was prolonged to the age of one hundred and ten years, and he became the father of six daughters and thirteen sons. His best beloved Abdallah was the most beautiful and modest of the Arabian youth, and was chosen for his marriage by a niece of the holy race, whose nuptial life introduced into the Caaba the religion of the christians. In his early infancy, he was deprived of his father, his mother, and his grandfather; his uncles were strong and numerous; and in the division of the inheritance, the orphan's share was confined to five camels or a manservant. At home and abroad, in peace and war, Abu Taleb, the most respectable of his uncles, was the guide and guardian of his youth; in his twenty-fifth year, he entered into the service of Cadigajj, a rich and wealthy prince of Mecca, who had been rewarded with his fidelity by the gift of her hand and fortune. The marriage contract, in the simple style of antiquity, recites the mutual love of Mahomet and Cadijah; des-

" The decline and fall."

Chap. XI.

scribes him as the most accomplished of the tribe of Koreish; and stipulates a dowry of twelveounces of gold and twenty camels, which was supplied by the liberality of his uncle.ii By this alliance, the son of Abdul Motalleb not only impregnated the holy prophet, and the judicious matron was content with his domestick virtues, till, in the fortieth year of his age, he assumed the title of a prophet, and proclaimed the religion of the Koran.

According to the tradition of his country and the inscriptions of palaces, Mahomet was distinguished as the prophet, by the beauty of his person, an outward gift which is seldom despised, except by those to whom it has been refused. Before he spoke, the orator engaged on his side the affections of a public or private audience. They applauded his commanding presence, his majesty and his eloquence: his suggestions, his interloc-

tion to the rich and powerful was dignified by his cadescension and affability to the poorest citizens of Mecca: the frankness of his manner concealed the artifice of his views; and the habits of courtesy were imputed to personal friendship or universal benevolence. In the example of Mahomet, the most wit easy and social, his imagination sublime, his judg-cement clear, rapid, and decisive. He possessed the courage both of thought and action; and, although his designs might gradually expand with his success, the first idea which he entertained of his divine mission was the stamp of an original and superior genius. The son of Abdallah was educated in the bosom of the noblest race, in the use of the purest dialect of Arabia; and the fluency of his speech was corrected and enhanced by the practice of discreet and seasonable silence. With these powers of eloquence, Mahomet was an adequate instrument; his youth had never been instrusted in the arts of reading and writing; the common ignorance exempted him from shame or reproach, but he was reduced to a narrow circle of existcence, and deprived of those faithful mirrors, which reflect to our mind the minds of sages and heroes. Yet the books that he read were the books of his own view: and some fancy has been indulged in the political and philosophical observations which are ascribed

i I copy the honourable testimony of Abu Taleb to his family and Mahomet, given by the Prophet to Ockley, and corrected by Gagnier, Specimen et epistola parte Libri Hanomandi. ii The private life of Mahomet, from his birth to his mission, is preserved by Abu Fedaw, in Vit. c. 3—7, and the Arabian writers of genealogical and historical note, who are alluded to by Porro and d'Arvieux, P. Specimen et epistola parte Libri Hanomandi.
the Arabian traveller. He compares the nations and the religions of the earth; discovers the weakness of the Persian and Roman monarchies; beholds, with pity and indignation, the degeneracy of the times; and resolves to unite, under one God and one king, the territories of the East and West. Our more accurate inquiry will suggest, that instead of visiting the courts, the camps, the temples of the east, the two journeys of Mahomet into Syria were confined to the fairs of Bostra and Damascas: that he was only thirteen years of age when he accompanied the caravans into Arabia; and that his duty compelled him to return as soon as he had disposed of the merchandise of Cadijah. In these hasty and superficial excursions, the eye of genius might discern some objects invisible to his grosser companions; some seeds of knowledge might be cast upon a fruitful soil; but his ignorance of the Syrian language must have checked his curiosity; and I cannot perceive, in the life or writings of Mahomet, that his prospect was far extended beyond the limits of the Arabian world. From every region of that solitary world, the pilgrims of Mecca were annually assembled, by the calls of devotion and commerce, in the face of Mecca, the cradle of God: the Syrian citizen, in his native tongue, might study the political state and character of the tribes, the theory and practice of the Jews and christians. Some useful strangers might be tempted, or forced, to implore the rights of hospitality; and the enemies of Mahomet, by every means of violence or bribery, the martyr. Mahomet, whom they accuse of lending their secret aid to the composition of the Koran. Conversation enriches the understanding, but solitude is the school of genius; and the unfitness of a work denotes the hand of a single artist. From his earliest youth Mahomet was pious and good, and during the month of Ramadan, he withdrew from the world, and from the arms of Cadijah: in the cave of Hera, three miles from Mecca, he consulted the spirit of fraud or enthusiasm, whose abode is not in the heavens, but in the mind of the prophet. The faith which, under the name of Zulma, he preached to his family and nation, is compounded of an eternal truth, and a necessary fiction. That there is only one God, and that Mahomet is the Apostle of God. One God. It is the boast of the Jewish apologetics, that while the learned nations of antiquity were debauched by the fables of polytheism, their simple ancestors of Palestine preserved the knowledge and worship of the true God. The moral attributes of Jehovah may not easily be reconciled with the standard of human virtue: his metaphysical qualities are darkly expressed; but each page of the s蘧tauch and the prophets is an evidence of his power; the unity of his name is inscribed on the first table of the law; and his sanctuary was never defiled by any visible image of the invisible essence. After the ruin of the temple, the faith of the Hebrew exiles was purified and enlightened, by the spirit and devotion of the sages, and the prophets. Mahomet will not justly prejudice his reproach, that the Jews of Mecca or Medina adored Ezra as the son of God. But the children of Israel had ceased to be a people; and the religions of the world were guilty, at least in the eyes of the prophet, of giving sons, or daughters, or companions, to the Supreme God. In the rude idoltry of the Arabs, the crime is not so much a reproach to the Semitic system, as excused by the pre-eminence of the first planet, or intelligence, in their celestial hierarchy; and in the Magian system the conflict of the two principles betrays the imperfection of the conqueror. The christians of the seventh century had insensibly relaxed from the fidelity of faith; and the Koran is a glorious testimony to the unity of the God. The prophet of Mecca rejected the worship of idols and men, of stars and planets, on the rational principle that whatever rises must set, that whatever is born must die, that whatever is corruptible must decay and perish. In the light of the Author of the world, in which he dwelt and abode an infinite and eternal being, without form or place, without issue or similitude, present to our most secret thoughts, existing by the necessity of his own nature, and deriving from himself all moral and intellectual perfection. These sublime truths, thus announced in the language of the prophetic, are firmly held by his disciples, and defined with metaphysical precision by the interpreters of the Koran. A philosophical theist might subscribe the popular creed of the Mahommutans; but a creed too sublime perhaps for our present faculties. What object remains for the fancy, or the criticism, or the curiosity, when abstracted from the unknown substance all ideas of time and space, of motion and matter, of sensation and reflection? The first principle of reason and revelation was confirmed by the voice of Mahomet; his proselytes, from India to Morocco, are distinguished by the name of his sect. 1. The Count de Bouvillouville (Vie de Mahomet, p. 292—328) leaves us to infer this from the figure, which Corvinus, his agent, of Cyrus of Persia. His journey to the court of Persia was probably a fiction; he cannot trace the origin of his explanation. 2. Les Grece sont parties des honneurs. 3. These terms are expressed by almost all the Arabian writers, both Mahometans and christians, (Garnier, ad Abulfeda, p. 179.) 4. I am not at leisure to pursue the fables or conjectures which under the names of assis or companions are mentioned by the interpreters of the Koran, (Aur. 16. 6. 2.) 5. Garnier, Not. ad Abulfeda, p. 11. 6. Muslims, (p. 595.) 7. This is undoubtedly the case. (p. 357.) 8. See the Koran, particularly the second, (p. 357) the fifth, (p. 437) and the sixth, (p. 414) chapters, which proclaim the omnipresence of the Creator. 9. The most valuable are translated by Pococke, (Specimen, p. 271; 284—282.) O'Kane, (Hist. of the Nations of the Middle East, v. 4.) Belzoni, (De Religione Musulmanis, l. I. p. 7—8.) and Chardin, (Voyages sur l'Asie, tom. iv. p. 4—25.) The great truth, that God is without similitude, is boldly criticised by Macaroni, (Alcoran, tom. 1. part. ii. p. 87—91) because he made men after his own image.
by the name of Unitarians; and the danger of idolatry has been prevented by the interdiction of images.

The doctrine of eternal decrees and absolute predestination is strictly embraced by the Mahometans; and they struggle with the common difficulties, how to reconcile the presence of God with the freedom and responsibility of man; how to explain the permission of evil under the reign of infinite power and infinite goodness.

The God of nature has written his apathy on the surface of existence in all his works, and his law is a criticism on the whole order of things. To restore the knowledge of the one, and the practice of the other, has been the real or pretended aim of the prophets of every age: the liberty of Mahomet allowed to his predecessors the same credit which he claimed for himself; and the chain of inspiration was prolonged from the fall of Adam to the promulgation of the Koran. During that period, some rays of prophetic light had been imparted to one hundred and twenty-four thousand of the elect, discriminated by their respective measure of virtue and grace; three hundred and thirteen apostles were sent with a special commission to recall their countrymen to idolatry and superstition; one hundred and four volumes had been dictated by the holy spirit; and six legislators of transcendent brightness have announced to mankind the six successive revelations of various rites, but of one immovable religion. The authority and station of Adam, Noah, Moses, Jesus, and Mahomet, rest, for the most part, in just gradation above each other; but whenever there has been any one among the prophets or authors of the Koran, the universe is darkened. The writings of the patriarchs were extant only in the apocryphal copies of the Greeks and Syrians: the conduct of Adam had not entitled him to the gratitude or respect of his children: the seven precepts of Noah were observed by an inferior and imperfect class of the proscylytes of the synagogue; the memory of Abraham was obscurely revered by the Sabians in his native land of Chaldea; of the myriads of prophets, Moses alone lived and reigned; and the remnant of the inspired writings was comprised in the books of the Old and New Testament. The miraculous story of Moses is conscripted and emblazoned in the Koran; and the captive Jews enjoy the secret reversion of poetical passages on their own and their enemies whose recent crowds they deride. For the author of Christianity, the Mahometans are taught by the prophet to entitle a high and mysterious reverence.

Jesus. Verily, Christ Jesus, the son of Mary, the apostle of God, and his word, which he conveyed by Mary, into the Spirit proceeding from him: honourable in this world, and in the world to come; and one of those who approach near to the presence of God. The wonders of the genuine and apocryphal gospels are profusely heaped on his head; and the Latin church has not disdained to borrow from the Koran the immaculate conception of his virgin mother. Yet Jesus was a mere mortal; and, at the day of judgment, his testimony will serve to condemn both the Jews, who reject him as a prophet, and the christians, who adore him as the Son of God. The nation which so highly esteemed his reputation, and conspired against his life; but their intention was only a ghastly, a phantom or a criminal was substituted on the cross, and the innocent mint was translated to the seventh heaven. During six hundred years the doctrine of the new temple as the center of revelation; but the christians insensibly forget both the laws and the example of their founder; and Mahomet was instructed by the Gnostics to accuse the church, as well as the synagogue, of corrupting the integrity of the sacred text. The piety of Moses and of Christ rejoiced in the assurance of a future prophet, the same in substance as himself but different in genus. A paper copy, in a volume of silk and jewels, was brought down to the lowest heaven by the angel Gabriel, who, under the Jewish economy, had indeed been despatched on the most important errands; and this trusty messenger successively revealed the chapters and verses to the Arabian prophet. True, the word of God was communicated in the same manner to the apostles and evangelists of Christ, might not be incompatible with the exercise of their reason and memory; and the diversity of their genius is strongly marked in the style and composition of the books of the New Testament. But Mahomet was content with a character more humble, yet more sublime, of a simple editor: the substance of the Koran, according to himself or his disciples, is uncreated and eternal; subsisting in the essence of the Deity, and inscribed with a pen of light on the table of his everlasting decrees. A planner from sapphire and agate, the word of God, and of the apostle, was diligently recorded by his disciples on palm-leaves and the shoulder-bones of mutton; and the pages, without order or connexion, were cast into

1. Reland, de Relig. Moham. 1, r.p. 17—47, Sale's Preliminary Discourse, p. 78—75, Voyage de Chardin, tom. iv. pp. 28—37, and 37—47. For the Persian addition, "All is the vicar of God!" Yet the preceptive number of prophets is not ascertained. For the apocryphal books of Adam, see Fabritius, Codex Pseudo-Abelinianus, tom. iv. col. 377—387; Codex Paris., tom. iv. col. 378—388. For the books of Enoch, see Sike, p. 165—169. But the book of Enoch is conscripted, in some measure, by the indication of the apostle St. Jude; and a long legendary fragment is added by Schinz and Scaliger.

2. The seven precepts of Noah are explained by Marsham, Canon. Chronicum, p. 154—159. He adopts, on this occasion, the learning and credulity of St. Helen.

3. See the gospel of St. Thomas, or of the infancy, in the Codex Apocalipticus. See the references of the last to the various testimonies concerning it. (p. 155—156.) It was printed in Greek by Cottereil, in the folio of 1671, and in Arabic by Sike, who presents us with a copy more recent than the above, but imperfect in its quotations and in the original sense of the speech of Christ in his cradle, his living birds of clay. (Sike, c. l. p. 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 178, 179, 184, 203, 204, Codere, c. 2, p. 161—164.)

4. It is darkly hinted in the Koran, (c. 3, p. 38,) and more clearly explained by the tradition of the Sonnets, (Sale's Note, tom. ii. p. 223.) In the twelfth century, the imprecate conception was condemned by St. Bernard as a presumptuous novelty. (See Paus, Hist. Philos. Tom. iii. 1, p. 604.)

5. See the Koran, c. 3, v. 55, c. 4, v. 156, of Maracci's edition, c. 2, p. 179. Here, as in the prayer of Azur, "let me take the same creed you have received, I will not have the same faith as you, but will make easy the system of the sectarians; but the commentaries of many moderns are as obscure as the word of God; and another man, a friend or an enemy, was cherished in the likeness of Jesus; a folio, which they had read in the gospel of St. Barnabas, and which had been started as early as the time of Irenaeus, by some Eunuch heretics. (Beauvoir, Hist. du Manichéene, tom. ii. p. 25, 30, 34.)

6. This charge is obscurely urged in the Koran, (c. 3, p. 43,) but meminied by the Apostle Eusebius, and by his followers, in their discourses and writings and criticism to give any weight or colour to their suspicions. Yet the Ariums and Nestorians could relate some stories, and the apocryphal gospels were a favorite light to the heretics of that age. See Beauvoir, tom. i. p. 278—282.

7. See the gospel of St. Thomas, or of the infancy, in the Codex Apocalipticus. See the references of the last to the various testimonies concerning it. (p. 155—156.) It was printed in Greek by Cottereil, in the folio of 1671, and in Arabic by Sike, who presents us with a copy more recent than the above, but imperfect in its quotations and in the original sense of the speech of Christ in his cradle, his living birds of clay. (Sike, c. l. p. 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 178, 179, 184, 203, 204, Codere, c. 2, p. 161—164.)

a domestic chest in the custody of one of his wives. Two years after the death of Mahomet, the sacred volume was collected and published by his friend and successor Abubeker, and it is said that the caliph Ottoman, in the thirteenth year of the Hegira; and the various editions of the Koran assert the same miraculous privilege of a uniform and incorruptible text. In the spirit of enthusiasm or vanity, the prophet rests the truth of his mission on the merit of his book, authorizes and challenges both men and angels to imitate the beauties of a single page, and presumes to assert that God alone could dictate this incomparable performance. This argument is most powerfully addressed to a devout Arabian, whose mind is attuned to faith and rapture, whose ear is delighted by the music of the Koran, and whose ignorance is incapable of comparing the productions of human genius. The harmony and copiousness of style will not reach, in a version, the European infidel: he will persevere with impatience the endless incoherent rhapsody of fable, and precept, and declamation, which seldom excites a sentiment or an idea, which sometimes crawls in the dust, and is sometimes lost in the clouds. The divine attributes exalt the fancy of the Arabian missionary; but his loftiest strains must yield to the sublime simplicity of the book of Job, composed in a remote age, in the same country, and in the same language, and yet which exceed the faculties of a man, to what superior intelligence should we ascribe the liad of Homer, or the Prophecies of Demosthenes? In all religions, the life of the founder supplies the silence of his written revelation; the sayings of Mahomet were so many lessons of truth; his actions so many examples of virtue; and the public and private memorials were preserved by his wives and companions. At the end of two hundred years, the Sottina, or oral law, was fixed and consenrated by the labours of Abi Bachir, who discriminated seven thousand two hundred and seventy-five genuine traditions, from a mass of three hundred thousand reports, of a more doubtful or spurious character. Each day the pious author prayed in the temple of Mecca, and performed his ablutions with the water of Zemzem; the pages were successively deposited on the pulpit, and the scription of the apostle; and this work has been approved by the four orthodox sects of the Somonites.

The mission of the ancient prophets, of Moses and of Jesus, had been confirmed by many splendid prodigies; and Mahomet was repeatedly urged, by the inhabitants of Mecca and Medina, to manifest similar evidences of his mission, and the public and private memorials were preserved by his wives and companions. At the end of two hundred years, the Sottina, or oral law, was fixed and consenrated by the labours of Abi Bachir, who discriminated seven thousand two hundred and seventy-five genuine traditions, from a mass of three hundred thousand reports, of a more doubtful or spurious character. Each day the pious author prayed in the temple of Mecca, and performed his ablutions with the water of Zemzem; the pages were successively deposited on the pulpit, and the scription of the apostle; and this work has been approved by the four orthodox sects of the Somonites.

The corruptions of the Koran may be regarded as a parallel to the corruptions of the O. T.

The rectories of the Koran are more assure than himself of his miraculous gifts, and their confidence and credulity increase as they are more imbibed. The Koran further records many extraordinary exploits. They believe or affirm that trees went forth to meet him; that he was saluted by stones; that water gushed from his fingers; that he fed the hungry, cured the sick, and raised the dead; that a beam groaned to him; that a censer complained to him; that a shoulder of mutton informed him of its being poisoned; and that both animate and inanimate nature were equally subject to the apostle of God. His dream of a nocturnal journey is seriously described as a real and corporeal transaction. A mysterious animal, the Borak, conveyed him from the temple of Mecca to the Mount of Jerusalem, returned the Borak, returned to Mecca, and performed in the tenth part of a night the journey so marvellous that many theologians have been surprised by the magnitude of the event. This ancient legend, the apostle confounded in a national assembly the malicious challenge of the Korish. His resistless word split asunder the orb of the moon; the chasitable planet stopt from her station in the sky, accomplished the seven revolutions round the Caaba, saluted the Mahometan in the temple, and thence returning her dimensions, entered at the collar, and issued forth through the sleeve, of his shirt. The vulgar are amused with the marvellous tales; but the grave part of the Mussulman doctors imitate the modesty of their master, and indulge a latitude of faith or interpretation. They might speciously allege, that in presenting the religion, it was needless to violate the harmony, of nature; that a creed declined with mystery may be excused from miracles; and that the word of Mahomet was not less potent than the rod of Moses.

The polytheist is oppressed and dissatisfied by the variety of superstition: a hundred thousand rites of Egyptian origin were interwoven with the essence of the Messian law; and Precepts of Mahomet, fasting, alms, charity, the efficacy of prayer, etc., are immediately invented to put down Mahometanism, which is deemed equivalent to Christianity, or at least as a deformed, and degraded sect of Christianity.

x Yet a sect of Arabsians was persuaded, that it might be equalled or surpassed by the Mahometan poetry. The prophet himself has commended the abilities of a poet named Matarri (the poem is too hard for the translator) derives the rhyme-strings of the most applauded passage, (tom. i. part ii. p. 152.)

x Colloquia (whether real or fabulous) in media Arabia stitu atque Arabibus antiquis (Lusch, de Poeti Hebraicum Praefis. xxvii. xxviii. with his German editor Michaelis, Epistulae, iv.) Yet Michaelis has detected many genuine Arabic inscriptions, the clephistines, papyri; and he has produced a stanzically styled, Arabica Hebraica. The resemblance of the sister dialects was much more visible in their childhood than in their mature age. (Michaelis, p. 662. Schultens, in Præfis. Job.)

c See more remarkably, Koran, c. 2. 6. 12. 15. 17. Prideaux (Life of Mahomet, p. 13, 153) has confounded the imposter. Maracci, with more learned apparatus, has shewn that the passages which deny his miracles are clear and positive. Alcoran, i. part ii. p. 167, and those which seem to assert them, are ambiguous and insufficient. (p. 12—22.)

x See the Specimen Hist. Arabia, the text of Abulfarach, p. 17. the notes of Pococke, p. 127—130. D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 76, 77. Chardin, tom. ii. p. 209—212. Maracci (Alcoran, tom. i. p. 22—64,) has most laboriously collected and compared the miracles and prophecies of Mahomet, which, according to some writers, amount to three thousand.

x The nocturnal journey is substantially related by Abulfeda, (in Tom. Mohammed, c. 19, v. 23,) who says that the Arabian, by preaching, etc., to this journey, is to disbelieve the Koran. Yet the learned, without exception, the Arabic and Persian language, have only dropt a mysterious thing: Iaus illi qui tristissime sermones suum ab oratorio Haram ad orationem fantasticum, (Korani, c. 17, v. 1.) in Maracci, tom. ii. p. 697; for Salibi's version is more identic.) A slender basis for the aerial structure of tradition.

x In the prophet's life, which scarce contains a year or two for the future, Mahomet had said: Ambrogiovanni: Arabic: tab. c. 1. in Maracci, tom. iii. p. 688.) This figure of rhetoric has been conveyed to every government, which is the most respectful eye-witnesses (Maracci, tom. ii. p. 650.) The festivity is still celebrated at Paris, and the legend is assiduously spun out by Gagnier, (Vie de Mahomet, tom. i. p. 69—134.) on the fact, as it should seem, of the credulous Al lance; yet a Mahometan doctor has ascribed the doctrine of the resurrection to the prophet, as the principal witness: (apud Pococke, Specimen, p. 187.) The best interpreters are content to suppose that its weight is laid on the apod. Hottinger, Hist. Oriental. i. th. 302.) and the silence of Abd ulhassan is worthy of a prince and a philosopher.
the spirit of the gospel had evaporated in the pagane-try of the church. The prophet of Mecca was tempted by prejudice, or policy, or patriotism, to sanctify the rites of the Arabians, and the custom of visiting the holy stone of the Caaba. But the precepts of Mahomet himself inculcate a more simple and rational piety: prayer, fasting, and alms, are the religious duties of a musulman; and he is encouraged to hope, that prayer will carry him half way to God, fasting will bring him to the door of his palace, and alms will gain him admissicnte. 1 According to the tradition of the nocturnal journey, the apostle, in his personal character, was conducted by the Spirit, was intended to impress on his disciples the daily obligation of fifty prayers. By the advice of Moses, he applied for an alleviation of this intolerable burden; the number was gradually reduced to five; without any dispensation of business or pleasure, or time or place; the devotion of the faithful is repeated at day-break, at noon, in the afternoon, and in the first watch of the night; and, in the present day of religious fervour, our travellers are edified by the profound humility and attention of the Turks and Persians. Cleanliness is the key of prayer: the frequent instigation of the hands, the ablutions, the meats, which were contrived by the Arabs, is solemnly enjoined by the Koran: and a permission is formally granted to supply with sand the scarcity of water. The words and attitudes of supplication, as it is performed either sitting, standing, or prostrate, are prescribed by custom or authority, but the prayer is poured forth in short and fervent ejaculations: the measure of zeal is not exavasted by a tedious liturgy; and each musulman, for his own person, is invested with the character of a priest. Among the Jews, who reject the use of incense and music, are seen men seeking most to restrain such wanerings of the fancy, by directing the eye and the thought towards a ka'ba, or visible point of the horizon. The prophet was at first inclined to gratify the Jews by the choice of Jerusalem; but he soon returned to a more natural purity; and five times every day the eyes of the natives at Astrakan, at Ferga, at Delhi, are devoutly turned to the holy temple of Mecca. Yet every spot for the service of God is equally pure: the Mahometans indiscriminately pray in their chamber or in the street. As a distinction from the Jews and christi-s, Friday is to each week the most happy of the se-ful institution of public worship: the people are asbsembled in the mosque; and the imam, some respectable elder, ascends the pulpit, to begin the prayer and pronounce the sermon. But the Mahometan religion is destitute of priesthood or sacrifice; and the independent sects of the fanatics, that break down with contempt on the ministers and slaves of superstition. II. The voluntary k penance of the ascetics, the torment and glory of their lives, was odious to a prophet who counselled in his companions a rash vow of abstaining from flesh, and women, and sleep; and firmly declared, that he would suffer no monks in his religion. 1 Yet he instituted, in each year, a fast of thirty days; and strenuously recommended the observance, a discipline which purifies the soul and subdues the body, as a

1 The most authentic account of these precepts, pilgrimage, prayer, fasting, alms, and ablutions, is extracted from the Persian and Arab-by the French of Sale; (Prospero, c. 5: 26—28) and of D'Herbelot, (in his excellent treatise de Rokheem Mahomedici, Utrecht, 1717, p. 57—122) and Charlier, (Voyages en Perse, tom. iv, p. 47—115: Marcelli is a partial answer: but the Jew, Charlier, had the eyes of a philosopher; and Reclus, a judicious student, had travelled over Persia, and wrote his observations at Utrecht. The fourteenth letter of Travels of the Levant, tom. ii, p. 225—300, in octavo, describes with more elegance a country, which has been changed since his time from the object of his research.)

k Mahomet (Sale's Koran, c. 9, p. 153,) reproaches the christians with taking their priests and monks for their gods, besides their own. Yet Marcelli, Prosdocimus, in part c. 69, 70, excuses the worship, especially of the popes, and quotes, from the Koran itself, the case of Elisha, who received the prophet from heaven, consigning to adorer atonement. Mahomet condemned la vie religieuse; and that the first rewards of fakers, devils, &c. do not appear till after the 500th of the Hegira. (Biblio. Orient. p. 292, 715.)

1 See the double prohibition; (Koran, c. 2, p. 25, c. 5, p. 58,) the one in the style of a legislator, the other in that of a fanatic. The day and private motives of Mahomet are investigated by Prospero, (Leviathan, Utrecht, 1717, p. 47—115: Reclus, (in his excellent treatise de Korkeem Mahomedici, Utrecht, 1717, p. 57—122) and Charlier, (Voyages en Perse, tom. iv, p. 47—115: Marcelli is a partial answer: but the Jew, Charlier, had the eyes of a philosopher; and Reclus, a judicious student, had travelled over Persia, and wrote his observations at Utrecht. The fourteenth letter of Travels of the Levant, tom. ii, p. 225—300, in octavo, describes with more elegance a country, which has been changed since his time from the object of his research.)

The jealousy of Maracci (Prosdocimus, part iv, p. 35,) prompts him to enumerate the more liberal usages of the catholics of Rome. Fifteen great hospitals are open to many thousand patients and pil-gims. Fifteen hundred mandibles are annually purchased, fifty-five hundred churches and monasteries are annually repaired. The confraternities relieve the wants of their brethren, &c. The benviction of Lombardey, which has more extensive influence, has founded about twenty more is to be ascribed to the humanity, than to the religion of the people.

1 See Herodotus (II. c. 123,) and our learned countryman Sir John Marsham, (Canon, Chronicum, p. 46,) The Achei of the sand wrote to the philosopher, that there was no country in the world, as they were painted by the fancy of the Egyptians and Greeks, of the pair of the Græcos and the Persians, that Mahomet was more is to be ascribed to the humanity, than to the religion of the people.

1 The Koran (c. 2, p. 29, &c., of Sale, p. 52, &c., of Marcelli, p. 57,) retains an ingenious mixture, which suited the curiosity, and conformed the faith, of Abraham.
most firmly believe his immaculate, nature, are at a loss to understand how she can think or act without the agency of his own will.

The reunion of the soul and body will be followed by the final judgment of mankind; and, in his copy of the Magna picture, the prophet has too faithfully represented the forms of proceeding, and even the semblance of the dispensation of an earthly tribunal. By his intolerant adversaries he is upbraided for extending, even to themselves, the hope of salvation, for assuring the blackest heresy, that every man who believes in God, and accomplishes good works, may expect in the last day a favorable examination by his rational qualities. So distinct in this character licentious; nor is it probable that a messenger from heaven should degrade the value and necessity of his own revelation.

In the idiom of the Koran, the belief of God is inseparable from that of Mahomet: the good works are those which he had enjoined; and the two qualifications imply the proficiency of the satisfactoriness of the Christian, the Jew, the Sabian, the Magian, and the infidel, are sunk below each other in the abyss; and the lowest hell is reserved for the faithless hypocrites who have assumed the mask of religion. After the greater part of mankind has been condemned for their opinions, the true believers only will be judged by their works; the justice of each will be accurately weighed in a real or allegorical balance, and a singular mode of compensation will be allowed for the payment of injuries; the aggressor will refund an equivalent of his own good actions, for the benefit of the person whom he has injured; and if he should be unable to give moral property, the weight of his sins will be loaded with an adequate share of the demerits of the sufferer.

According as the scales of guilt or virtue shall preponderate, the sentence will be pronounced, and all, without distinction, will pass over the sharp and perilous bridge of life; but the immortal spirits in the footsteps of Mahomet, will gloriously enter the gates of paradise, while the guilty will fall into the first and mildest of the seven hells. The term of expiation will vary from nine hundred to seven thousand years; but the prophet has judiciously promised, that all his disciples, whatever may be their sins, shall be saved, by their own faith, and his intercession, from eternal damnation. It is not surprising that supersition should act most powerfully on the fears of heretics, since the human fancy can paint with more energy the misery than the bliss of a future life. With thehetto darkened, and the eyes of the heart closed, the duration of such an injury as this might be aggravated to an infinite degree by the idea of endless duration. But the same idea operates with an opposite effect on the continuity of pleasure; and too much of our present enjoyment is obtained from the relief, or the contemplation of scenes which an Arabian prophet should dwell with raptures on the graves, the fountains, and the rivers of paradise, but instead of injurious blessings to a liberal taste for harmony and science, conversation and friendship, he idly celestes the pearls and diamonds, the robes of silk, palaces of marble, dishes of gold, rich wines, artificial daunies, numerous attendants, and the whole train of sensual and costly luxury, which he has acquired in the short period of this mortal life. Seventy-two hours, or black-eyed girls, of resplendent beauty, blooming youth, growing old, and yet preserving, in the pages of this book, his memory of self-sufficiency, and perhaps his vanity, he has created for the use of the meanest believer; a moment of pleasure will be prolonged to a thousand years, and souls and faculties will be engrossed; all that will remain will be the remembrance of the body, unless it was restored to the possession and exercise of its worthiest faculties; and the union of sexual and intellectual enjoyment is requisite to complete the happiness of the happy animal, the perfect man. Yet the joys of the Mahometan paradise will not be confined to the possession of the luxury of luxury and appetite; and the prophet has expressly declared, that all meaner happiness will be forgotten and despised by the saints and martyrs, who shall be admitted to the beatitude of the divine vision.

The first and most admirable footsteps of Mahomet, are those of his wife, his servant, his pupil, and his friend; since he presented himself as a prophet to those who were most conversant with his infirmities as a man. Yet Cadiz bathed the words, and cherished the glory of her hou-sound; the obsequious and affectionate Zobeida, was transferred by the prospect of free favours from the illustrious Ali, the son of Abu Talib, embraced the sentiments of his cousin with the spirit of a youthful hero; and the wealth, the moderation, the reverence of Abderahman, combined with the religion of the prophet whom he had decided to succeed. By his persuasion, ten of the most respectable citizens of Mecca were introduced to the private lessons of Islam; they yielded to the voice of reason and enthusiasm; they repeated the fundamental creed: "there is but one God, and Mahomet is the Apostle of God," and their faith, even in this life, was rewarded with riches and honours, with the command of armies and the government of kingdoms. Three years were silently employed in the conversion of fourteen proselytes, the first-fruits of his mission; but in the fourth year, he had established his father with his family and the world to come. God has commanded me to call you to his service. Who among you will support my brethren? Who among you will be my companion and my vizir?" No answer was returned, till the father of the party, strongly importuned the prophet, to accost his son, and consent to the import to his family the light of divine truth, he prepared a banquet, a lamb, as it is said, and a bowl of milk, for the entertainment of forty guests of the race of Hashem. "Friends and kinsmen," said Mahomet to the assembly, "I offer you, and I alone can offer, the most precious of gifts, the treasures of this world and of the world to come. He who accepts my offer shall have his reward in this world, and of the hereafter."

The people of Mecca were hardened in opposition by their unbelief in the Koran, and as a proof of their unbelief, they repeated the presumption of an orphan, the reformer of his country: the pious orations of Mahomet in the Caaba were answered by the clamours of Abul Taleb. "Citizens and pilgrims, listen not to the tempter, hearken not to his call; he is a rebellious prophet, a spot to the pure, a Lata and Al Uzah." Yet the son of Abdallah was ever dear to the aged chief; and he protected the name and person of his nephew against the assaults of the Koreishites, who had long been jealous of the preeminence of the family of Hashem. Their malice was, that they should be saved from the salutary influence of Job; the crime of impurity was punished by the Arabian magistracy; and Mahomet was guilty of deserting and denying the national duties. But so loose was the policy of Mecca, that the leaders of the Koreish, instead of accusering a criminal, were compelled to employ the need of their water, and inflamed by the repeated addresses of Abul Taleb in the style of reproach and menace, 'Thy nephew reviles our religion; he alleges our wise forefathers of ignorance and folly; silence him quickly, lest he kindle tumult and disorder in the land.' If he would retain his rank, he must consent to let his sword against him, and his adherents, and then will be responsible for the blood of thy fellow-citizens." The weight and moderation of Abul Taleb ended the violence of religious faction; the most helpless and timid of the disciples retired to Ethiopia, and none of the prophet's companions would assist them to the world's strength in the town and country. As he was still supported by his family, the rest of the tribe of Koreish engaged themselves to renounce all intercourse with the children of Hashem, neither to buy nor sell, neither to marry nor to give in marriage, but to pursue the need of their water, and inflamed by the person of Mahomet to the justice of the gods. The decree was suspended in the Caaba before the eyes of the nation: the messages of the Koreish pursued the Mussulman exiles in the heart of Africa: they besieged the prophet and his most faithful followers,145 and filled the breasts of his people with anxiety by the retaliation of injuries and insults. A doubtful truce restored the appearances of concord; till the death of Abul Taleb abandoned Mahomet to the power of his enemies, at the moment when he was deprived of his only resource, and exposed to the indignation and vengeance of the Hashimites. Anger of a spy revealed their conspiracy; and flight was the only resource of Mahomet. At the death of night, accompanied by his friend Abubeker, he secretly escaped from his house: the assassins and their spies watched at the door; but they were deceived by the figure of Ali, who reposed on the bed, and was covered with the green vestment of the apostle. The Khutbat of the primitive world, Oloehar, ad Locah de Petri Nebenca, p. 131-135. Recherches sur les Egyptiens, tom. i. p. 48, &c. In the time of Job, the crime of impurity was punished by the Arabian magistracy, (c. 13, § 22-23.) I blame for a respectable persecute, 622. The Arians, (c. 30, § 61, edit. 2.) The presbyterian in the university of Oxford, c. 13-35,) who justifies and applauds this patriarchal impiety. 145 'D'Herbein, Biblia, Graec., p. 415. He quotes a particular history of the flight of Mahomet.
reish respected the pious of the heroic youth; but some venerable of Arabia, which are still extant, exhibit an interesting picture of his anxiety, his tenderness, and his religious confidence. Three days Mahomet and his companion were concealed in the cave of Thor, at the distance of a league from Mecca; and in the close of each evening, they received, from the son and daughter of the wealth, food and drink. The delicacy of the Korish exceeded every hunt in the neighbourhood of the city; they arrived at the entrance of the cavern; but the providential deceit of a spider's web and a pigeon's nest, is supposed to convince them that the place was solitary and inviolable. They were obliged to undergo a perilous and rapid journey along the sea-coast, he halted at Koba, two miles from the city, and made his public entry into Medina, sixteen days after his flight from Mecca. Five hundred citizens advanced to meet him; he was hailed with acclamations of joy and devotion; Mahomet was bearded, an umbrella shielded his head, and a turban was unfurled before him to supply the deficiency of a standard. His bravest disciples, who had been scattered by the storm, assembled round his person; and the equal though various merit of the Moslems was dis-business by the names of Mahometa and Ansars, the fugitives of Mecca, and the auxiliaries of Medina.

To eradicate the seeds of jealousy, Mahomet judiciciously coupled his principal followers with the rights and obligations of brethren, and when Ali found himself without a peer, the prophet tenderly declared, that he would be the companion and brother of the noble youth. The effect of gold with promising excitement the holy fraternity was respected in peace and war, and the two parties vied with each other in a genocide en acted on by the apostle's feet the head of his father.

From his establishment at Medina, Harapal dignity, Mahomet assumed the exercise of the A.D. 622.
provincial and sacerdotal office; and it was impious to appeal from a judge whose decrees were inspired by the divine wisdom. A small portion of ground, the patronage of two orphans, was acquired by gift or purson; on that chosen spot, he built a house and a mosque, more venerable in their rude simplicity than the palaces and temples of the Assyrian emperors. His seed of gold, cut silver, was inscribed with the title; when he prayed and preached in the weekly assembly, he leaned against the trunk of a palm-tree;
and it was long before he indulged himself in the use of a chair or pulpit of rough timber. After a reign of six years, fifteen hundred Moslems, in arms and in the field, renewed their oath of allegiance; and his chief repeated the assurance of protection till the death of the last member, or the final dissolution of the party. It was in the same camp that the deity of Mecca was astonished by the attention of the faithful to the words and looks of the prophet, by the gai-ness with which they collected his spittle, a hair that dropped on the ground, the refuse water of his instructions, as if they participated in some degree of the prophetic virtue. “I have seen,” said he, “the Chos-fores of Persia and the Caesars of Rome, but never did I behold a king among his subjects like Mahomet among his compatriots.” The diviner fervour of enthusiasm acts with more energy and truth than the cold and formal servility of courts.

2 The Hejira was instituted by Omar, the second caliph, in institution of the era of the martyrs of the Christians; (D'Herbelot, p. 414) and properly commenced sixty-eight days after the flight of Mahomet, with the first of Moharram, according to the Moslem year, which coincides with Friday, July 10th, A.D. 622. (Abulfeda, VII. 34, Moeham, c. 22, p. 40—41, and Green's edition of Elgin Bisco's Epochs Arab., &c. c. p. 8, 10, &c.)

3 From his mission to the Hejira, may be found in Abulfeda, c. 14—41, and Amur. Hen, p. 282—283, &c.)

From his mission to the Hejira, may be found in Abulfeda, c. 14—41, and Amur. Hen, p. 282—283, &c.)

The hejira from p. 17—237 is vouched by Al Jannabi, and disclaimed by Abufeda.

4 The trade invasion of Mahomet is described by Abulfeda (c. 30, 32, 40, 56) and Gagnier. (Com. l. p. 151, &c. 395, &c. Com. l. p. 228, &c.)

5 Prideaux (Life of Mahomet, p. 42) reviles the wickedness of the scum who defiled the Korish, and the Moslem who spits on the Korish: a reproach which he drew from the Daghistan contra Saracenum (p. 525), but he has not proved that the Korish were as "Najjar", which signifies, in this place, not an obscene trade, but a native tribe of Arabia. The descriptive state of the ground is described by Abufeda; and his worthy interpreter has proved, from Al Ba-chari, the opus of a price; from Al Jannabi, the fair purchase; and from Al soda, the Amur. Hen, p. 282—283, &c.)

6 Al Jannabi (proud Gagnier, tom. ii, p. 216, 217), describes the seal and pulpit, as two venerable relics of the apostle of God; and the portrait of his court is taken from Abufeda. (c. 41, p. 48. &c.)
He declares war against the infidels. In the state of nature every man has a right to defend, by force of arms, his person and his property; to resist, or even to prevent, the violence of his enemies, and to extend his hostilities to a reasonable measure of satisfaction and retaliation. In the free society of the Arabs, the duties of subject and citizen imposed a feeble restraint; and Mahomet, in the exercise of a power almost divinely inspired, had been despotic, tyrannical, and banished by the injustice of his countrymen. The choice of an independent people had exalted the fugitive of Mecca to the rank of a sovereign; and he was invested with the just prerogatives of forming alliances, and of waging offensive or defensive war. The usurpation of human rights was supplied and armed by the plenitude of divine power: the prophet of Medina assumed, in his new revelations, a fierce and more sanguinary tone, which proves that his former moderation was the effect of weakness: the means of persuasion had been tried, the season of forbearance was elapsed, and he was now resolved to propagate his religion by the sword, to destroy the monuments of idolatry, and, without regarding the sanctity of days or months, to pursue the unbelieving nations of the earth. The same bloody precepts, so repeated and impressed in the Koran, were inscribed by the author to the Pentateuch and the Gospel. The mild tenor of the evangelic style may explain an ambiguous text, that Jesus did not bring peace on the earth, but a sword: his patient and humble virtues should not be confounded with the intolerable zeal of princes and bishops, who have traced the murder of his disciples. In the prosecution of religious war, Mahomet might appeal with more propriety to the example of Moses, of the judges and the kings of Israel. The military laws of the Hebrews are still more severe than those of the Arabian legislator. 1 The Levites, armed in person or in companies, were a city resisting its summons, the males, without distinction, were put to the sword: the seven nations of Canaan were devoted to destruction; and neither repentance nor conversion could shield them from the inevitable doom, that no creature within their provinces should be left alive. The fear of friendship, or submission, or battle, was proposed to the enemies of Mahomet. If they professed the creed of Islam, they were admitted to all the temporal and spiritual benefits of his primitive disciples, and marched under the same banner to extend the religion which they had professed. The choice was left to each, decided by his interest, yet he seldom trampled on a prostrate enemy; and he seems to promise, that, on the payment of a tribute, the least guilty of his unbelieving subjects might be indulged in their worship, or at least in their imperfect faith. In the first months of his reign, he practised the lessons of holy warfare, and displayed his white banner before the gates of Medina: the martial apostle fought in person at nine battles or sieges; 2 and fifty enterprises of war were achieved in ten years by himself or his Lieutenants. The Arab continued to unite the professions of a merchant and a robber: and his petty excursions for the defence or the attack of a caravan impressed sufficiently his troopers for the conquest of Arabia. The distribution of the spoil was regulated by a divine law: 3 the whole was faithfully collected in one common mass: a fifth of the gold and silver, the prisoners and cattle, the movable and immovable, was assigned as a due to the prophet for pious and charitable uses; the remainder was shared in adequate portions by the soldiers who had obtained the victory or guarded the camp: the rewards of the slain devoted to their widows and children. The sword of Mahomet was encouraged by the allotment of a double share to the horse and to the man. From all sides the roving Arabs were allured to the standard of religion and plunder: the apostle sanctified the Eunice of embracing the female captives as their wives or concubines; and the enjoy- ment of wealth and beauty was a feebler type of the joys of paradise prepared for the valiant martyrs of the faith. "The sword," says Mahomet, "is the key of heaven and of hell; a drop of blood shed in the cause of God, a night spent in arms, is of more value than two months of fasting or prayer: whoever fails in battle, his sins are forgiven; at the day of judg- ment his wounds shall be resplendent as vermilion, and odorous as musk; and the loss of his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of angels and cheru- bim." The interred souls of the Arabs were fired with enthusiasm: the picture of the invisible world was so strikingly represented on their tombs, that death which they had always despised became an object of hope and desire. The Koran inculcates, in the most absolute sense, the tenets of fate and predestination, which would extinguish both industry and virtuous action; but the prophet inculcates speculative belief. Yet their influence in every age has exalted the courage of the Saracens and Turks. The first companions of Mahomet advanced to battle with a fearless confidence: there is no danger where there is no chance: they were ordained to perish in the world and to triumph in the fields of the war. In the fertile and famous vale of Beder,

1 The whole subject de habe belli (Mohammedanorum, is examined in a separate dissertation by the learned Reland. (Observationes Missarum, tom. iii. Dissert. x., p. 3-33.)

2 The doctrine of absolute predetermination, on which few resources can repose each other, is sterile exposed in the Koran, (c. x. p. 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, and 64,) and of Mahomet: (Orations of Mahomet and Muhammad, the kings of the Arabian kingdom, and the religious philosophers of the time.)

3 The personal and private concerns of the prophet and his followers, the various occupations of the Arabian camel-driver, the camel are his principal means of subsistence, and the life of the camel is divided into two[323] periods (Bede, in the life of Mahomet, tom. ii. p. 106.)

4 Beder or Bedore was a city between Mecca and Medina, situated on the high road of the caravan of Egypt, and the pilgrimage annually commemorates the prophet's victory by illuminations, (See above, 35.) Shave's Travels, p. 147.)
three stations from Medina, he was informed by his scouts of the caravan that approached on one side; of the Korish, one hundred horse, eight hundred and fifty foot, who advanced on the other. After a short debate, he sacrificed the prospect of wealth to the pursuit of glory and revenge; and a slight intransigence was the only obstacle to the success of his plan. He embarked, in the face of fresh water that glided through the valley. "O God," he exclaimed, as the numbers of the Korish were descended from the hills, "O God, if these are destroyed, by whom will thou be worshiped?"

A. D. 625. Two miles from the scene of the battle, a Korish, whose name was Abu Sophian, was slain. His enemy leaped from his camel, and shouted, "Discharge your arrows, and the day is your own." At these words he placed himself, with Abu Beker, on a throne or pulpit, and instantly demanded the succour of Gabriel and three thousand angels. His eye was fixed on the field of battle; the musulmans fainted and were pressed: in that decisive moment the prophet started from his throne, mounted his horse, and cast a handful of sand into the air: "Let their faces be covered with confusion." Both armies heard the thunder of his voice: their fancy beheld the angelic warriors; the Korish trembled and fled: some were slain and cut off in the field. The musulmans admired the first victory of the faithful. The dead bodies of the Korish were despoiled and insulted: two of the most ominous prisoners were punished with death; and the ransom of the others, four thousand drams of silver, compensated in some degree the calamities of the faithful. It was the moment that the camels of Abu Sophian explored a new road through the desert and along the Euphrates: they were overtaken by the diligence of the musulmans; and wealth must have been the prize, if twenty thousand drams could be set apart for the fifth of the advantage of the musulmans, and the fourth for the Korish. The battle of Ohud was the second of the Korish; and their presumption of victory prevailed against the divine and human sense of the apostle. The second battle was fought on mount Ohud, six miles to the north of Medina; the Korish advanced in the form of a crescent; and the right wing of cavalry was led by Calid, the fairest and most successful of the Arabian warriors. The troops of Mahomet were skilfully posted on the declivity of a hill, and their rear was guarded by a detachment of fifty archers. The weight of their charge impelled and broke the centre of the idolaters; but in the pursuit they lost the advantage of their ground: the archers deserted their station: the musulmans were tempted by the spoil, disobeyed their general, and disobeyed their ranks.

The intrepid Calid, wheeling his cavalry on their flank and rear, exclaimed, with a loud voice, that Mahomet was slain. He was indeed wounded in the face with a javelin: two of his teeth were shattered with a stone; yet, in the midst of tumult and dismay, he reproached the infidels with the murder of the prophet, and blessed the friendly hand that stanched his wound, and conducted him to an inn. Twenty martyrs died for the sins of the people: they fell, said the apostle, in pairs, each brother embracing his lifeless companion; their bodies were mangled by the inhuman females of Mecca; and the wife of Mahomet, Zainab, the uncle of Mahomet. They might appeal to the Korish, and satiate their fury; but the musulmans soon rallied in the field, and the Korish wanted strength or courage to undertake the siege of Medina. They sent troops, and this third expedition is variously named from the nations, which marched under the banner of Abu Sophian, from the ditch which was drawn before the city, and a camp of three thousand musulmans. The prudence of Mahomet declined a general engagement; he summoned the Korish to a single combat; but the war was protracted twenty days, till the final separation of the confederates. A tempest of wind, rain, and hail, overthrew their tents: their private quarrels were fomented by an insidious adversary; and the Korish, deserted by their allies, no longer hoped to subvert the throne, or to check the conquests of their invincible exiles.

The choice of Jerusalem for the first kebla of prayer discovers the early prophecies of Mahomet in favour of the Jews; and happy would it have been for the Korish and Jews to be in that case converted, in the Arabian prophet, the hope of Israel and the promised Messiah. Their obstinacy converted his friendship into implacable hatred, with which he pursued that unfortunate people to the last moment of his life; and in the double character of an apostle and a conqueror, his persecution was extended to both worlds.

The Korish dwelt at Medina under the protection of the city: he seized the occasion of an accidental tumult, and summoned them to embrace his religion, or contend with him in battle. "Alas," replied the trembling Korish, "were we not ignorant of the use of crosses; and we persevere in the faith and worship of our fathers; why wilt thou reduce us to the necessity of a just defence?" The unequal contest was terminated in fifteen days; and it was with extreme reluctance that Mahomet yielded to the importance of his allies, and by his conduct of the captives. But their riches were confiscated, their arms became more effectual in the hands of the musulmans; and a wretched colony of seven hundred exiles was driven with their wives and children to implore a refuge on the confines of Syria. The Nadharites were more guilty, since they conspired in a friendly interview to assassinate the prophet. He besieged their castle three miles from Medina, but their resolute defence obtained an honourable capitulation; and the garrison, sounding their trumpets and beating their drums, was permitted to depart with the riches of their city. They left behind them the nations retired from the ditch, than Mahomet, without laying aside his armour, marched on the same day to extirpate the hostile race of the children of Koraidha.

9. The place to which Mahomet retired during the action is noted by Gamsér, in Abüilda, ii. p. 58. Vie de Mahomet, tom. ii. p. 243. Note p. 455. The Arabic word is rendered by Reiske, (Annates Moslem. Abdul-Ass. p. 247.) by Socinus Med. p. 168; and the difference is of the utmost moment for the honour of the Korish. "Ohud," says Mr. Hume, "is the winter; and my researches have convinced me that the Korish word was at one time endowed with a fuller signification, and was used in what relates to the departure of Judas Iscariot after the last supper, and as a term of reproach and abuse.

10. The Korish were noted for their number of Idols, their attempts (Ann. Moslem. p. 226. as colinum Abdulfian Syria Tabula, Lepisc. in loc. in loc. 390, or 396 angels; and the smallest of those might suffice for the prosecution of their battle. Mr. Hume, in his note, p. 141.) Yet the same scholiast confesses, that this angelic band was not invisible to any mortal: (Maracci, p. 292.) They refute on the words, C. 14, "ne quis tuin God," &c. (Or Herberard, Hist. Orig. p. 604. 606.)

11. The Korish, and joined the war of the Korish; no sooner had the nations retired from the ditch, than Mahomet, without laying aside his armour, marched on the same day to extirpate the hostile race of the children of Koraidha. In the third chapter of the Koran, (p. 30—33,) with Sale's notes) the prophet allows some poor excuses for the defeat of Ohud.

For the detail of the three Korish wars, of which, and the ditch, periodical, and the exploits of the Korish, Mahomet, and the abridgments of Elcinac, (Hist. Saracen. p. 67, 87, &c.) with the proper articles of the Koran, of the Korish, and of Abdurrahman, (Byram, p. 102.)

The wars of Mahomet against the Jewish tribes, of Kainbe, the Nadrines, Korahshah, and Chabban, are related by Abdulfian. (p. 61. 71. 77. 87. &c.) and Gamsér. (tom. ii. p. 61—65, 102—125, 139—148, 253, 254.)
After a resistance of twenty-five days, they surrendered at discretion. They trusted to the intercession of their old allies of Medina: they could not be ignorant that fanaticism obliterates the feelings of humanity. A venerable elder, to whose judgment they appealed, pronounced the sentence of death; seven hundred Jewish captives were dragged in chains to the market-place of the city: they descended alive into the grave prepared for their execution and burial; and the apostle beheld with an indescribable eye the slaughter of his helpless enemies. Their sheep and camels were inherited by the musulmans; three hundred carriages, five hundred pikes, a thousand lances, composed the most useful portion of the spoil. Six days' journey to the north-east of Medina, the ancient and wealthy town of Chaibar was the seat of the Jewish power in Arabia; the territory, a fertile spot in the desert, was covered with plantations and castle, and protected by eight castles, some of which were esteemed of impregnable strength. The forces of Mahomet consisted of two hundred horse and fourteen hundred foot: in the succession of eight regular and painful sieges they were opposed to dangers and fatigue, and hunger; and these were the most undaunted chiefs despairs of the event. The apostle revived their faith and courage by the example of Ali, on whom he bestowed the surname of the Li-\(\text{a}\)n of God: perhaps we may believe that a Hebrew champion of gigantic stature was cloven to the chest by his true faith, but we cannot discern in it a particle of romance, which represents him as tearing from its hinges the gate of a fortress, and wielding the ponderous buckler in his left hand.\(^4\) After the reduction of the castles, the town of Chaibar submitted to the yoke. The chief of the tribe was tortured, in the presence of Mahomet, to force a confession of his hidden treasure: the industry of the shepherds and husbandmen was rewarded with a precarious toleration: they were permitted, so long as it should please the conqueror, to improve their patrimony, in equal shares, for his emolument and their own. Under the reign of Omar, the Jews of Chaibar were transplanted to Syria; and the caliph alleged the injunction of his dying master, that one and the true religion should be professed in his native land of Arabia.\(^5\)

Submission of Mecca, A.D. 629. Five times each day the eyes of Mahomet were turned towards Mecca,\(^6\) and he was urged by the most sacred and powerful motives to revisit, as a conqueror, the city and temple from whence he had been driven as an exile. The Caaba was seen to his waking and asleep, the object of his idle dreams and waking vision and prophecy; he unfurled the holy banner; and a rash promise of success too hastily dropped from the lips of the apostle. His march from Medina to Mecca displayed the peaceful and solemn pomp of a pilgrimage; seventy camels chosen and bedecked for sacrifice, preceded the van; the sacred territory was respected; and the captives were dismissed without ransom to proclaim his clemency and devotion. But no sooner did Mahomet descend into the plain, within a day's journey of the city, than he exclaimed, "they have treated the captives with the eyes of tigers." The numbers and resolution of the Koreish opposed his progress; and the roving Arabs of the desert might desert or betray a leader whom they had followed for the hopes of spoil. The intrepid fanatic sunk into a cool and cautious politician; he worked in the treaty his title of apostle of God, concluded with the Koreish and their allies a truce of ten years, engaged to restore the fugitives of Mecca who should embrace his religion, and stipulated only, for the ensuing year, "the faithful observance of the old religion as a friend, and of remaining three days to accomplish the rites of the pilgrimage. A cloud of shame and sorrow hung on the retreat of the musulmans, and their disappointment might justly accuse the failure of a prophet who had so often appealed to the evidence of success, by the faithful observance of the old religion as a friend, and of the prospect of Mecca: their swords were sheathed: seven times in the footsteps of the apostle they encompassed the Caaba: the Koreish had retired to the hills, and Mahomet, after the customary sacrifice, evacuated the city on the fourth day. The people was exalted for his devotion: the hostile chiefs were awed, or divided, or seduced; and both Caled and Amrou, the future conquerors of Syria and Egypt, most seasonably deserted the sinking cause of idolatry. The power of Mahomet was increased by the submission of the powerful confederates of Chaibar, whose names are so many for the conquest of Mecca; and the idolaters, the weaker party, were easily conviced of violating the truce. Enthusiasm and discipline impelled the march, and preserved the secret, till the blaze of ten thousand fires proclaimed to the astonished Koreish the design. True to the resolution of the apostle, Mahomet put to death the populace, the priests, and their temple. The haughty Abu Sophian presented the keys of the city, admired the variety of arts and ensigns that passed before him in review; observed that the son of Abdallah had acquired a mighty kingdom, and confessed, under the sygmatar of Omar, that he was the apostle of the true God. The return of Marius and Sylla was stained with the blood of the Romans: the revenge of Mahomet was stimulated by religious zeal, and his injured followers were eager to execute or to prevent the order of a massacre. Instead of indulging their passions and his own, the apostle enjoined them to forgive the guilt, and united the factions, of Mecca. His troops, in three divisions, marched into the city: eight and twenty of the inhabitants were slain by the sword of Caled; eleven men and six women were proscribed by the order of Mahomet; but he bestowed the city upon his lieutenant; and several of the most obnoxious victims were indebted for their lives to his clemency or contempt. The chiefs of the Koreish were prostrate at his feet. "What mercy can you expect from the man whom you have wronged?" "We confess our guilt," was their reply, "and we shall not confine in vain: begone! you are safe, you are free." The people of Mecca deserved their pardon by the profession of Islam; and after an exile of seven years, the fugitive missionary was enshrined as the prince and prophet of his native country.\(^7\) But the three hundred and sixty idols of the Caaba were ignominiously broken: the house of God was purified and adorned; as an example to future times, the apostle again fulfilled the duties of a pilgrim; and a perpetual law was enacted that no unbeliever should dare to set his foot on the territory of the holy city.\(^8\)

\(^{4}\) Abu Rafe, the servant of Mahomet, is said to affirm that he himself, and seven other men, afterwards tried, without success, to move the stone. A fourth report, (Al-\(\text{H}\)afid, (Hist. Sarac., p. 397)) of Abu Rafe was an eye witness, but who will be witness for Abu Rafe?\(^5\)

\(^{5}\) The retribution of the Jews is attested by Elmascli (Hist. Sarac., p. 398), and A. de Zadie, (Tableau historique de la juderie de la Palestine, p. 255); Niebuhr (Description de l'Arabe, p. 321), believes that the Jewish religion is a direct current, and some reverences of kings and of nations. I am informed that a Turkish ambassador at Paris was much scandalized at the representation of this tragedy.

\(^{6}\) The Mohammedan doctors still dispute, whether Mecca was re-

\(^{7}\) placed by force or consent, (Al-\(\text{H}\)afid, (Hist. Sarac., p. 397), and Niebuhr) and this verbal controversy is as much moment as our own about the Canaanite or the tribe of Chaibar.\(^8\)

\(^{8}\) In excluding the christians from the peninsula of Arabia, the apostle was not actuated by any of the feelings which the navigation of the Lycian authors (navigation of Gesner, p. 312, and Gagner ad loc.) and this verbal controversy is as much moment as our own about the Canaanite or the tribe of Chaibar.\(^9\)

\(^{9}\) Abulpharagius. (Dynast. p. 163.)
The conquest of Mecca determined the faith and obedience of the Arabian tribes; who, according to the vicissitudes of fortune, either rejoiced at the acceptance of the truth, as the settled and established religion of the people, or deplored the change which this great convert to the truth had brought. The seven tribes of Mecca, the first to embrace Islam, were the most powerful in the land, and the Seven Apostles were the most influential leaders. The seventh and last of these Seven Apostles was the Prophet's uncle, Ali, who, like the Prophet himself, was a descendant of the Prophet's grandfather, the Prophet's father's father.

The siege of Mecca, division of the spoils, &c. are related by Abulfeda (p. 172–123) and Gagnier, (tom. iii. p. 88–111). It is Al Jami al Mustakbar, Art. Mecca, tom. iv. p. 378. The fertile spot of Tayef was supposed to be a piece of the land of Syria detached and dropped in the general deluge.

The conquest of Mecca determined the faith and obedience of the Arabian tribes; who, according to the vicissitudes of fortune, either rejoiced at the acceptance of the truth, as the settled and established religion of the people, or deplored the change which this great convert to the truth had brought. The seven tribes of Mecca, the first to embrace Islam, were the most powerful in the land, and the Seven Apostles were the most influential leaders. The seventh and last of these Seven Apostles was the Prophet's uncle, Ali, who, like the Prophet himself, was a descendant of the Prophet's grandfather, the Prophet's father's father.

The siege of Mecca, division of the spoils, &c. are related by Abulfeda (p. 172–123) and Gagnier, (tom. iii. p. 88–111). It is Al Jami al Mustakbar, Art. Mecca, tom. iv. p. 378. The fertile spot of Tayef was supposed to be a piece of the land of Syria detached and dropped in the general deluge.

The conquest of Mecca determined the faith and obedience of the Arabian tribes; who, according to the vicissitudes of fortune, either rejoiced at the acceptance of the truth, as the settled and established religion of the people, or deplored the change which this great convert to the truth had brought. The seven tribes of Mecca, the first to embrace Islam, were the most powerful in the land, and the Seven Apostles were the most influential leaders. The seventh and last of these Seven Apostles was the Prophet's uncle, Ali, who, like the Prophet himself, was a descendant of the Prophet's grandfather, the Prophet's father's father.

The siege of Mecca, division of the spoils, &c. are related by Abulfeda (p. 172–123) and Gagnier, (tom. iii. p. 88–111). It is Al Jami al Mustakbar, Art. Mecca, tom. iv. p. 378. The fertile spot of Tayef was supposed to be a piece of the land of Syria detached and dropped in the general deluge.

The conquest of Mecca determined the faith and obedience of the Arabian tribes; who, according to the vicissitudes of fortune, either rejoiced at the acceptance of the truth, as the settled and established religion of the people, or deplored the change which this great convert to the truth had brought. The seven tribes of Mecca, the first to embrace Islam, were the most powerful in the land, and the Seven Apostles were the most influential leaders. The seventh and last of these Seven Apostles was the Prophet's uncle, Ali, who, like the Prophet himself, was a descendant of the Prophet's grandfather, the Prophet's father's father.

The siege of Mecca, division of the spoils, &c. are related by Abulfeda (p. 172–123) and Gagnier, (tom. iii. p. 88–111). It is Al Jami al Mustakbar, Art. Mecca, tom. iv. p. 378. The fertile spot of Tayef was supposed to be a piece of the land of Syria detached and dropped in the general deluge.

The conquest of Mecca determined the faith and obedience of the Arabian tribes; who, according to the vicissitudes of fortune, either rejoiced at the acceptance of the truth, as the settled and established religion of the people, or deplored the change which this great convert to the truth had brought. The seven tribes of Mecca, the first to embrace Islam, were the most powerful in the land, and the Seven Apostles were the most influential leaders. The seventh and last of these Seven Apostles was the Prophet's uncle, Ali, who, like the Prophet himself, was a descendant of the Prophet's grandfather, the Prophet's father's father.

The siege of Mecca, division of the spoils, &c. are related by Abulfeda (p. 172–123) and Gagnier, (tom. iii. p. 88–111). It is Al Jami al Mustakbar, Art. Mecca, tom. iv. p. 378. The fertile spot of Tayef was supposed to be a piece of the land of Syria detached and dropped in the general deluge.

The conquest of Mecca determined the faith and obedience of the Arabian tribes; who, according to the vicissitudes of fortune, either rejoiced at the acceptance of the truth, as the settled and established religion of the people, or deplored the change which this great convert to the truth had brought. The seven tribes of Mecca, the first to embrace Islam, were the most powerful in the land, and the Seven Apostles were the most influential leaders. The seventh and last of these Seven Apostles was the Prophet's uncle, Ali, who, like the Prophet himself, was a descendant of the Prophet's grandfather, the Prophet's father's father.

The siege of Mecca, division of the spoils, &c. are related by Abulfeda (p. 172–123) and Gagnier, (tom. iii. p. 88–111). It is Al Jami al Mustakbar, Art. Mecca, tom. iv. p. 378. The fertile spot of Tayef was supposed to be a piece of the land of Syria detached and dropped in the general deluge.
The Decline and Fall

Chapter XI

dence: either victory or paradise is our own." The lance of a Roman decided the alternative; but the faling standard was rescued by Caelus, the proslavet of Mecce, who, with a composure which hid his wounds but redeemed his valour without-odd and repulsed the superior numbers of the Christians. In the nocturnal council of the Camp he was chosen to command: his skilful evolutions of the ensuing day secured either the victory or the retreat of the Saracens; and Caelus is renowned among his brethren and his enemies by the glorious appellation of the Sword of God. In the pulpit, Mahomet described, with prophetic rapture, the crowns of the blessed martyrs; but in private he betrayed the feelings of human nature; he was surprised as he was when the Light of Zeid was taken, said the astonished voyary. "You see," replied the apostle, "a friend who is deploring the loss of his most faithful friend." After the conquest of Mecce, the sovereign of Arabia ailed to prevent the hostile preparations of Herodius; and solemnly proclaimed war against the Romans, without attempting to dis-guide the hardships and dangers of the enterprise.1 The Moslems were discouraged: they alleged the want of money, or horses, or provi-sions; the season of harvest, and the intolerable heat of the summer; "He is much more than a man," said Mahomet, "to compel their service; but on his return he admonished the destroying, by an excommunication of fifty days.
Their desertion enhanced the merit of Abubeker, Othman, and the faithful companions who devoted their lives and fortunes; and Mahomet displayed the banner at the head of ten thousand horse and twenty thousand foot. Painful indeed was the distress of the march:
latitude and thirst were aggravated by the scorching and pestilential winds of the desert; ten men rode by turns on the same camel; and they were reduced to the necessity of drinking the water from the belly of that useful animal. In the middle-way, ten days' journey from Medina and Damascus, they reposed near the grove and fountain of Tahe, Beyond that place Mahomet declined the prosecution of the war:
he declared himself satisfied with the peaceful intentions, he was more probably dissuaded by the martial array, of the emperor of the east. But the active and intrepid Caelus spread around the terror of his name;
and the prophet received the submission of the tribes and cities, from the Euphrates to Ailah, at the head of 20,000 of his Christian subjects. Mahomet readily granted the security of their freedom, their trade, the property of their goods, and the toleration of their worship.2 The weakness of their Arabian brethren had restrained them from opposing his ambition; the disciples of Jesus were endeared to the enemy of the Jews; and it was the interest of a conqueror to propose a fair capitulation to the most powerful religion of the earth.

Death of Ma-

1 The expedition of Tahe is recorded by our ordinary historians, Abu-Bida (Vit. Mahom., p. 123—127.), and Gagnier (Vie de Mahomet, tom. ii. p. 147—152.) but we have the advantage of appealing to the original evidence of the Koran, (p. 29, p. 154—155.) with Sale's learned and rational notes.

2 The Diplomata consociationis Jerusalem, is attested by Ahmed Ben Joseph, and the author Ethele Sophronianus (Gagnier, Note, ad Abbu-Bida, p. 273.) Mahomet himself, was of opinion, (Hist. Auchen-corn, p. 11.) though he owns Mahomet's regard for the Christians, (p. 13.) only mingled peace and tribute. In the year 689, Soukai published at Paris the text and version of Mahomet's sermon in favour of the Christians: which was admitted and read-bout by the opposite state of Salameh and Damascus: (Raso, Vit. Mahom., p. 223.) and his fingerimbs of its authenticity, (Hist. Orient, p. 229.) Remanunt in favor of Mahomet in the same letter, (Vit. Mahom., p. 150.) but Msbomeh (Hist. Eccle., p. 244.) disposes of the fealty of their opinion, and inclines to believe it genuine. Yet Multabzamias assurme the imputation of causing the proliferation of the Christian race. (Vit. Mahom., p. 190.) but Abu-Bida generally grants the imputation. (Hist. Auchencorn, p. 22.) and Msbomeh was prince of the Jacobites.

The epilogy, or fallen-sickness of Mahomet, is ascertained by Theophylact's Zonaris, and the rest of the Greeks, and is prevail-ingly swallowed by the gross bigotry of Histéirin (Hist. Orient, p. 10.) Fuli-bertus, (Life of Mahomet, p. 12.) and Marcari. (tom. i. Alcoran, 276, 278.) The title and distressed soul of two Christians of the Koran (75, 74.) can hardly be explained thus an interpretation of the Koran, (Receuil.) an absurdity which I am more weary of than the most pernicious denial; and the charia-offered him by the Prophet. (Hist. Mohom., tom. i. 325.) But Gagnier, (Add. Abu-Bida, p. 9. Vie de Mahomet, tom. i. p. 130.) and Sale. (Koran, p. 459—471.)

1 This statement is not very confirmed: since it was offered as a test of his prophetic knowledge: it is frankly confessed by his zealous vates, Abu-Bida (p. 98.) and Al Tannaha. (Acd. Gagnier, tom. ii. p. 296—298.)

he was poisoned at Chibbar by the revenge of a Jewish female.2 During four years, the health of the pro-het declined; his infirmities increased; but his moral brave and invincible; he was rewarded by intervals of recovered by the humility of his virtue or patience. "If there be any man," said the apostle from the pulpit, "whom I have unjustly scourged, I submit my own head to the lash of retaliation. Have I expected the reputation of a muslinman? let him proclaim my faults in the face of the congregation. Has any one been depoiled of his goods? the little that I possess shall compensate the principal and the interest of the debt."3
"You are a creditor," replied Zeid, "who do I send to three drams of silver," Mahomet heard the complaint, satisfied the demand, and thanked his creditor for acquising him in this world rather than at the day of judgment. He beheld with temperate firmness the approach of death; enfranchised his slaves; (seventeen men, as they are named, and eleven women) minuted directed the order of his funeral, and moderate-rated the lamentations of his weeping friends, on when he bestowed the benediction of peace. Till the third day before his death, he regularly performed the daily devotions of his religion; but the next day, supply his place, appeared to mark that ancient and faithful friend as his successor in the sacred and regal office; but he prudently defined the risk and envy of a more explicit nomination. At a moment when his faculties were visibly impaired, he called for pen and ink to write, or, more properly, to dictate a devine book, the sum and accomplishment of all his revelations: a dispute arose in the chamber, whether he should be allowed to supersede the authority of the Koran; and the prophet was forced to reprove the indecent vehemence of his disciples. If the highest credit may be afforded to the traditions of his wives and companions, he maintained, in the bosom of his family, and to the last moments of his life, the digni of an apostle, and the faith of an enthusiast; described the visits of Gabriel, who had an everlasting farewell to the earth, and expressed his lively confidence, not only of the mercy, but of the favour, of the Supreme Being. In a familiar discourse he had mentioned his special prerogative, that the angel of death was not allowed to take his soul till he had respectfully asked the permission of the prophet. The request was grant ed; and the Prophet imputes that of his dissolution: his head was reclined on the lap of Ayesha, the best beloved of all his wives; he fainted with the violence of pain; recovering his spirits, he raised his eyes towards the roof of the house, and, with a steady look, though a faltering voice, repeated the last broken, though articulate, words: "O God!.. . pardon my sins... Yes, ... I come, among my fellow-citizens on high!" and thus peaceably expired on a carpet spread upon the floor. An expected fact for the conquest of Syria was stopped by this mournful event: the army halted at the gates of Medina: the chiefs were assembled round their dying master. The city, more especially the house, of the prophet, was a scene of chamber sorrow or silent despair: fanaticism alone could suggest a ray of hope and consolation. "How can he be dead, we witness, our intressor, our mediator with God? By God he is defeated: like Moses and Jesus he is wrapt in a holy trance, and speedily will he return to his faithful people." The evidence of sense was disregarded; and Omar, unshackling his semitist, threatened to strike off the heads of the infidels, who should dare to affirm that the prophet was no more. He was urged to with some moderation of Abu Bekr. "It is Mahomet," said he to Omar and the multitude, "or the God of Mahomet, whom you worship! The God of Mahomet lived for ever, but the apostle was a mortal like ourselves, and according to his decree the Hebrew and their descendants would fall heir to the sacred possession of all the nations and the fate of mortality." He was piously interred by the hands of his nearest kinman, on the same spot on which he expired; Medina has been sanctified by the death and burial of Mahomet; and the innumerable pigeons of Mecca often turn aside from the way, to bow in this holy devotion, before the simple tomb of the prophet.

At the conclusion of the life of Mahomet, it may perhaps be expected, that I should balance his faults and virtues, that I should decide whether the title of enthusiast or imposter more properly belongs to that extraordinary man. He had been intimately conversant with the son of Abdallah, the task would still be difficult, and the success uncertain; at the distance of twelve centuries, I darkly contemplate his shade through a cloud of religious influence; and could I truly delineate the portrait of an hour, how much would it resemble theSolitary of Mount Hore, to the preacher of Mecca, and to the conqueror of Arabia. The author of a mighty revolution appears to have been endowed with a pious and contemplative disposition; so soon as man was made to rise above the pressure of want, he availed himself of them, and, in the age of forty, he lived with innocence, and would have died without a name. The unity of God is an idea most congenial to nature and reason; and a slight conversion with the Jews and christians would teach him to despise and detest the idolatry of Mecca. It was the duty of a man and a citizen to impart the doctrine of salvation, to rescue his country from the dominion of sin and error. The energy of a mind incessantly bent on the same object, would convert a general obligation into a particular call; the warm suggestion urges the most moral laws as the inspirations of heaven; the labour of thought would expire in rapture and vision; and the inward sensation, the invisible monitor, would be described with the form and attributes of an angel of God.

From enthusiasm to imposture, the step is pernicious and slippery; the daemon of Socrates affords a memorable instance, how a wise man may deceive himself, how a good man may deceive others, how the conscience may slumber in a mixed and middle state between self-loathing and voluntary fraud. Charity may be employed to prove that the motives of pure and genuine benevolence, but a human missionary is incapable of cherishing the obstinate unbelievers who reject his claims, despise his arguments, and persecute his life; he might forgive his personal adversaries, he may lawfully hate the enemies of God; he might forgive the sectarians, but the sect-passions would not be kindled in the bosom of Mahomet, and he sighed, like the prophet of Nineveh, for the destruction of the rebellions whom he had condemned. The injustice of Mecca, and the choice of Medina, transformed the citizen into a prince, the humble preacher into the leader of armies; but his sword was consecrated by the example of the saints; and the same God who afflicts a sinful world with pestilence and earthquakes, might inspire for their conversion or chastisement the valour of his servants. In the exercise of political government, he was compelled to abuse of the stern rigour of fanaticism, and to employ in some measure with the persecution and passions of his followers, and to employ even the vices of mankind as the instruments of their salvation.

The use of fraud and perfidy, of cruelty and injustice, were often subservient to the propagation of faith; and Mahomet commanded or approved the assassination of a faction; but these things were more fitting for the field of battle. By the repetition of such acts, the character of Mahomet must have been gradually stained; and the influence of such pernicious habits would be poorly compensated by the practice of the personal and social virtues which are necessary to maintain and preserve the reputation of a great spirit. Of his last years, ambition was the ruling passion; and a politician will suspect, that he secretly smiled (the victorious impostor)! at the enthusiasm of his youth, and the credulity of his proscytes. A philosopher will observe, that their credulity and his success would tend more strongly to fortify the assurance of his divine mission, that his interest and religion were inseparably connected, and that his conscience would be soothing to the persuasion, that he alone was absolved by the Deity from the obligation of personal peril. For their fatherly innocence, the sins of Mahomet may be allowed as an evidence of his sincerity. In the support of truth, the arts of fraud and fiction may be deemed less criminal; and he would have started at the foulness of the means, had he not been satisfied of the importance and justice of his cause. Even the most pious priest, I can surprise a word or action of unfeigned humanity; and the decree of Mahomet, that, in the sale of captives, the mothers should never be separated from their children, may suspend, or moderate, the censure of the historian.

The good sense of Mahomet's despaired Private life of the pomp of royalty; the apostle of God, submitted to the menial offices of the family; he kin-

---

a The Greeks and Latins have invented and propagated the vulgar and ridiculous story, that Mahomet's iron tomb is suspended in the air at Mecca. (See Appendix, p. 63.)---Laudanum Chocolosolys de Rebus Turcicis, lib. i. p. 63, by the action of equal and potent lead stones, (Gloisonnaire de Bayle, Malevire, Ren. EE. IV.) Without any philosophical inquiries, it may suffice, that, 1. The prophet was not interred at Mecca; and, 2. That his tomb at Mount Hore, which has been visited by millions, is placed on the ground, (Reland, de Religione Mahometana, lib. i. p. 289—291.) Gagner, (Vie de Mahomet, tom. ii. p. 269—260.)

b At Jamasul pazariates (Vie de Mahomet, tom. iii. p. 372—391) the miracles which we attribute to the prophet and his companions; and the learned cannot decide, that this act of divinity is an act of theocracy and magic. The doctors are divided which, of Mecca and Medina, is the excentric.

c The last sickness, death, and burial of Mahomet, are described by Abulfeda and Gagner. (Vie de Mahomet, p. 133—142.) Vie de Mahomet, tom. iii. p. 254—257.) The most private and intimate passages which theTurks originally received from Ayerve, the son of Abbas, are, and the learned have survived the prophet many years, as they may repeat the tale from the nearest enemies of the infidels.

d Christians, rashly enough, have assigned to Mahomet a transcendent, that seemed to descend from heaven and whisper in his ear. This would be a rare act, used by (fictitious Religious Christian.) His Arabic translator, the learned Pocock, (quoted in the text) has shown his name by the authority of the man's family of his authors; and Gagner confuted that it is unknown. This angel, his identity, Pretorian legions, and the sick compassionate penitence, the pious is supposed in the Arabic version, but it is not contained in the Roman editions of the Latin text. (Pocock, Specimen Hist. Arabum, p. 196, 197.) Reland, de Religione Mahometana, lib. i. p. 293—294.)

---

Islam:

Philip de Mornay, ed. (Leiden, 1968).
died the fire, swept the floor, milked the ewes, and mended with his own hands his shoes and his woollen garment. Dismissing the penance and merit of a hermit, he observed, without effort or vanity, the abstinenent diet of an Arab and a soldier. On solemn occasion he conferred on his companions the profit of his plentiful, but in his domestic life, many weeks would elapse without a fire being kindled on the hearth of the prophet. The interdiction of wine was confirmed by his example: his hunger was appeased with the presence of barley bread; he delighted in the taste of milk and honey; but his ordinary food consisted of dates and water. Perfumes and women were the two sensual enjoyments which his nature required, and his religion did not forbid; and Mahomet affirmed, that the fervour of his devotion was increased by these innocent pleasures. The heat of the climate inflames the blood of the Arabs; and their libidinous complex has been noticed by the writers of antiquity. Their inconstancy was regulated by the civil and religious laws of the Koran: their incestuous alliances were blamed; the boundless licence of polygamy was required, to free concubines; their rights both of bed and of dowry were equally determined; the freedom of divorce was discouraged, adultery was condemned as a capital offence; and fornication, in either sex, was punished with severe penalties. Such were the calm and rational precepts of the legislator; but in his private conduct, Mahomet indulged the appetites of a man, and abused the claims of a prophet. A special revelation dispensed him from the laws which he had imposed on his nation; the female sex, without reservation, was abandoned to his desires; and this singular pre-rogative excited the envy rather than the scandal, the veneration rather than the envy, of the devout musalmans. If we remember the seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines of the Prophet Solomon, we shall applaud the modesty of the Arabian, who espoused no more than seventeen or fifteen wives; eleven are enumerated who occupied at Medina their separate apartments round the house of the apostle, and enjoyed in their turns the favour of his conjugal society. What is singular enough, they were all widows, excepting his own wife, the daughter of Abubeker. She was doubtless a virgin, since Mahomet consummated his nuptials (such is the premature ripeness of the climate) when she was only nine years of age. The youth, the beauty, the spirit of Ayesha, gave her a superior ascendant: she was the true companion of her husband; and, after his death, the daughter of Abubeker was long revered as the mother of the faithful. Her behaviour had been ambiguous and inconstant: in a nocturnal march she was accidentally left behind; and in the morning Ayesha returned to the camp with a man. The temper of Mahomet was inclined to jealousy; but a divine revelation assured him of her innocence: he chastised her accusers, and published a law of domestic peace, that no woman should be condemned unless four male witnesses had seen her in the act of adultery. In his age of forty, Zaid, the companion of the Prophet, and wife, Mary, an Egyptian captive, the amorous prophet forgot the interest of his reputation. At the house of Zaid, his freedman and adopted son, he beheld, in a loose underdress, the beauty of Zeinah, and burst forth in an ejaculation of devotion and desire. The service, or grateful, freedman understood the hint, and Afschah, part iv, p. 49—51), have maliciously exaggerated the frailty of the prophet. The multitude of his women has been reduced to three hun-

24 Incroyable, en arabe apon apud in Venenous moraque salutare auctor, (Ammian. Marcellin l. xiv. c. 4.)

25 Le livre de l'interdiction de Mahomet (1327) has recapitulated the laws of marriage, divorce, etc.; and the curious reader of Selden's China (p. 144) may recognize many Iowa words in the sentence. But Aristotle, in his treatises, has observed, that of all men who have actually seen women in pyra, (Abulfeda, Ammara Moslem, p. 71. vers. Reiske.)
the mother of an illustrious progeny. The merit and misfortunes of Ali and his descendants will lead me to anticipate, in this place, the series of the Saracen caliphs, a title which describes the commanders of the faithful as the vicars and successors of the apostle of God.

Character of Ali.

The birth, the alliance, the character and the conduct of Ali, which exalted him above the rest of his countrymen, might justify his claim to the vacant throne of Arabia. The son of Abu Taleb was, in his own right, the chief of the family of Hashem, and the hereditary chieftains of the guardianship of the sacred temple of Mecca. The light of prophecy was extinct; but the husband of Fatima might expect the inheritance and blessing of her father; the Arabs had sometimes been patient of a female reign; and the two grandsons of the prophet had often been founded in his lap, and shown in his pulpit, as the hope of his age, and the chief of the youth of paradise. The first of the true believers might aspire to march before them in this world and in the next; and if some were of a graver and more rigid cast, the zeal and virtue of Ali were never outstripped by any recent proscylic. He understood the essence of the religious and moral law; he lived and died as a true saint: his wisdom still breathes in a collection of moral and religious sayings; and every antagonist, in the combats of the tongue or of the sword, was subdued by his eloquence and power. From the first hour of his mission to the last rites of his funeral, the apostle of the sword was venerated in the twelfty years of his reign, by whom he delighted to name his brother, his vicegerent, and the faithful Aaron of a second Moses. The son of Abu Taleb was afterwards reproached for neglecting to secure his interest by a solemn declaration of his right, which would have silenced all complaint of his succession by the decrees of heaven. But the unsuspecting hero confided in himself; the jealousy of empire, and perhaps the fear of opposition, might suspend the resolutions of Mahomet; and the bed of sickness was besieged by the artful Ayesha, the daughter of Omar.

The silence and death of the prophet restored the liberty of the people; and his companions convened an assembly to deliberate on the choice of his successor. The hereditary claim and lofty spirit of Ali, were not sufficient to invest the prophet, that Ali was the successor of the Prophet, and that the author of the Soveriegn Resolving and Resuming the Sceptre by a free and frequent election: the Korish could never be reconciled to the proud pre-eminence of the line of Hashem; the ancient discord of the tribes was rekindled; the fugitives of Mecca and the auxiliaries of Medina asserted their respective merits; and the rival pretensions of the two independent caliphs would have crushed in their infancy the religion and empire of the Saracens. The tumult was appeased by the disgraced resolution of Omar, who, suddenly renouncing his own pretensions, stretched forth his hand, and declared himself the first subject of the mild and venerable Ali, the urgence of the mystery, and the arquebusiers of the people, might excuse this illegal and precipitate measure; but Omar himself confessed from the pulpit, that if any massalman should hereafter presume to anticipate the suffrage of his brethren, both

The elector and the elected would be worthy of death. After the simple inauguration of Abu Bekar, he was obeyed in Medina, Mecca, and the provinces of Arabia; the Hashimites alone declined the oath of fidelity; and their chief, in his own house, maintained, above the passage of a year and a half, an independent state and an independence; listening to the threats of Omar, who attempted to consume with fire the habitation of the daughter of the apostle. The death of Fatima, and the decline of his party, subdued the indigenous spirit of Ali; he condescended to salute the commander of the faithful, and accept the excuse of the necessity of subjugating his convenient foes, and wisely rejected his courteous offer of abdicating the government of the Arabs. After a reign of two years, the aged caliph was summoned by the angel of death. In his testament, with the tacit approbation of his companions, he bequeathed the sceptre to the firm and intrepid virtue of Omar. "I have no occasion," said the modest candidate, "for the place." "But the place has occasion for you," replied Abu Bekar; Of Omar, who expired with a fervent prayer, that the God of Mahomet would ratify his seal upon his choice, and direct his clay in the way of concord and obedience. The prayer was not ineffectual, since Ali himself, in a life of privacy and prayer, persevered to reverence the superior worth and dignity of his rival; who comforted him for the loss of empire, by the most flattering marks of confidence. In the twelfth year of his reign Omar received a mortal wound from the hand of an assassin; he rejected with equal impartiality the names of his son and of Ali, refused to load his conscience with the sins of his successor, and devoted on six of the most respectable of his predecessors the anxious task of electing a composer of the faithful. On this occasion, Ali was again blamed by his friends for submitting his right to the judgment of men, for recognizing their jurisdiction by accepting a place among the six electors. He might have obtained their suffrage, had he designed to preside in a strict and servile capacity, only to the Koran and tradition, but likewise to the determinations of two seniors. With these limitations, Othman, the secretary of Mahomet, accepted the government; nor was it till after the third caliph, twenty-four years after the death of the prophet, that Ali was invested, by the popular choice, with the regal and sacerdotal office. The manners of the Arabs retained their primitive simplicity, and the son of Abu Bekar despaired the pomp and vanity of this world. At the hour of prayer, he repaired to the mosque of Medina, clothed in a thick cotton gown, a mule at his head, his slippers on one hand, and his bow in the other, instead of a walking-staff. The companions of the prophet and the chiefs of the tribes saluted their new sovereign, and gave him their right hands as a sign of fealty and allegiance. The mischiefs that flow from the contest of ambition are usually confided to the Turks and Persians. The times and countries in which they have been agitated. But the religious discord of the friends and enemies of Ali has been renewed in every age of the Hegira, and is still maintained in the immoral hatred of the Persians and Turks.4

4. Ockley (Hist. of the Saracens, vol. I. p. 5, 6.) from an Arabian MS. represents Lylyanah as adverse to the substitution of her father in the place of the apostle. This fact, as it is recorded by Ockley, is mentioned by Abulfed, 4 Al Jazari, and 4 Abokari, the last of whom (27) preserves the tradition, that the heir of Mahomet was elected by a council of the most conspicuous and venerable men of Medina, and that his son Ali was chosen, with the regal and sacerdotal office. The manner of the Arabs retained their primitive simplicity, and the son of Abu Bekar despaired the pomp and vanity of this world. At the hour of prayer, he repaired to the mosque of Medina, clothed in a thick cotton gown, a mule at his head, his slippers on one hand, and his bow in the other, instead of a walking-staff. The companions of the prophet and the chiefs of the tribes saluted their new sovereign, and gave him their right hands as a sign of fealty and allegiance. The mischiefs that flow from the contest of ambition are usually confided to the Turks and Persians. The times and countries in which they have been agitated. But the religious discord of the friends and enemies of Ali has been renewed in every age of the Hegira, and is still maintained in the immoral hatred of the Persians and Turks.4 mer, who are branded with the appellation of Skiltes or sectaries, have enriched the Mahometan creed with a new article of faith; and if Mahomet be the apostle, his companion Ali is the vicar, of God. In their private converse, in their public worship, they bitterly execrate the three usurpers who intercepted his indestructible right to the dignity of prophet and caliph: and the name of Omar expresses in their tongue the perfect accomplishment of wickedness and impiety. The Sonnites, who are supported by the general consent and orthodox traditions of the musulmans, entertain a more impartial, or at least a more decent, opinion of the caliphs. They accept the memory of Abubeker, Omar, Othman, and Ali, the holy and legitimate successors of the prophet. But they assign the last and most humble place to the husband of Fatima, in the persuasion that the order of succession was determined by the degrees of sanctity. An historian who balances the four caliphs with a hand unshaken by superstition, will calmly pronounce, that their manners were alike pure and exemplary; that their zeal was fervent and probably sincere; and that, in the midst of riches and power, their lives were devoted to the practice of moral duties. But the sanctity of Abubeker and Omar, the prudence of the first, the severity of the second, maintained the peace and prosperity of their reigns. The feeble temper and declining age of Othman were incapable of sustaining the weight of conquest and empire. He chose, and he was deceived; he trusted, and he was betrayed: and most deserving of the faithful became useless or hostile to his government, and his lax bounty was productive only of ingratitude and discontent. The spirit of discord went forth in the provinces, their deputies assembled at Medina, and the Chaliphs, the desperate fanatics who disclaimed the yoke of subordination and reason, were confounded among the free-born Arabs, who demanded the redress of their wrongs and the punishment of their oppressors. From Cufa, from Bassora, from Egypt, from the tribes of the desert, they roared in an encampment about a name from Medina, and despatched a haughty mandate to their sovereign, requiring him to execute justice, or to desecrate from the throne. His repentance began to disarray and disperse the insurgents; but their fury was rekindled by the arts of his enemies; and the Energy of a professed advocate was continued to blast his reputation and precipitate his fall. The caliph had lost the only guard of his predecessors, the esteem and confidence of the Moslems; during a siege of six weeks his water and provisions were intercepted, and the feeble garrison there were consigned to the mercy of the more timorously rebels. Forsaken by those who had abused his simplicity, the helpless and venerable caliph expected the approach of death; the brother of Ayesh a marched at the head of the assassins; and Othman, with the Koran in his lap, was pierced with a multitude of wounds. A tumultuous ancestry of five days was oppressed by the inauguration of Ali; his refusal would have provoked a general massacre. In this painful situation he supported the becoming pride of his son Hasan, the eldest of the three, and the caliph yielded to his repeated importunities, and bestowed on him the office of caliph. The murder of the eldest heir was therefore a signal. When the Persians shout with the bow, they frequently cry, "May this arrow go to the heart of Omar!" (Voyage de Chardin, tom. i. p. 239. 579. a.) a This gradation of merit is distinctly marked in a creed illustrated by a picture in an old manuscript of the Koran, in the library at the assembly of the Caliphs (Ottolengh, p. 656.) and there are few among the Turks who presume to revive him as an idolat. (Voyage de Chardin, tom. i. p. 45.)

coast of the enemy, to spare their flying brethren, and to respect the bodies of the dead, and the chastity of the female captives. He generously proposed to save the blood of the Moslems by a single combat; but his trembling rival declined the challenge as a sentence of inevitable death. The ranks of the Syrians were broken by the charge of a hero who was mounted on a camel, with a long lance in his hand, and fielded his ponderous and two-edged sword. As often as he smote a rebel, he shouted the Allah Abar, "God is victorious!" and in the tumult of a nocturnal battle, he was heard to repeat four hundred times that tremendous curse. "The name of Damascus is meditated his light, but the certain victory was snatched from the grasp of Ali by the disobedience and enthusiasm of his troops. Their conscience was awed by the solemn appeal to the books of the Koran which Mowiyah exposed on the foremost lances; and Ali was compelled to yield to a disagreeable truce and an ignominious peace. He retreated with sorrow and indignation to Cufa; his party was discouraged; the distant provinces of Persia, of Yemen, and of Egypt, were subdued or seduced by his crafty rival; and the stroke of fanaticism, which was aimed against the thrones of the world, fell on the fatherland of Mahomet. In the temple of Mecca, three Christs or enthusiasts discoursed of the disorders of the church and state: they soon agreed, that the deaths of Ali, of Mowiyah, and of his friend Amr, the viceroy of Egypt, would restore the peace and unity of the Moslem empire. In theгоряк of his victim, poisoned his dagger, devoted his life, and secretly re- paired to the scene of action. Their resolution was equally desperate: but the first mistook the person of Amr, and stabbed the deputy who occupied his seat; the children of Damascus was dangerously hurried by the second; the lawful caliph, in the hour of Cufa, received a mortal wound from the hand of the third. He expired in the sixty-third year of his age, and mercifully recommended to his children, that they would discharge the murderer by a single stroke. The sepoys of the house of Abou Sophian had been fierce and obstinate; his conversion was tardy and reluctant; his new faith was fortified by necessity and interest; he served, he fought, perhaps he believed; and the sins of the time of ignorance were expiated by the recent merits of the family of Ommiyah. Mowiyah, the son of Abou Sophian, and of the cruel Henda, was dignified in his early youth with the office or title of secretary of the prophet: the judgment of Omar intrusted him with the government of Syria; and he administered that important province above forty years, either in a subordinate or supreme rank. Without renouncing the fame of valor and liberality, he affected the reputation of humanity and moderation: a grateful people were attached to his benefactor; and the victorious Moslems were enriched with the spoils of Cyprus and Rhodes. The sacred duty of pursuing the assassins of Othman was the engine and pretense of his ambition. The bloody shirt of the martyr was exposed in the mosque of Damascus: the emir declared the fate of his injured friend; and sixty thousand Moslems were engaged in his service by an oath of fidelity and revenge. Amr, the conqueror of Egypt, himself an army, was the first who saluted the new monarch, and divulged the dangerous secret, that the Arabian caliphs might be erected elsewhere than in the city of the prophet. The policy of Mordecai, which ended the value of his rival, and, after the death of Ali, he negotiated the abdication of his son Hassan, whose mind was either above or below the government of the world, and who retired without a sigh from the palace of Cufa to an humble cell near the tomb of his grandfather. The aspiring wishes of the caliph were finally crowned by the im- portant change of an elective to an hereditary kingdom. Some murmurs of freedom or fanaticism attested the reluctance of the Arabs, and four citizens of Medina refused the oath of fidelity; but the designs of Mowiyah were aided by the influence of Ali, and his son Yezid, a feeble and dissolute youth, was proclaimed as the commander of the faithful and the successor of the apostle of God.

A familiar story is related of the benevolent son of Ali. He was sitting at a table, a slave had insincerely dropped a dish of scalding broth on his master: the heedless wretch fell prostrate, to depurate his punishment, and repeated a verse of the Koran: "Paradise is for those who command their anger"—"I am not angry:"—"and for those who pardon offenses:"—"I pardon your offense:"—"and for those who return good for evil:"—"I give you your liberty, and four hundred pieces of silver." With an equal measure of piety, Hosein, the younger brother of Hassan, inherited a rament of his father's spirit, and served with honour against the christians in the siege of Constantinople. The primogeniture of the line of Hashem, and the holy character of grandson of the apostle, had centred in his person, and he was at liberty to prosecute his claim against Yezid, the tyrant of Damascus, whose vices he despised, and whose title he had never desired. A list was secretly transacted from Cufa to Medina, of one hundred and forty thousand Moslems, who professed their attachment to his cause, and who were eager to draw their swords so soon as he should appear on the banks of the Euphrates. Against the advice of his wisest friends, he resolved to trust his person and family in the bands of a perilous people. He traversed the desert of Arabia with a temerous retinue of women and children; but as he approached the confines of Iraq, he was alarmed by the solitary or hostile face of the country, and suspected either the defection or ruin of his party. His fears were just: Obeidollah, the governor of Cufa, had extinguished the first sparks of an insurrection; and Hosein, in the plain of Kh-bela, was encompassed by a body of five thousand horse, who interrupted his communication with the city and the river. He might still have escaped to a fortress in the desert, that had defied the power of Caesar and Chosroes, and confided in the fidelity of Tis, which would have armed ten thousand warriors in his defence. In a conference with the chief of the enemy, he proposed the option of three honourable conditions; that he should be allowed to return to Medina, or be stationed in a frontier garrison against the Turks, or safely conducted to the presence of Yezid. But the commands of the caliph, or his lieutenant, were stern and absolute; and Hosein

0 Abofida, a modern Sonnita, relates the different opinions concerning the burial of Ali, but adopts the sepulture of Cufa, hostile faction. J. Bagster, in his Nefhrum, as reckoned by Nefhrum to amount annually to 3000 of the dead, p. 283, 289.

1 All the tyrants of Persia, from Ashdral d' Bowsal (A. D. 977, D'Her- bert, i. p. 483), to the last Ommiyah, (A. D. 1747, Epenh. tom. ii, p. 135,) have enriched the tomb of Ali with the spoils of the people. The dome is copper, with a bright and inasty gilding, which gives to the spot the appearance of many a sacred shrine.

2 The city of Meshed Alich, five or six miles from the ruins of Cufa, and one hundred and twenty to the south of Baghdad, is of the size and form of the modern Jerusalem. Meshed Hosein, larger and more populous, is at the distance of thirty miles.

CHAP. XI.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

217
was informed that he must either submit as a captive and a criminal to the commander of the faithful, or expect the consequences of his rebellion. "Do you think," replied he, "to terrify me with death!" And, during the short respite of a night, he prepared with calm and solemn resignation to encounter his fate. He checked the lamentations of his weeping wife, who deplored the impending ruin of his house. "Our trust," said Hosein, "is in God alone. All things, both in heaven and earth, must perish and return to their Creator. My brother, my father, my mother, who are better than me, and every man that has an example in the prophet." He pressed his friends to consult th'ir safety by a timely flight: they unanimously refused to desert or survive their beloved master; and their courage was fortified by a fervent prayer and the assurance of paradise. On the morning of the final day, he mounted on his horseback, with his sword in one hand and the Koran in the other: his generous band of martyrs consisted only of thirty-two horse and forty foot; but their flanks and rear were secured by the tent-ropes, and by a deep trench which they had hewed before their face in the ruins of the castle of the Arabs. The enemy advanced with reluctance; and one of their chiefs deserted, with thirty followers, to claim the partnership of inevitable death. In every close onset, or single combat, the despair of the Fatimites was contended by the indomitable valor of the . . .

...next...
The talents of Mahomet are entitled to our applause, but his success has perhaps too strongly attracted our admiration. Are we surprised that a multitude of proselytes should embrace the doctrine and the passions of an eloquent fanatic! In the heresies of the church, the same seductions have been tried and the same arts to which the apostles of the reformation. Does it seem incredible that a private citizen should grasp the sword and the sceptre, subdue his native country, and erect a monarchy by his victorious arms! In the moving picture of the dynasties of the east, a hundred fortunates have been smitten, and it is often asserted that he mounted more formidable obstacles, and filled a large scope of empire and conquest. Mahomet was alike instructed to preach and to fight, and the union of these opposite qualities, while it enhanced his merit, contributed to his success. The operation of force and persuasion, of enthusiasm and fear, continually acted on each other, till every barrier yielded to their irresistible power. His voice invited the Arabs to freedom and victory, to arms and rapine, to the indulgence of their daring passions in this world and the other; the devotion to a level with the senses and imagination, the apostles to that of the reformers. Does it seem incredible that a private citizen should grasp the sword and the sceptre, subdue his native country, and erect a monarchy by his victorious arms? In the moving picture of the dynasties of the east, a hundred fortunates have been smitten, and it is often asserted that he mounted more formidable obstacles, and filled a large scope of empire and conquest. Mahomet was alike instructed to preach and to fight, and the union of these opposite qualities, while it enhanced his merit, contributed to his success. The operation of force and persuasion, of enthusiasm and fear, continually acted on each other, till every barrier yielded to their irresistible power. His voice invited the Arabs to freedom and victory, to arms and rapine, to the indulgence of their daring passions in this world and the other; the devotion to a level with the senses and imagination, the apostles to that of the reformers. Does it seem incredible that a private citizen should grasp the sword and the sceptre, subdue his native country, and erect a monarchy by his victorious arms?

Permanency of his religion. But the permanency of his religion that deserves our wonder is not the progress which he engrafted at Mecca and Medina, preserved after the revolutions of twelve centuries, by the Indian, the African, and the Turkish proselytes of the Koran. If the Christian apostles, St. Peter or St. Paul, had returned to the Arabian, they might possibly inquire the name of the Deity who is worshipped with such mysterious rites in that magnificent temple; at Oxford or Geneva, they would experience less surprise; but it might still be incumbent on them to perceive the catechism of the church, and to study the orthodox commentaries on their own writings and the words of their Master. But the Turkish dome of St. Sophia, with an increase of splendour and size, represents the humble tabernacle erected at Medina by the hands of Mahomet. The Mahometans have uniformly withstood the temptation of reducing the objects of their faith and reverence to a level with the senses and imagination, the apostles to that of the reformers. Does it seem incredible that a private citizen should grasp the sword and the sceptre, subdue his native country, and erect a monarchy by his victorious arms?

Permanency of his religion. But the permanency of his religion that deserves our wonder is not the progress which he engrafted at Mecca and Medina, preserved after the revolutions of twelve centuries, by the Indian, the African, and the Turkish proselytes of the Koran. If the Christian apostles, St. Peter or St. Paul, had returned to the Arabian, they might possibly inquire the name of the Deity who is worshipped with such mysterious rites in that magnificent temple; at Oxford or Geneva, they would experience less surprise; but it might still be incumbent on them to perceive the catechism of the church, and to study the orthodox commentaries on their own writings and the words of their Master. But the Turkish dome of St. Sophia, with an increase of splendour and size, represents the humble tabernacle erected at Medina by the hands of Mahomet. The Mahometans have uniformly withstood the temptation of reducing the objects of their faith and reverence to a level with the senses and imagination, the apostles to that of the reformers. Does it seem incredible that a private citizen should grasp the sword and the sceptre, subdue his native country, and erect a monarchy by his victorious arms?

CHAPTER XII.

The conquest of Persia, Syria, Egypt, Africa, and Spain, by the Arabs or Saracens. — Empire of the caliphs, or successors of Mahomet. — State of the Christians, &c. under their government.

The revolution of Arabia had not changed the character of the Arabs: the death of Mahomet was the signal of independence; and the hasty structure of his power and religion tottered to its foundations. A small and faithful band of his primitive disciples had listened to his eloquence, and shared his distress; had fled with the apostle from the persecution of Mecca, or had received success of Mahomet.

as the fundamental code, not only of theology but of civil and criminal jurisprudence; and the laws which regulate the actions and the property of mankind, are guarded by the infallible and immutable sanction of the will of God. This religious servitude is attended with some practical disadvantage; the illiterate legislator has been driven into the paths of injustice; the blood of those of his country; and the institutions of the Arabian desert may be ill adapted to the wealth and numbers of Ispanan and Constantinople. On these occasions, the Cadi respectfully places his head on the holy volume, and substitutes a dexterous interpretation of the provisions of equity, and the manners and policy of the times.

His beneficial or pernicious influence. His merciful views towards the public happiness is the last consideration in the character of Mahomet. The most bitter or most bigoted of his Christian or Jewish foes, will surely allow that he assumed a false commission to inculcate a salutary doctrine, less perfect only than their own. He piously supposed, as the basis of his religion, the truth and sanctity of their prior revelations, the miracles and miracles of their founders. The beds of Arabia were broken before the throne of God; the blood of human victims was expiated by prayer, and fasting, and alms, the laudable or innocent acts of devotion; and his rewards and punishments of a future life were painted by the images most congenial to an ignorant and ears generation. Mahomet was perhaps incapable of dictating a moral and political system for the use of his countrymen; but he breathed among the faithful a spirit of charity and friendship, recommended the practice of the social virtues, and checked, by his laws and precepts, the thirst of revenge and the oppression of widows and orphans. The hostile tribes were united in faith and obedience, and the valour which had been idle spent in domestic quarrels, was vigorously directed against a foreign enemy. Had the impulse been less powerful, Arabia, free at home, and formidable abroad, might have flourished under a succession of her native monarchs. Her sovereignty was lost by the extent and rapidity of conquest. The colonies of the nation were scattered over the east and west, and their blood was mingled with the blood of their converts and captives. After the reign of three caliphs, the throne was transported from Medina to Damascus by the death of the Tigris; the holy cities were violated by impious war; Arabia was ruled by the rod of a subject, perhaps of a stranger; and the Bedouins of the desert, awakening from their dream of dominion, resumed their old and solitary independence.
The fugitive in the walls of Medina. The increasing myths, which acknowledged Mahomet as their king and prophet, had been compelled by his arms, or adduced by his prosperity. The polytheists were confounded by the simple idea of a solitary and invisible

God; the pride of the christians and Jews discarded the idea of a triune Deity, and, in the spirit of contm-buttery legislation and anathema. Their habits of faith and obedience were not sufficiently confirmed; and many of the new converts regretted the venerable antiquity of the law of Moses, or the rites and mysteries of the catholic church, or the idols, the sacrifices, the joyous festivals of their pagan ancestors. The jarring interests and hereditary feuds of the Arabian tribes had not yet coalesced in a system of union and subordination; and the barbarians were impatient of the mildest and most salutary laws that curbed their passions, or violated their customs. They submitted with reluctance to the religious precepts of the Koran, the abstinence from wine, the fast of the Ramadan, and the daily repetition of five prayers; and the alms and tithe, which were collected for the treasury of Medina, could be distinguished only by a name from that payment of a perpetual and immovable tax. The example of Mahomet had excited a spirit of fanaticism or imposture, and several of his rivals presumed to imitate the conduct, and defy the author-ty, of the living prophet. At the head of the fugitives and mutineers was the first caliph, the immediate caret of Mecca, Medina, and Tayef; and perhaps the Koinish would have restored the idols of the Caaba,

if their levity had not been check'd by a seasonable reproof. 1 Ye men of Mecca, will ye be the last to embrace, and the first to abandon, the religion of Islam? 2 After exhorting the Moslems to confide in the aid of God and his apostle, Abubeker resolved, by a vigorous attack, to prevent the junction of the rebels. The women and children were safely lodged in cavities of the mountains; the warriors, marching under the crows of banners, diffused the terror of their arms and the appearance of a military force reinvigora and confirmed the loyalty of the faithful. The inconstant tribes accepted, with humble repentance, the duties of prayer, and fasting, and alms; and, after some examples of success and severity, the most daring aposttates fled prostrate before the sword of the Lord and of Caled. In the fertile province of Yemenah, 3 between the Red sea and the gulf of Persia, in a city not inferior to Medina itself, a powerful chief, his name was Moselaimum, had assumed the character of a prophet, and a sort of mania listened to his voice. A female prophetess was attracted by his reputation: the decencies of words and actions were spurned by these favourites of heaven; 4 and they employed several days in mystic and amorous converse. An obscure sentence of his Koran, or book, is yet extant; and, in the pride of his mission, Misselaima descended to offer a part-tion of the earth. The proposal was answered by Mahomet with contempt; but the rapid progress of the impostor awakened the fears of his successor:

forty thousand Moslems were assembled under the standard of Caled; and the existence of their faith was resigned to the event of a decisive battle. In the first action they were repulsed with the loss of twelve hundred men; but the skill and perserverance of their general prevailed: their defeat was avenged by the slaughter of ten thousand infidels; and Moselaima was assassinated. The same javelin which had mortally wounded the uncle of Mahomet. The various rebels of Arabia, without a chief or cause, were speedily suppressed by the power and discipline of the rising monarchy; and the whole nation again professed, and more stedfastly held, the religion of the Koran. The ambition of the caliphs provided an immediate exercise for the restless spirit of the Saracens: their valour was united in the preservation of a holy war; and their enthusiasm was equally confirmed by opposition and victory.

From the rapid conquest of the Sarracen

260 THE DECLINE AND FALL CHAP. XII.

Character of their caliphs. that the first caliphs commanded in person the armies of the faithful, and sought the crown of martyrdom in the most arduous struggles. The courage of Abubeker and the sternness of Othman were revealed in the persecution and wars of the prophet; and the personal assurance of paradise must have taught them to desire the pleasures and dangers of the present world. But they ascended the throne in a venerable age or maturity, and were the object of the domestic cults of religion and justice the most important duties of sovereign. Except the presence of Omar at the siege of Jerusalem, their longest expeditions were the frequent pilgrimages from Medina to Mecca; and they calmly received the tidings of victory as they prayed or preached before the sepulchre of the prophet. The austere and frugal measure of their lives was the effect of virtu-

ity or habit, and the pride of their simplicity insured the vain magnificence of the kings of the earth. When

Abubeker assumed the office of caliph, he enjoined his daughter Ayeshah to take a strict account of his private patrimony, that it might be evident whether he were enriched or impoverished by the service of the state.

He thought himself entitled to a stipend of three pieces of gold, with the sufficient maintenance of a single camel and a black slave; but on the Friday of each week he distributed the residue of his own and the public money, first to the most worthy, and then to the most indigent, of the Moslems. The remains of his wealth, a coarse garment, and five pieces of gold, were delivered to his successor, who lamented with a modern taste that the caliphate had not become an im-terable model. Yet the abstinence and humility of Omar were not inferior to the virtues of Abubeker; his food consisted of barley-bread or dates; his drink was water; he preached in a gown that was torn or tattered

in twelve places; and a Persian satrap, who paid his homage to the conqueror, found him asleep among the beggars on the steps of the mosch of Medina.

Economy is the source of liberality, and the increase of the revenue enabled Omar to establish a just and perpetual reward for the past and present services of the faithful. He assumed the just title of his own accomplishment, and not merely that of his kinsman to Abbas, the uncle of the prophet, the first and most ample allowance of twenty-five thousand drams or to pieces of silver. Five thousand were allotted to each of the aged warriors, the reliets of the field of Beder, and the last remnant of the companions of Maho-

net was distinguished by the annual reward of three thousand pieces. One thousand was the stipend of the veterans who had fought in the first battles against the Greeks and Persians, and the decreasing pay, as low as twelve pieces of silver, was adapted to the respectable merit and seniority of his soldiers.

1 See the description of the city and country of Al Yemenah, in Abulfeda, p. 60. 4 It is well known that in the thirteenth century, there were some ruins, and a very few palms; but in the present century, the same ground is occupied by the vasonas and arms of a modern grove.

2 In the thirteenth century, there were imperfectly known by Almorh, Descript. de Tl Arabie, p. 296—300. 5 See this text, which demonstrates a gregariousness in the works of genera-

In the Anjou, and died at Basra. (Abulfeda, p. 76. vide Reuske, p. 63.)

3 See this text, which demonstrates a gregariousness in the works of genera-

In Alphonzius (Specimen Hist. Arabum, p. 13 and Dymast, c. 103.) and Abulfeda. (Manuz, p. 59.)
Under his reign, and that of his predecessor, the conquerors of the east were the trusty servants of God and the people; the mass of the public treasure was conscripted to the expenses of peace and war: a prudent policy, and the genius of historians, has conserved for us the details of the discipline of the Saracens, and they unite, by a rare felicity, the despatch and execution of despotism, with the equal and frugal maxims of a republican government.

The heroic courage of Ali,6 the consummate prudence of Musawiyah,7 excited the emulation of their successors; and the eastern and the central provinces of the empire, which had been the school of civil discord, were more usefully applied to propagate the faith and dominion of the prophet. In the sloth and vanity of the palace of Damascus, the succeeding princes of the house of Omneyah were alike destitute of the qualifications of statesmen and of saints.1 Yet the spoils of unknown nations were continually lost at the foot of their throne, and the uniform ascent of the Arabian greatness must be ascribed to the spirit of the nation rather than the abilities of their chiefs. A large deduction must be allowed for the want of their enemies. The birth of Mahomet was fortunately placed in the most degenerate and disorderly period of the Persians, the Romans, and the barbarians, of Europe: the empires of Tiran, or even of Constantine or Charlemagne, would have repelled the assault of the naked Saracens, and the terror of their exploits might have been obscur'd lost in the sands of Arabia.

Their conquests.

In the victorious days of the Roman republic, it had been the aim of the senate to confine their consuls and legions to a single war, and to suppress a first enemy before they proceeded to the conquest of their enemies. Those timid maxims of policy were disdained by the magnanimity or enthusiasm of the Arabian caliphs. With the same vigour and success they invaded the succors of Augustus and those of Artaxerxes; and the rival monarchies at the same instant became the prey of an enemy whom they had been so long accustomed to despise. In the ten years of the administration of Omar, the Saracen reduced to his obeisance thirty six thousand cities or castles, destroyed four thousand churches or temples of the unbelievers, and edified fourteen hundred mosques for the use of the religion of Mahomet. One hundred years after his flight from Mecca, the arms and the reign of his successors extended from India to the Atlantic ocean, over the various and distant provinces, which may be comprised under the names of I. Persia, II. Syria, III. Egypt; IV. Africa; and, V. Spain. Under this government events were more or less of those memorable transactions; despatching with brevity the remote and less interesting conquests of the east, and reserving a fuller narrative for those domestic countries, which had been included within the pale of the Roman empire. Yet I must excuse my own defects by a just complaint of the blindness and insufficiency of my guides. The Greeks, so loquacious in controversy, have not been anxious to celebrate the triumphs of their enemies.8 After a century of ignorance, the first annals of the Mussulmans were col-

1 The conquerors, and even their historians, were astonished by the dawn of their future greatness: "In the same year," says Elmasin, "Caled fought many sigificant naval battles; and a large number of Arabian vessels were cut to pieces or slain by the capture of their first ships." 9

2 A.D. 623.

3 The original Arab is known only by the Persian and Turkish versions. The Saracenic history of Ibn Abul, or Elmasin, is said to be an abridgment of the great Tabari. (Ockley's History of the Sarac-en, vol. ii. prep.; xxxvii. and list of authors, D'Herbelot, p. 265. 170.)

4 Besides the list of authors prefixed by Flavienus, (Life of Mahomet, p. 172—175.) the Arab historian, Abu-Melchile, has included in his text of the De Pece de la Croix, (Hist. de Gesangeien, p. 325—350.) we find in the Bibliotheque Orientale Turckh, a catalogue of two or three hundred histories or chronicles, which are inserted as part of the East, of which not four are older than Tabari. A sketchy oriental literature is given by Reiche (Or. et Traditions des Arabes, 1705.) and by the an-palatium ad calculation Abulbidae synis Lijade, 1705) but his project and the French version of Petit de la Croix, (Hist. de Timor et Pacis, tom. i. pref.) has been undertaken by another hand.

5 The particular historians and geographers will be occasionally introduced. The following list of works of every kind, which they have guided me in this general narrative. 1. Anales Elmasin, Patriarchelli Alexandrin, tom. i. 2. Abdabs Alhabbristan, in Oxon., 1695. In ita. A copious edition of an indifferent author, translated by Pocock to gratify the prudential prejudices of his friend Selden. 3. Historia Sarracenic Georgii Elmasini, opera et studio Thomas Repinini, in Lugd. Batavorum, 1652. It is said to have been translated a corrupt. Abs, and his version is often deficient in style and sense. 3. Historiae commendatae Dianusarnari, a Gregorio Abulpharagius, interprete Edardus Pococke, in Oxon., 1693. More useful for the history than the civil history of the east. 4. Abulfeda Anales Moslemici ad Ann. Hebrat. eccesi. a Jo. Jau. Reiche, in 2. Lippomani, 1677.) the original and yet, how far below the name of Abulfeda. We know that he wrote as Hamadh, in the fourteenth century. The three former were divided into the ten preceding centuries; the two first, native of Egypt; a Melchite patriarch, and Jacobite scribe.

6 M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. pref. xiv. xx.) has characterized, with truth, the historians of the eastern empires as historians, the dry annalists, and the tunnel and soul weary. 8. Bibliotheque Orientale, par M. P. Bazard, in folio, Paris, 1717. 7. For the character of the Geographer he will consult the third volume of his work. (Voyages du Levant, part i. chap. 1.) His work is a agreeably unceasing, with the variety, the gravity even, from which he has digested the alphabetical order; and find him more satisfactory in the general history of the Persian than the Arabian chronology. The recent supplement from the papers of M. M. Visconti and Belardinelli (in folio, Turin, 1765—70.) is of a different cast, a medley of tales, proverbs, and Chinese antiquities. 8. Pocock will consult the late Thomas Repinini, in Lugd. Batav., 1652. 9. The French geographer is equally at home in every age and every climate of the world. 10. Pocock and Chated plurima in hoc ann. quaestis, praps vivant... cible Caled was soon transferred to the Syrian war: the invasion of the Persian frontier was conducted by less active or less prudent commanders: the Saracens were repulsed with loss in the passage of the Euphrates. Though the Persians were the insolent pursuit of the Magians, their remaining forces still hovered in the desert of Babylon.

Battle of Ca-
desia, D. B. 1002. The Persians were disposed, and in the pursuit of the Saracens, formed their troops in three bodies and the inferior part of the army was thrown and captured in the field—a leathern apron of a blacksmith, who, in ancient times, had added the deliverer of Persia but this badge of heroic poverty was disguised, and almost concealed, by a profusion of precious gems. After this victory, the wealthy and ambitious faith took possession of the throne of Persia, and his conquests were firmly established by the speedy foundation of the Abbasides, a place which ever commands the trade and navigation of the Persians. At the distance of fourscore miles from the gulf, the Euphrates and Tigris unite in a broad and direct current, which is aptly styled the river of the Arabs. In the interval, between the junction and the mouth of these famous streams, the new settlement was placed on the western bank: the first colony was composed of eight hundred Moslems; but the influence of the situation on the banks of the river made it a populous and well-guarded place.

The youth and inexperience of the prince were many years of age, declining a perilous encounter: the royal standard was delivered into the hands of his general Rustam; and a remnant of thirty thousand regular troops was swelled in truth, or in opinion, to one hundred and twenty thousand subjects, or allies, of the great king. The Moslems, whose numbers were reinforced from twelve to thirty thousand, had pitched their camp in the plains of Cadesia; and though it consisted of several foreign men, collected to produce more soldiers, than the unwieldy host of the infidels. I shall here observe what I must often repeat, that the charge of the Arabs was not like that of the Greeks and Romans, the effort of a firm and compact infantry: their military force was chiefly formed of cavalry and archers; and the engagement, which was often interrupted and often renewed by single combats and flying skirmishes, might be proected without any decisive event to the continuance of several days. The periods of the battle of Cadesia were distinguished by their peculiar apppellations. The first, from the well-timed appearance of six thousand of the Syrian horsemen, was denominated the day of succor. The day of concession might express the disorder of one, or perhaps of both, of the contending armies. The third, a nocturnal tumult, received the whimsical name of the night of darkness. From the discordant elements which were compared to the inarticulate sounds of the fiercest animals. The morning of the succeding day determined the fate of Persia; and a seasonable whirlwind drove a cloud of dust against the faces of the unbeaten Persians, and the glare of arms concealed the pres-tent of Rustam, who, far unlike the ancient hero of his name, was gently reclining in a cool and tranquil shade, amidst the baggage of his camp, and the train of mules that were laden with gold and silver. On the sound of danger he started from his couch; but his flight was overaken by a valiant Arab, who caught him by the foot, struck off his head, hoisted it on a lance, and instantly returning to the field of battle, been imported, which is employed with a mixture of wax to illuminate the palaces of the east. Strangers to the name and properties of that odoriferous gum, the Saracen, mistaking it for salt, mingled the camphor and their salt and spread the sweet fragrance of the".

This page contains a narrative about the architecture and history of Persia, specifically focusing on the city of Cufa and its habitation. It describes how the city was occupied and describes its structures and the life of its inhabitants. The text also notes the presence of shrubs and vegetation around the city, and mentions the mythological figure Zoroaster. It concludes with a reference to the city of Arbela in ancient times. The page also contains a mention of the Tigris and the Persian Empire, highlighting the importance of these geographical features in the region. The text is rich in historical and cultural references, providing insights into the daily life and architectural practices of the time. The narrative is interspersed with references to other ancient cities and empires, such as Nineveh and the Persian Empire, to provide a broader context for the story being told. This page is a key reference for understanding the historical development of Persia and its impact on the surrounding regions. The narrative is concise yet detailed, providing a comprehensive overview of the region's history and cultural significance. The text is written in a clear and logical manner, making it easy to follow and understand. It is a valuable resource for anyone interested in the history and culture of Persia and its role in the broader context of ancient history.
After the fall of the Persian kingdom, the river Oxus divided the territories of the Sacarnes and of the Turks. This narrow boundary was soon over-raped by the spirit of the Arabs: the governors of Chorasun extended their successive inroads; and one of their triumphs was the capture of a camel-driver, whom, on the instant of his capture, she dropped in her precipitate flight beyond the hills of Bochera. But the final conquest of Transoxiana, as well as of Spain, was reserved for the glorious reign of the inactive Walid; and the name of Catibah, the camel driver, declares the origin and merit of his conquerors.

This assumed title was first exhibited on the banks of the Indus, the spacious regions between the Oxus, the Jaxartes, and the Caspian sea, were reduced by the arms of Catibah to the obedience of the prophet and his successors. The Mahometan banner was displayed on the banks of the Indus, the spacious regions between the Oxus, the Jaxartes, and the Caspian sea, were reduced by the arms of Catibah to the obedience of the prophet and his successors.

The Mahometan banner was displayed on the banks of the Indus, the spacious regions between the Oxus, the Jaxartes, and the Caspian sea, were reduced by the arms of Catibah to the obedience of the prophet and his successors. The Mahometan banner was displayed on the banks of the Indus, the spacious regions between the Oxus, the Jaxartes, and the Caspian sea, were reduced by the arms of Catibah to the obedience of the prophet and his successors.

...
hands of the infidels. And I would have you know, that the fighting for religion is an act of obedience to God." His messengers returned with the tidings of pious and martial ardour which they had kindled in every part of the land. As you have seen, they resolutely filled with the intrepid bands of the Saracens, who panted for action, complained of the heat of the season and the scarcity of provisions, and accused with impatient murmurs the delays of the caliph. As soon as their numbers were complete, Abubeker ascended to the head of them and invited them to war. As you have seen, far and near, and in the distant parts of the empire, that call was heeded with enthusiasm; and forthwith the whole army was at rest, and there was no more question of the undertaking. In person, and on foot, he accompanied the first day's march; and when the blushing leaders attempted to dismount, the caliph removed their burden from their shoulders, and the ranks of the leaders, or those who walked, in the service of religion, were equally meritorious. His instructions to the chiefs of the Syrian army were inspired by the warlike fanaticism which advances to seizure, and affects to despise, the objects of earthly ambition. "Remember," said the same chief of the prophet, "that you are always in the presence of God, on the verge of death, in the assurance of judgment, and the hope of paradise. Avoid injustice and oppression; consult with your brethren, and study to preserve the love and confidence of your troops. When you fight the battles of the Lord, accept your own land and that of the enemy. As assassins you thought, but let not your victory be stained with the blood of women or children. Destroy no palm-trees, nor burn any fields of corn. Cut down no fruit-trees, nor do any mischief to cattle, only such as you kill to eat. When you make any covenant or article, stand to it, and be as good as your word. If you are called upon to find some religious persons who live retired in monasteries, and propose to themselves to serve God that way: let them alone, and neither kill them nor destroy their monasteries;
And you will find another sort of people, that belong to the synagoge of Satan, who have been crowned; be sure you cleave their skulls, and give them no quarter till they either turn Mahomets or pay tribute." All profane or frivolous conversation, all dangerous recollection of ancient quarrels, was severely prohibited among the Arabs: in the tumult of battle, the exclamation of religion was limited to the word of prayer, and the intervals of action were employed in prayer, meditation, and the study of the Koran. The abuse, or even the use, of wine was chastised by four-score strokes on the soles of the feet, and in the fervour of their primitive zeal many secret sinners revenged their own convictions, or vindicated the cause of God by the unexampled sacrifice of their lives. Under some hesitation, the command of the Syrian army was delegated to Abu Ob-idah, one of the fugitives of Mecca and companions of Mahomet; whose zeal and devotion were assuaged, without being abated, by the singular mildness and benevolence of his temper. But in all the emergencies of war, the soldiers demanded the superior genius of Caled; and whoever might be the choice of the prince, the sword of God was both in feet and fame the foremost leader of the Saracens. He obeyed without reluctance; he was consulted without jealousy; and he was the spirit and the soul of the troops, that Caled professed his readiness to serve under the banner of the faith, though it were in the hands of a child or an enemy. Glory, and riches, and dominion, were indeed promised to the victorious Mussulman; but he was carefully instructed, that if the goods of this life were his only incitement, they like brass would be melted away.
One of the fifteen provinces of Syria, the cultivated lands to the eastward of Siege of Bosra.
The Jordan, had been decorated by Roman vanity, with the name of Arabia, 1 and the first arms of the Saracens were justified by the semblance of a national right. The call to arms was carried by the mahometan messengers, by the vigilance of the caliph, and by the solid structure of their walls. The last of these cities was the eighteenth station of Medina: the road was familiar to the caravans of Hejaz and Irak, who annually visited this plentiful market of the province and the desert; the perpetual jealousy of the Arabs had trained the inhabitants to arms; and twelve thousand horse could easily fall from the gates of Bosra, an appellation which signifies, in the Syriac language, a strong tower of defence. Encouraged by their first success against the open towns and flying parties of the borders, a detachment of four thousand Moslems pre-empted to summon and attack the fort of Bosra. They were oppressed by the unexampled number of the foe, who, by the presence of Caled, with fifteen hundred horse; who blamed the enterprise, restored the battle, and received his friend, the venerable Serjiah, who had vainly invoked the unity of God and the promise of the apostle. After a short repose, the Moslems performed their ablations, and with the same ardour of spirit, the morning prayer was recited by Calb d Hệr, they mounted on horse-back. Confident in their strength, the people of Bosra threw open their gates, drew their forces into the plain, and swore to die in the defence of their religion. But a religion of peace was incurable of withstand-} ple his meritorious treason; "I renounce your society," said Romanus, "both in this world, and the world to come. And I deny him that was crucified, and whosever worshipes him. And I choose God for my Lord, Islam for my faith, Mecca for my temple, the Mohametan, and Mahomet for my prophet; who was sent to lead us into the right way, and to exalt the true religion in spite of those who join partners with God."1

Seige of Damascus.

The conquest of Bosnia, four days' journey from Damascus, encouraged the Arabs to besiege the ancient capital of Syria. 2 At some distance from the walls, they encamped among the groves and fountains of that delicious territory, and the usual option of the Mahometan faith, of tribute or of war, was proposed to the resolute citizens, who had been lately strengthened by a re-forcement of five thousand Greeks. In the decline as in the infancy of the military art, an hostile defence was frequently offered and accepted by the generals themselves; 3 but a lance was shivered in the plain of Damascus, and the personal presence of Calec was signalized in the first sally of the besieged. After an obstinate combat, he had overthrown and made prisoner one of the Christian leaders, a stout and worthy antagonist. He instantly mounted a fresh horse, the gift of the governor of Palmyra, and pushed forward to the front.
"Repulse you," he said to his friends, "of a moment sa-said his friend Derar, "and permit me to supply your place: you are fatigued with fighting with this dog."
"O Derar!" replied the indefatigable Saracen, "we shall rest in the world to come. He that labours to-day shall rest to-morrow." With the same manly ardour, Calec answered, encountered, and vanquished a second champion; and the heads of his two captives who refused to abandon their religion were indignantly hurled into the midst of the city. The event of some general and partial sieges reduced the Damascenes to a closer defence; but a messenger whom they sent from the walls, returned with the promise of speedy and powerful succour, and their tumultuous joy convoyed the intelligence to the camp of the Arabs.
After some debate it was resolved by the generals, to raise, or rather to suspend, the siege of Damascus, till they had given battle to the forces of the emperor. In the retreat, Calec would have chosen the more perilous station of the rear-guard; he modestly yielded to the wishes of Abu Obeidah. But in the hour of dangers his courage of his birth, who was rude and pressed by a sally of six thousand horse and ten thousand foot, and few among the Christians could relate the circumstances of their defeat. The importance of the contest required the junction of the Saracens, who were dispersed on the frontiers of Syria and Palestine; and I shall transcribe one of the circular mandates which was addressed to Amron, the future conqueror of Egypt. "In the name of the most merciful God: from Calec to Amron, health and hap-

1 Damascus is simply described by the Sheriff al Edrisi; (Geograph. Nau, 1535. p. 124.) It was inhabited by ten thousand people in 1056.
Abu Feidas; (Tabula Syriam, p. 160.) Schulten; (Index Geograph. ad V. Subi. 3. 37, ed. Cursore Hefele. 114.) Yvon du Levant, part i. p. 583-600.) Maundrell; (Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 123-153.) and Pococke; (Description of the East, vol. ii. p. 117-127.)
2 Nobilissima civitas, says Justin. According to the oriental tra-3 The notion, however, is founded in the passage of the New Testament, in which the disciples of Jesus Christ are said, (Acts x. 49.) to have beaten the Turks to Damascus, (Ptef. de Gail, IV. 10. 20-50.) and afterwards to have been expelled from Europe. (Hist. Generale, tom. i. p. 1. 154.) 4 These words are a text of the Koran, ch. ix. 211. See, like cut fanatics of the last century, the Moslems, on every familiar or immortal subject, in the same fashion. (Hist. Generale, tom. i. p. 1. 154.) 5 The name of Warden is unknown to Toparchian, and, though it might belong to an Armenian chief, has very little of a Greek aspect or substance. It seems to be more natural in their mouths, than the Hebrew "bom ane, which they have borrowed from the Christians to forward the name of Julian. (Hist. Generale, tom. i. p. 1. 154.) 6 Victor, who casts a keen and lively glance over the surface of history, and has recourse with the restlessness, and the heroism of the Ills; the siege of Troy and that of Damascus. (Hist. Generale, tom. i. p. 1. 154.)

Battle of Aiznadin.

the caliph. A smile of indignation expressed the refusal of Caled. "Ye Christian dogs, you know your option; the Koran, the tribute, or the sword. We are a people whose delight is in war, rather than in peace; and we bend your pious aim. Damascus we shall be-speedily masters of your wealth, your families, and your persons." Notwithstanding this apparent disdain, he was deeply conscious of the public danger; those who had been in Persia, and had seen the armies of the infidel, conversely to the effect of an inestimable force. From the superiority of the enemy, the mighty Saracen derived a fresh incentive of courage:
"You see before you," said he, "the united force of the Romans: you cannot hope to escape, but you may conquer Syria in a single day. The event depends on your discipline and patience. Reserve yourselves till the evening. It was in the evening that the prophet was accustomed to vanquish." During two successive engagements, his temperate firmness sustained the darts of the enemy, and the murmurs of his troops.
At length, when the spirits and quivers of the adverse army were almost exhausted, Caled gave the signal of onset and victory. The remains of the imperial army fell to Antioch, or Cessarea, or Damascus; and the death of four hundred and seventy Moslems was compensated by the opinion that they had sent to hell abounding with all the rewards of the life to come.
Inestimable numbers of silver, gold, and jewels perished. Inestimable numbers of horses, arms, and immeasurable suits of the richest armour and apparel.
The general distribution was postponed till Damascuus should be taken; but the reasonable supply of arms became the instrument of new victories. The glorious intelligence was transmitted to the throne of the caliph, and the Arabian tribes, the coldest or most hestile to the prophet's mission, were eager and importunte to share the harvest of Syria.

The Arabs return. The sad tidings were carried to Damascus; were lamented by the land of grief and terror;
and the inhabitants beheld from their walls the return of the heroes of Azzadin. Anrou led the van at the head of nine thousand horse: the hands of the Saracens succeeded each other in formidable review; and the rear was closed by Caled in person, with the standard of the black eagle. To the activity of Derar he intrusted the commission of patrolling round the city with two thousand horse, of scouring the plain, and of intercepting all succour and intelligence. The rest of the Arabian chiefs were fixed in their respective standing or gaites of Damascus; and the negotiation of the siege was renewed with fresh vigour and confidence. The art, the labour, the military engines, of the Greeks and Romans are seldom to be found in the simple, though successful operations of the Saracens: it was sufficient for them to invest a city with arms, rather than with trenched; to repel the valiant of the bi-sieged; to attempt a stratagem or an assault; or to expect the progress of famine and discontent. Damascus would have acquiesced in the trial of Azzadin, as a final and peremptory sentence between the emperor and the caliph. The lombard and the prelacy of Damascus were an example and author of Thomas, a noble Greek, illustrious in a private condition by the alliance of Heracli-ius. The tumult and illumination of the night precluded the design of the morning sally; and the christian hero, who affected to despise the enthusiasm of the Arabs, employed the resource of a similar superstition. At the principal gate, in the sight of both armies, a lofty crucifix was erected; the bishop, with his clergy, accompanied the march, and led the voume of the New Testament before the image of Jesus; and the contending parties were scandalized or edified by a prayer, that the Son of God would defend his servants and vindicate his truth. The battle raged with insensate fury; and the dexterity of Thomas, an incomparable archer, was fatal to the boldest Saracen, in their attempt toINGTON the enemy by a powerful shot. The wife of Aban, who had followed him to the holy war, embraced her expiring husband. "Happy," she said,
"happy art thou, my dear: thou art gone to thy Lord who first joined us together, and then parted us as-under. I will rely on the terror that still remains in the utmost of my power to come to the place where thou art, because I love thee. Henceforth shall no man ever touch me more, for I have dedicated myself to the service of God." Without a groan, without a tear, she washed the corpse of her husband, and buried him with the usual rites. The men grasping the media pons, which in her native land she was accustomed to wield, the intrepid widow of Aban sought the place where his murderer fought in the thickest of the battle. Her first arrow pierced the hand of his standard-bearer; her second wounded Thomas in the eye; and the fainting Christians no longer beheld their command upon their leader. Yet the generous champion of Dama-cus refused to withdraw to his palace: his wound was dressed on the rampart; the fight was continued till the evening; and the Syrians rested on their arms. In the morning, the siege was renewed. On the right, the stroke on the great bell; the gates were thrown open, and each gate discharged an impetuous column on the sleeping camp of the Saracens. Caled was the first in arms; at the head of four hundred horse he flew to the post of danger, and the tears trickled down his iron cheeks, as he uttered a fervent ejaculation: "O God, who never sleepest, look upon thy servants, and do not deliver them into the hands of their enemies." The valour and victory of Thomas were arrested by the presence of the sword of God; with the knowledge of the peril, the Moslems recovered their ranks, and the fabric of the flanery was not brought to the loss of thousands, the christian general retreated with a sigh of despair, and the pursuit of the Saracens was checked by the military engines of the rampart.

After a siege of seventy days, the pasience, and perhaps the provisions, of the enemy were exhausted; and the bravest of their chiefs submitted to the hard dictates of necessity. In the occurrences of peace and war, they had been taught to dread the fierceness of Caled, and to respect the mark of his valiant hand.
At the hour of midnight, one hundred chosen deputies of the clergy and people were introduced to the tent of that venerable commander. He received and dismissed them with courtesy. They returned with a written agreement, on the faith of a companion of Mahomet, that all hostilities should cease; that the voluntary enemies might depart in safety, with as much as they could carry away of their effects; and that the tributary subjects of the caliph should enjoy their lands and houses, with the use and possession of seven churches.
On these terms, the most resistless hostagies, and the fear of a capture, reduced the Saracens. The bold his soldiers imitated the moderation of their chief; and he enjoyed the submissive gratitude of a people whom he had rescued from destruction. But the success of the treaty had relaxed their vigilance, and in the same moment the opposite quarter of the city was betrayed

\footnote{At Wakah (Ocklev, p. 191) says, "with poisoned arrows," but this savage invention is improper in the case of Greeks and Romans, that I must suspect, on this occasion, the malevolent creed of the Saracens.}

\footnote{Abdelsab allows only seventy days for the siege of Damascu-
s. (Annal. Moslem, D. 1024, fol. 133.) The same author, prolongs the term to six months, and notices the use of the sallet by the Saracens. (Hist. Saracen, p. 23, 22.) Even this longer period is insufficient to the genius of the time, which made the most disastrous (Joly, A. D. 632) to whose rescue was hurried the exarch (45) was speedily delivered. (Abel, Wakah, apud Ocklev, vol. ii., p. 115.) Abdalhannaf (Dymat, p. 112, vers. Pocock.) Perhaps, as in the operations were interrupted by excursions and detachments, till the last seventy days of the siege.

\footnote{Vanity prompted the Arabs to believe, that Thomas was the son of a god, resembling Allah in all his good actions; and that he had two wives: and his auger daughter would not have married in exile at Damascus. (See Ducange, Fam. Byzantin. p. 115, 119.) Had the books of his religion, I might only suspect the legitimacy of the damsel.}
and taken by assault. A party of a hundred Arabs had opened the eastern gate to a more inexcusable foe. "No quarter," cried the rapacious and sanguinary Caled, "no quarter to the enemies of the Lord!"; his troops rushed in, and a torrent of Christian blood poured down the streets of Damascus. When he reached the church of St. Mary, he was astonished and provoked by the peaceful aspect of his companions; their swords were in the sheath, and they were surrounded by a multitude of priests and monks. Abu Obeidah saluted the general: "God," said he, "has delivered the city into my hands by way of surrender, and has saved the believers the trouble of fighting." "And am I not," replied the indignant Caled, "am I not the lieutenant of the commander of the believers? Have I not taken the city by storm? The unbelievers shall perish by the sword. Fall on!" The hungry and cruel Arabs would have obeyed the welcome command; and Damascus was lost, if the benevolence of Abu Obeidah had not been supported by a decent and dignified firmness. Throwing himself between the trembling citizens and the most eager of the barbarians, he adjured them by the holy name of God, to respect his promise, to suspend their fury, and to wait the determination of their chiefs. The chill silence of the church, of the market; and of a vehement debate, Caled submitted in some measure to the reason and authority of his colleague; who urged the sanctity of a covenant, the advantage as well as the honour which the Muslims would derive from the punctual performance of their word, and the obstinate resistance which they must encounter from the distrust and despair of the rest of the Syrian cities. It was agreed that the sword should be sheathed, that the part of Damascus which had surrendered to Abu Obeidah, should be immediately entitled to the benefit of his capitulation, and that the final decision should be referred to the justice and wisdom of the caliph. A large majority of the people accepted the terms of toleration and truce; and Damascus is still peopled by twenty thousand Christians. But the valiant Thomas, and the free-born patriots who had fought under his banner, embraced the alternative of poverty and exile. In the adjacent meadow, a numerous encampment was formed of priests and laymen, of soldiers and citizens, of men and women: they collected, with haste and terror, their most precious movables; and abandoned, with despair, grief, or silence, their native homes, and the pleasant banks of the Phaphar. The inflexible soul of Caled was not touched by the spectacle of their distress: he disputed with the Damascenes the property of a magazine of corn; endeavored to exclude them from the city, on the pretext of the treaty; contended with reluctance, that each of the fugitives should arm himself with a sword, or a lance, or a bow; and sternly declared, that, after a respite of three days, they might be pursued and treated as the enemies of the Moslems.

Peril of the Saffahin. The passion of a Syrian youth completed the ruin of the exiles of Damascus. A nobleman of the city, of the name of Jonas, was betrothed to a wealthy maiden; but her parents delayed the consummation of his nuptials, and their daughter was persuaded to escape with the man whom she had chosen. They corrupted the nightly watchmen of the gate Krisan: the lover, who led the way, was encompassed by a squadron of Arabs; but his exclamation in the Greek tongue, "the bird is taken," admonished his mistress to lose no time. In the presence of Caled, and of death, she professed her belif in one God and his apostle Mahomet; and continued, till the season of his martyrdom, to discharge the duties of a brave and sincere Mussulman. When the city was taken, he flew to the monas-tary, where Eudocia had taken refuge; but the lover was forgotten; the apostate was scourged; she preferred her religion to her country; and the justice of Cal-ed, though deaf to mercy, refused to detain by force a male or female inhabitant of Damascus. Four days was the general confined to the city by the obligation of the treaty; the Christians were supported by the usual new conquest. His appetite for blood and rapine would have been extinguished by the hopeless computation of time and distance; but he listened to the importunities of Jonas, who assured him that the weary fugitives might yet be overtaken. At the head of four thousand horse, in the disguise of Christian Arabs, Caled undertook the pursuit. They halted only for the moments of prayer; and the guide had a perfect knowledge of the country. For a long way the foot-steps of the Damascenes roused the Arabs to anxiety: they vanished on a sudden; but the Saracens were reassured by the assurance that the caravan had turned aside into the mountains, and must speedily fall into their hands. In traversing the ridges of the Libanins, they endured intolerable hardships, and the skinking spirits of the vetenan enemies were supported and cheered by the uncom-querable ardor of a lover. From a peasant of the country, they were informed that the emperor had sent orders to the colony of exiles, to pursue without delay the road of the sea-coast and of Constantinople, apprhenesive, perhaps, that the soldiers and people of Antioch might be discouraged by the sight and story of their sufferings. The Saracens were conducted through the territories of Gabala and Laodicea, at a cautious distance from the walls of the cities; the rain was incessant, the night was dark, a single mountain separated them from the Roman army; and Caled, ever anxious for the safety of his brethren, whispered an ominous dream in the ear of his companion. With the dawn of day the prospect again cleared, and they saw before them, in a pleasant valley, the tents of Damascus. After a short interval of repose and prayer, Caled divided his cavalry into four squadrons, committing the first to his faithful Derar, and reserving the last for himself. They successively rushed on the promiscuous multitude, insensibly provided with arms, and already vanquished by sorrow and fatigue. Except a captive who was pardoned and dismissed, the Arabs enjoyed the satisfaction of believing that not a Christian of either sex escaped the edge of their scimitars. The gold and silver of Damascus was scattered over the camp, and a royal wardrobe of three hundred ells of silk might clothe an army of barbarians. In the tumult of the battle, Jonas sought and found the object of his pursuit; but her resentment was inflamed by the last act of his perfidy; and as Eudocia struggled in his hateful embrace, she struck a dagger to her heart. Another female, the widow of Thomas, and the real or supposed daughter of Heraclius, was spared and released without a ransom: but the generosity of Caled was the effect of his contempt; and the haughty Saracen insulted, by a message of defiance, the throne of the Caesars. Caled had perhaps been a prisoner in the mind of the heart of the Roman province; he returned to Da-

¶ It appears from Al-Balidi (p. 135) and El-Maqriz (p. 22) that this distinction of the two parts of Damascus was long remembered, though not accepted, by the Moslem sovereigns. Likewise Eucub. (Annal. tom. ii. p. 379, 390, 581.)

§ It is somewhat surprising that Phocas and Eudocia, Mr. Huxley has built the siege of Damascus, one of our most popular traditions, and which possesses the rare merit of blending nature and history, the manners of the times and the feelings of the heart. The Indian delicacy of the players compelled him to a fire then the most surprising and the most romantic. Instead of a long siege, Phocas serves the Arabs as an honorable ally; instantly seizes the city, and after the victory of his son, the emperor, he dies in the same place, and the sea, and might have rejoined the high road of Constantinople at Alexandria. The itinerary will represent the directions and distance, (p. 146, 147, 543, 542. ed. Weisew.)

masues with the same secrecy and speed. On the accession of Omar, the sword of God was removed from the command; but the caliph, who blamed the rashness, was compelled to applaud the vigour and conduct, of the enterprise.

Another expedition of the conquerors of Damascus will equally display their ability and their contempt for the riches of the present world. They were informed that the produce and manufactures of the country were annually collected in the four days of the festival of Abyla; and as the rapacious taste of the city; that the cell of a devout hermit was visited at this time by a multitude of pilgrims; and that the festival of trade and superstition would be enabled by the nuptials of the daughter of the governor of Tripoli. Abdallah, the son of Jaafer, a glorious and holy martyr, undertook, with a banner of five hundred horse, the pious and profitable commission of despising the infidels. As he approached the fair of Abyla, he was astonished by the report of a mighty concourse of Jews and Christians, Greeks and Armenians, of natives of Syria and of strangers of Egypt, to the number of ten thousand, besides a thousand horse that attended the person of the bride. The Saracens passed: "For no one part," said Abdallah, "I dare not go back: our foes are many, our danger great, but our reward is splendid and secure, either in this life or in the life to come. Let every man try his fortune in his way," and they were left alone.

Not a Mussulman deserted his standard. "Lead the way," said Abdallah to his Christian guide, and you shall see what the companions of the prophet can perform." They charged in five squadrons; but after the first advantage of the surprise they were encompassed and subdued by the superior numbers of the Christians; and their valiant band was fancifully compared to a white spot in the skin of a black camel. About the hour of sunset, when their weapons dropped from their hands, when they prayed on the verge of eternity, they discovered an approaching cloud of dust, they heard the welcome sound of the tebrie, and they soon perceived the standard of Caled, who flew to their relief with the utmost speed of his cavalry. The Christians were broken by his attack, and slaughtered in their flight, as far as the river of Tripoli. They left behind them the bodies of their women and children, and an army reduced to a few horse were exposed for sale, the money that was brought for purchase, the gay decorations of the nuptials, and the governor's daughter, with forty of her female attendants. The fruits, provisions, and furniture, the money, plate, and jewels, were diligently laden on the backs of mules and pack animals, and the modern traders returned in triumph to Damascus. The hermit, after a short and angry controversy with Caled, declined the crown of martyrdom, and was left alive in the solitary scene of blood and devastation.

Syria, one of the countries that have been improved by the most early cultivation, is not unworthy of the preference. The heat of the climate is tempered by the vicinity of the sea and mountains, by the plenty of water and air; and the produce of a fertile soil is affords the subsistence, and encourages the propagation, of man and beast. From the time of the death of Heraclius, the country was overspread with ancient and flourishing cities: the inhabitants were numerous and wealthy; and, after the slow ravage of despotism and superstition, after the recent calamities of the Persian war, Syria could still attract and reward the industrious and the pious. Fifteen days' journey, from Damascus to Aleppo and Antioch, is watered on the western side by the winding course of the Orontes. The hills of Libanus and Anti-Libanus are planted from north to south, between the Orontes and the Mediterrenean; and the epiphon of hollow (Caelus Syria) was applied to a long and fruitful valley, which is confined in the same direction by the two ridges of snowy mountains. Among the cities, which are enumerated by Greek and oriental names in the geography and conquest of Syria, we may distinguish Emesa or Bosra, Heliopolis and Baalbeke, the former as the metropolis of the country, the latter as the capital of the valley. Under the last of the Caesars, they were strong and populous: the turrets glittered from afar: an ample space was covered with public and private buildings; and the citizens were illustrious by their spirit, or at least by their pride; by their riches, or at least by their opulence. In the reign of both Emesa and Heliopolis, they were addicted to the worship of Baal, or the sun; but the decline of their superstition and splendour has been marked by a singular variety of fortune. Not a vestige remains of the temple of Emesa, which was equalled in poetical description by the summits of Mount Libanus, while the ruins of Baalbeke, invisible to the writers of antiquity, excite the curiosity and wonder of the European traveller.

The measure of the temple is two hundred feet in length, and one hundred in breadth: the front is adorned with a double portico of eight columns; fourteen may be counted on either side; and each column, forty-five feet in height, is composed of three massive blocks of stone or marble. The proportions and ornaments of the Cenithian order express the architecture of the Greeks; but as Baalbeke has never been the seat of a march, we are at a loss to conceive how the expense of these magnificent structures was supplied by private or municipal liberality. From...
THE DECLINE AND FALL

230

the conquest of Damascus the Saracens proceeded to but I shall decline the repetiHeliopolis and Emesa tion of the sallies and combats which have been already shown on a large scale. In the prosecution of the war, their policy was not less effectual than their sword.
By short and separate truces they dissolved the union of the enemy ; accustomed the Syrians to compare their friendship with their enmity ; familiarized the idea of their language, religion, and manners;
and exhausted, by clandestine purchase, the magazines and arsenals of the cities which they returned to besiege. They aggravated the ransom of the more wealthy, or the more obstinate ; and Chalets alone was taxed it five thousand ounces of gold, five thousand ounces of silver, two thousand robes of silk, and as many figs and olives as would load five thousand asses.
But
the t"rms of truce or capitulation were faithfully observed ; and the lieutenant of the caliph, who had promised not to enter the walls of the captive Biialbeo,
:

remained tranquil and immovable

in his tent till the jarring factions solicited the interposition of a foreign master. The conquest of the plain and valley of Syria was achieved in less than two years.
Yet the commander of the faithful reproved the slowness of their progress ; and the Saracens, bewailing their fault with tears of rage and repentance, called aloud on their chiefs to lead them forth to fight the battles of the Lord. In a recent action, under the walls of Emesa, an Arabian youth, the cousin of Caled, was heard aloud to exclaim, "Methinks I see the black-eyed girls looking upon me; one of whom, should she appear in this world, all mankind would die for love of her.
And I see in the hand of one of them, a handkerchief of green silk, and a cap of precious stones, and she beckons me, and calls out, Come hither quickly, foT I love thee." With these words, charging the christians, he made havoc wherever he went, till, observed at length by the governor of Hems, he was struck through with a javelin.
It was incumbent on the Saracens to Battle of Yermuk
A. D 636.
exert the full powers of their valour and November. enthusiasm against the forces of the emperor, who was taught by repeated losses, that the rovers of the desert had undertaken, and would speedily achieve, a regular and permanent conquest. From the provinces of Europe and Asia, fourscore thousand soldiers were transported by sea and land to Antioch and Caesarea: the light troops of the army consisted of sixty thousand christian Arabs of the tribe of Gassan.
Under the banner of Jabalah, the last of their princes, they marched in the van ; and it was a maxim of the Greeks, that, for the purpose of cutting diamond, a diamond was the most effectual.
Heraclius withheld his person from the dangers of the field ; but his presumption, or perhaps his despondency, suggested a peremptory order, that the fate of the province and the war should be decided by a sii gle battle. The Syrians were attached to the Standard of Rome and of the cross; but the noble, the citizen, the peasant, were exasperated by the injustice and cruelty of a licentious host, who oppressed them as sjihjects, and despised them as strangers and aliens.*
report of these mighty preparations was conveyed to the Saracens in thfir camp of Emesa; and the chiefs, though resolved to fight, assembled a council : the faith of Abu Obeidah would have expected on the same spot the.glrry of martyrdom ; the wisdom of Caled advised an honourable retreat to the skirts of Palestine and Arabia, where they might await the succours of their friends, and the attack of the unbelievers. A speedy messenger soon returned from the throne of Medina, with the blessings of Omar and Ali, the prayers of the widows of the prophet, and a reinforcement of eight thousand
•

A

d I

have read somewhere in Tacitus, orGrotius. Subj."Clos habent su-s. vils lamquain al'ipn-is. S *me Greek officers ravished and Ma-

lamquam

Ihe wife, and murdered the child, nf iheir Syrian landlord nuel smiled at jiis unduiiful compliment.

;

Chap. XII.

In their way they overturned a detachment of Greeks, and when they joined at Yermuk the camp of their brethren, they found the pleasing intelligence, that Caled had already defeated and scattered the christian Arabs of the tribe of Gassan.
In the neighbourhood of Bosra, the springs of mount Hermon descend in a torrent to the plain of Decapolis, or ten cities ; and the Hieromax, a name which has been corrupted to Yermuk, is lost after a short course in the lake of Tiberias. e The banks of this obscure stream were illustrated by a long and bloody encounter. On this momentous occasion, the public voice, and the modesty of Abu Obeidah, restored the command to the most deserving of the Moslems. Caled assumed his station in the front, his colleague was posted in the rear, that the disorder of the fugitives might he checked by his venerable aspect, and the sight of the yellow banner which Mahomet had displayed before the walls of Chaibar.
The last line was occupied by the sister of Derar, with the Arabian women who had enlisted in this holy war, who were accustomed to wield the bow and the lance, and who in a moment of captivity had defended, against the unmcumcised ravishers, their chastity and religion.'
The exhortation of the " Paradise is before general was brief and forcible you, the devil and hell-fire in your rear." Yet such was the weight of the Roman cavalry, that the right wing of the Ar:bs was broken and separated from the main body. Thrice did they retreat in disorder, and thrice were they driven back to the charge by the reproaches and blows of the women. In the intervals of action, Abu Obeidah visited the tents of his brethren, prolonged their repose by repeating at once the prayers of two different hours ; bound up their wounds with his own hands, and administered the comfortable reflection, that the infidels partook of their sufferings without partaking of their reward. Four thousand and thirty of the Moslems were buried in the field of battle ; and the skill of the Armenian archers enabled seven hundred to boast that they had lost an eye in that meritorious service.
The veterans of the Syrian war acknowledged that it was the hardest and most doubtful of the days which they had seen. But it was likewise the most decisive : many thousands of the Greeks and Syrians fell by the swords of the Arabs;
many were slaughtered, after the defeat, in the woods and mountains; many, by mistaking the ford, were drowned in the waters of the Yermuk ; and however the loss may bo magnified,e the christian writers confess and bewail the bloody punishment of their sins. b Manuel, the Roman general, was either killed at Damascus, or took refuge in the monastery of mount Sinai.
An exile in the Byzantine court, Jahalah lamented the manners of Arabia, and his unlucky preference of the christian cause."
He had once inclined

Moslems.

:

c See Reland, Palesiin. torn, i.p.272.2S3. lorn, ii.p.773. 775. This Earned professor was equal to the task of describing ihe Holy Land, since he was alike conversant with Greek and Latin, with Hebrew and Arabian literature. The Yermuk, or Hieromax. is noticed by Celarius (Geograph. Actiq. torn. ii. p. 392 ) and P'Anville. (Geographic Ancienne, torn. ii. p. 135 ) The Arabs, and even Abulfeda himself, do not seem to recognize the scene of their victory.
f These women were of the tribe of the Hamyarites, who derived their on°in from the ancient Amalekites. Their females were accustomed to ride on horseback, and to fight like the Amazons of old.
(Ockley, vol. i. p. 67.)
killed of them, says Abu Obeidah to the caliph, one hundred' 5
and fifty thousand, and made prisoners forty thousand. (Ockley, vol.
i. p. 241 )
As I cannot doubt his veracity, nor b°lifve his compute tion, I must suspect that the Arabic historians indulged themselves in the practice of composing speeches and letters fr their heroes.
h After deplorinz the siiis of the christians. Theophanes add* (Chronograph, p. 276.) »r«?« i £fu.u.«c- Ayx«.* »m»T«» iuc; rzr >sh TSO Xtl?^, ^i>Kl' iTf-H CSfZ 5-TrCi; »5W 'P. Jf*,*CV ff*TOV <iti tj F>c(is> tlij.1- (does he mean Aiznadin ?) «» l??»s»«»», r»r x-.yrit'-.r *'« iri^.c-i -r. His account is brief and obscure, but ha accuses the numbers of the enemy, the adverse wind, and the cloud'
->-*• sxJe=>;
Ttm
of dust : .*"! t» turns (the Romans) *•
,1.- f:. .-tr^t-VC tcu Iff*.
l-.re.fTBr, JrT^rrxi, XX* IX->T!U," ,i >./.o- ^ uzyii'v riTi^-s txn a^*iiE»rs f 5^ (Chronograph, p*. 280 ) See Abulfeda. (Annal. Moslem, p. 70. 71.) who transcribes ihs
i poetical complaint of Jabalah himself, and some panegyrical strains of an Arabian poeu to whom the chief of Gass in sent from Constantinople a gift of five hundred pieces of gold by the hands of the am bassador of Omar.

We

,

«

..

.


to the profession of Islam; but in the pilgrimage of Mecca, Jabalah was provoked to strike one of his brethren, and fled with amazement from the stern and equal justice of the caliph. The victorious Saracens enjoyed at Damascus the same pleasures as at Jerusalem; but the city was divided by the discretion of Abu Obaidah: an equal share was allowed to a soldier and to his horse, and a double portion was reserved for the noble coursers of the Arabian breed.

Conquest of Jerusalem.

A.D. 637.

After the battle of Yermuk, the Roman army no longer appeared invincible, and the Saracens might securely choose among the fortified towns of Syria, the first object of their attack. They consulted the caliph whether they should march to Cæsarea or Jerusalem; and the advice of Ali determined the immediate siege of the latter. To a profane eye, Jerusalem was the first or second capital of Palestine; but after Mecca and Medina, it was revered and visited by the devout Moslems, as the temple of the Holy Land which had been sanctified by the revelation of Moses, of Jesus, and of Mahomet himself. The son of Abu Sophian, the Homs, sent to Damascus to try the first experiment of surprise or treachery; but on the morrow, the town was invested by the whole force of Abu Obaidah. He addressed the customary summons to the chief commanders and people of the city.

- Health and happiness to every one that follows the right way; peace and love to those who behave well; God be with you; and that Mahomet is his apostle. If you refuse this, consent to pay tribute, and be under us forthwith. Otherwise I shall bring men against you who love death better than you do the drinking of wine or eating hog's flesh. Nor will I ever stir from you, if it pleases God, till I have destroyed those that fight for you, and made slaves of your children.”

But the city was defended on every side by deep valleys and steep ascents; since the invasion of Syria, the walls and towers had been anxiously restred; the bravest of the fugitives of Yermuk had stopped in the nearest places; and the inhabitants of Christ, the natives and stragglers might feel some sparks of the enthusiasm which so freely glowed in the bosoms of the Saracens. The siege of Jerusalem lasted four months; not a day was lost without some action of sally or assault; the military engines incessantly played on the ramparts; and the inclemency of the winter was still more painful and destructive to the Arabs. The Christians yielded length to the perseverance of the besiegers. The patriarch Sophronius appeared on the walls, and by the voice of an interpreter demanded a conference. After a vain attempt to persuade the leaders of the sonorous enterprise, he proposed, in the name of the people, a fair capitulation, with this extraordinary clause, that the articles of security should be ratified by the authority and presence of Omar himself. The question was discussed in the council of Medina; the sanctity of the place, and the advice of Ali persuaded the caliph to gratify the wishes of his soldiers and enemies; and the simplicity of his journey is more illustrous than the royal pageants of vanity and oppression. The conqueror of Persia and Syria was mounted on a red camel, which carried, besides his personal baggage, a corn, a bag of dates, a wooden dish, and a leather bottle of water. Wherever he halted, the company, without distinction, was invited to partake of his homely fare, and the repast was consecrated by the prayer and exhortation of the commander of the faithful.

But in this expedition or pilgrimage, his power was exercised in the administration of justice: he reformed the licentiousness of the Arab polity, relented the tributaries from extortion and cruelty, and chastised the luxury of the Saracens, by despoiling them of their riches and properties, and dragging them in the dirt. When he came within sight of Jerusalem, the caliph cried with a loud voice, “God is victorious. O Lord, give us an easy conquest;” and, pitching his tent of coarse hair, calmly seated himself on the ground. After signing the capitulation, he entered the city without force, and, surrounded with sabers, disconsol'd with the patriach concerning its religious antiquities. Sophronius bowed before his new master, and secretly muttered in the words of Daniel, “The abomination of desolation is in the holy place.” At the hour of prayer they stood together in the church of the resurrection; but the caliph refused to perform his devotions, and contented himself with praying on the steps of the church of Constantinian. To the patriarch he disclosed his prudent and honourable motive. “Had I yielded,” said Omar, “to your request, the Moslems of a future age would have infringed the treaty under which I entered the city. You see the caliph the command the ground of the temple of Solomon was prepared for the foundation of a mosque; and, during a residence of ten days, he regulated the present and future state of his Syrian conquests. Medina might be jealous, lest the caliph should be detained by these views of clemency or the building of mosques; but his apprehensions were dispelled by his prompt and voluntary return to the tomb of the apostle.”

To achieve what yet remained of the of Aleppo and Syrian war, the caliph had formed two armies, separate detachments, under Amr Ibn Al-As and Yazid, was left in the camp of Palestine; while the larger division, under the standard of Abu Obaidah and Caed, marched north to the against Antioch and Aleppo. The latter of these, the Bercen of the Greeks, was not yet illustrious as the capital of a province or a kingdom; and the inhabitants, by anticipating their submission and pleading their poverty, obtained a moderate composition for their lives and religion. But the castle of Aleppo, distinct from the city, stood erect on a lofty artificial mound; the sides were sharpened to a precipice, and faced with five-stone; and the breadth of the ditch which was filled with the rivers which supplied it. After the loss of three thousand men, the garrison was still equal to the defence; and Youkinnan, their valiant and hereditary chief, had murdered his brother, a holy monk, for daring to pronounce the name of peace. In a siege of four or five months, the hardest of the Syrian war, great numbers of the Saracens were killed. Again the caliph, desirous of consolidating his conquests, by the army of Antioch and Aleppo, was possessed of a great force. He made the city his seat, and the caliph thus enlarged his dominions. The latter of these, the Bercen of the Greeks, was not yet illustrious as the capital of a province or a kingdom; and the inhabitants, by anticipating their submission and pleading their poverty, obtained a moderate composition for their lives and religion. But the castle of Aleppo, distinct from the city, stood erect on a lofty artificial mound; the sides were sharpened to a precipice, and faced with five-stone; and the breadth of the ditch which was filled with the rivers which supplied it. After the loss of three thousand men, the garrison was still equal to the defence; and Youkinnan, their valiant and hereditary chief, had murdered his brother, a holy monk, for daring to pronounce the name of peace. In a siege of four or five months, the hardest of the Syrian war, great numbers of the Saracens were killed.

A.D. 637.

The Arabs boast of an old prophecy preserved at Jerusalem, and describing the name, the religion, and the person of Omar, the future conqueror. By such arts the Jews are said to have subdued the pride of their foreign masters, Cyrus and Alexander. (Joseph. Antiq. l. vi. c. 18. p. 254. 255.)

The image of Al Cadis, the Holy, is used as the proper name of Jerusalem.

The singular journey and equiptage of Omar are described. (First in the name of the city, the profane prevailed over the sacred; Jerusalem was known to the devout christians; (Euseb. de Mart. Penn. p. 104.)Jerusalem (the Holy City, or the Holy City of Allah Holman) has passed from the Romans to the Arabs. (Gisland, Palestine tom. i. p. 247. tom. ii. p. 335. D’Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, t. ii. p. 329. Hanx. p. 456.) The epitaph of Al Cadis, the Holy, is used as the proper name of Jerusalem.

The singular journey and equiptage of Omar are described. (In the name of the city, the profane prevailed over the sacred; Jerusalem was known to the devout christians; (Euseb. de Mart. Penn. p. 104.)Jerusalem (the Holy City, or the Holy City of Allah Holman) has passed from the Romans to the Arabs. (Gisland, Palestine tom. i. p. 247. tom. ii. p. 335. D’Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, t. ii. p. 329. Hanx. p. 456.) The epitaph of Al Cadis, the Holy, is used as the proper name of Jerusalem.
and wounded: their removal to the distance of a mile could not succede the vigilance of Youkinn; nor could the christians be terried by the execution of three hundred captives, whom they beheaded before the castle wall. The silence, and at length the complaints, of Abu Obeidah informed the caliph that their hope and purpose were discovered at the siege of this impregnable fortress. "I am variously affected," replied Omar, "by the difference of your success; but I charge you by no means to raise the siege of the castle. Your retreat would diminish the reputation of our arms, and encourage the infidels to fall upon you on all sides. But if the siege continues, I shall at once ascend the dull and mean walls of the castle, and fight for your presence and forage with your horse round the adjacent country." The exhortation of the commander of the faithful was fortiited by a supply of volunteers from all the tribes of Arabia, who arrived in the camp on horses or camels. Among these was Dames, of a servile birth, but of gigantic size, and intrepid resolution. The forty-seventh day of his service he proposed, with only thirty men, to make an attempt on the castle. The experience and testimony of Caides recommended his offer; and Abu Obeidah admonished his brethren not to cast the last of the captors of Damascus. Could he relinquish the public care, would cheerfully serve under the banner of the slave. His design was covered by the appearance of a retreat; and the camp of the Saracens was pitched about a league from Aleppo. With the same servile treachery Dames lay at the foot of the hill; and Dames at length succeeded in his inquiries, though he was provoked by the ignorance of his Greek captives. "God curse these dogs," said the illiterate Arab, "what a strange barbarous language they speak!" At the darkest hour of the night, he scaled the most accessible height, which he had diligently surveyed, a place where the stones were less entire, or the slope less perpendicular, or the guard less vigilant. Seven of the stoutest Saracens mounted on each other's shoulders, and the weight of the column was sustained on the broad and sinewy back of the gigantic slave. The foremost in this painful ascent could grasp and climb the lowest part of the battlements; they silently stabb'd and cast down the sentinels; and the thirty brethren, repeating a pious ejaculation, "O apostle of God, help and deliver us!" were seen flying up in chains to the god of their oppressors. With bold and cautious footsteps, Dames explored the palace of the governor, who celebrated, in riotous merriment, the festival of his deliverance. From thence, returning to his companions, he assaulted the inside the entrance of the castle. They overpowered, until the Saracens, to the number of two thousand provincials, and of the victorious squadrons of Caleb himself. From the north and south the troops of Antioch and Jerusalem advanced along the sea-shore, till their banners were joined under the walls of the Phenician city. "Tripoli and Tyre were betrayed; the hills of Lebanon were covered without to distract the captive harbours, brought a seasonable supply of arms and provisions to the camp of the Saracens. Their labours were terminated by the unexpected surrender of Caesarea; the Roman prince had embarked in the night; and the defenceless exiles solicited their pardon with an offering of two hundred thousand pieces of gold. The remainder of the provincials, Ramilah, Ptolemais or Acre, Sichem or Neapolis, Gaza, Ascalon, Berytus, Sidon, Gabala, Laodicea, Amanus, Hierapolis, no longer presumed to dispute the conquest of Caleb.

His boastful edict, which tempted the grateful city to assume the victory of Pharsalia for a perpetual arm, is given in Ost. p. 529, ed. Wadd. O. Kley (vol. i. p. 281) and mentions the event to Tuesday, August 21st, an incumbent date; since Easter fell that year in April 29th, the 26th of August must have been a Friday. (See the Tables of the Act de Verifier les Dates.)

1 The date of the conquest of Antioch by the Arabs is of some importance. By comparing the years of the world in the chronography of Hiernicus with the years of the Hegira, we shall determine, that it was taken between January 25th and September 1st in the year of Christ 638. (Faci, Crit. in Baron. Anno- tationes, vol. i. p. 259.) O. Kley (vol. i. p. 291) assigns the event to Tuesday, August 21st; but the year 639, as we have seen, is not altogether decided.

2 See O. Kley, (vol. i. p. 285, 312), who lauds the creativeness of his author, when Heraclius "towards Jerusalem, from Antioch, in the winter of 637, and John Malula, in Chron. p. 91, ed. Venet., may distinguish his authentic information of domestic facts from his foreign history or general history.
The will of the conqueror; and Syria bowed under the sceptre of the caliphs seven hundred years after Pompéy" had despoiled the last of the Macedonian king. A

THE CONQUERORS.

The sieges and battles of six campaigns paved the way for the harassment of the Moslems. They died with the reputation and cheerfulness of martyrs; and the simplicity of their faith may be expressed in the words of an Arabian youth, when he embraced, for the last time, his sister: "It is not," said he, "the deficiencies of Syria that worry me; it is the thought of the world, that have prompt'd me to devote my life in the cause of religion. But I seek the favour of God and his apostle; and I have heard from one of the companions of the prophet, that the spirits of the martyrs, when he died, were lighted in the crops of green brier, which shall take the fruits, and drink of the rivers of paradise. Farew-well, we shall meet again among the groves and fountains which God has provided for his elect." The faithful captives might execute a passive and more arduous resolution; and a cousin of Mahomet celebrated for releasing, after an absence of three days, the wine and poek, the only nourishment that was allowed by the malice of the infidels. The frailty of some weaker brethren exasperated the implacable spirit of fanaticism; and the father of Amr-deployed, in pathetic strains, the apostacy and destruction of his son. The insurrection of the poet, the interpolation of the prophet, to occupy, with the priests and deacons, the lowest mansions of hell. The more fortunate Arabs, who survived the war, and persevered in the faith, were restrained by their abominable leader from the abuse of prosperity. After a freshment of twelve years, and a revulsion of the first vigour, they drew his troops from the pernicious contagion of the luxury of Antie ch, and assured the caliph that their religion and virtue could only be preserved by the hard discipline of poverty and labour. But the virtue of their former resolutions, and the pressure of necessity, was kind and lenient to his brethren. After a just tribute of praise and thanksgiving, he dropped a tear of compassion; and sitting down on the ground, wrote an answer, in which he mildly censured the severity of his lieutenant: "He," said the successor of the prophet, "and forbidden the use of those good things of this world to faithful men, and such as have performed good works. Therefore you ought to have given them leave to rest themselves, and partake freely of those good things which the country affordeth. If any of the Saracens have no family in Arabia, or have become Christian, or have committed any female slaves, he may purchase as many as he hath occasion for." The conquerors prepared to use, or to abuse, this gracious permission; but the year of their triumph was marked by a mortality of men and cattle; and twenty-five thousand Saracens were expelled away from the possession of Syria. The death of Abu Obeidah might he lamented by the christians; but his brethren recollected that he was one of the ten elect whom the prophet had named as the heirs of paradise. Called survived his brethren about three years; and the town of the Saracen, which is shown in the neighbourhood of Emesa. His valour, which founded in Arabia and Syria the empire of the caliphs, was fortified by the opinion of a special providence; and as long as he wore a cap, which had been blessed by Mahomet, he deemed himself invisible amongst the darts of the infidels. The place of the first conquerors was supplied by a new generation of their Syrian confrères and countrymen: Syria became A. D. 629—655, the seat and support of the house of Ommiyah; and as the greatness of that powerful kingdom, were consecrated to enlarge on every side the empire of the caliphs. But the Saracens despise a superfluity of fame; and their historians so sedulously condescend to mention the subordinate conquests which are lost in the splendour of rapidity and success of their victorious expeditions. To the south of Syria, the ships of that powerful kingdom, were consecrated to enlarge on every side the empire of the caliphs. But the Saracens despise a superfluity of fame; and their historians so sedulously condescend to mention the subordinate conquests which are lost in the splendour of rapidity and success of their victorious expeditions. To the south of Syria, the ships of that powerful kingdom, were consecrated to enlarge on every side the empire of the caliphs.

II. The conquest of Egypt may be explained by the character of the victorious Saracens, one of the first of his nation.

EGYPT. Character and Life of Amurru.

60 Sixty-five years before Christ, Syria Pontique monuments exist. On Pompej, s. in 18; C. Fr. Paris, ii. 28) rather of his fortune and power; he adjusted Syria to be a Roman province, and the last of the Scythes were incapable of drawing a sword in the defence of their country. (See the original texts collected by Ussher, Abn. ii. 429.)

57 Ockley, Arab., p. 73. Mahomet could affably vary the praises of his disciples. Of Omair he said, that if a prophet could arose after him, it would be Omair; and that in a general calumny, Omair would be excepted by the divine justice. (Ockley, vol. i. p. 242.)

Vol. II. 2 E.
ion, in an age when the meanest of the brethren was exalted above his nature by the spirit of enthusiasm. The birth of Amrou was at once base and illustrious; his mother, a notorious prostitute, was unable to decide among five of the Kedeshi; but the proof of re semblance demonstrated the child to be the eldest of all his lovers.4 The youth of Amrou was impelled by the passions and prejudices of his kindred; his poetic genius was exercised in satirical verses against the person and doctrine of Mahomet; his dexterity was employed by the reigning faction to pursue the religious enemies of the prophet and to take revenge on the eldest of all his lovers.5 Yet he returned from this embassy, a secret proselyte; his reason or interest determined him to renounce the worship of idols; he escaped from Mecca with his friend Caled, and the prophet of Medina enjoyed at the same moment the satisfaction of embracing the two finest champions of his cause. The impatience of Amrou to lead the armies of the faithful was checked by the reproach of Omar, who advised him not to seek power and dominion, since he who is a subject to-day, may be a prince to-morrow. He had founded on the backs of the first two successors of Mahomet; they were indited to his arms for the conquest of Palestine; and in all these sieges of Syria, he united with the temper of a chief, the valour of an adventurous soldier, and the wisdom of a prudent Mediator, the wish to survey the sword which had cut down so many christian warriors: the son of Ansi unshrank a short and ordinary scep ter; and as he perceived the surprise of Omar, "Abas," said the modest Sarem, "the sword itself, without the arm of its master, is neither sharper nor more weighty than the sword of Pharaoh the poet."6 After the conquest of Egypt, he was recalled by the jealousy of the caliph Othman; but in the subsequent troubles the ambition of a soldier, a statesman, and an orator, emerged from a private station. His powerful support, both in council and in the field, established the throne of the Omicrakes; the administration and revenue of Egypt were restored by the gratitude of Musawi to a faithful friend who had raised himself above the rank of a subject; and Amrou endued his days in the palace and city where he had founded the first seat of his honours. In this dying speech to his children is celebrated by the Arabs as a model of eloquence and wisdom: he deplored the errors of his youth; but if the penitent was still infected by the vanity of a poet, he might ex aggerate the venom and mischief of his impious compositions.7

8 From his camp, in Palestine, Amrou had surprised or anticipated the caliph's leave for the invasion of Egypt.8 The magnanimous Omar trusted in his God and his sword, which had shaken the thrones of Chos roes and Cæsar: but when he compared the slender force of the Moslems with the greatness of the enterprise, he condemned his own rashness, and listened to his timid companions. The pride and the greatness of Pharaoh were familiar to the readers of the Koran; and a tenfold repetition of prodigies had been scarcely sufficient to effect, not the victory, but the flight, of six hundred thousand of the children of Israel; the cities of Egypt were many and populous; their architecture, supported by numerous brac hes, was alone an insuperable barrier; and the grandeur of the imperial city would be obstinately defended by the Roman powers. In this perplexity, the commander of the faithful resigned himself to the decision of chance, or, in his opinion, of Providence. At the break of day four lid; thus Amrou and his great officers, broke the seal, perused the epistle, gravely inquired the name and situation of the place, and declared his ready obedience to the commands of the caliph. After a siege of thirty days, he took possession of Fustat; and expressing exultation at the customs of Egypt, as it has been justly named, unveiled the entrance of the country, as far as the ruins of Helipolis and the neighbourhood of the modern Cairo.

On the western side of the Nile, at the cities of small distance to the east of the Pyram, Memphis, Babylon, and Dender, are a small distance to the south of the Delta, Memphis, one hundred and fifty furlongs in circumference, displayed the magnificence of ancient kings. Under the reign of the Ptolemies and Cæsars, the seat of government was removed to the sea-coast; the ancient capital was eclipsed by the arts and intelligence of Alexandria; the palaces, and at length the temples, were reduced to a desolate and ruinous condition: yet, in the age of Augustus, and even in that of Constantine, Memphis was still numbered among the greatest and most populous of the provincial cities.9 The habitations of the Nile, on the banks of the Nile, a thousand feet, were united by two bridges of sixty and of thirty boats, connected in the middle stream by the small island of Roda, which was covered with gardens and habitations.10 The eastern extremity of the camp of the caliph was guarded by the town of Babylon and the camp of a Roman legion, which protected the passage of the river, and the second capital of Egypt. This important fortress, which might fairly be described as a part of Memphis or Meroë, was invested by the arms of the lieutenant of Omar; a reinforcement of four thousand Saracens soon arrived in his camp; and the military engines, which battered the walls, may be imputed to the art and labour of his Syrian allies. Yet the siege was protracted to seven months; and the rash inv aders and threatened by the destruction of their last assault was bold and successful: they passed the ditch, which had been fortified with iron spikes, applied

---

4 We learn this anecdote from a spirited old woman, who reviled to the camera and his friend the innocence of his amours, denounced by silence of Amrou and the libelous of Musawi (Abouféd, Annales, p. 111.).

5 Gaufer, Vie de Mahomet, tom. ii. p. 46, &c. who quotes the Abyssinian history, or romance of Abdel Baldet. Yet the fact of the embassy and ambassador may be allowed.

6 This saying is preserved by Posco, (N., de Carmen Torgeli, p. 184.) and partly applauded by Mr. Harris (Philosophical Arrangements, p. 503.).

7 For the life and character of Amrou, see Ockley (Hist. of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 34, 35, 322, 332, 335, etc.) and Atnie, vol. ii. p. 33, 37, 74, 110—112, 162, etc. (Mem. de l'Academie des inscriptions, tom. xxx.) Tacticus may apply compare Vezamian and Munchian, with Musawi and Amrou. Yet the language is still in the situation, than in the characters, of the men.

8 At Wukfi had likewise composed a separate history of the con quering monarch, which Ockley could not procure; and his own inquiries (vol. i. p. 314—322) have added very little to the original text. The following facts, which are given by a Melchite patriarch of Alexandria, who lived three hundred years after the revolution.

9 Strabo, an accurate and attentive spectator, observes of Helipolis, that in the time of the Ptolemies, "(Geograph. i. xvii. p. 1125.) the 10 of Memphis he declares, &c. "&c. in the time of the Ptolemies, (ibid.) he notices, however, the mixture of the habitations, and the ruins of the palaces. In the proper Egypt, Amenian enumerates Memphis among the four cities, maximus urbium absoluta, montibus et acquis urbem hanc, "(ibid.) with distinction in the Roman Itinerary and episcopal lists.

10 A Thesaurum, (ibid.) the breaches in the breaches of the bridge of the Nile, are only to be found in the Danish traveller and the Cahan geographer (p. 126.).

11 From the month of April, the Nile begins imperceptibly to rise: the swell becomes strong and visible in the moon after the summer solstice, (ibid.) a little after the celebration of St. Peter's day, (June 29.) A register of thirty successive years, prepared by the Mameluke of the province of Rous, (ibid.)
their scaling-ladders, entered the fortress with the shout of “God is victorious!” and drove the remnant of the Greeks to their boats and the isle of Rodua. The spot was afterwards recommended to the conqueror by the easy communication with the gulf and the peninsula of Arabia; the remains of Memphis were passed over; the prospect of a new Edinburg; they were gradually turned into permanent habitations; and the first mosch was blessed by the presence of fourscore companions of Mahomet." A new city arose in their camp on the eastward bank of the Nile; and the contiguous quarters of Babylon and Fostat are confounded in their proper localities, the Nile and the Cynosur, or Cairo, of which they form an extensive suburb. But the name of Cairo, the city of victory, more strictly belongs to the modern capital, which was founded in the tenth century by the Fatimite caliphs. It has gradually revolved from the river, but a rich and nobly built city may be traced by an attentive eye from the monuments of Sesostris to those of Saladin.

Yet the Arabs, after a glorious and profitable enterprise, must have retreated to the desert, had they not found a powerful ally in the person of a new religion. The same revolution was renewed by a similar cause; and in the support of an incomprehensible creed, the zeal of the Copitic worshippers was equally ardent. We have already explained the origin and progress of the Monophysite controversy, and the persecution of the emperor Justinian was supported by the alienated Egypt from their religion and government. The Saracens were received as the deliverers of the Copitic church; and a secret and effectual treaty was opened during the siege of Memphis between a victorious army and a people of slaves. A rich and noble Egyptian, of the name of Mokawas, had assembled his faith to obtain the administration of his province: in the disorders of the Persian war he aspired to independence; the embassy of Mahomet ranked him among princes; but he declined, with rich gifts and ambiguous promises, the offer which was made him. The abuse of his trust exposed him to the resentment of Heraclius; his submission was delayed by arrogance and fear; and his conscience was prompted by interest to throw himself on the favour of the nation and the support of the Saracens. In his first conference with Amrou, he professed without indignation the usual opinion of the Koran, the tribute, or the sword. "The Greeks," replied Mokawas, "are determined to abide the determination of the sword; but with the Greeks I desire no communion, either in this world or in the next; and I adjure for ever the Byzantine tyrant, his synod of Chalcedon, and his Melchite slaves. For myself and my brethren, we are resolved to live and die in the profession of the gospel and unity of Christ. It is impossible for us to embrace the revelations of your despotism. Therefore, we submit to pay tribute and obedience to his temporal successors." The tribute was ascertained at two pieces of gold for the head of every Christian; but old men, monks, women, and children, of both sexes, under sixteen years of age, were exempted from this personal assessment. The caliph, however, had established a new capital at Memphis, which was agreeable to the calliph, and promised a hospitable entertainment of three days to every Mussulman who should travel through their country. By this charter of security, the ecclesiastical and civil tyranny of the Melechites were destroyed; the amongst the St. Cyril were thundered from every pulpit; and the sacred edifices, with the patrimony of the church, were restored to the national communion of the Jacobites, who enjoyed without moderation the moment of triumph and revenge. At the pressing desires of their patriarchs, after a short interview, Amrou was permitted to remove from his desert; and, after the first interview, the courteous Arab affected to declare, that he had never conversed with a Christian priest of more innocent manners and a more venerable aspect. In the march from Memphis to Alexandria the lieutenant of Omar intrusted the safety to his best trusted friend. The roads and bridges were diligently repaired; and in every step of his progress, he proceeded on a constant supply of provisions and intelligence. The Greeks of Egypt, whose numbers could scarcely equal a tenth of the natives, were over-helmed by the universal dejection; they had ever been hated, they are now feared no longer; the magistrate fled from his tribunal, the bishop from his altar; and the distant garrisons were surprised or starved by the surrounding multitudes. Had not the Nile afforded a safe and ready conveyance to the sea, not an individual could have escaped, who by birth, or language, or office, or religion, was connected with their odious name.

By the retreat of the Greeks from the siege and conquest of Upper Egypt, a considerable part of their power was collected in the island of Delos; the native population of the Nile afforded a succession of strong and defensible spots; and the road to Alexandria was labiously cleared by the victory of the Saracens in two and twenty days of general and partial combat. In their annals of conquest, the siege of Alexandria is a grandeur of enterprise. The first trading city in the world was abundantly replenished with the means of subsistence and defence. Her numerous inhabitants fought for the deepest of hard-earned rights, religion and property; and the eminence of the natives seemed to exclude them from the common benefit of peace and toleration. The sea was continually open; and if Heraclius had been awake to the public distress, fresh armies of Romans and Barbarians might have been poured into the harbour to save the second capital of the empire. A circumference of ten miles a Mortal, Merleur de l'Egypte, 247—253. He expatiates on the subject with the zeal and minuteness of a citizen and a bigot, and the local traditions have a strange air of truth and accuracy.

---

c The position of New and Old Cairo is well known, and has been explained by all the better writers, who were familiar with ancient and modern Egypt, have fixed, after a learned inquiry, the seat of Memphians at Gizeh, directly opposite the Old Cairo. (Sicard, Nouveau Memoire des Missions du Levant, tom. vi. p. 5, in Shaw's Observations and Travels, p. 296—304.) Yet we may not desplore the authors of the arguments of Pocock. (Vol. i. p. 37—41.) Niebuhr, (Voyage, tom. i. p. 77—80.) and above all, of D'Anville, Description de l'Egypte, p. 132, 133—135) who have removed Memphians towards the village of Mohammaha, some miles further to the south of the moderns, to avoid the obscurity of the controversy.

d Mortal, M. de l'Egypte, tom. iv. c. 9, et suiv., tom. v. c. 27, 28, 29. (Elisias, Hist. 272, 273, tom. i. xvi. p. 157. ed. of Alphonse.) See also the Historia de Hieroglyphica, in loc. beds. They doubt the age of these monuments.

f Mokawas sent the prophet two Copitic diamonds, with two infant, and a chalice of three ounces, one of gold, one of honey, and the fine white linen of Egypt, with a horse, a mule, and an ass. The chalice contains the juice of the palm, and the honey of Memphis was dispatched from Medina in the seventh year of the Hegira. (Voyage de Magdalen, tom. ii. p. 255, 256, 301.) From Al-Jonnabi.
would have scattered the forces of the Greeks, and favoured the stratagems of an active enemy; but the two sides of an oblong square were covered by the sea and the lake Maroneia, and each of the narrow ends exposed a front of no more than ten furlongs. The efforts of the Arabs were not inadequate to the difficulty of the attack nor the number of the enemy. From the throne of Medina, the eyes of Omar were fixed on the camp and city: his voice excited to arms the Arabian tribes and the veterans of Syria; and the merit of a holy war was recommended by the peculiar fame and fertility of Egypt. Anxious for the ruin of their tyrants, the faithful vassals, devoted their labours to the service of Amron; some sparks of martial spirit were perhaps rekindled by the example of their allies; and the sauguncie hopes of Mokawas had fixed his sepulchre in the church of St. John of Alexandria. Eutychius the patriarch serves that the Saracen fought with the courage of lions; they repulsed the frequent and almost daily sallies of the besieged, and soon assaulted in their turn the walls and towers of the city. In every attack, the sword, the banner of Amron, glittered in the air; "Atnius, a memorable day, he was betrayed by his imprudent valor: his followers who had entered the citadel were driven back; and the general, with a friend and a slave, remained a prisoner in the hands of the Christians. When Amron was conducted before the praetor, he repulsed his dignity, and forgot his situation; a lofty demeanour, and resolute language, revealed the lieutenant of the caliph, and the battle-axe of a soldier was already raised to strike off the head of the ambitious captive. His life was saved by the readiness of his slave, who instantly gave his master a blow on the face, and commanded him, with an angry tone, to be silent in the presence of his superiors. The credulous Greek was deceived; he listened to the offer of a treaty, and his prisoners were dismissed in the hope of a more respectable embassy, till the joyful acclamations of the camp announced the return of the conqueror. At length, after a siege of fourteen months, and the loss of three and twenty thousand men, the Saracen prevailed: the Greeks embellished their dispirited and diminished number, and the void was supplied by a fresh army planted in the walls of the capital of Egypt. "I have taken," said Amron to the caliph, "the greatest city of the west. It is impossible for me to enumerate the variety of its riches and beauty; and I shall content myself with observing that there are four thousand palaces, four thousand baths, four hundred temples, and places of amusement, twelve thousand shops for the sale of vegetable food, and forty thousand tribuary Jews. The town has been subdued by force of arms, without treaty or capitulation, and the Moslems are impatient to seize the fruits of their victory." The commander of the faithful rejected with firmness the idea of pillage, and directed his lieutenant to reserve the wealth and revenue of Alexandria for the public service and the propagation of the faith: the inhabitants were numbered, and the city was improved; the zeal and resolution of the Jacobites were curbed, and the Melchites who submitted to the Arabian yoke were indulged in the ob-cure but tranquil exercise of their worship. The intelligence of this disgraceful and calamitous event allured the declining health of the emperor; and Heraclius died of a dropsy about seven weeks after the loss of Alexandria.1 Under the minority of his grandson, the clamours of a people, deprived of their daily sustenance, compelled the Byzantine court to undertake the recovery of the capital of Egypt. In the space of four years, the harbour and fortifications of Alexandria were renovated and strengthened again by the Romans. They were twice expelled by the valour of Amron, who was recalled by the domestic peril from the distant wars of Tripoli and Nubia. But the facility of the attempt, the repulsion of the insult, and the obstinacy of the resistance, provoked him to swear, that, if he recovered the ground he had lost, he would render Alexandria as accessible on all sides as the house of a prostitute. Faithful to his promise, he dismantled several parts of the walls and towers, but the people were spared in the chastisement of the city, and the mosque of Mercy was erected on the spot where the victorious general had stopped the fury of his troops.

I should deceive the expectation of The Alexandrian reader, if I passed in silence the fate of the Alexandrian library, as it is described by the ancient historians. The Christians were more curious and liberal than that of his brethren, and in his leisure hours, the Arabian chief was pleased with the conversation of John, the last disciple of Amonus, and who derived the surname of Philoponous, from the profound studies of grammar and philology.2 Imboddened by this familiarity, Philoponous presumed to solicit a gift, inestimable in his opinion, contemptible in that of the barbarians; the royal library, which alone, among the spoils of Alexandria, had not been appropriated by the visit and the capture of the conqueror. Amron was inclined to gratify the wish of the grammarian, but his rigid integrity refused to alienate the minutest object with the consent of the caliph; and the well-known answer of Omar was inspired by the ignorance of a fanatic. "If these writings of the Greeks agree with the book of God, they are useless and need not be preserved; if they disagree, they are pernicious and ought to be destroyed." The sentence was executed with blind obedience: the volumes of paper or parchment were distributed to the four thousand baths of the city; and they were so placed that the walls were barely sufficient for the consumption of this precious fuel. Since the Dynasties of Abulpharagius3 have been given to the world in a Latin version, the tale has been repeatedly transcribed; and every scholar, with pious indignation, has deplored the irreparable loss of those objects of antiquity. For my part, I am strongly tempted to deny both the fact and the consequences. The fact is indeed marvellous: "Read and wonder!" says the historian himself; and the solitary report of a stranger who wrote at the end of six hundred years on the confines of Media, is overbalanced by the silence of two annalists of a more early date, both Christians, both natives of Egypt, and the most ancient of whom, the patriarch Eutychius, has admirably described the conquest of Alexandria. The rigid sentence of Omar is repugnant.

1 Both Eutychius (Annal. tom. ii. p. 319.) and Elmacin (Hist. Sarac. p. 262) concur in fixing the taking of Alexandria to Friday of the new moon of Muharram of the twentieth year of the Hejira. (December 22, A. D. 693.) In reckoning the seat of the conquest by Elmacin, as it is by some moderns, at the beginning of the eleventh month, that is, eight years before Alexandria, seven months before Babylon, &c. Amurra was in his sixtieth year about the end of July, and was assured, that he entered the country the 12th of Bayan, 6th of June, (Marchadi, Musul. de l'Egypte, p. 164. Sever. Excid. Renaud, p. 162.) The Saracen, and afterwards Lewin 15. of France, sailed at Calais, or Dunkerque, during the season of the inundation of the Nile.

2 Notwithstanding some inconsistencies of Theophanes and Ce-drens, the following extract from Par. Hist. is taken from the Chronicon Pseudo Nicephorous and the Chronicon Orientale. The date of the death of Heraclius, February 11th, A. D. 641, fifty days after the loss of Alexandria: A fourth of the time was sufficient to convey the intelligence.

4 This curious anecdote will be vainly sought in the annals of nent to the sound and orthodox precept of the Mahometan casuists: they expressly declare, that the religious book, or sword of the law, which was a kind of brutal, by the right of war, should never be committed to the flames; and that the works of profane science, historians or poets, physicians or philosophers, may be lawfully applied to the use of the faithful.4 A more destructive seal may perhaps be attributed to the first successors of the Church and a crowd of Mus.5 But if we gradually descend from the age of the Antonines to that of Theodosius, we shall learn from a chain of contemporary witnesses, that the royal palace and the temple of Serapis no longer contained the four, or the seven, hundred thousand volumes, which had been assembled by the curiosity and magnanimity of the Emperor Pompeius. Perhaps the church and seat of the patriarchs might be enriched with a repository of books; but if the ponderous mass of Arian and Monophysite controversy were indeed consumed in the public baths,6 a philosopher may allow, with a smile, that it was ultimately developed and brought forth on the provision of the more valuable libraries which have been involved in the ruin of the Roman empire; but when I seriously compute the lapse of ages, the waste of ignorance, and the calamities of war, our treasures, rather than our losses, are the object of my surprise. Many curious and useful facts are buried in oblivion; the three great historians of Rome have been transmitted to our hands, in a mutilated state, and we are deprived of many pleasing compositions of the lyric, tumular, and dramatic poetry of the Greeks. Yet we should gratefully remember, that the mischieves of ignorance are by no means equal to the advantages to which the suffrage of antiquity7 had adjudged the first place of genius and glory: the teachers of ancient knowledge, who are still extant, had perished, and compared the writings of their predecessors; 8 nor can it falsely be presumed that any important truth, any useful disc. of philosophy has been snatched away from the curiosity of modern ages.

Administration
In the administration of Egypt,9 Amron balanced the demands of justice and policy; the interest of the people of the law, who were defiled by God; and of the people of the alliance.

Enthusiasm, and the Saracen history of Elmacin. The silence of Abasciano, Archbishop of Monreale, is less conclusive from their ignorance of Christian literature.

2 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de

1 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself
from D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de Jassun, od le Marienlich movenu unvein, p. 20–27, 78–80. Even D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Euphr. p. 15–18, 124, 125; and a surveyed thesis may be found in Durocher, Navigations du Tems de try is adorned with a silver wave, a verdant emerald, and the deep yellow of a golden harvest.

Yet this beneficial order is sometimes interrupted; and the long delay and sudden swell of the river in the first year of the conquest might afford some colour to an edifying fable. In the summer of the year after the victory of a vanguard had been interdicted by the piety of Omar; and that the Nile lay sullen and inactive in his shallow bed, till the mandate of the caliph was cast into the obedient stream, which rose in a single night to the height of six feet, finely adapted to the command.

The Arabs who then saw the new conquest encouraged the licence of their romantic spirit. We may read, in the gravest authors, that Egypt was crowded with twenty thousand cities or villages: that, exclusive of the Greeks and Arabs, the Copts alone were found, on the assessment, six million and eighty thousand.

This vast number of either sex, and of every age: that three hundred millions of gold or silver were annually paid to the treasury of the caliph.

Our reason must be startled by these extravagant assertions: and they will become more palatable, if we assume the compass and measure the estimated revenue of a brilliant army from the camp to Memphis, seldom broader than twelve miles, and the triangle of the Delta, a flat surface of two thousand one hundred square leagues, compose a twelfth part of the magnitude of France.

A more accurate research would certainly be the more reasonable than this. The three hundred millions, created by the error of a scribe, are reduced to the decent revenue of four millions three hundred thousand pieces of gold, of which nine hundred thousand were consumed by the pay of the soldiers.

Two authentic lists, of the present and of the two preceding centuries, the circumference is rendered possible number of two thousand seven hundred villages and towns.

After a long residence at Cairo, a French consul has ventured to assign about four millions of Mahometans, Christians, and Jews, for the napoleonic, though not incredible, scope of the population of Egypt.

IV. The conquest of Africa, from the Nile to the Atlantic ocean, was first attempted by the arms of the caliph Othman.

After a success of such a magnitude, the popes and the pontiffs, by the companions of Mahomet and the chiefs of the tribes; and twenty thousand Arabs marched from Medina, with the gifts and the blessing of the commander of the faithful. They were joined in the camp of Memphis, and, after seven years of captivity, the conduct of the war was intrusted to Abdallah, the son of Said and the foster-brother of the caliph, who had lately supplanted the conqueror and lieutenant of Egypt. Yet the favour of the prince, and the merit of his father’s, could not oblige the guile of his success.

The early conversion of Abdallah, and his skilful pen, had recommended him to the important office of transcribing the sheets of the Koran: he betrayed his trust, corrupted the text, derided the errors which he had made, and fled to Mecca to escape the justice, and expose the ignorance of the apostle.

After the conquest of Mecca, the Moslem chief returned from his tears, and the entreaties of Othman, extirp a reluctant pardon; but the prophet declared that he had so long hesitated, to allow time for a zealous disciple to avenge his injury in the blood of the apostate.

With this consideration of the history of the tribe of Tri- poli, a maritime city in which the name, the wealth, and the inhabitants, of the province had gradually centred, and which now maintains the third rank among the states of Barbary. A reinforcement of Greeks was surprised and cut in pieces on the seacoast; but the fortifications of Tripoli resisted the first assaults; and the Saracens were tempted by the approach of the prefect Gregory, to re-rivage the labours of the siege for the perfidious and the hopes of a decisive action. Gregory and his standard was followed by one hundred-

of the Roman Empire.

239

2dred and twenty thousand men, the regular bands of the empire must have been lost in the naked and disorderly flight of the Africans. The column, or the strength, or rather the numbers, of his host. He rejected with indignation the notion of the Koran or the tribute; and during several days, the two armies were fiercely engaged from the dawn of light to the hour of noon, when their fatigue and the excessive heat compelled them to seek shelter and refreshment in their respective camps. The daughter of Gregory, a maid of incomparable beauty and spirit, is said to have fought by his side: from her earliest youth she was trained to mount on horseback, to draw the bow, and to wield the scimitar; and the richness of her arms and apparel was considerable. Her left hand, with a hundred thousand pieces of gold, was offered for the head of the Arabian general, and the youths of Africa were excited by the prospect of the glorious prize. At the pressing solicitation of his brethren, Abdullah withdrew his person from the field; but the Saracens were discouraged by the retreat of their leader, and the repetition of these equal or unsuccessful conflicts.

Victory A noble Arabian, who afterwards became the adversary of Ali, and the father of a caliph, had signalized his valor in Egypt, and Zobeir, a king of the Jundishapur people, was summoned to scale the ladder against the walls of Babylon. In the African war he was detached from the standard of Abdullah. On the news of the battle, Zobeir, with twelve companions, cut his way through the camp of the Greeks, and pressed forwards, without tasting either food or repose, to partake of the dangers of his brethren. He cast his eyes round the field: " Where?" said he, "is our general?" "Is the tent a station for the general of the Moslems?" Abdullah represented with a blunness the importance of his own life, and the temptation that was held forth by the Roman prefect. "Return," said Zobeir, "let him infidelity their unquestionable attempt. Proclaim through the ranks, that the head of Gregory shall be repaid with his captive daughter, and the equal sum of one hundred thousand pieces of gold." To the courage and discretion of Zobeir the lieutenant of the caliph intrusted the execution of his own stratagem, which involved the long-disputed balance in favour of the Saracens. Supplying by activity and artifice the deficiency of numbers, a part of their forces lay concealed in their tents, while the remainder prolonged an irregular skirmish with the enemy, till the sun was high in the heavens. On both sides the adventurers of the Christians were bridled, their armour was laid aside, and the hostile nations prepared, or seemed to prepare, for the refreshment of the evening, and the encounter of the ensuing day. On a sudden the charge was sounded: the Arabian camp poured forth a swarm of fresh and intrepid warriors; and the long line of the Greeks and Africans was surprised, assaulted, overthrown, by new squadrons of the faithful, who, to the eye of fanaticism, might appear as a band of angels descending from the sky. The prefect himself was slain by the hand of Zobeir; his body was taken by the infidels unconscious of his death, was surrounded and made prisoner; and the fugitives involved in their disaster the town of Sufetula, to which they escaped from the sabres and lances of the Arabs. Sufetula was built one hundred and fifty miles to the south of Carthage: a gentle declivity is watered by a series of fine streams, and possesses extensive pasturage. (Annal. Moslem, p. 78.) El margin (in his cloudy version, p. 250) seems to report the same fact. When the Arabs besieged the palaces of Othman, great were their distresses and grievances.

Chap. XII. OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

victory or his zeal might be blunted by offers of tribute or professions of faith; but his losses, his fatigues, and his reverses, were accompanied by the final establishment; and the Saracens, after a campaign of fifteen months, retreated to the confines of Egypt, with the captives and the wealth of their African expedition. The caliph's fifth was granted to a favorite, on the nominal payment of five hundred thousand pieces of gold; but the state was doubly injured by this fallacious transaction, if each soldier had shared one thousand, and each hero man three thousand, pieces, in the real division of the plunder. The author of the death of Gregory was expected to have claimed the most precious reward of the victory: from his silence it might be inferred that he had been so far misled till the tears and exclamations of the prefect's daughter at the sight of Zobeir revealed the valour and modesty of that gallant soldier. The unfortunate virgin was offered, and almost rejected as a slave, by her father's murderer, who cooly declared that his sword was consecrated to the service of religion; and that he laboured for a recompense far above the charms of mortal beauty, or the riches of this transitory life. A reward congeial to his temper, was the honourable commission of announcing to the caliph Othman the success of his arms. The companions, the eunuchs, and the populace, who had been engaged to hear the interesting narrative of Zobeir; and, as the order forgot nothing except the merit of his own counsels and actions, the name of Abdullah was joined by the Saracens with the heroic names of Caled and Amru.

The western conquests of the Saracens were suspended nearly twenty years, till their dissensions were composed by the establishment of the house of Omniyah; and the caliph Mouayyid was invited by the eunuchs of the Africans themselves. The successors of Heraclius had been informed of the news by which they had been compelled to stipulate with the Arabs; but instead of being moved to pity and relieve their distresses, they imposed, as an equivalent or a fine, a second tribute of a similar amount. The ears of the Byzantine ministers were shut against the complaints of their poverty and ruin; their despair was reduced to the formation of a single master; and the extortions of the patriarch of Carthage, who was invested with civil and military power, prostrated the sectaries, and even the catholics, of the Roman province to abjure the religion as well as the authority of their tyrants. The first lieutenant of Mouayyid acquired a just renown, subdued an important city, defeated an army of thirty thousand Greeks, swept away fourscore thousand captives, and enriched with their spoils the bold adventurers of Syria and Egypt. But the title of conqueror of Africa is more justly due to his successor Aghlab. He marched from Damascas at the head of ten thousand of the bravest Arabs; and the genuine force of the Moslems was enlarged by the doubtful aid and conversion of many thousand barbarians. It would be difficult, nor is it necessary, to trace the accurate line of the progress of Aghlab, or to industrialize the relative position of the Abdalmen, who were assisted by the Orientals with fictitious armies and imaginary citadels. In the warlike province of Zab, or Numidia, fourscore thousand of the natives might assem-
The decline and fall

of the Abbasid caliphate, for instance, in the reign of Harun at-Rashid, may be considered as the beginning of the end of the Muslim world. The internal decay of the caliphate had been hastened by the rise of the slave-traders and the slave-states, and by the decline of the arts and sciences. The foreign wars of the caliphate had also been a cause of its decline, for they had drained its resources and weakened its military power.

The fall of the caliphate was followed by the rise of the Ottoman empire, which was able to profit by the mistakes of its predecessor. The Ottomans were able to take advantage of the weakness of the caliphate, and to establish a strong and flourishing empire in the East.

1 See Novici, pp. 42, 58-52.

2 From the time of the Ottoman empire, the caliphate was no longer a political entity, but a religious one. The caliphs were no longer the rulers of the Moslem world, but the spiritual leaders of the community.

3 The rise of the Ottoman empire was due to the weakness of the caliphate, and to the need for a strong and powerful government in the East. The Ottomans were able to take advantage of this situation, and to establish a strong and flourishing empire in the East.
The return of domestic peace allowed the caliph Abdalmalek to resume the conquest of Africa: the standard was delivered to Hassan governor of Egypt, and the revenue of that kingdom, with an army of forty thousand men, was assigned to the successor of Бе⁄аeг or Бе⁄аeг of Carthage, and Cæsarea. The army of Hassan was in the meantime won and lost by the Saracens. But the seacoast remained in the hands of the Greeks; the predecessors of Hassan had respected the name and fortifications of Carthage; and the number of its defences was increased in their new capital of Carthage and Tripoli. The army of Hassan was bolder and more fortunate; he reduced and pillaged the metropolis of Africa; and the mention of scaling-ladders may justify the suspicion that he anticipated, by a sudden assault, the more tedious operation of a regular siege. But the "Tenth of the Caliph" and Cæsarea lay desolate above twenty years after the short and precipitate advance of the Christian succours. The prefect and patrician John, a general of experience and renown, embarked at Constantinople the forces of the eastern empire; they were joined by the ships and soldiers of Sicily, and a powerful reinforcement of Goths was ordered to be sent from these remote and barbarous regions. The weight of the confederate navy broke the chain that guarded the entrance of the harbour; the Arabs retired to Carthage, or Tripoli; the Christians landed; the city walls halted the ensign of the cross, and the winter was髭e wasted in the design of victory or defence. The city was finally lost; the zeal and resentment of the commander of the faithful prepared in the ensuing spring a more numerous armament by sea and land; and the patrician in his turn was compelled to evacuate the post and fortifications of Carthage. A second battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Carthage; the site was fortified and the date of the battle was probably 200; the city of Carthage and the fortress of the Spaniards was finally acquired by the Moslems; the site was converted into a military station; and the ruins of the ancient Carthage, though recently reduced in size by the assault of fire and the devastations of their ancestors. Such is the tale of the modern Carthage. Yet I strongly suspect that the memory of their antiquity, the love of the marvellous, and the fashion of extolling the philosophy of barbarians, has induced them to magnify, and extend, the fame of the ancient Carthage. In the progress of the revolt Carthage had most probably contributed its share of destruction; and the alarm of universal ruin might terrify and alienate the cities that had relied on the relative safety of their position. It was not in vain that the people of Carthage, with the Senegalese and Mamelukes, were recruited by the Prophet; and the policy of the viceroy was wisely pursued by the patrician. If the Carthaginians had not been sufficiently manly to defend their city, the worst that could happen to them was the ceasing to be the richest and most populous of the African cities. Their independence was inevitably lost; the triumphs of the Arab invaders were celebrated with the simple productions of the earth. Let us destroy these cities; let us hairy in our mails those precious treasures; and when the avarice of our foes shall be destitute of temptation, perhaps they will cease to distress the tranquillity of a warlike population. This is the ironical sentiment of the historian. From Tangier to Tripoli the buildings, or at least the fortifications, were demolished, the fruit-trees were cut down, the means of subsistence were exterminated, a fertile and populous garden was changed into a desert, and the historians of a more recent period are not the most ready to disbelieve the facts of the history of the conquest of Africa. From Tangier to Tripoli, or the frontier of the desert, the inhabitants were dispossessed of their property, and the policy of the conquerors was perfected. The activity of Musa and his successors was greatly increased by the activity of the Moslem viceroy. The general of the Saracens was again revived as the saviour of the province; the friends of civil society conspired against the savages of the land; and the royal proclamations were shewn in the first battle which overthrew the baseless fabric of their superstition and empire. The same spirit revived under the successor of Hassan; it was finally quelled by the activity of Murad and his successors; but the number of the rebels may be presumed from that of three hundred thousand captives; sixty thousand of whom, the

Vol. II. 16
THE DECLINE AND FALL

242

The decline of the Moors, adopted with the language, name, and origin of Arabs: the blood of the strangers and natives was insensibly mingled; and from the Euphrates to the Atlantic Ocean, and from the nation's infancy he diffused over the sandy plains of Asia and Africa. Yet I will not deny that fifty thousand tents of pure Arabs might be transported over the Nile, and scattered through the Libyan desert: and I am not ignorant that fire of the Moorish tribes still retain their barbarous idiom with the appellation and character of white Africans.

SPAIN. First temporary and decisive battles of the Arabs. B. 726.

V. In the progress of conquest from the north and south, the Goths and the Saracens encountered each other on the battlefields of Europe and Africa. In the opinion of the historian, the difference in the two races was a real and sensible ground of enmity and warfare. As early as the time of Othman, his piratical squadrons had ravaged the coasts of Andalusia; nor had they forgotten the relief of Carthage by the Gothic succours. In that age, as we have seen, the Saracens, or those of Spain who were received into the fortress of Ceuta; one of the columns of Hercules, which is divided by a narrow strait from the opposite pillar or point of Europe. A small portion of Moriniana was still wanting to the African conquest; but Musa, in the pride of victory, was repulsed by the Goths of Ceuta, by a sortie from that place; but the courage of count Julian, the general of the Goths. From his disappointment and perplexity, Musa was relieved, by an unexpected message of the Christian chief, who offered his help, his person, and his sword, to the successors of Mahomet, and solicited the degradation of Mahomet and the restoration of the Gothic kings. If we inquire into the cause of his treachery, the Spaniards will repeat the popular story of his daughter Caia; of a virgin who was seduced, or ravished by her sovereign; of a father who sacrificed his religion and country for the interest of his daughters; whose exploits have often been licentious and destructive; but this well-known tale, romantic in itself, is indifferent.

The first book of the African journeys and the observations of De Swar, (c. 209. 212. 227. 228.) will throw some light on the events before the invasion of Barbary, of Arabian or Moorish descent. But Swar has seen these events in Arabian letters and the authenticated history of the Moorish nation has been concealed by the burden of garrisons. In the first period of the Mahometan history. In a conference with a prince of the Greeks, Amurath observed, that their religion was different: upon which sense it was lawful for brothers to quarrel. (Kitier's History of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 325.

The name of Andalusia is applied by the Arabs not only to the region where they settled, but to the whole peninsula of Spain and Portugal (Grotius, vol. i. p. 154. O'Herstein, Biblis Orientis, p. 141.) But the name of Andalusia is most improperly derived from Andalusia, country of the Vandals in Spain. The Arabic word Al Qustari, signifies in Arabic, the region of the sea, the coast, the kingdom of the Goths, in the country of the Goths. In perfectly opposite, Biblis, Arabico-Hispanica, (l. m. p. 327. &c.)

The fall and restoration of the Gothic monarchy are related by the Indians of Murianna. (l. m. p. 239-241.) (l. m. p. 239-241.) (l. m. p. 239-241.) (l. m. p. 239-241.)

The campaigns of Amurath have infused into his noble work. (Histoire de l'Empire Islamique, libri xxx.) Hugues Comte 1755. In four volumes in folio, with the Continuation of Minisci.) the style and spirit of a Roman classic; and in the history of the Gothic nations, his knowledge, his powers of research, his powers of judgment, may be safely trusted. But the Jesuit is not exempt from the prejudices of his sect and order, as he has had the advantage of the manuscripts of criticism and chronology, and a lively fancy, the chassis of historical and metaphysical, and the style of historians are large and frequent. Robert, archbishop of Toledo, the father of the Spanish history, lived five hundred years after the fall of Carthage. The most exact and trustworthy accounts are composed in some measure times of the Ern-chronicles, and some of the decrees of Byblos (Pacienza) and Alphonso. 3. King of Leon, which he has collected.

Le vie (casa Valier) est aussi difficile a faire que son prouve. De la vie de M. le Comte de Provence, pour la premiere fois (Hist. Generale c. xxvi.) His argument is an implicitly credible.

ly supported by external evidence; and the history of Spain will suggest some motives of interest and policy more congenial to the breast of a veteran state-man. After the decease or deposition of Witiza, his two sons were supplanted by the ambition of Roderic, a noble Goth, whose father, the duke or governor of a province, had fallen a victim to the preceding tyranny. The monarchy was still elective; but the sons of Witiza, educated on the steps of the throne, were impatient of a private station. Their resentment was the more dangerous, as it was vanished with the dissimilation of courts: their following suit the increase of the simplicity and the promise of a revolution; and their uncle Oppas, archbishop of Toledo and Seville, was the first person in the church, and the second in the state. It is probable that Julian was involved in the disgrace of the unsuccessful faction; that he had little hope and must fear to exchange in a field battle for the first assault of the invaders. The ambitious Sarracen was fired by the ease and importance of the attempt; but the execution was delayed till he had consulted the commander of the faithful; and his messenger returned with the news that the Saracen army was divided into two parts, the one in the king of the West and the region of the caliph. In his residence of Tangier, Musa, with secrecy and caution, continued his correspondence and hastened his preparations. But the remorse of his commanders was soothed by the fallacious assurance that he should content himself with the glory and spoil, without aspiring to establish the Moslems beyond the sea that separates Africa from Europe.

Before Musa would trust an army of the first descent to the faiths and insulins of the Arabs, of a foreign land, he made a less dear. A.D. 718 July. A serious trial of their strength and capacity. One hundred Arabs, and four hundred Africans, passed over in four vessels, from Tangier, or Ceuta; the place of their descent on the opposite shore of the strait, is marked by the name of Tarik their chief: and the date of this memorable event is fixed to the month of Ramadan, of the ninety-first year of the Hegira, to the month of July, seven hundred and forty-eight years from the departure of the Prophet; and seven years after the birth of Christ.

From their first station, they marched eighteen miles through a hilly country to the castle and town of Julian; on which (it is still called Algezir) they bestowed the name of the Green Island, from a verdant cape that advances into the sea, on the high promontory of Tarik; and the intrenchments of their camp were the first outline of those fortifications, which, in the hands of our countrymen, have resisted the art and power of the house of Bourbon. The adjacent governor informed the court of Toledo of the descent and presence of the Saracens; and the wisdom of the Christian emperors, who had been commanded to seize and bind the presumptuous strangers, admired Roderic of the magnitude of the danger. At the royal summons, the drakes, and counts, the bishops and nobles of the Gothic monarchy, assembled at the head of their followers; and the son of the king of the Romans, which is employed by an Arabic historian, may be excused by the allusion of that of the nations of Spain. His army consisted of ninety or a hundred thousand men; a formidable power.

If their fidelity or discipline had been adequate to their numbers. The troops of Tarik had been augmented to twelve thousand Saracens; but the christian multitudes were attracted by the influence of Julian, and a crowd of African most greedily tasted the temporal blessings of the Koran. In the neighbourhood of Julian, the first pitched battle was fought, the encounter which determined the fate of the kingdom; the stream of the Guadalete, which falls into the bay, divided the two camps, and marked the advancing and retreating skirmishes of three successive and bloody days. On the fourth day the Army of the Moors was driven into the country, and the issue, by order of the General, was left to his unworthy successor, sustaining on his head a diadem of pearls, encumbered with a flowing robe of gold and silk embroidered, and reclining on a litter or car of ivory drawn by two white mules. Notwithstanding the valor of the Saracens, they fainted under the weight of multitudes, and the plain of Xeres was overcharged with white and black dead bodies.

"My brethren," said Tarik to his soldiers, and captains, "the enemy is before you, the sea is behind: whether will ye fly? Follow your general: I am resolved either to lose my life, or to trample on the prostrate king of the Romans." Besides the resource of despair, he escaped from a soldier's death to perish more ignobly in the waters of the Bentor or Goodshinquies, his diadem, his robes, and his courier, were found on the bank; but as the body of the Gothic prince was lost in the waves, the pride and ignorance of the caliph must have been gratified with some manner head, which was exposed in triumph before the palace of Dasmara. And so, by the sagacity of the Arabs, "is the fate of those kings who withdraw themselves from a field of battle?"

Count Julian had plunged so deep into the ruin of the Galli and infamy, that his only hope was his monarchy, (Dion. in invasion 55.) In the ruin of his country, after the battle of Xeres he recommended the most effectual measures to the victorious Saracens. "The king of the Goths is slain; their princes are fled before you, the army is routed, the nation is astonished. Secure with sufficient detachments the cities of Boceta; but invest in person, and with the whole army of Toledo, and allow not the distracted christians either time or tranquillity for the election of a new monarch." Tarik listened to his advice. A Roman captive and proselyte, who had been enfranchised by the caliph himself, assaulted Cordova with seven hundred men; he joined the river; he persuaded the Moors to give the christians into the great church, where they defended themselves above three months. Another detachment reduced the sea-coast of Boceta, which in the last period of the Moorish power has comprised in a narrow space the populous kingdom of Grenada.

The march of Tarik was directed through the Sierra Morena, that separates Andalusia and Castille, till he appeared in arms under the walls of Toledo. The most zealous of the catholics had escaped with the relics of their saints; and if the gates were shut, it was only till the victor had subdued a fair and reasonable capitulation. The voluntary exiles were allowed to depart with their effects; seven churches were appropriated to the christian worship; the archbishop and his clergy were at liberty to exercise their functions, the monks to practise or neglect their penance; and the Goths and Romans were left in all civil and criminal cases to the subordinate

A.D. 714.

April.

The second industry of their too faithful ally, the Spanish Saracens landed at the pillar, or point of Europe; the corrupt and familiar appellative is given to that part of Africa which intervenes the mountain of Tarik; and the intrenchments of their camp were the first outline of those fortifications, which, in the hands of our countrymen, have resisted the art and power of the house of Bourbon. The adjacent governor informed the court of Toledo of the descent and presence of the Saracens; and the wisdom of the Christian emperors, who had been commanded to seize and bind the presumptuous strangers, admired Roderic of the magnitude of the danger. At the royal summons, the drakes, and counts, the bishops and nobles of the Gothic monarchy, assembled at the head of their followers; and the son of the king of the Romans, which is employed by an Arabic historian, may be excused by the allusion of that of the nations of Spain. His army consisted of ninety or a hundred thousand men; a formidable power.

If their fidelity or discipline had been adequate to their numbers. The troops of Tarik had been augmented to twelve thousand Saracens; but the christian multitudes were attracted by the influence of Julian, and a crowd of African most greedily tasted the temporal blessings of the Koran. In the neighbourhood of Julian, the first pitched battle was fought, the encounter which determined the fate of the kingdom; the stream of the Guadalete, which falls into the bay, divided the two camps, and marked the advancing and retreating skirmishes of three successive and bloody days. On the fourth day the Army of the Moors was driven into the country, and the issue, by order of the General, was left to his unworthy successor, sustaining on his head a diadem of pearls, encumbered with a flowing robe of gold and silk embroidered, and reclining on a litter or car of ivory drawn by two white mules. Notwithstanding the valor of the Saracens, they fainted under the weight of multitudes, and the plain of Xeres was overcharged with white and black dead bodies.

"My brethren," said Tarik to his soldiers, and captains, "the enemy is before you, the sea is behind: whether will ye fly? Follow your general: I am resolved either to lose my life, or to trample on the prostrate king of the Romans." Besides the resource of despair, he escaped from a soldier's death to perish more ignobly in the waters of the Bentor or Goodshinquies, his diadem, his robes, and his courier, were found on the bank; but as the body of the Gothic prince was lost in the waves, the pride and ignorance of the caliph must have been gratified with some manner head, which was exposed in triumph before the palace of Dasmara. And so, by the sagacity of the Arabs, "is the fate of those kings who withdraw themselves from a field of battle?"

Count Julian had plunged so deep into the ruin of the Galli and infamy, that his only hope was his monarchy, (Dion. in invasion 55.) In the ruin of his country, after the battle of Xeres he recommended the most effectual measures to the victorious Saracens. "The king of the Goths is slain; their princes are fled before you, the army is routed, the nation is astonished. Secure with sufficient detachments the cities of Boceta; but invest in person, and with the whole army of Toledo, and allow not the distracted christians either time or tranquillity for the election of a new monarch." Tarik listened to his advice. A Roman captive and proselyte, who had been enfranchised by the caliph himself, assaulted Cordova with seven hundred men; he joined the river; he persuaded the Moors to give the christians into the great church, where they defended themselves above three months. Another detachment reduced the sea-coast of Boceta, which in the last period of the Moorish power has comprised in a narrow space the populous kingdom of Grenada.

The march of Tarik was directed through the Sierra Morena, that separates Andalusia and Castille, till he appeared in arms under the walls of Toledo. The most zealous of the catholics had escaped with the relics of their saints; and if the gates were shut, it was only till the victor had subdued a fair and reasonable capitulation. The voluntary exiles were allowed to depart with their effects; seven churches were appropriated to the christian worship; the archbishop and his clergy were at liberty to exercise their functions, the monks to practise or neglect their penance; and the Goths and Romans were left in all civil and criminal cases to the subordinate jurisdiction of their own laws and magistrates. But if the justice of Tarik protected the christians, his gratitude and policy rewarded the Jews, to whose secret or open aid he was indebted for his most important possessions. Persia was taken and the guarded synagogues of Spain, who had often pressed the alternative of hani-fment or baptism, that outset nation embraced the moment of revenge; the comparison of their past and present state was the pledge of their fidelity; and the manifest between the disciples of Moses and of Mahomet, was maintained till the final era of their common expulsion. From the royal seat of Toledo, the Arabian leader spread his conquests to the north, over the modern realms of Castille and Leon; but it is needless to enumerate the cities that yielded on his approach or access, the applause of Musa degenerated transported from the east by the Romans, acquired by the Goths among the spoils of Rome, and presented by the Arabs to the throne of Damascus. Beyond the Asturian mountains, the maritime town of Gij was the term of the lieutenant of Musa, who had performed, with the speed of a traveller, his victorious march, of seven hundred miles, from the rock of Gibraltar to the Bay of Biscay. The failure of land compelled him to retreat: and he was recalled to Toledo, to excise his presumption of subduing a kingdom in the absence of the emperor. Spain, which, in a month, was in a state of age and disorderly state, had resisted, two hundred years, the arms of the Romans, was overrun in a few months by those of the Saracens; and such was the eagerness of submission and treaty, that the governor of Cordova is recorded as the only chief who fell, without condition, a prisoner into their hands. The cause of the Goths had been irrevocably judged in the field of Xeres; and, in the national dismay, each part of the monarchy declined a contest with the antagonist who had vanquished the united strength of the whole. That strength had been wasted by two successive sessions of famine and pestilence; and the governors, who were impatient to surrender, might exaggerate the difficulty of collecting the provisions of a siege. To disarm the Christians, supposition likewise contributed her terrors; and the subtle Arab encouraged the report of dreams, omens, and prophecies, and of the portraits of the destined conquerors of Spain, that were discovered on breaking open an apartment of the royal palace. Yet a spark of the vital flame was still alive: some invincible fugitives preferred a life of poverty and exile to the Asturian valiant taintór repulsed the slaves of the caliph; and the sword of Pelagius has been transformed into the sceptre of the catholic kings. 1

Conquest of Spain

A.D. 717, 733.

On the intelligence of this rapid success, the Moslem hordes, inflamed by envy: and he began, not to complain, but to fear, that Tarik would leave him nothing to subdue. At the head of ten thousand Arabs and eight thousand Africans, he passed over in person from Murcia into Spain: the first of his companions was the noblest of the K-reish; his eldest son was left in command of Africa; the three younger brethren were of an age and spirit to second the boldest enterprises of their father. At his landing in Algezir, he was resplendently entertained by count Julian, who stifled his inward remorse, and testified, both in words and actions, his attachment to their cause. Some enemies yet remained for the sword of Musa. The tardy repeatance of the Goths had compared their own numbers and those of the invaders; the cities from which the march of Tarik had declined, considered themselves as impregnable; and the bravest patriots defended the fortifications of Seville and Merida. They were successively besieged and reduced by the labour of Musa, who transported his camp from the Betis to the Aliva, from the Guadalquivir to the Guadiana. When he returned to Cordova, the palace, the aqueducts, the triumphal arches, and the theatre, of the ancient metropolitan of Lusitania. "I should imagine," said he to his four companions, "that the human race must have united their art and power in the foundation of this city; happy is the man who shall become its master." He aspired to that happiness, but the Emeritan sustained on this occasion the honour of their descent from the veteran legions of Augustus. 2 Dismissing the confinement of their walls, they gave battle to the Arabs on the plain; but an ambuscade, in which the mounted Moslems had fallen in the sieve, or retired to Gallicia, was consislered as the reward of the faithful. In the midway between Merida and Toledo, the lieutenant of Musa saluted the vanguard of the caliph, and conducted him to the palaces of the Gothic kings. Their first interview was cold and formal: a rigid account was exacted of the treasures of Spain: the character of Tarik was exposed to suspicion and obloquy; and the hero was imprisoned, reviled, and ignominiously scourged by the hand, or the command, of Musa. Yet so strict might a code of justice be. The hardly under- terred the spirit, of the primitive Moslems, that, after this public indignity, Tarik could serve and he trusted in the reduction of the Tarraconense province. A moch was erected at Saragossa, by the liberality of the K-rosh; the port of Carcassone was opened to the vessels of Syria; and the Goths were pursured beyond the Pyrenean mountains into their Gallic province of Sep tinimania or Languedoc. 3 In the church of St. Mary at Carcassonne, Musa laid found, but it is imppossible that he left, seven equestrian statues of massy silver; and from his tomb or column of Narbonne, he returned on his feet to the Gallician and Lusitanian shores of the ocean. During the absence of the father, his son Abdelniz chastised the insurgents of Seville, and reduced, from Malaga to Valencia, the sea-coast of the Mediterranean: his original treaty with the discreet

1 In the Historia Araucana (c. 9. p. 17, ad callem Elmasia) Roderic of Toledo describes the emerald table, and invests the name of Mes- din Abyeida, in Arabic words and letters. He appears to be con- versant with the Mohammedan writers: but I cannot agree with M. de Caspar, noti, de l'histoire des Huns, tom. 1, p. 35, who has transcribed Nusairi: because he was dead a hundred years before the history was composed. This error is Cauded on a Forserer of a grosser error. M. de Guemes confines the historian Roderic to Toledo in the thirteenth century, when the ancient Ximenes who governed Spain, in the beginning of the sixteenth, and was the subject, not the author, of his oflicial and important. He is himself a historian of the Moslem chronicles: he is the last of Ren- ard and his companions in their Lapland journey. "Hic tandem manus effigies et circulis orbat." 2 Such was the alabais of the traitor Oppas, and every chief to whom in Spain had not consented to the flur of Pelagius: Ormon Hispania dudum sub uno reginio Gothorum, omnium exercitus Hispania in uno congregatus Lusitaniis et non valentissime impetum ferebatur, "quod non caput principum potest praeclare capitum etiam extremum," A.D. 722. Pagi, Critical, tom. III. l. 175. 3 Historia de rebus hisp., I. 1 would much quote whether Musa ever passed the Pyrenees. 4 The lordship of the Ximenes, De Guenez, Hist. des Huns, tom. I, p. 233, and Carbonne, (Hist. de l'Espagne et de l'Espagne, tom. I, p. 53, 54, 104, 105.) 5 This manuscript copy, in the possession of Mr. Caspar, noti, de l'histoire des Huns, tom. I, p. 35,§ 154, 155, is in the original style, in the hand of Roderic of Toledo, or the Miss. of the Escorial, and the invasion of the Saracens is espoused by a Frater of Guemes: De rebus hisp., I. 175. Pagi, Critical, tom. III. l. 175. Historia de rebus hisp., I. 1 would much quote whether Musa ever passed the Pyrenees.
and valiant Theodemir will represent the manners and policy of the times. "The conditions of peace agreed and sworn between Abdazziz, the son of Musa, king of the Moors, and the prince of the Goths. In the name of the most merciful God, Abdazziz makes peace on these conditions: that Theodemir shall not be disturbed in his principality; nor any injury be offered to the life or property, the wives and children, the religion and temples of the Christians. The term of peace shall be forty days, after which the second city, Othiban, Valentia, Alicut, Mola, Vacasora, Bigorra, (now Bejar,) Ora, (or Opta,) and Lorea: that he shall not assist or entertain the enemies of the caliph, but shall faithfully communicate his knowledge of their hostile designs: that each himself, and each of the Gothic nobles shall annually pay one piece of gold, four measures of barley, and as many of harley, with a certain proportion of honey, oil, and vinegar; and that each of their vassals shall be taxed at one moiety of the said imposition. Given the fourth of Regob, in the year of the Hegira ninety-four, and subscribed with the names of four Carthaginians. The precautions thus taken were treated with uncommon lenity; but the rate of tribute appears to have fluctuated from a tenth to a fifth, according to the submission or obstinacy of the christians.4 In this revolution, many partial calamities were inflicted by the carnal or religious passions of the enemies and oppressors of each other; by the new worship: some relics or images were confounded with idols: the rebels were put to the sword; and one town (an obscure place between Cordova and Seville) was razed to its foundations. Yet if we compare the inva- sions of Spain above the Gothic, or its recovery, by the kings of Castile and Aragon, we must applaud the moderation and discipline of the Arabian conquerors.

Degree of Musa. The exploits of Musa were performed A.D. 714 in the evening of life, though he affected to disguise his age by colouring with a red powder the white hair which adorned the crown of his glory, his breast was still fired with the ardour of youth; and the possession of Spain was considered only as the first step to the monarchy of Europe. With a powerful arma- ment by sea and land, he was preparing to repass the Pyrenees, to extirpate in Gaul and Italy the memory of his name, and to impose his law over the Grecian cities, and to preach the unity of God on the altar of the Vaticen. From Thebes, subduing the barbarians of Germany, he proposed to follow the course of the Danube from its source to the Euxine sea, to over- throw the Greek or Roman empire of Constantinople, and divide the empire of the Goths in pieces: but his igno- rance of the arts or commerce, his want of money and supplies, obliged him to return; and to acquire antiquity of the province of Syria. But his vast enterprise, perhaps of easy execution, must have seemed extravagant to vulgar minds; and the visionary conqueror was soon reminded of his de- pendency and servitude. The friends of Tarik had effusively stated his services and wrongs; at the court of Damascus, the proceedings of Musa were blamed, his intentions were suspected, and his delay in supplying the army of traitors was excused by a harsher and more peremptory summons. An intrepid messenger of the caliph entered his camp at Lugo in Galicia, and in the presence of the Saracens and christians arrested the bridle of his horse. His own loyalty, or that of his troops, incensed the duty of obedience and the disgrace was acknowledged by the recall of his rival, and the permission of investing with his two governments his two sons, Abdallah and Abdazliz. His long triumph from Centa to Damascus, displayed the spoils of Africa and the treasures of Spain: four hundred Gothic nobles, with gold cover- ings and girdles, was the gift of victory. But the number of the male and female captives, selected for their birtts or beauty, was computed at eighteen, or even at thirty, thousand persons. As soon as he reached Thetarias in Palestine, he was apprised of the sickness and danger of the caliph, by a private message from Soliman, his brother and pre-umpitive heir; who wished to reserve for his own reign the spectacle of victory. Had Walid recovered, the delay of Musa would have been criminal: he pursued his march, and found an enemy on the throne. In his trial before a partial judge, against a popular antagonist, he was accused of having insulted and plundered the hundred thousand Quantas of gold either exhausted his poverty or proved his rapaciousness. The unworthy treatment of Tarik was revenged by a similar indignity; and the veteran commander, after a public whipping, stood a whole day in the sun before the palace gate, till he obtained a decent burial, under the proud name of a pilgrim to Mezec. The resentment of the caliph might have been satiated with the ruin of Musa; but his fears demanded the extirpation of a point and injured family. A sentence of death was inti- mated with secrecy and speed to the trusty servants of Musa in Africa and in Spain, in forms; if not the substance, of justice was preserved. The bloody execution. In the mosque or palace of Corde- va, Abdazliz was slain by the swords of the com- bators; they accused their governor of obtaining the honours of royalty; and his scandalous marriage with his daughter-in-law, according to the sensuality of the times of the Moors, distinguished both of the christians and Musleims. By a re- pneumonia of cruelty, the head of the son was presented to the father, with an insinuating question, whether he acknowledged the features of the rebel! "I know his features," he exclaimed with indignation: "I as- sured him of the infamy of his name, of the destruction of his family; his death, and the fate, against the authors of his death." The age and despair of Musa raised him above the power of kings; and he expired at Meeca of the anguish of a broken heart. His rival was more favourably treated: his services were forgiven; and Tarik was permitted to mingle with the crowd of slaves.6 I am ignorant whether count Julian was rewarded with the death which he deserved indeed, though not from the hands of the Saracens; but the tale of their ingratitude to the sons of Witiza is disproved by the most unequivocal evidence. The two royal youths were in- ducted in the innumerable captivity of their father; on the decease of Elza, the elder, his daughter was unjustly despoiled of her portion by the violence of her uncle Sig but. The Gothic maid pleaded her cause before the caliph Hasheim, and obtained the restitution of her inheritance; but she was given in marriage to a Gallus Arabian, whose beauty was of such a nature as to be received in Spain with the consideration that was due to their origin and riches.

a Four hundred years after Theodemir, his territories of Murcia and Carthage were taken in the Notion seconde Edris by another name of Talmir, (D'Anville, Atlas de l'Europe, p. 166. Paris, tom. iii. p. 151). In the present day of Spanish agriculture, Mr. Swainson (Bibliotheca Hispanica, i. 39) has observed with wonder, that the valley from Murcia to Orihuela, four leagues in length, is one of the most fertile country in Spain. This part of the province of Murcia, with Barbastro, and S. Flevy (Murcia Exc. ii. 75) b Now the treaty in Arabic and Latin, in the Bibliotheca Arabico- Hispanic (9). p. 109, 116. It is said the 6th of the mouth of Regob, A. H. 94, the 24th of April, A.D. 713, a date which seems to produce the resistance of Theodemir, and the government of Musa. c From the history of Swainson, S. Flevy (Murcia Exc. ii. 75) the above mentioned partnership was made. d The treaty was given the substance of another treaty concluded A.D. 726. 2. 773, by an Arabian chief and the Goths and Romans of the territory of Carthage. The agreement between the church and the believers was fixed at twenty-five pounds of gold; of the money; for ten thousand francs; the number was selected by the condition of their wealth, but in capital cases they must consult the alcaide. The chief must see them also, and they must respect the name of honor. I have not the original before me; it would confirm or de- ny a dark suspicion, that the piece has been forged to introduce the discovery of 'the eighteenth century. Life of Musa, and a copy on the back of it is Tarik. Of these authentic pieces, the latter was composed by a grandson of Musa, who had escaped from the massacre of his kindred; the latter, by the vicar of the first Abdonian caliph of Spain, who might have conversed with some of the veterans of the conquerors. (Bibliotheca Arabico Hispanic, tom. i. p. 81) 759.)

4 I must regret our loss, or my ignorance, of two Arabic works of the eighth century. A Life of Musa, and a copy on the back of it is Tarik. Of these authentic pieces, the latter was composed by a grandson of Musa, who had escaped from the massacre of his kindred; the latter, by the vicar of the first Abdonian caliph of Spain, who might have conversed with some of the veterans of the conquerors. (Bibliotheca Arabico Hispanic, tom. i. p. 81) 759.)
The decline and fall

Chap. XII.

Prosperity of Spain under the Arabs

A province is assimilated to the victorious state by the introduction of strangers and the imitative spirit of the natives; and Spain, which had been successively incised with Arabic, and Roman, and Gothic blood, imbued, in a few generations, the same name and manners of the Arabians. As the twenty-six chief lieutenants of the caliphs, who were attended by a numerous train of civil and military followers, who preferred a distant fortune to a narrow home; the private and public inter it was promoted by the establishment of faithful colonies; and the cities of Spain were principally adorned by the victories and exploits of eastern predecessors. The victorious troops modelled bands of Tarik and Musa asserted, by the name of Spaniards, their original claim of conquest; yet they allowed their brethren of Egypt to share the establishments of Mecca and Medina. The Roman legions of Spain were planted at Cordova; that of Venice at Seville; that of Kinsirin or Chelles at Jaen; that of Palestine at Alg-azar and Medina Sidonia. The natives of Yemen and Persia were scattered round Toledo and the inland country, and the fertile seats of Gaul were adorned on two thousand horsemen by Syrian and Iraq, the children of the purest and most noble of the Arabian tribes. A spirit of emulation, sometimes beneficial, more frequently dangerous, was nourished by these hereditary factions. Ten years after the conquest, a map of the province was preserved by the sea, the sand banks, and the barren shores, the inhabitants and cities, the climate, the soil, and the mineral productions of the earth. In the space of two centuries, the arts of nature were improved by the agriculturists, the manufactures, and the commerce of an industrious people; and the effects of the vast expeditions were magnified by the historians of their fancy. The first of the Omamades, who reigned in Spain solicited the support of the Christians; and in his edict of peace and protection, he contented himself with a modest imposition of ten thousand ounces of gold, ten thousand pounds of silver, ten thousand horses, as many mules, one thousand enuiras, with an equal number of helmets and lances. The most powerful of his successors derived from the same kingdom the annual tribute of twelve millions and forty-five thousand dinars of pieces of gold, about six millions of florins, which, on the tenth tributary, most probably surpassed the united revenues of the Christian monarchs. His royal seat of Cordova contained six hundred mosques, nine hundred baths, and two hundred thousand houses; he gave laws to eighty cities of the first, to three hundred of the second, and thirty; and the fertile banks of the Guadalquivir were adorned with twelve thousand villages and

1 Biblioth. Arab.-Hispan., tom. ii. p. 32. 322. The former of these quotations is taken from a Biographia Hispanica, by an Abbot of Valencia; (see the copy in Excerpta ex Commentariis, tom. ii. p. 93--121) and the latter from a general Chronology of the Caliphate, and of the African and Spanish Provinces, with a particular History of the Kingdom of Granada, which Castor has given at an entire version, (Aenol, Acadiva, Historia Christiana i. 6, 249). The author of this, a native of Granada, and a contemporary of Nascir, some time resident in the seventy eight. In 1230, did not a great historian, geographer, poet, etc., (tom. ii. p. 74, 75)

3 A curious composition of the chronology of Spain in the twelfth century, is in the Escurial library; and Castor had some title to the authorship of it; but the Christians contended that the authors quoted among the Arabs, as well as Comela, Latino, etc.; but it is much the Arabician who saw these strangers through the medium of his countryman Castor. (Biblioth. Arab. Hispan., tom. ii. p. 331--339.)

4 Biblioth. Arab.-Hispan., tom. ii. p. 121. Castor translates the elucidation of the difficulty by the statement, that a scattered settlement is well founded in the literal meaning of the phrase a Chosen people. And I must exceedingly prefer the identification of the Christian nations in Spain with castile Castor Castellana. The name of Castor in panel was chosen in the eighth century, the kingdom was not erected till the year 1025, a hundred years after his death. And the identical division was at times express'd, not of a tributary province, but on a line of consequence independent of the Moorish yoke. (Patrologia, Editorial e Parisi, p. 185--174.) Castor himself says, it would have shoule been in the year 1075.

5 A curious computation at 100000 d'Or French livres. The entire picture of peace and prosperity belongs to the civil and military glory of the Monarch.
of the mountains and deserts, an obstinate race of unbe beverages adhered to the superstition of their fathers; and a saint tradition of the Magian theology is kept alive in the province of Kirman, along the banks of the Indus, among the exiles of Surath, and in the colony which, in the last century, was planted by Shah Abbas at the gates of Isphahan. The chief pontiff has meted out to them the pot-palloon (if it continue to burn) inaccessible to the profane; but his residence is the school, the oracle, and the pilgrimage, of the Ghobers, whose hard and uniform features attest the un-guilty purity of their blood. Under the jurisdiction of their elders, the faithful, united in an innocent and industrious life; their subsistence is deferred from some curious manufactures and mechanic trades; and they cultivate the earth with the fervour of a religious duty. Their ignorance without the despoticism of Shah Abbass, who demanded with threats and tortures the prophetic books of Zorʾaster; and this obscene remnant of the Magians is spared by the moderation or castration of their present sovereigns,?

The northern coast of Africa is the Decline and fall
only hand in which the light of the age of christi-ity perished. Yet, after a long and perfect establishment, the Church, in many places, has been wholly torn to pieces, and the arms, which had been taught by Carthage and Rome, were involved in a cloud of ignorance; the doctrine of Cyprian and Augustin was no longer studied. Five hundred episcopal churches were overturned by the hostile fury of the Donatsis, the Vandals, and the Moors. The zeal and numbers of the clergy declined; and the people, without discipline or knowledge, or hope, submissively yielded the dying embers of Christianity; but the introduction of a foreign prelate, a stranger to the Latin, and an enemy to the catholics, suppose the decay and dissolution of the African hierarchy. It was no longer the time when the successor of St. Cyprian, at the head of the church, maintained an equal contest with the ambition of the Roman pontiff. In the eleventh century, the unfortunate priest who was seated on the ruins of Carthage, implored the arms and the protection of the Vatican; and he bitterly complains that his sacred body had been scourged by the Saracens, and that his authority was disputed by the four suffragans, the folteering pillars of his throne. Two epistles of Gregory the seventh are destined to soothe the distress of the catholics, and the pride of a Moorish prince. The pope assures the sultan that they both worship the same God, and may hope to meet in the bosom of Islam, either professed or embraced the Mahometan faith; and under their dynasty (A. D. 953–1030) should place the fall of the republic (A. D. 418–965, 955.)

Yet the present state of the Ghebers in Persia is taken from Sir
John Chardin, not indeed the most learned, but the most judicious, honest and impartial historian. (A. D. 1677–1772.)
His brother, Pietro della Valle, Olearius, Fauclier, Tavernier, De Bry, Terni, and several others, who visited Persia, reached, had neither ears nor attention for this interesting people,

A.D. 1050–1076. The letter of a Saracen to the grand viceroy of Africa, to the caliph Abd Albas, the first of the Abbasid dynasty, in A. D. 423. (Baron H. de la Fosque et de l’Asgarde, tom. ii. p. 156.)

We have seen, however, (p. 22.) that the Ghebers in the Gins, or physicians, are innumerable in Persia. The Ghobers, or physicians, are innumerable in Persia. The circular, called Illumination, or the Mahometan compendium, is still the same. The Mahometan code;

The last Magian of name and power appears to be Mardavij
the Bitarist, who, beginning the tenth century, reigned in the northern provinces of Persia, under the title of Mirchond, or Mirchond, of

In the eleventh century, the unfortunate priest who was seated on the ruins of Carthage, implored the arms and the protection of the Vatican; and he bitterly complains that his sacred body had been scourged by the Saracens, and that his authority was disputed by the four suffragans, the folteering pillars of his throne. Two epistles of Gregory
the seventh are destined to soothe the distress of the catholics, and the pride of a Moorish prince. The pope assures the sultan that they both worship the
same God, and may hope to meet in the bosom of Islam, either professed or embraced the Mahometan faith; and under their dynasty (A. D. 953–1030) should place the fall of the republic (A. D. 418–965, 955.)

Yet the present state of the Ghebers in Persia is taken from Sir
John Chardin, not indeed the most learned, but the most judicious, honest and impartial historian. (A. D. 1677–1772.)
His brother, Pietro della Valle, Olearius, Fauclier, Tavernier, De Bry, Terni, and several others, who visited Persia, reached, had neither ears nor attention for this interesting people,

A.D. 1050–1076. The letter of a Saracen to the grand viceroy of Africa, to the caliph Abd Albas, the first of the Abbasid dynasty, in A. D. 423. (Baron H. de la Fosque et de l’Asgarde, tom. ii. p. 156.)

We have seen, however, (p. 22.) that the Ghebers in the Gins, or physicians, are innumerable in Persia. The circular, called Illumination, or the Mahometan compendium, is still the same. The Mahometan code;

The last Magian of name and power appears to be Mardavij
the Bitarist, who, beginning the tenth century, reigned in the northern provinces of Persia, under the title of Mirchond, or Mirchond, of Abraham; but the complaint, that three bishops could no longer be found to consecrate a brother, announces the speedy, and inevitable ruin of the episcopal order, and Spain. The Christians of Africa and Spain had a long struggle to maintain the purity of circumcision, and the legal abstinence from wine and pork; and the name of Mozarabes (adoptive Arabs) was applied to their civil or religious conformity.4 About the middle of the twelfth century the worship of Christ and the succession of pastors were abolished absolutely in the bishops of Barbary, and the kingdom of Cordova and Seville, of Valencia and Grenada.5 The throne of the Almohads, or Urmrians, was founded on the mildest fanaticism, and their extraordinary rigour might be provoked or justified by the recent victories and tolerant zeal of the princes of Sicily and Castille, of Aragon and Provence. The faith of the Mozarabes was occasionally revived by the papal missionaries; and, on the landing of Charles the fifth, some families of Latin Christians were encouraged to rear their heads at Tunis and the African coast. The gospel was quickly re-quickly, and the long province from Tripoli to the Atlantic has lost all memory of the language and religion of Rome.6

Tolerance and persecution. The Christians, the Jews and Christians of the Turkish empire eked out the liberty of their religion granted by the Arab caliphs. During the first age of the conquest, they suspected the loyalty of the catholics, whose name of Melchites betrayed their secret attachment to the Greek emperor, while the Nestorians and Jacobites, their inveterate enemies, approved themselves to the save and voluntary friends of the Mahometan government. Yet this partial jealousy was healed by time and submission; the churches of Egypt were shared with the catholics; but all the oriental sects were included in the common benefits of the realm, the patronage of the jurisdiction of the patriarchs, the bishops, and the clergy, were protected by the civil magistrature; the learning of individuals recommended them to the employment of secretaries and physicians; they were enriched by the lucrative collection of the revenues; and they were the sole authorities to the crown of the religions of cities and provinces. A caliph of the house of Abbas was heard to declare that the Christians were most worthy of trust in the administration of Persia.7

The rapid growth of Mohammedanism in the ninth century, the conveyance of the Arabic language to Spain, and the transplantation of the Arabic government of the caliphate of Cordova provoked the sentence of the caliph, by the public confession of their inconstancy, or their passionate invectives against the person and religion of the prophet. The empire of Hergina, the caliphs were the most potent and absolute monarchs of the globe, A.D. 715.

Their prerogative was not inscribed, either in right or in fact, by the power of the nibles, the freedom of the subjects of the east was in the hands of a senate, or the memory of a free constitution. The authority of the companions of Mahomet execrated with their lives; and the chiefs or emirs of the Arabian tribes left behold, in the desert, the spirit of equality and independence. The royal and sacerdotal character was transferred to the caliphs, who from the sacred names of the first century of the emperors of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book.

The empire of the early days of the Arabians, the crown and absolute monarchs of the globe, A.D. 715.

Their prerogative was not inscribed, either in right or in fact, by the power of the nibles, the freedom of the subjects of the east was in the hands of a senate, or the memory of a free constitution. The authority of the companions of Mahomet execrated with their lives; and the chiefs or emirs of the Arabian tribes left behold, in the desert, the spirit of equality and independence. The royal and sacerdotal character was transferred to the caliphs, who from the sacred names of the first century of the emperors of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east, to whom the name of liberty was unknown, and who were accustomed to applaud in their writings, the cruelty and servitude of Mahomet; and if the Koran was the rule of their actions, they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book.
indissoluble union and easy obedience that pervaded the government of Augustus and the Antonines; but the progress of the Mahometan religion diffused over this ample space a general resemblance of manners and opinions. The language and laws of the Koran were studied in the two empires of Constantinople and Seville: the Moor and the Indian embraced as countrymen and brothers in the pilgrimage of Mecca; and the Arabian language was adopted as the popular idiom in all the provinces to the westward of the Ti-gris. 9

CHAPTER XIII.

The two sieges of Constantinople by the Arabs.—Their invasion of France, and defeat by Charles Martel.—Civil war of the Ommiades and Abbasides.—Learning of the Arabs.—Luxury of the caliphs.—Naval enterprises on Crete, Sicily, Spoleto, Venice, and the empire of the caliphs. Defeats and victories of the Greek emperors.

The limits of the Arabian conquests.

When the Arabs first issued from the desert, they must have been surprised at the ease and rapidity of their own success. But when they advanced in the career of victory to the banks of the Indus and the summit of the Pyrenees; when they had repeatedly struck the terror of their seymitars and the energy of their faith, they might be equally astonished that any nation could resist their invincible arms, that any boundary should confine the dominion of the successor of the prophet. The confidence of soldiers and fanatics may indeed be excused, since the calm historian of the present hour, who strives to follow the rapid course of the Saracens, must study to explain by what means the church and state were saved from this impending, and, as it should seem, from this inevitable danger. The deserts of Scythia and Sarmatia might be guarded by their extent, their climate, their poverty, and the course of the northern sheep; China was remote and inaccessible: but the greatest part of the temperate zone was subject to the Mahometan conquerors, the Greeks were exhausted by the calamities of war and the chances of their latest provinces, and the barbarians of Europe might justly tremble at the precipitate fall of the Gothic monarchy. In this inquiry I shall unfold the events that rescued our ancestors of Britain, and our neighbours of Gaul, from the civil and religious yoke of the Koran; that protected the majesty of Rome, and the existence of the Christian church; and that invigorated the defence of the christians, and scattered among their enemies the seeds of division and decay.

Forty-six years after the flight of Mah-homet from Mecca, his disciples appeared in arms under the walls of Consta-tinople. They were animated by a genuine or fictitions saying of the prophet, that, to the first army which besieged the city of the Caesars, their sins were forgiven: the long series of Roman triumphs would be meritoriously transferred to the conquerors of New

(A. D. 995.) Since that time, the houses in Spain have been overbalanced by the conquists in India, Tartary, and the European Territories.

4 The Arabic of the Koran is taught as a dead language in the col-degs of the Dutch tern, and the scientific interest is com-cared to the Latin; the vulgar version of Heyzaj and Yemen to the Italian; and the Arabic dialects of Syria, Egypt, Africa, &c. to the Provenca, Spanish and Portuguese. (Niebuhr, Description de l'Arcin, p. 74, &c.)

1 Theophanes places the seven years of the siege of Constantinople in the year 667, (of the Alexandrian 665, Sept. 1) and the place of the Saracens four years afterwards; a glaring inconsistency! which Petavius, Gaur, and Pazi, (Critica, tom. i, p. 83, 6d.) have strenuously to remove. Of the Arabians, the Heyzaj 52, (A. D. 672, January 3) is assigned by Elmasi, the year 48, (A. D. 665, Feb. 28) by Abufoha, whose testimony I esteem the most convenient and credible.

6 For this first siee of Constantinople, see Niccophor, (Breviar, p. 253, &c. Thoaplis, (Ann. Danil, p. 323, &c.) Theophanes, ( Chronogr., p. 432) Zonaras; (Hist. tom. ii. l. 19, p. 99) Elmasi; (Hist. Nara-

p. 56, 37) Aboabula; (Anian, Moslem, p. 107, 149, vers. Reiske.)

7 See also the summary of the Procopius, (De Avar. etc. 9) and Constantine, vol. ii. p. 127, 129.

8 The state and movements of the Dardanells is exposed in the Memoirs of the Baron de Tott, (com. ill. p. 39-97) who was sent to reconstruct them against the Romans. From a principal action it may be expected much more matter of satire: a style that is not the act for the amusement, rather than the instruction, of his reader. Perhaps, on the approach of the enemy, the minister of Constantinople was occupied, like that of Mustapha, in finding two Canary birds, who should sing precisely the same note.

THE DECLINE AND FALL

Chap. XIII.

realized the holy spot at the foot of the walls and the bottom of the harbour; and the mosque of Ayub has been deservedly chosen for the simple and martial inauguration of the Turkish sulmans. The event of the siege revivified, both in the east and west, the reputation of the Roman arms, and for a moment shed a ray over the glories of the Saracens. The Greek ambassador was favourably received at Damascus, in a general council of the emirs or Koresiah: a peace, or truce, of thirty years was ratified between the two empires; and the stipulation of an annual tribute, fifty hundred thousand francs, and three thousand pieces of gold, degraded the majesty of the commander of the faithful. The aged caliph was desirous of possessing his dominions, and ending his days in tranquility and repose: while the Moors and Indians trembled at his name, his palace and city of Damascus was insulted by the Mardaites, or Maronites, of Mount Libanus, the firmest barrier of the empire, till they were disarmed and transplanted by the suspicious policy of the Greeks. After the revolt of Arabia and Persia, the house of Omnyiah was reduced to the confines of Syria and Beyond, and fear enforced their compliance with the pressing demands of the Christians; and the tribute was increased to a slave, a horse, and a thousand pieces of gold, for each of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the solar year. But as soon as the empire was again united, the policy and system of Abdalmalek, he exclaimed a badge of servitude not less injurious to his conscience than to his pride; he discontinued the payment of the tribute; and the resentment of the Greeks was discharged from action by the mad tyranny of the second caliph, the just rebellion of his subjects, and the frequent change of his antagonists and successors. Till the reign of Abdalmalek, the Saracens had been content with the free possession of the Persian and Roman treasures, in the coin of Chosreces and Cazars. By the command of that caliph, a national mint was established, both for silver and gold; and the inscription of the diuar, though it might be censured by some timorous casuists, proclaimed the unity of the God of Mahomet. Under the reign of the caliph Walid, the Greek language and characters were exchanged in the accounts of the public revenue. This change was productive of the invention or discovery of the use of our present numerals, the Arabic or Indian cyphers, as they are commonly styled, a regulation of office has promoted the most important discoveries of arithmetic, algebra, and the mathematical sciences. Whilst the caliph Walid sat idle on the Second siege of the throne of Damascus, while his lieutenants, Constantinople, An-dian and Spain, a third army of Saracens overspread the Vayad, the Urg, and Asia Minor, and approached the embers of the Byzantine capital. But the attempt and disgrace of the second siege was reserved for his brother Soliman, whose ambition appears to have been quenched by a more active and martial spirit. In the revolutions of the Greek empire, after the type of Justinian, the caliph continued in power by a general edict, which the humble secretary, Anastasius or Artemius, was promoted by chance or merit to the vacant purple. He was alarmed by the sound of war; and his ambassador returned from Damascus with the tremendous news that the Rhodians, dispersed themselves an army by sea and land, such as would transcend the experience of the past, or the belief of the present age. The precautions of Anistasius were not unworthy of his station, or of the impending danger. He issued a peremptory mandate, that all persons who were not provided with the means of self-defence should desert their cities, and evacuate the city; the public granaries and arsenals were abundantly replenished; the walls were restored and strengthened; and the engines for casting stones, or darts, or fire, were stationed along the ramparts, or in the higginates of war, of which an additional number was constructed. But the gentry of Byzantium acted as more honourable, than to repel an attack; and a design was meditated, above the usual spirit of the Greeks, of burning the naval stores of the enemy, the ephyras timber that had been heaped in Mount Libanus, and was piled along the sea-shore of Phocis, for the service of the Egyptian fleet. This generous enterprise was defeated by the cowardice or treachery of the troops, who, in the new language of the empire were styled of the obsequious theme. They murdered their chief, deserted their standard in the isle of Mytilene, and went to the isles of Thasos and Thasos, and the isle of Thrace, and the same rule was observed of the Saracens, Moslemah, the brother of the caliph, was advancing at the head of one hundred and twenty thousand Arabs and Persians, the greater part mounted on horses or camels; and the sudden attack of the Saracen army of Tyana, Amida, and the isle of Ypsos, was of sufficient duration to exercise their skill and to elevate their hopes. At the well-known passage of Abydus, on the Hellespont, the Mahometan army was transported, for the first time, from Asia to Europe. From thence, wheeling round the Thracian cities of the Propontis, Moslemah invested Constantinople on the land side, surrounded his camp with a ditch and rampart, prepared and planted his engines of assault, and declared, by words and actions, a patient resolution of expecting the return of seed-time and harvest, should the obstinacy of the besieged prove equal to his own. The Greeks would gladly have ransomed their religion and empire, by a fine or assessment of a piece of gold on the head of each inhabitant of the 4 Demetrius Canethios's Histor. of the Othman empire, p. 106, 106, Rycaut's State of the Ottoman empire, p. 10, 11, Voyages de Thavenc, part, i.p. 199. The Christians, who suppose that the martyr Abyd, is really confounded with the patriarch Job, betray their own ignorance rather than of that of the Turk. Theophanes, though a Greek, deserves credit for these tribunes, (Chronogr., p. 255, 296, 300, 301.) which are conformed, with some variations, by the Arabic History of Abulpharagius. (Dyonis. p. 125, vors. Pisc.)

The censure of Theophanes is just and pointed, (τοις Φοιτητοις) κατακτημενοι... τος κοινωνης Πτωχους... τον Αθηναν τον 6ου της θρησκευσης, έλεγχος της χριστιανικης Εκκλησίας... τους Ρώμας του της Αιγυπτιας οικησεως. (Chronogr., p. 302, 303.) The series of these events may be traced in the Annals of Theophanes, and in the Abriber of the Patriarch, Nicephorus, p. 22—24.

These domestic revolutions are related in a clear and natural state, by the account of Ockinger on the Saracen, 253—350. Besides our printed authors, he draws his materials from the Arabic MSS. of Oxford, which he would have more deeply searched, had he been confined to the Bodleian library instead of the civil library of the University of his country.

Elmones, who dates the first coinage A. H. 76, A. D. 655, five or six years later than the Greek historians, has compared the weight of the best or common gold dinar, to the dinar of the Saracens, (p. 77,) which may be equal to two pennies (45 grains) of our Troy weight. The standard of value is, of twenty or thirty. (p. 24—35.) The parity of the two systems is the same Elmones and Arabic physicians, some dinars as high as two dinars, as low as three or four. It appears, however, that the weight of money, and the weight of the dinar, is nearly in the same proportion. (Ibid.)

The extinction of science in the west, they were adopted by the Arabic world. According to a letter of Michael IV. and referred to the Latins about the eleventh century.

1 In the division of the empire, or provinces described by Constantine Porphyrogynegus, (De Thesmatibus, 1. i. p. 9, 10,) the obsequent, a Latin appellation of the army and palace, was the fourth in the list, but it is supposed to have been transferred from the Palatem from the Hellas after the usual parts of Byzantium and Paphlagon, (See the two maps prefixed by Delius to the Imperium Orientale of Bandel.) chap. xiii. of the roman empire

251
city; but the liberal offer was rejected with disdain, and the presumption of Moslemah was exalted by the speedy approach and invincible force of the navies of Egypt and Syria. They are said to have amounted to eighteen hundred ships: the number betrays their inconsiderable national force, the ephemeral character of their vessels, whose magnitude impeded their progress, each was manned with no more than one hundred heavy-armed soldiers. This huge armada proceeded on a smooth sea, and with a gentle gale, towards the mouth of the Bosphorus; the surface of the strait was overlaid thereby, in the language of that day, with a moving forest, and the same fatal night had been fixed by the Saracen chief for a general assault by sea and land. To allure the confidence of the enemy, the conqueror had thrown aside the chain that usually guarded the entrance of the harbour; but while they hesitated whether they should seize the opportunity, or apprehend the snare, the ministers of destruction were at hand. The fireships of the Greeks were launched against them, the Arabs, their arms, and vessels, were involved in the same flames, the disorderly fugitives were dashed against each other or overwhelmed in the waves, and the enemy's fleet, so long as it had threatened to extirpate the Roman name. A still more fatal and irreparable loss was that of the caliph Soliman, who died of an indigestion in his camp near Kinnisir or Chaleis in Syria, as he was preparing to lead against Constantineopolis the remaining forces of the empire. This discovery was made by a kinsman and an enemy; and the throne of an active and able prince was degraded by the useless and pernicious virtues of a bigot. While he started and satisfied thescruples of a blind conscience, the siege was continued through the winter by the negligent, rather than by the valor of the former, the winter proved uncommon rigorous; above a hundred days the ground was covered with deep snow, and the natives of the sultry climes of Egypt and Arabia lay torpid and almost lifeless in their frozen camp. They revolved on the return of spring; a second effort had been made in their favour; and their distress was relieved by the arrival of two numerous fleets, laden with corn, and arms, and soldiers; the first from Alexandria, of four hundred transports and galleys; the second of three hundred and sixty vessels from the ports of Africa. But the Greek fires were again kindled, and it is hard to determine, in the absence of any authentic account, the experience which had taught the Moslems to remain at a safe distance, or to the perfidy of the Egyptian mariners, who deserted with their ships to the emperor of the Christians. The trade and navigation of the capital were restored; and the produce of the fisheries supplied the wants, and even the luxury of the inhabitants. But the calamities of famine and disease were soon felt by the troops of Moslemah, and as the former was miserably assuaged, so the latter was dreadfully propagated, by the pernicious nutriment which hunger compelled them to extract from the most unwholesome food, of the ships of war. This winter, and even of enthusiasm, was extinct: the Saracens could no longer struggle beyond their lines, either single or in small parties, without exposing themselves to the merciless retaliation of the Thracian peasants. An army of Bulgarians was attracted from the Danubian

A beautiful by the gifts and promises of Leo; and these savagely auxiliaries made some atonement for the evils which they had inflicted on the empire, by the defeat and slaughter of twenty-two thousand Asiatics. A report was dexterously scattered, that the Franks, the Saracen, and all those Latin nations which had landed in the sea and land in the defence of the Christian cause, and their formidable aid was expected with far different sensations in camp and city. At length after a siege of thirteen months, the hopeless Moslem failure and re me came received from the caliph the well-wished of the Sar crain, and the capture of the Arabian cavalry over the Hellespont and through the provinces of Asia, was executed without delay or molestation; but an army of their brethren had been cut in pieces on the side of Bithynia, and the remains of the fleet were so repeatedly damaged by the tempest and fire, that only five galleys entered the port of Alexandria to relate the tale of their various and almost incredible disasters.

In the two sieges, the deliverance of invention and Constantinople may be chiefly ascribed to the Greek

The most important secret of compounding and directing this artificial flame was imparted by Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Syria, who deserted from the service of the caliph to that of the emperor. The skill of a chemist and engineer was equivalent to the succour of fleets and armies; the Saracen galleys were destroyed or dispersed, and was fortunately reserved for the distressful period, when the degenerate Romans of the east were incapable of contending with the warlike enthusiasm and youthful vigour of the Saracens. The historian who presumes to analyze this extraordinary composition, should suspect his ignorance, and refer to the chemical guides, so prone to the marvellous, so careless and, in this instance, so jealous of the truth. From their obscure, and perhaps fallacious, hints, it should seem that the principal ingredient of the Greek fire was the naptha; or liquid bitumen, a light, tenacious, and inflammable oil, which springs from the earth, and catches the fire as soon as it comes in contact with the air, and catches the fire as soon as it comes in contact with the air, and catches the fire as soon as it comes in contact with the air.
this mixture, which produced a thick smoke and a loud explosion, proceeded a fierce and obstinate flame, which not only rose in perpendicular ascent, but like a hurricane with equal vehemence in descent or lateral progress; instead of being extinguished, it was nourished and quickened, by the element of water; and sand, ashes, or other refuse matter, whether thrown down or driven before it by the wind, would supply the necessary nutriment. The Greeks, therefore, could despise the fury of this powerful agent, which was justly denominated by the Gauls, the liquid, or the maritime fire. For the annoyance of the enemy, it was employed with equal effect, by sea and land; in battles or in sieges. It was either poured from the ramps of large machines, or launched in red-hot globes of stone and iron, or darted in arrows and javelins, twisted round with flax and tow, which had deeply imbibed the inflammable oil; sometimes it was deposited in fireships, the victuals and instruments of a more ample revenge, and was most commonly blown through long tubes of copper, which were planted on the prow of a galley, and most fancifully shaped into the mouths of savage monsters, that seemed to vomit a stream of liquid and consuming fire. This important art was preserved at Constantinople, as the palace of the emperors; the galleys of the fleet occasionally lent to the allies of Rome; but the composition of the Greek fire was concealed with the most jealous scruple, and the terror of the enemies was increased and prolonged by their ignorance and surprise. In the treaty of the administration of the empire, the emperor and his successor invited a great many savants and savants, and invented contrivances and devices that might best elude the indiscreet curiosity and importunate demands of the barbarians. They should be told that the mystery of the Greek fire had been revealed by an angel to the first and greatest of the emperors, with a sacred injunction, that this gift of Heaven, this peculiar blessing of the Almighty, should never be communicated to any foreign nation; that the prince and subjects were alike bound to religious silence under the temporal and spiritual penalties of treason and sacrilege; and that the impious attempt would provoke the sudden and supernatural vengeance of the God of the Christians. By these precautions, the secret was confined, above four hundred years, to the Romans of the east; and, at the end of the eleventh century, the Pisans, to whom every sea and every art were familiar, suffered the effects which attended using the composition of the Greek fire. It was at length either discovered or stolen by the Mahometans; and, in the holy wars of Syria and Egypt, they retorted an invention, contrived against themselves, on the heads of the Christians. A knight, who witnessed and heard of the Saracen threatened vassals, with heartfelt sincerity, his own fears, and those of his companions, at the sight and sound of the mischief-producing engine that discharged a torrent of the Greek fire, the feu Gregoires, as it is styled by the more early of the French writers. It came flying through the air, says Joinville, 'like a winged long-haired dragon, about the thickness of a hogshead, with the report of thunder and the velocity of lightning; and the darkness of the night was dispelled by this deadly illumination. The use of the Greek, or, as it might now be called, of the Saracen fire, was continued to the middle of the fourteenth century, when the

The DECLINE and FALL

of the scientific or casual compound of nitre, sulphur, and charcoal, effected a new revolution in the art of war and the history of mankind. Constantiopolis and the Greek fire might exclude the Arabs from the eastern entrance of Europe; but in the west, the Saracen progress and the triumphs of Gaul were threatened and invaded by the conquerors of Spain. The decline of the French monarchy invited the attack of these innate fanatics. The descendants of Clovis had lost the inheritance of his martial and ferocious spirit; and their misfortune or demerit might possibly be the cause of the progress of the Goths, the Gascous, and the Franks, assembled under the standard of this Christian hero: he repelled the first invasion of the Saracen; and Zama, lieutenant of the caliph, lost his army and his life under the walls of Thoulouse. The ambition of his successors was stimulated by revenge: they repassed the Pyrenees with the means and the resolution of conquest. The advantageous situation which had recommended Narbonne as the first Roman colony, was again chosen.

This extraordinary man, Friar Bacon, reveals two of the ingredients, sulphur and sulphur, and conceals the third in a sentence of mysterious gibberish, as if he dreaded the consequences of his own discovery. (Beg. Brit., vol. i. p. 430, new edition.)

For the invasion of France, and the defeat of the Arabs by Charles Martel, see the Historia Arabum (c. 114) of Roderic Jimenez, archbishop of Toledo, who had before him the Christian Chronicle of Isidore Passarino, and the Mahometan history of Nicosia; and their anonymous authors were silent or concise; but the account of their losses, but M. Cardinali (tom. i. p. 129—131) has given a pure and simple account of all that he could collect from Ibn Hakan, Hizai, and other Mahometan writers. The text is doubtless, and the lives of saints, are inserted in the collection of Bouquet, (tom. ii.) and the Annals of Pagi, who (tom. iii. under the proper years) has rendered the chronicle, which is anticipated six years in the Annals of Barcinus. The Dictionary of Boyle (Medicino and Musciano) was engaged for lively editions.

Eginhart, de Vita Caroli Magni, c. i. p. 15, 16. Edit. Schmick, Strasbourg, 1711. Some modern critics accuse the master of Charlemagne of exaggerating the weaknesses of the Merovingians: but the general outline is just, and the French reader will for ever repeat the sentence of Charles the Simple.

1. That extraordinary man, Friar Bacon, reveals two of the ingredients, sulphur and sulphur, and conceals the third in a sentence of mysterious gibberish, as if he dreaded the consequences of his own discovery. (Beg. Brit., vol. i. p. 430, new edition.)

2. For the invasion of France, and the defeat of the Arabs by Charles Martel, see the Historia Arabum (c. 114) of Roderic Jimenez, archbishop of Toledo, who had before him the Christian Chronicle of Isidore Passarino, and the Mahometan history of Nicosia; and their anonymous authors were silent or concise; but the account of their losses, but M. Cardinali (tom. i. p. 129—131) has given a pure and simple account of all that he could collect from Ibn Hakan, Hizai, and other Mahometan writers. The text is doubtless, and the lives of saints, are inserted in the collection of Bouquet, (tom. ii.) and the Annals of Pagi, who (tom. iii. under the proper years) has rendered the chronicle, which is anticipated six years in the Annals of Barcinus. The Dictionary of Boyle (Medicino and Musciano) was engaged for lively editions.

3. Eginhart, de Vita Caroli Magni, c. i. p. 15, 16. Edit. Schmick, Strasbourg, 1711. Some modern critics accuse the master of Charlemagne of exaggerating the weaknesses of the Merovingians: but the general outline is just, and the French reader will for ever repeat the sentence of Charles the Simple.

4. Manuscrit, on the Osne, between Compiègne and Noyon, which Echard and Etienne Baluze, and also Rodin, William, a member of the Académie of France for Dean, Bouquet's Collection.) Compendium, or Compiègne, the palace of modern France. (Hist. tuta Galliarm, p. 132.) and that laughing philosophic, the Abbé Galliau, (Dialogues sur le Commerce des Étrangers, p. 25,) may truly affirm, that a most prudent and circumspect writer, that a feu Gregoires was shot with a pile or javelin, from an engine that acted with fire, so that the flame was blown about, the vixen, or envoy, of shaking the established property of France, has tempted some modern to carry gunpowder above the fourteenth century, (seer Sir William Temple, Dextras, &c.) and the Greek fire above the

5. The DECLINE and FALL of the scientific or casual compound of nitre, sulphur, and charcoal, effected a new revolution in the art of war and the history of mankind. Constantiopolis and the Greek fire might exclude the Arabs from the eastern entrance of Europe; but in the west, the Saracen progress and the triumphs of Gaul were threatened and invaded by the conquerors of Spain. The decline of the French monarchy invited the attack of these innate fanatics. The descendants of Clovis had lost the inheritance of his martial and ferocious spirit; and their misfortune or demerit might possibly be the cause of the progress of the Goths, the Gascous, and the Franks, assembled under the standard of this Christian hero: he repelled the first invasion of the Saracen; and Zama, lieutenant of the caliph, lost his army and his life under the walls of Thoulouse. The ambition of his successors was stimulated by revenge: they repassed the Pyrenees with the means and the resolution of conquest. The advantageous situation which had recommended Narbonne as the first Roman colony, was again chosen. by the Moslems; they claimed the province of Sep-tember, or Longueau, as a just dependence of the Spanish monarchy: the vineyards of Gascony and the city of Bordeaux were possessed by the sovereigns of Damascus and Sunnaec, and the south of France, from the mouth of the Garonne to that of the Rhone, assumed the manners and religion of Arabia. These narrow limits were secured to him by the spirit of Abdalhman, or Aderman, who had been restored by the caliph Hashim to the wishes of the soldiers and people of Spain. That veteran and daring commander adjudged to the obedience of the prophet whatever yet remained of the kingdom of the Moors; he would display his glory, and execute the sentence, at the head of a formidable host, in the full confidence of surmounting all opposition either of nature or of man. His first care was to suppress a domestic rebel, who controlled the most important passes of the Pyrenees; Munaza, a Moorish chief, had accepted the alliance of the duke of Aquitain, and Eudes, from a motive of private or public interest, devoted his beauteous daughter to the embraces of the African misbeliever. But the strongest fortresses of Cerdagne were invested by a superior force; the rebel was overtaken and slain in the mountains; and his wide extent, and the mingled policy and desires, or more probably the vanity, of the commander of the faithful. From the Pyrenees, Abderane proceeded without delay to the passage of the Rhone and the siege of Arles. An array of Christians attempted the relief of the city; the bombs of their leaders were yet visible in the thirteenth century; and many thousands of their dead bodies were carried down the rapid stream into the Mediterranean sea. The arms of Abderane were not less successful on the side of the ocean. He passed without opposition the Garonne and Dordogne, which unite their waters in the gulf of Bordeaux; but he overran the wild and isolated Eudes, who had formed a second army, and sustained a second defeat, so fatal to the Christians, that, according to their sad confession, God alone could reckon the number of the slain. The victorious Saracen overran the provinces of Aquitain, whose Gallic nature and domestic situation, and the many splendid cities of Poitou and Poitou; his standards were planted on the walls, or at least before the gates, of Tours and of Sens; and his detachments overspread the kingdom of Burgundy as far as the well-known cities of Lyons and Besancon. The monarch of the Franks, however, did not want spirit to spare the country or the people, was long preserved by virtue; and the invasion of France by the Moors or Mahometans, affords the ground-work of these fables, which have been so wildly disfigured in the romances of chivalry, and so elegantly adorned by the Italian muse. In the decline of society and art, the deserted cities could supply a slender booty to the Saracens; their richest spoil was found in the churches and monasteries, which they stripped of their ornaments and delivered to the flames; and the tutelar saints, held in so high veneration by the Muslims, were not forgotten their miraculous powers in the defence of their own sepulchers. A victorious line of march had been prolonged above a thousand miles from the rock of Gibraltar to the banks of the Loire; the repetition of an equal space would have carried the Saracens to the mouth of the Rhine, but the distance by which the Rhine is not more impassable than the Nile or the Euphrates, and the Arabian fleet might have sailed without a naval combat into the mouth of the Thames. Perhaps the interpretation of the Koran would now be taught in the schools of Oxford, and her pulpits might demonstrate to a circumcised people the sanctity and truth of the revelation of Mahomet. From such calamities was Christen-edom delivered by the genius and fortune of one man, Charles, the illegitimate son of the elder Pepin, was content with the title of mayor or duke of the Franks; but he desired to become the father of a line of kings. In a laborious administration of twenty-four years, he restored and supported the dignity of the throne, and the rebels of Germany and Gaul were successively crushed by the activity of a warrior, who, in the same campaign, would have been the first conqueror of the shores of the ocean. In the public danger, he was summoned by the voice of his country; and his rival, the duke of Aquitain, was reduced to appear among the fugitives and suppliants. "Alas!" exclaimed the Franks, "what a misfortune! what an indignity! We have long heard of the name and conquests of the Arabs: we were apprehensive of their attack from the east; they have now conquered Spain, and invade our country on the side of the west. Yet their numbers, and (since they have no buckler) their arms, are inferior to ours. If you follow my advice," replied Charles, "you will not break their march, nor precipitate your attack. They are like a torrent, which it is dangerous to stem in its career. The thirst of riches and the consciousness of success, redouble their valour, and valour is of more avail than arms or numbers. Be patient till they have thrown themselves with the encumbrance of wealth. The possession of wealth will divide their counsels and assure your victory." This subtle policy is perhaps a refinement of the Arabian writers; and the situation of Charles will suggest a more narrow and selfish motive of procrastination; the secret desire of the prince, without compromising the pride, and wasting the provinces, of the rebel duke of Aquitain. It is yet more probable, that the delays of Charles were inevitable and reluctant. A standing army was unknown under the first and second race; more than half the kingdom was now in the hands of the Saracens; according to their respective condition, the Franks had grown in numbers, and were too conscious or too careless of the impending danger; and the voluntary aids of the Gepidae and Germans were separated by a long interval from the standard of the Christian general. No sooner had he collected his forces, than he sought and found the place of victory in the heart of France; it was the country of Poitiers. His well-conducted march was covered by a range of hills, and Abderane appears to have been surprised by his unexpected presence. The nations of Asia, Africa, and Europe, advanced with equal ardour to an encounter which would change the history of the world. In the six first days of desultory com- bat, the horsemen and archers of the east maintained their advantage; but in the closer onset of the seventh day, the orientals were oppressed by the strength and stature of the Germans, who, with stout hearts and whole hands, advanced in the sacred and inviolate name of their posterity. The epithet of Martellus, the Hero, which has been added to the name of Charles, is expressive of his weighty and irresistible strokes; the valour of Eudes was excited by resentment and emulation; and their companions, in the eye of history, are true proofs of the proverb, that "after the fire, the smith." After a bloody field, in which Abderane was slain,
The Decline and Fall

Chapter XIII.

The Saracens, in the close of the evening, retired to their camp. In the disorder and despair of the night, the various tribes of Yemen and Damascus, of Africa and Spain, were provoked to turn their arms against each other; the remains of their host were suddenly divided; some were captured, and the conquest was a fruitful, hasty and separate retreat. At the dawn of day, the stillness of an hostile camp was suspected by the victorious Christians: on the report of their spies, they ventured to explore the riches of the vacant tents; but, if we except some celebrated relics, a small portion of the spoil was restored to the less fortunate, and laid at the owners' disposal. The joyful tidings were soon diffused over the catholic world, and the monks of Italy could affirm and believe that three hundred and fifty, or three hundred and seventy-five, thousand of the Mahometans had been crushed by the hammer of Charles; while, no more than fifteen hundred Christians were slain in the field of Tours. But this incredible tale is sufficiently disproved by the caution of the French general, who apprehended the snares and accidents of a pursuit, and dismissed his German allies to their native freedom. The inactivity of a conqueror betrays the loss of strength and blood, and the most cruel execution is inflicted, not in the ranks of battle, but on the backs of a flying enemy. Yet the victory of the Franks was complete and final; Aquitain was for the Franks. The Franks were recovered by the arms of Eudes; the Franks and the Franks were soon driven beyond the Pyrenees by Charles Martel and his valiant night. It might have been expected that the saviour of Christendom would have been canonized, or at least appalled, by the gratitude of the conquered; but they were indebted to his sword for their present existence. But in the public distress, the mayor of the palace had been compelled to apply the riches, or at least the revenues, of the bishops and abbots, to the relief of the state and the reward of the soldiers. His merits were forgotten, his sacrifice alone was remembered, and, in an epistle to a Carlingvian prince, a Gallic synod presumes to declare that his ancestor was damned; that on the opening of his tomb, the spectators were afflicted by a smell of fire and the aspect of a horrid dragon; and that a saint of the times was indulged with a pleasant vision of the soul and the body of Charles Martel, burning, to all eternity, in the abyss of hell. The loss of an army, or a province in the western world, was less painful to the court of Damascus, than the rise and progress of a rival competitor. Egypt, invaded by the Persians, the caliph of the house of Omnia had never been the objects of the public favour. The life of Mahomet recorded their perseverance in idolatry and rebellion: their conversion had been reluctant, their elevation irregular and fictitious, and their throne was cemented with the most holy and nole blood of Arabia. The best of their race, the pious Omar, was dissatisfied with his own title; their personal virtues were insufficient to justify a departure from the order of succession; and the eyes and wishes of the faithful were turned towards the line of Hashem and the kin

1 These numbers are stated by Paul Warneford, the deacon of Aquitain, (See Gesta Langobard. I. vi. p. 262, ed. Gen.) and Abase

2 anis, the librarian of the Roman church, (to Viti. Gregori II.) who tells a miraculous story of three consecrated spores, which render ed invulnerable the French soldiers among whom they had been shared. It should appear, that in his letters to the Pope, Eudes usur ped the right of succession, and that the Franks were obliged to take French annalist, who, with equal falsehood, accuse him of inviting the Saracens.

3 Nahrone, and the rest of Septimania, was recovered by Pepin, the son of Charles Martel, A.D. 753, (Pagi. Critica, tom. iii. p. 304.) The passage is considered by most historians to be a genuine history; it was pitted by the French historians into the Arabs, who employed the captives in the construction of the mosques of Fez and Mekke. (Hist. des Arabes, p. 351.)

4 This pastoral letter, addressed to Lewis the Germanic, the grand son of Charlemagne, and to Louis the Bavarian, is dated in the year 758, and signed by the bishops of the provinces of Noyon, and Rouen. (Baronius, Annal. Eccles. A.D. 754. Fiey. Hist. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 434—436.) Yet Baroniun himself, and the French critics, reject with contempt this episopal fiction, of the apostle of God. Of these the Fatimites were either rash or pusillanimous; but the descend ants of Abbas cherished, with courage and discretion, the hopes of their rising fortunes. From an obscure residence in Syria, they secretly despatched their emissaries, and the next year, 876, the province of Apamea was annexed to their dominions, and their influence was immediately manifest. (Abulpharagius, Hist. Dynast. p. 140.)

5 The seed and the saddle which had carried any of his wives away, was considered a treasure of so much value that priests were paid for guarding them. By the pen of the same writer, we are informed, that his horse, a handsome black stallion, was killed in the course of a hunting party, conducted by a male. Twelve hundred mules or camels were required for his kitchen furniture; and the daily consumption amounted to three thousand cakes, a hundred sheep, besides oxen, poultry, &c. (Abulpharagius, Hist. Dynast. p. 140.) Fall of the Ommiades.

His speed was urged by the incessant diligence of Abdallah, who in every step of the pursuit acquired strength and reputation: the military valour of the white faction was finally vanquished in Egypt; and the lance, which terminated the life and anxiety of Mervan, was not less welcome perhaps to the unfortunate than to the victorious chief. The merciless inquisition of the conqueror eradicated the most distant branches of the hostile race. The chief of Mahomet was now accused, and the martyrdom of Hossein was abundantly revenged on the posterity of his tyrants. Four-score of the Ommiades, who had yielded to the faith or clemency of their foes, were invited to a banquet at Damascus. The laws of hospitality were violated by a promiscuous massacre: the board was spread over their fallen bodies; and the festivity of the guests was enlivened by the music of their dying groans. By the event of the civil war, the dynasty of the Abbassides was firmly established; but the Christians only could triumph in the mutual hatred and common loss of the directors of Mahomet.

Yet the thousands who were swept away by the sword of war might have been speedily retrieved in the succeeding generation, if the consequences of the revolution had not tended to dissolve the power and unity of the empire of the Saracen. The central government of a people in which the name of Abdallah alone escaped the rage of his enemies, who hunted the wandering exile from the banks of the Euphrates to the valleys of mount Atlas. His presence in the neighbourhood of Spain revived the zeal of the white faction. The name and emblem of kiaf were now in the hands of the Persians; the west had been pure from civil arms; and the servants of the abdicated family still held, by a precarious tenure, the inheritance of their lands, and the offices of government. Strongly prompted by gratitude, indignation, and fear, they invited the grandson of the caliph Hashem to ascend the throne of his ancestors.

But he had been born at the time when the Persians; the west had been pure from civil arms; and the servants of the abdicated family still held, by a precarious tenure, the inheritance of their lands, and the offices of government. Strongly prompted by gratitude, indignation, and fear, they invited the grandson of the caliph Hashem to ascend the throne of his ancestors.

Yet the thousands who were swept away by the sword of war might have been speedily retrieved in the succeeding generation, if the consequences of the revolution had not tended to dissolve the power and unity of the empire of the Saracen. The central government of a people in which the name of Abdallah alone escaped the rage of his enemies, who hunted the wandering exile from the banks of the Euphrates to the valleys of mount Atlas. His presence in the neighbourhood of Spain revived the zeal of the white faction. The name and emblem of kiaf were now in the hands of the Persians; the west had been pure from civil arms; and the servants of the abdicated family still held, by a precarious tenure, the inheritance of their lands, and the offices of government. Strongly prompted by gratitude, indignation, and fear, they invited the grandson of the caliph Hashem to ascend the throne of his ancestors.
years by the vices or virtues of his children. His son Mahadi, in a single pilgrimage to Mecca, expended six millions of dinars of gold. A pious and charitable motive may sanctify the foundation of cisterns, and caravanserais, which he distributed along a measured road of seven hundred miles; but his train of camels laden with snow, could serve only to sostenish the natives of Arabia. The fruits and flowers of the royal banquet. The couriers would surely praise the liberality of his grandson Almamin, who gave away four-fifths of the income of a province, a sum of two millions four hundred thousand gold dinars, before he drew his foot from the stirrup. At the nuptials of the sultan, he presented to the great and smallest of the court ladies, and the persons of the court, with the head of the bride, and a lottery of lands and houses displayed the capricious bounty of fortune. The glories of the court were heightened, rather than impaired, in the decline of the empire, and a Greek ambassador might naturalize, or deny, the magnificence of the feebler Moezder. "The caliph's whole army," says the historian Abulfeda, "both horse and foot, was under arms, which together made a body of one hundred and sixty thousand men. His state-officers, the favourite slaves, stood near him in splendid array, the courtiers glittering in gold and gems. Near them were seven thousand eunuchs, four thousand of them white, the remainder black. The porters or door-keepers were in number seven hundred. Bar- res and boats, with the most superb decorations, were seen swimming upon the Tigris. Nor was the palace itself less splendid; it was a tree of gold and silver spreading into eighteen large branches, on which, and on the lesser boughs, sat a variety of birds made of the same precious metals, as well as the leaves of the tree. While the machinery affected spontaneous motions, the several birds wandered at their natural harmony. Through this scene of magnificence, the Greek ambassador was led by the vizir to the foot of the caliph's throne."

In the west, the Ommandes of Spain supported, with equal pomp, the title of commander of the faithful. Three miles from Cordova, in honour of his favourite sulhna, the third and greatest of the Almamians, he con- structed the city, palace, and gardens of Zehra. Twenty-five years, and above three millions sterling, were employed by the founder: his liberal taste invited the artists of Constantinople, the most skilful sculptors and painters of the age; and the buildings were sustained or adorned by twelve hundred columns of Spanish and African, and Greek and Italian, marble. The hall of audience was inrusted with gold and pearls, and a great bason in the centre was surrounded with the curious and costly figures of birds and quadrupeds. In a lofty pavilion of the gardens, one of these basons and fountains, so delightful in a salutary climate, was replenished not with water, but with the purest quick- silver. The seraglio of Abbudrahm, his wives, concubines, and black eunuchs, amounted to six thousand three hundred persons; and he was attended to the field by a guard of twelve thousand horses, whose belts and scyimeters were studded with gold.

In a private condition, our desires are in consequence perpetually satisfied. Our private happiness, the bliss of life, the social virtues of domestic subordination; but the lives and labours of public happiness, of millions are devoted to the service of a despotic prince, whose laws are blindly obeyed, and whose wishes are instantly gratified. Our imagination is dazzled by the splendid picture; and whatever may be the calculation of the revenue of the empire, he who would obstinately refuse a trial of the comforts and the cares of royalty. It may therefore be of some use to borrow the experience of the same Abbudrahm, whose magnificence has perhaps excited our admiration and envy, and to transcribe an authentic document, which was found in the closet of the deceased caliph, "I have now reigned above fifty years in victory or peace; beloved by my subjects, dreaded by my ene- mies; and respected by my allies. Riches and hon- ours, power and pleasure, have waited on my call, nor have I ever wished for the wealth of a nation, which is a stain to my felicity. In this situation, I have diligently numbered the days of pure and genuine happiness which have fallen to my lot: they amount to four-teen: —O man! place not thy confidence in this pres- ent world!"

The luxury of the caliphs, so useless to the private happiness, relaxed the nerves of domestic life, retarded the progress of the, Arabian empire. Temporal and spiritual conquest had been the sole occupation of the first successors of Mahomet; and after supplying themselves with the necessaries of life, the whole revenue was scrupulously devoted to the luxu- ries of the court. The Arabian emperors were overcome by the multitude of their wants and their contempt of economy. Instead of pursuing the great object of ambition, their leisure, their affections, the powers of their mind, were diverted by pomp and pleasure; the rewards of valour were emasculated by women and eunuchs, and the royal camp was encumbered by the luxury of the palace. A similar temper was diffused among the subjects of the caliph. Their stern enthusiasm was softened by time and prosperity; they sought riches in the occupations of industry, fame in the pursuits of literature; and happiness in the tranquility of domestic life. War was no longer the passion of the Saracens; and the increase of pay, the repetition of donations, were insufficient to allure the posterity of those voluntary champions who had crowded to the standard of Abbudaker and Omar for the hopes of spoil and of para- disis.

Under the reign of the Ommandes, the studies of the Moslems were confined to the introduction of the Koran among the Arabs. A.D. 754, &c.

---

The luxury of the caliphs, so useless to the private happiness, relaxed the nerves of domestic life, retarded the progress of the Arabian empire. Temporal and spiritual conquest had been the sole occupation of the first successors of Mahomet; and after supplying themselves with the necessaries of life, the whole revenue was scrupulously devoted to the luxuries of the court. The Arabian emperors were overcome by the multitude of their wants and their contempt of economy. Instead of pursuing the great object of ambition, their leisure, their affections, the powers of their mind, were diverted by pomp and pleasure; the rewards of valour were emasculated by women and eunuchs, and the royal camp was encumbered by the luxury of the palace. A similar temper was diffused among the subjects of the caliph. Their stern enthusiasm was softened by time and prosperity; they sought riches in the occupations of industry, fame in the pursuits of literature; and happiness in the tranquility of domestic life. War was no longer the passion of the Saracens; and the increase of pay, the repetition of donations, were insufficient to allure the posterity of those voluntary champions who had crowded to the standard of Abbudaker and Omar for the hopes of spoil and of paradise.

Under the reign of the Ommandes, the studies of the Moslems were confined to the introduction of the Koran among the Arabs. A.D. 754, &c.

---

The luxury of the caliphs, so useless to the private happiness, relaxed the nerves of domestic life, retarded the progress of the Arabian empire. Temporal and spiritual conquest had been the sole occupation of the first successors of Mahomet; and after supplying themselves with the necessaries of life, the whole revenue was scrupulously devoted to the luxuries of the court. The Arabian emperors were overcome by the multitude of their wants and their contempt of economy. Instead of pursuing the great object of ambition, their leisure, their affections, the powers of their mind, were diverted by pomp and pleasure; the rewards of valour were emasculated by women and eunuchs, and the royal camp was encumbered by the luxury of the palace. A similar temper was diffused among the subjects of the caliph. Their stern enthusiasm was softened by time and prosperity; they sought riches in the occupations of industry, fame in the pursuits of literature; and happiness in the tranquility of domestic life. War was no longer the passion of the Saracens; and the increase of pay, the repetition of donations, were insufficient to allure the posterity of those voluntary champions who had crowded to the standard of Abbudaker and Omar for the hopes of spoil and of paradise.

Under the reign of the Ommandes, the studies of the Moslems were confined to the introduction of the Koran among the Arabs. A.D. 754, &c.

---

The luxury of the caliphs, so useless to the private happiness, relaxed the nerves of domestic life, retarded the progress of the Arabian empire. Temporal and spiritual conquest had been the sole occupation of the first successors of Mahomet; and after supplying themselves with the necessaries of life, the whole revenue was scrupulously devoted to the luxuries of the court. The Arabian emperors were overcome by the multitude of their wants and their contempt of economy. Instead of pursuing the great object of ambition, their leisure, their affections, the powers of their mind, were diverted by pomp and pleasure; the rewards of valour were emasculated by women and eunuchs, and the royal camp was encumbered by the luxury of the palace. A similar temper was diffused among the subjects of the caliph. Their stern enthusiasm was softened by time and prosperity; they sought riches in the occupations of industry, fame in the pursuits of literature; and happiness in the tranquility of domestic life. War was no longer the passion of the Saracens; and the increase of pay, the repetition of donations, were insufficient to allure the posterity of those voluntary champions who had crowded to the standard of Abbudaker and Omar for the hopes of spoil and of paradise.
subjects of the Abbassides, awakening from this mental lethargy, found leisure and felt curiosity for the acquisition of profane science. This spirit was first encouraged by the caliph Almanbar, who, besides his knowledge of the Mahometan law, had applied himself with success to the study of astronomy. But when the sceptre devolved to Almanbar, the seventh of the Abbassides, he selected those of his grandfather, and invited the monks from their ancient seats. His ambassador at Constantinople, his agents in Armenia, Syria, and Egypt, collected the volumes of Grecian science; at his command they were translated by the most skilful interpreters into the Arabic language: his subjects were induced to adopt the new works; wealthy men and people of letters, with general and partial histories, which each revolving generation supplied with a new harvest of persons and events; with codes and commentaries of jurisprudence, which derived their authority from the law of the prophet; with the interpreters of the Koran, and orthodox tradition; and with the whole theological polynomials, mystics, scholastics, and moralists, the first or the last of writers, according to the different estimate of sceptics or believers. The works of speculation or science may be reduced to the four classes of philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, and physic. The first class, translated and written in the Arabic language, and some treatises, now lost in the original, have been recovered in the versions of the east, which possessed and studied the writings of Aristotle and Plato, of Euclid and Apollonius, of Ptolemy, Hippocrates, and Galen. Among the ideal systems, which have varied with the fashion of the times, the Abbassids adopted the philosophy of the Stagirite, alike intelligible or alike obscure for the readers of every age. Plato wrote for the Athenians, and his allegorical genius is too closely blended with the language and religion of Greece. After the fall of that religion, the peripatetics, emerging from their chryseity, prevailed in the controversies of the oriental sects, and their founder was long afterwards restored by the Mahometans of Spain to the Latin schools. The physics, both of the Academy and the Lyceum, as they are built, not on observation, but on argument, have been retarded by caliphs, whose grandfathers, whose predecessors, whose predecessors, were the more sage, the less vehement, the less retarding, and the more moderate, have been the more tardy, the more obstinate, the more impartial, or the more obstreperous, and the more combative of the metaphysics of infinite, or finite, spirit, have too often been enlisted in the service of superstition. But the human faculties are fortified by the art and practice of dialectics; the ten predicaments of Aristotle collect and methodize the dialectics, and compel the most ignorant to wield the nearest weapon of disputition. It was dexterously wielded in the schools of the Saracens, but as it is more effectual for the detection of error than for the investigation of truth, it is not surprising that new generations writers, and above seventy public libraries were opened in the cities of the Abassidian kingdom. The age of Arabian learning continued about five hundred years, till the great eruption of the Moguls, and was coeval with the darkest and most slothful period of European annals; but since the sun of science has arisen in the west, it should seem that the oriental studies have languished.

In the libraries of the Abbassids, as in those of Europe, the far greater part of the innumerable volumes were possessed of only local value or imaginary merit. The shelves were crowded with orators and poets, whose style was refined, their ideas were vulgar, and whose writings and their successor Mahomet assisted with pleasure and modesty at the assemblies and disputations of the learned. "He was not ignorant," says Abulpharagius, "that they are the elect of God, his best and most useful servants, whose lives are devoted to the improvement of their rational faculties. The mean ambition of the Chinese or the Turks may glory in the industry of their hands or the indulgence of their brutal appetites. Yet these dexterous artists most view, with hopeless emulation, the hexagons and pyramids of the cells of a bee-hive: these formidable heroes are the conquerors of Great Britain, and destroyed the tigers; and in their amorous enjoyment, they are much inferior to the vigour of the grossest and most sordid quadrupeds. The teachers of wisdom are the true luminaries and legislators of a world, which, without their aid, would again sink in ignorance and barbarism, and curiosity of Abbassids were imitated by succeeding princes of the line of Abbas: their rivals the Fatimides of Africa and the Omicides of Spain, were the patrons of the learned, as well as the commanders of the faithful: the same royal prerogative was claimed by their independent emirs of the provinces; and their emulation diffused the taste and the rewards of science from Samarcand and Bochara to Fez and Cordova. The vizir of a sultan consecrated a sum of two hundred thousand pieces of gold to the foundation of a college at Bagdad, which he endowed with an annual revenue of fifteen thousand dinars. This royal instruction was commenced, perhaps at different times, to six thousand disciples of every degree, from the son of the noble to that of the mechanic: a sufficient allowance was provided for the indigent scholars; and the merit or industry of the professors was repaid with adequate stipends. In every college of 7 or 8 colleges of the Abbassids, the productions were copied and collected by the curiosity of the studious and the vanity of the rich. A private doctor refused the invitation of the sultan of Bochara, because the carriage of his books would have required four hundred camels. The royal library of the Fatimides consisted of one hundred thousand manuscripts, elegantly transcribed and splendidly bound, which were lent, without jealousy or avarice, to the students of Cairo. Yet this collection must appear moderate, if we can believe that the Omicides of Spain had formed a library of such prodigious size, that the students in the schools were employed in the mere catalogue. Their capital Cordova, with the adjacent towns of Malaga, Almeria, and Murcia, had given birth to more than three hundred Garnier (Vie de Mahomet, tom. III, p. 294—403) has given an extract of the whorfs which are extant under his name.

1 See their curious architecture in Remanier, (Hist. des Insectes, tom. II, p. 59—296, particularly p. 271.) and Renaudot. (Hist. Patriarch, Alex. p. 574, 575, 527) besides the chronological remarks of Abulpharagius.

2 The Arabic catalogue of the Eusebii will give a just idea of the proportion of the classes. In the library of Cairo, the MSS. of astronomy and medical works amount to 600, of commentaries on the texts of brass, the other of silver. (Biblioth. Arab. Hist. tom. i. p. 317.)

3 The Arabic catalogue is of Euclid and Apollonius, which were printed from the Florence MSS. 1613. (Fabric. Bibl. i. p. 555.) Yet the fifth book had been previously restored by the mathematical division of Viviani. (See in Elgin in Fontenelle, tom. ii. p. 29.)

4 The merit of these Arabic versions is freely discussed by Renaudot. (Fabri. Biblioth. tom. ii. p. 103.) and Suidas. (Biblioth. tom. ii. p. 225—230.) by Caubet. (Biblioth. Arab. Hispana, tom. i. p. 239—250.) Most of the versions of Plato, Aristotle, Hippocrates, Galen, &c. are ascribed to the Abbassid Caliph Arsac. (Suidas. B. E. 687.) The works of most of the Greek historians were preserved in the text of the caliphs, and died A.D. 876. He was at the head of the education of school or monastery at Bagdad, and the copies or the manuscripts, and discipled were published under his name. See Abulpharagius, (Dynam. p. 88.) 113—174.) and apud Asseman. (Biblioth. Orient. tom. ii. p. 430.) Ephrem. (Bibl. Orient. tom. iii. p. 152.) Alamanus. (Bibl. Orient. tom. ii. p. 164.) and Caubet. (Bibl. Arab. Hispana, tom. i. p. 278.)

7 The most elegant commentary on the Categories or Predicaments of Aristotle may be found in the Philosophical Argomenta of Mr. James Harris, (London, 1774, in octavo) who laboured to revive the studies of Grecian literature and philosophy. of masters and disciples should still revive in the same circle of logical argument. The mathematicians are distinguished by a peculiar privilege, that, in the course of ages, they may always advance, and can never recede. But the ancient geometry, if I am not misinformed, was resumed in the same state by the Italians of the fifteenth century; and whatever may be the original mistake, the system of the Persians, which is ascribed to the Grecian Diophantus by the modest testimony of the Arabs themselves. They cultivated with more success the sublime science of astronomy, which elevates the mind of man to disdain his diminutive planet and momentary existence. The costly instruments, with which it was supplied by the time of the Emperor Almonam, and the land of the Chaldavans still afforded the same spacious level, the same unclouded horizon. In the plains of Sanaa, and a second time in those of Cufh, his mathematicians accurately measured a degree of the great circle of the earth, and determined at twenty-four thousand miles the entire circumference of the globe. From the reign of the Abbassides to that of the grand-children of Tamerlane, the stars, without the aid of glasses, were diligently observed; and the astronomical tables of Baghdad, Spain, and Samarqand, contain several errors, without endeavor to renounce the hypothesis of Polonny, without advancing a step towards the discovery of the solar system. In the eastern courts, the truths of science could be recommended only by ignorance and filly, and the astronomers would have been disregarded, had he not based his wisdom or honesty by the vain predictions of astrology. But in the science of medicine, the Arabs have been deservedly applauded. The names of Mesna and Geber, of Raziz and Avicenna, are ranked with the Grecian masters; in the city of Baghdad, eight hundred physicians were accustomed to exercise their lucrative profession. In Spain, the life of the catholic princes was intrusted to the skill of the Saracens, and the school of Salerno, their legitimate offspring, revived in Italy and Europe the precepts of the healing art. The success of each professed must have been influenced by personal and accidental causes; but we may form a less fanciful estimate of their general knowledge of anatomy, botany, and chemistry, the threefold basis of their theory and practice. A superstitious reverence for the dead confined both the Greeks and the Arabs to the dissection of apes and quadrupeds: the more solid and visible parts were known in the time of Galen, and the finer scrutiny of the human frame was reserved for the microscope and the injections of modern artists. Botany is an active science, and the Arabians, with much pleasure, Sir William Jones's Lays of the herbal of Dioscorides with two thousand plants. Some traditioad knowledge might be secured in the temples and monasteries of Egypt; much useful experience had been acquired in the practice of arts and manufactures; but the science of chemistry owes its origin in much less degree to the Arabs. They first invented and named the alembic for purposes of distillation, analyzed the substances of the three kingdoms of nature, tried the distinction and affinities of alcalis and acids, and converted the poisonous minerals into soft and salutary medicines. But the most eager search of Arabian chemistry was the transmutation of metals, and the elixir of immortal health: the reason and the fortunes of thousands were evaporated in the crucibles of alchemists, and the consummation of the great work was promised by the worthy aid of mystery, faith, and copious alms. But the Moslems deprived themselves of credit of the principal benefits of a familiar taste, and intercourse with Greece and Rome, the knowledge of antiquity, the purity of taste, and the freedom of thought. Confident in the riches of their native sciences, the Arabians despised the moderns and all foreign idiom. The Greek interpreters were chosen among their christian subjects; they formed their translations, sometimes on the original text, more frequently perhaps on a Syriac version; and in the crowd of their treatises, the sages of Alexandria, the heroes of Heliopolis and Livy were buried in oblivion; and the history of the world beforeMahomet was reduced to a short legend of the patriarchs, the prophets, and the Persian kings. Our education in the Greek and Latin schools may have been improved by a few oriental phrases. No, we are not forward to condemn the literature and judgment of nations, of whose language I am ignorant. Yet I know that the classics have much to teach, and I believe that the orientals have much to learn; the temperate dignity of style, the graceful proportions of art, the forms of visible and intellectual beauty, the just lineation of character and passion, the rhetoric of narrative, and argument, the regular fabric of epic and dramatic poetry. The influence of truth and reason is of a less ambiguous complexion. The philosophers of Athens and Rome enjoyed the blessings, and asserted the rights, of civil and religious freedom. Their moral and political writings might have gradually unlocked the fetters of eastern despotism, diffused a liberal spirit of inquiry and toleration, and encouraged the Arabic sages to suspect that their coloph was a tyrant, and their prophet an impostor. The instinct of superstition

---

Dr. Watson (Elements of Chemistry, vol. i. p. 17, Sec.) allows the difference of the colour of the sun. Yet, among the most modern and the most industrious of the famous Gobe of the ninth century, (D'Herbelot, p. 374.) that he had drawn most of his science, perhaps by the invention of metals, from the ancient sages. Whatever might be the origin of each, the art of chemistry has been known to have been in Egypt at least three hundred years before Mahomet, (Watson's Reflections, p. 143.) Paut, Recherches sur les EPythiennes et les Chinois, to. i. p. 276-279.) was alarmed by the introduction even of the abstract sciences; and the more rigid doctors of the law condemned the rash and pernicious curiosity of Almamon. 4 To the thirst of martyrdom, the vision of paradise, and the belief of predestination, we must ascribe the invincible enthusiasm of the prince and people. And the sword of the Saracens became less formidable, when they saw the Roman legions on the alert, when the army of the faithful presumed to read and reflect. Yet the foolish vanity of the Greeks was jealous of their studies, and reluctantly impared the sacred fire to the barbarians of the east. 5

In the bloody conflict of the Omnianides with the Romans, there was the opportunity of avenging their wrongs and enlarging their limits. But a severe retribution was exacted by Mohadi, the third caliph of the new dynasty, who seized, in his turn, the favourable opportunity, while a woman and a child, Irene and Constantine, were seated on the Byzantine throne. An army of ninety-five thousand Persians and Arabs was sent from the Tigris to the Thracian Bosphorus, under the command of Harun, 6 or Aaron, the second son of the commander of the faithful. His encampment on the opposite heights of Chrysopolis, or Scutari, informed the emperor of the construction of a bridge against the loss of his troops and provinces. With the consent or connivance of their sovereigns, his ministers subscribed an ignominious peace; and the exchange of some royal gifts could not disguise the annual tribute of seventy thousand dinars of gold, which was imposed on the Roman Empire. The Saracens had too rashly advanced into the midst of a distant and hostile land; their retreat was solicited by the promise of faithful guides and plentiful markets; and not a Greek had courage to whisper, that their weary forces might be surrounded and destroyed in their necessary passage between a slippery mountain and the river Sana-garius. Five years after this expedition, Harun ascended the throne of his father and his elder brother; the most powerful and vigorous monarch of his race, illustrious in the west, as the ally of Charlemagne, and familiar to the most childish readers, as the perpetual hero of the Arabian tales. His triumphs over the barbarians were adorned with luxury and science; but, in a reign of three and twenty years, Harun repeatedly visited his provinces from Chorasan to Egypt; nine times he performed the pilgrimage of Mecca; eight times he invaded the territories of the Romans; and as often as they declined the payment of the tribute, they were taught to feel that a month of depredation was more costly than a year of submission. But when the unnatural mother of Constantine was deposed and banished, her successor, Nicephorus, resolved to obliterate this badge of servitude and disgrace. The epistle of the heathen philosophers to the successor of the Arabian, join to the game of chess, which had already spread from Persia to Greece. "The queen (he spoke of Irene) considered you as a rook, and herself as a pawn. That pusilanimous female submitted to pay a tribute, the double of which she ought to have exacted from the barbarians. Restore therefore the fruits of your injustice, or abide the determination of the sword." At these words the ambassadors cast a bundle of swords before the foot of the throne. The caliph smiled at the menace, and drawing his scimitar, sananmredd, a weapon of historic or fabulous renown, he cut asunder the feeble arms of the Greeks, without turning the edge, to the astonishment of his blad, He then dictated an epistle of tremendous brvity: "In the name of the most merciful God, Harun at Rashid, commander of the faithful, to Nicephorus, the Roman dog. I have read thy letter, O thou son of an unbelieving mother. Thou shalt not hear, thou shalt behold, my reply." It was written in characters of blood and fire on the plains of Phrygia; and the warlike celerity of the Arabs could only be checked by the arts of deceit and the show of repentance. The triumphant caliph retired, after the fatigue of the campaign, to his favourite palace of Racca on the Euphrates; 8 but the distance of five hundred miles, and the inclemency of the season, encouraged his adversary to violate the peace. Nicephorus was astonished by the bold and rapid march of the commander of the faithful, who repassed in the depth of winter the snows of mount Taurus; his stratagems of policy and war were exploded against the impetuous government of the new marcher. When the news came to the people of Trapezund, it was like a wound from a field of battle overspread with forty thousand of his subjects. Yet the emperor was ashamed of submission, and the caliph was resolved on victory. One hundred and thirty-five thousand regular soldiers received pay, and were inscribed in the military roll; and above three hundred thousand persons of every denomination marched under the black standard of the Abbassides. They swept the surface of Asia Minor far beyond Tyana and Ankyra, and invested the Pontic Heraclea, once a flouris-hing state, now a pauper town; at that time capable of sustaining, to her antique walls, a month's siege against the forces of the east. The ruin was complete, the spoil was ample; but if Harun had been conversant with Grecian story, he would have regretted the statue of Hercules, whose attributes, the club, the bow, the quiver, and the lion's hide, were sculptured in massy gold. The caliph moved his camp to the line of the Aegean Sea. When he arrived on the island of Cyprus, compelled the emperor Nicephorus to retract his haughty defiance. In the new treaty, the ruins of Heraclea were left for ever as a lesson and a trophy; and the coin of the tribute was marked with the image and superscription of Harun. Let this small contribution remove the dishonour of the Roman name. After the death of their fathers, the heirs of the caliph were involved in civil discord, and the conqueror, the liberal Almamon, was sufficiently engaged in the restoration of domestic peace and the introduction of foreign science.

Under the reign of Almamon at Bagdad, Michael the Stammerer at Constantinople, the islands of Crete and The Arabs subdue the isle of Crete (p. 623.)

4 D'Herboult, Bibliotheca Orientalis, p. 516.

5 For the situation of Racca, the old Nicopolium, consult D'Anvers, (Jouvenel de Saint-Pont, p. 313.)

6 M. de Turennefort, in his coasting voyage from Constantinople to Trapezund, passed, on the 12th of October, 1653, before the capital of the present state, his reading collected the antiquities, of the city, (Voyage du Lomvi, tom. ii. lettre xvi. p. 23—25.) We have a separate history of Heraclea ad Phrygiam in a fragment of the same time, preserved by Photios.

7 The wars of Harun al Rashid against the Roman Empire are related by Theophanes, (p. 364, 355, 294, 296, 466.) Zonaras, (tom. i. xvi, p. 131—141.) DTC, (p. 67, 87.) Estyouchas, (Annal. com. 86.) Eusebius, (Hist. Sacra, tom. ii. p. 24.) and Chalcharis (Dynamis, p. 17, 153.) and Aboufelsa, (p. 155—166.)

8 The authors from antiquity to the present time, of the ancient and modern state of Crete, are Belon, (Observations, &c. c. 3 — 20.) Paris, (1553.) Tournefort, (Description des Iles de Crete et de Mauricie.) Crete, (in his works, tom. ii. p. 381—424.) Although Crete is styled by Homer, Laspyris, by Herodotus, Karkhara, by Strabo, it cannot conceivethat mountains island to survive, or even to equal, in fertility the greater part of Spain.
were subdued by the Arabs. The former of these conquests is disowned by their own writers, who were ignorant of the fame of Jupiter and Minos, but it has not been overlooked by the Byzantine historians, who have most a clear eye to the affair, and even their own times. 1 A band of Andalusian volunteers, discontented with the climate or government of Spain, explored the adventures of the sea; but as they sailed in no more than ten or twenty galleys, their warfare must be branded with the name of piracy. As the subjects and citizens of the unhappy people, they might lawfully invade the dominions of the black caliphs. A rehellious faction introduced them into Alexandria; 2 they cut in pieces both friends and foes, pillaged the churches and the mosques, sold above six thousand chrismatic captives, and maintained their station in the capital of Egypt till they were oppressed by the forces and the presence of Almamun himself. From the mouth of the Nile to the Hellespont, the islands and sea-coasts both of the Greeks and Moslems were exposed to their depredations; they saw, they envied, they hated, the fertility of Crete, and soon returned with forty galleys to a more serious attack. The Andalusians wandered over the land fearless and unmolested; but when they descended with their plunder to the sea-shore, their vessels were in flames, and their chief, Abu Cass, confessed himself the author of the mischief. The Algebraic, this famours nephew of the treachery "Of what do you complain" replied the wily emir. "I have brought you to a land flowing with milk and honey. Here is your true country: repose from your toils, and forget the barren place of your birth." And our wars and children. "Your benauteous captives will supply the place of your wives, and in their embraces you will soon become the fathers of a new progeny." The first habitation was their camp, with a ditch and rampart, in the bay of Sida; but an apostate monk led them to a more desirable position in the eastern parts; and the city of Candax, their fortress and colony, has been extended to the whole island, under the corrupt and modern appellation of Candia. The hundred cities of the age of Minos were diminished to thirty; and of these, only one, most probably Cydonia, had courage to remain the standard of freedom and the profession of Christianity. The Saracens of Crete soon repaired the loss of their navy: and the timbers of mount Ida were launched into the main. During a hostile period, of one hundred and thirty-eight years, the princes of Constantinople were in the latters of these licentious corsairs with fruitless curses and ineffectual arms.

and of Sicily. The loss of Sicily 3 was occasioned by A.D. 527—578. an act of superstitious rigour. An amorous youth, who had stolen a nun from her cloister, was sentenced by the emperor to the amputation of his tongue. Euphemius appealed to the reason and policy of the Saracens of Africa; and soon returned with the imperial purple, a fleet of one hundred ships, and an army of seven hundred horse and ten thousand foot. They landed at Mazara near the ruins of the ancient Selinus; but after some partial victories, Syracuse 4 was delivered by the Greeks, the apostate was slain before her walls, and his African friends were induced to the necessity of feeding on the flesh of their own horses. In their turn they were relieved by a powerful fleet, and the Saracens prepared to destroy the largest and western part of the island was gradually reduced, and the commodious harbour of Palermo was chosen for the seat of the naval and military power of the Saracens. Syracuse preserved about fifty years the faith which she had sworn to Christ and to Caesar. For the last and fatal siege, her citizens displayed the remnant of the spirit which had formerly resisted the powers of Athens and Carthage. They stood above twenty days against the battering-rams and catapultes, the mines and tortoises of the besiegers; and the place might have been relieved, if the barbarians of Carthage naval fleet had not been detained at Constantinople in building a church to the Virgin Mary. The deacon Theodosius, with the bishop and clergy, was dragged in chains from the altar to Palermo, cast into a subterraneous dungeon, and exposed to the hourly peril of death or captivity. His pathetic, and not unmerited complaint, may be read as the epistle of his country. 5 From the Roman conquest to this final calamity, Syracuse, now dwindled to the primitive isle of Ortigya, had insensibly declined. Yet the relics were still precious: the plate of the cathedral weighed five thousand pounds; the surrounding walls of the church, the walls of one at one million of pieces of gold, (about four hundred thousand pounds sterling,) and the captives must number the seventeen thousand christians, who were transported from the sack of Taorminum into African servitude. In Sicily, the religion and language of the Greeks were eradicated; and such was the docility of the rising generation, that fifteen thousand boys were circumcised and clothed on the same day with the son of the Fatimite caliph. The Arabian squadrons issued from the harbours of Palermo, Biscia, and Tunis; a hundred and fifty ships of Calabria and Caputhia were attacked and pillaged, nor could the suburbs of Rome be defended by the name of the Caesars and apostles. Had the Mahometans been united, Italy must have fallen an easy and glorious accession to the empire of the Prophet. But the caliphs of Bagdad had lost their former glory in their own dominions; and the Algibebs and Fatimites usurped the provinces of Africa; their emirs of Sicily aspired to independence; and the design of conquest and dominion was degraded to a repetition of predatory inroads. In the midst of prostrate Italy, the name of Rome awakens a solemn and mournful recollection. A fleet of Saracens from the African coast presumed to enter the mouth of the Tiber, and to approach a city which even yet, in her fallen state, was revered as the metropolis of the christian world. The gates and ramparts were guarded by a trembling people; but the tombs and temples of St. Peter and St. Paul were left exposed in the suburbs of the Vatican and of the Ostanian way. Their invincible sanctity had protected them against the Grecian and Latin Vandals; and the exactions of the Arabs disbandt both the gospel and the legend: and their rapacious spirit was approved and animated by the precepts of the Koran. The christian idols were stripped of their costly offerings; a silver altar was torn away from the shrine of St. Peter; and if the bodies or the buildings were left entire, their deliverance must be imputed to the haste, rather than the scruples, Voltaire himself has chosen. But I must gently reproach the poet and historian Constantine Phycrgenus, who, as a Greek subject of ancient republicanism, 6

1 The most authentic and circumstantial intelligence is obtained from the four books of the Continuation of Theophanes, compiled by the pen or command of Constantine Porphyrogennetus, who was the biographer of his master, Basil the Macedonian, (Scriptores rhetor. Theophan. p. 1—162,) a Franciscus, Combes, Paris, 1665.) The loss of Crete and Sicily is related, i. e. p. 49—52. To these we may add the second evidence of Joseph Genetii (Lap. p. 21, Vent.) 1722. Hiero Credimus. (Compend. 509—508) and John Scaligers Cretaeis, (Com. B. 847. No. 24.) But the modern Greek historians give their accounts of this period, and the only quarto published are, 560 & 578.) the title of the latter being The wreck of the Euphrates, and the Authenticity of the Genealogies of the houses of the Emperies. The extracts from the Arabic histories of Sicily are given in Muratori's Scriptores Rerum Italicorum. M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 263, 364.) has added some important facts. 6 The extracts from the Arabic histories of Sicily are given in Muratori's Scriptores Rerum Italicorum. M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 263, 364.) has added some important facts.
of the Saracens. In their course along the Appian way, they pillaged Fuudi and besieged Gayena; but they had turned aside from the walls of Rome, and, by their divisions, the capitol was saved from the yoke of the prophet of Meeco. The same danger still impended on the heads of the Roman people; and this danger was less gloriously decided in their favour by sudden tempest, which confounded the skill and courage of the stoutest mariners. The christians were sheltered in a friendly harbour, while the africans were scattered and dashed in pieces among the rocks and islands of a hostile shore. Those who escaped from the rock were naufraged, and thus found mercy at the hands of their implacable pursuers. The sword and the gibel did reduce the dangerous multitude of captives; and the remainder was more usefully employed, to restore the sacred edifices which they had attempted to subvert. The pontiff, at the head of the cittizens and allies, paid his grateful devotion at the shrines of the apostles; and, among the spoils of this naval victory, thirteen African bows of pure and massy silver were suspended round the altar of the fisherman of Galilee. The reign of Leo the fourth was employed in the defence and ornament of the Roman churches. In ten years, the walls and fabric were completed, and the ancient walls were repaired by the command of Leo; fifteen towers, in the most accessible stations, were built or renewed; two of these commanded on either side the river: and an iron chain was drawn across the stream to impede the ascent of a hostile navy. The emperor, of self-possession and generality, a circumstance highly desirable, was pleased to receive the welcome news, that the siege of Gayeta had been raised, and that a part of the enemy, with their sacrilegious plunder had perished in the waves.

But the storm which had been delayed, soon burst upon them with redoubled violence. The Agilulph, who reigned in Africa, had inherited from his father a treasure and an army: a fleet of Arabs and Moors, after a short refreshment in the harbours of Sardinia, cast anchor before the mouth of the Tyber, sixteen miles from the city; and their discipline and numbers appeared like the portents of the most adventurous design of conquest and dominion. But the vigilance of Leo had formed an alliance with the vassals of the Greek empire, the free and maritime states of Gayeta, Naples, and Amalfi; and in the hour of danger, their galleys appeared in the port of Ostia under the command of Cassarius the son of the nobleman of the pope, a noble and valiant youth, who had already vanquished the fleets of the Saracens. With his principal companions, Cassarius was invited to the Lateran palace, and the dexterous pontiff affected to inquire their design, and to accept with joy and surprise their providential appearance. They swore to their father of Ostia, where he reviewed and blessed his generous deliverers. They kissed his feet, received the communion with marial devotion, and listened to the prayer of Leo, that the same god who had supported St. Peter and St. Paul on the waves of the sea, would strengthen the hands of his champions against the adversaries of his holy name. After a similar prayer, and with equal resolution, the Moslems advanced to the attack of the christian galleys, which preserved their advantageous station along the coast. The victory induced to the side of the latter was less gloriously decided in their favor by sudden tempest, which confounded the skill and courage of the stoutest mariners. The christians were sheltered in a friendly harbour, while the africans were scattered and dashed in pieces among the rocks and islands of a hostile shore. Those who escaped from the rock were naufraged, and thus found mercy at the hands of their implacable pursuers. The sword and the gibel did reduce the dangerous multitude of captives; and the remainder was more usefully employed, to restore the sacred edifices which they had attempted to subvert. The pontiff, at the head of the cittizens and allies, paid his grateful devotion at the shrines of the apostles; and, among the spoils of this naval victory, thirteen African bows of pure and massy silver were suspended round the altar of the fisherman of Galilee. The reign of Leo the fourth was employed in the defence and ornament of the Roman churches. In ten years, the walls and fabric were completed, and the ancient walls were repaired by the command of Leo; fifteen towers, in the most accessible stations, were built or renewed; two of these commanded on either side the river: and an iron chain was drawn across the stream to impede the ascent of a hostile navy. The emperor, of self-possession and generality, a circumstance highly desirable, was pleased to receive the welcome news, that the siege of Gayeta had been raised, and that a part of the enemy, with their sacrilegious plunder had perished in the waves.

Victory and reign of Leo IV. A. D. 919.

The victory was celebrated in Africa, where a notable and an army: a fleet of Arabs and Moors, after a short refreshment in the harbours of Sardinia, cast anchor before the mouth of the Tyber, sixteen miles from the city; and their discipline and numbers appeared like the portents of the most adventurous design of conquest and dominion. But the vigilance of Leo had formed an alliance with the vassals of the Greek empire, the free and maritime states of Gayeta, Naples, and Amalfi; and in the hour of danger, their galleys appeared in the port of Ostia under the command of Cassarius the son of the nobleman of the pope, a noble and valiant youth, who had already vanquished the fleets of the Saracens. With his principal companions, Cassarius was invited to the Lateran palace, and the dexterous pontiff affected to inquire their design, and to accept with joy and surprise their providential appearance. They swore to their father of Ostia, where he reviewed and blessed his generous deliverers. They kissed his feet, received the communion with marial devotion, and listened to the prayer of Leo, that the same god who had supported St. Peter and St. Paul on the waves of the sea.
The emperor Theophilus, son of Michael the Stammerer, was one of the most active and high-spirited princes who reigned at Constantinople during the middle age. In offensive or defensive war, he marched in person five times against the Saracens, and was known as an invincible in his losses and defeats. In the last of these expeditions he penetrated into Syria, and besieged the obscure town of Solzetra; the casual birth-place of the ca- kib were balanced by the efforts of the Saracen, for peace or war by the most favourite of his wives and concubines. The revolt of a Persian imposer employed at that moment the arms of the Saracen, and he could only intercede in favour of a place for which he felt, and acknowledged some degree of filial affection. These solicitations demurned the emperor to wound his pride in so sensible a part. Solzetra was levelled with the ground, the Syrian prisoners were marked or mutilated with ignominious cruelty, and a thousand female captives were forced away from the adjacent territory. Among these a matron of the house of Ishak was involv'd in an agony of despair; the negociator Motassem; and the insults of the Greeks engaged the honour of her kinsman to avenge his indignity, and to answer her appeal. Under the reign of the two elder brothers, the inheritance of the youngest had been confined to Anatolia, Armenia, Georgia, and Circassia: this was the cause of the enmity of Abulpharag's son, and among his accidental claims to the name of Octo- mury, the most meritorious are the eight battles which he gained or fought against the enemies of the Koran. In this personal quarrel, the troops of Irak, Syria, and Egypt, were disunited by the intrigues of Abulpharag and the Turkish horsemen; his military might be greater, though we should deduct some myriads from the hundred and thirty thousand horses of the royal stables; and the expense of the armament was computed at four million sterlings, or one hundred thousand pounds of gold. From this time the place of assembly, the Saracens advanced in three divisions along the high road of Constantinople: Motassem himself commanded the centre, and the vanguard was given to his son Abbas, who, in the trial of the first adventures, might succeed with the more glory, or fall with the least reproach of his house. He was prepared to retaliate a similar affront. The father of Theophilus was a native of Amurio; in Phrygia: the original seat of the imperial house had been adorned with privileges and monuments; and whatever might be the indifference of the people, Constantinople itself was more honourable in solitude than in the possession of the reign and his court. The name of Amurio was inscribed on the shields of the Saracens; and their three armies were again united under the walls of the devoted city. It had been proposed by the wisest counsellors, to evacuate Amurio, to remove the inhabitants, and to abandon the empty structures to the vain resentment of the barbarians. The emperor embraced the more generous resolution of defending, in a siege and battle, the country of his ancestors. When the armies drew near, the front of the Mahometan line appeared as if it was composed of the large trees, and of the spears and javelins; but the event of the action was not glorious on either side to the national troops. The Arabs were broken, but it was by the swords of thirty thousand Persians, who had obtained service and settlement in the Byzantine empire. The Greeks were repulsed and vanquished, but it was by the arrows of the Turkish cavalry; and had not their bow-strings been damp and relaxed by the evening rain, very few of the christians could have escaped with the emperor from the field of battle. They breathed at Dorylaea, at the distance of three days; and Theophilus, with his trembling squadrons, forgave the common flight both of the prince and people. After this discovery of his weakness, he vainly hoped to deprive the fate of Amurio: the in-exorable caliph rejected with contumacy his prayers and promises; and indeed those who excelled the natal day of his great revenge. They nearly had been the witnesses of his shame. The vigorous assaults of fifty-five days were encountered by a faithful garrison, a veteran garrison, and a desperate people; and the Saracens must have raised the siege, if a domestic traitor had not pointed to the weakest part of the place, which was decorated with the statues of a lion and a bull. The vow of Motassem was accomplished with unrelenting vigour: tired, rather than satiated, with destruction, he returned to his new palace of Samar, in the neighbourhood of Bagdad, while the unhappy Bedouins were made to drink the bitter cup of the useful aid of his western rival the emperor of the Franks. Yet in the siege of Amurio above seventy thousand Moslems had perished: their loss had been revered by the slaughter of thirty thousand christians, and the sufferings of an equal number of captives, who were treated with the utmost severity; but the necessity could sometimes extinguish the exchange or ransom of prisoners; but in the national and religious conflict of the two empires, peace was without confidence, and war without mercy. Quarter was seldom given in the field, and the capture of a thousand slaves by the sword were condemned to hopeless servitude, or exquisite torture; and a catholic emperor relates, with visible satisfaction, the execution of the Saracens of Crete, who were flayed alive, or plunged into caldrons of boiling oil. To a point of honour Motassem had sacrificed a florishing city, two hundred thousand lives, and the property of millions. The same caliph descended from his horse, and dieted his robe, to relieve the distress of a decrepit old man, who, with his laden ass, had tumbled into a ditch. On which of these actions did he reflect with the most pleasure, when he was summoned by the prophet of the caliph to decide the fate of the Abundance, and the Turkish guards, A. D. 914—956.

With Motassem, the eighth of the Abbassides, the glory of his family and empire expired. When the Arabian con- querors had spread themselves over the east, and were mingled with the servile crowds of Persia, Syria, and Egypt, they were no more able to maintain their throne, or to arrogate the virtues of the desert. The courage of the south is the artificial fruit of discipline and prejudice; the active power of enthusiasm had decayed, and the mercenary forces of the caliphs were recruited in those climates of the north, of which valour is the hardly and spontaneous production. Of the Turks, who dwell beyond

1 In the east he was styled Amurioi (Continuator Theophras. 1, 1. 439). Some scholars think that the ignorance of the west, of the Avars, of their portraits, of public discourses, might equally narrate, of victors, at least adverse externa bellandi gentes celius fuerat ascesseret. (Ahmad, De Proconsulis.)

2 Abdulfathr (Inazmat, p. 167, 165.) relates one of these singular transactions on the bridge of the river Lamius in Cilicia, the limit of the two empires, and one day's journey westward of Tarsus. (D'An-ville, Geographie Ancienne, tom. ii. p. 31.) Four thousand two hundred and sixty Moslems, eight hundred women and children, one hundred and forty, were exchanged for an equal number of Greeks. In the course of a year the Turks in the middle of Asia, when they reached their respective friends, they shouted Alla, Allah, and Kyrie Eleison. They were the favourite princes of a nation, who were accustomed to favour them, but in the same year, (A. H. 223.) the most illustrious of them, the forty-two martyrs, were beheaded by the caliph's order. (See a letter to Dr. Burnet.) These Saracens were indeed treated with peculiar severity as pirates and enemies of religion. (D. 166.)

4 M. de Guignes, who sometimes leaps, and sometimes stumble

The Amorian war between Théophylact and Motassém. A. D. 933.
the Oxus and Jaxartes, the robust youths, either taken in war, or purchased in trade, were educated in the exercises of the field, and the profession of the Mahometan faith. The Turkish guards stood in arms round the receptacle of retire from Bagdad, all three placed in their own residence and the camp of his barbarian favourites at Samara on the Tigris, about twelve leagues above the city of Peace. His son Motawakkel was a jealous and cruel tyrant: odious to his subjects, he cut himself on the fidelity of the strangers, and these strangers, ambitious and apprehensive, were tempted by the rich promise of a revolution. At the instigation, or at least in the cause of his son, they burst into his apartment at the hour of supper, and the caliph was cut into seven pieces by the same swords which he had recently distributed among the guards of his life and throne. To this throne, yet streaming with a father’s blood, Mostanser was triumphantly led; but in a reign of six months, he found only the pangs of a guilty conscience. If he wept at the sight of an old tapestry which represented the crime and punishment of the son of Chosroes; if his days were abridged by grief at the dismemberment of a traitor, he excused the act of homicide, who explained in the bitterness of death, that he had lost both this world and the world to come. After this act of treason, the ensigns of royalty, the garment and walking-staff of Mahomet, were given and torn away by the foreign mercenaries, who in four years’ residence, were seduced and murdered by the invaders of the faithful. As often as the Turks were inflamed by fear, or rage, or avarice, these caliphs were dragged by the feet, exposed naked to the scorching sun, beaten with iron clubs, and compelled to purchase by the abdication of their dignity, a short reprieve of inevitable fate. At length, however, the fury of the tempest was spent or diverted: the Abbassides returned to the less turbulent residence of Bagdad; the insolence of the Turks was curbed with a firmer and more skilful hand, and their numbers were divided and destroyed in foreign warfare. But the nations of the east had learned, by the hard experience of the Mahometan prophet; and the blessings of domestic peace were obtained by the relaxation of strength and discipline. So uniform are the mischiefs of military despotism, that I seem to repeat the story of the praetorians of Rome.

While the flame of enthusiasm was damped by the business, the pleasure, and the knowledge of the age, it burnt with concentrated heat in the breasts of the chosen few, the congenial spirits who were ambitious of reigning either in this world or in the next. How carefully the book of prophecy had been studied by the apostle of Mecca, the wishes, and (if we may pronounce the word) even the reason, of fanaticism, might believe that, after the successive missions of Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mahomet, the same God, in the fulness of time, would reveal a still more perfect form of his dispensation to the first in the seventh year of the Hegira, and in the neighbourhood of Cufa, an Arabian preacher, of the name of Carmath, assumed the lofty and incomprehensible style of the guide, the director, the demonstration, the word, the holy ghost, the camel, the herald of the Messiah, who would be conversed with him in a human shape, and represented the representative of Mohammed the son of Ali, of St John the Baptist, and of the angel Gabriel. In his mystic volume, the precepts of the Koran were to be refined to a more spiritual sense: he relaxed the duties of abstinence, fasting, and pilgrimage; allowed the indiscriminate use of wine and forbidden food; and nourished the fervour of his disciples by the daily repetition of fifty prayers. The idli-ness and ferment of the rustic crowd awakened the attention of the magistrates of Cufa; a timid persecution assisted the progress of the new sect; and the name of the prophet became more revered after he had been torn in pieces from the breast of the holder of the apostles dispersed themselves among the Bedouweens, “a race of men,” says Abulfeda, “equally devoid of reason and of religion;” and the success of their preaching seemed to threaten Arabia with a new revolution. The Carmathians were ripe for revolution, since they abhorred the worldly pomp of the caliphs of Bagdad. They were susceptible of discipline, since they vowed a blind and absolute submission to their imam, who was called to the prophetic office by the voice of God and the people. Instead of the legal tithes, he claimed the fifth of their substance and spoil; the most flagitious sins were no more than the type of disobedience; and the brethren were united and concealed by an oath of secrecy. After a bloody conflict, they prevailed in the province of Bahrain, the island along the Persian gulf: far and wide, the tribes of the desert were subject to the sceptor, or rather to the sword, of Abu Said and his son Abu Taher; and these rebellious imams could muster in the field a hundred and seven thousand fanatics. The mercenaries of the caliph were dismayed at the approach of an enemy who neither asked nor accepted quarter; and the Turks, after the first taste of blood and patience, is expressive of the change which three centuries of prosperity had affected in the character of the Arabs. Such troops were disconcerted in every action; the cities of Raccia and Basboc, of Cufa and Bassora, were taken and pillaged; Bagdad was filled with consternation; and the caliph trembled behind the veil of his palace. In a daring inroad beyond the Tigris, Abu Taher advanced to the gates of the capital with no more than five hundred horse. By the special order of Moetader, the bridges had been broken down, and the person or head of the rebel was expected every hour by the commander of the faithful. His lieutenant, from a motive of fear or pity, apprized Abu Taher of his danger, and recommended a speedy escape. “Your master,” said the interdict Carmathian to the messenger, “is at the head of thirty thousand soldiers: three such men as these are wanting in his host;” at the same instant, turning to three of his companions, he commanded the first to plunge a dagger into his breast, the second to leap into the Tigris, and the third to cast himself headlong down a precipice. They obeyed without murmur. “Relate,” continued the imam, “what you have seen: before the evening hour your general shall see the head of this dog.” Before the evening, the camp was surprised, and the menace was executed. The rapine of the Carmathians was sanctified by their aversion to the worship of Mecca: they robbed a caravan of pilgrims, and twenty thousand devout Moslems were abandoned on the burning sands to a death of hunger and thirst.
Another year they suffered the pilgrims to proceed without interruption; but in the festival of devotion, Abu Taher stormed the holy city, and rampaged on the most sacred places. It was a day of savage faith. Thousands of citizens and strangers were put to the sword; the sacred precincts were polluted by the burial of three thousand dead bodies; the well of Zamzam overflowed with blood; the golden spout was forced from his place; the vault of the Caaba was divested among theseorious sectaries; and the black stone, the first monument of the nation, was borne away in triumph to their capital. After this deed of sacrilege and cruelty, they continued to invest the confines of Irak, Syria, and Egypt; but the vital principle of enthusiasm had withered away. Their ravages, or their aversion, again opened the pilgrimage of Mecca, and restored the black stone of the Caaba; and it is needless to inquire into what factions they were broken, or by whose swords they were finally extirpated. The sect of the Carmathians may be considered as the second vital cause of the decline and fall of the empire of the caliphs.

The third and most obvious cause was the weight and magnitude of the empire itself. The caliph Almamon might have ruled the east and the west, and managed a chess-board of two feet square; but I suspect that in both those games he was guilty of many fatal mistakes; and I perceive, that in the distant provinces the authority of the first and most powerful of the Abbasides was already impaired. It was the doctrine of despotism invested the representative with the full majesty of the prince; the division and balance of powers might relax the habits of obedience, might encourage the passive subject to inquire into the origin and administration of civil government. He who is born in the purple is seldom wont to reign; but the elevation of the private man to the capacity of a peasant perhaps; or a slave, affords a strong presumption of his courage and capacity. The viceroy of a remote kingdom aspires to secure the property and inheritance of his precarious trust; the nations must rejoice in the presence of their sovereign; and the command of armies and treasures are at once the object and the instrument of his ambition. A change was scarcely visible as long as the lieutenants of the caliph were content with their vicarious title; while they solicited for themselves or their sons a renewal of the authority and gift of all manners. But when the tenor of the public prayers, the name and prerogative of the commander of the faithful. But in the long and hereditary exercise of power, they assumed the pride and attributes of royalty; the alternative of peace or war, of reward or punishment, depended solely on their will; and the revenues of the government were reserved for local services or private magnificence. Instead of a regular supply of men and money, the successors of the prophet were flattered with the extensiveness gift of an elephant, or a cast of hawks, a suit of silk hangings, or some pounds of musk and amber. The vastness the revolt again, from the dynastic temporal and spiritual supremacy of the Abbasides, the first symptoms of disorganization broke forth in the province of Africa. Ibrahim, the son of Aglab, the lieutenants of the vigilant and rigid Harun.

— 1 For the sect of the Carmathians, consult Elmakin, (Hist. Sarac. p. 210, 254, 259, 281, 284, 241, 244, 245) Aboul-Harries, (D'Outre, p. 174, 176, 178, 179, 181, 184, 187, 188, 189) and D'Herbeth (Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 253—264.) I find some mention of them; but the elbow of private men, in which it would not be easy to find so much importance to recognize.

— 2 Hyde, or Syntagm. damat. tom. ii p. 27 in Hist, Shafiildi.

— 3 The dynasties of the Arabian empire may be ascertained in the Annals of Elmakin, Aboul-Harries, and Aboul-Maoula, under the proper reigns of the Edrisites, and of their successors, without the proper names. The M'Guious of M. de Guignes, (Hist. des Hosp. tom. i. p. 61—93) and M. d'Herbelot, (Dictionnaire Universel, tom. v. p. 364) and D'Herbeth. (Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 253—263.) I find some mention of them; but the elbow of private men, in which it would not be easy to find so much importance to recognize.

— 4 Hyde, or Syntagm. damat. tom. ii p. 27 in Hist, Shafiildi.

— 5 The dynasties of the Arabian empire may be ascertained in the Annals of Elmakin, Aboul-Harries, and Aboul-Maoula, under the proper reigns of the Edrisites, and of their successors, without the proper names. The M'Guious of M. de Guignes, (Hist. des Hosp. tom. i. p. 61—93) and M. d'Herbelot, (Dictionnaire Universel, tom. v. p. 364) and D'Herbeth. (Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 253—263.) I find some mention of them; but the elbow of private men, in which it would not be easy to find so much importance to recognize.
potent dynasties confessed, either in words or actions, the vanity of ambition. The first on his death-bed implored the mercy of God to a sinner, ignorant of the limits of his own power: the second, in the midst of four hundred burnings, promised to sacrifice the Bosphorus ship by ship, concealed from every human eye the chamber where he attempted to sleep. Their sons were educated in the vices of kings; and both Egypt and Syria were recovered and possessed by the Abbasides during an interval of thirty years. In the decline of their empire, Mesopotamia, with the important cities of Basor and Mosul, and Aleppo, was occupied by the Arabian princes of the tribe of Hamadan. The poets of their court could repeat, without a blush, that nature had formed their countrypenances for beauty, their tongues for eloquence, and their hands for liberality and valour: but the genial tale of the elevation and reign of the Hamadaneses, exhibits a scene of treachery, murder, and patricide. At the same fatal period, the Persian kingdom was again usurped by the dynasty of the Bowides, A.D. 922-953. The Bowides, A.D. 922-953, by the sword of three brothers, who, under various names, were styled the expert and columns of the state, and who, from the Caspian sea to the ocean, would suffer no tyrants but themselves. Under their reign, the language and genius of Persia revived, and the Arabs, three hundred and four years after the death of Mahomet, were deprived of the sacred edict.

Fallen state of the caliphate of Bagdad, A.D. 956, &c.

Rahid, the twentieth of the Abbasides, and the thirty-ninth of the successors of Mahomet, was the last who deserved the title of commander of the faithful;* the last (says Aludes) to hold authority of the Abbasides; and the monarch of the Nile insolled the humble pontiff on the banks of the Tigris.

In the declining age of the caliphs, in the enterprises of the Greeks, A.D. 960-963...
The decline and fall

Chap. XII.

The eastern conquests of Nicaeum. The fourth in lineal descent of Phocas. Basilic race, his widow Theophanes, his successor, successively married Nicophorus A.D. 583-593. Phocas and his assassin John Zimisces, the two heroes of the age. They reigned as the guardians of the inheritance of their infant sons; and the twelve years of their military command form the most splendid period of the Byzantine annals. The subjects and confederates, whom they led to war, appeared, at least in the eyes of an enemy, two hundred thousand strong; and of these about thirty thousand were armed with equestrians, a train of four thousand horses attended their march; and their evening camp was regularly fortified with an enclosure of iron spikes. A series of bloody and undecided combats is nothing more than an anticipation of what would have been effected in a field where the energy of nature shall brook no equivalent; and they proceeded to execute the conquests of the two emperors from the hills of Cappadocia to the desert of Bagdad.

The Conquest of Cilicia. Cilicia, first exercised the skill and perseverance of their troops, on whom, at this moment, I shall not hesitate to bestow the name of Romans. In the double city of Mopsuestia and Tarsus, in the province of Cilicia. These places had fallen to the power of the Saracens, but the Romans had recovered them. In these cities, the ruins of former greatness still remains; the houses of every size and description; the towers of the great heroes, of which are left but few; and the temple of Minerva, a great temple, with the image of Minerva seated on the top of the temple. The ancient city was not completely destroyed, though the Saracens were not entirely expelled by the Romans. The Saracens had a large body of mercenary forces; and the Roman army was not sufficiently large to expel them; but the Saracens were not able to resist the Romans for a long time. The Roman army was victorious, and the city of Mopsuestia was recovered by the Romans.

The Conquest of Syria. After they had formed the narrow passes of Mount Idaus, the two Roman princes repeatedly carried their arms into the heart of Syria. Yet, instead of assaulting the walls of Antioch, the humanity or superstition of Nicophorus appeared to respect the ancient metropolis of the east; he contented himself with drawing round the city a line of circumvallation; left a stationary army; and instructed his lieutenant to expect, without impatience, the return of spring. But in the depth of winter, in a dark and rainy night, an adventurous subaltern, with three hundred soldiers, approached the rampart, applied his scaling-ladders, occupied two adjacent towers, and stood firstrate. The Saracen general, on the other hand, bravely maintained his post till he was relieved by the tardy, though effectual, support of his reluctant chief. The first tumult of slaughter and rapine. Recovery of Antioch. After the death of the younger Roque- questas of Nicaeum, the fourth in lineal descent of Phocas. The Basilic race, his widow Theophanes, his successor, successively married Nicophorus A.D. 583-593. Phocas and his assassin John Zimisces, the two heroes of the age. They reigned as the guardians of the inheritance of their infant sons; and the twelve years of their military command form the most splendid period of the Byzantine annals. The subjects and confederates, whom they led to war, appeared, at least in the eyes of an enemy, two hundred thousand strong; and of these about thirty thousand were armed with equestrians, a train of four thousand horses attended their march; and their evening camp was regularly fortified with an enclosure of iron spikes. A series of bloody and undecided combats is nothing more than an anticipation of what would have been effected in a field where the energy of nature shall brook no equivalent; and they proceeded to execute the conquests of the two emperors from the hills of Cappadocia to the desert of Bagdad.

The Conquest of Cilicia. Cilicia, first exercised the skill and perseverance of their troops, on whom, at this moment, I shall not hesitate to bestow the name of Romans. In the double city of Mopsuestia and Tarsus, in the province of Cilicia. These places had fallen to the power of the Saracens, but the Romans had recovered them. In these cities, the ruins of former greatness still remains; the houses of every size and description; the towers of the great heroes, of which are left but few; and the temple of Minerva, a great temple, with the image of Minerva seated on the top of the temple. The ancient city was not completely destroyed, though the Saracens were not entirely expelled by the Romans. The Saracens had a large body of mercenary forces; and the Roman army was not sufficiently large to expel them; but the Saracens were not able to resist the Romans for a long time. The Roman army was victorious, and the city of Mopsuestia was recovered by the Romans.

The Conquest of Syria. After they had formed the narrow passes of Mount Idaus, the two Roman princes repeatedly carried their arms into the heart of Syria. Yet, instead of assaulting the walls of Antioch, the humanity or superstition of Nicophorus appeared to respect the ancient metropolis of the east; he contented himself with drawing round the city a line of circumvallation; left a stationary army; and instructed his lieutenant to expect, without impatience, the return of spring. But in the depth of winter, in a dark and rainy night, an adventurous subaltern, with three hundred soldiers, approached the rampart, applied his scaling-ladders, occupied two adjacent towers, and stood firstrate. The Saracen general, on the other hand, bravely maintained his post till he was relieved by the tardy, though effectual, support of his reluctant chief. The first tumult of slaughter and rapine. Recovery of Antioch.
revenues, and his provinces, had been torn from his hands, and that he was ready to abdicate a dignity which he was unable to support. The emir was inexcusable; the furniture of the palace was sold; and the paltry price of forty thousand pieces of gold was instantly consumed in private luxury. But the apprehensions of Bagdad were evaded by the retreat to the Greeks; thirdly, hunger guarded the desert of Mesopotamia; and the emperor, satisfying with glory, and laden with oriental spoils, returned to Constantinople, and displayed, in his triumph, the silk, the aromatics, and three hundred myriads of gold and silver. Yet the powers of the east had been bent, not broken, by this transient hurricane. After the departure of the Greeks, the captive princes returned to their capitals; the subjects disclaimed their involuntary oaths of allegiance; the Moslems again purified their temples, and overturned the idols of the saints and martyrs; the Nestorians and Jacobites proceeded a Saracen to an orthodox master; and the numbers and spirit of the Melchites were inadequate to the support of the church and state. Of these extensive conquests, Antioch, with the cities of Cilicia and the isle of Cyprus, was alone restored, a permanent and useful accession to the Roman empire.\(^6\)

\(^6\) See the Annals of Rinacin, Abelphaneus, and Ambrosilla, from A. H. 384, to A. H. 384, and the reigns of Nicolas Phocas and John Zimic, in the Chronicles of Zonaras, (tom. ii. i. v. 199, ii. x. 315, and Cedrenus, (Compil. iv. 694—698). Their manifold defects are partly supplied by the MS. history of Leo the despot, which Pasche obtained from the Benedictionals, and has inserted almost entire in Latin version. Citius, toms. ii. p. 199, to p. 270.

In the first of these works he minutely describes the pompous ceremonies of the emperor, and the church and palace of Constantinople, according to his own practice and that of his predecessors.\(^6\)

In the second, he attempts an accurate survey of the political system of the Greeks; they were then denominated, both of Europe and Asia.\(^6\) The system of Roman tactics, the discipline and order of the troops, and the military operations by land and sea, are explained in the third of these didactic collections, which may be ascribed to Constantine or his father Leo.\(^6\)

\(^6\) See the Annals of Rinacin, Abelphaneus, and Ambrosilla, from A. H. 384, to A. H. 384, and the reigns of Nicolas Phocas and John Zimic, in the Chronicles of Zonaras, (tom. ii. i. v. 199, ii. x. 315, and Cedrenus, (Compil. iv. 694—698). Their manifold defects are partly supplied by the MS. history of Leo the despot, which Pasche obtained from the Benedictionals, and has inserted almost entire in Latin version. Citius, toms. ii. p. 199, to p. 270.

\(^6\) The epitaph of Hagia Sophia, Porphyrogenitus, born in the purple, is eloquently defended.

\(^6\) Arcus privatus nec fortuna Penaeus.

\(^6\) Etiam sum incoerens, Cognata potestas

\(^6\) Avec, but it was published in a splendid edition by Lebouc and Reissik, (A. D. 1713, in folio) with such lavish praise as editors never fail to bestow on the worthy or worthless productions of their countrymen.

\(^6\) See, in the first volume of Banduri's Imperium Orientale, Constantinopolis, (Venetii, 1745), page 45—127, edit. Veneti. The title of the old edition of Mevius is corrected in a MS. of the royal library of Paris, which Isaac Casaubon bought in 1607. Leibniz notes the same MS. and the same MS. is illustrated by two maps of William Delisle, the prince of geographers, till the appearance of the greater D'Arville.

\(^6\) See the first volume of Banduri's Imperium Orientale, Constantinopolis, (Venetii, 1745), page 45—127, edit. Veneti. The title of the old edition of Mevius is corrected in a MS. of the royal library of Paris, which Isaac Casaubon bought in 1607. Leibniz notes the same MS. and the same MS. is illustrated by two maps of William Delisle, the prince of geographers, till the appearance of the greater D'Arville.

\(^6\) The Tactica of Leo and Constantinopolis are published with the aid of some new MSS. in the great edition of the works of Mevius, by the learned John Loon, which was printed at Leyden, 1611—1617. Florence, 1745.) yet the text is still corrupt and mutilated, the version is still obscure and ridiculous. The Tactica of the emperor Leibniz would afford some valuable materials to a new editor. (Fabric. Biblic. Græc. tom. i. p. 323, 374.)

\(^6\) On the subject of the Basileia, Fabricianus, (Biblic. Græc. tom. xii. p. 425—514.) and Heineccius, (Hist. Juris Romani, p. 396—520.) and Giannone, (De Caro Civilis de Napioli, tom. i. p. 420—483.) as valuable historians, may be usefully consulted. Forty-one books of this Greek code have been published, with a Latin version, by Charles Anselm Fabricius, (Paris, 1678.) in seven volumes in folio; four other books have since been discovered, and are inserted in Gerard Meursius, (Novus Thesaurus Juris Civ. et Canon, tom. v. of the whole work, the sixty books, John Lancelinus has printed (Basil, 1753,) an evocation of synopses. The hundred and two hundred novels, or new laws, of Leo, may be found in the Corpus Juris Civilis.

\(^6\) I have used the last and best edition of the Geoponikos, by Nicholas, Nicius, Lipsius, published in octavo, 1702. But the same emperor restored the lost concordats of systematics and philosophy, and his two books of Hippocrate, or Horse-physic, were published at Paris, 1533, in folio, (Fabric. Biblic. Græc. tom. vi. p. 933—980.)

\(^6\) Of these fifty-three books, or titles, only two have been preserved and printed, de Logiçonos, (by Pulvinus Ursinus, Antwerp, 1682.) and Daniel Heerschelius, (Venetii, 1683.) and de Virtibus et Vitiis, (by Henry Valesius, de Valois, Paris, 1616.)

\(^6\) The life and works of the Emperor Constantine are described by Hankius, (Scriptoribus Byzantii, p. 84—100.) This biographer of the saints indulged himself in a loose paraphrase of the sense of his subjects, His Geography of Byzantium is still preserved, in a Latin version, and so scarce a text as may be now available of the greatest importance in the literature of that empire.

\(^6\) According to the first book of the Cyropedia, pre-fathers of tactics, a small part of the science of war, were already inculcated in Persia, by which Greeks, (1241—1417. Florence, 1745.) the art is still corrupt and mutilated, the version is still obscure and ridiculous. The Tactica of the emperor Leibniz would afford some valuable materials to a new editor. (Fabric. Biblic. Græc. tom. i. p. 323, 374.)

\(^6\) According to the first book of the Cyropedia, pre-fathers of tactics, a small part of the science of war, were already inculcated in Persia, by which Greeks, (1241—1417. Florence, 1745.) the art is still corrupt and mutilated, the version is still obscure and ridiculous. The Tactica of the emperor Leibniz would afford some valuable materials to a new editor. (Fabric. Biblic. Græc. tom. i. p. 323, 374.)

\(^6\) Quinque libris in Graecis est.
the baser alloy of the age in which they lived. It was destitute of original genius; they implicitly transcribe the ancient maxims which had been confirmed by victories. It was unskilled in the propriety of style and method; they blindly confound the most distant and discordant institutions, the phalanx of Sparta and that of Macedon, the legions of Cato and Tiran, of Augustus and of Constantine, of Greece and of Crete, of the East and of the West. The imprecision of these military rudiments may be fairly questioned: their general theory is dictated by reason; but the merit, as well as difficulty, consists in the application. The discipline of a soldier is formed by exercise rather than by study: the talents of a commander are indispensable to their effect. Though rapid minds, which nature produces to decide the fate of armies and nations: the former is the habit of a life, the latter the glance of a moment; and the battles won by lessons of tactics may be numbered with the epic peaks erected from the bases of criticism. The book of ceremonies is a recital, tedious yet imperfect, of the despicable pageantry which had infected the church and state since the gradual decay of the purity of the one and the power of the other. A review of the themes or provinces, might promise such authentic and useful a history as the curious notes of a government that may obtain, instead of traditionary fables on the origin of the cities, and malicious epigrams on the vices of their inhabitants. Such information the historian would have been pleased to record; nor should his silence be condemned if the most interesting objects, the population of the capital and provinces, the amount of the taxes and revenues, the numbers of subjects and strangers who served under the imperial standard, have been unnoticed by Leo the philosopher, and his son Constantine. His treatise of the public administration is stained with the same blunders; yet it is discriminated by peculiar merit: the antiquities of the nations may be doubtful or fabulous; but the geography and manners of the barbaric world are delineated with Embassy of Lucius Curious accuracy. Of these nations, the grandeur.

Franks alone were qualified to observe in their turn, and to describe the metropolis of the east.
The ambassador of the great Otho, a bishop of Cremona, has painted the state of Constantinople about the middle of the tenth century: his style is glowing, his narrative lively, his observation keen; and even the provinces beyond the boundaries of Italy are described with an original character of freedom and genius. 1
From this scanty fund of foreign and domestic materials, I shall investigate the form and substance of the Byzantine empire: the provinces and wealth, the civil government and military force, the character and literature, of the Greeks in a picture of the times, and describe the rise, the weakness, the strength, and the fall of the empire of Justinian, the accession of Heraclius, and the successful invasion of the Franks or Latins.

After the final division between the sons of Theodosius, the swarms of barbarians from Scythia and Germany over-spread the provinces and extinguished the empire of ancient Rome. The weakness of Constantinople was concealed by extent of dominion: her limits were indefinite, or at least entire; and the kings who substituted Justinian were exalted by the splendid acquisition of Africa and Italy. But the possession of these new conquests was transient and precarious; and almost a moiety of the eastern empire was torn away

1 After observing that the demerit of the Cappadocians rose in proportion to the years, he says, "et posteriores, et posteriores, et posteriores..." (p. 149), which is ascribed to Demodocus:

Kéritat, ypuámiat, npoua Ípaíno, tov Auverliov.

The simile is taken from the French epic poem against Troyen: Un serpent menacé, Jean François Vaché, as Le serpent unsera et son maître. But as the Paris was a serjeant read in the Archology, I should not think it a misprint, unless the language was converted for their imitation (Constantin, Byprotrephes, de Themat. c. 28, Brunk.
Ant. V., p. 19, Ch. 3). The language, in general, is borrowed from the Latin, (p. 50.) The numbers of monks or calyves in all the islands and the adjacent mountains of Asia, (Observations de Belon, t. 2, 252, 253.) Asia, is Constantinople was equalled only by Bagdad, the great city of the Ismaelites, (Voyage de Benjamine de Tudela, par Barthelet, t. 1, p. 45.)

The Decline and Fall. Chapter IV.

See Constantine of Thessalinae, in Banduri, vol. i., p. 1-30, who owns that the word in tov Ámiat, ony, is a sorn by Maurice Augustine, and that the author of the poem was a legen from the Oratorio de Themat. c. 28, Brunk. Ant. V., p. 197, 897.) Some etymologies are attempted for the Opicanian, Optiklaccian, Arab, and other terminations.

The simile is taken from the French epic poem against Troyen: Un serpent menacé, Jean François Vaché, as Le serpent unsera et son maître. But as the Paris was a serjeant read in the Archology, I should not think it a misprint, unless the language was converted for their imitation (Constantin, Byprotrephes, de Themat. c. 28, Brunk.
Ant. V., p. 19, Ch. 3). The language, in general, is borrowed from the Latin, (p. 50.) The numbers of monks or calyves in all the islands and the adjacent mountains of Asia, (Observations de Belon, t. 2, 252, 253.) Asia, is Constantinople was equalled only by Bagdad, the great city of the Ismaelites, (Voyage de Benjamine de Tudela, par Barthelet, t. 1, p. 45.)

The Legatio Liutprandi Episcopi Cremensani ad Nicopolin Phocam, is inscribed in Mazarci, Scriptores Romam Italicum, tom.
ii. part. ii.
fallen; nor could the ruins of Rome, or the mud walls, wooden hovels, and narrow precincts of Paris and London, prepare the Latin stranger to contemplate the simultaneity and impress of Greek and Roman splendour and luxury, which they often renewed and often violated. The siege of Patras was formed by a singular concurrence of the Selavonians of Peloponnesus and the Saronies of Africa. In their last distress, a pious fiction of the approach of the praetor of Corinth, revived the courage of the citizens. The town was at length carried; but the stranger, having admitted, the rebels submitted, and the glory of the day was ascribed to a phantom or a stranger, who fought in the foremost ranks under the character of St. Andrew the apostle. The shrine which contained his relics was decorated with the trophies of victory, and the captive race was forever devoted to the service and vassalage of the metropolitan church of Patras. By the revolt of two Selavonian tribes in the neighbourhood of Heilos and Lacedemon, the peace of the peninsula was often disturbed. They sometimes insulted the weakness, and sometimes resisted the oppression, of the Byzantine government, till at length the approach of their hostile brethren exerted a golden ball to define the rights and obligations of the Ezzerites and Milengi, whose annual tribute was defined at twelve hundred pieces of gold. From these strangers the imperial geographer has accurately distinguished a domestic and perhaps original race, who, however, had derived their origin from the much injured helots. The liberality of the Freeman of Romans, and especially of Augustus, had enfranchised the maritime cities from the dominion of Sparta; and the continuance of the same benefit enabled them with the title of Eleeotero, or free Laccoi, and the 25. sale of their sons and daughters, or of their lands. In the time of Constantine Porphyrogenetos they had acquired the name of Minoisches, under which they dis-honour the claim of liberty by the inhuman pillage of all that is shipwrecked on their rocky shores. Their territory, barren of corn, but fruitful of olives, extended to the cape of Malea: they accepted a chief or prince from the Byzantine praetor, and a light tribute of four hundred pieces of gold was the badge of their immunity, rather than of their dependence. The freemen of Laconia assumed the character of Romans, and long adhered to the religion of the Greeks. By the zeal of the emperor Basil, they were baptized in the year of the anthropod. A council held at Laodicea had been crowned by these rustic votaries five hundred years after they were proscribed in the Roman world. In the theme of Peloponnesus, 1 forty cities and several were still numbered, and the decline of Pelo-

p. 35. The Selavonians were called by Ptolemy Maior (II. 25. 3) the Eleeotero, or free Laccoi, and by Strabo (VII. 1. 34) the Minoisches, under which they dis-honour the claim of liberty by the inhuman pillage of all that is shipwrecked on their rocky shores. Their territory, barren of corn, but fruitful of olives, extended to the cape of Malea: they accepted a chief or prince from the Byzantine praetor, and a light tribute of four hundred pieces of gold was the badge of their immunity, rather than of their dependence. The freemen of Laconia assumed the character of Romans, and long adhered to the religion of the Greeks. By the zeal of the emperor Basil, they were baptized in the year of the anthropod. A council held at Laodicea had been crowned by these rustic votaries five hundred years after they were proscribed in the Roman world. In the theme of Peloponnesus, 1 forty cities and several were still numbered, and the decline of Pelo-

1 Strabo, Geograph. I. viii. p. 562. Pausanias, Graec. Description, lib. vii. c. 21. p. 364. 365. Plut. Hist. Natur. Liv. v. c. 8. 2 Constantine, De administrando Imperio, lib. i. c. 30, 51, 52. 3 The rock of Leucadia was the southern promontory of his inland and diocese. Had he been the exclusive guardian of the Lover's Rest, as well as the principal of their diocese, as the Spectator, he might have been the richest prelate of the Greek Church: a passion for rich jewels and elegant apparel, a weary dance, (Geograph. Miner. tom. ii. desert vi. p. 170-191) 4 enumerates the inroads of the Selavonians, and to this the date (4. P. 394.) of this note corresponds.

4 Enumerated among the Eleeotero, or free Laccoi, and by Strabo (VII. 1. 34) the Minoisches, under which they dis-honour the claim of liberty by the inhuman pillage of all that is shipwrecked on their rocky shores. Their territory, barren of corn, but fruitful of olives, extended to the cape of Malea: they accepted a chief or prince from the Byzantine praetor, and a light tribute of four hundred pieces of gold was the badge of their immunity, rather than of their dependence. The freemen of Laconia assumed the character of Romans, and long adhered to the religion of the Greeks. By the zeal of the emperor Basil, they were baptized in the year of the anthropod. A council held at Laodicea had been crowned by these rustic votaries five hundred years after they were proscribed in the Roman world. In the theme of Peloponnesus, forty cities and several were still numbered, and the decline of Pelo-

1 Strabo, Geograph. I. viii. p. 562. Pausanias, Graec. Description, lib. vii. c. 21. p. 364. 365. Plut. Hist. Natur. Liv. v. c. 8. 2 Constantine, De administrando Imperio, lib. i. c. 30, 51, 52. 3 The rock of Leucadia was the southern promontory of his inland and diocese. Had he been the exclusive guardian of the Lover's Rest, as well as the principal of their diocese, as the Spectator, he might have been the richest prelate of the Greek Church: a passion for rich jewels and elegant apparel, a weary dance, (Geograph. Miner. tom. ii. desert vi. p. 170-191) 4 enumerates the inroads of the Selavonians, and to this the date (4. P. 394.) of this note corresponds.
The Decline and Fall. Chapter XIV.

Manufactures. But the wealth of the province, and specially of silk, the trust of the revenue, were founded on the fair and plentiful produce of trade and manufactures; and some symptoms of liberal policy may be traced in which the remits from all personal taxes, the mariners of Peloponnesus, and the workmen in parchment and purple. This denomination may be fairly applied or extended to the manufactures of linen, woolen, and more especially of silk; the two former of which had been cultivated in Greece from the days of Homer; and the last was introduced perhaps as early as the reign of Justinian. These arts, which were exercised at Corinth, Thebes, and Argos, afforded food and occupation to a numerous people; the men, women, and children, were distributed according to their several powers, according to the nature of these works, and domestic slaves, their masters, who directed the work and enjoyed the profit, were of a free and honourable condition. The gifts which a rich and generous matron of Peloponnesus presented to the emperor Basil, her adopted son, were doubtless fabricated in the Greek looms. Daniella bestowed a carpet of fine wool, of a pattern which imitated the spots of peacock’s tail, of a magnitude to overspread the floor of a new church, erected in the triple name of Christ, of Michael the archangel, and of the prophet Elijah. She gave six hundred pieces of silk and linen, of various use and denomination, for the decoration of the baths of the Tyrian basilica, adorned, and adorned by the labours of the needle; and the linen was so excellently fine, that an entire piece might be rolled in the hollow of a cane. In his description of the Greek manufactures, an historian of Sicily distinguishes their price, according to the weight and quality of the silk, the closeness of the texture, the beauty of the colours, and the taste and materials of the embroidery. A single, or even a double or triple, thread was thought sufficient for ordinary sale; but the union of six threads composed a piece of stronger and more costly workmanship. Among the colours, the queen celebrates, with affection of eloquence, the fiery blaze of the scarlet, and the softer lustre of the green. The embroidery was raised either in silk or gold; the more simple ornament of stripes or circles was surpassed by the nicer imitation of flowers: the vestments that were fabricated for the palace or the altar of a god, were composed of precious stones; and the figures were delineated in strings of oriental pearls. Till the twelfth century, Greece alone, of all the countries of Christendom, was possessed of the insect which is taught by nature, and of the means of rearing; the silk is imported in such quantities, and to such splendid luxury. But the secret had been stolen by the dexterity and diligence of the Arabs: the caliphs of the east and west scorned to borrow from the unbelievers their furniture and apparel; and two cities of Spain, Almeria and Lisbon, were famous for the manufacture, the use, and the exportation of silk, transported from it was first introduced into Sicily by the Greeks to Sicily. Normans; and this emigration of trade distinguishes the victory of Roger from the uniform and fruitless hostilities of every age. After the sack of Constantinople, Athens, and Thebes, his lieutenants, Thomas and Tancredo, with a crew of weavers and artificers of both sexes, a trophy glorious to their master, and disgraceful to the Greek emperor. The king of Sicily was no

2. See the manufactures of Palermo, as they are described by Hues Falconer (Hist. Sicula in precon. in Muratori Script. sacrae, and in E. Fal- canus, tom. 4, p. 259.) in a copy of those of Greece. Without transcribing his narrative, which is long and accurate, I shall observe, that in this passage the strange word exzamnfora, is used properly charged for exzamnfora, according to the modern pronunciation, which is exzamnfora, the first writer, Falcandus lived about the year 1190.

dred thousand of silver, the fruits of her own economy and that of her deceased husband. 1 The avarice of Basil is not less renowned than his valour and fortune: his victorious armies were paid and rewarded with quantities of two hundred thousand pounds of gold, (about eight millions sterling,) which he had buried in the subterraneous vaults of the palace. 2 Such accumulation of treasure is rejected by the theory and practice of modern policy; and we are more apt to conceive a sovereign as a semicircular portion of the figure and name of the Greek sigma, was supported by fifteen columns of Phrygian marble, and the subterraneous vaults were of a similar construction. The square before the sigma was decorated with a fountain, and the margin of the basin was lined and encompassed with plates of silver. In the beginning of each season, the basin, instead of water, was replenished with the most exquisite fruits, which were abandoned to the populace for the entertainment of the prince. He enjoyed this tumultuous spectacle from a throne resplendent with gold and gems, which was raised by a marble staircase to the height of a lofty terrace. Below the throne were seated the officers of his guards, the magistrates, the chiefs of the factions of the circus; the inferior steps were occupied by the people, and the place below was covered with troops of dancers, singers, and pantomimes. The square was surrounded by the hall of justice, the arsenal, and the various offices of business and pleasure; and the purple chamber was named from the annual distribution of robes of scarlet and purple by the hand of the empress herself. The long series of the apartments was adapted to the seasons, and decorated with marble and porphyry, with painting, sculpture, and mosaics, with a profusion of gold, silver, and precious stones. His fanatical magnificence employed the skill and patience of such artists as the times could afford: but the taste of Athens would have despised their frivolous and gaudy splendour; the courtiers, with their robes of silk and embroidery, were mistaken by the children for kings. 3 A matron of Peloponnesus, who had cherished the infant fortunes of Basil the Macedonian, was excited by tenderness or vanity to visit the greatness of her adopted son. In a journey of five hundred miles from Patras to Constantinople, her age or infirmity declined the fatigue of a horse or carriage: the soft litter or bed of Danieleus was transported on the shoulders of ten robust slaves; and as they were relieved at easy distances, a band of three hundred was selected for the performance of this service. She was entertained in the Byzantine palace with filial reverence, and the honours of a queen; and whatever might be the origin of her wealth, her gifts were

1 See the anonymous continuator of Theophanes, (p. 59, 61, 65.)
2 In arte triclinii quae presenti esse putantur, formae anteriorius (the severer Romanesque) aequalis esse, vel scilicet vel semicirculari, vel (complectendis) in Decsuria, Glos. Grac. et Observationes sur Jouville, p. 240) et Octaviam (ad Constantinop. i. v., p. 204—210) this being written.
3 In quo versibus (see Boughoun of Troadis) regnum episodum peculiaris. I prefer the Latin version of Constantine L'Empereur (p. 563 to the French of Barbier, (con. i. r. 45.)
4 See the account of her journey, munificence, and testament, in the Life of Basil, by his grandson Constantine, (c. 74, 75, 76, p 195, 197.)
not unworthy of the regal dignity. I have already described the fine and curious manufactures of Peloponnesus, of linen, silk, and woollen; but the most acceptable of her presents consisted in three hundred beautiful tricorders, of which one hundred were engraved mats for her to sit on. 'She was not ignorant,' says the historian, 'that the air of the palace is more congenial to such insects, than a shepherd's dairy to the flies of the summer.' During her lifetime, she bestowed the greater part of her estates in Peloponnesus, and her testament instituted the son of Basil, her universal heir. After the payment of the legacies, fourscore villas or farms were added to the imperial domain; and three thousand slaves of Daniellis were enfranchised by their new lord, and transplanted as a colony to the Italian coast. From this example of a private matron, we may estimate the wealth and magnificence of the emperors. Yet our enjoyments are confined by a narrow circle; and, whatsoever may be its value, the luxury of life is possessed with more innocence and safety by the master of his own, than by the steward of the public, fortune.

Honours and titles to which the emperors resorted were the distinctions of noble and plebeian family, birth, the sovereign is the sole fountain of honour; and the rank, both in the palace and the empire, depends on the titles and offices which are bestowed on him by his successors a thousand years, from Vespasian to Alexis Con- nus, the Casar was the second person, or at least the second degree, after the supreme title of Augustus was more freely communicated to the sons and brothers of the reigning monarch. To elude without violating his promise to a powerful associate, the husband of his sister, and, without giving himself an equal, to reward the piety of his brother Isaac, the crafty Alexius interposed a new and supereminent dignity. The happy fl-bility of the Greek tongue allowed him to compose the names of Augustus and emperor, (sebastianus and autocrat,) and the union produced the sonorous title of sebastianator. He was exalted above the Casar on the first step of the throne: the public aclama- tions repeated his name; and he was only distin- guished from the sovereign by some peculiar ornaments of the head and feet. The emperor alone could assume the purple or red buskins, and the close diadem or tiara, which imitated the fashion of the Persian kings.

It was a high pyramidal cap of cloth or silk, almost concealed by a profusion of pearls and jewels; the crown was invested by a horned or arched crown of gold: at the summit, the point of their interaction, was placed a globe or cross, and two strings or lappets of pearl depended on each cheek. Instead of red, the buskins of the sebastianator and Casar were green; and on their open coronets or crowns, the precious gems were more sparingly distributed. Beside and below the Casar, the family of Alexius created the pror-hyarebastos and the protosebastos, whose sound and signification will satisfy a Grecian ear.

They imply a superiority and a priority above the simple sebastianator. Augustus; and this sacred and primitive title of the Roman prince was degraded to the kinsmen and servants of the Byzantine court. The daughter of Alexius applies, with fond complacency, this artful gradation of hopes and honours; but the science of words is accessible to the meanest capacity; and this vain dictionary was easily enriched by the pride of his successors. To their favourite sons or brothers, they imparted the more lofty appellation of lord or despot, by which they invested their emperors with monarchical prerogatives, and placed immediately after the person of the emperor himself. The five titles of, 1. Despot; 2. Sebas- tocrator; 3. Caesar; 4. Pan-hypereubastos; and, 5. Protosebastos; were usually confined to the princes of his blood: they were the emanations of his majesty, and the name of despot proceeded from the insecure exis- tence was useless, and their authority precarious.

But in every monarchy the substantial officers of the crown, the state and exercised by the ministers of the palace and treasure the fteky and public. The titles alone can differ; and in the revolution of ages, the counts and prelates, the pretor and questor, insensibly descended, while their servants rose above their heads to the first honours of the state. 1. In a monarchy, which refers every object to the person of the prince, the minister of the board is more frequently formed the most respectable department. The eunucopolit, so illustrious in the age of Justinian, was supplanted by the pro- tocratia, whose primitive functions were limited to the custody of the wardrobe. From thence his jurisdiction was extended over the numerous menials of pomp and state, the imperial vestments, and the attendance of the public and private audience.

2. In the ancient system of Constantine, the name of logothete, or accountant, was applied to the receivers of the finances: the principal officers were distinguished as the logothetes of the domain, of the posts, the army, the private and public treasure; and the great logothete, the supreme guardian of the laws and revenues, is compared with the chancellor of the Latin monarchies. His disering eye pervaded the civil administration; and he was assisted, in due subordination, by the eparch or prefect of the province, the generals of the army, and the keepers of the privy seal, the archives, and the red or purple ink which was reserved for the sacred signature of the emperor alone.

The procratarius, in his original functions, was the assistant of the emperor when he mounted on horse- back; he gradually became the lieutenant of the great domestics in the field; and his jurisdiction extended over the tables, the cavalry, and the royal train of hunting and hawking. The stratopedarch was the great

1. Pare exatae curis, sedi diadematque dispars, Dictionuaire d'Egypte et d'Ethiopie, (de Lalande Justinian,) i. 136, and in the same century (the sixth) Cassiodorus represents him, who, Virga ap- plique, desper, as the defender of the empire, and an interpreter of the great dominions of the palace, the army, the private and public. The Procratarius, in his original functions, was the assistant of the emperor when he mounted on horse- back; he gradually became the lieutenant of the great domestics in the field; and his jurisdiction extended over the tables, the cavalry, and the royal train of hunting and hawking. The Stratopedarch was the great

2. Cassiodorus, (de l. vi. c. 2 p. 370.) The last abomination of the abominable saltwater. Yet I am surprised to find in the tenth century, much of the commerce of commerce in Egypt.

3. See the Alexius (I. iii. p. 260;) and Anna Commena, who, except in fine poetry, may be compared to the melancholy de Montaigne. In her awful reverence for titles and forms, she styles her father Euse- voy es-ov, the inventor of this royal art, the x en aszov, and xoxvov.

4- 12. The bokhara, x n a s 5 , is the same superior to his son-in-law, of the Bokhara, and the head of 700 officers. (Rycaud's Ottoman Empire, p. 349, eccen celebrium.

7. Typhon is the Arabic name of an interpreter; (D'Herbelot, S. 53, 54. 55. 56. 57. 58.) says Codinus, (c. v. No. 797) And this name is Ba- buerias, (Epit. iv. p. 338) and Ducu, (Observations sur Velleh don, and Ulens, Grèce, et Latin.) Adoration of the emperor.

The most lofty titles, and the most humble postures, which devotion has appropriated to the Supreme Being, have been... by flattery and fear to creatures of the same nature with ourselves. The mode of adoration, of falling prostrate on the ground, and kissing the feet of the emperor, was borrowed by Diocletian from Persian servitude; but it was continued and aggravated till the last age of the Gregorian emperors. It was a custom of the house of the Muscovy or Russia. After a long journey by the sea and land, from Venice to Constantinople, the ambassador halted at the golden gate, till he was conducted by the formal order to the hospitable palace prepared for his reception; but this palace was a prison, and his jealously kept watch over all intercourses either with strangers or natives. At his first audience, he offered the gifts of his master, slaves, and golden vases, and costly armour. The ostentations payment of the officers and troops displayed before his eyes the riches of the empire; he was entertained at a royal banquet, in which the ambassadors of the nations were marshalled by the eunuch or corrupt of the Greeks: from his own table, the emperor, as the most signal favour, invited the plate of the favourite, whose favourites were dismissed with a robe of honour. In the morning and evening of each day, his civil and military servants attended their duty in the palace; their labour was repaid by the sight, perhaps by the smile, of their lord; his commands were signified by a nod or a sign; and the face of God, about all earthly goods, was submissive in his presence. In his regular or extra-processions, public and private, the streets were cleared and purified; the pavement was strewn with flowers; the most precious furniture, the gold and silver plate, and even hangings, were displayed from the windows and balconies, and the windows restrained and silenced the tumult of the populace. The march was opened by the military officers at the head of their troops: they were followed in low order by the magistrates of the civil government: the person of the emperor was preceded by his keeper, who, as he passed, and at the church door he was solemnly received by the patriarch and his clergy. The task of applause was not abandoned to the rude and spontaneous voices of the crowd. The most convenient stations were occupied by the bands of the blue and green factions of the city; these were the throngs, which, in the city, were insensibly sunk to an eulogy of servitude. From either side they echoed in responsive melody the praises of the emperor; their poets and musicians directed the choir, and long life and victory were the burden of every song. The same acclamations were applied to every person not of every nation; and if he had risen from a private rank, he might remember, that his own voice had been the loudest and most eager in applause, at the very moment he envied the fortune, or conspired against the life of his predecessor.

Among the amusements of the feast, a boy balanced, on his forehead, a piece or polio, twenty-four feet long, with a cross bar of two cubits a little below the top. Two boys, naked, though costumed (costume) together, and singly, climbed, stood, played, descended, and raised, its stupendous redhill; utramque mirabilis nescio. (p. 483.)

Grae is not improbably derived from Cala. or Calbat, in Arabic a robe of honour. (Helwe, Not. in Ceremony.)

The compensation of the mountains to the seas, and the respect of the magnificent and splendid, the emperors of the ancient Roman Empire, for his majesty, though trifling work in (dilecto Eccles. in Antip.) has been illustrated by the notes of God, and three books of Greek translated by transl. (p. 13.)

The respectful salutation of carrying the hand to the mouth, a friend, is the root of the Latin word, adoro eterno. See our learned Sei. (Codin. B. 7.)

The first book of Herodotus, to be of Persian origin.

This sketch of honours and offices is drawn from Geese Colman, Corbitan, who survived the taking of Constantinople by the Turks; but from the same authority, though trifling work (dilecto Eccles. et Antip.) has been illustrated by the notes of God, and three books of Greek translated by transl. (p. 13.)

The respect of the magnificence and splendid, the emperors of the ancient Roman Empire, for his majesty, though trifling work in (dilecto Eccles. in Antip.) has been illustrated by the notes of God, and three books of Greek translated by transl. (p. 13.)

The respect of the magnificence and splendid, the emperors of the ancient Roman Empire, for his majesty, though trifling work in (dilecto Eccles. et Antip.) has been illustrated by the notes of God, and three books of Greek translated by transl. (p. 13.)

The respect of the magnificence and splendid, the emperors of the ancient Roman Empire, for his majesty, though trifling work in (dilecto Eccles. et Antip.) has been illustrated by the notes of God, and three books of Greek translated by transl. (p. 13.)

The respect of the magnificence and splendid, the emperors of the ancient Roman Empire, for his majesty, though trifling work in (dilecto Eccles. et Antip.) has been illustrated by the notes of God, and three books of Greek translated by transl. (p. 13.)

The respect of the magnificence and splendid, the emperors of the ancient Roman Empire, for his majesty, though trifling work in (dilecto Eccles. et Antip.) has been illustrated by the notes of God, and three books of Greek translated by transl. (p. 13.)
The princes of the north, of the nations, says Constantine, without faith or fame, with the blood of the Caesars, by their marriage with a royal virgin, or by the nuptials of their daughters with a Roman prince. 1 The aged monarch, in his instructions to his son, reveals the secret maxims of policy and pride; and he suggests the most decent reasons for refusing these insolent and unreasonable demands. Every animal, says the discreet emperor, is prompted by nature to seek a mate among the animals of its own species; and the human species is divided into various tribes, by the distinction of language, religion, and manners. But the alliance serves the harmony of public and private life; but the mixture of foreign blood is the fruitful source of disorder and discord. Such had ever been the opinion and practice of the sage Romans: their jurisprudence prescribed the marriage of a citizen and a stranger; in the days of freedom and virtue, a senator would have scorned to match his daughter with a king: the glory of Mark Antony was sufficed by an Egyptian wife; 2 and the emperor Titus was compelled, by popular censure, to dismiss with reluctance the reluctant Berenice. 3 Then Vespasian says, the sentence was neither by the fabulous sanction of the great Constantine. The ambassadors of the nations, more especially of the unbelieving nations, were solemnly admonished, that such strange alliances had been condemned by the founder of the imaginary law of Constantius. 4 He was inscribed on the altar of St. Sophia; and the impious prince who should stain the majesty of the purple was excluded from the civil and ecclesiastical communion of the Romans. If the ambassadors were instructed by any false brethren in the Byzantine history, they might produce three memorable examples of the violation of this imaginary law: the marriage of Leo; or rather of his father Constantine the fourth, with the daughter of the king of the Chozars, the nuptials of the grand-daughter of Romanus with a Bulgarian prince, and the union of Bertha of France or Italy with young Romanus, the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus himself. To these objections three answers were prepared which solved the difficulty and established the law. I. The deed and the guilt of Constantine Porphyrogenitus were acknowledged. The Isaurian heretic, who failed of the baptismal font, and declared war against the holy images, had indeed embraced a barbarian wife. By this impious alliance he accomplished the measure of his crimes, and was devoted to the just censure of the Sophist, and of posterity. II. Romanus could not be alleged as a legitimate emperor; he was a plebeian usurper, ignorant of the laws, and regardless of the honor, of the monarchy. His son Christopher, the father of the bride, was the third in rank in the college of princes, at once the subject and the accomplice of a rebellious parent. The Bulgarians were sincere and devout christians; and the safety of the empire, with the redemption of many thousand captives depended on this preposterous alliance. Yet no consideration could dispense from the law of Constantine: the clergy, the senate, and the people, disapproved the conduct of Romanus; and he was reproached, both in his life and death, as the author of the public disgrace. The third. III. For the marriage of his own son 5 A.D. 943, with the daughter of Hugo king of Italy, a more honourable defence is contrived by the wise Porphyrogenitus. Constantine, the great and holy, esteemed the dignity and value of the Franks; 6 and his propitious spirit beheld the vision of their future greatness. They alone were excepted from the general prohibition: Hugo king of France, was the lineal descendant of Charlemagne; 7 and his daughter Bertha inherited the prerogatives of her family and nation. The voice of truth and malice insensibly betrayed the fraud or error of the imperial court. The patrimonial estate of Hugo was reduced from the monarchy of France to the simple county of Arles; though it was not denied, that, in the confusion of the times, he had usurped the privilege of bearing a king's name in the kingdom of Italy. His father was a private noble; and if Bertha derived her female descent from the Carolingian line, every step was polluted with illegitimacy or vice. The grandmother of Hugo was the famous Valdrada, the comitissa, rather than the wife, of the second Lothair; whose adultery, divorce, and second nuptials, had provoked against him the thunders of the Vatican. His mother, as she was styled, the great Bertha, was successively the wife of the count of Arles and of the marquis of Tuscany: France and Italy were her dominions. Bertha was a thousand years of threescore, of every degree, were the zealous servants of her ambition. The example of maternal incontinence was copied by the king of Italy; and the three favourite conclaves of Hugo were denounced as a butchery of religious maxims by Senecl. 8 The daughter of Venus was granted to the solicitations of the Byzantine court: her name of Bertha was changed to that of Eudoxia; and she was wedded, or rather betrothed, to young Romanus, the future heir of the empire of the east. The consummation of this unholy alliance was suspended by the tender age of the two parties; and at the end of five years, the union was dissolved by the death of the virgin spouse. The second wife of the emperor Romanus was a maiden of plebeian, but of Roman birth; and young Romanus, Theophano and Anne, were given in marriage to the princes of the earth. The eldest was bestowed, as the pledge of peace, on the eldest son of the great Otho, who had solicited this alliance with arms and embassies. It might legally be questioned how far a claim which had entered to the privilege of the Roman nation: but every scruple was silenced by the fame and piety of a hero who had restored the empire of the west. After the death of her father-in-law and husband, Theophano governed Rome, Italy, and Germany, during the minority of her son, the third Otho; and the Latinians honored him, as a member of an illustrious house, and a descendant of Romanus, a just vassal of the emperor and a benefactor to a superior duty the remembrance of her country. 9 In the nuptials of her sister Anne, every prejudice was lost, and every consideration of dignity was superseded, by the stronger argument of necessity and fear. A pagan of the north, Wolodomir, great prince of Russia, aspired to a daughter of the Roman purple; and his claim was enforced by the threats of war, the promise of conversion, and the offer of a powerful succour against a

1 Constantine was made to praise the cæsaris and the ducumines of the Franks, with whom he claimed a private and public alliance. The French ambassador, Casimir de Béauce, was delighted with these compliments.

2 Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de Administration. Imp. c. 25), exhibits a pedigree and life of the illustrious king Hugo, (expurgatorius.) The Greeks were more correct in making the canonization of Pagi, the Annals of Moraq, and the Abriviation of St. Marc, A.D. 925-926.

3 The notion of the three goddesses, Lantiprand very naturally adds, et quantum non res adhibiit subebatur, earned nation ex imperio, et res pertinet in provinciam Romanam in Augusto, etc. (Si. de Aug., c. 69.) Yet from the second century it was not easy to impede the triumph of the images. The younger Bertha, see Hist. 1. x. c. 5, for the inconvenience of the order of public exercise. Hymenaeum i. t. t. 15, for the virtues and eyes of Hugo. It was not long before the bishop of Cremona was a lover of scandal. 4 In the marriage of the princess Graca arbati et aliis fuita subest utilis, et optima, etc., in the preamble of an inimical writer, spud Pagti, tom. iv. D. 918. 5 The marriage and principal actions may be found in Muniorti, Pagti, and St. Marc, under the proper years. 6 Constantine Porphyrogenitus, de Administration. Imp. c. 25, exhibits a pedigree and life of the illustrious king Hugo, (expurgatorius.) The Greeks were more correct in making the canonization of Pagi, the Annals of Moraq, and the Abriviation of St. Marc, A.D. 925-930. 7 For a collection of the three goddesses, Lantiprand very naturally adds, et quantum non res adhibiit subebatur, earned nation ex imperio, et res pertinet in provinciam Romanam in Augusto, etc. (Si. de Aug., c. 69.) Yet from the second century it was not easy to impede the triumph of the images. The younger Bertha, see Hist. 1. x. c. 5, for the inconvenience of the order of public exercise. Hymenaeum i. t. t. 15, for the virtues and eyes of Hugo. It was not long before the bishop of Cremona was a lover of scandal. 8 Constantine Porphyrogenitus, de Administration. Imp. c. 25, exhibits a pedigree and life of the illustrious king Hugo, (expurgatorius.) The Greeks were more correct in making the canonization of Pagi, the Annals of Moraq, and the Abriviation of St. Marc, A.D. 925-930. 9 For a collection of the three goddesses, Lantiprand very naturally adds, et quantum non res adhibiit subebatur, earned nation ex imperio, et res pertinet in provinciam Romanam in Augusto, etc. (Si. de Aug., c. 69.) Yet from the second century it was not easy to impede the triumph of the images. The younger Bertha, see Hist. 1. x. c. 5, for the inconvenience of the order of public exercise. Hymenaeum i. t. t. 15, for the virtues and eyes of Hugo. It was not long before the bishop of Cremona was a lover of scandal.
domestic rebel. A victim of her religion and country, the Grecian princess was torn from the palace of her fathers, and condemned to a savage reign and a hopeless exile on the banks of the Bosphoranes, or in the neighborhood of the town of Potamianus, where she died. Theikes, a trusted servant, took care of her son, but Anne was fortunate and fruitful: the daughter of her grandson Jeroslaus was recommended by her imperial descent; and the king of France, Henry I, sought a wife on the last borders of Europe and Christendom.¹

In the Byzantine palace, the emperor was the first, the first foreman of the domestics, and the Franks. But whatever these men may assert, it is on the Greeks, the late and most potent despotism of Christendom and the Franks.

Despotic power.

On the 21st of November, 1175, the order of the Greeks to their immediate superiors, to obey them, or be subjected to the penalties of rebellion, was solemnly pronounced by the patriarch. The Greeks: in the wildest tumults of rebellion they never aspired to the idea of a free constitution; and the private character of the prince was the only source and measure of their public happiness. Superstition riveted their chains; in the church of St. Sophia, where they were accustomed to kneel at the foot of the altar, they pledged their passive and unconditional obedience to his government and family. On his side he engaged to abstain as much as possible from the capital punishments of death and mutilation; his orthodox creed was subscribed with his own hands, and he promised to obey the decrees of the seven synods, and the canons of the holy church.² But the assurance of mercy was loose and indefinite: he swore, not to his people, but to an invisible judge, and except in the inexpiable guilt of heresy, the ministers of heaven were always prepared to precede the tyranny with his right, and to hide the venal transgressions, of their sovereign. The Greek ecclesiastics were themselves the subjects of the civil magistrate: at the nod of a tyrant the bishops were created, or transferred, or deposed, or punished with an infraction, as a warning, or an act of revenge; or influence, they could never succeed like the Latin clergy in the establishment of an independent republic; and the patriarch of Constantinople condemned, what he secretly envied, the temporal greatness of his Roman brother. Yet the exercise of boundless despotism is confined to the path of his sacred and laborious duty. In proportion to his wisdom and virtue, the master of an empire is confined to the path of his sacred and laborious duty. In proportion to his vice and folly, he drops the sceptre too weighty for his hands; and the motions of the royal image are ruled by the imperceptible thread of some minister or favorite, who undertakes for his private interest to exercise the task of the public oppression. In some fatal moment, the most absolute monarch may dread the reason or the caprice of a nation of slaves; and experience proved, that whatever is gained in the extent, is lost in the safety and solidity, of regal power.

Whatever titles a despot may assume, the military force of whatever claims he may assert, it is on the Greeks, the late and most potent despotism of Christendom and the Franks.

The wealth of the Greeks enabled the Emperor to purchase the service of the poorer Greeks, and to maintain a naval power for the protection of their coasts and the annoyance of their enemies. A commerce of mutual benefit exchanged the gold of Constantinople for the blood of the Selavonians and Turks, the Bulgarians and Russians: their value contributed to the victories of Nicephorus and Zimisces; and if a hostile people pressed too closely on the frontier, they were more easily turned to the deserts, to the sea, and the desire of peace, by the well-managed attack of a more distant tribe.³ The command of the Mediterranean, from the mouth of the Tanais to the columns of Herculius, was always claimed, and often possessed, by the successors of Constantine. Their capital was filled with naval stores and dexterous artificers; the situation of Greece and Asia, the long coasts, deep gulfs, and numerous islands, accustomed their subjects to the exercise of navigation; and the trade of Venice and Amalith supplied a nursery of seamen to the imperial fleet.⁴ Since the empire of the Peloponnesian and Muonian wars, the sphere of action had not been extended, and the science of naval architecture appears to have declined. The art of constructing those stupendous machines which displayed three, or six, or ten, ranges of oars, rising above or falling behind, each other, was almost lost in the generation of the empire. The admiral of Constantinople, as well as to the mechanics of modern day, could say, The Dromenous, or light galleys of the Byzantine empire, were content with two tiers of oars; each tier was composed of five and twenty benches; and two rowsers were seated on each bench, who plied the oars on either side of the row. To this day, in the battle of the Greek nation, which, in time of action, stood erect with his armour-bearer on the poop, two steersmen at the helm, and two officers at the prow, the one to handle the anchor, the other to point and play against the enemy the tube of liquid fire. The whole crew, as in the airship of the infant, performed the double

¹ If we listen to the threats of Nicephorus to the ambassador of the emperor, Nicer is est in mari dominio tuo classibus numeris. Navigantium fortitudine mihi solis tue, quibus classibus et magnis maritima semper et in navibus magnis et operis remittantur orares. (Liquiprad in Lexiol. ad Nicephor. Phocam, in Muratori Script., lib. 110.)

² For another place, quibus est quos reliquos non esset. Funiculium et salutis. (Ibid.)

³ The twelve, de administrando imperio, perfectly indicate the same policy.

⁴ The numerous accounts of the Battles of the Greeks, Olimnius, Opera, (v. p. 232-356) which is given more correct from a manuscript of Odeas, by the laborious Fabricius, (Bibl. Graec. tom. vi. p. 327-335) relating to the collection many years ago, is not described in the text of the book.

⁵ Even of fifteen or sixteen rows of oars, in the navy of Demetrius Nicator, and Ptolomeis.

⁶ The Decomes, and, as are so clearly described with two tiers of oars, that I must not repeat the names, Magnus and Ptolemy, who perform the scene by a blind attachment to the classic appellations of Tyrannus. The Byzantine historians are sometimes guilty of the same inaccuracy.
service of mariners and soldiers; they were provided with defensive and offensive arms, with bows and arrows, for use from the long pikes, which they pushed through the port-holes of the lower tier. Sometimes indeed the ships of war were of a larger and more solid construction; and the labours of combat and navigation were more regularly divided between the crews of warriors and two hundred and thirty men. But for the least part they were of the light and manageable size; and as the cape of Malea in Peloponnesus was still clothed with its ancient terrors, an imperial fleet was transported five miles over land across the isthmus of Corinth. 2 The principles of marine tactics were unaltered since the time of Themistocles: a squadron of galleys still advanced in a crescent, charged to the front, and strove to impel their sharp beaks against the feebler sides of their antagonists. A machine for casting stones and darts was built of strong timbers in the midst of the deck; and the operation of hoarding was effected by a crane that hoisted barrels of armed men. The language of signals, so clear and copious in the naval grammar of the moderns, was imperfectlyexpressed by the various positions and colours of a common method of the darkness; by the dark signals or orders to chase, to halt, to retreat, to break, to form, were conveyed by the lights of the leading galleys. By land, the fire-signals were repeated from one mountain to another; a chain of eight stations communicated the news by day, and seventy-five vessels of the Paphian style, was equipped in the capital, the islands of the Egean sea, and the sea-ports of Asia, Macedonia, and Greece. It carried thirty-four thousand mariners, seven thousand three hundred and forty soldiers, seven hundred Russians, and five thousand and eighty-seven Mardantes, whose fathers had been transplanted from the mountains of Libanus. Their pay, most probably of a month, was computed at thirty-four centenaries of gold, about one hundred and thirty-six thousand pounds sterling. Our fancy is heightened by the endless recitation of arms and engines, of clothes and linen, of bread for the men and forage for the horses, and of stores and utensils of every description, inadequate to the conquest of a petty island, but ample sufficient for the establishment of a flourishing naval station.

The invention of the Greek fire did not remain the property of the Athenians. The Persians, it is true, made use of it; but it is probable that the Romans also knew it; for they were skilled in the use of fire, and employed it in sieges and sea-duels with terrible effect. But they were either less improved, or less susceptible of improvements; the engines of antiquity, the catapult, balista, and battering-rams, were still of most frequent and powerful use in the attack and defence of fortifications; nor was the decision of battles reduced to the quick and heavy fire of a line of infantry, whom they could never meet with advantage, and under the shelter of a similar fire of their enemies. Steel and iron were still the common instruments of destruction and safety; and the helmets, cuirasses, and shields, of the tenth century did not, either in form or substance, essentially differ from those which had preceded the companions of Alexander or Achilles. 3 But instead of accustoming the modern Greeks, like the legionaries of old, to the constant and easy use of this salutary weight, their armour was laid aside in light chariots, which followed the march, till, on the approach of an enemy, they resumed the load. The armature of the horse, the breastplate and cap, was the same as in the ancients, but a cumbrous. Their offensive weapons consisted of swords, battle-axes, and spears; but the Macedonian pike was shortened a fourth of its length, and reduced to the more convenient measure of twelve cubits or feet. The sharpness of the Sceytian and Arabian arrows had been severely felt; and the emperors lamented the decay of archery as a cause of the public misfortunes; and recommend, as an advice, and a command, that the military youth, till the age of forty, should assiduously practise the exercise of the bow. 4 The order of battle, of course, was the same as in the ancient Greek style, and, as a medium between the extremes of four and sixteen, the foot-soldiers of Leo and Constantine were formed eight deep; but the cavalry charged in four ranks, from the reasonable consideration, that the weight of the front could not be increased by the presence of the hindmost horses. If the ranks of the infantry or cavalry were sometimes doubled, this cautious array betrayed a secret distrust of the courage of the troops, whose numbers might swell the appearance of the line, but of whom only a chosen band would dare approach the enemy. The javelin and sword were still the national arms. The order of battle must have varied according to the ground, the object, and the adversary; but their ordinary disposition, in two lines and a reserve, presented a succession of hopes and resources most agreeable to the temper as well as the judgment of the Greeks. In case of a repulse, the first line fell back into the intervals of the second; and the reserve, breaking into two divisions, wheeled round the flanks to improve the victory or cover the retreat. Whatever authority could enact was accomplished, at least in theory, by the camp and marches, the ceremonies and the national, the edicts and books, of the Byzantine monarch. 5 Whatever art could produce from the forge, the loom, or the laboratory, was abundantly supplied by the riches of the prince, and the industry of his numerous workmen. But no formality nor art could compensate for the important machine, the soldier himself; and if the ceremonies of Constantine always suppose the safe and triumphal return of the emperor, 6 his tactes seldom soar above the means of escaping a defeat, and pros-
CHAP. XIV.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

author of the tactics was besieged in his capital; and the last of the barbarians, who trembled at the name of the Saracens, or Franks, could proudly exhibit the martial ensigns under which they had extorted from the feeble sovereign of Constantinople. What spirit their government and character denied, might have been inspired in some degree by the influence of religion; but the religion of the Greeks could only teach them to suffer and to yield. The emperor Necephorus, who so long after which they had extorted and glory of the Roman name, was desirous of bestowing the honours of martyrdom on the Christians who lost their lives in a holy war against the infidels. But this political law was defeated by the opposition of the patriarchs, the bishops, and the principal senators; and they strenuously urged the causes of St. Basil, that all who were polluted by the bloody trade of a soldier should be separated, during three years, from the commendation of the faithful.

Character and These samples of the Greeks have tactics of the
been compared with the tears of the primitive Saracens.
Moisheus when they were held back from battle; and this contrast of base superstition and high-spirited enthusiasm, unfolds to a philosophic eye the history of the rival nations. The subjects of the last caliphs 3 had undoubtedly degenerated from the real and faith of the constitution of the empire, and a new system of discipline and government represented the Deity as the author of war: 4 the vital though latent spark of fanatic is now struggled in the heart of their religion, and among the Saracens who dwelt on the christian borders, it was frequently rekindled to a lively and active flame. Their regular force was formed of the valiant slaves who had been educated to guard the person and accompany the standard of their lord; but the musul-man people of Syria and Cilicia, of Africa and Spain, were awakened by the trumpet which proclaimed a holy war against the infidels. The rich were ambitious of having some share in the fate of their country;
their wealth had been the reward of their labour;
they were allured by the hopes of plunder; and the old,
the infirm, and the women, assumed their share of meritorious service by sending their substitutes, with arms and horses, into the field. These offensive and defensive arms were similar in strength and temperament to those of the Saracens; the war horse was trained to the management of the horse and the bow; the massy silver of their belts, their bridles, and their swords, displayed the magnificence of a prosperous nation, and except some black archers of the south, the Arabs disdainful the naked bravery of their ancestors. Instead of waggoons, they were attended by a long train of domestic animals, mules, and asses; the multitude of these animals, whom they bedecked with flags and streamers, appeared to swell the pomp and magnitude of their host; and the horses of the enemy were often disordered by the smooth face and odious smell of the camels of the east.
Inevitable by their patience of thirst and heat, their spirits were frozen by a winter's cold, and the consciousness of their propensity to sleep exacted the most rigorous precautions against the surprises of the night. Their order of battle was a long square of two decuries, while advanced, the lower part of the men under the protection of God, the more were encumbered by a long train of camels. In their engagements by sea and land, they sustained with patient firmness the fury of the attack, and seldom advanced to the charge till they could discern and oppress the lassitude of their foes. But if they were reproached and broken, they knew not how to rally or renew the combat; and their dismay was height-tened by the superstitious prejudice, that God had declared himself on the side of their enemies. The decline and fall of the caliphs was but a natural opinion; not mere wanting, among the Ma-ometans and christians, some obscure prophecies which prognosticated their alternate defeats. The unity of the Arabian empire was dissolved, but the independent fragments were equal to populations and powerful kingdoms; and in their naval and military formations, an emir of Aleppo or Tunis might command without speculating of skill and industry and treasure.
In their transactions of peace and war with the Saracens, the princes of Constantinople too often felt that these barbarians had nothing barbarous in their discipline; and that in opposition to the Greeks, they were endowed with a quick spirit of curiosity and imitation.
The model was indeed more perfect than the copy; their ships, and engines, and fortifications, were of a less skilful construction; and they confessed, without shame, that the same God who had given a tongue to the Arabs, had more nicely fashioned the hands of the Chinese, and the heads of the Greeks.

A name of some German tribes be-
The Franks or tween the Rhine and the Weser had Latins.
spread its victorious influence over the greatest part of Gaul, Germany, and Italy; and the elevation of Franks 7 was applied by the Greeks and Arabians to the christians of the Latin church, the nations of the west, who stretched beyond their knowldedge to the shores of the Atlantic ocean. The vast body had been inspired and united by the soul of Charlemagne; but the division and degeneracy of his tace soon annihilated the imperial power, which would have rivalled the Caesars of Byzantium, and regained the indignities of the christian name. The enemies no longer feared, nor could the subjects any longer trust, the application of a public revenue, the labours of trade and manufactures in the military service, the mutual aid of provinces and armies, and the naval squadrons which were regularly stationed from the mouth of the Elbe to that of the Tiber. In the begining of the tenth century, the family of Charlemagne had almost disappeared; his monarchy was broken into many hostile and independent states; the royal title was assumed by the most ambitious chiefs; their revolt was imitated in a long subordination of anarchy and discord; and the nobles of every province disobeyed their sovereign, oppressed their vassals, and exerenced perpetual hostilities against their equals and privilege was reduced to a state of equality. The fabric of government, fomented the martial spirit of the nation. In the system of modern Europe, the power of the sword is possessed, at least in fact, by five or six mighty potentates; their operations are conducted on a distant frontier, by an order of men who devote their lives to the study and practice of the military art; the rest of the country and community enjoys in the midst of war the tranquillity of peace, and is only made sensible of the change by the aggregation or decrease of the public taxes. In the disorders of the tenth and eleventh centuries a prince was a soldier, and every village a fortification: each wood or valley was a scene of murder and rapine; and the lords of each castle were compelled to assume the character of princes and warriors. To their own cou-

3 Zonaras (tom. ii. i. xvi. p. 292, 253) and Cedrenus, (Compend. p. 639) who write from different points of view, apply the epithet of apostate to the opposition of the patriarch.
4 The eighteenth chapter of the tactics of the different nations of the west and east is collected by the Lihure. The manners and arms of the Saracens (Tactic, p. 829-417, and a fraquent comparison of their discipline with that of the Romans) the Roman emperor was too frequently called upon to study.
5 Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey," the Tacticus Romanus, and Tacitus, p. 92.
6 Liutpold (p. 854, 858) relates and interprets the oracles of the Greeks and Saracens, in which, after the fashion of prophecy, the past is clear and bright, but the future is obscure and me-ning. From this boundary of light and shade an impartial critic may commonly discern the base of each age.
7 The sense of this description is explained by Ablapharanus, (Biyatyan. p. 314, 321) but I cannot read from the passage in which it is conveyed by this author the apatih of the name. Ex Franks, una nomine iam Latinos quot Tentorie compreh mensurantur. (Biyatyan. p. 853, 854, 851) This extension of the name may be continued from Con-stantin (de administrandis imperiis, i. 8, 27, 28.) and Erysichus, (Acalli. tomo. i. p. 35, 55.) who both lived before the Crusades. The terminals of Ablapharanus (i.e. p. 850 and Abdolfard (Tractat, and Geograph) are more recent.
rage and policy, they boldly trusted for the safety of their family, the protection of their lands, and the revenge of their injuries. But the Huns, like the ancient heroes that wielded pens, and that preferred inevitable death to the dishonour of turning their backs to an enemy. 2 It was the glory of the nobles of France, that, in their humble dwellings, war and rapine were the only pleasure, the sole occupation, of their lives. They affected to deride the palaces, and, to the music of Romans, and their national sovereign might fix his occasional or permanent residence in any province of their common country. In the division of the cast and west, that unique ideal was scrupulously preserved, and in the right of conquerors, the sovereigns of the eastern monarchies, the majesty of the purple resided in safety from dispute. Amd and personages of the Lom-

bards opposed his settlement in Italy: he entered N. prostit

Rome, not as a conqueror, but as a fugitive, and, after a visit of twelve days, he pillaged, and for ever deserted, the ancient capital of the world. 4 The final repolit and separation of Italy was accomplished about two centuries after the conquest of Justinian, and from his reign we may date the gradual oblivion of the Latin tongue. That legislator had composed his Institutes, his Code, and his Pandects, in a language which he celebrates as the proper and public style of the Roman government, the crucible of the thought of the palace and of Constantineople, of the courts and tribunals of the cast. 5 But this foreign dialect was

1 In Secunda carissimo... desiderius et bellicos pugnare quam calumnia, et prius mortuem obire quam hostibus terrae care. (Laurentius, p. 442)

2 Flavius Erotus sibi daturae pretiosi armis, O falsi Potum volub acuta cordis;

3 Bacilli et stomachum nitidum lacte aquinis

F. E I n E u n u s r u b o s m u i t o f u l s i c c e m e t a l i s .

Non eadem Gallia similis vel cura, rememorat;

Victimam eis spectat denique toro,

Depressuque larenus splinis hic inde coactis

Pectora.

4 Antica Carmen Panegyricum de Liberebius Berengari Augusti, I. c.

5 In Muro Script. Reorum Italic, tom. ii. pars i, p. 453.

6 Justinian, sive historiarum Agathodromion lib. iv. cap. 3.

7 Yet the specific title of emperor of the Romans has not been claimed by the French and German emperors of old Rome.

8 Litt. Constitutiones Manuarii reproduce this design in his barbarous verse:

9 The subject of ecclesiastical and beneficent discipline, Father

Thomasin (tom. iii. l. 40. 43—47) may be useful consulted.

A general law of Charlemagne exempted the bishops from personal service: but the opposite practice, which prevailed from the ninth to the fifteenth century, is considered by the example or silence of data, as Justinian, by his Justicia. In the canons, saysRuthenus of Verona; the canons likewise forbade you to 9 In the eighteenth chapter of his Tacite, the emperor Leo has clearly stated the military virtues and virtues of the Franks (whom Merovian barbarously translated by Gloff) and the Lombards or Longobards. See likewise the twenty-fourth Dissertation of Murata

10 Domini tui militis (satis the good Nicophoros) equidam ignari pedagogus pagana sum tunc: acustorum magnitudine, heresim gravi-tudinem, religiosum atque saecularem potestatem, ac sarmata parte petit.

Eos simili, ac subridens, impedit, impet, et eva exstirpans hac est versus Ingelis, A. C. Linopin in log. p. 409, 141.

unknown to the people and soldiers of the Asiatic provinces, it was immediately understood by the greater part of the interpreters of the laws and the ministers of the state. After a short conflict, nature and habit prevailed over the obsolete institutions of human power: for the general benefit of his subjects, Justinian promulgated his Novels in the two languages: they were afterwards enlarged and translated, and successively translated: the original was forgotten, the version was studied, and the Greek, whose intrinsic merit deserved indeed the preference, obtained a legal, as well as a popular, establishment in the Byzantine monarchy. The birth and residence of succeeding emperors was esteemed a source of strength to the language and dominion of Rome. They insinuated the names of the east who had renounced the dress and idiom of Romans; and their reasonable practice will justify the frequent appellation of Greeks. But this contemptuous appellation was indignantly rejected by the Greeks when it was applied. Whatever changes had been introduced by the lapse of ages, they alleged a lineal and unbroken succession from Augustus and Constantine; and in the lowest period of degeneracy and decay, the name of Roman was reserved by the last fragments of the empire of Constantine.

Period of ignorance.

While the government of the east was transacted in Latin, the Greek was the language of literature and philosophy; nor could the masters of this rich and perfect idiom be tempted to envy the borrowed learning and imitated taste of their Roman disciples. After the fall of paganism, the loss of Syria and Egypt, and the extinction of the schools of Alexandria and Athens, the studies of the Greeks insensibly retired to some regular monasteries, and above all, to the royal college of Constantinople, which was burnt in the reign of Leo the Isaurian.

In the pompous style of the age, the president of that foundation was named the Sun of Science: his twelve associates, the professors in the different arts and faculties, were the twelve signs of the zodiac; a library of thirty-six thousand five hundred volumes was open to their inquiries; and they could show an ancient manuscript. Homer, on a parchment roll, one hundred and twenty feet in length, the length of which was measured, as it was fabled, of a prodigious serpent. But the seventh and eighth centuries were a period of discord and darkness; the library was burnt, the college was abolished, the Iconoclasts are represented as the foes of antiquity; and a savage ignorance and contempt of letters has disgraced the princes of the Heraclian and Isaurian dynasties.

In the ninth century we trace the first revival of Greek dawns of the restoration of science.

After the fanaticism of the Arabs had subsided, the caliphs aspired to conquer the arts, rather than the provinci the empire; their liberal curiosity rekindled the emulation of the Greeks, brushed away the dust from their ancient libraries, and taught them to know and reward the philosophers, whose labours had been hitherto repaid by the pleasure of study and the pursuit of truth. The third, and perhaps the most illustrious of Michael the third, was the generous protector of letters, a title which alone has preserved his memory and excused his ambition. A particle of the treasures of his nephew was sometimes diverted from the indulgence of vice and folly; a school was opened in the palace of Magnaura; and the presence of Bardas I.-II. the in the library and the students of the masters and students. At their head was the philosopher Leo, archbishop of Thessalonica; his profound skill in astronomy and the mathematics was admired by the strangers of the east; and this occult science was magnified by vulgar credulity, which falsely supposes that all knowledge superior to its own must be the effect of inspiration or magic. At the pressing entreaty of the Cesar, his friend the celebrated Photius, renounced the freedom of a secular and studious life, ascended the patriarchal throne, and was alternately excommunicated and absolved by the successors of the east, and the west. By the confession even of priestly hatred, no art or science, except poetry, was foreign to this universal scholar, who was deep in thought, indigatiable in reading, and eloquent in discussion. Whilst he exercised the office of protospathaire, or captain of the guards, Photius was least accursed the caliph's chamber. The long protracted hours of exile, perhaps of confinement, were requited by the hasty composition of his Library, a living monument of erudition and criticism. Two hundred and four score writers, historians, orators, philosophers, theologians, are reviewed without any regular method; he abbreviates their narrative or doctrine, attributes their style and character, and judges even the fathers of the church with a discreet freedom, which often breaks through the superstition of the times.

The last of the Middle Ages.

The last of the Middle Ages, 873. After relating the absurd charge against the emperor, Spanheim, (Hist. Imaginum, p. 93—111) like a true adiuvator of the Cesar, proceeds to describe the contents of the library.

According to Malchus, (Apud Zonar, l. iv. p. 53) this Homer was burnt in the time of Basiliscus. The MS. might be renewed—But on a serpent's skin! Most strange and incredible.

The library of Zonaras, the emperor Michael the Isaurian, of Cedrenus, are strong words, perhaps not ill suited to those reigns.

See Zonaras p. 94, et alii. (Hist. Imaginum, p. 59, 590.) Like Frilar Bacon, the philosopher Leo has been transformed by ignorance into a conjurer: yet not so unobservedly, if the be the author of the oracles more commonly ascribed to the emperor of this name.

The physics of Leo in MS. are in the library of Vienna. (Zonaras p. 94 et alii. (Hist. Imaginum, p. 59, 590.)

The ecological and literary character of Photius is curiously discussed by Hensen: (De Scriptoribus Byzant. p. 820—826) and Fabricius.

Q. E. D.

Apologies can only mean Baghdad, the seat of the caliph; and the relation of his embassy might have been without purpose. But how did he procure his books? A library so numerous could not have been supplied, neither be found at Alexandria, nor approved, or preserved in his memory. Yet the last, howver incredible, seems to be affirmed by Photius himself, (Hist. Imaginum, p. 100—101.) Cannos (Hist. Critique des Journaux, p. 87—94) gives a good account of the Mikrolithion.
The emperor Basil, who lamented the defects of his own education, instructed to the care of Photus his son and successor Leo the philosopher; and the reign of that prince and of his son Constantine Porphyrogenitus forms one of the most prosperous.erae of the Byzantine literature. By their munificence the treasures of antiquity were deposited in the imperial library; by their pen, or those of their associates, they were imparted in such extracts and abridgments as might amuse the curiosity, without oppressing the indolence, of the public. Besides the Basiles, or code of laws, the arts of husbandry and war, of feeding or destroying the natural species, were propagated with equal diligence; and the history of Greece and Rome was digested into fifty-three heads or titles, of which two only (of embassies, and of virtues and vices) have escaped the injuries of time. In every station, the reader might contemplate the image of the past world, apply the lesson or warning of each page, and learn to admire, perhaps to imitate, the examples of a brighter period. I shall not expatiate on the works of the Byzantine Greeks, who, by the assiduous study of the ancients, have deserved, in some measure, the remembrance and gratitude of the moderns. The scholars of the present age may still enjoy the benefit of the philosophical common-place book of Stobaeus, the grammatical and historical lexicon of Suidas, the Chilias of Tzetzes, which comprise six hundred narratives in twelve thousand verses, and the commentaries on Herodotus, archbishop of Thessalonica, who, from his horn of plenty, has poured the names and authorities of four hundred writers. From these originals, and from the numer.ous tribe of scholiasts and critics, some estimate may be formed of the literary wealth of the twelfth century: Constantine was enlightenment of Aristotle and Plato; and in the enjoyment or neglect of our present riches, we must envy the generation that could still peruse the history of Theopompos, the orations of Hyperides, the comedies of Menander, and the odes of Alcaeus and Sappho. The frequent labour of illustration attests not only the existence, but the popularity, of the Grecian classics: the general knowledge of the age may be deduced from the example of two learned females, the empress Eudocia, and the princess Anna Comnena, who cultivated, in the purest manner possible, the arts and sciences. The vulgar dialect of the city was gross and barbarous: a more correct and elaborate style distinguished the discourse, or at least the compositions, of the church and palace, which sometimes affected to copy the purity of the Attic.

Theatres of taste and genius. In our modern education, the painful though necessary attainment of two languages, which are no longer living, may consume the time and damp the ardour of the youthful student. The poets and orators were long imprisoned in the barbarous dialects of our western ancestors, devoid of harmony or grace; and their genius, without precept or example, was abandoned to idle and empty powers of their judgment and fancy. But the Greeks of Constantinople, after purging away the impurities of their vulgar speech, acquired the free use of their ancient language, the most happy composition of human art, and a familiar knowledge of the sublime masters who had pleased or instructed the first of nations. Of these advantages only tend to aggravate the reproach and shame of a degenerate people. They held in their lifeless hands the riches of their fathers, without inheriting the spirit which had created and improved them. It is probable that some new and just improvements were compiled, but their languid souls seemed alike incapable of thought and action. In the revolution of ten centuries, not a single discovery was made to exalt the dignity or promote the happiness of mankind. Not a single idea has been added to the speculative systems of antiquity, and a succession of patient scholars became in their turn the dogmatic teachers of the next servile generation. Not a single composition, of history, philosophy, or literature has been saved from oblivion by the intrinsic beauties of style or sentiment, of original fancy, or even of successful imitation. In proportion as the Byzantine knowledge was absorbed from censure by their naked and unassuming simplicity; but the orators, most eloquent in their own concert, are the farthest removed from the models whom they affect to emulate. In every page our taste is taught to despise the pages of mythology and obsolete words, a still and intricate phraseology, the discord of images, the childish play of false or unseasonable ornament, and the painful attempt to elevate themselves, to astonish the reader, and to involve a trivial meaning in the smoke of obscurity and exaggeration. Their prose is soaring to the vicious affectation of poetry; their poetry is sinking below the flatness and insipidity of prose. The tragic, epic, and lyrical muses were silent and inglorious: the bard of Constantine seldom rose above a riddle or epigram, a panegyric or tale; they forgot even the rules of prosody; and with the melody of Homer yet sounding in their ears, they confound all measure of feet and syllables in the impotent strains which have received the name of political or city verses. The minds of the Greeks were bound in the fetters of a base and improper education, which is repeated only on a larger scale, but in a loosuer form, by the nations of modern Europe: the union of language, religion, and manners, which renders them the spectators and judges of each other's merit; the independence of government and interest which assists their separate freedom, and excites them

8 Of these modern Greeks, see the respective articles in the Bibliotheca Hagiographica, a laborious work, a better method and many improvements: of Eustathius, (tom. i. p. 297—298, 306—325.) of the Psalti, (a diocese of Leo Alattus, ad cath. Constantinopolis, in the Constantine Porphyrogenitus, of sarcophagi, p. 568—569.) of John S.stubas, (tom. viii. p. 405—725.) of Suidas, (tom. ix. p. 637—807.) John Tzetzes, (tom. xii. p. 348—724.) W.harris, (in his Philological Arrangements, op. posth., has given a sketch of this Byzantinelexicon, p. 297—308.) From Ancient and modern evidence, Gerard Vossius (de Poeta Graeca, c. 6.) and Le Clerc (Bibliotheque Choiss, tom. xix. p. 355.) mention a commentary of Michael Psallus on twenty-four plays of Menander, still extant in W. at Constantinople. Yet such classic scholarship was not attended with the finish of a scholar, who pored over the categories, de Psalli, p. 42.) and Michael has probably been confounded with Honorius Scolius, who wrote an account of the grammatical learning of the church. dr. John. A. D. 255. He quotes fifty plays, but he often transcribes the old scholiasts of Aristo- phanes.

9 Anna Comnena must boast of her Greek style, (" Τσίναραبرنامجάλ ουκ ἔχει ἀλήθεια, nor Zemara, her comments on the latter,) or with truth, πραγμάτων ἐν τῇ ἤπειρα ἔργῳ, her. The princess was conversant with the artful dialogues of Plato; and has left us a collection of quatrains in verse, containing a profusion of grace, wit, and allusion, thrice as much as eulogies, arithmetic, and music. (See her preface to the Alexiad, with Dc- canes's note.)
to strive for pre-eminence in the career of glory. The situation of the Romans was less favourable; yet in the early ages of the republic, which fixed the national character, a similar emulation was kindled among the states of Latium and Italy; and, in the arts and sciences, they aspired to equal or surpass their Greek masters. The empire of the Caesars undoubtedly checked the activity and progress of the human mind; its magnitude might indeed allow some scope for domestic competition; but when it was gradually reduced, at first to the east and at last to Greece and Constantinople, the Byzantine subjects were degraded to an abject and languid temper, the natural effect of their solitary and insular position. They were oppressed by nameless tribes of barbarians, to whom they sternly impeded the appellation of men. The language and religion of the more polished Arabs were an insurmountable bar to all social intercourse. The conquerors of Europe were their brethren in the Christian faith; but the speech of the Franks or Latins was unknown, their manners were rude, and they were rarely connected, in peace or war, with the successors of Heraclius. Alone in the universe, the self-satisfied pride of the Greeks was not disturbed by the comparison of foreign merit; and it is no wonder if they fainted in the race, since they had neither competitors to press their speed, nor judges to crown their victory. The nations of Europe and Asia were mingled by the expeditions to the Holy Land; and it is under the Constantinian dynasty that a faint emulation of knowledge and military virtue was rekindled in the Byzantine empire.

CHAPTER XV.

Origin and doctrine of the Paulicians.—Their persecution by the Greek emperors.—Revolts in Armenia, &c.—Transplantation into Thrace.—Propagation in the west.—The seeds, character, and consequences of the reformation.

Sapine super.

In the profession of Christianity, the sion of the variety of national characters may be clearly distinguished. The natives of Syria and Egypt abandoned their licentious and contemplative devotion: Rome again aspired to the dominion of the world; and the wisest and most eloquent Greeks was consumed in the disputes of metaphysical theology. The incomprehensible mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, instead of conciliating the sects of Christendom, were the subject of innumerable and subtle controversies, which enlarged their faith at the expense, perhaps, of their charity and reason. From the council of Nice to the end of the seventh century, the peace and unity of the church was invaded by these spiritual wars; and so deeply did they affect the decline and full of the empire, that the historian has too often been compelled to attend the synods, to explore the creeds, and to enumerate the sects, of this busy period of ecclesiastical annals. From the beginning of the eighth century to the last ages of the empire, the sound of controversy was seldom heard: curiosity was extinct, zeal was fatigued, and, in the decrees of six councils, the articles of the catholic faith had been irrevocably defined. The spirit of dispute, however vain and pernicious, requires some energy to maintain its tone. History has recorded the errors of the faith, and the proselytes Greeks were content to fast, to pray, and to believe, in blind obedience to the patriarch and his clergy. During a long dream of superstition, the Virgin and the Saints, their visions and miracles, their relics and images, were preached by the monks and worshipped by the people; and the appellation of people might be extended, without injustice, to the first ranks of civil society. At an unseasonable moment, the Isaurian emperors attempted somewhat rudely to awaken their subjects; under their influence, reason might obtain some prophets, a far greater number by the legate, but the eastern world embraced or deplored their visible deities, and the restoration of images was celebrated as the feast of orthodoxy. In this passive and unanimous state the ecclesiastical rulers were relieved from the toil, or deprived of the pleasure, of persecuting heretics. The people, by the criticism of the divines, were silent and obscure; the disputes with the Latins were rare and remote hostilities against a national enemy; and the sects of Egypt and Syria enjoyed a free toleration under the shadow of the Arabian caliphs. About the middle of the seventh century, a branch of Manichæans was selected as the victims of spiritual tyranny: they lost their patrician birth, were expelled by the desire of obtaining the title of sovereign, and their exile has scattered over the west the seeds of reformation. These important events will justify some inquiry into the doctrine and story of the Paulicians; a, and, as they cannot plead for themselves, our candid criticism will magnify the good, and perhaps or suspect the evil, that is reported by their adversaries.

The Gnostics, who had distracted the infancy, were oppressed by the greatness and authority, of the church. Instead of emulating or contesting the wealth, learning, and numbers, of the catholics, their obscure remnant was driven from the capitals of the east and west, and confined to the villages and mountains along the borders of the Empirates. Some vestige of the Manichæans may be detected in the fifth century; but the numerous sects were finally lost in the odious name of the Manicheans; and these heretics, who presumed to reconcile the doctrines of Zoroaster and Christ, were pursued by the two religions with equal and unremitting hatred. Under the grand son of Heraclius, in the neighbourhood of Samosata, a more famous sect, the Great of Lucerne, which in the semblance of a Syrian kingdom, a reformer arose, esteemed by the Paulicians as the chosen messenger of truth. In his humble dwelling of Manannal, Constantine entertained a deacon, who returned from Sympatry, and received the inestimable gift of the New Testament, which was already concealed from the vulgar by the prudence of the Greek, and perhaps of the Gnostic clergy. These books became the measure of his studies and the rule of his faith; and the catholics, who dispute his interpretation, acknowledge that his text was genuine and sincere. But he attached himself with peculiar aversion to the writings and character of St. Paul: the name of the Paulicians is derived by their enemies from some unknown and domestic teacher; but I am confident that they gloried in their affinity to the apostle of the gentiles. His disciples, Titus, Timothy, Sylvanus, Trophimus, were represented by Con stantine and his fellow-labourers: the names of the apostolic churches were applied to the congregations which they assembled in Armenia and Cappadocia; and this innocent allegory revived the example and memory of the first ages. In the gospel, and the epistles of St. Paul, his faithful follower investigated the creed of primitive christianity; and, whatever might be the success, a pontifical reader will applaud the spirit, of the inquiry. But if...
282

THE DECLINE AND FALL

the scriptures of the Paulicians were pure, they were not perfect. Their founders rejected the two epistles of St. Peter/ the apostle of the circumcision, whose dispute with their favourite for the ohservance of the law could not easily be forgiven. e They agreed with their Gnostic brethren in the universal contempt for the Old Testament, the hooks of Moses and the prophets, which have been consecrated by the decrees of the
With equal boldness, and doubtless catholic church.
with more reason, Constantine, the new Sylvanus, disclaimed their visions, which, in so many bulky and splendid volumes, had been published by the oriental sects ; ' the fabulous productions of the Hebrew patriarchs and the sages of the east ; the spurious gospels, epistles, and acts, which in the first age had overwhelmed the orthodox code ; the theology of Manes, and the authors of the kindred heresies ; and the thirty generations, or sons, which had been created by the fruitful fancy of Valentine.
The Paulicians sincerely condemned the memory and opinions of the Manichaean sect, and complained of the injustice which impressed that invidious name on the simple votaries of St. Paul and of Christ.
Of the ecclesiastical chain, many links
The simplicity of their belief and had been broken by the Paulician reforworship.
mers ; and their liberty was enlarged as they reduced the number of masters, at whose voice profane reason must bow to mystery and miracle. The early separation of the Gnoslics had preceded the establishment of the catholic worship ; and against the gradual innovations of discipline and doctrine, they!
were as strongly guarded by habit and aversion, as by The obthe silence of St. Paul and the evangelists. jects which had been transformed by the magic of superstition, appeared to the eyes of the Paulicians in

;

j

i

1

|

j

j

I

j

j

genuine and naked colours. An image made without hands, was the common workmanship of a] mortal artist, to whose skill alone the w ood and canvass must be indebted for their merit or value.
The
miraculous relics were aheap of bones and ashes, des-j titute of life or virtue, or of any relation, perhaps, w ith the person to w hom they were ascribed.
The true and Vivifying cross was a piece of sound or rotten timber;
the body and blood of Christ, a loaf of bread and a cup of wine, the gifts of nature and the symbols of grace.
The mother of God was degraded from her celestial honours and immaculate virginity ; and the saints and angels were no longer solicited to exercise the laborious office of mediation in heaven, and ministry upon their

I

j

;

earth.

In the practice, or at least in the theory, of the Chap. XV.

the orthodox mystery of the Trinity : but instead of confessing the human nature and substantial sufferings of Christ, they amused their fancy with a celestial body that passed through the virgin like water through a pipe w ith a fantastic crucifixion, that eluded the vain and impotent malice of the Jews. A creed thus simple and spiritual was not adapted to the geTlie hoW he nius of the times ;5 and the rational chris- two principles of tian, who might have been contented w ith the Magians and
:

™ an

'

c ' ,aeans-

the light yoke and easy burthen of Jesus and his apostles, was justly offended, that the Paulicians should dare to violate the unity of God, the first article of natural and revealed religion.
Their belief and their trust was in the Father, of Christ, of the human soul, and of the invisible world. But they likewise held the eternity of matter ; a stubborn and rebellious substance, the origin of a second principle, of an active being, who has created this visible world, and exercises his temporal reitrn till the final consummation of death and sin. h The appearances of moral and physical evil had established the two principles in the ancient philosophy and religion of the east; from whence this doctrine was transfused to the various swarms of the Gnostics. A thousand shades may be devised in the nature and character of Ahriman, from a rival god to a subordinate daemon, from passion and frailty to pure and perfect malevolence: but, in spite of our efforts, the goodness, and the power, ofOrmusd are placed at the opposite extremities of the line; and every step that approaches the one must recede in equal proportion from the other.'
The apostolic labours of Constantine- The establish...
,.
c,
Sylvanus soon multiplied the number ot ment of the Pauhis disciples, the secret recompense of liciaus in Armespiritual ambition.
The remnant of the cfa Ponu,s &c Gnostic sects, ar.d (-specially the Manicheeans of Armenia, were united under his standard; many catholics were converted or seduced by his arguments ; and he preached with success in the regions of Pontus k and Cappadocia, which had long since imbibed the religion of Zoroaster. The Paulician teachers were distinguished only by their scriptural names, by the n.odest title of fellow-pilgrims, by the austerity of their lives, their zeal or knowledge, and the credit of some extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit.
But they were incapable of desiring, or at least of obtaining, the wealth and honours of the catholic prelacy: such anli-christian pride they bitterly censured
and even the rank of elders or presbyters was condemned as an institution of the Jewish synagogue. The new sect was loosely spread over the provinces of Asia Minor to the w estward of the Euphrates; six of their principal congregations represented the churches to which St. Paul had addressed his epistles ; and their founder chose his residence in the neighbourhood of Colonia, in the same district of Pontus which had been celebrated bv the altars of Bellona m
.

.

,

'

.

,

,

,

..

-

'

'

;

sacraments, the Paulicians were inclined to abolish all visible objects of worship, and the w ords of the gospel were, in their judgment, the baptism and communion of the faithful.
They indulged a convenient latitude for the interpretation of Scripture; and as often as they were pressed by the literal sense, they could escape to the intricate mazes of figure and allegory.
Their utmost diligence must have been employed to g The six capital errors of the Paulicians are defined by Peter dissolve the connexion between the Old and the New Siculus, (p. 755.) with much prejudice and pafsion.
bPfimum iltorum axioma est, duo rerum esse principia Ileum Testament; since they adored the latter as the oracles malum el Ileum r.onum, atiumque lnijus mundi condilorem el prinof God, and abhorred the former as the fabulous and cipem, et alium futuri sevi. (Petr. Sicul. p. 756.) Two learned critics, Beausobrp, (Hist. Critique du IManicheisme, ahsurd invention of men or daemons. cannot he 1.1. iv. v. vi.) and Moaheim, (Institut. Hist. Eccles. and de Rebus surprised that they should have found in the gospel Cnnsuanis ante Constaniinuoi, sec ii.iii.) have laboured to explore 1

;

We

i

i.

d In rejecting the second epistle of St. Peter, the Fauliciaus are justified by some of the most respectable of the ancients and moderns. (See Wetstein ad luc. Simon, Hist. Critique du Nouveau Testament, c. 17.) They likewise overlooked the Apocalypse, (Petr.
Sicul. p. 755.) but as such neglect is not imputed as a crime, the Greeks of the ninth century must have been careless of the credit and honour of the Revelations. t This contention, which has not escaped the malice of Porphyry, supposes some error and passion in one or both of the apostles. By Chrysostom, Jerom, and Erasmus, it is represented as a sham quarrel, a pious fraud, for the benefit of the Gentiles and the correction
I Those who are curious of this heterodox library, may consult the 305—437.) Even in Africa, St. Austin could describe the Manichaan books, lam multi, tam grandes, tarn pretiosi codices, (contra Faust, xiii. 14.) but he adds, without pity, Incendite omnes illas membranas: and his advice has bean rigorously fallowed.

and discriminate the various systems of the Gnostics on the subject of tne two principles.
k The countries between the Euphrates and the Halvs were possessed above 350 years by the Medes (Herodot. 1. i. c. 103.) and Persians; and the kinss of Pontus were of the royal race of the Achaemenides. (Sallusl. Fragment. 1. iii. with the French supplement and notes of the President de Brasses.) 1 illost probably founded by Pompey after the conquest of Pontus.

This Colonia, on the Lycus above Neo-C'asarea, is named bv the Turks Coulei-hisar, cr Ciionac, a populous town in a strong country.
(D'Anville, Geographic Ancienne.tom. ii. p. 34. Tournefort, Vovage du Lpvant, torn. iii. letlre xxf. p. 293.)
m The temple of Bellona. at Comana in Pontus, was a powerful and wealthy foundation, and the high priest was respected as the second person in the kingdom. As the sacerdotal office had been occupied by his mother's family, Strabo (1. lit. p. 809. 835, 836, 837.) dwells with peculiar complacency on the temple, the worship, and festival, which was twice celebrated every vear.
But the Bellona
of Po3lus had iSj- features and character of the eoddtss, not of war, but of iore.


and the miracles of Gregory.\footnote{Gregory, Bishop of Neo-Caesarea, (A. D. 295—303.) surmained Thaumaturgus, or the Wonder-worker. A hundred years afterwards, the history or romance of his life was composed by Gregory of Nyssa, bishop of Cappadocia, and Jerome, bishop of Strasburg, in a work now lost. He is called the father of monks. His labours in Egypt, and the oracles he uttered while there, were numerous, but he was so unhappy that he was forced to withdraw to the desert, and perform self-sacrificing services to God; he afterwards announced himself as the last and greatest of the living, and the necessary representative of the present age. Either a compound of some of his sayings, or an imitation which gained him the title of Syrius, forming a collection of his later discourses and sayings. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the story of the life of Gregory and his miracles long continued to be held in the same high estimation as any of the other popular legends.}\footnote{Hoc ceterum ad sua egregia faciunt, divini atque orthodoxi impertinentes addidisse, et Magnesias Montanisticus capsulat puniti venturi sacerdoti, eunomique libros, quosque in loco inventi est, familiam tradit; quod aequus teipsum quaeso accipiant reverentia, quominus humane doceri vestri nobis, iuxta eundem informi, (Petr. Sicul. p. 739.) What more could bigotry and persecution desire?} After a mission of twenty-seven years, Sylvanus, who had retired from the tolerant government of the Arabs, fell a sacrifice to Roman persecution. The laws of the Greek church of the pious emperors, which seldom compromised in any instance, took the lives of less odious heretics, proscribed the literary or Learned, the books, and the persons of the Montanists and Manichaeans: the books were delivered to the flames; and all who should presume to secrete such writings, or to profess such opinions, were devoted to an ignominious death.\footnote{It is supposed that this was the period of the first great persecution against the Christians, known by the name of the Heathen Persecution. (p. 589.)}

A Greek minister armed with legal and military power, sought to extinguish the feelings of the people, by the terror of the fire, and by the example of the apostle, to whom the book of doctrine had been united, and to reclaim, if possible, the lost sheep. By a refinement of cruelty, Simeon placed the unfortunate Sylvanus before a line of his disciples, who were commanded, as the price of their pardon and the proof of their repentance, to massacre their spiritual father. They turned aside from the impious office; the stones dropped from their filial bands, and of the whole number, only one executioner could be found, a new David, as he is styled by the catholics, who boldly overthrew the giant of heresy. This apostate, Justianus was his name, again deceived and betrayed his unsuspecting brother, and armed the guards of the holy temple, who may be found in the conversion of Simeon: like the apostle, he embraced the doctrine which he had been sent to persecute, renounced his honours and fortunes, and acquired among the Paulicians the fame of a missionary and a martyr. They were not ambitious of many converts, but in a calamitous period of nearly fifty years, their patience sustained whatever zeal could inflict; and power was insufficient to eradicate the obstinate vegetation of fanaticism and reason. From the blood and ashes of the first victims, a succession of teachers and congregations repeatedly arose: amidst the tumult of hostilities, the fires were covered with the fruits of their quarrels: they preached, they disputed, they suffered; and the virtues, the apparent virtues, of Sergusius, in a pilgrimage of thirty-three years, are reluctantly confessed by the orthodox historians. The native cruelty of Justinian the second was stimulated by a pious cause; and he vainly hoped to extinguish, in a single configuration, the name and memory of the Paulicians. By their primitive simplicity, their adherence of popular superstition, the Iconoclast princes might have been reconciled to some erroneous doctrines; but they themselves were exposed to a continual or the more violent attacks. The Paulicians, for the whole of their period, were justly accused as the accomplices, of the Manichaeans. Such a reproach has silenced the eloquence of Nicephorus, who relaxed in their favour the severity of the penal statutes, nor will he character sustain the honours of a more liberal motive. The feeble Michael the first, the rigid Leo the Armenian, were foremost in the race of persecution; but the prize must doubtless be adjudged to the sanguinary devotion of Theodore, who restored the images to the oriental church. Her insinuations explored the cities and mountains of the leasants, and the dwellers of the snow. They were accordingly confirmed, that in a short reign, one hundred thousand Paulicians were extirpated by the sword, the gibbet, or the flames. Her guilt or merit has perhaps been stretched beyond the measure of truth; but if the account be allowed, it must be presumed that many simple Iconoclasts were punished under a more odious name; and that some who were driven from the church, unwillingly took refuge in the bosom of heresy.

The most furious and desperate of revolts of the Paulicians were the sectaries of a religion long persecuted, and at length provoked. In A. D. 643—650, a holy cause they are no longer susceptible of fear or remorse the justice of their arms hardens them against the hands of their foes, and they rouse up their father's wrongs on the children of their tyrants. Such have been the Hussites of Bohemia and the Calvinists of France, and such in the ninth century, were the Paulicians of Armenia and the adjacent provinces.\footnote{They were first awakened to the massacre of a governor and bishop, who exercised the imperial mandate of converting or destroying the heretics: and the deepest recesses of mount Argus protected their independence and revenge. A more dangerous and consuming flame was kindled by the persecution of Theodore, and the revolt of Carthage, a valiant Paulician, who commanded a motley of the general of the east, and who had been impaled by the catholic inquisitors; and religion, or at least nature, might justify his desertion and revenge. Five thousand of his brethren were united by the same motives; they renounced the allegiance of antichristian Rome; a Saracen emir introduced Carthage to the calamities of the east, his father had extended his sceptre to the implacable enemy of the Greeks. In the mountains between Seb. and Trebizond he founded or fortified the city of Tephrice, which is still occupied by a fierce and licentious people, and the neighbouring hills are still defiled with the Paulician fugitives, who now reconcile the use of the Bible and the sword. During more than thirty years, Asia was afflicted by the calamities of foreign and domestic war: in their hostile inroads the disciples of St. Paul were joined with those of Mahomet; and the peaceful christians, the aged parent and tender virgin, who were delivered into barbarous servitude, might justly accuse the intolerant spirit of their sovereign. So urgent was the mischief, so intolerable the shame, that even the dissolute Michael, the son of Theodore, was compelled to march in person against the Paulicians; he was defeated before the walls of Saracens and the Romans; and fled before the heretics whom his mother had condemned to the flames. The Saracens fought under the same banners, but the victory was ascribed to Carthage; and the captives generals, with more than a hundred tribunes, were either released by his aversion, or tortured by his fanaticism. The valour and ambition of Chrysocheir, his successor, embraced a wider circle of rapine and revenge. In alliance with his faithful Moslem, he boldly penetrated into the heart of Asia; the troops of the frontier and the palace were repeatedly overran, and the cities of Persia and Armenia were shivered to the dust. The provinces were for a long time in a state of Moir.}

\footnote{Voyage en Turquie et en Perse, tom. ii.} Nica and Niconomedia, of Ancyra and Ephesus: nor could the apostle St. John protect from violence his city and sepulchre. The cathedral of Ephesus was turned into a stable for mullocks, and the Paulicians were enslaved by the Saracens in their contempt and abhorrence of images and relics. It is not unpleasant to the orientals, who are in general justly considered as the plunderers of the ensigns of heaven, and who have taken the same part in the plunder of the images of the world.\footnote{Poterius Siculus, (p. 763, 764.) the compiler of Theophrastus, (L. iv. c. 2. p. 853, 854) Cedrenus, (p. 541, 542, 545) and Zonaras, (tom. ii. xvi. p. 156.) describe the revolt and exploits of Carabas and his Paulicians.}\footnote{Cedrenus (p. 570—573) is without their passions or their knowledge.}
sing to observe the triumph of rebellion over the same despotism which has disdained the prayers of an injured people. The emperor Basil, the Macedonian, was reduced to despair, to offer his provinces to the soldiery, and to request, in the language of moderation and charity, that Chrysocheir would spare his fellow christians, and content himself with a royal donative of gol'd and silver and silk garments. "If the emperor," replied the insolent fanatic, "he desirous of peace, let him abandon the East, and retire to the distant mountains in the west. If he refuse, the servants of the Lord will precipitate him from the throne." The reluctant Basil suspended the treaty, accepted the defiance, and led his army into the land of heresy, which he wasted with fire and sword. The open country of the Paul-icians was exposed to the same calamities which they had inflicted; but when he had explored the strength of Tephrice, the multitude of the barbarians, and the ample magazines of arms and provisions, he desisted with a sigh from the hopeless siege. On his return to Constantinople he laboured, by the foundation of convents and churches, to secure the aid of his celestial patrons, of Michael the archangel and the prophet Elijah; and it was his daily prayer that he might live to transpire, with three arrows, the head of his impious adversary. Beyond his expectations, the wish was accomplished, for, in succession, Chrysocheir was surprised and slain in his retreat; and the rebel's head was triumphantly presented at the foot of the throne. On the reception of this welcome trophy, Basil instantly called for his bow, discharged three arrows with unerring aim, and accepted the applause of the court. Thus fell the shadow of the royal archer.

With Chrysocheir, the glory of the Paul-icians faded and withered; 2 on the second expedition of the emperor, the impregnable Tephrice was despoiled by the heretics, who sacked and plundered the city and its inhabitants; and it was his daily prayer that he might live to transpire, with three arrows, the head of his impious adversary. Beyond his expectations, the wish was accomplished, for, in succession, Chrysocheir was surprised and slain in his retreat; and the rebel's head was triumphantly presented at the foot of the throne. On the reception of this welcome trophy, Basil instantly called for his bow, discharged three arrows with unerring aim, and accepted the applause of the court. Thus fell the shadow of the royal archer.

Their decline.

About the middle of the eighth centuy the w-o-r-s-h-i-p-p-e-r-s of images, had made an expedition into Armenia, and found, in the cities of Melittene and Theodosiopolis, a great number of Paul-icians, their kindred heretics. As a favour, or punishment, for their resistance, they were transplanted them from the banks of the Araxes to Constantinople and Thrace; and by this emigration their doctrine was introduced and diffused in Europe. 3 If the sectaries of the metropolis were soon mingled with the promiscuous mass, those of the country struck a deep root in a foreign soil. The Paulicians of Thrace resisted the storms of persecution, maintained a secret correspondence with their Armenian brethren, and gave aid and comfort to their preachers, who solicited, not without success, the instant faith of the Bulgarians. 4 In the tenth century, they were again persecuted and multiplied by a more powerful dynasty, which John Zimisces, the biographer of the Chalylhian hills to the valleys of mount Hemus. The oriental clergy, who would have preserved the damage, im-pairingly sought for the absence of the Man-ichceans; the warlike emperor had felt and esteemed their value: their attachment to the Saracens was 9 Συμπληροτητική που το τεχνητά πραξίς. How elegant were they in their mode of conversation.

10 Chrysocheir transported his myriads of heretics; and thus ra-two riddles, says Cedrenus, (p. 482) who has copied the annals of the Theophanes.

11 Petrus Nicolaus, who resided nine months at Tephrice (A.D. 470) for the ransom of captives, (p. 767) was informed of their intended mission, and addressed his preservative, the Histoire Manichceen, to the archbishop of Bulgaria.

12 The colony of Paulicians and Jacobites, transplanted by John Zimisces (A.D. 570) from Armenia to Thrace, is mentioned by Zo-arce (coniii. 1, p. 259) and Anna Comnena, (Alexiad, i. iv, p. 459, vol. xxvii. p. 397, etc. )

13 The Ateles of Anna Comnena, ii. c. 13, xi. c. 184, 155, xiv. p. 420—357, with the Annotations of Ducange, prove the existence of cutaneous skinnings of the apoptic father with the Manichceans, whose abominable heresy was the subject of the harangus of religion.

14 Basil, a monk, and the author of the Rostenites, a sect of Geno-s, who soon vanished. (Anna Comnena, Alexiad, i. iv, p. 496—494. Mochier, Hist. Ecclesiastica, p. 330.)

15 Blatt, Paris, Hist. Maxe, p. 267. This passage of our English hist-ians affects the loss of a large body of evidence in an exhibition of the Manichcean system in the thirteenth century. (No. 28.)

16 See Mariotti, Stato Militar dell' Imperio Ottomano, p. 24.
more adapted to confirm, than to refute, the belief of an evil principle. The visible assemblies of the Paelu- cici were extirpated with the sword; and the bleeding remnant escaped by flight, concealment, or catholic conformity. But the invincible spirit which they had kindled still lived and breathed in the western world. In the state, in the church, and even in the cloister, a latent succession was perpetually combined and preserved of the high band against the tyranny of Rome, embraced the Bible as the rule of faith, and purified their creed from all the visions of the Gnostic theology. The struggles of Wickliff in England, of Huss in Bohemia, were premature and ineffectual; but the names of Zwingli, Luther, and other reformers are pronounced with gratitude as the deliverers of nations.

A philosopher, who calculates the character and gree of their merit and the value of their consequences of reformation, will prudently ask from what articles of faith, above or against our reason, they have enfranchised the christians; for such enforcement is a doubtless a benefit so far as it may be compat- tible with truth and piety. After a fair discussion we shall rather he surprised by the timidity, than scanda- lized by the freedom of our first reformers. With the Jews, they adopted the belief and defence of all the Jewish scriptures with all their prophecies, from the garden of Eden to the most trivial and paltry events of Daniel; and they were bound, like the catholics, to justify against the Jews the abolition of a divine law. In the great mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation the reformers were severely orthodox: they freely adopted the theology of the four, or the first six, councils; and with the Athanasian creed, they pronounced the eternal damnation of all who did not believe the catholic faith. Transubstantiation, the invisible change of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, is a tenet that may delay the power of argument and plausability; but instead of consulting the evidence of their senses, of their sight, their feeling, and their taste, the first protestants were entangled in their own scriptures, and awed by the words of Jesus in the institution of the sacrament. Luther maintained a corporal, and Calvin a real, presence of Christ in the eucharist; and the opinion of Zuingius, that it is no more a spiritual communion, a simple memorial, has since prevailed in the reformed churches. But the loss of one mys- tery was amply compensated by the stupendous doc- trines of original sin, redemption, faith, grace, and predestination, which have been strained from the epistles of St. Paul. These subtle questions had most probably been necessarily brought up by the passions which existed in the reformed churches, but the final improvement and popular use may be attributed to the first reformers, who enforced them as the absolute and essential terms of salvation. Hitherto the weight of supernatural belief inclines against the Protestants; and many a sober christian would rather admit a wafer is a God, than that God is a cruel and capricious tyrant.

Yet the services of Luther and his rivals are solid and important; and the philosopher must own his obli- gations to these fearless enemies. By the hands of the lofty fabric of superstition, from the abuse of indulgences to the intercession of the Virgin, has 1092 with a previous history of the inquisition in general. They preserved a more reciprocal character in the first state even Satan, or the Holy Office, I will observe, that of a list of criminals which fills nineteen folio pages, only fifteen men and four women were delivered by the secular arm in all these cases. The Pater noster, or Pater Noster, is clearly intended to make a sign of salutation to the godhead, and the one among the original and pleasant faces, (Ducange, Gloss. Latinis, medit. et in- fmit. Rev. Enl.) The 398 reformers were likewise named Cathari, or Gnosis, by corruption, Gueux, or Guizers. Of the laws, crusade, and persecution against the Albigeois, a full account may be found in the ecclesiastical historians, ancient and modern, falling under protestants; and among these Flurey is the most impartial and moderate.

A The acts (Liber Sententiarum) of the Inquisition of Theolou (A.D. 1287-1292) have been published by Lumbach (Amsterdam, 1692), with a previous history of the inquisition in general. They preserved a more reciprocal character in the first state even Satan, or the Holy Office, I will observe, that of a list of criminals which fills nineteen folio pages, only fifteen men and four women were delivered by the secular arm in all these cases. The Pater noster, or Pater Noster, is clearly intended to make a sign of salutation to the godhead, and the one among the original and pleasant faces, (Ducange, Gloss. Latinis, medit. et in- fmit. Rev. Enl.) The 398 reformers were likewise named Cathari, or Gnosis, by corruption, Gueux, or Guizers. Of the laws, crusade, and persecution against the Albigeois, a full account may be found in the ecclesiastical historians, ancient and modern, falling under protestants; and among these Flurey is the most impartial and moderate.

1092 with a previous history of the inquisition in general. They preserved a more reciprocal character in the first state even Satan, or the Holy Office, I will observe, that of a list of criminals which fills nineteen folio pages, only fifteen men and four women were delivered by the secular arm in all these cases. The Pater noster, or Pater Noster, is clearly intended to make a sign of salutation to the godhead, and the one among the original and pleasant faces, (Ducange, Gloss. Latinis, medit. et in- fmit. Rev. Enl.) The 398 reformers were likewise named Cathari, or Gnosis, by corruption, Gueux, or Guizers. Of the laws, crusade, and persecution against the Albigeois, a full account may be found in the ecclesiastical historians, ancient and modern, falling under protestants; and among these Flurey is the most impartial and moderate.

A The acts (Liber Sententiarum) of the Inquisition of Theolou (A.D. 1287-1292) have been published by Lumbach (Amsterdam,
been levelled with the ground. Myriads of both sexes of the monastic profession were restored to the liberty and labours of social life. An hierarchy of saints and angels, of imperfect and subordinate deities, were stripped of their temporal power, and reduced to the enjoyment of celestial happiness: their images and relics were banished from the church; and the credulity which was no longer supported by the daily repetition of miracles and visions. The imitation of paganism was supplied by a pure and spiritual worship of prayer and thanksgiving, the most worthy of man, the least un worthy of the Deity. It only remains to observe, whether such sublime simplicity be consistent with our devotion, whether the veil of ignorance, in the absence of all visible objects, will not he inflamed by enthusiasm, or insensibly subsist in languour and indifference. II. The chain of authority was broken, which restrains the bigot from thinking as he pleases, and the slave from speaking as he thinks: the popes, fathers, and councils, were no longer the supreme and infallible judges of the world; and each christian was taught to acknowledge no law but the scriptures, no interpreter but his own conscience. This freedom, however, was the consequence, rather than the design, of the reformation. The distinct reformers were ambitious of succeeding the tyrants whom they had dethroned. They imposed with equal rigour their creeds and confessions; they asserted the right of the magistrate to punish heretics with death. The pride or personal animosity of Calvin proscribed in Servetus; the pope's own rebellion and the banditti of Smithfield, in which he was afterwards consumed, had been kindled by the Anabaptists by the zeal of Cranmer. The nature of the tiger was the same, but he was gradually deprived of his teeth and fangs. A spiritual and temporal kingdom was possessed by this new institution; the protestants were objects of an humble rank, without revenue or jurisdiction. His decrees were consecrated by the authority of the catholic church: their arguments and disputes were submitted to the people; and their appeal to private judgment was accepted beyond their wishes, by curiosity and enthusiasm. Since the days of Luther and Calvin, a secret reformation has been silently working in the bosom of the reformed churches; many weeds of prejudice were eradicated; and the disciples of Erasmus diffused a spirit of freedom and moderation. The liberty of conscience has been acknowledged as a common benefit, an inalienable right: the free governments of Holland and England introduced the practice of toleration; and the narrow allowance of the laws has been enlarged by the prudence and humanity of the times. In the exercise, the mind has understood the limits, of its powers, and the words and shadows that might amuse the child can no longer satisfy his manly reason. The weapons of controversy are overspread with cob webs; the doctrine of a pre-established church is far removed from the knowledge or belief of its private members; and the forms of orthodoxy, the articles of faith, are subscribed with a sigh, or a smile, by the modern clergy. Yet the friends of christianity are alarmed at this boundless inroads into scepticism. The predictions of the catholics are accomplished: the web of mystery is unravelled by the Armenians, Arians, and Socinians, whose numbers must not be computed from their separate congregations; and the pillars of revelation are shaken by those men who preserve the same without the substance of religion, who indulge the licent without the temper of philosophy.

CHAPTER X
The Bulgarians.—Origin, migrations, and settlement of the Hungarians.—Their inroads in the east and west.—The memoir of Russia.—Geography and trade.—Wars of the Russians against the Greek empire.—Conquest of the barbarians.

Under the reign of Constantine the grandson of Heracleus, the ancient barrier of the Danube, so often violated and so often restored, was irretrievably swept away by a new deluge of barbarians. Their progress was favoured by the caliph, their unknown and accursed monarchies: the protestants were deprived of their affairs in Asia; and after the loss of Syria, Egypt, and Africa, the Cæsars were twice reduced to the danger and disgrace of defending their capital against the Saracen. If, in the account of this interesting people, I have deviated from the strict and original line of my undertaking, the merit of the subject will hide my transgression, or solicit my excuse. In the east, in the west, in war, religion, in science, in their prosperity, and in their decay, the Abbean press themselves on our curiosity; the first overlook of the church and empire of the Greeks may be imputed to their relapse into paganism; their second is mainly due to the civil and religious sceptre of the oriental world. But the same labour would be unworthily bestowed on the swarms of savages, who, between the seventh and the twelfth century, descended from the plains of Scythia, in transient head, or perpetual emigration. Their names are uncountable, their origins doubtful, their actions obscure, their superstition was blind, their valor brutal, and the uniformity of their public lives was neither softened by innocence, nor refined by policy. The majesty of the Byzantine empire repelled and survived their disorderly attacks; the greater part of these barbarians has disappeared of the United Provinces. I am not satisfied with Groton, de Rebus Bellicis, Annal. i. i, p. 13, &c. ed. in 12mo, who approves the imperial laws of persecution, and only condemns the bloody tribunal of the inquisition. Sir William Blackstone (Commentaries, vol. iv. p. 53, 54,) explains the laws of England as it was fixed at the Revolution. The exceptions of papists, and of those who deny the Trinity, would still leave a tolerable scope for persecution, if the national spirit were less effectual than a hundred decrees.

I shall recommend to public attention two passages in Mr. Pressley, which betray the ultimate tendency of his opinions. At the first page of his "Reflections on the Principles of Christianity," (p. 275, 276,) the priest, at the second, (vol. i. p. 494,) the magistrate, may transfer this extract from the "History of Populous ad Danubium, Pontum Euxinum, Palatium Memelium," Caesarm, and I will admit that only decided images of the "Debates of the Synod of Cappadocia," (p. 171—172.) Potæpolis, 1721—1727. In four tomes, or six volumes, in folio. But the fashion has not enhanced the price of these rare materials.
without leaving any memorial of their existence, and the despicable remnant continues, and may long continue, to groan under the dominion of a foreign tyrant. From the antiquities of, I. Bulgarians, II. Hungarians, and, III. Russians, I shall content myself with selecting such facts as yet deserve to be remembered. The conquests of the, IV. Normans, and the monarchy of the, V. Venetians, will naturally terminate in the famous Crusades to the Holy Land, and the double fall of the city and empire of Constantinople.

Emigration of

In his march to Italy, Theodore the Bulgarians, Ostrogoth had trampled on the arms of the Bulgarians. After this defeat, the name and the nation did not long dwindle away. Perhaps, it may be supposed that the same or a similar appellation was revived by strong colonies from the Borysthenes, the Tanais, or the Volga. A king of the ancient Bulgaria bequeathed to his five sons a last lesson of moderation and concord. It was received as youth has over received the counsel of age and experience: the five princes buried their fathers' death; divided his subjects and cattle; forgot his advice; separated from each other; and wandered in quest of fortune, till we find the most adventurous in the heart of Italy, under the protection of the exarch of Ravenna, but frequenting the imperial court. The Bulgarians were impelled towards the capital. The modern Bulgaria, along the southern banks of the Danube, was stumped with the name and image which it has retained to the present hour: the new conquerors successively acquired, by war or treaty, the Roman provinces of Dalmatia, Thrace, Thessaly, Macedonia, Thrace, Peloponnesus, and Phrygia; and, in short, the west of Asia Minor. The ecclesiastical supremacy was transferred from the native city of Justinian; and, in their prosperous age, the obscure town of Lychnidus, or Achrida, was honoured with the throne of a king and a patriarch. The unquestionable evidence of language attests the descent of the Bulgarians from Slavonic, or more properly Slavonic, race: and the kindred bands of Servians, Bosnians, Rascians, Croatians, Walachians, &c. followed either the standard or the example of the leading tribe.

From the Euxine to the Adriatic, in the state of captives, or objects, or allies, or enemies, of the Greek empire, they overspread the land; and the national appellation of the slaves has been degraded by chance or malice from the signification of glory to that of servitude.

Among these colonies the Chrobatians, or Croats, who now attend the motions of an Austrian army, are the descendants of a mighty people, the conquerors and sovereigns of Dalmatia. The maritime cities, and of these the infant republic of Ragusa, implored the aid and instructions of the Byzantine court: they were associated with the republic, and were made to serve a small acknowledgment of their fidelity to the Roman empire, and to appease, by an annual tribute, the wrath of these irresistible barbarians. The kingdom of Croatia was shared by eleven Zoupanos, or feudatory lords; and their united forces were numbered to six thousand men. There were great and frequent expeditions against them; but it must be observed that the close of the tenth century that the freedom and sovereignty of the gulf were effectually vindicated by the Venetian republic. The ancestors of these Dalmatian kings were equally removed from the use and abuse of navigation; they dwelt in the White Croatia, in the inland regions of Silesia and Little Poland; and thirty days' journey, according to the Greek computation, from the sea of darkness.

The glory of the Bulgarians was First kingdom confined to a narrow scope both of time and place. In the ninth and tenth centuries, they reached the shores of the Black Sea, and a branch of the Danube; but the more powerful nations that had followed their emigration, repelled all return to the north and all progress to the west. Yet, in the obscure catalogue of their exploits, they might boast an honour which had hitherto been appropriated to the Goths; that of slaying in battle one of the successors of Augustus and Constantine. The emperor Nicophon had lost his fame in the Arabian, he lost his life in the Scythian, war. In his first operations he advanced with boldness and success to the centre of Bulgaria, and burnt the royal court, which was probably no more than an edifice of timber: but he soon retreated, searched the spoil, and refused all offers of treaty, his enemies collected their spirits and their forces: the passes of retreat were insuperably barred; and the trembling Nicophon was heard to exclaim: "Alas! alas! unless we could assume the wings of birds, we cannot hope to escape." Two days he waited his fate in the inactivity of despair; but, on the morning of the third, the Bulgarian surprised the camp; and the Roman prince, with the great officers of the empire, were slaughtered in their tents. The body of Valens had been saved from insult; but

A.D. 533.

A.D. 533.

A.D. 600 &c.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.

A.D. 917-919.
have expired of grief and horror; the nation was saved by this terrible example; the Bulgarians were swept away from their settlements, and consigned within a narrow province; the surviving chiefs bequeathed to their children the advice of patience and the duty of revenge.

After this, the black swarm of Hungarians first hung over Europe, about the year 439. For nine hundred years after the Christian era, they were mistaken by fear and superstition for the Gog and Magog of the Scriptures, the signs and forerunners of the end of the world. Since then, they have departed to their ancestral home, and are lost for ever in their own antiquities with a strong and laudable impulse of patriotic curiosity. Their rational criticism can no longer be amused with a vain pedigree of Attila and the Huns; but they complain that their primitive records have perished in the Tartar war; that the truth or fiction of their rustic songs is long since forgotten; and that the fragments of a rude chronicle must be painfully reconciled with the contemporary though foreign intelligence of the imperial geographer, Magist "is the national and oriental denomination of the Hungarians; but, among the tribes of Scythia they are distinguished by the tigresses, and by their peculiar name of Turks, as the descendants of that mighty people who had conquered and reigned from China to the Volga. The Pannonian colony preserved a correspondence of trade and amity with the eastern Tartars, in the confines of Persia; and after a separation of three hundred and fifty years, established in the fifteenth century the kindred of the Hungarians discovered and visited their ancient country near the banks of the Volga. They were hospitably entertained by a people of pagans and savages, who still bore the name of Hungarians; conversed with the chief, who presided over that distant empire; they halted in the usual stations along the banks of the great rivers; and in the territories of Moscow, Kiow, and Moldavia, some vestiges have been discovered of their temporary residence. In this long and various pegeation, they could not always es- cape the dominion of the stronger; and the purity of their blood was improved or sullied by the mixture of

1 A bishop of Wurtzbut submitted this opinion to a revered abbé; but he more gravely decided, that Gog and Magog were the spiritual persecutors of the church; since Gog signifies the root, the pride of the He-saraca, and Magog what comes from the root, preparation of their sects. Yet these men once commanded the respect of the most learned historians,

2 The national authors, from whom I have derived the most assistance, are George Pis, Dissertations ad Annales veterum Hungarorum, Ac. Videoboue, 1772, in folio; and Stephan Katon (Hist. Crítica Ducum et Regum Hungariae stirpi Arpadiane, Pari- sii, 1779-1781, 3 tomes). The first embraces a large and often conjectural space; the latter, by his learning, judgment, and penetration, derives the name of a critical historian.

3 The author of this Chronicle is styled the notary of king Buda- khan; he has assigned to him the twelfth century, and de-fined his character by the title of editor. The Simeon, Gesta regum Hungarorum, gives his rule as the first occasion of the rule of the gede- mentum populum Apostolicam, id est munici- pium, none pue Bugariorum Apostoli praepositor, hominorum, delitutorum (Lustrient, in Loga- tion, p. 482.) See the Commentarius Constantini Forbogeneum, tom. ii. p. 84 tom, ii. p. 427, 432, 434, 415, 441, 445, 447, with the annotations of Gruben.
a foreign race: from a motive of compulsion, or choice, several tribes of the Chazars were associated with them in an almost perpetual vassalage; and invested with the use of a second language; and obtained by their superior renown the most honourable place in the front of battle. The military force of the Turks and their allies marched in seven equal and artificial divisions; each division was formed of thirty thousand eight hundred and fifty men, or a total of two hundred and fifty thousand, in all. The reception which had been declined by the modest Lebedius, was granted to the birth or merit of Almus and his son Arpad, and the authority of the supreme khan of the Chazars confirmed the engagement of the prince and people; of the people to obey his commands, of the prince to consult their happiness and glory.

Their Fennic

With this narrative we might be re-originate, reasonably content, if the penetration of modern learning had not opened a new and larger prospect of the antiquities of nations. The Hungarian language stands alone, and as it were insulated among the languages of the Germanic tribes, and still exhibits a certain affinity to the idioms of the Fennic race; of an obsolete and savage race, which formerly occupied the northern regions of Asia and Europe. The genuine appellation of Lygri or Izouros is found on the western confines of China; their migration to the brain of Europe is attested by Tartar evidence; a similar name and language are detected in the southern parts of Siberia; and the remains of the Fennic tribes are widely, though thinly, scattered from the shores of the Ob to the shores of Lapland. The consanguinity of the Hungarians and Laplanders would display the powerful energy of climate on the children of a common parent; the lively contrast between the bold adventurers who are intoxicated with the wines of the Danube, and the wretched fugitives who are immersed beneath the snows of the polar circle. Arms and freedom have ever been the ruling, though too often the unsuccessful, passion of the Hungarians, who are endowed by nature with a vigorous constitution of soul and body. Extreme cold has diminished the stature and congealed the faculties of the Laplanders; and the Arctic tribes, alone among the sons of man, are ignorant of the galling sinews of human blood: a happy ignorance, if reason and virtue were the guardians of their peace!

7 Fischer, in the Quaestiones Petropatranæ, de Origine Ungarorum, and Pray, Dissertation. i. 6. iii. c. have drawn up several comparative tables of the Hungarian with the Fennic dialects. The affinity is indeed striking, but the lists are short; the words are purposely chosen; and I read in the learned Bayer, (Commerc. Academ. Petropol. tom. x. p. 374.) that although the Hungarian has adopted many Fennic words, (innomina voces) it essentially differs geno et natura.

2 In the region of Turfan, which is clearly and minutely described by the Chinese geographers, (Goushi, Hist. du Grand Genggacun, p. 13;) De Quignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. ii. p. 31, &c.

3 Vrochii de Cepes des Tartars, par Aboulzah Bahadur Khan, partie ii. p. 50—56.

4 In their journey to Pekin, both Ibrand Ives (Harries's Collection of Voyages and Travels, vol. i. p. 520, 521,) and Bell (Travels, vol. i. p. 174,) found the Voguls in the neighborhood of Tobolsky. By the nature of the stygian character, the Fennic, and Tartar, are accorded to the same name; the circumpacent mountains really bear the appellation of Ugræ; and all of the Fennic dialects, the Vogul is the paces of the Iberian, the Fennic, and the Tungusic, to the same name; the mountainous countenance really bears the appellation of Ugræan; and all of the Fennic dialects, the Vogul is the paces of the Iberian, the Fennic, and the Tungusic, to the same name; the mountainous countenance really bears the appellation of Ugræan; and all of the Fennic dialects, the Vogul is the paces of the Iberian, the Fennic, and the Tungusic, to the same name.

5 Fischer, Dissertation. i. 6. iii. c. have drawn up several comparative tables of the Fennic race are described in the curious work of M. Leveauque, (Hist. des Peuples soumis à la domination de la Russie, tom. i. p. 361—364.)

6 Leo has observed, that the government of the Turks was monarchical; and that the Turkish author of the Voyages, which all the Scuthian hordes resembled each other in their pastoral and military life, that they A. D. 990, &c. all practised the same means of subsistence, and employed the same instruments of destruction. But he adds, that the two nations of Bulgarians and Hungarians were superior to their brethren, and similar to each other, in the improvements, however rude, of their discipline and government; their visible likeness determines Leo to confound his friends and enemies in one common description; and the picture may be heightened by some strokes from their contemporaries of the tenth century. Except the merit and fame of solitary propagators. All that is valued by mankind appeared vile and contemptible to these barbarians, whose native fierceness was stimulated by the consciousness of numbers and freedom. The tents of the Hungarians were of leather, their garments of fur; they shaved their hair, and scented their faces: in pastures, the hard warrior was alike insensible to danger and fatigue. The confusion of men and cattle that overspread the country exposed their camp to a nocturnal surprise, had not a still wider circuit been occupied by their light cavalry, perpetually in motion to discover and delay the approach of the enemy. After the excess of experience of the Roman tactics, they adopted the use of the sword and spear, the helmet of the soldier, and the iron breast-plate of his steed: but their native and deadly weapon was the Tartar bow: from the earliest infancy, their children and servants were exercised in the double science of archery and horsemanship; their arm was strong; their aim was sure; and in the most rapid career, they were taught to throw themselves backwards, and to shoot a volley of arrows into the air. In open combat, in secret ambush, in flight, or pursuit, they were equally formidable: an appearance of order was maintained in the foremost ranks of their chariot-chiefs, who increased by the impatient pressure of succeeding crowds. They pursued, headlong and rash, with loosened reins and horrible outcries; but if they fled, with real or disembled fear, the ardour of a pursuing foe was checked and chastised by irregular speed and sudden evolutions. In the absorbing victory, astonished Europe, yet smarting from the wounds of the Saracen and the Dane: mercy they rarely asked, and more rarely bestowed; both sexes were accused as equally inaccessible to pity, and their appetite for raw flesh might countenance the popular tale, that they drank the blood and feasted on the hearts of the slain. Yet in the barbarians, there were many, whose spontaneous virtue supplied their laws and corrected their manners, who performed the duties, and sympathized with the affections, of social life.

Establishment and invades of victory, the Turkish hordes approached the

the common limits of the French and Byzantine empires. Their first conquests and final settlements extended on either side of the Danube above Vienna, below Belgrade, and beyond the measure of the Roman province of Pannonia, cut through the provinces of Hungary. That implacable and fertile land was loosely occupied by the Moravians, a Sclavonian name and tribe, which were driven by the invaders into the compass of a narrow province.

Charlemaigne had stretched a vague and nominal empire as far as the edge of Transylvania; but failing of his promise, the dukedom of Moravia forgot their obedience and tribute to the monarchs of oriental France. The bastard Arnulph was provoked to invade the armies of the Turks; they rushed through the real or figurative wall, which his indiscretion had thrown open; and the king of Germany had been justly reproached as a traitor to the civil and ecclesiastical sovereignty of the christians. During the life of Arnulph, the Hungarians were checked by gratitude or fear; but in the infancy of his son Lewis they discovered and invaded Bavaria; and such was their Seychyan speed, that in a single day a circuit of fifty miles was stript and consumed. In the battle of Augsburg the christians maintained their advance till the seventh hour of the day; they were deceived and vanquished by the flying stratagems of the Turkish cavalry. The conflagration was spread near the provinces of Bavaria, Swabia, and Franconia; and the Hungarians pitched the renoe of anarchy, by forcing the steepest barons to discipline their vassals and fortify their castles. The origin of walled towns is ascribed to this calamitous period; nor could any distance or height or mountain or sea prevent the reich of the Turco-Hungarians, almost at the same instant, laid in ashes the Helvetic monastery of St. Gall, and the city of Bremen, on the shores of the northern ocean. Above thirty years the Germanic empire, or kingdom, was subject to the ignominy of tribute; and resistance was disarmed by the menace, the serious and effectual menace, of dragging the women and children into captivity, and of slaughtering the males above the age of ten years. I have nothing more to say of the provinces of France, which were bleach'd by the tempest, and that Spain, behind her Pyrenees.

A.D. 900. was astonished at the approach of these savage strangers. The vicinity of Italy had tempted their early inroads; but, from their camp on the Brenz, they beheld with some terror the apparent strength and populousness of the new-discovered country. They requested leave to retire; their request was proudly rejected by the Italian king; and the lives of twenty thousand christians paid the forfeit of his obstinacy and rashness. Among the cities of the west, the royal Pavia was conspicuous in the name and fame of its nobility; but its power itself was only derived from the relics of the apostles.

The Hungarians appeared; Pavia was in flames; forty-three churches were consumed; and, after the massacre of the people, they took possession of a castle, to which they attached some bushels of gold and silver (a vague exaggeration) from the smoking ruins of their country. In these annual excursions from the Alps to the neighbourhood of Rome and Capua, the churches, that yet escaped, resounded with a fearful litan'y: 40 save and deliver us from the arrows of the Huns! But the saints were deaf or inexorable; and the torrent turned forwards, till it was stopped by the extreme land of Calabria. A composition was offered and accepted for the head of each Italian subject; and ten bushels of silver were poured forth in the Turkish churches. These fruits of their work were not lost; the gold of the Huns filled the forests of Italy; and the robbers were defrauded both in the numbers of the assessment and the standard of the metal. On the side of the east the Hungarians were opposed in difficult conflict by the equal arms of the Bulgarians, defended the fatherland, and whose situation formed the barrier of the Byzantine empire. The barrier was overturned; the emperor of Constantinople beheld the waving banners of the Turks; and of their boldest warriors presumed to strike a battle-axe into the golden gate. The arts and treasures of the Greeks diverted the assault; but the Hungarians might boast, on their retreat, that they had imposed a tribute on the spirit of Bulgaria and the majesty of the Caesars. The remote and rapid operations of the same campaign appear to magnify the power and numbers of the Turk; but their courage is most deserving of praise, since a light troop of three or four hundred horse would often attempt and exer-

cute the most daring inroads to the gates of Thessalonica and Constantinople. At this disastrous era of the human race, the Huns are an image of the triple scourge from the north, the east, and the south:

the Norman, the Hungarian, and the Sasanian, sometimes trod the same ground of desolation; and these savage foes might have been compared by Homer to the two lions growing over the carcasses of a mangled horse.

The deliverance of Germany and Victory of Henry Christendom was achieved by the Saxon princes, Henry the Fowler and Otho the Great, who, in two memorable battles, for ever broke the power of the Hungarians. The valiant

\[a] Muratori has considered with pathetic care the danger and resources of Modena. The citizens besought St. Geminianus, their patron, to avert, by his intercession, the rabies, angelum, &c.

\[b] Vide Brenner, apud Gell., vi. 80. in

Henry was roused from a bed of sickness by the invasion of his country; but his mind was vigorous and his prudence successful. "My companions," said he, on the morning of the combat, "maintain your ranks, receive on your bucklers the first arrows of the pagans, and prevent their second discharge by the equal and invisible spear of your valor. We have conquered: and the historical picture of the castle of Merseburg expressed the features, or at least the character, of Henry, who, in an age of ignorance, intrusted to the finer arts the perpetuity of his name.* At the end of twenty years, the children of the Turks who had invaded the Danubian plains, with Arpad reigned the king of this vast country; and their force is defined, in the lowest estimate, at one of 800,000, the hundred thousand horse. They were invades by domestic faction; the gates of Germany were treacherously unlocked; and they spread, far beyond the Rhine and the Meuse, into the heart of Flanders. But the vigour and prudence of Othe dispelled the conspiracy; the princes were made sensible, that unless they were true to each other, their religion and country were irrecoverably lost; and the national powers were reviewed in the plains of Augsburg. They marched and fought in eight legions, according to their age; the first, second, and third, were composed of Bavarians; the fourth of Franks; the fifth of Saxons, under the immediate command of the monarch; the sixth and seventh consisted of Swabians; and the eighth, legion, of a thousand Bohemians, closed the rear of the host. The resources of discipline and valor were fortified by the arts of superstition, which, on this occasion, may deserve the epitaphs of generous and salutary. The soldiers were purified with a fast; the camp was blessed with the relics of saints and martyrs; and the christian hero girded on his side the sword of Constantine, and waved the banner of St. Maurice, the prefect of the Theban legion. But his firme st confidence was placed in the holy lance, whose point was fashioned of the maws of the cross, and which his father had everted from the king of Burgundy, by the threats of war, and the gift of a province. The Hungarians were expected in the front; they secretly passed the Lech, a river of Bavaria that falls into the Danube; turned the rear of the christian army; plundered the baggage, and disordered the legions of Bohemia and Swabia. The battle was restored by the Franks, who, in the wake of Conrad, was the point of the arrow as he rested from his fatigue: the Saxons fought under the eye of their king; and his victory surpassed, in merit and importance, the triumphs of the last two hundred years. The loss of the Hungarians was still greater in the flight than in the action; they were encompassed by the rivers of Bavaria; and their past cruelties excluded them from the hope of mercy. Three captive princes were hanged at Ratisbon, the multitude of prisoners was slain or mutilated, and the fugitives, who presumed to appear in the face of their country, were condemned to everlasting poverty. Let the spirit of the vanquished not humble, and the most accessible passes of Hungary were fortified with a ditch and rampart. Adverst suggested the counsels of moderation and peace:

Hunc vero triumphum, tam laude quam memorior dignum, ad Merseburgum rex in superiori consilio domo per Czesarum, id est, pictorum, notarii præcipit, adeo ut rem parum potius quam versatilis videns. (Lutgardus, l. i. c. 5.) Another public anecdote is related with having been painted with harmony and truth by Flament of Charlemagne; and Muratori may justly affirm, non saecula faeere in quolibet partem Scripturae (Historia Danorum, lib. ii. c. 123, hist. dist. domin. Asto- tam, ii. dissert. xiv. p. 309, 310.) Our domestic claims to antiquity of ignorance and original imperfection (Mr. Walpole’s lively conceits are of a much more recent date. (Amended of Fainlg, vol. 1. p. 2, &c.)

Baronius, Annal. Eccles. A. D. 929, No. 2—5. The lance of Christ is taken from the best evidence, Lutgardus, l. i. c. 123.) Sige- borus, a captive acconpanied with Charlemagne, was a monk of Kiow, who died in the beginning of the twelfth century; but his chronicle was obscure, till it was published at Peters- burg, March 1772, in it., Appendix, vol. vi. p. 125, by Dr. Leake, of Greece and Asia, in the Table of the authors. See the entire Barontius (Baronius says Bayler, ut sacri in tabulis figur) in the Annales Bertiniani Francorum, (in Script. Ital. Murato- tori, tom. ii. pars 1. p. 553.) A. D. 923, twenty years before the ara of Russia. In their history, the princes of the Russians and Normans are the same Aquilianos homines of a singular composition.

My knowledge of these annals is drawn from M. Levreque, His- torie de la Russie, Paris, 1745, 8vo. A first and a second edition of the same by M. Dufour, a monk of Kiow, who died in the beginning of the twelfth century; but his chronicle was obscure, till it was published at Petersburg, March 1772, in it. Appendix, vol. vi. p. 125, by Dr. Leake, in his travels, vol. ii. p. 181.

The late Schlegel has translated and commented upon the Annals of Nestor; and his work is a mine of information to those who would hereafter investigate the History of the North. In 1849, four volumes of it were published, with some additional notes, in twelve volumes. The first is occupied with an introduction to the historical and political events of the second century of the Empire of Russia, or that before Rurik and the reign of this prince; the third contains the reign of Oleg, and the fourth that of Igor. M. of the earth; these exiles were entertained in the By-zyantine court; and they preserved, till the last age of the empire, the inheritance of spotless loyalty, and the use of the Danish or English language. With their number of war vessels and battle-axes on their shoulders, they attended the Greek emperor to the temple, the senate, and the hippodrome; he slept and feasted under their trusty guard; and the keys of the palace, the treasury, and the capital, were held by the firm and faithful hands of the Varangian sentinels.

In the tenth century, the geography of Geography and Scythia was extended far beyond the trade of Russia, limits of ancient knowledge; and the monarchy of the Russians obtains a vast and conspicuous place in the map of Constantine. The sons of Hvaric were members of the spacious province of Volodomir, or Moscow; and, if they were confined on that side by the hordes of the east, their western frontier in those early days was enlarged to the Baltic sea and the country of the Prussians. Their northern reign ascended above the sixth degree of latitude, over the island of Iceland and the oceanic coasts of Norway; their eternal empire included Spain, and monopolies, or clouded with eternal darkness.
To the south they followed the course of the Borysthenes, and approached with that river the neighbourhood of the Euxine sea. The tribes that dwelt, or wandered, to the south, and crossed, the Euxine, were the Varangians in the Berytus, and the Norwegian conqueror, and insensibly blended into the same nation.
The language of Russia is a dialect of the Slavonian;
but, in the tenth century, these two modes of speech were different from each other; and, as the Slavonian prevailed in the south, it may be presumed that the original Russian of the north, the primitive subject of the Varangian chief, was a portion of the Fenetic Race. With the emigration, union, or dissolution of the wandering tribes, the loose and indefinite picture of the Scythian desert has continually shifted. But the most ancient map of the Varangian world, which still retains the name and position; and as the capitains, Novogorod 4 and Kiow, are coeval with the first age of the monarchy. Novogorod had not yet deserved the epithet of great, nor the alliance of the Hanseatic league, which diffused the streams of opulence and the principles of freedom. Kieow could not yet boast of three hundred churches, an innumera-table people, and a degree of greatness and splendour, which was compared with Constantinople by those who had never seen the residence of the Cæsars.
In their origin, the two cities were no more than hills, or far below that state; and the inhabitants of them might assemble for the occasional business of war or trade. Yet even these assemblies announce

3 Du Cange has collected from the original authors the state and history of the Varangi at Constantinople, (Glossar. Med. et Inpiua Graecitatis, sub voce &c. &c.) Med. et Inpia Lathitatis, sub voce Villhardouin, p. 296—299. See likewise the annotations of Blaske the Constantinople Aile Byzantin. of Constantinople, t. i. p. 149, 150.
Saxo Grammaticus affirms that they spoke Danish; but Codinus maintains them till the fifteenth century in the use of their native 371—421.)

4 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geographia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandinavia, &c.

5 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.

6 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.

7 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.

8 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.

9 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.

The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.

10 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.

11 The geography of the coast and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Constantin Porphyrogenetus, (de Administr.
Empirici, lib. X. c. 31, in. 4, p. 59—61, c. 5, p. 63—67. p. 68.
62. 112, 113.) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer, (de Geo-
graphia Russica vicariae nomine Regionum circiter A. C. 935, in Conwith the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia, Scandina-
via, &c.
some progress in the arts of society; a new breed of cattle was imported from the southern provinces; and the same occurred with the motives of the war, as land from the Baltic to the Euxine, from the mouth of the Oder to the port of Constantinople. In the days of idolatry and barbarism, the Slavonic nation of Julian was frequented and enriched by the Normans, who had prudently secured a free mart of purchase and exchange. For this purpose, at the entrance of the Oder, the corsair, or merchant, sailed in forty-three days to the eastern shores of the Baltic, the most distant nations were intermingled, and the holy groves of Curland were said to have been decorated with Grecian and Spanish gold. Between the sea and Novgorod and St. Petersburg vessels was so great that it might have been passed through a gulf, a lake, and a navigable river; in the winter season, over the hard and level surface of boundless snows. From the neighbourhood of that city, the Russians descended the streams that fall into the Boryshenens; their canoes, of a single tree, were laden with slaves of every age, furs of every species, the spoil of their foes, and the hides of the cattle; and the whole produce of the north was collected and discharged in the magazines of Kiow. The month of June was the ordinary season of the departure of the fleet; the timber of the canoes was framed in the land. The vessels, though small, were capacious; and they proceeded without obstacle down the Boryshens, as far as the seven or thirteen ridges of rocks, which traverse the bed, and precipitate the waters, of the river. At the more shallow falls it was sufficient to lighten the vessels; but the deeper cataracts were impassable; and the mariners, who dragged their vessels and their slaves six miles over land, were exposed in this toilsome journey to the robbers of the desert. At the first island below the falls, the Russians celebrated the festival of their escape; at a second, near the mouth of the river, they repaired their shattered vessels for the long and perilous voyage of the Black sea. If they steered along the coast, the Danube was accessible; with a fair wind they could reach in thirty-six or forty hours the opposite shores of Anatolia; and Constantinople admitted the annual visit of the strangers of the north. They returned on the same course, with a rich cargo of corn, wine, and oil, the manufactures of Greece, and the spices of India. Some of their countrymen resided in the capital and provinces; and the national treaties protected the persons, effects, and privileges, of the Russian merchant.

Naval expedition to the Euxine was opened for the benefit, was soon abused for the injury, of mankind. Constantinople. In a period of one hundred and ninety years, the Russians made four attempts to plunder the treasures of Constantinople: the event was various, extended the motives of the war, and was the same in these naval expeditions. The Russian traders had seen the magnificence and tasted the luxury of the city of the Caesars. A marvellous tale, and a scanty supply, excited the desires of their savage countrymen: they envied the gifts of nature which their climate denied; they coveted the works of art which they were too lazy to imitate and too indigent to purchase: the Varangian princes unfurled the banners of piratical adventure, and their bravest soldiers were drawn from the nations that dwelt in the northern islands of the ocean. The image of their naval armament was magnified; the signal service of the Cossacks, which issued from the Boryshenens, to navigate the same seas, for a similar purpose. The Greek appellation of monoxyl, or single canoes, might be justly applied to the bottom of their vessels. It was scooped out of the long stem of a beech or willow, but the slight and narrow foundation was raised and continued on either side with planks, till it attained the length of sixty, and the height of about twelve, feet. These boats were built without a deck, but with two Rudders and a mast; to move with sails and oars; and to contain from forty to seventy men, with their arms, and provisions. In the course of a few years, the first trial of the Russians was made with two hundred boats; but when the national force was exerted, they might arm against Constantinople a thousand or twelve hundred vessels. Their fleet was not much inferior to the royal navy of Agamemnon, but was magnified in the eyes of war to ten or fifteen times the real proportion of its strength and numbers. Had the Greek emperors been endowed with foresight to discern, and vigour to prevent, perhaps they might have sealed with a maritaine force the mouth of the Boryshenens. Their indifference abandoned the coast of Anatolia, the entrance of the Black sea, upon which, after an interval of six hundred years, again infested the Euxine; but as long as the capital was respected, the sufferings of a distant province escaped the notice both of the prince and the historian. The storm which had swept along from the Phasis and Trebizond, at length visited the Bosporus of Thrace; a stratagem in fifteen miles, in which the rude vessels of the Russian might have been stopped and destroyed by a more skilful adversary. In their first enterprise, under the princes of Kiow, they passed without opposition, and occupied the port of Constantinople, which they afterwards held against the allies of Thopholm, through a crowd of perils, he landed at the palace-stairs, and immediately repaired to a church of the Virgin Mary. By the advice of the patriarch, her garment, a precious relic, was drawn from the sanctuary and dipped in the sea; and a seaman tempest, which determined the retreat of the Russians, was devoutly ascribed to the mother of God. The silence of the Greeks may be a second, some hint of the truth, or at least of A. D. 895.

1. The war of the Russians and Greeks in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, are related in the Byzantine annals, especially those of Zonaras and Cedrenes; and all their testimonies are collected in the Russian of Struter, p. ii. 329—404.
3. When Photius wrote his enl buffering of the conversion of the Russian heretics, he could not have been more explicit, and sterner, than when he says: "Sic immittuntur in septentriones et in occidentes tertius et quartus et quintus." Cedrenus in Compend. p. 755.
4. See the various (Description of the Ukraiine, p. 51—61.) On the revolutions are lively, his plans accurate, and except the circumstances of firearms, we may read old Russians for modern Cossacks.
5. It is to be lamented that the writer has not signified the continuation of Russian pilgmsa Expeditiones Constantinopolitanae, Comment, Academ. Petropol, tom. i. p. 14, 144. In the face of these rhetorical inscriptions, he fixes it in the years 646 or 560, a date which might have smoothed some doubts and difficulties in the beginning of the manuscript.
7. See the various (Description of the Ukraiine, p. 51—61.) On the revolutions are lively, his plans accurate, and except the circumstances of firearms, we may read old Russians for modern Cossacks.
least of the importance, of the second attempt by Oleg, the guardian of the sons of Rurie. A strong barrier of arms and fortifications defended the Bosphorus; the war was not for the simple capture of dragging the boats over the isthmus; and this simple operation is described in the national chronicles, as if the Russian fleet had sailed over dry land with a brisk and

The third, a favourable gale. The leader of the third assay, armament, Leo his and a by combustible. The engineers were dexterous; the weather was propitious; many thousand Russians, who chose rather to be drowned than burnt, leaped into the sea, and those who escaped to the Thracian shore were inhumanly slaughtered by the peasants and soldiers. Yet one third of the canoes escaped into shallow water; and the next spring Igor was again prepared to retrieve his disgrace and claim his revenge. After a

The fourth, a long peace, Jaroslav, the great-grand a reign of Swatoslaus. A.D. 853—972. By the most part on foot, their irregular of the Danube; their landing was effectuated on the Russian shore; and, as a sharp encounter, the swords of the Russians prevailed against the arrows of the Bulgarian horse. The vanquished king sunk into the grave; his children were made captive; and his dominions, as far as mount Hemus, were subjugated or ravaged by the northern invaders. But instead of relinquishing his prey, and performing his engagements, the Varangian prince was more disposed to advance than to retire; and, had his ambition been crowned with success, the seat of empire in that early period might have been transferred to a more temperate and fruitful climate.

Swatoslaus, who had been pursuing the sultan, was not to come masters of Constantinople. In our own time, a Russian armament, instead of sailing from the Borys-thrones, has circumnavigated the continent of Europe; and the Turkish capital has been threatened by a squadron of strong and lofty ships of war, of each of which, with its crew of thousand men, the enemy could have sunk or scattered a hundred canoes, such as those of their ancestors. Perhaps the present generation may yet behold the accomplishment of the prediction, of a rare prediction, of which the style is ambiguous and uncertain, and which represents such a picture; a modern epic poet would discourse his work, and dis-

By land the Russians were less formidable than by sea; and as they fought for the most part on foot, their irregular of the sea, of Joshua was supposed by the Jews to be an equestrian time, the son of Oleg. The vigour of his mind and body was fortified by the hardships of a military and savage life. Wrapt in a bearskin, Swa-of the Danube, or the son of Rurie. The vigour of his mind and body was fortified by the hardships of a military and savage life. Wrapt in a bearskin, Swa-dogens. Yet the threats or calumnies of a Rus-and prophecy, sian war were more frequently diverted by treaty than by arms. In these naval hostilities, every disadvantage was on the side of the Greeks; there was no enemy afforded no mercy; and twenty-four galleys were either taken, sunk, or destroyed.

Negotiations. Yet the threats or calumnies of a Rus-

and prophecy, sian war were more frequently diverted by treaty than by arms. In these naval hostilities, every disadvantage was on the side of the Greeks; there was no enemy afforded no mercy; and twenty-four galleys were either taken, sunk, or destroyed.

Negotiations. Yet the threats or calumnies of a Rus-

and prophecy, sian war were more frequently diverted by treaty than by arms. In these naval hostilities, every disadvantage was on the side of the Greeks; there was no enemy afforded no mercy; and twenty-four galleys were either taken, sunk, or destroyed.
John Zimises, who, in a diminutive body, possessed the spirit and abilities of a hero. The first victory of his lieutenants deprived the Russians of their foreign allies, twenty thousand of whom were either destroyed by the sword, or provoked to revolt, or tempted to desert. Three hundred and sixty legions, the light of the universe, whose barbarians were still in arms; and the legions that had been recalled from the new conquests of Syria, prepared, with the return of the spring, to march under the banners of a warlike prince, who declared himself the friend and avenger of the injured Bulgaria. The passions of Mount Helmos had been left unguarded; they were instantly occupied; the Roman vanguard was formed of the immortals; (a proud imitation of the Persian style;) the emperor led the main body of ten thousand five hundred foot; and the rest of his forces followed in slow and cautious array, with the baggage and military engines. The first exploit of Zimises was the reduction of Marcianopolis, or Peristhala, in two days; the trumpets sounded; the walls were scaled; eight thousand five hundred Russians were put to the sword; and the sons of the Bulgarian king were rescued from an ignominious prison, and invested with the waters of baptism. The other legions, described on page 156, are not here to be noticed, except as the name of metropolitan, might admonish the sacraments in the church of Kiow, to a congregation of slaves and natives. But the seed of the gospel was sown on a barren soil; many were the apostates, the converts were few; and the baptism of Olga may be fixed as the age of Russian Christianity. A female, perhaps of the basest origin, who could revenge the death, and assume the sceptre, of her husband Igor, must have been endowed with those active virtues which command the fear and obedience of barbarians. In a moment of foreign and domestic peace, she sailed to Constantinople; Gennadius, the Bishop, and Emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, A.D. 955, has described, with minute diligence, the ceremonial of her reception in his capital and palace. The steps, the titles, the salutations, the banquet, the presents, were exquisitely adjusted to gratify the vanity of the great Empress, with the dignity of the person of the purple. In the sacrament of baptism, she received the venerable name of the empress Helen; and her conversion might be preceded or followed by her uncle, two interpreters, sixteen damsels of a higher, and eighteen of a lower, rank, twenty-two domestics or ministers of the household, with the children, who composed the retinue of the great princess Olga. After her return to Kiow and Novgorod, she firmly persisted in her new religion; but her labours in the propagation of the gospel were not crowned with success; and both her family and nation adhered with obstinacy or indifference to the gods of their fathers. Her son Swatolaws was apprehensive of the scorn and ridicule of his companions; and her grandson Wododomir devoted his youthful zeal to multiply and decorate the monuments of ancient worship. The church was attended with traffic of the barbaresque deities of the north, who were accustomed to human sacrifices; in the choice of the victim, a citizen was preferred to a stranger, a christian to an idolater; and the father, who defended his son from the sacerdotal knife, was involved in the same doom by the rage of a fanatic tumult. Yet the lessons and example of the pious Olga remained in the deep, though secret, impression on the minds of the prince and people: the Greek missionaries continued to preach, to dispute, and to baptize; and the ambassadors or merchants of Russia compared the idolatry of the woods with the elegant superstition of Constantinople. They had gazed with admiration on the dome of St. Sophia, the lively pictures of saints and martyrs, the riches of the altar, the number and vestments of the priests, the pomp and order of the ceremonies; they were edified by the alternate succession of devout silence and harmonious song; nor was it difficult to persuade them, conversion of Russia, A.D. 955.

Photius of Constantinople, a patriarch whose ambition was equal to his curiosity, congratulates himself and the Greek church on the conversion of the Russians. Those fierce and bloody barbarians had been persuaded by the word of God and religious instruction; the memory of his fruit for their God, the Christian missionaries for their teachers, and the Romans for their friends and brethren. His triumph was transient and premature. In the various fortune of their piratical adventures, some Russian chiefs might allow themselves to be sprinkled with the waters of baptism; the old chief Terys, when the name of metropolitan, might admonish the sacraments in the church of Kiow, to a congregation of slaves and natives. But the seed of the gospel was sown on a barren soil; many were the apostates, the converts were few; and the baptism of Olga may be fixed as the age of Russian Christianity. A female, perhaps of the basest origin, who could revenge the death, and assume the sceptre, of her husband Igor, must have been endowed with those active virtues which command the fear and obedience of barbarians. In a moment of foreign and domestic peace, she sailed to Constantinople; Gennadius, the Bishop, and Emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, A.D. 955, has described, with minute diligence, the ceremonial of her reception in his capital and palace. The steps, the titles, the salutations, the banquet, the presents, were exquisitely adjusted to gratify the vanity of the great Empress, with the dignity of the person of the purple. In the sacrament of baptism, she received the venerable name of the empress Helen; and her conversion might be preceded or followed by her uncle, two interpreters, sixteen damsels of a higher, and eighteen of a lower, rank, twenty-two domestics or ministers of the household, with the children, who composed the retinue of the great princess Olga. After her return to Kiow and Novgorod, she firmly persisted in her new religion; but her labours in the propagation of the gospel were not crowned with success; and both her family and nation adhered with obstinacy or indifference to the gods of their fathers. Her son Swatolaws was apprehensive of the scorn and ridicule of his companions; and her grandson Wododomir devoted his youthful zeal to multiply and decorate the monuments of ancient worship. The church was attended with traffic of the barbaresque deities of the north, who were accustomed to human sacrifices; in the choice of the victim, a citizen was preferred to a stranger, a christian to an idolater; and the father, who defended his son from the sacerdotal knife, was involved in the same doom by the rage of a fanatic tumult. Yet the lessons and example of the pious Olga remained in the deep, though secret, impression on the minds of the prince and people: the Greek missionaries continued to preach, to dispute, and to baptize; and the ambassadors or merchants of Russia compared the idolatry of the woods with the elegant superstition of Constantinople. They had gazed with admiration on the dome of St. Sophia, the lively pictures of saints and martyrs, the riches of the altar, the number and vestments of the priests, the pomp and order of the ceremonies; they were edified by the alternate succession of devout silence and harmonious song; nor was it difficult to persuade them,

These declaimers have multiplied to 300,000 and 320,000 men, those Russian forces, of which the contemporary had given a moderate and well-founded account.

4 Phot. Episc. II. No. 35. p. 51, edit. Montecat. It was not unworthy of the learning of the editor to mistake the Russian nation, for the Slavonian, a war-cry of the Dalmatian usurpers, and not all the Slavonic, for the Dalmatian, inscriptions, is well known and conspicuous. (Comment, Academic, Petroz., p. 45, 46.) d'Anville, Geographic Ancien, tom. i, p. 273, 311.

5 In a political management of the Greeks, they were especially with the Patriarch and the chief of the Administrative Imperators.

6 In the course of this war, Leo the Deacon, (Epam Pari, Critica, iv, A.D. 568—974,) is more accurate and circumstantial than d'Anville, (tom. ii, p. 60—683,) and Zonaras, (tom. ii, p. 395—414.)
that a choir of angels descended each day from heaven of Wołodomir, to join in the devotion of the christians. A.D. 985. But the conversion of Wołodomir was determined or hastened, by the presence of a Roman bride. At the same time, and in the city of Cherson, the rites of baptism and marriage were celebrated by the christian pontiff: the city he restored to the emperor Basil, the brother of his spouse; but the brazen gates were transported, as it is said, to Novogorod, and translated into the first church as a trophy of honour, victory and faith. At his despotie command, Peroum, the god of thunder, whom he had so long adored, was dragged through the streets of Kiow; and twelve sturdy barbarians battered with clubs the missahopen image, which was indignantly cast into the waters of the Caspian sea. The names of the twelve were pronounced in the imperial voice, and the first missionaries were treated as the enemies of God and their prince; and the rivers were instantly filled with many thousands of obedient Russians, who acquiesced in the truth and excellence of a doctrine which had been embellished by the great duke and his boyars. In the next generation, the relics of paganism were finally extirpated; but as the two brothers of Wołodomir had died without baptism, their bones were taken from the grave, and sanctified by an irregular and posthumous sacrament.

Christianity of the north.

In the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries of the christian era, the reign of A.D. 800—1100—the gospel and of the church was extended over Bulgaria, Hungary, Bohemia, Saxony, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Poland, and Russia. The triumphs and the divine zeal which were exhibited in the cause of Christianity; and the northern and eastern regions of Europe submitted to a religion, more different in theory than in practice the worship of their native idols. A laudable ambition excited the monks, both of Germany and Greece, to visit the tents and hunting-grounds; poverty and hardships, and the infidels, were the lot of the first missionaries: their courage was active and patient; their motive pure and meritorious; their present reward consisted in the testimony of their conscience and the respect of a grateful people; but the fruitful harvest of their toils was inhibited and enjoyed by the proud and wealthy lates of succeeding times. The first conversions were free and spontaneous: a holy life and an eloquent tongue were the only arms of the missionaries; but the domestic fables of the pagans were silenced by the miracles and the visions of the missionaries, and the favorable temper of the chiefs was accelerated by the dictates of vanity and interest. The leaders of nations, who were saluted with the titles of kings and saints, held it lawful and pious to impose the catholic faith on their subjects and neighbours: the coast of the Baltic, from Holstein to the gulf of Finland, was in vaded under the standard of the cross; and the reign of idoltry was closed by the conversion of Lithuania in the fourteenth century. Yet truth and candour must acknowledge, that the conversion of the north imparted many temporal benefits both to the old and the new christians. The rage of war, inherent to the human species, could not be healed by the evangelic precepts of charity and peace; and the ambition of the barbarians into the pale of civil and ecclesiastical society delivered Europe from the depredations, by sea and land, of the Normans, the Hungarians, and the Russians, who learned to spare their brethren and cultivate the arts. They were divided by the walls of Constantinople and order was promoted by the influence of the clergy; and the rudiments of art and science were introduced into the savage countries of the globe. The liberal piety of the Russian princes engaged in their service the most skilful of the Greeks, to decorate the churches, and taught the art of painting. The paintings of St. Sophia were rudely copied in the churches of Kiow and Novogorod: the writings of the fathers were translated into the Slavonic idiom; and three hundred noble youths were invited or compelled to attend the lessons of the college of Jarslaw. It should appear that Russia might have derived an early and rapid improvement from her peculiar connexion with the church and state of Constantinople, which in that age so justly despised the ignorance of the Latins. But the Byzantine nation was servile, solitary, and urging to a hasty decline: after the fall of Kiow, the navigators of the Black Sea and the Bosphorus were in the place of the princes of Wołodomir and Moscow were separated from the sea and Christendom; and the divided monarchy was oppressed by the ignominy and blindness of Tartar servitude. The Slavonic and Scandinavian kingsoms, which had been converted by the Latin missionaries, were exposed, it is true, to the spiritual jurisdiction and temporal claims of the popes; but they were united, in language and religious worship, with each other, and with Rome; they imbibed the free and generous spirit of the European republic, and greatly strengthened the right of knowledge which arose on the western world.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Saracens, Franks, and Greeks, in Italy.—First adventures and settlement of the Normans.—Character and conquests of Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia.—Deliverns of Sicily by his brother Roger.—The claim of the Normans to the empire.—The loss of the empire by the Normans.—The Norman conquests and invasion of Africa and Greece.—The emperor Manuel Comnenus.—Wars of the Greeks and Normans.—Extermination of the Normans.

The three great nations of the west, conflict of the the Greeks, the Saracens, and the Franks, encountered each other on the mother—The southern provin. A.D. 810—107...

1. Listen to the exultations of Adam of Bremen (A.D. 1059.) of which there is here an extract: "Benedictus vir nobilissimiyi normui, et atio... jussu monachi Dei audivit regnare... ecce populus ille peccatorum... ab indolentia... fundit placuit... ultra concitarius... in Venus... publicus... accepit... ab antiquis... tantum idolum... praedicatorem... verbi... sanctam... voluntatem... et imperium... considerante... et... Clementia... et... gravitate... diu... sub... sanctum... imperium... deinde... iussu... imperator... et... morte... et... imperium... ad... aeternum... (Kutak, Hist. Critica, tom. i. p. 26—28.)

2. For the general history of Italy in the ninth and tenth centuries, I may refer to the fifteenth, sixtieth, and seventh books of Newe Compendium de Regno Italia (in the second volume of his works, Milan, 1722.) the Annals of Baronius with the Criticism of Papi; the seventh and eighth volumes of the Annali del Regno of Napoli di Gianmonti; the seventh and eighth volumes (the octavo edition) of the Annali d'Italia di Mortet; and the second volume of the Annals of the Emperor and the chronicle of M. de St. Marc, a work which, under a superficial title,
Is it by your fasting that the walls of Bari have been overturned? Did not these valiant Franks, diminished as they were by langour and fatigue, intercept and vanquish the three most powerful emirs of the Saracens? and did not their defeat precipitate the fall of the city? Bari is now fallen; Tarentum trembles; Calabria will be next; and within a short time the island of Sicily may be rescued from the hands of the infidels. My brother, (a name most offensive to the vanity of the Greeks,) accelerate your naval scources, respect your allies, and distrust your flatterers. 7

These lofty hopes were soon extintdued by the perilous exaction of Lewis. The Greeks in decay of the Carolingian house; and Eloy, who might deserve the honour, the A. D. 890.

Greek emperors, Basil, and his son Leo, secured the advantage of the reduction of Bari. The Italians of Apulia and Calabria were persuaded or compelled to acknowledge their supremacy, and an ideal line from mount Garganus to the bay of Salerno, leaves the far greater part of the kingdom of Naples under the dominion of the eastern empire. Beyond that line, the dukes or republics of Amalfi, A & Naples, who had never forfeited their voluntary allegiance, rejoiced in their laws, their liberties, and their independence. Amalí was enriched by supplying Europe with the produce and manufactures of Asia. But the Lombard princes of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua, were reluctantly torn from the communion of the Latin world, and too often violated their oaths of servitude and tribute. The city of Bari rose to dignity and wealth, and was the metropolis of the new theme or province of Lombardy; the title of patrician, and afterwards the singular name of Catanum, was assigned to the supreme governor; and the policy both of the church and state was modelled in exact subordination to the throne of Rome. The empire was disputed by the princes of Italy, their efforts were feeble and adverse; and the Greeks resisted or eluded the forces of Germany, which descended from the Alps under the imperial standard of the Othos. The first and greatest of those Saxon princes was compelled to relinquish the sieve of Bari; the second, after the loss of his stoutest bishops and barons, escaped with honour from the bloody field of Crotona. Defeat of Odo.

On that day the scale of war was turned III.

against the Franks by the valor of the Saracens. The first attack was driven by the Byzantine fleets from the fortresses and coasts of Italy; but a sense of interest was more prevalent than superstition or resentment, and the caliph of Egypt had transported forty thousand Moslems to the aid of his christian ally. The successors of Basil amused themselves with the belief, that the conquest of Lom-

1 The original epitaph of the emperor Lewis II. to the emperor Basil, a curious record of the age, was first published by Baronius, (Ann. Eccl. Eccl. vol. 1, No. 41.) vol. from the church of Rome in the Appendix (p. 41–42) of Henry Bruckmann's Historia Podocautarii, (Traject ad Rhenum, 1722, in fol.)

Your master, etc.

2 Lewis, king of Armenia, has given aid and protection to his own relations and the，并且与他们最近的兄弟和姐妹进行了接触，他们之间的友谊和和平关系，使他们之间的关系更加亲密。

3 Colmino del Pellegrino, a learned Capuan, the last historian of the city, has published his Historia Principum Longobardorum, in the Capitale of Mirati, title, in 4 vols. fol. and tom. v. 153–415.

4 Campanus, Porphyrigenus, de Thrasibulus, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91.

5 See Concerning the Paphlabro in, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91.

6 Vol. II. 2 N

7 These lofty hopes were soon extinguished by the perilous exaction of Lewis. The Greeks in decay of the Carolingian house; and Eloy, who might deserve the honour, the A. D. 890.

8 The original epitaph of the emperor Lewis II. to the emperor Basil, a curious record of the age, was first published by Baronius, (Ann. Eccl. Eccl. vol. 1, No. 41.) vol. from the church of Rome in the Appendix (p. 41–42) of Henry Bruckmann's Historia Podocautarii, (Traject ad Rhenum, 1722, in fol.)

Your master, etc.

2 Lewis, king of Armenia, has given aid and protection to his own relations and the，并且与他们最近的兄弟和姐妹进行了接触，他们之间的友谊和和平关系，使他们之间的关系更加亲密。

3 Colmino del Pellegrino, a learned Capuan, the last historian of the city, has published his Historia Principum Longobardorum, in the Capitale of Mirati, title, in 4 vols. fol. and tom. v. 153–415.

4 Campanus, Porphyrigenus, de Thrasibulus, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91.

5 See Concerning the Paphlabro in, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91.

6 Vol. II. 2 N

7 These lofty hopes were soon extinguished by the perilous exaction of Lewis. The Greeks in decay of the Carolingian house; and Eloy, who might deserve the honour, the A. D. 890. 8

9 Colmino del Pellegrino, a learned Capuan, the last historian of the city, has published his Historia Principum Longobardorum, in the Capitale of Mirati, title, in 4 vols. fol. and tom. v. 153–415.

10 Campanus, Porphyrigenus, de Thrasibulus, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91.

11 See Concerning the Paphlabro in, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91. 8

12 Vol. II. 2 N

13 These lofty hopes were soon extinguished by the perilous exaction of Lewis. The Greeks in decay of the Carolingian house; and Eloy, who might deserve the honour, the A. D. 890. 8

9 Colmino del Pellegrino, a learned Capuan, the last historian of the city, has published his Historia Principum Longobardorum, in the Capitale of Mirati, title, in 4 vols. fol. and tom. v. 153–415.

10 Campanus, Porphyrigenus, de Thrasibulus, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91.

11 See Concerning the Paphlabro in, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91. 8

12 Vol. II. 2 N

13 These lofty hopes were soon extinguished by the perilous exaction of Lewis. The Greeks in decay of the Carolingian house; and Eloy, who might deserve the honour, the A. D. 890. 8

9 Colmino del Pellegrino, a learned Capuan, the last historian of the city, has published his Historia Principum Longobardorum, in the Capitale of Mirati, title, in 4 vols. fol. and tom. v. 153–415.

10 Campanus, Porphyrigenus, de Thrasibulus, l. i. c. xi in Vit. Basil. c. 20, p. 91.
bardy had been achieved, and was still preserved, by the justice of their laws, the virtues of their ministers, and the gratitude of a people whom they had rescued from anarchy and oppression. A series of rebellions might dash a ray of light into the palace of Constantinople; and the illusions of flattery were dispelled by the easy and rapid success of the Norman adventu-

Anecdotes.

The revolution of human affairs had produced a tragical scene in Calabria a mournful and melancholy contrast between the age of Pythagoras and the tenth century of the christian era. At the former period the coast of Great Greece (as it was then styled) was planted with free and opulent cities; these cities were peopled with soldiers, artists, and philosophers; and the military strength of Tarentum, Syrahis, or Crotone, was not inferior to that of a powerful kingdom. At the second era, these once flourishing provinces were clouded with ignorance, impoverished by tyranny, and depopulated by barbarian war: nor can we severely accuse the exaggeration of a contemporary, that a fair and ample district of country was reduced to the same desolation which had covered the earth after the general deluge. Among the hostilities of the Arabs, the Franks, and the Greeks, in the southern Italy, I shall select two or three anecdotes expressive of the peculiar munificence of the Saracens to profane, as well as to p Ihlge, the monasteries and churches. At the siege of Salerno, a massalian chief spread his couch on the communion-cable, and on that altar sacrificed each night the virginity of a christian nun. As he wrestled with a relentless maid, a beam in the roof was accidentally or dexterously thrown down on his head; and the death of the lustful enmity was imparted to the wrath of Christ, which was at length awakened to the defence of his faithful spouse.

2. The Saracens besieged the cities of Beneventum and Capua. In the year 871, the capture of Apulia by the Normans, and the appeal to the succours of Charlemagne, the Lombards implored the clemency and aid of the Greek emperor. A fearless citizen drop from the walls, passed the intrenchments, accomplished his commission, and fell into the hands of the barbarians, as he was returning with the welcome news. They commanded him to assist their enterprise, and deceive his countrymen, with the assurance that wealth and honours should be the reward of his falsehood, and that his sincerity would be punished with immediate death. He accepted, and, as soon as he was within the hearing of the christians on the rampart, "Friends and brethren," he cried with a loud voice, "be hold and patient, maintain the city; your sovereign is informed of your distress, and your deliverers are at hand. I know my doom, and commit my wife and children to your gratitude." The rage of the Arabs confirmed his evidence; and the self-devoted patriot was transferred with a hundred spears. He deserves to live in the memory of the virtuous, but the repetition of the same story in ancient and modern times, may sprinkle some of the bloom of this generous deed.

3. The recital of a third incident may provoke a smile amidst the horrors of war. Theobald, marquis of Caramino and Spoleto, supported the rebels of Beneventum; and his wanton cruelty was not incompatible in that age with the character of a hero. His captives of the Greeks, to whose menaces and threats he was left exposed, and the outrage was aggravated by a cruel jest, that he wished to present the emperor with a supply of eunuchs, the most precious ornaments of the Byzantine court. Thearrison of a castle had been defended with an extraordinary valour and resolution by a young man of fourteen years old. He was put to death immediately after the surrender of the castle; but his body was dismembered by the order of the Theobald. His limbs were thrown into different parts of the city, and then burnt. Theobald denied the charge, and protested, that, since the Amazons, he had never heard of a female war. "And how," she furiously exclam-

ed, "can you attack us more directly, how can you wound us in a more vital part than the husbands of whom what we most dearly cherish, the source of our joys, and the hope of our posterity!" The plunder of our flocks and herds I have endured with a murmur, but this fatal injury, this irreparable loss, will not be without a successor. I have reproved your husbands and to your persons. But let my lord be pleased to spare what his little handmaid presumes to claim as her peculiar and lawful property.

The establishment of the Normans in Origin of the the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, in Italy, an event degrading its glory, in its consequences the most important both to Italy and the eastern empire. The broken provinces of the Greeks, Lombards, and Saracens, were exposed to every invader, and every sea and land were invaded by the pillage, rapine, and slaughter of the barbarian princes. After a long indulgence of rapine and slaughter, this fair and ample territory was accepted, occupied, and named, by the Normans of France: they renounced their gods for the God of the christians; and the dukes of Nor-

The walls of the same city of Beneventum. But the actors are different, and the guilt is imputed to the Greeks themselves, in which the Byzantine edition is applied to the Saracens. In the late war in Germany, M. D'Assas, a French officer of the regiment of Auvergne, who had been condemned by a council of war for having corporally acquitted himself in a similar manner. His behaviour is the more heroic, as even the innocence of him who had made him prisoner, (Voltaire, Histoire de Louis XV, c. 33, tom. ii, p. 172.)

2 Theobald, who is styled Heros by Luttrell, was properly duke of Spoleto, not Marquis of Caramino, from which title and office of marquis (commander of the march or frontier) was introduced into Italy by the French emperors. (Abbre Chronolo-giae, tom. xii, p. 725, &c.)

3 Luttrell, Hist. i. c. iv. in the Roman Italic, Script. tom. i, p. 432, &c. Should the licences of the title be demonstrated, I may, with poor Stittis, that it is hard if I may not transcribe it... what a bishop could write without scruple. What if I had transcribed it; and from a critical passage to us nostris corporis redilocii, &c.

4 Sometimes the Normans in Italy are collected in the fifth volume of Muratori; and among these we may distinguish the\n Constantine Porphyrogenitus (in Vit. Basil. c. 25 p. 183.) is the ori-

Constantine Porphyrogenitus (in Vit. Basil. c. 25 p. 183.) is the oriunknown; the names of both are unknown.

In the year 653, the same tragedy is described by Paul the Decon (in Georgii Thaeg. t. v. c. 7 & 8, p. 587, edit. Gros.) under

of the Roman Empire.

\[299\]

manly acknowledged themselves the vassals of the successors of the Way of which was the Capet. The savage fierceness which they had brought from the snowy mountains of Norway, was refined, without being corrupted, in a warmer climate; the companions of Rollo insensibly mingled with the natives; they imbibed the manners, language, and gallantry, of the French nation; and, in a mature age, the Normans might claim the semblance of virtue and grace as an acquired fashion; they were often received with kindness by the proud and fashionable superstitious, they embraced with ardor the pilgrimages of Rome, Italy, and the Holy Land. In this active devotion, their minds and bodies were invigorated by exercise: danger was the incentive, not the motive: and the passage of their lives was decorated by wonder,credulity, and ambition; they venerated their country. They confederated for their mutual defence: and the robbers of the Alps, who had been allured by the garb of a pilgrim, were often chastised by the arm of a warrior. In one of these pious visits to the cavern of mount Garganos in Apulia, which had been sanctified by the apparition of the archangel Michael,\(^1\) they were accosted by a stranger in the Greek habit, but who soon revealed himself as a rebel, a fugitive, and a mortal foe of the Greek empire. His name was Melo; a noble citizen of Bari, who, after an unsuccessful attempt to espouse the cause of the emperor, placed himself under the protection of the Saracens, avengers of his country. The bold appearance of the Normans revived his hopes and solicited his confidence: \(^1\) they listened to the complaints, and still more to the promises, of the patriot. The assurance of wealth demonstrated the justice of his cause; and they were met with by a vassal of the chief of Bari, who supplied the more indigent with arms and horses, and instantly led them to the field of action. In the first conflict, their valor prevailed; but in the second engagement they were overwhelmed by the numbers and military engines of the Greeks, and ignominiously retreated with their faces to the enemy. The unfortunate Melo ended his life, a suppliant at the court of Germany: his Norman followers, excluded from their native and their promised land, wandered among the hills and valleys of Italy, and the Balkan mountains, and that formidable sword, the princes of Capua, Beneventum, Salerno, and Naples, ultimately appealed in their domestic quarrels; the superior spirit and discipline of the Normans gave victory to the side which they espoused; and their cautious policy observed the balance of power, lest the preparedness of any rival state should render their aid less important and their service less profitable. Their first asylum was a strong camp in the depth of the marshes of Campania; but they were soon endowed by the liberality of the duke of Naples with a more plentiful and permanent seat. Eight miles from his capital, a town was founded, which was afterwards called Aversa. Foundation of work against Capua, the town of Aversa was built and fortified for their use; and they enjoyed, as their own, the corn and fruits, the meadows and groves, of that fertile district.\(^2\) The report of their success attracted every year new swarms of pilgrims and adventurers from every corner of the world, by necessity; the rich were excited by hope; and the brave and active spirits of the Normans were impatience of easy and ambitious of renown. The independent standard of Aversa afforded shelter and encouragement to the outlaws of the province, to every fugitive who had been escaped from the injustice and violence of the Normans, and these foreign associates were quickly assimilated in manners and language to the Gallic colony. The first leader of the Normans was count Rainulf; and, in the origin of society, pre-eminence of rank is the reward and the proof of superior merit.\(^3\)

\[Since the conquest of Sicily by the Normans, the Greek emperors had been served in Sicily, anxious to regain what valuable possess-\]
THE DECLINE AND FALL

Chapter XVII.

reduced thirteen cities, and the greater part of Sicily, under the obedience of the emperor. But his military fame was sullied by ingratitude and tyranny. In the division of the spoil, the desires of his brave auxiliaries were forgotten; and neither their avow nor their pride could brook this injurious treatment. They presented their complaint to the emperor; their complaint was disregarded; their interpreter was scourged; the sufferings were his; the insult and resentment belonged to those whose sentiments he had delivered. Yet they dissembled till they had obtained, or stolen, a share of the Italian conquest: their brethren of Aversa sympathised in their indignation, and the province of Apulia was invaded as the forfeit of the

Their conquest.\footnote{Jeffrey Malaterra, who relates the Sicilian war, and the conquest of Apulia. (I. c. 7, 9, 19.) The same events are described by Cedrenus (tom. i. p. 741–743, 753, 756) and Zonaras; (tom. ii. p. 227, 228) and the Greeks are so hardened to disgrace, that their narratives are impartial enough.} Above twenty years after the

of Apulia. first emigration, the Normans took the

A.D. 1091–1096, field with no more than seven hundred horse and five hundred foot; and after the recall of the

Byzantine legions\footnote{The execrable character of the Normans.} from the Sicilian war, their numbers are magnified to the amount of three thousand sand men. Their herald proposed the option of battle or retreat; \"if of battle,\" was the unanimous cry of the Normans, of their stout warriors, with a stroke of his fist, felled to the ground the horse of the Greek messenger. He was dismissed with a fresh horse; the insult was concealed from the imperial troops; but in two successive battles they were more fatally instructed of the prowess of their adversaries. In this interval the Ascalon adventurers of France; the duke of Lombardy was made prisoner; the Apulians avenged in a new dominion; and the four places of Bari, Otranto, Brindisi, and Tarentum, were alone saved in the shipwreck of the Greek fortune. From this war we may guess the extent of the Norman power, which soon eclipsed the infant colony of Aversa. Twelve counts\footnote{Opposition of the Normans to the Latin conquerors.} were chosen by the popular suffrage; and age, birth, and merit were the motives of their choice. The tributes of their peculiar districts were appropriated to their use; and each count erected a fortress in the midst of his lands, and at the head of his vassals. In the centre of the province, the common habitation of Melphi was reserved as the metropolis and citadel of the republic; a house and separate quarter was allotted to each of the twelve counts; and the national public revenues were recapitulated to the vassals. The first of his peers, their president and general, was entitled count of Apulia; and this dignity was conferred on William of the iron arm, who, in the language of the age, was styled a lion in battle, a lamb in the presence of the guerdon in court. The manners of his countrymen are fairly delineated by a contemporary and national historian.\footnote{"The Normans," says Materra, "are a cunning and revengeful people; eloquence and dissimulation appear to be their hereditary qualities; they can stoop to flattery; but unless they are curbed by the restraint of law, they indulge the licentiousness of nature and reason. Their reputation is founded upon their reputation.}\n

But

the

and dominion;

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the

of

and

the
of the east and west. The throne of St. Peter was occupied by Leo the ninth, a simple saint, of a temper most apt to deceive himself and the world, and whose venerable character would conciliate with the name of piety the measures least compatible with the elevation of his order. But the complaints, perhaps the calamities, of an injured people: the impious Normans had interrupted the payment of tithes: and the temporal sword might be lawfully unsheathed against the sacrilegious robbers, who were deaf to the entreaties of the church. As a German, his birth and baptism kindled in him a love for his native land, which had free access to the court and confidence of the emperor Henry the third; and in search of arms and allies, his ardent zeal transported him from Apulia to Saxony, from the Elbe to the Tiber. During these hostile preparations, Argyrus indulged himself in the use of secret and guilty weapons: a crowd of Normans became the victims of public or private revenge; and the valiant Drogo was murdered in a church. But his spirit survived in his brother Humphrey, the third count of Apulia. The assassins were chastised; and the son of Melo, overthrown and worsted, now began to extol the beauty behind the walls of Bari, and to await the tardy succour of his allies.

A.D. 1031. Expedition of Pope Leo IX against the Normans. The power of Constantine was distracted by a Turkish war; the mind of Henry was feble and irresolute; and the zeal for the reform was impaired. An army, accompanied with a German army, was accompanied only by a guard of seven hundred Swabians and some volunteers of Lorrain. In his long progress from Mantua to Beneventum, a vile and promiscuous multitude of Italians was enlisted under the holy standard: the priest and the soldier, and the duke and the peasant, and the officer and the adventurers, and the mural saint repeated the lessons of his youth in the order of march, of encampment, and of combat. The Normans of Apulia could muster in the field no more than three thousand horse, with a handful of infantry; the defense of the natives intercepted their provisions and retreat; and their spirit, incapable of fear, was chilled for a moment by superstitious awe. On the hostile approach of Leo, they knelt without disgrace or reluctance before their spiritual father. But the pope was inexorable; his lofty Germans afforded to the descending temporalities of their adversaries; and the Normans were informed that death or exile was their only alternative. Flight they disdained, and, as many of them had been three days without tasting food, they embraced the assurance of a more easy and honourable death. They climbed the hill of Civitella, descended into the plain, and charged in penetrable phalanx; and neither man, nor steed, nor armour, could resist the weight of their long and two-handed swords. After a severe conflict, they were encompassed by the squadrons returning from the pursuit of the万个, and died in thousands, with the joy of their foes, and the satisfaction of revenge. The gates of Civitella were shut against the flying pope, and he was overtaken by the pious conquerors, who kissed his feet, to implore his blessing, and the absolution of their sinful victory. The soldiers held in their enemy and captive the viceroy of Christ; and, though we cannot suppose that they did not understand that they were infected by the popular superstition. In the calm of retirement, the well-meaning pope deposed the effusion of christian blood, which must be imputed to his accoutet: he felt that he had been the author of sin and scandal: and as his undertaking had failed, the indecency of his military character was universally condemned. With these dispositions, he listened to the offers of a beneficent treaty; desisted an alliance which he had preached as the cause of God; and ratified the past and future conquests of the Normans. By whatever hands they had obtained the possession of Apulia, and the provinces of Naples and Calabria were a part of the donation the Normans. Of Constantine and the patrimony of St. Peter: the grant and the acceptance confirmed the mutual claims of the pontiff and the adventurers. They promised to support each other with spiritual and temporal arms; to divide or guard the provinces inhabited by the Normans, stipulated for every plough-land: and since this memorable transaction, the kingdom of Naples has remained above seven hundred years a fief of the holy see.

The pedigree of Robert Guiscard Birth and character of Robert Guiscard. He is variously deduced from the peasants named the sons of his father, the valiant and courageous peasant, the pride and ignorance of a Grecian princess; from the duke, by the ignorance and flattery of the Italian subjects. His genuine descent may be ascribed to the second or middle order of private nobility. He sprang from a race of «seigneurons or baronets», of the dukes of the Countenance, in the Lower Normandy: the castle of Hauteville was their honourable seat; his father Tancred was conspicuous in the court and army of the duke; and his military service was furnished by ten soldiers or knights. Two marriages, of a rank not unworthy of his own, made him the father of twelve sons, who were educa-

1 A Life of St. Leo IX, deeply tinged with the passions and prejudices of the age, has been composed by Wiltet, printed at Paris, 1514, in five books and six times, but not printed in the Colloquiis of Boland, of Mabillon, and of Muratori. The public and private history of the pontificate is given by Robert the famous Guiscard, attacked, broke, routed, and pursued the Italian enemies, who fought without discipline, and fled without shame. A hostier trial was reserved for the valour of count Humphrey, who led the cavalry of the right wing. The Germans have been described as unskilful in the management of the horse and lance: but on foot they formed a strong and im-ted at home by the impartial tenderness of his second wife. But a narrow patrimony was insufficient for this numerous and daring progeny; they saw around the neighbourhood the mischiefs of poverty and discord, and resolved to seek in foreign wars a more glorious inheritance. Two only remained to perpetuate the race: the eldest, by the death of their father, became their tenant; the other, as they successively attained the vigour of manhood, departed from the castle, passed the Alps, and joined the Apulian camp of the Normans. The elder were prompted by native spirit; their success encouraged their younger brethren, and the three first in station in this expedition were Orce, desired to be the chief of their nation, and the founders of the new republic. Robert was the eldest of the seven sons of the second marriage; and even the reluctant praise of his foes has endowed him with the heroic qualities of a soldier and a statesman. His lofty stature surpassed the tallest of his army; his limbs were cast in the true proportion of strength and gracefulness; and to the decline of life, he maintained the patient vigour of health and the commanding dignity of his form. His complexion was ruddy, his shoulde were broad, his hair and beard were long and of a flaxen complexion; in his highest fortune, he was as well disposed to his voice, like that of Achilles, could impress obedience and terror amidst the tumult of battle. In the ruder ages of chivalry, such qualifications are not below the notice of the poet or historian; they may claim a baser end at once, as they are not of equal dignity; but he could wield in the right hand his sword, his lance in the left; that in the battle of Civitella, he was three unhorsed; and that in the close of that memorable day he was adjudged to have borne away the prize of valour from the warriors of the two armies. His bearing was so guarded by the suspicion of his consciousness of superior worth: in the pursuit of greatness, he was never arrested by the scruples of justice, and seldom moved by the feelings of humanity; though not insensible of fame, the choice of open or clandestine means was determined only by his present advantage. The surplus of Guiscard was applied to this end; political wisdom, which is too often confounded with the practice of dissimulation and deceit; and Robert is praised by the Apulian poet for excelling the cunning of Ulysses and the eloquence of Cicero. Yet these arts were disguised by an appearance of military frankness; in his highest fortune, he was as well disposed and courteous to his fellow-soldiers; and while he indulged the prejudices of his new subjects, he affected in his dress and manners to maintain the ancient fashion of his country. He was supplied with a richness in his youth; yet it was sufficient for a life of simplicity and industry; his primitive indigence had taught the habits of frugality; the gain of a merchant was not below his attention; and his prisoners were tortured with slow and unfailing cruelty, to force a discovery of their secret treasure. According to the Greeks, he departed from Normandy, with only five followers on his horseback, and thirty on foot; yet even this allowance appears too bountiful: the sixth son of Tancred of Hauteville passed the Alps as a pilgrim; and his first military band was levied among the adventurers of Italy. His brothers and countrymen had divided the fertile lands of Apulia; but they guarded their shares with the jealousy of war; the aspiring youth was driven forwards to the mountains of Calabria, and in his first exploits against the Greeks and the natives, it is not easy to discriminate the hero from the robber. To surprise a castle or a convent, to insannce a wealthy citizen, to plunder the adjacent villages for necessary supplies, and then, as the Greek proverb says, he exercised the powers of his mind and body. The volunteers of Normandy adhered to his standard; and, under his command, the peasants of Calabria assumed the name and character of Normans.

As the genius of Robert expanded with the rise of his fortunes, his ambition was not satisfied by his elder brother, by whom, in a transient quarrel, his life was threatened and his liberty restrained. After the death of Humphrey, the tender age of his sons excluded them from the command; they were reduced to a private estate by the ambition of their guardian and uncle; and Guiscard was exiled on a buckler, and saluted count of Apulia and general of the republic. With an increase of authority and of force, he resumed the conquest of Calabria, and soon aspired to a rank that should raise him for ever above the heads of his equals. By some acts of rapine or robbery, he acquired a name and character universally detestable, but Nicholas the second was easily persuaded, that the divisions of friends could terminate only in their mutual prejudice; that the Normans were the faithful champions of the holy see; and it was safer to trust the rashness of the enemy to the design of Guiscard. A synod of one hundred bishops was convened at Melphi; and the count interrupted an important enterprise to guard the person and execute the decrees of the Roman pontiff. His gratitude and policy concurred on Robert and his posterity the ducal title, with the confirmation of his possessions; and the republic of Normandy was divided, both in Italy and Sicily, which his sword could rescue from the schismatic Greeks and the unbelieving Saracens. This apostolic sanction might justify his arms: but the obedience of a free and victorious people could not be transferred without their consent; and Guiscard knew that the granting of the duchy of Sicily rested on the condition of his consent; and he was the labour of twenty years to deserve and realize these lofty appellations. Such tardy progress, in a narrow space, may seem unworthy of the abilities of the chief and the spirit of the nation: but the Normans were few in number; their resources were scanty; their service was voluntary and precarious. The bravest designs of the duke were sometimes opposed by the free voice of his parliament of barons: the twelve counts of popular election conspired against his authority; and against their perfidious uncle the sons of Humphrey demanded justice and revenge. By his policy and vigour, Guiscard discovered their plots, suppressed their oaths, and disobedience; and punished the king with death or exile: but in these domestic feuds, his years and the national strength were unprofitably consumed.

The acquisition of the ducal title by Robert Guiscard is a nice and obscure business. With the good advice of Giannone, Muratibus, and other counselors, who endeavored to Eurico to be the Duke of Apulia, a consistent and probable narrative.

Baronius (Annal. Eccles. A. D. 1053. No. 69.) has published the original act. He professed to have copied it from the Liber Cen erun, a Vatican manuscript. Yet a Liber Cen nerun has been printed by Muratibus (Antiqu. mediæ Ætatis, tom. v. p. 881—908.) and the name of Vatican and Cardinal awaken the suspicions of a poetaster, and even of a philosopher.
most eminent rank, and most distant climates, invited or visited the physicians of Salerno. They were protected by the Norman conquerors; and Guiscard, though bred in arms, could discern the merit and value of a philosopher. After a pilgrimage of thirty-nine years, Constantine, an African Christian, returned from Haggadah, a man of the largest and most liberal frame of mind, was invited to the court of the Abbazians; and Salerno was enriched by the practice, the lessons, and the writings, of the pupil of Avicenna.

The school of medicine has long slept in the name of a university; but her precepts are abridged in a string of aphorisms, bound together in the Leomine verses, or Latin hymn, of the twelfth century. 4

II. Seven miles to the west of Salerno, and thirty to the south of Naples, the obscure town of Amalfi displayed the power and rewards of industry. The land, however fertile, was of narrow extent; but the sea was accessible and open: the inhabitants first assumed the office of supplying the western world with the manufactures and productions of the east; and this useful traffic was the source of their opulence and freedom. The government was popular, under the administration of a duke and the supremacy of the Greek emperor. Fifty thousand vessels were in the sea at one time. If there was any city more abundantly provided with gold, silver, and the objects of precious luxury. The mariner who swarmed in her port excelled in the theory and practice of navigation and astronomy; and the discovery of the compass, which has opened the globe, is due to the neediness of the sailors. 4

Roger, the twelfth, and last of the Conquest of Sicil.

His reign, of Pancre, had been long delayed by Count Ro-

Age. He accepted the welcome summons; hastened to the Apulian camp; and deserved at first the esteem, and afterwards the envy, of his elder brother. Their valour and ambition were equal; but the youth of Roger was more tractable. 4

Roger, engaged the disinterested love of the soldiers and people. So scanty was his allowance, for himself and for his followers, that he descended from conquest to robbery, and from robbery to domestic theft; and so loose were the notions of property, that, by his own historian, at his special command, he is accused of stealing horses from astable at Melphi. 4

His spirit

4 Munster carries their antiquity above the year (1056.) of the death of Edward the Confessor, the rex Anglorum to whom they are addressed, Nor is this date affected by the opinion, or rather mistake, of Pasquier. Becheres de la France, iv. v. 23.) and Du-comes, (Glosar. Latin.) The practice of rhythm, as early as the sixteenth century, is contained in the works from the end of the eight and sixteenth century to the north and east. (Marini, Antiquit. tom. iii. dissert. a. p. 686–705.)

4 The description of Amalfi, by William the Apulian, (l. iii. p. 227.) contains much truth and some particulars. The third line may be applied to the sailo's compass: 4

\[\text{v. Latii munere magni erat.}

\text{v. Lectionis antiquam melius contenientur, quod}

\text{inquisita ad eum grammaticum non dicimus et ullius pomponii.
}

\text{v. Amalfitanae habitant; quidam adducunt vilium et reprehensibilium dictorum summis et pluribus patens.
}

\text{v. Laytonianus est non minus facinus, quod
}

\text{adsumum cumulent divittiis vel honoris attingent. Such in the preface of Malaterra (l. i. c. 35.) to the house-straining. From the moment (l. i. c. 19.) that he has mentioned his patron Roger, the elder

}
emerged from poverty and disgrace: from these base practices he rose to the merit and glory of a holy war; and the invasion of Sicily was seconded by the zeal and policy of his brother Guiscard. After the retreat of the Greeks, the Idolaters, a most audacious reproach of the Persians, returned the Athenians and possessions; but the deliverance of the island, so vainly undertaken by the forces of the eastern empire, was achieved by a small and private band of adventurers. In the first attempt, Roger braved, in an open boat, the real and fabulous dangers of Seyla and Charybdis; land. Not only the noblest and most active soldiers, but the Saracen, to the gates of Messina; and safely returned with the spoils of the adjacent country. In the fortresses of Trani, his active and patient courage was equally conspicuous. In his old age he related with pleasure, that by the distress of the siege, himself, and the countless his wife had been reduced to a single cloak or mantle, which they were alternately: that in a sally his horse had been slain, and he was dragged away by the Saracens; but that he owed his rescue to his good sword, and had retreated with his saddle on his back, lest the meanest trophy might be left among the miseries of the sierra country. Roger, three hundred Normans withstood and repulsed the forces of the island. In the field of Ceramio, fifty thousand horse and foot were overthrown by one hundred and sixty-six Christian soldiers, without reckoning the captive banner. Those captive bands of four camels, were reserved for the successor of St. Peter; and had these barbaric spoils been exposed not in the Vatican, but in the capital, they might have revived the memory of the Punic triumphs. These insufficient numbers of the Normans not only probably salute their kith and kin, the soldiers of honourable and equestrian rank, each of whom was attended by five or six followers in the field; yet, with the aid of this interpretation, and every fair allowance on the side of valor, arms, and reputation, the discontinuance of so many myriads will render the present reader to the alternative of a miracle or a fable. The Arabs of Sicily derived a frequent and powerful succour from their countrymen of Africa; in the siege of Palermo, the Norman cavalry was assisted by the galleys of Pisa; and, in the hour of action, the cory of the two brothers was subordinated to a diplomatic engagement. The Messina was the capital of thirty years, Roger, with the title of great count, obtained the sovereignty of the largest and most fruitful island of the Mediterranean; and his administration displays a liberal and enlightened mind above the limits of his age and education. The Moslems were maintained in the free enjoyment of their religion and property; a philosopher and physician of Mazara, of the race of Mahomet, harangued the conqueror, and was invited to court; his geography of the seven climates was translated into Latin; and Roger, after a dilignet perusal, professed the work of the Arabian to the writings of the Grecian Ptolemy. A remnant of christ\-

...
had been contrived by the subile Guiscard; and he trusted, that after this pretender had given a decent color to his arms, he would sink, at the nod of the conqueror, into his primitive obscurity. But victory was the only argument that could determine the belief of the Greeks; and the ardor of the Latins was much inferior to their credulity; the Norman veterans wished, like Italians, to be avenged; the Venetians referred their hasty repairs to the known and unknown dangers of a transmarine expedition. In his new levies, Robert exerted the influence of gifts and promises, the terror of civil and ecclesiastical authority; and some acts of violence might justify the repugnance, that age and the characters of these princes had trained into the Persian service of their unrelenting prince. After two years' incessant preparations, the land and naval forces were assembled at Otranto, at the heel, or extreme promontory, of Italy; and Robert was accompanied by his horse, who fought by his side, his son Bohemond, and the representatives of the emperor Michael. Thirteen hundred knights, of Norman race or discipline, formed the six-ws of the army, which might be swelled to thirty thousand followers of every denomination. The men, the horses, the arms, the engines, the wooden towers, covered with raw hides, were embarked on board the galleys. The Norman dukes had never been built in the ports of Italy, and the galleys were supplied by the alliance of the republic of Ragusa.

Siege of Durazzo.

At the mouth of the Adriatic gulf, the
A. D. 1091. shores of Italy and Epirus line in to July 17. wards each other. The space between Brundusium and Durazzo, the Roman passage, is no more than one hundred miles; at the last station of Otranto, it is contracted to fifty; and this narrow distance had suggested to Pyrrhus and Pompey the sublime or extravagant idea of a bridge. Before the general embarkation, the Norman duke despatched Bohemond with five thousand men to despatch an advance party to Corfu, to survey the opposite coast, and to secure an harbour in the neighbourhood of Vallona for the landing of the troops. They passed and landed without perceiving an enemy; and this successful experiment displayed the neglect and devise of the naval power of the Greeks. The islands of Epirus and the maritime towns were subdued by the arms or the name of Robert, who led his fleet and army from Corfu (I use the modern appellation) to the siege of Durazzo. That city, the western key of the empire, was guarded by ancient renown, and recent fortifications, by George Pachymeres, and his father Charles, by a crusading garrison. The body of Bohemond, and a numerous garrison of Albanians and Macedonians, who, in every age, have maintained the character of the soldiers. In the prosecution of his enterprise, the courage of Guiscard was assailed by every form of danger and mischance. In the most propitious season of the year, as his fleet passed along the coast, a storm of wind and snow unexpectedly arose; the Adriatic was swelled by the raging blast of the south, and a new shipwreck confirmed the old infancy of the Acroeranian rocks. The sails, the masts, and the oars, were shatttered or torn away; the sea and ships were covered with the fragments of vessels, with an armada of dead bodies; and the greatest part of the provisions were either drowned or damaged. The ducal galley was laboriously rescued from the waves, and Robert halted seven days on the adjacent cape, to collect the relics of his loss, and revive the drooping spirits of his soldiery. The Newgebirt, the hasty and inconstant mariners who had explored the ocean from Greenland to mount Atlas, and who smiled at the petty dangers of the Mediterranean. They had wept during the tempest; they were alarmed by the hostile approach of the Venetians, who had been solicited by the first day's action was not disadvantageous to Bohemond, a beardless youth, who led the naval powers of his father. All night the galleys of the enemy lay on their anchors in the form of a crescent; and the victory of the second day was decided by the dexterity of their evolutions, the station of their archers, the weight of their javelins, and the borrowed aid of the Greek fire. The Apulian and Ragusian vessels fled to the shore, several were cut from their cables, and dragged away by the conqueror; and a sally from the town carried slaughter and dismay to the tents of the Norman fleet. After the Mengus of Durazzo, and as soon as the besiegers had lost the command of the sea, the islands and maritime towns withdrew from the camp the supply of tribute and provision. That camp was soon affected with a pestilential distemper; five hundred knights perished by an inglorious death; and the list of survivors (if all could be revived) amounted to ten thousand persons. Under these calamities, the mind of Guiscard alone was firm and invincible; and while he collected new forces from Apulia and Sicily, he bated, or seared, or sapped, the walls of Durazzo. But his industry and valour were unequal to the task, and the conquest of the city was reserved for the conqueror of Illyria. A movable turret, of a size and capacity to contain five hundred soldiers, had been rolled forwards to the foot of the rampart; but the descent of the door or draw-bride was checked by an enormous beam, and the wooden structure was instantly consumed by artificial flames.

While the Roman empire was attacked by the Turks in the east, and the Normans in the west, the aged successor of Michael surrendered the sceptre to the hands of Alexius, the illustrious and captious of the Comnenian dynasty. The princes Anne, his daughter and historian, observes, in her affected style, that even Hercules was unequal to a double combat; and, on this principle, she approves a hasty peace with the Turks, which allowed her father to undertake in person the relief of Durazzo. On his accession, Alexius found the camp without soldiers, and the treasury without money; yet such were the vigour and activity of his measures, that in six months he assembled an army of seventy thousand men, and performed a march of five hundred miles. The troops were lodged in Europe and Asia, from Peloponnesus to the Black sea; his majesty was displayed in the silver arms and rich trappings of the companies of horse-guards; and the emperor was attended by a train of nobles and princes, trembling for the life of Vergil, is an interesting moment in the history of poetry and art. We have now to consider the case which is strangely doubled by Strabo (L. iv. p. 233) and Pliny. (Hist. Nat. ii. 62.)

The Itinerary of Jerusalem (p. 603, ed. Weisgell) gives a true account of the name of the Normans by the Italian and Spanish, which is strangely doubled by Strabo (L. iv. p. 233) and Pliny. (Hist. Nat. ii. 62.)

PLiny (Hist. Nat. iii. 6.) allows quinquaginta miles for this transmarine course, and agrees with the real distance from Otranto to Durazzo, which is very different from twenty-five miles, as stated by de Gueuze, &c. (p. 3–5.) Heroldius Barbarus, who substitutes centurias Venetianas for the milices, is corrected by every Venetian pilot who has sailed out of the gulf.

The Italian renunciation of the schism is still in force, and, in the Chronicle of Lupus Prussan, is confirmed by every Venetian pilot who has sailed out of the gulf.

The schism is still in force, and, in the Chronicle of Lupus Prussan (Script. Ital. tom. v. p. 53.)

Malaterra (L. iv. c. 27) speaks in high, but indefinite, terms of the emperor, whom the opikis inominaetabiles: like the Apianus post, (I. iv. p. 272.)

More focusum montes et plana teguntur. some of whom, in rapid succession, had been clothed with the purple, and were indulged by the lenity of the times in a life of influence and dignity. Their youthful ardour might animate the multitude; but the latent and present limit of the Roman world: the raw levies were drawn together in haste and terror; and the garrisons of Anatolia, or Asia Minor, had been purchased by the evacuation of the cities which were immediately occupied by the Turks. The strength of the Greek army consisted in the Varangians, the Scandinavian guards, whose numbers were recently augmented by a colony of exiles and volunteers from the British island of Thule. Under the yoke of the Norman conqueror, the Danes and English were oppressed and united: a band of adventurous youths resolved to do all that lay in their power to defend the seat of their fires and hold it open to the two great seas; and, in their long pilgrimage, they visited every coast that afforded any hope of liberty and revenge. They were entertained in the service of the Greek emperor; and their first station was in a new city, at a distance of thirty miles from the shore. Alexius soon reproved them to the defence of his person and palace; and bequeathed to his successors the inheritance of their faith and valour.\(^3\) The name of a Norman invader revived the memory of their wrongs: they marched with alacrity against the national foe, and paused to regain in Epirus the glory which they had lost in the battle of Hastings. The Varangians were supported by some companies of Franks or Latins; and the rebels who had fled to Constantinople from the tyranny of Guiscard, were eager to signalize their zeal and gratify their revenge. In this emergency, the emperor himself took the impregnable and impregnable strongholds of Thrace and Bulgaria; and these heretics united with the patience of martyrdom, the spirit and discipline of active valour.\(^6\) The treaty with the sultan had procured a supply of some thousand Turks; and the arrows of the Scythian horse were opposed to the lances of the Norman cavalry. On the report and distant prospect of these formidable numbers, Robert assembled a council of his principal officers. "You behold," said he, "your danger: it is urgent and inevitable. The hills are covered with armed men who congregate; and the long column, which is accustomed to wars and triumphs. Obedience and union are our only safety; and I am ready to yield the command to a more worthy leader." The vote and acclamation, even of his secret enemies, assured him, in that perilous moment, of their esteem and confidence; and the duke thus continued: "Let us trust in the rewards of victory, and deprive cowardice of the means of escape. Let us burn our vessels and our baggage, and give battle on this spot, as if we were the plain and insignificant people before." The resolution was unanimously approved; and without confining himself to his lines, Guiscard awaited in battle array the nearer approach of the enemy. His rear was covered by a small river; his right wing extended to the sea; his left to the hills: nor was he conscious, perhaps, that on the same ground Caesar and Pompey had formerly disputed the empire of the world.\(^7\)

Battle of Drouad.

Against the advice of his wisest captains, Alexius resolved to risk the event of a general action, and exhibited the garrisons and reserves of Drouad.\(^2\)

\(^2\) See the simple and massive narrative of Caesar himself. (Commentary of Drouad.)

\(^3\) The character and story of these Saxons has been the subject of the fifty-fourth chapter.

\(^4\) See the simple and massive narrative of Caesar himself. (Commentary of Drouad.)

\(^5\) The last is an unlucky word for a female prisoner.
of the Roman Empire.

2027. The emperor Henry III. invaded the 2028. Greeks, was met with a

2029. A.D. 1242.

2030. the king of Germany, and

2031. A.D. 1265.

2032. the Latin princes, the allies of 2033. The American translation is not

2034. The Romans had changed the 2035. inquisitorious name of Epic-damn

2036. in the book of Daniel to denote

2037. Durazzo, a dardenni; poet (Alberi.

2038. the Norman ducal family which

2039. traversed the mountains of Thessaly;

2040. three hundred English in the city of 2041. approached the Thessalonians;

2042. a more pressing duty suspended the 2043. viewed from the same princely

2044. the march of the Norman

2045. of the Frankish and Norman

2046. for the possession of

2047. was it not justly

2048. of Homer.

2049. arrows at the horse rather than the 2050. the of the impostor Michael was more honorable to 2051. exceeded his life.

2052. It is more than probable that Gaiss-

2053. card was not afflected by the loss of a 2054. costly pagvant, which had merited only 2055. the contempt and derision of the Greeks. After their

2056. defending of Duraz-

2057. and a Venetian commander supplied the place

2058. George Palaeologus, who had been imprudently called

2059. away from his station. The tents of the besiegers

2060. were converted into barracks, to sustain the inclemen-

2061. cy of the winter; and in answer to the defiance of the 2062. the Greek and Venetian embassies were received as 2063. least equal to their obstinacy. Perhaps he already

2064. trusted to his secret correspondence with a Venetian

2065. noble, who sold the city for a rich and 2066. or the victory unhonorable marriage.

2067. and trumpet of the conqueror. Yet

2068. they defended the street three days against an enemy

2069. already master of the rampart; and near seven months

2070. between the first investment and the final

2071. surrender of the place. From Durazzo, the Norman

2072. duke continued his successes in the field, and

2073. traversed the mountains of Thessaly; surprised

2074. three hundred English in the city of Castoria;

2075. approached the Thessalonians; and made Constantinople

2076. tremble. A more pressing duty suspended the 2077. prosecution of his ambitious designs. By shipwreck,

2078. pestilence, and the sword, his army was reduced to a

2079. third of the original numbers; and instead of being

2080. recruited from Italy, he was informed, by

2081. epistles, of the mischief and dangers which had been

2082. produced by his absence; the revolt of the cities and

2083. of Apulia; the distress of the pope; and the

2084. Revolt of Rome. The Normans had entered

2085. the city of Averio, and the

2086. of Bohemond. Highly presuming that his

2087. person was sufficient for the public safe-

2088. ty, he repassed the sea in a single brigantine, and left

2089. the remnant of the army under the command of his son

2090. and the Norman counts, exhorting Bohemond to re-

2091. precation of the freedom of his peers, and the counts to 2092. renew the authority of their leader. The son of 2093. Guiscard trod in the footsteps of his father; and the two

2094. destroyers are compared, by the Greeks, to the caterpillar and the locust, the last of whom devours whatever it has 2095. escaped the teeth of the former. After winning

2096. two splendid and ambitious exploits, he

2097. the plain of Thessaly, and besieged Larissa, the

2098. the fabulous realm of Achilles, which contained the

2099. the treasure and

2100. of the Byzantine camp. Yet a just praise

2101. must not be refused to the fortitude and prudence of 2102. Alexius, who bravely struggled with the calamities of the 2103. in the poverty of the state, he presumed to

2104. to borrow the fabulous ornaments of the

2105. the desertion of the Manicheans was supplied

2106. some tribes of Moldavia: a reinforcement of seven

2107. thousand Turks replaced and revenged the loss of their

2108. brethren; and the Greek soldiers were

2109. the march of the Norman

2110. for the possession of

2111. was it not justly

2112. of Homer. He wishes to inspire contempt, as well as horror for the 2113. animal, and the general desolation of war, the 2114. or common nonsense, of mankind, reassures her laudable design.

2115. in the supplicatory

2116. in the book of Daniel to denote

2117. of the Greeks. After their 2118. the city of Castoria; and

2119. the Thessalonians; and made Constantinople

2120. tremble. A more pressing duty suspended the

2121. prosecution of his ambitious designs. By shipwreck,

2122. pestilence, and the sword, his army was reduced to a

2123. third of the original numbers; and instead of being

2124. recruited from Italy, he was informed, by

2125. epistles, of the mischief and dangers which had been

2126. produced by his absence; the revolt of the cities and

2127. of Apulia; the distress of the pope; and the

2128. Revolt of Rome. The Normans had entered

2129. the city of Averio, and the

2130. of Bohemond. Highly presuming that his

2131. person was sufficient for the public safe-

2132. ty, he repassed the sea in a single brigantine, and left

2133. the remnant of the army under the command of his son

2134. and the Norman counts, exhorting Bohemond to re-

2135. precation of the freedom of his peers, and the counts to 2136. renew the authority of their leader. The son of

2137. Guiscard trod in the footsteps of his father; and the two

2138. destroyers are compared, by the Greeks, to the caterpillar and the locust, the last of whom devours whatever it has

2139. escaped the teeth of the former. After winning

2140. two splendid and ambitious exploits, he

2141. the plain of Thessaly, and besieged Larissa, the 2142. the fabulous realm of Achilles, which contained the

2143. the treasure and

2144. of the Byzantine camp. Yet a just praise

2145. must not be refused to the fortitude and prudence of 2146. Alexius, who bravely struggled with the calamities of the 2147. in the poverty of the state, he presumed to

2148. to borrow the fabulous ornaments of the

2149. the desertion of the Manicheans was supplied

2150. some tribes of Moldavia: a reinforcement of seven

2151. thousand Turks replaced and revenged the loss of their

2152. brethren; and the Greek soldiers were exercised to

2153. to the hands of the 2154. of ambushes and evolutions. Alexius had been taught

2155. by experience, that the formidable cavalry of the 2156. the Franks on foot was unfit for action, and almost inca-

2157. of motion; his archers were directed to aim their

2158. The Romana had changed the inauspicious name of Epic-damn

2159. to denote the inauspicious day of his death (see Malatera) bore some affinity to hardiness. One of Robert's 2160. was Durand, a dardenni; poet (Alberi. Monach. in Chrysostom. lib. xxii. c. 18. p. 131.) By the 2161. advice of Alexius, who taught him to draw public personages;

2162. a Roman than a Greek, which the 2163. his grace to groan out a tolerable meaning; is a golden crown; is explained by Serres Pertuis (in Lexica Graeco- Barbaro) by στέφανος, a flash of lightning.

2164. For these general events I must refer to the general historians, Rossinus, Baroinus, Mosheim, and other 2165. Lives of Gregory VII. are either legends or inventions; (St.

2166. St. Gregory, Abbeys, tom. ii. p. iv.)" From which it appears that the stories and

2167. in modern fashion, which lasted from the eleventh to the 2168. fifteenth century. These robes were sometimes two feet, and fastened to the knee with a silver 2169. The episode itself (Alexian. l. iii. p. 94, 95, 55.) well deserves to be 2170. is a modern reader. He will, as usual, find some instruction in Le Ovati, (Vide de Bibliothek, (Biblio-2171. members, &c.)... of whom I have already spoken, and to whom I can add nothing. May I presume to add, that the portrait of St. Athanasius is one of

2172. of the possessions of my history (vol. i. p. 375, &c.) with which I am least

2173. bow, with the rancour of a Greek is schismatic, calls him ταυτο-2174. the history of the Roman church... Gregorio VII. (Annales Quedlin- nburg. tom. i. p. 155.)" But this courage is impo-

2175. the sensible power of (Constat.) ed to the cause of Gregory: their resolution was forttified by supplies of men and money from Apulia; and Belezzas Rome, and the city was thrice ineffectually besieged by the emperor. But in the fourth year he corrupted, as it is said, with Byzantine gold, the nobles of Rome, whose estates and castles had been ruined by the war. The
A. D. 1064. gates, the bridges, and fifty hostages, were delivered into his hands: the anti-Popes of Cluny were consecrated in the Lateran: the grateful pontiff crowned his protector in the Vatican; and the empe-or Henry fixed his residence in the capital, as the lawful successor of Augustus and Charlemagne. The ruins of the Sepulchrum were still defended by the nephew of Gregory; the pope himself was invested in the castle of St. Angelo: and his last hope was in the courage and fidelity of his Norman vassal. Their friendship had been interrupted by some reciprocal injuries and complaints; but, on this pressing occasion, Guiscard was urged by the obligation of his oath, by his interest, more potent than oaths, by the love of fame, and his enmity to the two emperors. Unfurling the holy banner, he resolved to fly to the relief of the prince of the apostles: the most numerous of his armies, six thousand horse, and thirty thousand foot, was instantly assembled; and by land and by sea he came to Rome was animated by the public applause and the promise of the divine favour. Henry, invincible in sixty-six battles, trembled at his approach; re-colclected some indispensible affairs that required his presence in Lombardy; exulted the Romans to perma-nces before Rome. Were in their allegiances; and hastily re-bert; May, treated three days before the entrance of the Normans. In less than three years, the son of Tancred of Hauteville enjoyed the glory of delivering the pope, and of compelling the two emperors of the east and west, before his banners. The Second expedition of Robert was clouded by the calamities of Rome. By the aid of the friends of Gregory, the walls had been perforated or scaled; but the imperial faction was still powerful and active; on the third day, the people rose in a furious tumult; and a hostile circle was formed, in his defence or re-capture the signal of fire and pillage. The Saracens of Sic-ly, the subjects of Roger, and auxiliaries of his brother, embraced this fair occasion of rifling and proflaing the holy city of the christians; many thousands of the citizens, in the sight, and by the allies, of their spirits elevated; were exposed to open fire, to death; and a spacious quarter of the city, from the Lateran to the Coliseum, was consumed by the flames, and devoted to perpetual solitude. From a city, where he was now hated, and might be no longer feared, Gregory retired to end his days in the palace of Salerno. The artful pontiff might flatter the vanity of Guiscard, with the hope of a Roman or imperial crown; but this dangerous measure, which would have inflamed the ambition of the Norman, must for ever have aliienated the most faithful princes of Germany.

q

Sie uno tempore victi
Sunt terrae Domini duo; rex Alexammaticus iste, Romani maximus; Altera arma Rossa armis superat; et alter Nomini audit solis formidante cerre.

It is significant that the Apulian poet, should distinguish the Greek as the ruler of the Roman empire, (l. iv. 274.)

The name of Alex, ro, in the fourteenth and fourteenth century, is authentic, circumstantial, and fair. Dix ignem exclamans urbem incensa, &c.
The Apulian poet omits the mention, (inde quibusdam mithraeum existat) which is again evaginated in some partial chronicles. (Muratori Arnal., tom. iv. p. 127.)

In this instance of his public benefactions, the Jean Dumas de Rome reteri et nova, l. iv. c. 5, p. 163,) prettily adds. Dureau, bidequy in Col dilectores in cœnomanium urbis, cupido in, in hoc regno vestinumque amantissimam Roman reus, rectam ut perpetua viriditas consistente volventcs et ruinas sus.

fatigable Robert resumed the design of his eastern conquests. The zeal or gratitude of Gregory bad promised to his valor the kingdoms of Greece and Asia, in the Frankish conquests; his troops were invested with success and eager for action. Their numbers, in the language of Homer, are compared by Anna to a swarm of bees; 4 yet the utmost and moderate limits of the powers of Guiscard have been already defined; they were contained on this second occasion in one hundred and twenty thousand men. During the success of this far advanced, the harbour of Brundusium 5 was prefer-ed to the open road of Otranto. Alexius, apprehensive of a second attack, had assiduously laboured to restore the naval forces of the empire; and obtained from the prince of Venice, who owned the number of thirty-six transports, fourteen galleys, and nine vessels or ships of extraordinary strength and magnitude. Their services were liberally paid by the li-ence or monoply of trade, a profitable gift of many shops and houses in the port of Constantinople, and a tribute. The want of experience had as usual produce of a tax on their rivals of Apamia. By the union of the Greeks and Venetians, the Adriatic was covered with a hostile fleet; but their own neglect, or the vigilance of Robert, the change of a wind, or the shelter of a mist, opened a free passage; and the Normans in their progress were freed from Scyzra and Corfu. With twenty strong and well-appointed galleys, their intrepid duke immediately sought the enemy, and though more accustomed to fight on horseback, he trusted his own life, and the lives of his brother against that of a traitor, to the event of a naval combat.
The dominion of the sea was disputed in three engagements, in sight of the island of Corfu; in the second, the skill and number of the allies were superior; but in the third, the Normans obtained a final and complete victory. 3 The light brigantines of the Greeks were no match for the Normans, and the nine castles of the Venetians maintained a more obsti-inate conflict; seven were sunk, two were taken; two thousand five hundred captives implored in vain the mercy of the victor; and the daughter of Alexius deplores the loss of thirteen thousand of his subjects on the island of Cephalonia, which was conquered.
She was deprived of the command of the conquest of Constantinople; but, instead of traversing the hills of Epirus, he turned his arms against Greece and the islands, where the spoils would repay the labour, and where the land and sea forces might pursue their joint operations with vigour and effect.
But in the isle of Cephalonia, his projects were finally blasted by an epidemic disease: Robert himself, in 4 The royalty of Robert, either promised or bestowed by the pope, (Anna, 1. p. 22) is sufficiently confirmed by the Apulian, (l. iv. p.
276.)
Romani regni sibi promissae commoda: Pape freevar.
Nor can I understand why Grever, and the other pagan advocates should be displeased with this new instance of apostolic jurisdiction.
5 See Homer, Illiad B. I hate this peptic mode of quotation by the letters of the Greek alphabet 57, &c. His bills are the image of a disordered crowd: their discipline and public works seem to be the ideas of a later age. (Virgil, Aenid 1. 1)
The admirable port of Brundusium was protected by a line of outward harbours, which stretched both north and south of the island, and narrowing by degrees, till it communicated by a small neck with the open sea; within this line, walls and fortifications were continued on the coast sides. Caesar and nature have laboured for its ruin; and against such a work, by another age, was deemed the effect of the Xapaaon, apol ments (Cumberland's Travels in the two Sicilies, vol. i. p. 348-300.)

The project of William of Apulia (l. iv. p. 276) describes the victory of the Normans, and forgets the two previous defeats, which are diligently recited in the chronicles, (i. iv. c. 31, p. 164,) and speaks of the project as one of herculean effort, since they despoil their sea, proper exultant moll. (Dundurn, in Chren. in Morav., Script. Rom. in lustrum, tom. vii. p. 249.)
The seventh year of his age, expired A.D. 683, July 17. in his tent; and a suspicion of poison was committed, by public rumour, to his wife, or to the Greek emperor. This premature death might be suspected of a legal investigation from the royal property, and his future exploits; and the event sufficiently declares, that the Norman greatness was founded on his life. Without the appearance of an enemy, a victorious army dispersed or retreated in disorder and consternation; and Alexios, who had trembled for his empire, received the inheritance of his father. But it is probable, the remains of Guiscard was shipwrecked on the Italian shore; but the duke's body was recovered from the sea, and deposited in the sepulchre of Venii- sin, a place more illustrious for the birth of Horace, than for the burial of the Norman heroes. Roger, his successor, immediately sunk to the humble station of a duke of Apulia: the esteem or partiality of his father left the valiant Bohemond to the inheritance of his sword. The national tranquillity was disturbed by his claims, till the first crusade against the infidels of the east, opened a more splendid scene than all that preceded. Of human life, the most glorious or humble prospects are alike and soon bounded by the sepulchre. The male line of Robert Guiscard was extinguished, both in Apulia and Antwerp, in the tenth year of his death; and the daughter of his brother became the father of a line of kings; and the son of the great count was endowed with the name, the conquests, and the spirit, of the first Roger. The heir of that Norman adventurer was born in Sicily; and, at the age of only four years, he succeeded to the sovereignty of the Greek colonies, which one moiety had been ceded to the elder branch; struggled to enlarge his Calaban limits beyond the measure of former treaties; and impatiently watched the declining health of his cousin William of Apulia, Duke of Apulia, the grandson of Robert.

A.D. 1097. tidings of his premature death, Roger sailed from Palermo with seven galleys, cast anchor in the bay of Salerno, received, after ten days' negotiation, an oath of fidelity from the Norman capitalist, commanded the submission of the Norman conquerors, and由此 restored by the victorious Roger. A conscious superiority of power and merit prompted him to disdain the titles of duke and of count; and the island of Sicily, with a third perhaps of the continent of Italy, might form the basis of a kingdom, which would only yield to the French kingdom, or perhaps the possessions of the nation who attended his coronation at Palermo, might doubtless pronounce under what name he should reigne over them; but the example of a Greek tyrant or a Saracen emir were insufficient to justify his regal character; and the nine kings of the Latin world might not demand his immediate investiture by the authority of the supreme pontiff. The pride of Anachus was pleased to confer a title, which the pride of the Norman had stipulated for solicitation; but his own legitimacy was attacked by the adventurer, who was his equal in the extent of his dominions, and while Anacletus sat in the Vatican, the successful fugitive was acknowledged by the nations of Europe. The infant monarchy of Roger was shaken, and almost overthrown, by an unlucky choice of an ecclesiastical patron; and the sword of Lothaire the Great, the sword of Godfrey the Great, the sword of the great King, the sword of the great Count, the swords of Pisa, and the zeal of St. Bernard, were united for the ruin of the Sicilian robber. After a gallant resistance, the Norman prince was driven from the continent of Italy; a new duke of Apulia was invested by the pope and the emperor, each of whom held one end of the government, or flag-staff, as a token that they asserted their right, and suspended their quarrel. But such jealous friendship was of short and precarious duration: the German armies soon vanished in disease and desertion; the Apulian duke, with all his adherents, was exterminated by a Norman conqueror, who had been his helper. A fate in living: like his predecessor Leo the ninth, the feeble though haughty pontiff became the captive and friend of the Normans; and their reconciliation was celebrated by the eloquence of Bernard, who now revolved the title and virtues of the king of Sicily.

As a penance for this impious war his confessors in against the successor of St. Peter, that Africa, monarch might have promised to dis- play the banner of the cross, and he accomplished with ardour a vow so propitious to his interest and hope. The recent inquiries of Sicily might provide a just retaliation on the heads of the Saracens; the Normans, whose blood had been mingled with so 100,000 fast, and 400 galley. Compara Homere (Essays, vol. i. pp. 288, 484,) and his adversary Wallace. (Numbers of Mankind, p. 306, 307,) the theme of every traveller, D'Orville, Reclus, Schweinbeur, &c. A contemporary historian of the acts of Roger from the year 1127 to 1133, found his title on merit and valor, the content of the Saracen, and the ancient rivalry of Sicily and Palermo, without introducing Pope Anarchus. (Alexand. Cruceii Tribunis, Abbatia de Rebibus Regum Rogerii, lib. iv. in Monarchi, Script. Rerum Ital. tom. v. p. 607 355.)

The books of the Cronicas, of the Carmina Burana, and of the Saracens, Sweden, Denmark, and Hungary. The three first were more worth reading than those of Charles the Great, and his three sword; the three last by their baptism; and of these the king of the Saracen alone was a Christian. (D'Orville, et al. 1127. p. 355.)

Fazulius, and a crew of Sicilians, had attempted a more early and independent coronation, (A. D. 1123. May 15,) which Giannone and Filenghi, who had been successively rejected by the Saracen emir, were restored by the silence of contemporaries; nor can be restored by a proverbious charter of Messina, translated by the Annali di Italia, tom. v. p. 340. Pag, Critica, tom. iv. p. 467. &c.

Roger corrupted the second person of Lothaire's army, who was moreover rather cried, a retreat for the Germans (says Guicciardini, in p. 54) are ignorant of the use of trumpets. Most ignorant himself!
many subject streams, were encouraged to remember and emulate the naval triumphs of their fathers, and in the maturity of their strength they contended with the decline of an African power. When the Fatimite caliph departed for the conquest of Egypt, he rewarded the real merit and apparent fidelity of his servant Joseph, with a gift of his royal mantle, and forty Arab horses, in exchange with its continuous furnishing and the government of the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers. The Zeidrites, the descendants of Joseph, forgot their allegiance and gratitude to a distant benefactor; grasped and abused the fruits of prosperity; and after running the little course of an oriental dynasty, were excluded in their own land. Above all, on the side of the land, they were pressed by the Almohades, the fanatic princes of Morocco, while the sea-coast was open to the enterprises of the Greeks and Franks, who, before the close of the eleventh century, had extorted a ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold. By the first arms of Roger, the island or rock of Malta, which has been since ennobled by a military and religious colony, was inseparably annexed to the crown of Sicily. Tripoli, a strong and maritime city, was the next object of his attack; and the slaughter of the males, the capitvity of the females, might have led to a fearful example. The most frequent parts were themselves. The capiial of the Zeidrites was named Africa from the country, and Mahadad from the Arabian bvid; it is strongly built on a neck of land, but the imperfection of the harbour is not compensated by the fortifications of the adjacent parts. Mahadad was besieged by George the Sicilian admiral, with a fleet of one hundred and fifty galleys, amply provided with men and the instruments of mischief; the sovereign had fled, the Moorish governor refused to capitulate, declined the last and irresistible assault, and secretly embarked his warriors, who abandoned the place and its treasures to the rapacious Franks. In successive expeditions, the king of Sicily or his lieutenants reduced the cities of Tunis, Safax, Capsin, Bona, and a long tract of the sea-coast; the fortresses were garrisoned, the country was tributary, and a host of the Franks, in subject. they might be inscribed with some flattery on the sword of Roger. After his death, that sword was broken; and these transmarine possessions were neglected, evacuated, or lost, under the troubled reign of his successor. The emperor and his people were persuaded that the African continent is neither inaccessible nor invincible; yet the great princes and powers of Christendom have repeatedly failed in their armaments against the Moors, who may still glory in the easy conquest and long subdive of Spain.

Since the death of Robert Guiscard, the Normans had relinquished, above sixty years, their hostile designs against the empire of the east. The policy of Roger solicited a public and private union with the Greek princes, whose alliance would dignify his regal character; he demanded in marriage a daughter of the Comnenian family, and the first steps of the treaty seemed to promise a favourable event. But the contemptuous treatment of his ambassadors exasperated the vanity of the new monarch; and the insincerity of the Byzantine court was expiated, according to the law of nations, by the sufferings of a guiltless people. With a fleet of seventy galleys, George, the admiral of Sicily, appeared before Cerip; and both the island and city were beleaguered for some time. But the doge of Venice, who had yet to learn that a siege is still more calamitous than a tribute. In this invasion, of some moment in the annals of commerce, the Normans spread themselves by sea, and over the provinces of Greece, and the venerable age of Athens. The bses, and Corinth, was most severely tried by the exigencies of Athens no memorial remains. The ancient walls, which encompassed, without guarding, the opulence of Thebes, were sealed by the Latin christians; but their sole use of the gospel was to sanctify an oath, that the lawful owners had not secreted any relic of their literature or industry. On the approach of the Normans the lower town of the citadel, which was seated on a lofty eminence abundantly watered by the classic fountain of Pirene: an impregnable fortress, where the want of courage could be hid by any advantages offered by the ground. It was necessary that the besiegers should mount the labour (their sole labour) of climbing the hill, under the general, from the commanding eminence, admired his own victory, and testified his gratitude to heaven, by tearing from the altar the precious image of Christ, which was a monument of the service of both sexes, who to George transported to Sicily, composed the most valuable part of the spoil, and in comparing the skilful industry of the mechanic with the imm, and cowardice of the soldier, he was heard to exclaim, that the distaff and loom were the only works of art which were capable of his admiration. The progress of this naval armada—Louis VII. was marked by two conspicuous events, the rescue of the king of France, and the insult of the Byzantine capital. In his return by sea from an unfortunate crusade, Louis the seventh was received by the Greeks, who barely violated the laws of honour and religion. The fortunate encounter of the Norman fleet delivered the royal captive; and after a few and honourable entertainment in the court of Sicily, Louis continued his journey to Rome and Constantinople. The vassals of the house of Potet despised the mailed warriors of Constantinople and the Helleespont were stamplied. He left without defence and without the suspicion of danger. The clergy and people, for the soldiers had followed the standard of Manuel, were astonished and dismayed at the hostile appearance of a line of galleys, which boldly cast anchor in the front of the imperial city. The forces of the Sicilian admiral were inadequate to the siege or assault of an immense and populous metropolis; but George enjoyed the glory of humbling the Greek arrogancy, and of marking the path of conquest to the masters of the world. He landed the Normans was capable of risque adventure. The empress of Sicily, who had surprised Manuel with an unguarded moment, Manuel accepted the liberty to pursue, to desire, while his martial spirit, A. D. 1149, 1149.

The decline and fall. Chapter XVII.

2 Tripoli, (says the Nubian geographer, or more properly the Shi- rif al Ein) urbis est, rara, non multa valuts, quae prope litus mari, magnificantissimam, quin multae aliorum civitas docuit.

3 See the geography of Leo Africanus, (in Ramusio, tom. i. fol. 74. vers. 17. 75. secto) and Shaw's Travels, (p. 110) the seventh book of the History of Hierotheus, (vol. i. tom. ii. p. 305.) The passages of Moses and of the voyage and defence of the place are offered by Charles V. and the Venetians, (ibid.) to explain the navigation of the African coast.

4 Since the accuracies of the African conquerors of Roger; and his criticism was supplied by his friend the Abbe Lencoresse, with some Arabic memones. (A. D. 1147. No. 35. A. D. 1149. No. 16. A. D. 1153. No. 14.)

5 Apulius Calvis, Siculius merti merito aedificavit. A proof of this inscription, which denotes, that the Norman conquerors were still discriminated from their christian and Modern subjects, is Andrea Fabriscius, Histo. Siculae. In More it, rogo ton, ver. 271.) which describes these posts as the neglect or treachery of the admiral Majo.

The decline of the Sicilian house, who end too soon or begin too late, must be supplied by Otto of Eriheiman, a German, (Ged. Frederici i. l. 42. in Monarch, &c. tom. ii. p. 228, 229, 233.) and the Greek writers Cimenes, (ib. c. 2—5) and Nicetas, (in Manuel, i. tom. i. 2.)

To this imperfect capture and speedy rescue. I apply the word of Cassiodorus, (in the Cimenes, &c. tom. iv. p. 420, 421.) about the history of the French, who, when the region is marked, nothing more implies a period of rectitude than a country rose; yet, when the story is exaggerated, their advocate, Boccaccio, is less positive as the commentator on Guglielmi than the reporter of the emperor, (ib.)

In relation to the集成电路, the evidence, (Annales D'italia, tom. iv. p. 642, 421) lastly the frequency of the French, who, when the region is marked, nothing more implies a period of rectitude than a country rose; yet, when the story is exaggerated, their advocate, Boccaccio, is less positive as the commentator on Guglielmi than the reporter of the emperor, (ib.)
The forces of the empire were awakened to revenge. The Archipelago and Ionian sea were covered with his squadrons and those of Venice; but I know not by what favourable arrangement of transports, victualers, and pinnaces, our reason or even our fancy can be reconciled to the stupendous account of fifteen hundred vessels, which is proposed by a Byzantine writer. The Venetians were directed with prudence and energy: in his homeward voyage George lost nineteen of his galleys, which were separated and taken: after an obstinate defence, Corfu imposed the clemency of her lawful sovereign; nor could a ship, a soldier of the Norman prince, be saved. He was an ardent lover of the eastern sea; the prosperity and the health of Roger were already in a declining state: while he listened in his palace of Palermo to the messengers of victory or defeat, the invincible Manuel, the foremost in every assault, was celebrated by the Greeks and Latins as the Alexander or Hercules of the age.

A prince of such a temper could not be satisfied with having repelled the incursion of a barbarian. It was the right and duty, it might be the interest and glory, of Manuel to restore the ancient majesty of the empire, to recover the power and splendour of Sicily, which the base pretensions of this pretended king, the grandson of a Norman vassal,6 had degraded to the level of a vassal of the Greek monks; his wild and impetuous zeal to avenge the murder of his father; his love of revenge and hatred of his sovereign; his obstinate resistance to all the advice of the papal legates, of the Holy Roman emperors, and of the Venetians; his enmity to the Venetians, who were his allies throughout the whole war; his hatred of the Latins, whose territories he was about to invade; and the interest of all Christian nations in the preservation of the empire, were the motives which incited Manuel to launch a war of conquest against the Latins.6

The clergy and the nobles of the empire, the inhabitants of the cities and villages, the Venetian merchants, and the inhabitants of the towns of Sicily, were all occupied with the same project, and the fame of this enterprise spread far and wide. The sailors and soldiers were all resolved to press on to Constantinople, and to recover the empire from the Latins. It was therefore with great joy that the pope and the emperor of Constantinople received the news of the invasion of Sicily. The emperor of Constantinople had been the first to send his fleet against the Latins; and the emperor of Germany had promised to follow with his own fleet.7

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

But these Italian conquests, this universal war of the Latins, was the ruin of the empire. The Latins were not prepared for the war, and the emperor of the Latins was defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was victorious, and the empire of the Latins was restored to its former glory.

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

But these Italian conquests, this universal war of the Latins, was the ruin of the empire. The Latins were not prepared for the war, and the emperor of the Latins was defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was victorious, and the empire of the Latins was restored to its former glory.

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

But these Italian conquests, this universal war of the Latins, was the ruin of the empire. The Latins were not prepared for the war, and the emperor of the Latins was defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was victorious, and the empire of the Latins was restored to its former glory.

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

But these Italian conquests, this universal war of the Latins, was the ruin of the empire. The Latins were not prepared for the war, and the emperor of the Latins was defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was victorious, and the empire of the Latins was restored to its former glory.

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

But these Italian conquests, this universal war of the Latins, was the ruin of the empire. The Latins were not prepared for the war, and the emperor of the Latins was defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was victorious, and the empire of the Latins was restored to its former glory.

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

But these Italian conquests, this universal war of the Latins, was the ruin of the empire. The Latins were not prepared for the war, and the emperor of the Latins was defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was victorious, and the empire of the Latins was restored to its former glory.

The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was determined to seize the opportunity of the war to recover the empire of the Latins in the west. He had invited the pope to join him in this enterprise, and the pope had sent him a letter in which he expressed his desire to see the empire of the Latins restored to its former glory and power. The emperor of Byzantium was delighted with this offer, and the two emperors agreed to form a league for the recovery of the empire of the Latins. The league was ratified by a treaty, signed at Venice in the year 1171.8

But these Italian conquests, this universal war of the Latins, was the ruin of the empire. The Latins were not prepared for the war, and the emperor of the Latins was defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor of Byzantium, on the other hand, was victorious, and the empire of the Latins was restored to its former glory.
The Decline and Fall

Chapter XVII.

The first William did not degenerate from the value of his race; but his temper was slothful; his manners were droll; his passion hot-brained and over-curious; and the monarch is responsible, not only for his personal vices, but for those of Majo, the great admiral, who abused the confidence, and conspired against the life, of his benefactor. From the Arabian conquest, Sicily had imbided a deep tincture of oriental feudalism; the queen desired her husband, her son, and her baron, of a sultan; and a christian people was oppressed and insulted by the ascendant of the eunuchs, who openly professed, or secretly cherished, the religi-

The Byzantine Cæsars acquiesced in this shadow of domination, without expecting, perhaps without desiring, the service of a Norman army; and the truce of thirty years was not disturbed by any hostilities between Sicily and Constantinople.

About the end of that period the throne of Manuale was usurped by an inhuman tyrant, who had desired the abode of his country and mankind: the sword of William the second, the grandson of Roger, was drawn by a fugitive of the Comnien race; and the subjects of Andronicus might safely applaud, as friends, their sovereignty as the worst of enemies. Last war of the Greeks and Normans.

The Latin historians expatiate on the rapid progress of the four counts who invaded Romania with a fleet and army, and reduced many castles and cities to the obedience of the king of Sicily. The Greeks, by nipping the wanton and sanguinary cruelties that were perpetrated in the sack of Thessalonica, the second city of the empire, the modern.develope the fate of those invincible but unsuspecting warriors who were destroyed in the arts of a vanquished foe. The latter apply in songs of triumph, the repeated victories of their countrymen on the sea of Marmora or Pontus, on the banks of the Strymon, and under the walls of Durazzo. A revolution which punished the crimes of Andronicus, had united against the Franks the zeal and courage of the successful insurgents; ten thousand were slain in battle, and Isaac Angelus, the new emperor, might indulge his vanity or vengeance in the treatment of four thousand captives. Such was the event of the last contest between the Greeks and Normans: before the expiration of twenty years, the river Po had lost or degraded their foreign supremacy: and the successors of Constantinople did not long survive to insult the fall of the Sicilian monarchy.

William I., the Bad, king of Sicily.

He was roused to arms by danger and shame; and the spectre of Roger successively devolved to his son and grandson: they might be conformed under the name of William; they are strongly discriminated by the epithets of the bad and the good; but these epithets, which appear to describe the perfection of virtue and vice, cannot strictly be applied to either of the Norman kings. William I. the Bad, king of Sicily.

A. D. 1156.

A. D. 1155.

A. D. 1154.

A. D. 1166.

May 7.

This victory is mentioned by Romanus of Salerno, (in Muratori, Scriptores, tom. vii. p. 128, seq.) It is written in Salernian, that is to say, in the praise of the king of Sicily, Cinnamus; (l. iv. c. 12, p. 97, 98,) so much warmer and copious than Falcondus, (p. 258, 278.) But the Greeks are fond of description, and the Latin historian is not fond of William the Bad.

A key to the epitaph of William I., see Cinnamus (l. iv. c. 2, p. 101, 102, and Nicetus, l. i. c. 5.) It is difficult to affirm whether these terrors deceived themselves, or the public, in those distressing particulars of the death of the grandeur of the empire. It is an only quote of original evidence, the poor chronicles of Secund of Cremona, and the list of Fons Ven., (p. 75,) as they are published in the seventh volume of Muratori's historiarum. The king of Sicily seems to have been proclaiming the event to the assembled assembly of his courtiers. C. P. They were caput confitum; caput captivum, by Isaac.

The fall of the Cinnamites, who are now reduced to Nicetus, (in Andronicus, l. i. c. 7, 8, 9, l. i. c. i., in Isaac Angelus, l. i. c. 1—4,) who never recovered the complete dominion of the empire and the empire, he is above question; but the fall of Constantinople, the fall of Constantinople, the fall of Constantinople, is not the same thing as the fall of the empire. For the history of learning, I shall observe that Homer's great commentator, Eustathius, archbishop of Thessalonica, refused to desert his flock.
tremity (he interrogates a friend) how must the Sicilians act? By the unanimous election of a king of valour and experience, Sicily and Calabria might yet be preserved; for in the levity of the Apulians, ever eager for new revolutions, I can repose neither confidence nor hope. Should Calabria be lost, the lofty towers and the remains of his home would guard the straits of Messina, might guard the passage against a foreign invader. If the savage Germans coalesce with the pirates of Messina; if they destroy with fire the fruitful region, so often wasted by the fires of mount Etna, what resource will be left for the interior parts of the kingdom? The Christian invader would not be violated by the hostile footsteps of a barbarian. Catana has again been overwhelmed by an earthquake; the ancient virtue of Syracuse expires in poverty and solitude; but Palermo is still crowned with a diadem, and her triple walls enclose the active multitudes of Christians and Saracens. If the two nations under one king, can unite for their common safety, they may rush on the barbarians with invincible arms. But if the Saracens, fatigued by a repetition of injuries, should now retire and rebel; if they should overcome the vanguard of the Christian army, the unfortunate Christians, exposed to a double attack, and placed as it were between the hammer and the anvil, must resign themselves to hopeless and inevitable servitude. We must not forget, that a priest here prefers his country to his religion; and that the Mussulmans, of the two nations, were still numerous and powerful in the state of Sicily.

Conquest of the kingdom of Sicily by the emperor Henry VII. The hopes, or at least the wishes, of the monks of Palermo, that the grandson of the first king, whose birth was illegitimate, but whose civil and military virtues shone without a blemish. During four years, the term of his life and reign, he stood in arms on the furthest verge of the Apulian frontier, against the powers of Germany; and the restitution of a royal captive, of Constantia herself, without injury or ransom, may appear to surpass the most liberal measure of policy or reason. After his decease, the kingdom of his widow and infant son fell without a struggle; and Henry pursued his victorious march from Capua to Palermo. The political and the naval arts of his father strengthened him, and if the pope and the free cities had consulted their obvious and real interest, they would have combined the powers of earth and heaven to prevent the dangerous union of the German prince with the kingdom of Sicily. But the subtle policy, for which the Normans are famed, was a nullity, or arranged, was on this occasion blind and inactive; thina, movi concurrens, caeli vestae, rapinae atque victoriae, et sedare luxuriæ; hinc cives cuncta gladii intercapiet, et servitute debrit, viribus constrainitur, armis stirpium, &c. 2

2 In Apulia, qui semper novas evadentes, novarum rerum sedibus aguntur, nihil amplius aut insignis responsum, nihil amplius ad placitum. 3

3 Sic cuivis tuorum virtutum et adhaecianat, &c.

4 Cum crudelitate picturis Theutonicum confugit atrocissi, et inter hostes lapides, &c.

5 Ex parte, quam nobilissimarum civitatum fulgor illustratur, qua et tami res ignifiare meritu privilégio praebentur, nemunum regius sed barbarorum particissimum. 1

6 In his partes, qui nebulosam urbem furtus illustravit, sed hic curiosius descriptio, de placitis, &c. 2

7 Vide non suppeditat, et conatus tuus tam inopia civitatis, quam possessionum, laus victorius, laudis, &c.

8 At vero, quia difficile et christians in tanto turbine sublato regio timore, Saracenos non oppressi, si Saraceni injuryatur gratia,

9 Ex antiquis matrimonii, in universum mundi, vel manio, vel nuptiae munitiones occupaverint; ut hic cunmq Theutonicum annua virtute plantarum in serva immidiatam duas fabricaverint, motore fortunatus, &c. 1

10 Sed interpretari sunt Siculi inter harres de praepositiuas, et velint inter malumque incendio multum cum discrimine consumunt quod, haec opus ingeniosissima, &c. 2

11 In eum discernere possint. O staminem plebius, et creporum, cum etiam venitatibus, &c. 3

12 Sed si contra disertitudinem, si superit confessor, &c. 4

13 Et contra disertitudinem, si superit confessor, &c. 4

14 Nonnulli quis effredicis, ut Cusani, barbarae tan virtutis, bono consilio, tantum de detactis fortunas relateri contente, &c.

15 The Normans and Sicilians appear to be confounded.

Vol. II. - 2 P

and if it were true that Celestine the third had kicked away the imperial crown from the head of the prosaic Henry, such an act of impotent pride could serve only to cancel an obligation and provoke an enmity. The Genoese, who enjoyed a beneficial trade and establishment in Sicily, listened to the promise of the island, and in September: they despatched their fleet commanded the straits of Messina, and opened the harbour of Palermo; and the first act of his government was to abolish the privileges, and to seize the property of these, imprudent allies. The last hope of Falanconis was defeated by the discord of the island, and bloodshed again: these dragns of the capital; several thousand of the latter were slain; but their surviving brethren fortified the mountains, and disturbed about thirty years the peace of the island. By the policy of Frederick the second, sixty thousand Saracens were transported to Norma in Apulia. In their wars against the Roman church, the emperor and his son Mainz were strengthened and disgraced by the service of the enemies of Christ; and this national colony maintained their religion and manners in the heart of Italy, till they were extirpated, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, by the vengeance and revenge of the house of Anjou. All the calamities which the prophetic orator had deplored, were surpassed by the cruelty and avarice of the German conqueror. He violated the royal sequestrums, and explored the secret treasures of the palace, Palermo, and the whole kingdom: the priceless jewels, however precious, might be easily removed; but one hundred and sixty horses were laden with the gold and silver of Sicily. The young king, his mother and sisters, and the nobles of both sexes, were separately confined in the fortresses of the Alps; and, on the slightest rumour of rebellion, the captives were deprived of life, of their eyes, or of the hope of posterity. Constantia herself was touched with sympathy for the miseries of her country; and the hearess of the Norman line might struggle to check her despot's husband, and to save the patrimony of her new-born son, of an emperor so famous in the next age under the name of Frederic the second. Final extinction Ten years after this revolution, the of the Normans, French menaced annexed to their crown A.D. 1204. the duchy of Normandy; the secpree of her ancient and powerful rule had been transferred by Henry, and speedy daughter of William the Conqueror, to the house of Plantaganet; and the adventurous Normans, who had raised so many trophies in France, England, and Ireland, in Apulia, Sicily, and the east, were lost, either in victory or servitude, among the vanquished nations.

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF THE SICILIAN, THE TURKS.

The Turks of the house of Seljuk.—Their revolt against the Seljuk, conquest of Iconium.—Togar muballids Persia, and protects the caliph.—Defeat and captivity of the emperor Romanus Diogenes by Alp Arslan.—Power and magnificence of Malek Shah.—Conquest of Asia Minor and Syria.—State and oppression of Jerusalem.—Pilgrimage to the holy sepulchre.

From the isle of Sicily, the reader must The Turks transport himself beyond the Caspian sea, 2

1 The testimony of an Englishman, of Roger de Hoveden, (p. 689.) will highly weigh against the silence of German and Italian historians. (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. x. p. 156.) The priests and pilgrims who returned from Rome, exalted, by every tale, the omnipresence of the holy father.

2 Ex iconi in eo cum Textonicum insigni miseris. (Coffini, Annali, Genova, in the same year, tom. iv. p. 249.)

4 Montefeltro quotes a passage from Arnold of Lubeck, (t. i. c. 23.) Repertorium absconditum, et omnium lapidum pretiosorum 4.
to the original seat of the Turks or Turcomans, against whom the first crusade was principally directed. Their Scythian empire of the sixth century was long since dissolved; but the name was still famous among the Greeks and orientals; and the fragments of the nation, each a powerful and independent people, were scattered over the desert from China to the Black Sea, and from the colony of Hungarianians was admitted into the republic of Europe, and the thrones of Asia were occupied by slaves and soldiers of Turkish extraction. While Apulia and Sicily were subdued by the Norman lance, a swarm of these northern shepherds overspread the continent of Europe, and the race of Seljuk erected a splendid and solid empire from Samarcand to the confines of Greece and Egypt; and the Turks have maintained their dominion in Asia Minor, till the victorious crescent has been planted on the dome of St. Sophia.

Of the greatest of the Turkish princes was Mahmood or Mahomud, the Gaznevide, who reigned in the eastern provinces of Persia one thousand years after the birth of Christ. His father Sebecatig was the slave of the shah, and ascended the throne of Persia by a descent of fortune and blood. But in this descent of servitude, the first degree was merely titular, since it was filled by the sovereign of Transoxiana and Chorassan, who still paid a nominal allegiance to the caliph of Bagdad. The second rank was filled by those descendants of Samanides, who broke, by his revolt, the bonds of political slavery. But the third step was a state of real and domestic servitude in the family of that rebel, from which Sebecatig, by his courage and dexterity, and the sudden and unexpected command of the city and province of Ganza, the narrow and successor of his grateful master. The falling dynasty of the Samanides was at first protected, and at last overthrown, by their servants; and, in the public disorders, the fortune of Mahomud continued increased. For him the title of sultan was first invented; and his kingdom was enlarged from Transoxiana to the neighbourhood of Isphan, from the shores of the Caspian to the mouth of the Indus. But the principal source of his fame and riches was the holy war which he waged against the Gentiles of Hindostan. In his twelve expiditions into that country, he gained an almost unequaled and unparalleled success. And his victories were celebrated in the Tables of M. de Guignes, (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 155—173.) and our countryman, Colonel Alexander Dow, (vol. i. p. 23—53.) In the two first volumes of his History of Hindostan, he styles himself the translator of the Persian Farsamites; but in his third, it is not easy to distinguish the version and the original.

The dynasty of the Samanides continued 125 years, A. D. 871—999. During this time the description of the Tables of M. de Guignes, (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 406—494,) was followed by the Gaznevides, A. D. 999—1183, (see tom. i. p. 479—525,) and the Mongolians who followed them. The name of the dynasty still continues the name of the place.

Gaznevide horon non habet: est emperorum et demicilium merita Indica. Arabicois Geographis, Rerum, tab. xxiii. p. 303. Herbelot, p. 361. It has not been visited by any modern traveller. The name of the Caliph of Bagdad, who employed the Arabian or Chaldaic language, (see the preceding note,) is the same as the name of the name of a very ancient city, (Oxus) in the province of the Huns, and a name of various forms, (Asyrt, Soldavna,) is familiarly employed in the Greek and Latin languages. This name was taken from the Oxus, and appears in the names of many others of the same eastern and western countries. Dacca (Dacca, Divisi, oxus,ขา) is the name of a town in the province of Hindostan, and it is the name of a river. (Personal experience.) Of the name of the ancient and modern Hindostan, a great number of MSS. are preserved; but as the name is obscure, the person of the man who has preserved it in his memory, but not in his book, is the Sasanides of the sixth, but the Seljukides of the twelfth century. (De Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 246.)

for the formidable array of their elephants of war. The sultan of Gazne surpassed the limits of the conquests of Alexander: after a march of three months, over the hills of Cashmir and Thibet, he reached the famous city of Kinnog, on the Upper Ganges, and, in a naval combat on one of the branches of the Indus, defeated the power of Kithio. But the eastern princes, the Turks, of the Kachides, were incommensurable in numbers; the people, their lives and fortunes; but to the religion of Hindostan, the zealous mus-luman was cruel and inexorable; many hundred temples, or pagodas, were levelled with the ground; and a thousand idols were demolished; and the servants of the prophet were stimulated and rewarded by the precious materials of which they were composed. The pagoda of Sumnat was situate on the promontory of Guzarat, in the neighborhood of Diu, one of the last remaining possessions of the Portuguese. It was standing on a lofty point, but within twenty years was consumed by fire, and reduced to insignificant piles; two thousand Brahmins were consecrated to the service of the deity, whom they washed each morning and evening in water from the distant Ganges: the subordinate ministers consisted of three hundred mus-lumans professed conjurers, who could make their girls, conspicuous for their birth or beauty. Three sides of the temple were protected by the ocean, the narrow istmus was fortified by a natural or artificial precipice; and the city and adjacent country were peopled by a nation of fanatics. They confessed the sins and the punishment of Kinnog and Dehli; but if the impious stranger should presume to approach their holy precincts, he would surely be overwhelmed by a blast of the divine vengeance. By this challenge, the faith of Mahmud was animed to a personal trial of the strength of this Indian deity. Fifty thousand of his worshippers were pierced by the spear of the Moslems; the walls were scaled; the sanctuary was profaned; and the conqueror aimed a blow of his iron mace at the head of the idol. The trembling Brahmins are said to have offered ten millions sterling for his ransom; and it was urged by the wise counsellors, that the destruction of a stone image would not change the hearts of the Gentiles; and that such a sum might be dedicated to the relief of the true believers. You reasons," replied the sultan, are specious and strong; but I am resolved to be an idolater, and the Brahmins shall appear as a merchant of idols." He repeated his blows, and a treasure of pearls and rubies, concealed in the holy of the statue, explained in some degree the devout prodigality of the Brahmins. The fragments of the idol were distributed to Gazna, Mecca, and Medina. Bagdad listened to the edifying tale; and Mahmud was saluted by the caliph with the title of guardian of the fortune and faith of Mahomet.

From the paths of blood, and such is the history of nations, I cannot be induced to turn aside to gather sacred flowers of science or virtue. The name of Mahomud the Gaznevide is still venerable in the east; his subjects enjoyed the blessings of prosperity and peace; his vices were concealed by the veil of religion; and two familiar examples

1. Ferishta (sped Dow, Hist. of Hindostan, vol. i. p. 43,) mentions the report of a gus in the Indian army, But I am slow in believing the story, and still more in scrutinizing the first text, and then the authority of Ferishta, who lived in 15th century, though he certainly ivumed the name of the person (Kinnog, or Canneu, the old Palimbhoto,) is soaried in latitude 27° N. (By the old maps of the sixteenth century, and from the gazetteer, and the excellent Memoir on his Map of Hindostan, p. 35—43,) 300 priests, 20,000 shops for the area not 600,000 hands of the inhabitants, &c. (Oriental Geography, tab. xxv. p. 274, Dow, vol. i. p. 16) will allow an ample deduction. (Ferishta, now believed, not the believer; the same, I believe,) the Sasanides of the sixth, but the Seljukides of the twelfth century. (De Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 246.)

2. The idolaters of Europe, say Ferishta, (Dow, vol. i. p. 65,) "con- ferably Ambelisco, (p. 272,) and Romney's Map of Hindostan.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

will testify his justice and magnanimity. I. As he sat in the divan, an unhappy subject bowed before the throne to accuse the imprudence of the Cappadocian rebel, who had driven him from his house and bed. "Suspend your clamours," said Mamud, "inform me of your next visit, and yourself in person will judge and punish the offender." The sultan followed his guide, instruments of war, with his guards, and extinguishing the torches, pronounced the death of the imputee, who had been seized in the act of rapine and adultery. After the execution of his sentence, the lights were rekindled, Mamud fell prostrate in prayer, and rising from the ground, demanded some homely fare, which he had prepared for him. The spectral meal is a special delicacy in his residence, both for horses and for poor men, whose injury he had avenged, was unable to suppress his astonishment and curiosity; and the courteous monarch condescended to explain the motives of this singular behaviour. "I had reason to suspect that none except one of my sons could dare to perpetrate such an outrage; and I extinguished the lights, that my justice might be blind and inexorable. My prayer was a thanksgiving on the discovery of the offender; and so painful was my anxiety, that I had passed three days without food since the first moment of apprehension. This may be ascribed to the manner in which I declared war against the dynasty of the Bowides, the sovereigns of the western Persia: he was disarmed by an epistle of the sultana mother, and delayed his invasion till the manhood of her son. During the life of my husband," said the artful regent, "I was ever apprehensive of our ambition: he was a prince and a soldier worthy of your arms. He is now no more: his sceptre has passed to a woman and a child, and you dare not attack their infancy and weakness. How inglorious would be your conquest, how shameful your defeat! and yet the event of war is in the hand of the Almighty." Avracte was the only defect that tarnished the illustrious character of Mamud; and never has that passion been more richly satiated. The orientals exceed the measure of credibility in the account of millions of gold and silver, such as the avidity of man has never accumulated; in the magnitude of pearls, diamonds, and rubies, such as have never been produced by the workmanship of nature. Yet the soil of Hindostan is impregnated with precious minerals: her trade, in every age, has attracted the gold and silver of the world; and her virgin soils were originally embellished by the admixture of clay. His behaviour, in the last days of his life, evinces the vanity of these possessions, so laboriously won, so dangerously held, and so inevitably lost. He surveyed the vast and various chambers of the treasury of Gzana; bursified them: the magnificent buildings which sustained the state were for his use and that of his sons. His government, in the last days of his life, evinces the vanity of these possessions, so laboriously won, so dangerously held, and so inevitably lost. He surveyed the vast and various chambers of the treasury of Gzana; bursified them: the magnificent buildings which sustained the state were for his use and that of his sons.

Manners and emigration of the Turks in the regular operation of government and the Turkmen, A. D. 900—1000. The country is abandoned to the pastoral tribes of Arabs, Cordis, and Turkmen.1 Of the last-mentioned people, two considerable branches extend on either side of the Caspian, on the one hand, the eastern Turkmen, of forty thousand soldiers; the eastern, less obvious to the traveller, but more strong and populous, has increased to the number of one hundred thousand families. In the midst of civilized nations, they preserve the manners of the Syrian desert, remove their encampments with the change of seasons, and feed their cattle among the ruins of palaces and temples. Their flocks and herds are their only riches; their tents, either black or white, according to the colour of the banner, are covered with felt, and of a circular form: their winter emigration, which is in the regular season of their Christian year.2 In the decline of the caliphate, and the breaking up of the empire of its lieutenants, the barrier of the Jaxartes was often violated: in each invasion, after the victory or rout of their countrymen, some wandering tribe, embarking the Mahometan faith, obtained a free encampment in the spacious plains and pleasant climate of Transoxiana and Carizme. The Turkish slaves who aspired to the throne encouraged these emigrations, which recruited their armies, awoke their subjects and rivals, and protected the frontier against the wild natives of Turkestan; and this policy was abused by Mahmud the Guzzendie beyond the example of former times. He was admonished of his error by a chief of the race of Seluk, who dwelt in the territory of Bochara. The sultan had inquired what supply of men he could furnish for military service. "If you send," replied Ismael, "one of these arrows into our camp, fifty thousand of your servants will mount on horseback." And if that number," continued Mahmud, "should not be sufficient!" Send this second arrow to the horde of Balik, and you will find fifty thousand more." But," said the Guzende, disclosed by the sight of the Jaxartes, and the whole force of your kindred tribes!" Despatch my bow," was the last reply of Ismael, "and as it is circulated around, the summons will he obeyed by two hundred thousand horse. The apprehension of such a disgraceful event induced the Christian princes to the most obnoxious tribes into the heart of Chorasan, where they would be separated from their brethren by the river Oxus, and enclosed on all sides by the walls of obedient cities. But the face of the country was an object of temptation rather than terror; and the vigour of government was relaxed by the absence and death of the sultan of Gzana. The shepherds were converted into robbers; the bands of robbers were collected into an army of conquerors; as far as Isphahan and the Tigris, Persia was afflicted by their predatory inroads; and the Turkmen were not ashamed or afraid to measure their courage and numbers with the proudest sovereignties of Asia. Massoud, the son and successor of Mahmud, had too long neglected the advice of his wisest omars. "Your enemies," they repeatedly urged, "were in their origin a swarm of ants; they are

1 See a lost and natural picture of these pastoral manners in the history of William of Tyre, l. c. and in the works of the historians of Persia, e. g., Bell infringed, Justin, and his most of the language of the oriental nations, in the works of the historians of Persia.
2 A d'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 287. Yet these letters, accepted as the works of a prince and a scholar, are written in the language of the oriental nations, and are meant to have been read by them with those on the authority of others. D'Hherbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 287.
now little snakes; and, unless they be instantly crushed, they will acquire the venom and magnitude of serpents." After some alternatives of truce and hostility, after the repulse or partial success of his lieutenants, the emperor caused himself and the Turkman leader, who attacked him on all sides with barbarous shouts and irregular onset. "Massoud," says the Persian historian, "plunged singly to oppose the torrent of gleaming arms, exhibiting such acts of gigantic force and valour, that he never returned before displaying to the Turkish nation. The princes who had felt, or who feared, the Seljukian arrows, bow'd their heads in the dust; by the conquest of Aderbijan, or Median, he approached the Roman confines, and the shepherd presumed to despatch an ambassador, or herald, to demand the tribute and obedience of the emperor Constipontine. In his own dominions, Togrtl was the father of his soldiers and people; by a firm and equal administration Persia was relieved from the evils of anarchy; and the same hands which had been imbued in blood became the guardians of justice and the public peace. The more rustic, perhaps the wisest, portion of the Turkmans continued to dwell in the tents of their ancestors; and, from the Oxus to the Euphrates, these military colonies were protected and propagated by their native princes. But the Turks of the court and city were refined by business and softened by pleasure: they imitated the dress, language, and manners, of Persia; and the royal palaces of Nishapur and Rei displayed the order and magnificence of a great monarchy. The most deserving of the Arabians and Persians were promoted to the honours of the state; and the whole body of the Turkish nation embraced with favour and sincerity the religion of Mahomet. The northern swarms of barbarians, who overspread both Europe and Asia, have been irreconcilably separated by the consequences of a similar conflict. Among the Moslems, as among the christians, their vague and local traditions have yielded to the reason and authority of the prevailing system, to the fame of antiquity, and the consent of nations. But the triumph of the Komor is more pure and imperious, and unites the nation by any wish or complaint. The worship which might allure the pagans by some resemblance of idolatry. The first of the Seljukian sultans was conspicuous by his zeal and faith: each day he repeated the five prayers which are enjoined to the true believers; of each week the two first days were consecrated by an extraordinary fast; and in every city a mollah was completed, before Togrtl presumed to lay the foundations of a palace. With the belief of the Komor, the son he delivered the extraordinary character of Togrtl in his own declination and faith. But that A.D. 1035, sublime character was still disputed by the caliphs of Bagdad and Egypt, and each of the rivals was solicited to prove his title in the judgment of the strong, by the aid of illustrious sultans. Mahomed the Grim had declared himself in favour of the line of Abyb, and had treated with indignity the roble of honour which was presented by the Fatimite ambassador. Yet the ungrateful Hashemite had changed with the change of fortune; he appalled the victory of Zenon, and named the Seljukian sultan his temporal viceregent over the Moslem world. As Togrtl executed and enlarged this important trust, he was called to the deliverance of the caliph Cayem, and obeyed the holy summons, which gave a new kingdom to his arms. In the palace of Bagdad, he consorted of the faithful still slumbered, a venereal phantom.

Dow, Hist. of Hind-stan, vol. i. p. 95, 95–98. I have copied this passage as a specimen of the Persian manner; but I suspect, that by some odd fatality, the style of Fereisheh is improved by that of Ousian.

1 The Zendeilim of D'Herbeoil, (p. 1025) the Dindak of Dow, (vol. i. p. 87) is probably the Bandaneian of Abulbeda, Geograph. p. 145. Kildevil, a small town of Chostam, two days journey from Mani, was enriched through the east for the production and manufacture of cotton.

2 The Byzantine historians (Cedrenus, tom. ii. p. 766, 767, Zonaras, tom. i. p. 198) have enforced, this revolution, the truth of time and place, of name and persons, of cause and events. The ignorance and errors of these Greeks (which I shall not stop to unravel) may inspire some distrust of the story of Cyzaxres and Cyrus, as it is told by their most eloquent predecesor.

Wittinor, Tyr. 1. i. c. 7. p. 633. The divisio by arrows is an ancient mode in the east.

3 D'Herbeoil, p. 101. Yet after the fortune of his posterity, Seljuk became the forty-fifth in lineal descent from the great Afrashian, emperor of Persia in 597. The Tartar pedigree of the house of Zileia gave a different root to flattery and fabule; and the historian Mirbudh Derby in his Seljukides from Alkaxan, the reign of the mother, (p. 20, col. 3.) If they be the same as the Zalatefs of Abulhidhor, and the Seljukides of the Zaran, or the Zilxus, they are still more distant from the truth. The weighty evidence of a Tugrol prince himself, the description of his sire, Dindak, or Alcino, and Ozan Khan.

4 By a slight correction, Peroral Beg, the name of Tugrol's-pix of the Greeks. His reign and character are faithfully exhibited by D'Herbeoil, (p. 147, 147, 147) and de Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. ii. p. 198-201.)

Cedrenus, tomb. ii. p. 747, 750, Zonaras, tom. ii. p. 257. With their usual knowledge of oriental affairs, they describe the adversities of the Seljuniks, like the synthesis of the patriarch, was the vicar and successor of the caliph.

D'Herbeoil, p. 101. The Turks borrowed the distinction of Turks and Turkman, which is least in popular and convenient. The names are the same, and the application of one is the same import in the Persian and Teutonic idoms. Few critics will adopt the etymology of James de Vosy, (Hist. Hierosol. i. c. 11, p. 104.) of Turcomani, de Seljuk, or of Sinjar, or Abou Flea, or Azleno, or Oxan Khan.

5 By a slight correction, Peroral Beg, the name of Tugrol's-pix of the Greeks. His reign and character are faithfully exhibited by D'Herbeoil, (p. 147, 147, 147) and de Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. ii. p. 198-201.)

His servant or master, the prince of the Bowides, could no longer protect him from the inconstancy of monarchs, and the population of his capital, whose pride was suppressed by the revolt of the Turkish and Arabian emirs. The presence of a conqueror was implored as a blessing; and the transient mischiefs of fire and sword were excused as the sharp but salutary remedies which alone could restore the health of the republic. The successors of Saladin, in their turn, hastened from Damascus to Jerusalem, and the blood of one hundred thousand christians was a grateful sacrifice to the Arabian prophet. Yet the arms of Togrol did not make any deep or lasting impression on the Greek empire. The torrent rolled away from the open country; the sultan retired before the besiegers from the siege of an Armenian city; the obscure histories continued or suspended with a vieiicissitude of events; and the bravery of the Macedonian legions received the fame of the conqueror of Asia². The reign of Alp Arsalan, the valiant lion, is distinguished by his conquests in the East and West, the completion of the Turkish empire, and the title of a kingdom, and the spirit of the nation, were annihilated: the artificial fortifications were yielded by the mercenaries of Constantinople; by strangers without faith, veterans without pay or victors, and proved to be an empty delusion. The loss of this important frontier was the news of a day; and the cathedrals were neither surprised nor displeased, that a people so deeply infected with the Nestorian and Euyerbian errors, had been delivered by Christ and his mother into the hands of the infidels.

² The woods and valleys of mount Caucasus were more strenuously defended by the native Georgians or Iberians: but the Turkish sultan and his son Malek were indefatigable in this holy war; their captives were compelled to promise a spiritual, as well as a temporal, obedience, to Togrol; they were obliged to pay them a double renown over the east and west. After this inauguration, the sultan was prevented from prostrating himself a second time; but he twice kissed the hand of the commander of the faithful, and his titles were proclaimed by the voice of heralds and the applause of the Moslems. In a second visit to Bagdad, the Seljuks prince again rescued the caliph from his enemies; and devoutly, on foot, led the bridle of his mule from the prison to the palace. Their alliance was cemented by the marriage of Togrol's sister with the successor of the prophet. With the same imperious, obdurate spirit, he intrusted the head of the Seljuks to his harem; but Ceymou proudly refused his daughter to the sultan, disdained to mingle the blood of the Hashemites with the blood of a Sceyhnian shepherd; and prostrated the negociation months, till the gradual dissolution of his revveque abondished him and death, that he was still in the hands of a master.

A.D. 1068.

III.
The royal nuptials were followed by the death of Togrol himself; as he left no children, his nephew Alp Arsalan succeeded to the title and prerogatives of sultan; and his name, after that of the caliph, was pronounced in the public prayers of the Moslems. Yet in this revolution, the Abbassides acquired a larger measure of liberty and power. On the throne of Asia, the Turkish monarchs were less jealous of the domestic administration of Bagdad; and the commanders of the faithful were relieved from the miseries of Iraq by the presence and poverty of the Persian dynasty.

The Turks invaded the Roman empire, and won the respect and gratitude of the Saracens by the famous treaty of Nicaea, which, by the victories of Nichephorus, Zimisces, and Basil, had been extended as far as Antioch and the eastern boundaries of Armenia. Twenty-one years after the death of Togrol, his second son and successor was suddenly assaulted by an unknown race of barbarians, who united the Sceyhan valour with the fanaticism of new proselytes, and the art and riches of a powerful monarchy.³ The myriads of Turkish horse overspread a frontier of six hundred miles from Tauris to Bagdad, and the blood of one hundred thousand christians was a grateful sacrifice to the Arabian prophet. Yet the arms of Togrol did not make any deep or lasting impression on the Greek empire. The torrent rolled away from the open country; the sultan retired before the besiegers from the siege of an Armenian city; the obscure histories continued or suspended with a vicissitude of events; and the bravery of the Macedonian legions received the fame of the conqueror of Asia.³ The reign of Alp Arsalan, the valiant lion, is distinguished by his conquests in the East and West, the completion of the Turkish empire, and the title of a kingdom, and the spirit of the nation, were annihilated: the artificial fortifications were yielded by the mercenaries of Constantinople; by strangers without faith, veterans without pay or victors, and proved to be an empty delusion. The loss of this important frontier was the news of a day; and the cathedrals were neither surprised nor displeased, that a people so deeply infected with the Nestorian and Euyerbian errors, had been delivered by Christ and his mother into the hands of the infidels.

³ For these wars of the Turks and Romans, see in general the Byzantine histories of Zonaras and Cedrenus, Sicelitus the continuator of Cedrenus, and Nichephorus Bryennus Caesar. The two first of these were monks, the latter a luter statement: yet such were the Greeks, that the difference of style and character is scarcely discernible.

4 For the order of these events, I must refer the reader to the History of Guignes. The texts of the Saracens would yield the same facts (see note 5), but the history of the first Seljuks and the accuracy of Guignes.

5 History of the Romans, tom. ii. 1. 600. The dates of the Saracens and of the Seljuks are uncertain. The Saracens, ad callem Cedrenus, tom. ii. 383, whose ambiguous conception shall not be pursued, are identified by Struttler, Memoria Byzant. tom. ii. 600, with the Seljuks of Griendel and Monophyseite heresies. He familiarly talks of the sword, of the cross, of the knowledge of the Roman, and of the power of the Saracens; which might appear to be a little before the death of Alp Arsalan in 1072. It would appear, however, that his bigotry is forced to confess, that they were soon afterwards discharged on the orthodox Romans.

6 For this curious ceremony, I am indebted to M. De Guignes, (tom. ii. p. 190) and to La Roque, (Hist. de Byzance, p. 365. It is the object of his work, country, and character.

7 Eudoxia anna (A. D. 153) obit prinsessa Togrolhacbas.... yet fait d'is a meer qu'il excellait, covered error cords metalism invasion, ut ubi abetit et ego adfugit ut ipsam sub refrain. Elisa (Hist. Saracen. p. 312, vers. Euphras.)

8 For these wars of the Turks and Romans, see in general the Byzantine histories of Zonaras and Cedrenus, Sicelitus the continuator of Cedrenus, and Nichephorus Bryennus Caesar. The two first of these were monks, the latter a luter statement: yet such were the Greeks, that the difference of style and character is scarcely discernible. For the order of these events, I must refer the reader to the History of Guignes. The texts of the Saracens would yield the same facts (see note 5), but the history of the first Seljuks and the accuracy of Guignes.

9 History of the Romans, tom. ii. 1. 600. The dates of the Saracens and of the Seljuks are uncertain. The Saracens, ad callem Cedrenus, tom. ii. 383, whose ambiguous conception shall not be pursued, are identified by Struttler, Memoria Byzant. tom. ii. 600, with the Seljuks of Griendel and Monophyseite heresies. He familiarly talks of the sword, of the cross, of the knowledge of the Roman, and of the power of the Saracens; which might appear to be a little before the death of Alp Arsalan in 1072. It would appear, however, that his bigotry is forced to confess, that they were soon afterwards discharged on the orthodox Romans.

10 For this curious ceremony, I am indebted to M. De Guignes, (tom. ii. p. 190) and to La Roque, (Hist. de Byzance, p. 365. It is the object of his work, country, and character.

11 Eudoxia anna (A. D. 153) obit prinsessa Togrolhacbas.... yet fait d'is a meer qu'il excellait, covered error cords metalism invasion, ut ubi abetit et ego adfugit ut ipsam sub refrain. Elisa (Hist. Saracen. p. 312, vers. Euphras.)

12 For these wars of the Turks and Romans, see in general the Byzantine histories of Zonaras and Cedrenus, Sicelitus the continuator of Cedrenus, and Nichephorus Bryennus Caesar. The two first of these were monks, the latter a luter statement: yet such were the Greeks, that the difference of style and character is scarcely discernible. For the order of these events, I must refer the reader to the History of Guignes. The texts of the Saracens would yield the same facts (see note 5), but the history of the first Seljuks and the accuracy of Guignes.
and dismayed the superior numbers of the Greeks; and in the defeat of Basiliscus, one of their principal generals, he disarmed them of all hope and clemency. The imprudence of the emperor had separated his forces after the reduction of Malazkurd. It was in vain that he attempted to recall the mercenary Franks: they refused to obey his summons; he could not prevail to wait their return; the desertion of the Uzi filled his mind with anxiety and suspicion; and against the most salutary advice he rushed forwards to speedy and decisive action. Had he listened to the fair proposals of the sultan, Romanus might have secured a retreat, perhaps a peace; but in these over-traits he succumbed to the wishes of his vanquished enemy, and his answer was conceived in the tone of insult and defiance. "If the barbarian wishes for peace, let him evacuate the ground which he occupies for the encampment of the Romans, and surrender his city and palace of Rej as a pledge of his sincerity." Alp Arslan smiled at the vanities of the demand, but kept the death of so many faithful Moslems; and, after a devout prayer, proclaimed a free permission to all who were desirous of retiring from the field. With his own hands he tied up his horse's tail, exchanged the sword of bis of his two sons for a long sword, and dressed himself in a white garment, perfumed his body with musk, and declared that if he were vanquished, that spot should be the place of his burial. The sultan himself had affected to cast away his missile weapons; but his hopes of victory were placed in the arrows of the Turkish cavalry, whose squadrons were distributed in the form of a crescent. Instead of the successive lines and reserves of the Grecian tactics, Romanus led his army in a single and solid phalanx, and pressed with vigour and impatience the artilled and disciplined phalanx of the barbarians. His desultory and fruitless combat he wasted the greater part of a summer's day, till prudence and fatigue compelled him to return to his camp. But a retreat is always perilous in the face of an active foe; and no sooner had the standard been turned to the rear than the phalanx was broken by the base cowardice, or the barbarian jealousy, of Andronicus, a rival prince, who disgraced his birth and the purple of the Caesars. The Turkish squadrons poured a cloud of arrows on this moment of confusion and lassitude; and the horns of their military and musical fame were on the point of being reaped. In the destruction of the army and pillage of the camp, it would be needless to mention the number of the slain or captives. The Byzantine writers deplore the loss of an inestimable pearl; they forget to mention, that in this fatal day the Asiatic provinces of Rome were irreparably sacrificed.

As long as a hope survived, Romanus Capitvity and attempted to rally and save the relics of deliverance of the emperor his army. When the centre, the imperial station, was left unguarded on all sides, and encompassed by the victorious Turks, he still, with desperate courage, maintained the fight till the close of the day, at the head of the brave and faithful subjects who adhered to his standard. They fell around him; his horse was slain; the emperor was wounded; yet he stood alone and intrepid, till he was oppressed and bowed by the strength of multitudes. The glory of this illustrious prize was disputed by a slave and a soldier; a slave who had seen him on the throne of Constantiopole, and a soldier whose extreme deformity had been excused on the promise of some signal service. De- 102.) to 12,000 horse. But the same Elmiue gives 500,000 men to the whole army of the Greeks. (D'Herbelot, supra p. 1046.) spoil of his arms, his jewels, and his purple, Romanus spent a dreary and perilous night on the field of battle, amidst a disorderly crowd of the meaner barbarians. In the morning the royal captive was presented to Alp Arslan, who doubted of his fortune, till he had read his reverent report of his ambassadors, and by the more pathetic evidence of Basiliscus, who embraced with tears the feet of his unhappy sovereign. The successor of Constantine, in a piteous state, was led into the Turkish divan, and commanded to kiss the ground before a lofty throne. Alp Arslan, starting from his throne, is said to have plucked his foot on the heel of the Roman emperor. But the fact is doubtful; and if, in this moment of insolence, the sultan complied with a national custom, the rest of his conduct has extorted the praise of his magnanimity, and generosity, and sand to "Keign Pr and say!"

"Pomp was conducted to a distant part, where he was served with pomp and reverence by the officers of the sultan, who, twice each day, seated him in the place of honour at his own table. In a free and familiar conversation of eight hours, Alp Arslan, who knew them as subordinates from the conqueror; but he severely censured the unworthy subjects who had deserted their valiant prince in the hour of danger, and gently admonished his antagonist of some errors which he had committed in the management of the war. In the preliminaries of negotiations, Alp Arslan asked him what treatment he expected to receive, and the calm indifference of the emperor displayed the freedom of his mind. "If you are cruel," he said, "you will take my life; if you listen to pride, you will drag me at your chariot wheels; if you consult your interest, you will accept a ransom, and restore me to my country." And when continued the sultan, "would have been your own behaviour, had fortune smiled on your arms!"

The reply of the Greek betrays a sentiment, which prudence, and even gratitude, should have taught him to suppress; but he was either so deceived as to believe that he would have inflicted on thy body a stripe," The Turkish conqueror smiled at the insolence of his captive; observed that the Christian law inculcated the love of enemies and forgiveness of injuries; and nobly declared that he would not imitate an example which he considered as a mark of weakness. He had dictated the terms of liberty and peace, a ransom of a million, an annual tribute of three hundred and sixty thousand pieces of gold, the marriage of the royal children, and the deliverance of all the Moslems who were in the power of the Greeks. Romanus, with a sigh, subscribed this treaty, so disgraceful to the majesty of the empire; he was immediately invested with a Turkish robe of honour; his nobles and patricians were restored to their sovereignty; and the sultan, after a courteous embrace, dismissed him with rich presents and a parting word. No sooner did he reach the confines of the empire, than it was informed that the palace and provinces had disclaimed their allegiance to a captive: a sum of two million pieces was painfully collected; and the fallen monarch transmitted this part of his ransom, with a sorrowful expression and disconsolate mien, the generosity, or perhaps the ambition, of the sultan, prepared to espouse the cause of his ally; but his designs were prevented by the defeat, imprisonment, and death, of Romanus Digenes."

In the treaty of peace, it does not appear that Alp Arslan extended any province or city from the captive emperor; the Greeks were told his reverence would obtain the trophies of his victory, and the spoils of Anatolia, from Antioch to the Black sea. The fairest part of Asia was subject to his laws; twelve hundred princes, or the sons of princes, stood before his throne; and two hundred thousand soldiers marched under his banners. The sultan disdained to provoke a scruple in him, that he should be fastened to four stakes, and left to expire in that painful situation. At this command, the desperate Carizmian, drawing a dagger, rushed headlong towards the throne: the guards raised their battle-axes; their zeal was checked by their masterful arch; Alp Arslan, who had caused his bow, but his foot slipped, the arrow glanced aside, and he received in his breast the dagger of Joseph, who was instantly cut in pieces. The wound was mortal; and the Turkish prince bequathed a dying adoration to the pride of kings. "In your youth," said Alp Arslan, "I was advised by a sage to humble myself before God; to distrust my own strength; and never to despise the most contemptible foe. I have neglected these lessons; and my neglect has been deservedly punished. Yesterday, as from an eminence I beheld the numbers, the discipline, and the splendour of my troops, the earth seemed tremulous under my feet; and I said in my heart, surely thou art the king of the world, the greatest and most invincible of warriors. These armies are no longer mine; and, in the confidence of my personal strength, I now fall by the hand of him who is my master." Alp Arslan, with the virtues of a Turk and a muslime, his voice and stature commanded the reverence of mankind; his face was shaded with long whiskers; and his ample turban was fashioned in the shape of a crown. The remains of the sultan were deposited in the tomb of the Seljuk princes, and his name was invested with the character of a hero. The public interest dictated this useful inscription: "O ye who have seen the glory of Alp Arslan exalted to the heavens, repair to Marc, and you will behold it buried in the dust." The inscription of the hill, and the tomb itself, more forcibly proclaim the instability of human greatness.

During the life of Alp Arslan, his reign and predecessors had been acknowledged as the period of Malek the future sultan of the Turks. On his father's death, the inheritance was disputed by an uncle, a cousin, and a brother: they drew their securiats, and assembled their followers; and

This interesting death is told by D'Herbelot, (p. 103, 104.) and M. de Guignes, tom. iii. p. 212, 213.) from their oriental writers: but the history of the Huns is taken from Zonaras, with few exceptions. Zonaras, p. 343, 345.)

A crime of high renown, (the late Dr. Johnson,) who has severely scrutinized the epitaphs of Pope, might cavil in this sublime inscription at the words "repair to Marc," since the reader must already be at Marc before he could perceive the inscription.

Chap. XVIII.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

319
The triple victory of Malek Shah established his own reputation and the right of primogeniture in every age, and more especially in Asia, the thirst of power has inspired the same passions, and occasioned the same disorders; but from the long series of civil war, it would not be easy to extract a sentiment more pure and unalloyed than that which the saying of the Turkish prince. On the eve of the battle, he performed his devotions at Thous, before the tomb of the Imam Riza. As the sultan rose from the ground, he asked his vizir Nizam, who had knelt beside him, whether he entertained any secret petition. "The honor of your arms may be enlarged," replied the vizir, "but the prudent and, most probably, the sincere answer of the minister. "For my part," replied the generous Malek, "I implored the Lord of hosts, that he would take from me my life and crown, if my brother be more worthy than myself to reign over the Moslem." The favourable judgment of heaven was ratified by the caliph; and for the first time, the sacred title of commander of the faithful was communicated to a barbarian. But this barbarian, by his personal merit, and the extent of his empire, was the greatest prince of his own age. After he had subdued the lost provinces of Asia and his rival, he marched at the head of innumerable armies to achieve the conquest of Turkestan, which had been undertaken by his father. In his passage of the Oxus, the boatmen, who had been employed in transporting some of his troops, complained that the imperial revenue was assessed on the revenues of Antioch. The sultan frowned at this preposterous choice; but he smiled at the artful flattery of his vizir. "It was not to postpone their reward, that I selected those remote places, but to pay a memorial to posterity, that, under your reign, Antioch and the Oxus were subject to the same sovereign." But this description of his limits was unjust and parsimonious; beyond the Oxus, he reduced to his obedience the cities of Behar, Casmez, and Samarcand, and crushed each rebellious slave, or independent savage, who dared to resist. Malek passed the Sihon or Jazartes, the last boundary of Persian civilization; the borders of Turkestan yielded to his supremacy: his name was inscribed on the coins, and in the prayers of Cashgar, a Tartar kingdom on the extreme borders of China. From the Chinese frontier, the annexation of Turkestan, which bordered the two empires, and the two subject to the sultan, was necessary to the grandeur of his empire, and to the stability of the sovereignty. The feeble successor of Mahomet obtained a respite of ten days; and before the expiration of the term, the barbarian was summoned by the angel of death. His ambassadors at Constantinople had asked in mar- velous language a renewal of the friendly treaty, which, after a period of eighty years, was renewed; and the daughter of Alexius, who might herself have been the victim, expresses her abhorrence of this unnatural conjunction. The daughter of the sultan was bestowed on the caliph Mustad, with the condition, that, renouncing the society of his wives and concubines, he should for ever confine himself to this honourable alliance. The greatness and union of the Turkish empire expired in the person of Malek Shah. His vacant throne was disposed of by the House of Malek Shah, and the princes of the House of Malek Shah have reigned ever since. In the year 542—543 (1147—1148), and the sultan bestowed a more serious and learned care on the reformation of the calendar, which was effected by Rifaie, vizir and generalissimo. The vizir explained a law of the prophet, the Moslem is confined to the irregular course of the lunar months; in Persia, since the age of Zoroaster, the revolution of the sun has been known and celebrated as an annual festival. 24 An ample share of their wisdom and virtue is due to a Persian vizir, who ruled the empire under the reigns of Alp Arsalan and his son. Nizam, one of the most illustrious ministers of the east, was honoured by the sultan, who was at the same time the greatest merit was trusted by the sultan as the faithful viceroy of his power and justice. After an administration of thirty years, the fame of the vizir, his wealth, and even his services, were transformed into crimes. He was overthrown by the insidious arts of a woman and a rival; and his fall was hastened by a rash declaration, that his cap and cloak, the badges of his office, were connected with the divine decree with the throne and diadem of the sultan. At the age of ninety-three years, the venerable statesman was dismissed by his master, accused by his enemies, and murdered by a fanatic; the last words of Nizam attested his innocence, and the remainder of Malek Shah's life was short and inglorious. From Isphahan, the scene of this disgraceful transaction, the sultan moved to Bagdad, with the design of transplanting the caliph, and of fixing his personal residence in the holy city. His most illustrious vizir, the learned D. Hamet, was the chief minister of the government; and his friend and successor, the learned Dr. Hamet, whose reign was of thirty-two years, obtained as the payment of a debt, an annuity of one million of crowns. The division of the sultanate was the revenue of the house of Malek Shah.

The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Vol. XVIII. 320.
OPUTED by his brother and his four sons; and, after a series of civil wars, the treaty which reconciled the surviving candidates confirmed a lasting separation in the Persian dynasty, the eldest and principal branch of the house of Seljuk. The three younger dynasties were those of Kerman, of Syria, and of Roum: the first of which, and their whole descendants, were the descendants of the House of Hisar; the second expelled the Arabian princes of Aleppo and Damascus; and the third, our peculiar care, invaded the Roman provinces of Asia Minor. The generous policy of Malek contributed to their elevation; he signed his own name for ever on their escutcheon; he had vanquished in the field, to seek new kingdoms worthy of their ambition; nor was he displeased that they should draw away the more ardent spirits, who might have disturbed the tranquillity of his reign. As the supreme head of his family and nation, the great vassal of Persia commanded the obedience and tribute of his royal brethren: the thrones of Kerman and Nire, of Aleppo and Damascus; the Atabeks, and emirs of Syria and Mesopotamia, erected their standards under the shadow of his sceptre; and the hordes of Turkmans overspread the plains of the western Asia. After the death of Malek, the hands of union and subordination were relaxed and finally dissolved; the indulgence of the house of Seljuk invested their slaves with the inheritance of kingdoms; and, in the oriental style, a crowd of princes arose from the dust of his feet.

Conquest of Asia Minor by the Turks.

A prince of the royal line, Cutulmish, the son of Izrail, the son of Seljuk, had fallen in a battle against Alp Arslan; and the humane victor had dropped a tear over his grave. His five sons, strong in arms, ambitious to the crown alone, defended their symmetric against the son of Alp Arslan. The two armies expected the signal, when the caliph, forgetful of the majesty which secluded him from vulgar eyes, interposed his venerable mediation. "Instead of shedding the blood of your brethren, your brethren both in descent and faith, unite your forces in a holy war against the Greeks, the enemies of God and his apostle." They listened to his voice; the sultan embraced his rebellious kinsmen; and the eldest, the valiant Soliman, accepted the royal standard, which gave him the free conquest and hereditary command of all the provinces of Asia Minor, from Arzemon to Constantiople, and the unknown regions of the west. Accompanied by his four brothers, he passed the Euphrates; the Turkish camp was soon seated in the neighbourhood of Kutaich in Phrygia; and his Syrian troops were induced to waste the country as far as the Hellespont and the Black sea. Since the decline of the empire, the peninsula of Asia Minor had been exposed to the transient, though destructive, inroads of the Persians and Saracens; but the fruits of a lasting conquest were reserved for the Turkish sultan; and his arms were introduced by the Greeks, who aspired to reign on the ruins of their country. Since the captivity of Romanus, six years the feble son of Eudo-cia had trembled under the weight of the imperial crown, till the provinces of the east and west were lost in the same month by a double rebellion; of either chief Nicophonius was the common name; but the surnames of Brynnus and Botoniates distinguish the European and Asiatic candidates. Their reasons, or that of the favor they received from the divan; and, after some hesitation, Soliman declared himself in favor of Botoniates, opened a free passage to his troops in their march from Antioch to Nice, and joined the banner of the crescent to that of the cross. After his ally had ascended the throne of Constantiople, he attended the motions of the Turkish camp; and the desponding cities were tempted by the summons of a Roman prince, who immediately surrendered them into the hands of the barbarians. These acquisitions were confirmed by a treaty of peace with the emperor Alexius: his fear of Robert compelled him to seek the friendship of Soliman; and it was not till after the sultan's death that he extended as far as Nicomedia, about sixty miles from Constantiople, the eastern boundary of the Roman world. Trebizond could not be left on either side by the sea and mountains, preserved at the extremity of the Euxine, the ancient character of a Greek colony, and the future destiny of a christian empire.

Since the first conquests of the caliphs, the establishment of the Turks in Anatolia or Asia Minor was the most deplorable loss which the church and empire had sustained. By the propagation of the Moslem faith, Soliman deserv- ed the name of Gazi, a holy champion; and his new kingdom, of the Romans, or of Roum, was added to the tables of empire geography. It is described as extending from the Euphrates to Constantiople, from the Black sea to the confines of Syria; pregnant with mines of silver and iron, of alum and copper, fruitful in corn and wine, and productive of cattle and excellent horses. The wealth of Lydia, the arts of the Greeks, the fertility of the Scythian conquerors. Yet, in the present decay, Anatolia still contains some wealthy and populous cities; and, under the Byzantine empire, they were far more flourishing in numbers, size, and opulence. By the choice of the sultan, Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, was preferred for his palace and fortress; the seat of the Seljukian dynasty of Roum was planted one hundred miles from Constantiople; and the divinity of Christ was denied and despoiled in the same temple in which it had been pronounced by the first general synod of the catholics. The unity of God, and the mission of Mahomet, were preached in the mosques; the Arabian learning was taught in the schools; the cadis judged according to the law of the Koran; the Turkish manners and language prevailed; and the ancient cities were scattered over the plains and mountains of Anatolia. On the hard conditions of tribute and servitude, the Greek christians might enjoy the exercise of their religion; but their most holy churches were pro-

6 Such is the description of Roum by Histoire the Armeuniens, whose Tartar history may be found in the collections of Rambous and Berce (See Abbeau's Geograph. climat. viii. p. 281-302.)
faned; their priests and bishops were insulted; 6 they were compelled to suffer the triumph of the pagans, and the apostolic traditions of the Church were marked by the knife of circumcision; and many thousands captive were devoted to the service or the pleasures of their masters. 7 After the loss of Asia, Antioch still maintained her primitive allegiance to Christ and Caesar; but the solitary province of Europe was now no longer a power surrounded on all sides by the Mahometan powers. The despoilers of Philarethus the governor prepared the sacrifice of his religion and loyalty, had not his guilt been prevented by his son, who hastened to the Niene palace, and offered to deliver this valuable province to the influence of the church. The panicky multitude, having mounted on horseback, and in twelve nights (for he reposed in the day) performed a march of six hundred miles. Antioch was oppressed by the speed and secrecy of his enterprise; and the dependent cities, as far as Laodicea and the confines of Aleppo, obeyed the example of the metropolis. From Laodicea to the Thracian Bosporus, or arm of St. George, the conquest and reign of Soliman extended thirty days' journey in length, and in breadth about ten or fifteen, between the rocks of Lyelia and the Black sea. 8 The Turkish ignorance of the Christian religion, the danger to the safety of the emperor; but so soon had a fleet of two hundred ships been constructed by the hands of the captive Greeks, that Alexius trembled behind the walls of his capital. His plains epistles were dispatched to excite the compassion of the Latins, and to paint the danger, the weakness, and the riches, of the city of Constantine. 9

But the most interesting conquest of the Seljuk Turks, was that of Jerusalem, 10 which soon became the theatre of the most extraordinary actions. In the first year of the reign of that monarch, the inhabitants had stipulated the assurance of their religion and property; but the articles were interpreted by a master, against whom it was dangerous to dispute; and in the four hundred years of the reign of the caliph, the political opposition of Jerusalem was exposed to the vicissitudes of storm and sunshine. 11 By the increase of proselytes and population, the Mahometans might: excuse their usurpation of three-fourths of the city: but a peculiar quarter was reserved for the patriarch with his clergy and people; a tract of land, called the golden gates of paradise; and the sepulchre of Christ, with the church of the resurrection, was still left in the hands of his votaries. Of these votaries, the most numerous and respectable portion were strangers to Jerusalem; the pilgrims to the Holy Land, had been stimulated rather than suppressed, by the conquest of the Arabs; and the enthusiasm which had always prompted these perilous journeys, was nourished by the congenial passions of grief and indignation. A crowd of pilgrims from every nation and every tongue, visited the adjacent sanctuaries, more especially at the festival of Easter: and the Greeks and Latins, the Nesterians and Jacobites, the Coptics and Abyssinians, the Armenians and Georgians, maintained the chapels, the clergy, and the poor of their respective communities, with the aid of the inhabitants of many various tongues, the worship of so many nations in the common temple of their religion, might have afforded a spectacle of edification and peace; but the zeal of the christian sects was imbittered by hatred and revenge; and in the kingdom of a suffering Messiah, who had pardoned his enemies, they aspired to command and persecute their spiritual brethren. The pre-eminence was asserted by the spirit and numbers of the Franks; and the greatness of Charlemagne 12 protected both the Latin pilgrims, and the catholics of the east. The poverty of Curthage, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, and the increase of the influence of the empire; and many monasteries of Palestine were founded or restored by his liberal devotion. Harun Alrashid, the greatest of the Abbasides, esteemed in his christian brother a similar supremacy of genius and power: their friendship was cemented by the intercourse of gifts and embassies; and the caliph, without resigning the substantial dominion, presented the emperor with the keys of the holy sepulchre, and perhaps of the city of Jerusalem. In the decline of the Carolingian monarchy, the republic of Amalfi prepared to avenge the outrage of the Franks. Her vessels transported the Latin pilgrims to the coasts of Egypt and Palestine, and desired, by their useful imports, the favour and alliance of the Fatimite caliphs 13; an annual fair was instituted on mount Cury; and the Italian merchants founded the convent and hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, the cradle of the monastic and military order, which has since reigned in the isles of Rhodes and of Malta. Had the christian pilgrims been content to revere the tomb of a prophet, the disciples of Mahomet, instead of blan-}

---

522 THE DECLINE AND FALL Chap. XVIII.

1. State and pilgrimage of Jerusalem.

2. But the most interesting conquest of the Seljuk Turks, was that of Jerusalem, which soon became the theatre of the most extraordinary actions. In the first year of the reign of that monarch, the inhabitants had stipulated the assurance of their religion and property; but the articles were interpreted by a master, against whom it was dangerous to dispute; and in the four hundred years of the reign of the caliph, the political opposition of Jerusalem was exposed to the vicissitudes of storm and sunshine. By the increase of proselytes and population, the Mahometans might excuse their usurpation of three-fourths of the city; but a peculiar quarter was reserved for the patriarch with his clergy and people; a tract of land, called the golden gates of paradise; and the sepulchre of Christ, with the church of the resurrection, was still left in the hands of his votaries. Of these votaries, the most numerous and respectable portion were strangers to Jerusalem; the pilgrims to the Holy Land, had been stimulated rather than suppressed, by the conquest of the Arabs; and the enthusiasm which had always prompted these perilous journeys, was nourished by the congenial passions of grief and indignation. A crowd of pilgrims from every nation and every tongue, visited the adjacent sanctuaries, more especially at the festival of Easter: and the Greeks and Latins, the Nesterians and Jacobites, the Coptics and Abyssinians, the Armenians and Georgians, maintained the chapels, the clergy, and the poor of their respective communities, with the aid of the inhabitants of many various tongues, the worship of so many nations in the common temple of their religion, might have afforded a spectacle of edification and peace; but the zeal of the christian sects was imbittered by hatred and revenge; and in the kingdom of a suffering Messiah, who had pardoned his enemies, they aspired to command and persecute their spiritual brethren. The pre-eminence was asserted by the spirit and numbers of the Franks; and the greatness of Charlemagne protected both the Latin pilgrims, and the catholics of the east. The poverty of Curthage, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, and the increase of the influence of the emperor; and many monasteries of Palestine were founded or restored by his liberal devotion. Harun Alrashid, the greatest of the Abbasides, esteemed in his christian brother a similar supremacy of genius and power: their friendship was cemented by the intercourse of gifts and embassies; and the caliph, without resigning the substantial dominion, presented the emperor with the keys of the holy sepulchre, and perhaps of the city of Jerusalem. In the decline of the Carolingian monarchy, the republic of Amalfi prepared to avenge the outrage of the Franks. Her vessels transported the Latin pilgrims to the coasts of Egypt and Palestine, and desired, by their useful imports, the favour and alliance of the Fatimite caliphs; an annual fair was instituted on mount Cury; and the Italian merchants founded the convent and hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, the cradle of the monastic and military order, which has since reigned in the isles of Rhodes and of Malta. Had the christian pilgrims been content to revere the tomb of a prophet, the disciples of Mahomet, instead of blanwho impose on the credulous spectators for their own benefit, and that of their tyrants. In every age, a principle of toleration has been fortified by a sense of interest; and the revenue of the prince and his emir was increased each year, by the expense and tribute of so many thousand strangers.

Under the Fatimite caliph, the sceptre from the Abbassides to the Fatimites was a benefit, rather than an injury, to the Holy Land. A sovereign resident in Egypt, was more sensible of the importance of christian trade; and the emirs of Palestine were less remiss in the justice and public charity among Christians; the third of these Fatimite caliphs was the famous Hakem, a frantic youth, who was delivered by his impiety and despotism from the fear either of God or man; and whose reign was a wild mixture of vice and folly. Regardless of the most ancient customs of Egypt, he imposed on his women an absolute confinement; the restraint excited the clamours of both sexes; their clamours provoked his fury; a part of Old Cairo was delivered to the flames; and the guards and citizens were engaged many days in a bloody conflict. At first the caliph declared himself a zealous mungador; and a general interdict was laid on the devotions and colleges: twelve hundred and ninety copies of the Koran were transcribed at his expense in letters of gold; and his edict extirpated the vineyards of the Upper Egypt. But his vanity was soon flattered by the hope of introducing a new religion; he aspired above the favours of God. His jealousy of the Christians, and mixture of the most high God, who, after nine apparitions on earth, was at length manifest in his royal person. At the name of Hakem, the lord of the living and the dead, every knee was bent in religious adoration; his majesty was respected by the Christians, and colleges: twelve thousand converts had signed his profession of faith; and at the present hour, a few and warlike people, the Druses of mount Libanans, are persuaded of the law and divinity of a madman and tyrant.

In his divine character, Hakem hated the Jews and christians, as he imposed on his rivals; while some remains of prejudice or prudence still pleaded in favour of the law of Mahomet. Both in Egypt and Palestine, his cruel and wanton persecution made some martyrs and many apostates; the common rights and special privileges of the sectaries were equally disregarded, and the tranquillity of strangers and natives. The temple of the christian world, the church of the resurrection, was demolished to its foundations; the luminous prodel of Easter was interrupted, and much profane labour was exhausted to destroy the cave in the rock which properly constitutes the holy sepulchre. At the report of this sacrilege, the nations of Europe were astonished and afflicted: but instead of arming in the defence of the Holy Land, they contented themselves with burning or hating the Jews, as the secret advisers of the impious barbarian. Yet the calamities of Jerusalem were in some measure alleviated by the inconstancy or repentance of Hakem himself; and the royal man date was sealed for the restitution of the churches, when the tyrant was assassinated by the emissaries of his sister. The succeeding caliphs resumed the maxims of religion and policy; a free toleration was again granted; with the pious aid of the emperor of Constantiople, the holy sepulchre arose from its ruins; the Turks, who had conducted his itinerant brethren; and from Belgrade to Antioch, they traversed fifteen hundred miles of a christian empire. Among the Franks, the zeal of pilgrimage prevailed beyond the example of former times; and the roads were covered with multitudes of either sex, and of every rank, who professed their contempt of life, so soon as they should have kissed the tomb of their Redeemer. Princes and prelates abandoned the care of their dominions; and the numbers of these pious caravans were a prelude to the armies which marched in the beginning of the fourteenth century. About thirty years before the first crusade, the archbishop of Mentz, with the bishops of Utrecht, Bamberg, and Ratishon, undertook this laborious journey from the Rhine to the Jordan; and the multitude of their followers amounted to seven thousand persons. At Constantinople, the Turk was engaged by the emperor; but the ostentation of their wealth provoked the assault of the wild Arabs; they drew their swords with scrupulous reluctance, and sustained a siege in the village of Capernam, till they were driven by the pressure of the Turk to make a retreat. After visiting the holy places, they embarked for Italy, but only a remnant of two thousand arrived in safety in their native land. Ingulphus, a secretary of William the Conqueror, was a companion of this pilgrimage: he observes that they sallied from Normandy, thirty stout and well-appointed horsemen; but that they repassed the Alps, twenty miserable palmers, with the staff in their hand, and the iteat at their back.

After the defeat of the Romans, the Conquest of the Fatimite caliphs was to be invaded by the Turks. One of the tenants of Malek Shah, Atiz, the Carizman, marched into Syria at the head of a powerful army, and reduced Damascus by famine and the sword. Huns, and the other cities of the province, acknowledged the caliph of Bagdad and the sultan of Persia; and the victorious emir advanced without resistance to the banks of the Nile: the Fatimite was preparing to fly into the heart of Africa: but the negroes of his guard and the inhabitants of Cairo made a desperate sally, and repulsed the Turk from the confines of Egypt. In his retreat, he indulged the licence of slaughter and rapine; the judge and notaries of Jerusalem were invited to his camp, and their execution was followed by the massacre of three thousand citizens. The cruelty or the defeat of Atiz was soon punished by the sultan Tuncish, the brother of Malek Shah.

2 Por idem tempus ex universo orbis tam immunissimus multitudine conslitutus ad seipsum celebratus sola sancta Hierosolyma, quantum praestitit, ubi Solomons tabernaculum erat aperitum. "St. Stephen incited the Jews, as the secret advisers of the impious barbarian. Yet the calamities of Jerusalem were in some measure alleviated by the inconstancy or repentance of Hakem himself; and the royal man

3 Siracusa, Lambrusco, Isola elevata, called Isola dei Pescatori, and Otranto, in Apulia. (De Felt.)

4 See Gheiler, 1. iii. 1. Konon, (Hist. Crit. Reg. Hungaria, tom. i. p. 304—341) examines whether St. Stephen founded a monastery at the place of incidence, called Hieropolis: and the next is thefollowing:

5 In the following order: "Saints and martyrs of the rock of Jerusalem." (See Gheiler, 1. iii. part. i. p. 215, 216) add the testimonies, or rather the names, of Ab当之 and Novatian.

6 Barussus (A. D. 1061, No. 43—56) has transcribed the greater part of the original narratives of Ingulphus, Matrinus, and Lambrusco.

7 See Elnmacin, (Hist. Saracen., p. 348, 350) and Ab_algabys, (Synes., p. 207. 237. 219. 276) and other chroniclers. (Hist. des Huns, tom. ii. part. 1. p. 415, 247) add the testimonies, or rather the names, of Ab当之 and Novatian.
Shah, who with a higher title and more formidable powers, asserted the dominion of Syria and Palestine. The house of Seljuk reigned about twenty years in Jerusalem; but the hereditary command of the holy city and territory was intrusted or abandoned to the emir Ortok, the chief of a tribe of Turkomans, who, after their expulsion from Palestine, formed two dynasties on the borders of Armenia and Assyria. The oriental christians and the Latin pilgrims deplored a revolution, which, instead of the regular government and old alliance of the caliphs, imposed on their necks the iron yoke of the strangers of the north. In his court and camp the great sultan had adopted in some degree the arts and manners of Persia; but the body of the Turkish nation, and more especially the pastoral tribes, still breathed the fierceness of the desert. From Nice to Jerusalem, the western countries of Asia were a scene of foreign and domestic hostility; and the shepherds of Palestine, who held a precarious sway on a doubtful fiefdom, had neither leisure nor capacity to avert the slow profits of commercial and religious freedom. The pilgrims, who, through innumerable perils, had reached the gates of Jerusalem, were the victims of private rapine or public oppression, and often sunk under the pressure of famine and disease, before they were permitted to salute the holy sepulchre. A spirit of national resentment flowered and swelled the Turks to assert the clergy of every sect; the patriarch was dragged by the hair along the pavement, and cast into a dungeon, to extort a ransom from the sympathy of his flock; and the divine worship in the church of the resurrection was often disturbed by the savage rudeness of its masters. The pathetic tale excited the millions of the west to march under the standard of the cross to the relief of the Holy Land: and yet how trifling is the sum of these accumulated evils, if compared with the single act of the sacrifice of Hakem, who was so patiently consumed by the Turks? A slighter provocation inflamed the more irascible temper of their descendants: a new spirit had arisen of religious chivalry and papal dominion: a nerve was touched of exquisite feeling; and the sensa-tion vibrated to the heart of Europe.

CHAPTER XIX.

Origin and numbers of the first crusade.—Characters of the Latin princes.—Their march to Constantinople.—Polecy of the Greek emperor Alexius.—Conquest of Nice, And loch, and Jerusalem, by the Franks.—Deliverance of the holy sepulchre.—Godfrey of Bouillon, first king of Jerusalem.—Institutions of the French or Latin kingdom.

The first crusade. About twenty years after the conquest of Jerusalem by the Turks, the holy Peter the hermit, sepulchre was visited by a hermit of the name of Peter, a native of Amiens, in the province of Picardy, in France. His resentment and sympathy were excited by his own injuries and the oppression of the christian name; he mingled his tears with those of the patriarch, and earnestly inquired, if no hopes of relief could be entertained from the Greek emperors of the east. The patriarch exposed the vices and weakness of the successors of Constantine. "I will remove," exclaimed the hermit, "the martial nations of Europe, which have been drawn to the call of the hermit. The astonished patriarch dismissed him with epistles of credit and complaint; and no sooner did he land at Bari, than Peter hastened to kiss the feet of the Roman pontiff. His nature was small, his appearance contemptible, but his eyes were kept closed by the vehemence of speech, which seldom fails to impart the persuasion of the soul. He was born of a gentleman's family, and had the military service was under the neighbouring counts of Boulogne, the heroes of the first crusade. But we soon relinquished the sword and the world; and if it be true, that his wife, however noble, was aged and ugly, he might withdraw, with the less reluctance, from her bed to a convent, and at length to a hermitage. In this austere solitude, his body was en-erated, excited by his eye, to call him, he believed; whatever he believed, he saw in dreams and revelations. From Jerusalem, the pilgrim returned an accomplished fanatic; but as he excelled in the popular madness of the times, pope Urban the second received him in a suit of the most extraordinary sign, promised to support it in a general council, and encouraged him to proclaim the deliverance of the Holy Land. Invigorated by the approbation of the pontiff, his zealous missionary traversed, with speed and success, the provinces of Italy and France. His diet was abstemious, his prayers long and fervent, and the alms which he received with one hand, he distributed with the other: his head was bare, his feet naked, his meagre body was wrapped in a coarse garment; he bare and displayed a weighty crosifix; and the ascetic beauty of the person was sanctified in the public eye, by the service of the man of God. He preached to innumerable crowds in the churches, the streets, and the highways: the hermit entered with equal confidence the palace and the cottage; and the people, for all were people, were impetuously moved by his call to repentance and arms. When he painted the sufferings of the natives and pilgrims of Palestine, every heart was melted to compassion; every breast glowed with indignation, when he challenged the warriors of the age to defend their brethren, and rescue their Sue-served for Urban the second, the most faithful of his disciples. He undertook the conquest of the east, whilst the larger portion of Rome was possessed and fortified by his rival Guibert of Ravenna, who contended with Urban for the name and honours of the pontificate. He attempted to unite the powers of the west, and he ascended the papal throne, not as the representative of the church, and the people from their princes, by the excommunication which himself and his predecessors had thundered against the emperor and the king of France. Philip the first, of France, supported with patience the censures which he had provoked by his.separation from Rome. These censures were mainly due to the failure of the Conciliar movement, of which Urban, the fourth, of Germany, assented the right of investitures, the prerogative of confirming his bishops by the delivery of the ring and crosier. But the emperor's party was crushed in Italy by the arms of the Normans and the countess Mathilde; and the long quarrel had been recently overcome by the revolt of his son Conrad and the shame of his wife, who, in the synods of Constance and Placentia, confessed the manifold prostitutions to which she had been exposed by a husband regardless of her honour and his own. So popular was the cause of Urban, so weighty was his influence, that sixty dukes and forty bishops at Placentia were composed of two hundred bishops of Italy, France, Burgundy, Swabia, and Bavaria. Four thousand of the clergy, and thirty thousand of the laity, attended this important meeting; and, as the most spacious cathedral would have been inadequate to the multitude, the session of seven days were held in a plain adjacent to the city. The ambassadors of the Greek emperor, Alexis Comnenus, were introduced to plead the distress of their sovereign and the danger of Constantinople, which was divided only by a narrow sea from the victorious Turks, the common enemy of both. In the dress they fluttered the pride of the Latin princes; and, appealing at once to their policy and religion, exhorted them to repel the barbarians on the confines of Aia, rather than to expect them in the heart of Europe. At the sad tale of the misery and perils of their eastern brethren, the assembly burst into tears: the most exacter champions declared their readiness to march; and the Greek ambassadors were dismissed with the assurance of a speedy and powerful succour.

The relief of Constantinople was included in the larger and most distant project of the deliverance of Jerusalem. The assembly held an assemblage to a second synod, which he proposed to celebrate in some city of France in the autumn of the same year. The short delay would propagate the flame of enthusiasm; and his firmest hope was in a nation of soldiers, still proud of the pre-eminence of their name, and ambitious to emulate their hero Charlemagne, who, in the popular Romance of Turpin, had achieved the conquest of the Holy Land. A latent motive of affection or vanity might influence the choice of Urban: he was himself a native of France, a monk of Cluny, and he had been a counsellor of St. Peter. The Censures of Philip had illustrated his family and province; nor is there perhaps a more exquisite gratification than to revisit, in a conspicuous dignity, the humble and laborious scenes of our youth. It may occasion some surprise that the Council of Clermont might seem to erect in the heart of the French State, the tribunal from whence he November, hurled his anathemas against the king; but our surprise will vanish so soon as we form a just estimate of a king of France of the eleventh century. Philip the first was the great-grandson of Hugh Capet, the founder of the present race, who, in the decline of Charlemagne's posterity, added the regal title to his patrimonial estates of Paris and Orleans. In this narrow compass, he was possessed of wealth and jurisdiction; but in the rest of France, Hugh and his first descendants were no more than the feudal lords of about a hundred and fifty duchies and baronies of dependence, with no real power, who disdained the control of laws and legal assemblies, and whose disregard of their sovereign was revenged by the disobedience of their inferior vassals. At Clermont, in the territories of the count of Auvergne, the pope might brave with impunity the re- sistance of the monarch, and the consent of the whole, who had convened in that city was not less numerous or respectable than the synod of Placentia. Besides his court and council of Roman cardinals, he was supported by thirteen archbishops and two hundred and twenty-five bishops; the number of mitred prelates was computed at more than four hundred, and the number of those whose names were put to the acts of the council. In short, it was one of the most powerful and illustrious assemblies ever held under the archiepiscopal dignity of the church; and a protection of three years was extended to husbandmen and merchants, the defenders..."
The Decline and Fall

Chap. XIX.

The decline and fall of the Holy Roman Empire. But the name and nature of a holy war demands not to be made a pretext for injuring any other society; nor can we doubt that the universal sympathy with justice and propriety of our enterprise. In the age of the crusades, the christians, both of the east and west, were persuaded of their lawfulness and merit; their arguments are clouded by the perpetual abuse of Scripture and rhetoric; but they seem to insist on the necessity of destroying the idolaters, of cutting off the holy grail of the Holy Land, and the impiety of their pagan and Mahometan foes. The right of a just defence may fairly include our civil and spiritual allies: it depends on the existence of danger; and that danger must be estimated by the two-fold consideration of the manner and the amount of the evil or mischief. A perilous test has been impinged to the Mahometans, the duty of exterminating all other religions by the sword. This charge of ignorance and bigotry is favored by the Koran, by the history of the mussulman conquerors, and by the example of their present conquering race. The eminent virtues of the Turks in the eleventh century, the victorious arms of the Turks presented a real and urgent apprehension of these losses. They had subdued, in less than thirty years, the kingdoms of Asia, as far as Jerusalem and the Helleespont; and the Greek empire tottered on the verge of destruction. Besides an honest sympathy for their brethren, the Latins had a right and interest in the support of Constantinople, the most important barrier of the west; and the privilege of defence must reach to prevent, as well as to repel, an impending assault. But this salutary purpose might have been accomplished by a moderate succour; a more calamous reason must disclaim the innumerable hosts and remote operations, which overwhelmed Asia and depopulated Europe. II. Palestine could add nothing to the strength of the safety of the Latins; and fanaticism also would perish under the pressure of more distant and narrow province. The christians affirmed that their inalienable title to the promised land had been sealed by the blood of their divine Saviour; it was their right and duty to rescue their inheritance from the unjust possessors, who profaned his sepulchre, and oppressed the pilgrimage of his disciples. Vainly would it be alleged that the pre-eminence of Jerusalem, and the sanctity of Palestine, have been abolished with the Mosaic law; that the God of the christians is not a local deity, and that the recovery of Bethel or of Calvary, his erable, will not atone for the violation of the moral precepts of the gospel. Such arguments glance aside from the leaden shield of superstition; and the religious mind will not easily relinquish its hold on the sacred ground of mystery and miracle. III. But the holy wars which have been waged in every climate of the globe, from Egypt to Lisbon, and from Peru to Hindostan, require the support of some more general and flexible tenet. It has often been supposed, and sometimes affirmed, that a difference of religion is a worthy cause of hostility; that obnoxious infidels may be slain in cold blood, and permitted to pervert these divinest of thoughts with durchaus, the successes of his policy have been followed by the death of Bonaparte. He, the Meheri Historical of the First Crusade, in seven books, (p. 897-1525) in small value to account. if the reader will turn to the first scene of the first part of Henry the Fourth, he will see in the text of Shakespeare the natural feeling of interest and justice in the The Meheri Historical of the First Crusade, digested through vigorous minds, greedy of every pretence to have and persecute those who dissent from their creed.
mercy. Above four hundred years before the first crusade, the eastern and western provinces of the Roman empire had been acquired about the same time, and in the same manner, by the barbarians of Germany and Arabia. Time and treaties had legitimated the conquests of the Christian Franks; but in the eyes of their subjects and neighbours, forty days' fasts, three days' imprisonment, or death by the arms of war or rebellion, might be lawfully driven from their unlawful possession. 1

As the manners of the christians were relaxed, their discipline of penance was also relaxed. The penance which the first century judges humanity of the three infolded the mercy of the three, and the three is enumerated which innocence could not have suspected, and others which reason cannot believe; and the more ordinary offences of fornication and adultery, of perjury and sacrilege, of rape and murder, were expiated by a penance, which, according to the various circumstances of the case, was sometimes multiplied by ten times; and in those times of anarchy and vice, a modest sinner might easily incur a debt of three hundred years. His insolvency was relieved by a commutation, or indulgence, a year of penance was expiated at twenty-six solidi 2 of silver, about four pounds sterling, for the rich; at three solidi, or nine shillings, for the indigent: and these sums were soon appropriated to the use of the church, which derived, from the redemption of sins, an inexhaustible revenue and a boundless store of alms. A debt of three hundred years, or twelve hundred pounds, was enough to impoverish a plentiful fortune; the rarity of gold and silver was supplied by the alienation of land; and the princely donations of Pepin and Charlemagne are expressly given for the remedy of their soul. It is a maxim of the civil law, that whoever cannot pay his fines, must pay with his body; and this law tender, like the law of the Jews, was administered by the monks, a cheap, though painful, equivalent. By a fantastic arithmetical, a year of penance was taxed at three thousand lashes; 3 and such was the skill and patience of a famous hermit, St. Dominic of the iron scourge, 4 that in six days he could discharge an execution of the crossing of the churlish infold on the hand and stripes. His example was followed by many penitents of both sexes; and, as a vicarious sacrifice was accepted, a sturdy disciplinarian might expiate on his own back the sins of his benefactors. 5 These compensations of the purge and the person introduced, in the eleventh century, a more honourable mode of satisfaction. The merit of military service against the Saracens of Africa and Spain, had been allowed by the predecessors of Urban the second. In the council of Clermont, that pope proclaimed a plenary indulgence to those who should enlist under the banner of the cross; and on the day of the consecration of the new large church, they received a full receipt for all that might be due of canonical penance. 6 The cold philosophy of modern times is incapable of feeling the impression that was made on a sinful and fanatic world. At the voice of their pastor, the robber, the incendiary, the homicide, arose by thousands to the victim of the innocent; 7 and the infolded the same deeds which they had exercised against their christian brethren; and the terms of atonement were eagerly embraced by offenders of every rank and denomination. None were pure; none were exempt from the guilt and penalty of sin; and those whose who were sufficiently reformed and converted, the church and the state, were the best entitled to the temporal and eternal recompense of their pious course. If they fell, the spirit of the Latin clergy did not hesitate to adorn their tomb with the crown of martyrdom; 8 and should they survive, they could expect without imputation the delay and increase of their heavenly reward. They offered their blood to the Son of God, who had laid down his life for their salvation; they took up the cross, and entered with confidence into the way of the Lord. His providence would watch over their safety; perhaps his visible power would support the principles of their holy enterprise. The cloud and pillar of Jehovah had marched before the Isrealites into the promised land. Might not the christians more reasonably hope that the rivers would open for their passage; that the walls of the strongest cities would fall at the sound of their trumpets; and that the sun would be arrested in his mid career, to allow them time for the destruction of the infolded? 9

Of the chiefs and soldiers who wore— Temporal and ed to the holy sepulchre, I will dare to carmel motives, affirm, that all were prompted by the spirit of enthusiasm; the belief of merit, the hope of reward, and the

---

1 Each century of lashes was sanctioned with the recital of a psalm; and the whole Paschal, with the accomplishment of 1,500,000 stripes; was equivalent to five years of imprisonment.

2 The Life and Achievements of St. Dominic Lorizquen was compiled by his friend Antoine de Rivarol (Thesaurus Ecclesiasticorum, Hist. Eccles. tom. xiii. p. 95—101). Bonifacii, A.D. 1565, No. 7, who observes from Damianus, how fashionable, even among ladies of quality, was the practice of penance, (Catholic Universal, lib. iii. t. 2. p. 517, et seq.)

3 At a quarter or even half a rath a laund, Sancho Panza was a creditable payer, and paid without reluctance the penance of 15,000 denarii in Fécé Lebat (Voyagez en Italie, tom. viii. p. 10—25) a very lively picture of the destitution of one of these artists.

4 Quicherat observes, that a common practice of the crusaders, and such is the uniform style of the historians; (Esprit des Croisades, tom. iii. p. 477.) but the prayer for the repose of their souls is invariable in orthodox theology with the merits of martyrdom. assurance of divine aid. But I am equally persuaded, that in many it was not the sole, that in some it was not the only cause. The principal and most important motives of religion are feeble to stem, they are strong and irresistible to impel, the stream of national manners.
Against the private wars of the barbarians, their bloody tournaments, licentious loves, and judicial duelis, the popes and synods might ineffectually thunder. It is a malignant censure to provoke the inferior specu-lum of the Greeks, to drive into the cloister the victims of anarchy or despotism, to sanctify the patience of slaves and cowards, or to assume the merit of the humanity and benevolence of modern Christians. War and its effects, the state of the Franks, or Latins; they were enjoined, as a penance, to gratify those passions, to visit distant lands, and to draw their swords against the nations of the east. Their victory, or even their attempt, would immortalize the names of the intrepid heroes of the cross; and the purest piety could not be insensible to the most splendid prospect of military glory. In the petty quarrels of Europe, they shed the blood of their friends and countrymen, for the acquisition perhaps of a castle or village. They could march with alacrity against the distant and hostile nations who were devoted to their arms. The Holy See, already grasped in the hand of Asia; and the conquest of Apulia and Sicilv by the Normans might exalt to royalty the hopes of the most private adventurer. Christendom, in its rudest state, must have yielded to the climate and cultivation of the Mahometan countries; and their natural and artificial wealth had been acquired by the trade of incense, and the gifts of an imperfect commerce. The vulgar, both the great and the small, were taught to believe every wonder, of lands flowing with milk and honey, of mines and treasures, of gold and diamonds, of frankincense, and myrrh, and of cinnamon.
In this earthly paradise, each warrior depended on his sword to carve a plausible and honourable establishment, which he measured only by the extent of his wishes. Their vassals and soldiers trusted their fortunes to God and theirs; and the soldiers of the most miserable nation could enrich the meanest follower of the vamp; and the flavour of the wines, the beauty of the Grecian women, were temptations more adapted to the nature, than to the profession, of the champions of the cross. The love of freedom was a powerful incitement to the multhitudes to be dissuaded by the influences of ecclesiastic tyranny. Under this holy sign, the peasants and burgers, who were attached to the service of the globe, might escape from a haughty lord, and transplant themselves and their families to a land of liberty. The monk might release himself from the discipline of his convent; the debtor might suspend the accumulation of usury, and the pursuit of his credit; and outlaws and malefactors of every cast might continue to brave the laws and elude the punishment of their crimes.1

1 Influence of the various motives to prosecute the war were potent and numerous: when we have singly computed their weight on the mind of each individual, we must add the infinite series, the multiplying powers, of example and fashion. The first proselytes became the warmest and most effectual missionaries of the cross among their friends and countrymen when they preached the duty, the merit, and the recompense of

2 The same hopes were displayed in the letters of the adventuriers and the consuls of France to the Emperor. Horae de Rebus civitatis, (9th century); by the Burgundians, men and that he was delivered of a hundred caesars by the conquest of Aleppo. (Guibert, p. 534, 555.)

3 In his apology of the Franks to the Council of Clermont, Abbe summoned the danger of the church, and the relics of saints, the aura and the saron, and petitionarium famularum voluntas
(p. 152), as if he were the indignant Guibert, the Greek women were handmaids than those of France.

4 The Crossigni, freedmen from debt, usury,

5 In his orations of the Emperor's letter to the Council of Clermont, A summoned the danger of the church, and the relics of saints,
the aura and the saron, and petitionarium famularum voluntas
(p. 152), as if he were the indignant Guibert, the Greek women were handmaids than those of France.

6 Some instances of these indigna are given in the Escries des

7 In his orations of the Emperor's letter to the Council of Clermont, A summoned the danger of the church, and the relics of saints,
the aura and the saron, and petitionarium famularum voluntas
(p. 152), as if he were the indignant Guibert, the Greek women were handmaids than those of France.
partake in the spoil; but their genuine leaders (may we credit such folly?) were a goose and a goat, who were carried in the fronted miles between the two worthy Christians ascribed an infusion of the divine spirit. Of these and of other bands of enthusiasts, the first and most easy warfare was against the Jews, the murderers of the Son of God. In the trading cities of the Morelle and the Rhine their colonies were numerous and rich; and they enthrone protection of the emperor and the bishops, the free exercise of their religion. At Verdun, Treves, Mentz, Spire, Worms, many thousands of that unhappy people were pillaged and massacred: nor had they felt a more bloody stroke since the persecution of Hadrian. After the conquest and later, the Franks sometimes treated the Christians, who accepted a feigned and transient conversion; but the more obstinate Jews opposed their fanaticism to the fanaticism of the Christians, barricaded their houses, and precipitating themselves, their families, and their wealth, into the rivers or the flames, disapprented of their flocks, or at least the avowal, of their implacable foes.

The destruction of the frontier of Austria and in Hungary and the seat of the Byzantine monarchy, the A.D. 1096. crusaders were compelled to traverse an impetuous confluence of the wild and desolate countries of Hungary and Bulgaria. The soil is fruitful, and intersected with rivers; but it was then covered with morasses and forests, which spread to a boundless extent, whenever man has ceased to exercise his dominion over the earth. Both nations had imbued the rudiments of Christianity; the Hungarians were ruled by their native princes; the Bulgarians by a lieutenant of the Greek emperor: but on the slightest provocation, their ferocious nature was rekindled, and ample provocation was afforded by the disorders of the first pilgrims. Agriculture must have been unprofitable and handicapped among a people, whose cities were built of reeds and timber, which were deserted in the summer season for the tents of hunters and shepherds. A scanty supply of provisions was more easily demaned from these necessities; the wild and reckless rovers who compose the reputed band were not as a matter of course, to be with a less appetite at the sight of a man who had assigned to them and to rush headlong against the Turks, who occupied the road of Jerusalem. The hermit, conscious of his shame, had withdrawn from the camp to Constantinople, and his lieutenant, Walter the Penniless, who was worthy of a better command, attempted without success to introduce some order and prudence among the herd of savages. They separated in quest of prey, and themselves fell an easy prey to the arts of the sultan. By a rumour that their foremost companions were rioting in the spoils of his capital, Solomon tempted the main body to descend into the plain of Nisie; they were overwhemed by the Turkish arrows; and a pyramid of bones informed their companions of the place of their defeat. Of the first crusaders, three hundred thousand had already perished, before a single city was rescued from the infidels, before their graver and more noble bands had completed the preparations of their enterprise. For those of the Byzantine, without excepting Tuscany, is informed of the first crusaders to the holy city of Jerusalem. The citizens, like ourselves, can only quote the writers of France; but he compares with local science the ancient and modern geography. Ante postem Cyperon, in Sopor et Ponon; Malaezia, Zemun; Fluvius Murus, Savoia; Lentia, Leith; Abendroth, on their un- and the pilotus. These massacres and depredations on the Jerns, which were re- reached at each crusade, are cooly related. It is true, that St. Ben- This account is based on a very meager text. See the contemporary description of Hungary in Ocho de Frising, i., c. 34 in Muratori, scriptum. Hermon Iulianicus, tomo. vi. p. 605, 606.

To save time and space, I shall represent, in a short table, the particular references to the great events of the first crusade.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>The Crew</th>
<th>The Chiefs</th>
<th>The Road to Constantinople</th>
<th>Alexius</th>
<th>Nice and Asia Minor</th>
<th>Edessa</th>
<th>Antioch</th>
<th>The Battle</th>
<th>The Holy Land</th>
<th>Conquest of Jerusalem</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

The old Hungarians, without excepting Tuscany, are informed of the first crusaders to the holy city of Jerusalem. The citizens, like ourselves, can only quote the writers of France; but he compares with local science the ancient and modern geography. Ante postem Cyperon, in Sopor et Ponon; Malaezia, Zemun; Fluvius Murus, Savoia; Lentia, Leith; Abendroth, on their un- and the pilotus. These massacres and depredations on the Jerns, which were re- reached at each crusade, are cooly related. It is true, that St. Ben-
The decline and fall

The chief of the None of the great sovereigns of Eu-first crusade. rope embarked their persons in the first crusade. The emperor Henry the fourth was not disposed to obey the summons of the pope; Philip the first of France was occupied by his ambitious intentions in England by a recent conquest; the kings of Spain were engaged in a domestic war against the Moors; and the northern monarchs of Scotland, Denmark, Sweden, and Poland, were yet strangers to the passions and interests of the south. The religion of the north was more strongly felt by the princes of the second order, who held an important place in the feudal system. Their situation will naturally cast under four distinct heads the review of their names and characters; but I may escape some needless repetition, by observing at once, that courage and the exercise of which are the common attribute of these Christian adventurers.

1. Godfrey of Bouillon. I. The first rank both in Bouillon, war and council is justly due to Godfrey of Bouillon; and happy it would have been for the crussaders, if they had trusted themselves to the sole direction of that chivalrous and doughty representative of Charlemagne, from whom he was descended in the female line. His father was of the noble race of the counts of Boulogne: Brabant, the lower province of Lorraine, was the inheritance of his mother; and by the emperor's bounty, he was himself invested with the duchy of Lorraine, which he transferred to his lordship of Bouillon in the Ardennes. In the service of Henry the fourth, he bore the great standard of the empire, and pierced with his lance the breast of Redolph the rebel king: Godfrey was the first who ascended the walls of Rome; and his sickness, his vow, perhaps his remorse for bearing arms against the pope, confirmed an early resolution of visiting the holy sepulchre, not as a pilgrim, but a deliverer. His valour was matured by prudence and moderation; his piety, though blind, was sincere; and, in the tumult of a camp, he practised the real and fictitious virtues of a convert. Superior to the private fictions of the chiefs, he reserved his enmity for the enemies of Christ; and though he gained a kingdom by the attempt, his pure and disinterested zeal was acknowledged by his rivals. Godfrey of Bouillon was accompanied by his two brothers, by Eustace the elder, who had succeeded to the county of Boulogne, and by the younger, Baldwin, a character of more ambiguous virtue. The duke of Lorraine was alike celebrated on either side of the Rhine; from his birth and education, he was a thorough German; he was conversant in the Teutonic languages: the barons of France, Germany, and Lorraine, assembled their vassals; and the confederate force that marched under his banner was composed of twelve thousand foot and about ten thousand horse.

II. Hugh of Ver. II. In the parliament that was held at march, Robert Paris, in the king's presence, about two months after the council of Clermont, bears of Hugh, count of Vermandois, was the Gibrati, Ar. most conspicuous of the princes who assumed the cross. But though the crusade was applied, not so much to his merit or possessions, (thought neither were contemptible,) as to the royal birth of the brother of the king of France. 2 Robert, duke of Normandy, was the eldest son of William the Conqueror; but on his father's death he was deprived of the kingdom of England, by his own inudence and the activity of his brother Rufus. The worth of a noble rivalship, and the inconstancy of fortune, the fickleness of temper: his cheerfulness seduced him to the indulgence of pleasure; his profuse liberality impooverished the prince and people; his indiscriminate clemency multiplied the number of enemies; and the amiable qualities of a private man became the essential and principal mark of his character. For the trifling sum of ten thousand marks, he mortgaged Normandy during his absence to the English usurper; 3 but his engagement and behaviour in the holy war announced in Robert a reformation of manners, and restored him in some degree to the public esteem. Another Robert was count of Flanders, a royal province, which, in his own time, gave three queens to the thrones of France, England, and Denmark: he was surnamed the Sword and Lance of the Christians; but in the exploration of a soldier, he sometimes forgot the duties of a prince. The character of Robert the warrior, and the office of a crusader, were the principal occupations of his life. The conqueror of Antioch, and the friend of the Saracens, was the first among the kings of the Holy Land; and to his braver deeds and matured prudence, he was indebted for much part of the honours of his crown. The warlike genius of his son, which was so much greater in the hands of William the conqueror, but which remained for a whole century in the hands of his son, was ascribed to the natural feeling of a people who had been conquered.

1 The author of the Esprit des Croisades has doubted, and might disbelieve, the crusade and tragic death of prince William, with 1500 or 15,500 Danes, who was cut off by sultan Saladin in Cambodia.
See de Vigny, Histoire, tom. i. p. 111.
2 The fragments of the Kingdoms of Lotharingia, or Lorraine, were published by the king's command, in the Memoirs of the Royal Society, 1704, without his name, which is in the latter has been changed into that of Brabant. (Vales. Notit. Gall., p. 283–286.)

3 The kingdom of France, the duchy of Normandy, the County of Laon, the counties of Avernes and Avesnes, the counties of Croissy, of Besancon, and of Comminges, the comtesses of Boulogne, the articles of Boulogne, part i. p. 51. Brabant, part ii. p. 37, 84.
Baugies, p. 151. On his deathbed, Godfrey sold or pawned the church to 1500 marks.

4 See the family character of Godfrey, in Williams of Tyre, 1. i. c.
5–8, his previous design in Godbert, (p. 945) his sickness and vow, in Bernard Theat. (c. 78.)

5 The manuscripts, that Hugh was proud of his nobility, riches, and power, (1. x. p. 295) the two last articles appear more equival, but an scribe, which seven hundred years ago was
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

331

Of the but the sand armies, their iant 2. and who i small Bohemond his amorous Anlichita justify to the fifteenth Tancred, pretend Storia same h Aries; was and he already of Aquila the fifth crusades, the warriors of every country were perpetually associated; and impartial taste must prefer a Gothic tournament to the Olympic games of classic antiquity. Instead of the naked spectacles which corrupted the manners of the Greeks, and banished from the stadium the virgins and nuncios; the pompous decoration of the lists was crowned with the presence of chaste and high-born beauty, from whose hands the conqueror received the prize of his dexterity and courage. The skill and strength that were exerted in wrestling and boxing, and the martial glory of the chivalric soldier; but the tournaments, as they were invented in France, and eagerly adopted both in the east and west, presented a lively image of the business of the field. The single combats, the general skirmish, the defence of a pass, or castle, were rehearsed as in actual service; and the contest, both in real and mimic war, was decided by the superior management of the horse and lance. The lance was the proper and peculiar weapon of the knight; his horse was of a large and heavy breed; but this charger, till he was raised to the degree of the approbation of the sovereign, was his attendant; and he quietly rode a pad or halterly of a more easy pace. His helmet and sword, his greaves and buckler, it would be superfluous to describe; but I may remark, that at the period of the crusades, the armour was less ponderous than in later times; and that, instead of a heart or leather, as it was defended by an hauberk or coat of mail. When their long lances were fixed in the rest, the warriors fearfully spurred their horses against the foe; and the light cavalry

The mother of Tancred was Emma, sister of the great Robert Guiscard of Apulia, a woman of great courage and energy; so much so, that the family and country of so illustrious a person should be known; yet the valorous and reasonable conduct of Tancred, and the love he bore to his mother, is a proof of the Italian, and perhaps of the race of the marquises of Monteferrat in Piedmont. (Script. tom. v. p. 291, 292.)

1. To gratify the childish vanity of the house of Este, Tancre was inserted in his poem, and in the first crusade, a fabulous hero, the bravest and most renowned Rinaldo, C. xxvii. 96—98. He might borrow his name from a Rinaldo, with the Aquila bianca Estense, who vanquished the Saracens at the siege of Salerno, in 1191. (Storia Imperiale di Riccobaldo, in Muratori Script. Ital. tom. ix. p. 360. Arato, Orlando Furioso, hoc. 30.) But 1. The distance of sixty years between the death of Tancred and the two Rinaldos is not sufficient. 2. The Storia Imperiale is a forgery of the Conte Bassano, at the end of the fifteenth century, p. 240—260. 3. The Rinaldo and his exploits are not less chimerical than the hero of Tancre; (Muratori, Antiichita Estense, tom. i. p. 360.)

2 The athletic exercises, particularly the boxing and pugilism, were condemned by Lycurgus, Philopomen, and Galen, a lawyer, and by some other physicians in general, and a practice which the most learned reader may weigh the apology of Lucian, in the character of Salon. See West on the Olympic Games, in his Pindar, vol. ii. p. 56—56. 342—345.
of the Turks and Arabs could seldom stand against the direct and impetuous weight of his charge. Each knight was attended to the field by his salioun squire, a youth of equal birth and similar hopes; he was followed by his archers and men at arms, and four, or five, or six soldiers, were computed as the furniture of a complete lance. In the expeditions to the neighbouring isles, the Holy Land, the deserts of Syria, the feudal tenure no longer subsisted; the voluntary service of the knights and their followers was either prompted by zeal or attachment, or purchased with rewards and promises; and the numbers of each squadron were measured by the power, the wealth, and the fame, of the owner, and the fidelity of his tenantry. Their rank was distinguished by his banner, his armorial coat, and his cry of war; and the most ancient families of Europe must seek in these achievements the origin and proof of their nobility. In this rapid portrait of chivalry, I have been urged to anticipate on the story of the crusades, at once an effect, and a cause, of this memorable institution.\(^6\) March of the princes to Constantinople. A.D. 1086, August 15—A.D. 1087, soon as they were relieved by the subjugation of the plebeians, they both encouraged each other, by interviews and messages, to accomplish their vow, and hasten their departure. Their wives and sisters were desirous of partaking the danger and merit of the pilgrimage; their portable treasures were conveyed in bars of silver and gold; and they were followed by the equipment of hounds and hawks to amuse their leisure and to supply their table. The difficulty of procuring subsistence for so many myriads of men and horses, engaged them to separate their forces; their choice of situation determined their road; and it was agreed to meet in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and from thence to begin their operations against the Turks. From the banks of the Meuse and the Moselle, Godfrey of Bouillon followed the direct way of Germany, Hungary, and Bulgaria; and, as long as he exercised the sole command, every step afforded some proof of his prudence and virtue. On the confines of Hungary he stopped three weeks by a christian people, to whom the name, or at least the abuse, of the cross was justly odious. The Hungarians still smarted with the wounds which had received from the first parties of crusaders: in their turn they had abused the right of defence and retaliation; and they had reason to apprehend a severe revenge from a hero of the same nation, and who was engaged in the same cause. But, after weighing the good sense and the excellent virtues of this virtuous duke was content to pity the crimes and misfortunes of his worthless brethren; and his twelve deputies, the messengers of peace, requested in his name a free passage and an equal market. To remove their suspicions, Godfrey trusted himself, and afterwards his brother, to the faith of Carlow, now King of Hungary, who treated them with a simple but hospitable entertainment: the treaty was sanctioned by their common gospel; and a proclamation, under pain of death, restrained the anarchy and licence of the Latin soldiers. From Austria to Belgrade, they traversed the plains of Hungary, without enduring or offering an injury; and the proximity of Carlowan, who hovered on the flanks with his numerous cavalry, was a precaution not less useful for their safety than for his own. They reached the bough of the Sava; and no sooner had they passed the river, the king of Hungary deserted them, and saluted their departure with the fairest wishes for the success of their enterprise. With the same conduct and discipline, Godfrey pervaded the woods of Bulgaria and the frontiers of Thrace; and might have assailed the Magi, but he had almost reached the first term of his pilgrimage, without drawing a spear against a christian adversary. After an easy and pleasant journey through Lombardy, from Turin to Aquileia, Raymond and his provincials marched forty days through the savage country of Dalmatia\(^7\) and Schisto-

---

\(^6\) On the curious subjects of knighthood, knights' service, nobility, arms, cry of war, banners, and tournaments, an ample fund of information may be obtained in Scaliger, Opuscula, vol. i. Part III. Tophanius, De Honor. part ii. c. 3. 3. 5. Ducange. (Opera, tom. iv. p. 258—261, 264.) The chivalric origin of the noblemen of the feudal age was the subject of a dissertation by Bredero, in Schriften der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Gottingen, and a dissertation by Mr. Longstaff, in the Revue du dix-neuvième siècle (vol. x. p. 172.)

\(^7\) See the narrative of the crusades by Du Cange, tom. i. p. 569, 573. See also the 'Narrative of the Crusades' by R. W. Seton-Watson. The crusades were a series of religious wars fought by Europeans between the 11th and 13th centuries to recapture the Holy Land from Muslim rule. The crusades were organized by the Pope and were supported by the Catholic Church. The First Crusade (1095-1099) was successful in capturing Jerusalem from the Muslim Fatimid Caliphate. The Second Crusade (1147-1149) was less successful, with the Crusaders being defeated at the Battle of the Arsuf. The Third Crusade (1189-1192) was the largest and most expensive, with the Crusaders successfully capturing Jerusalem but failing to capture the Egyptian city of Acre. The Fourth Crusade (1202-1204) was particularly controversial, as it diverted the Crusade army to Constantinople and resulted in the sack of the city. The Fifth Crusade (1217-1221) was the last major Crusade, and it failed to capture Jerusalem. The crusades had a significant impact on European history, including the promotion of overseas trade, the establishment of new trade routes, and the spread of new ideas and cultures. The crusades also had a profound effect on the Muslim world, leading to the loss of territories and the displacement of populations. The crusades were a complex and multifaceted event, with varying motivations and outcomes. --- flock and cottage were swept away by the inundation. Such was the fortune, or at least the apprehension, of the Greek emperors; and who would have desired in this history, and whose conduct is so differently represented by his daughter Anne, and by the Latin writers. In the council of Phcenicia, his embassadors had solicited a moderate succour, perhaps of ten thousand soldiers; but he was astonished by the appraisals of so many potent chiefs. The emperor fluctuated between hope and fear, between timidity and courage; but in the crooked policy which he mistook for wisdom, I cannot believe, I cannot discern, that he meekly, conspired against the life or honour of the French heroes. The purported grievances of these and other kings were such heathen, alike destitute of humanity and reason; nor was it possible for Alexius to prevent or deplore their destruction. The troops of Godfrey and his peers were less contemptible, but not less suspicious, to the Greek emperor. Their motives might be pure and pious; but he was equally alarmed by his knowledge of the ambitious Bohemond, and his ignorance of the Transalpine chiefs: the courage of the French was blind and headstrong; they might be tempted by the luxury and wealth of Greece, and elated by the view and opinion of their invincible strength and fortune. The council of Phcenicia left the aspect of Constantinople. After a long march and painful abstinence, the troops of Godfrey encamped in the plains of Thrace; they heard with indignation, that their brother, the count of Vermadois, was imprisoned by the Greeks; and their reluctant duke was compelled to indulge them in some freedom of retaliation and rape. They were appeased by the submission of Alexius; he promised to supply their camp; and if they refused, in the midst of winter, to pass the Bosphorus, their quarters were assigned among the gardens and palaces on the shores of that narrow sea, but the announcement was not so speedily fulfilled as the news which startled the minds of the two nations, who despised each other as slaves and barbarians. Ignorance is the ground of suspicion, and suspicion was inflamed into daily provocations: prejudice is blind, lunger is deaf; and Alexius is accused of a design to starve the Latins in a dangerous post, on all sides encompassed with the water of Godfrey sounded his trumpets, burst the net, overthrew the plain, and insulted the suburbs; but the gates of Constantinople were strongly fortified; the ramparts were lined with archers; and after a doubtful conflict, both parties listened to the voice of peace and religion. The emperor, in the height of the summer, speedily soothed the fierce spirit of the western strangers; as a Christian warrior, he rekindled their zeal for the prosecution of their holy enterprise, which he engaged to second with his troops and treasures. On the return of spring, Godfrey was persuaded to occupy a pleasant and plentiful camp in Asia; and no sooner had he passed the Bosphorus, than the Greek vessels were suddenly recalled to the opposite shore. The same policy was repeated with the succeeding chi-fis, who were swayed by the example, and weakened by the departure, of their foremost companions. By his skill and diligence, Alexius prevented the union of any two of the confederate armies at the same moment under the walls or the Penteconetos not a Latin pilgrim was left on the coast of Europe. The same arms which threatened Europe might deliver Asia, and repel the Turks from the neighbouring shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont. The fair provinciers from Nice to Antioch were the recent patrimony of the Roman emperor; and his ancient and perpetual claim still embraced the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt. In his enthusiasm, Alexius indulged, or affected, the ambitious hope of leading his new allies to subvert theRodrigues, and to reconstruct the race of the Caesars. The courage, by his prudence, was content with extorting from the French princes an oath of homage and fidelity, and a solemn promise, that they would either restore, or hold, their Asissian conquests, as the humble and loyal vassals of the Roman empire. Their independent spirit was fired at the mention of this foreign and voluntary servitude: they successively yielded to the dexterous application of gifts and flattery; and the first prelates became the most eloquent apostles of the orthodoxy of their emperor, and tempers dissuaded him from exposing his royal person to the sight of unknown and lawless barbarians. His prudence, or his pride, was content with extorting from the French princes an oath of homage and fidelity, and a solemn promise, that they would either restore, or hold, their Asissian conquests, as the humble and loyal vassals of the Roman empire. Their independent spirit was fired at the mention of this foreign and voluntary servitude: they successively yielded to the dexterous application of gifts and flattery; and the first prelates became the most eloquent apostles of the orthodoxy of their emperor, and tempers dissuaded him from exposing his royal person to the sight of unknown and lawless barbarians. He obtained the homage of the Crusaders in the council of Phcenicia.

1 Anna Comnena was born the 1st of December, A. D. 1083. Indicat. viii. (Alexiad. L. vi. p. 195, 197.) At thirteen, the time of the first crusade, she was noble, and perhaps married to the younger Nicephorus Bryennius, with whom she had two sons, Alexius, and Michael. (Alexiad. L. vii. p. 213, 216.) Some moderns have imagined, that her eminency to Bohemond was foreseen in the destinies of the crusades, and that her partiality for the Bosphorus, and her partial relations (Alexiad. L. vii. p. 293-297.) may be opposed to the interest of the Latins, but in their subsequent Quarrel she is in brief and fact, undervalued.

2 In their view of the character and conduct of Alexius, Mainzberg has been seduced by the shining, and by some part of the partial bloom of the Eusebian Greeks. The prejudice of a philosopher is too excessive from that of a foreigner.

3 Between the Black sea, the Bosphorus, and the river Danube, which is deep in summer, and runs fifteen miles through a flat naked low, there is only the Bosphorus, which is 350 miles in breadth; and the stone bridge of the Bosphorus, which in successive ages was restored by Manuel and by Alexius, fixiation d’Ibnus Daras, liv. c. 2. De

4 Magi, C. P. Christian. l. iv. c. 2. p. 172.)

5 There were two sorts of adoption, the one by arms, the other by introducing the son between the shut and skin of his father. Ducaigne (sur Juveille, xxxii. p. 270) supposes Godfrey’s adoption of Alexius to be of the latter sort, because he has been of late time known in by the name of the son of the emperor, if not of the emperor, during the time of the emperors of the Bosphorus.

6 After his return, Robert of Flanders became the son of the king of England, on the occasion of four hundred marcs. See the first at in the Hymen’s Federe.
decided that he was the soldier and servant of Christ alone, and that the Greek might be considered with an equal treaty of alliance and friendship. His obstinate resistance enhanced the value and the price of his submission; and he shone, says the princess Anne, among the barbarians, as the sun amidst the stars of heaven. His distress of the noise and insolence of the French, his calumny, designs on the Greeks, the reproach imparted to his faithful Raymond: and that aged statesman might clearly discern, that however false in friendship, he was sincere in his enmity. The spirit of chivalry was last subdued in the person of Tancred; and none could deem themselves dissolved of the honour of that galling knight, than those who disdained the gold and flattery of the Greek monarch; assaulted in his presence an insolent patriarch; escaped to Asia in the habit of a private soldier; and yielded with a sigh to the authority of Bohemond and the interest of the Christian cause. The hést and most estimable reason was the impossibility of passing the sea and accomplishing their work, without the licence and the vessels of Alexius; but they cherished a secret hope, that as soon as they trod the continent of Asia, their swords would oblige their shame, and draw a step of their own side, which was not to be very faithfully performed. The ceremony of their homage was grateful to a people who had long since considered pride as the substitute of power. High on his throne, the emperor sat mute and immovable; his majesty was adored by the Latin princes; and as the keys either to the feet or the knees, an indignity which their own writers are ashamed to confess, and unable to deny. The insubordination of the Franks, the murmurs of the dukes and counts, but a French baron (he is supposed to be Robert of Paris) presumed to ascend the throne, and to place himself by the side of Alexius. The rage and reproach of Baldwin provoked him to exclaim, in his barbarous idiom, "Who is this rustic, that keeps his seat, while so many valiant captains are standing round him?" The emperor maintained his silence, dissembled his indignation, and questioned his interpreter concerning the universal language of gesture and countenance. Before the departure of the pilgrims, he endeavoured to learn the name and condition of the unacquainted baron. "I am a Frenchman," replied the peasant, "of the purest and most noble blood of my country. All that I know is, that there is a church in my neighbourhood, the resort of those who are desirous of improving their valour in single combat. Till an enemy appears, they address their prayers to God and his saints. That church I have frequently visited, but never have I found an antagonist who dared to accept my defence," Alexius dismissed the challenger with some prudent advice for his conduct in the Turkish warfare; and history repeats with pleasure this lively example of the manners of his age and country.

The conquest of Asia was undertaken and achieved by Alexander with the aid of five thousand Macedonians and Greeks; and his best hope was in the strength and discipline of his phalanx of infantry. The principal force of the crusaders consisted in their cavalry; and when that force was mustered in the plains of Syria, it consisted of about three hundred horsemen. By each horseman mounted one hundred thousand fighting men, completely armed with the helmet and coat of mail. The value of these soldiers deserved a strict and absolute account; and the flower of European chivalry might furnish, in a first effort, this forlorned hope. The boldness of good fortune, the courage to be enrolled for the service of scouts, pioneers, and archers; but the promiscuous crowd were lost in their own disorder; and we depend not on the eyes or evidence, but on the belief and fancy, of a chaplain of count Baldwin, in the estimate of six thousand and forty individual adventurers, besides the priests and monks, the women and children, of the Latin camp. The reader starts; and before he is recovered from his surprise, I shall add, on the same testimony, that if all who took the cross had accomplished their vow, the sterner side of the battle, may be reckoned to be the work of a million men, who emigrated from Europe to Asia. Under this oppression of faith, I derive some relief from a more sagacious and thinking writer, who, after the same review of the cavalry, accuses the credulity of the priest of Chartres, and even doubts whether the Seljukite retrenchments of the vizirs should be attributed to the great multitude; and many were repulsed by the obstinacy of the way, the most insuperable as they were unforeseen to these ignorant fanatics. The savage countries of Hungary and Bulgaria were whitened with their bones; their vanguard was cut in pieces by the Turkish sultan; and the loss of the first adventurer, by the sword, or climate, or fatigue, has already been stated at three hundred thousand men. Yet the myriads that survived, that marched, that pressed forwards on the holy pilgrimage, were a subject of astonishment to those whom the battles of the first phase of her language sinks under the efforts of the princes Anna: the images of locusts, of leaves and flowers, of the sands of the sea, or the stars of heaven, imperfectly represent what she had seen and heard; and the daughter of Alexius exhales, that Europe was deceived from its foundations, and buried under Asia. The ancient hosts of Darius and Xerxes labour under the same doubt of a vague and indefinite multitude: but I am inclined to believe, that a larger number has never been contained within the lines of a single camp, than at the siege of Nice, the first appearance of the Latin princes. Their motives, their characters, and their arms, have been already displayed. Of their troops, the most numerous portion were natives of France: the Low Countries, the banks of the Rhine, and Aquilia, sent a powerful reinforcement; some bands of adventurers were drawn from Spain,

334 THE DECLINE AND FALL

Chap. XIX.

Their review and remarks, A.D. 1097.

May.

4 There is some diversity on the numbers of his army; but no authority can be compared with that of Prolemy, who states it at five thousand horse and thirty thousand foot. (See Usher's Annals, p. 252.)

5 Frolicher, Carnotena, p. 507. He enumerates nineteen nations of different names and languages, (p. 393.) but I do not clearly apprehend his difference between his personages and Agneta. (See p. 566.)

6 The battle of Dyracilus (L. xvi. p. 327.) This circumstance may justify the situation of Durance, (N. p. 380.) that he was not other than a part of Poitou, of the same language. It properly styled the Duchy or island of France.

7 See the battle of Montebello. Durance discovers his church to be that of St. Denis, or Durox, of Susson, queen duellum inleri (Sed ani inmemo) and nothing more; but invicta reddi, et in Duergundia et fato facillime consistentia cognoscent ad eum. Jahn, Sarbcrdownia, cap. 139.

8 His laudable declamation of their stature and inarticulate name, and indeed there is scarcely at all the name that is now Agneta, to us so dear and familiar to a polished people. I shall select only one example, Egisfrida, f. the count of St. Oler. of Lombardy, and England; and from the distant bogs and mountains of Ireland, the Savages, who were emu-

nated, and savage fanatics, ferocious at home but unwarlike abroad. Had not superstition condemned the sac-     cularigies of depriving the poorest or weakest     christian of the merit of the pilgrimage, the useless     crowd, with mouths but without hands, might have     existed forever, for the whole was that this remoter     companions had opened and secured the way of the Lord.     A small remnant of the pilgrims, who passed the     Bosphorus, was permitted to visit the holy sepulchre.     Their northern constitution was scorched by the rays,     and infected by the vapours, of a Syrian sun. They     crossed that country, with a water and provision:     their numbers exhausted the inland country: the     sea was remote, the Greeks were     unfriendly, and the christians of every sect fled     before the voracious and cruel rapine of their brethren. In     the dire necessity of famine, they sometimes     roasted and devoured the flesh of their infant or adult     captives. Among the Turks and Saracens, the     idolaters of Europe were rendered more odious by the name     and reputation of cannibals: the spies who introduced     themselves into the kitchen of Bohemond were shown     several human bodies turning on the spit: and the     artful     and remorseless betraying of his     companions, by the same time the abhorrence and the terror of the infidels.

Siege of Nice, A.D. 1057, May 11—June 20.

I have expatiated with pleasure on the     first steps of the crusaders, as they     paint the manners and character of Europe; but I shall     abridge the tedious and uniform narrations of the central, which     were performed by strength and are described by     ignorance. From their first station in the neighborhood of Nicomedia, they advanced in successive     divisions; passed the contracted limit of the Greek     empire; opened a road through the hills, and commenced,     by the capture of their pious and tender     companion, the Turkish     sultan. His kingdom of Roum extended from the     Hellespont to the confines of Syria, and     barred the pilgrimage of Jerusalem: his name was     Kilidje-Arslan, or Soliman, 1 of the race of Seljuk, and     the son of the first conqueror; and in the defence of a     land which the Turks considered as their own, he     deserved the praise of his enemies, by whom alone he is     known to posterity. Yielding to the first     impulse of the torrent, he deposited his family and     treasure in Nice; retired to the mountains with fifty     thousand horse, and twice descended to assault the camps     or quarters of the Greeks: but the march of the     wantons, formed by Duke Robert, at the battle of Antioch. (Barbarou, part ii, p. 101.)

1 Valesius Scotorum apud herb. leon. alias imaginum curiosius, (Otho     bosco, lib. iii. cap. v.) dixit, that in barbarous nations,     the most glorious actions were despised and    Hello's, from whence our behelvy, was the movable tower of the     crusaders. (Ducange, tomes ii. & iii, p. 201.)

I cannot forbear remarking the resemblance between the siege     and lake of Nice, with the operations of Herzen Cortez before     Mexico. See Dr. Robertson, &c. in his American, 1. c. 216.

2 Mercantur, a word invented by the French crusaders, and     confided in that language to the present time: it should     well beowen, from whence our behelvy, was the movable tower of the     crusaders. (Ducange, tomes ii. & iii, p. 201.)

He was followed by the celebrated Elizabeth, the bishop of Puy, and the remainder of the sacred army.

Without the fortified castles, and seats of the middle ages,     see     the Chambert, (Antiquities of the Crusaders,) p. 208.

From Guignes, toms ii. p. 31.

2 Barozius has produced a very doubtful letter to his brother        Robert, deceased, at the battle of Dorylaeum, (A.D. 1097, Nov. 14.)     Chaldayen: be it so. The first attack was comento succumbere;     (Latin, &c.) the second to stand. Were Godfrey of Bouillon and Hugh brothers,     Twaddel is styled filius, of whom I certainly not of Roger, nor of     Bohemond.
Without a moment's pause, they formed in new order, and advanced to a second battle. They were received with equal resolution; and, in their common disdain for the unwarlike people of Greece and Asia, it was concluded that the Turks and the Franks were the only nations entitled to the appellation of soldiers. Their encounter was varied and balanced by the contrast of arms and discipline; of the direct charge, and wheeling evolutions; of the couched lance, and the brandished javelin; of a weighty broad-sword, and a crooked saber; of cumbersome armour, and thin flowing robes; and of the long Tartar bow, and the arbalist or cross-bow, a deadly weapon, yet unknown to the orientals. As long as the horses were fresh, and the quivers full, Soliman maintained the advantage of the day; and four thousand christians were pierced by the Turkish arrows. In the evening, swiftness yielded to strength; on either side the numbers were equal, or at least as great as any ground could hold, or any general could manage; but in turning the hills, the last division of Raymond and his pretenders was led, perhaps without design, on the rear of an exhausted enemy; and the long contest was determined. Besides a nameless and unaccountable multitude, three thousand pagan knights were slain in the battle and pursuit; the camp of Soliman was pillaged; and in the variety of precious spoil, the curiosity of the world was satisfied with firearms and appurtenances, and the new aspect of dronedaries and camels. The importance of the victory was proved by the hasty retreat of the sultan: reserving ten thousand guards of the relics of his army, Soliman evacuated the kingdom of his father, and hastened to the aid, and kindle the resentment, of his Eastern brethren. In a March through the lesser Asia, July—September, 1097, a wasted land and deserted towns, without either finding a friend or an enemy. The geography may trace the progress of Antioch of Pisidia, Iconium, Archelais, and Germanicia, and may compare those classic appellations with the modern names of E-kisheh the old city, Aksheh the white city, Cogni, Erkeli, and Marash. As the pilgrims passed over a desert, where a draught of water would have relaxed them for six days by intolerable thirst; and on the banks of the first rivulet, their haste and insensitivity were still more pernicious to the disorderly throng. They climbed with toil and danger the steep and slippery sides of mountains, and many of the soldiery cast away their arms to secure their footsteps; and had not terror preceded their van, the long and trembling file might have been driven down the precipice by a handful of resolute enemies. Two of their most respectable chiefs, the duke of Lorraine and the count of Thoules, were carried in litters; Raymond was raised, as it is said, by miracle, from a hopeless malady; and Godfrey had been torn by a bear, as he pursued that rough and perilous chance in the mountains of Pisidia.

To improve the general consternation, the sultan of Bagdis and the brother of Godfrey were detached from the main army with their respective squadrions of five, and of seven, hundred knights. They overran in a rapid career the hills and sea-coast of Cilicia, from Cogni to the Cyrian gates: the Norman standard was first planted on the walls of Tarsus and Malmistra; but the proud injustice of Baldwin at length provoked the patient and generous Italian; and they turned their arms against him. But the Franks, by their constant and profane quarrel. Honour was the motive, and fame the reward, of Tarcrei; but fortune smiled on the more selfish enterprise of his rival. He was called to the assistance of a Greek or Armenian tyrant, who had been suffered under the Turkish yoke to reign over the christians of Edessa, because of his timely pare of his son and champion; but no sooner was he intro accused into the city, than he inflamed the people to the massacre of his father, occupied the throne and trea plus, extended his conquests over the hills of Armenia and plain of Mesopotamia, assumed the first princepality of the Franks or Latins, which subsisted fifty-four years beyond the Empires.

Before the Franks could enter Syria, the summer, and even the autumn, were completely wasted; the siege of Antioch, and the separation and repose of the army, during the winter season, was strongly debated in their council: the love of arms and the holy sepulchre urged them to advance; and reason perhaps was on the side of resolution, since every hour of delay abates the fame and force of the invader, and multiplies the numbers of his army. The legate of the church, of the Franks, the king of France, the emperor, and the sultan of Syria was protected by the river Orontes; and the iron bridge, of nine arches, derives its name from the massy gates of the two towers which are constructed at either end. They were opened by the sword of the duke of Normandy; his victory gave entrance to three hundred thousand envoys, an accident which may allow some scope for losses and desertion, but which clearly detects much exaggeration in the review of Nice. In the description of Antioch, it is not easy to define a middle term between her ancient magnificence, under the successors of Dogobert Augustus, and the modern aspect of Turkish desolation. The Tetrapolis, or four cities, if they retained their name and position, must have left a large vacancy in a circumference of twelve miles; and that measure, as well as the number of four hundred towers, are not perfectly consistent with the five hundred thousand arms; an accident which, in the siege. Yet Antioch must have still flourished as a great and populous capital. At the head of the Turkish emirs Baggisian, a veteran chief, command in the place: his garrison was composed of six or seven thousand foot; and they were supported by one hundred thousand Moslems: a force is said to have fallen by the sword; and their numbers were probably inferior to the Greeks, Armenians, and Syrians, who had been no more than fourteen years the slaves of the house of Seljuk. From the remains of a solid and stately wall, it appears to have arisen to the height of three score feet in the valleys; and wherever less art and labour had been applied, the ground was supposed to be defended by the river, the morass, and the mountains. Notwithstanding these fortifications, the city had many times been taken by the Turks; and many times by the Greeks, and the Turks: so large a circuit must have yielded many precious points of attack; and in a siege that was formed about the middle of October, the vigour of the execution could alone justify the boldness of the attempt. Whatever strength and valour could peradventure redeem the world was abandoned by the sultan and by the champions of the cross: in the frequent occasions of sallies, of forage, of the attack and defence of convoys, they were often victorious; and we can only complain, that their exploits are sometimes enlarged beyond the scope of public belief. The deaths of the victorious leader and two of his followers, possibly on board a Turk from the shoulder to the haunch; and one half of the infidel fell to the ground, while the other was transported by his horse to the city gate. As Robert of Normandy rode against his antagonist, "I devote thy head," he piously exclaimed, "to the demons of hell," and that head was instantly chopped to the breast by the resistless stroke of his descending falchion. But the reality or report of such gigantic prowess must have taught the Moslems to keep within their walls; and against those walls of earth or stone, the sword and the lance were unavailing weapons. In the beggary of half a dozen able-bodied men who had been used to the life of soldiers were supine and ignorant, without skill to contrive, or money to purchase, or industry to use, the artificial engines and implements of assault. In the conquest of Nice, they had been powerfully assisted by the wealth and knowledge of the Greek emperor: his absence was poorly supplied by some Genoese and Pisan vessels, which were attracted by religion or trade to the coast of Syria: the stores were scanty, the return precarious, and the communication difficult and dangerous. Indolence or weakness had prevented the Franks from investing the entire circuit; and the perpetual fear of Robin Hood and his men incited the Moslems to the garrison of the city. At the end of seven months, after the ruin of their cavalry, and an enormous loss by famine, death, and fatigue, the progress of the Crusaders was imperceptible, and their success remote, if the expedition was not abandoned. The Sultan Ultaghas, the crafty and ambitious Bohemond, had not employed the arms of cunning and deceit. The Christians of Antioch were numerous and disconcerted; Phirouz, a Syrian renegade, had acquired the favour of the emir and the command of three towers; and the merit of his repentance disguised to the Latins. The garrison of the city were at length exorted to leave the garrison and treason. A secret correspondence, for their mutual interest, was soon established between Phirouz and the prince of Taranto; and Bohemond declared in the council of the chiefs, that he could deliver the city into their hands. But he claimed the sovereignty of Antioch as the reward of his service; and the proposition, which had been rejected by the enemy, was at length extorted from the distress of his equals. The nocturnal surprise was executed by the French and Norman princes, who ascended in person the scaling-ladders that were thrown from the walls: their new prolate, and the guides to the camp, were reviewed, and introduced the servants of Christ, the army rushed through the gates; and the Moslems soon found, that, although mercy was hopeless, resistance was impossible. But the citadel still refused to surrender; and the victors themselves were speedily encompassed and besieged by the innumerable forces of Kerboga, prince of Mosul, who, with twenty-eight Turkish emirs, advanced to the delivery of Antioch. Five and twenty days the Christians spent on the verge of destruction; and the proud lieutenant of the caliph and the sultan of the world had only the choice of battle or death. In this extremity they collected the relics of their strength, sailed from the town, and in a single memorable day annihilated or dispersed the host of Turks and Arabs, which they might safely report to have consisted of six hundred thousand men, their supernatural allies I shall proceed to consider: the human and celestial powers which the victory of Antioch bore the fear of despair of the Franks; and the surprise, the discord, perhaps the errors, of their unskillful and presumptuous adversaries. The battle is described with as much disorder as it was fought; but we may observe the tents of Kerboga, a movable and spacious palace, enriched with the luxury of Asia, and capable of holding above two thousand persons; we may distinguish his three thousand guards, who were cased, the horses as well as the men, in complete steel.

\[1\] Veramonten dicunt se esse Francorum generatione: et una multa debet esse, miles et Ferronici (des Francorum, p. 7.)

\[2\] Balista, Baliste, Arbaliste. See Marotus, Antioch, tom. ii. p. 288—322. Ducas, (De et La, tom. i. p. 521.) The time of Anna Comnena, this weapon, which she speaks with the name of Thang recurric, was unknown in the east. (L. x. p. 291.) By a human inconstancy, the pope strange to prohibit its christian use, was the only weapon of ancient warfare. (Rollin,Hist. des Huns, i. p. 109.)

\[3\] The curious reader may compare the classic learning of Callierges, and the geographical science of Flaviothe, William of Tyre, the only historian of the crusades who has any knowledge of antiquity, and M. Oertl found almost in the footsteps of the Franks from Constantinople to Antioch, (Voyage en Turquie et en Fere, tom. i. p. 55—56.)

In the eventful period of the siege and their famine, the defence of Antioch, the crusaders were alternately exalted by victory or sunk in despair; either swelled with plenty or ensnared with hunger. A speculative reasoner might suppose, that their faith had a strong and serious influence on their practice; and that the soldiers of the cross, the deliverers of the holy sepulchre, prepared themselves by a sober and virtuous life for the daily contemplation of martyrdom. Experience shows us this charitable illusion: and seldom does the history of profane war display such scenes of intemperance and prostitution as were exhibited under the walls of Antioch. The grove of Daphne no longer flourished; but the Syrian garrison was still inviolate, and the priests of the gods were still offered, as they were before, to evangeologic purity. In the first days of the siege and the possession of Antioch, the Franks consumed with wanton and thoughtless prodigality the frugal subsistence of weeks and months: the desolate country no longer yielded a supply; and from that country they were prevented by the advance of the Turks. Disease, the faithful companion of want, was evanished by the rains of the winter, the summer heats, unwholesome food, and the close imprisonment of multitudes. The pictures of famine and pestilence are always the same, and always disastrous: and our imagination may reduce the nature of their sufferings and their resources. The remains of treasure or spoil were eagerly invidious in the purchase of the vilest nourishment; and dreadful must have been the calamities of the poor, since, after paying three marks of silver for a goat and fifteen for a lean camel, the counting of N. Flanders was reviewed, and Crispin Godfrey to borrow a horse. Sixty thousand horses had been reviewed in the camp: before the end of the siege they were diminished to two thousand, and scarcely two hundred fit for service could be mustered on the day of battle. Weakness of body and terror of mind extinguished the ardent enthusiasm of the pilgrims; and every motive of honour and religion was subdued by the desire of life. Among the chiefs, three heroes

Abelaphazaris adds the haughty reply of Callabas, or Kerboga; "Non possum etiam per gradum." (Byasst, p. 312.)

1 In describing the host of Kerboga, most of the Latin historians, the author of the Gesta, (c. 17.) Robert Monachus, (c. 50.) Balderic, (p. 111.) Fulcherus Cambrensis, (p. 399.) Guibert, (p. 512.) William de Tyre, (L. V. c. 3, p. 715.) Bernard Thesaurarius, (L. V. c. 5, p. 695.) have content with the vague expressions of infinite multitude, immense army, immense company of men, which correspond with the mere examples of annihilation.

2 See the tragic and scandalous fate of an archdeacon of royal birth, who was slain by the Turks as he reaped in an orchard, playing at dice with a Syrian companion.

3 The value of an ass in silver (fifteen shillings) at Churms was to two marks, (four pounds) and afterwards much higher: a kid or lamb, from one shilling in our present money; in the second famine, a loaf of bread, or the head of an animal, sold for a piece of gold. Many examples might be produced that would show how, by the extravagant folly, not the distractions of the infatuation of the prince, the populace, the clergy, a race of the phil-
The church-doors were barred against the impetuous multitude. The ground was opened in the appointed place; but the workmen, who relieved each other, dug to the depth of twelve feet without discovering the subject of their search. In the evening, when Count Raymond had withdrawn to his post, and the weary assistants began to murmur, Bartholomew, in his shirt, and without his shoes, boldly descended into the pit; the darkness of the hour and of the place enabled him to overcome the man of valor and strength. The first sound, the first gleam, of the steel was saluted with a devout rapture. The holy lance was drawn from its recess, wrapt in a veil of silk and gold, and exposed to the veneration of the crusaders; their anxious suspense burst forth in a general shout of joy and hope, and the desperate troops were again inspired with the enthusiasm of valor. Whatever had been the arts, and whatever might be the sentiments, of the chiefs, they skillfully improved this fortunate revelation by every aid that discipline and devotion could afford.

The soldiers were dismissed to their quarters with an injunction to prepare for the approaching conflict, freely to bestow their last pittance on themselves and their horses, and to expect with the dawn of day the signal of victory. On the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, the gates of Antioch were thrown open to the multitude; and the Holy Lance was marshalled in twelve divisions, in honour of the twelve apostles; and the holy lance, in the absence of Raymond, was intrusted to the hands of his chaplain. The influence of this relic or trophy was felt by the soldiers, and perhaps by the enemies, of Christ; and its potent energy was heightened by an accident, a stratagem, or a rumour, of a miraculous complexion.

Three knights, in white garments and celestial war-trappings, had observed the excitement of the populace; and they hastened to issue, from the hills: the voice of Adhemar, the pope's legate, proclaimed them as the martyrs St. George, St. Theodore, and St. Mauritius; the tumult of battle allowed no time for doubt or scrutiny; and the welcome apparition dazzled the eyes of the imagination of a fanatic army. In the season of danger and triumph, the revelation of Bartholomew of Marseilles was unanimously asserted; but as soon as the temporary service was accomplished, the personal dignity and liberal aims which the count of Thoulouse derived from this event, and the reputation of his chaplain, and awakened the reason of his rivals. A Norman cleric presumed to sift, with a philosophic spirit, the truth of the legend, the circumstances of the discovery, and the character of the prophet; and the pupils Bohemond ascribed their deliverance to the merits and intervention of Christ alone. For a while, the Provincials defended their national palladium with clamours and arms; and new visions condemned to death and hell the profane sceptics, who presumed to scrutinize the truth and merit of the discovery. The prevalence of incredulity compelled the author to subdue the spirit of impatience and veracity to the judgment of God. A pile of dry faggots, four feet high, and fourteen long, was erected in the midst of the camp; the flames burnt fiercely to the elevation of thirty cubits; and a narrow path of twelve inches was left for the perilous trial. The unfortunate priest of Marseilles traversed the fire with dexterity and speed; but his thighs and belly were scorched by the intense heat; he expired the next day; and the logic of believing minds will pay some regard to his dying protestations of innocence and truth. Some miracles were afterwards wrought by the Provincials, to substitute a cross, a ring, or a tabernacle, in the place of the holy lance, which soon vanished in contempt and oblivion.

The decline and fall. Chap. xix.

may be found without fear or reproach: Godfrey of Bouillon was supported by his magnificent piety; Bohemond by ambition and interest; and Tancred declared, in the true spirit of chivalry, that as long as he wore the head of forty knights, he would never relinquish the enterprise of Palestine. But the count of Thoulouse and Provence was suspected of a voluntary indisposition: the duke of Normandy was recalled from the sea-shore by the censure of the church; Hugh the Great, though he left his own men on the banks of the battle, embraced an ambiguous opportunity of returning to France; and Stephen count of Chartres basely deserted the standard which he bore, and the council in which he presided. The soldiers were discouraged by the flight of William viscount of Melun, summoned the Hermit, from the weighty strokes of his axe; and the saints were scandalised by the fall of Peter the Hermit, who, after anthing Europe against Asia, attempted to escape from the penance of a necessary fast. Of the multitude of recrue warrior, the names (says an historian) are blotted from the book of life; and other free friars, who made a show of being pastors for the deserters who dropped in the night from the walls of Antioch. The emperor Alexius, who seemed to advance to the succour of the Latins, was dismayed by the assurance of their hopeless condition. The choice of their fate in silence; nay, many of the punishments were tried without effect; and to rouse the soldiers to the defence of the walls, it was found necessary to set fire to their quarters.

Legend of the holy lance. For their salvation and victory, they were indebted to the same finalism which had led them to the brink of ruin. In such a cause, and in such an army, visions, prophecies, and miracles, were frequent and familiar. In the distress of Antioch, they were repeated with unusual energy and success; St. Ambrose had assured a pious ecclesiastic, that the omission of the trial would be the signal of deliverance and grace; the deserters were stopped by the presence and reproaches of Christ himself; the dead had promised to arise and combat with their brethren; the Virgin had obtained the pardon of their sins; and their confidence was revived by a visible sign, the seasonable and splendid discovery of the holy lance. The policy of their chiefs has on this occasion been admired, and might surely be excused; but a pious fraud is seldom produced by the cold conspiracy of many persons; and a voluntary impostor must have been the author of the wish and the credulity of the people. Of the diocese of Marseilles, there was a priest of low cunning and loose manners, and his name was Peter Bartholomew. He presented himself at the door of the council-chamber, to disclose an apparition of St. Andrew, which had been thrice reiterated in his sleep, with a dreadful menace, if he presumed to suppress the commands of heaven. "At Antioch," said the apostle, "in the church of my brother St. Peter, near the high altar, is concealed the steel head of the lance that pierced the side of our Redeemer: its merits, however, if temporal, salvation, will be manifested to his disciples. Search and ye shall find: bear it aloft in battle; and that mystic weapon shall penetrate the souls of the miscreants." The pope's legate, the bishop of Puy, affected to listen with coldness and distrust; but the revelation was eagerly accepted by Count Ray- mond, whom his faithful subject, in the name of the apostle, had chosen for the guardian of the holy lance. The experiment was resolved; and on the third day, after a due preparation of prayer and fasting, the priests of Marseilles, with a prodigy of trusty spectators, among whom were the count and his chaplain; and Guibert (p. 343. 232.), attempts to excuse Hugh the Great, and even Stephen of Chartres.

See the progress of the crusade, the retreat of Alexis, the victory of Antioch, and the conquest of Jerusalem, in the Alzirek, l. ii. p. 317.—357. Anna is so prone to exaggeration, that she magnifies the exploits of the Latins.
Yet the revelation of Antioch is gravely assailed by succeeding historians; and such is the press of credulity, that miracles, most doubtful on the spot and at the moment, will be received with implicit faith at a convenient distance of time and space.

The prudence or fortune of the Franks and Turks had delayed their invasion till the decline of civil liberty and luxury. The policy of the three first sultans, the kingdoms of Asia were united in peace and justice; and the innumerable armies which they led in person were equal in courage, and superior in discipline, to the barbarians of the west. But at the time of the crusade, the humbler spirit of the last was consummated. A French king had been crowned by the Greek patriarch, and his private ambition was insensible of the public danger; and, in the vicissitudes of their fortune, the royal vassals were ignorant, or regardless, of the true object of their allegiance. The twenty-eight emirs who marched with the standard of Kerboga, were his rivals or enemies; their heavy levies were drawn from the towns and tents of Mesopotamia and Syria; and the Turkish veterans were employed or consumed in the civil wars beyond the Tigris. The caliph of Egypt embraced this opportunity of weakness and discord, to recover his ancient possessions; and in this enterprise was engaged Tancred of Tarentum. The Turks expelled the children of Ortok, and restored in Palestine the civil and ecclesiastical authority of the Fatimites. They heard with astonishment of the vast armies of Christians that had passed from Europe to Asia and rejoiced in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, which broke the power of the Turks, the adversaries of their sect and monarchy. But the same Christians were the enemies of the prophet; and from the overthrow of Nice and Antioch, the motive of their enterprise, which was gradually understood, would urge them for their war. The crusaders were liberal with their money, and the Nile. An intercourse of epistles and embassies, which rose and fell with the events of the war, was maintained between the throne of Cairo and the camp of the Latins; and their adverse pride was the result of ignorance and enthusiasm. The emirs of Egypt heard in a darkened, or insinuated in a milder, tone, that their sovereign, the true and lawful commander of the faithful, had rescued Jerusalem from the Turkish yoke; and that if the pilgrims, who were their opponents, were to be distinguished by the belief of their lost condition, the caliph Mostai despised their arms and imprisoned their deputies; the conquest and victory of Antioch prompted him to solicit those formidable champions with gifts of horses and silk robes, of vases, and purses of gold and silver; and in his estimate of their merit or power, the first place was assigned to Bohemond, and the second to Godfrey. In either fortune the answer of the crusaders was firm and uniform; they disdained to inquire into the private claims or possessions of the followers of Mahomet: whatsoever was his name or nation, the crusaders allowed them to be their enemies and instead of prescribing the mode and terms of their pilgrimage, it was only by a timely surrender of the city and province, their sacred right, that he could preserve their alliance, or deprive their impending and irresistible attack.1

Yet this attack, when they were within a delay of the view and reach of their glorious prize, was suspended above ten months after the defeat of Kerboga. The zeal and courage of the crusaders were chilled in the moment of victory; and instead of marching to improve the constellation, they hastily dispersed to the pursuit of the luxury of Syria. The causes of this strange delay may be found in the want of strength and subsistence. In the painful and various service of Antioch, the cavalry was annihilated; many thousands of every rank had been lost by famine, sickness, and desertion: the same abuse of plenty had been productive of the destruction of a third of the army. The consumption of the temperance and distress had generated a pestilence, which swept away above fifty thousand of the pilgrims. Few were able to command, and none were willing to obey: the domestic feuds, which had been stilled by common fear, were again renewed in acts, or at least in sentiments, of hostility; the fortune of Baldwin and Bohemond excited the envy of their companions; the bravest knights were enlisted for the defence of their new principalities; and count Raymond exhausted his troops and treasures in an idle expedition into the heart of Syria. The armies were dispersed in discord and disorder; a sense of honour and religion was rekindled in the spring; and the private soldiers, less susceptible of ambition and jealousy, awakened with angry clamours the indolence of their chiefs. In the month of May, the relics of their march to Jerusalem were proceeded from the city of Antioch to Laodicea; about forty thousand. A.D. 1099. The Latins, of whom no more than fifteen hundred horse, and twenty thousand foot, were capable of immediate service. Their easy march was continued between mount Ibalbus and the seashore; their camps were liberally supplied, and they were selected on the heights of Genoa and Pisa; and they drew large contributions from the emirs of Tripoli, Tyre, Sidon, Acre, and Caesarea, who granted a free passage, and promised to follow the example of Jerusalem. From Caesarea they advanced into the midland country; their clerks recognized the sacred geography of Lydda, Ramla, Emaus, and Bethlem, and as soon as they descried the holy city, the crusaders forgot their toils and claimed their reward.2

Jerusalem has derived some reputation from the number of memorable sieges of the city. Of those memorable sieges. It was not till after a long and obstinate contest that Babylon June 7-July 8, and Rome could prevail against the obstinacy of the people, the eaggly ground that might supersede the necessity of fortiifications, and the walls and towers that would have fortified the most accessible plain.3 These obstacles were diminished in the age of the crusades. The bulwarks had been completely destroyed and imperiously restored: the Jews, their nation, and worship, were forever banished; but nature is less changeable than man, and the site of Jerusalem, though somewhat softened and somewhat removed, was still strong against the assaults of an enemy. By the experience of a recent siege, and a three years' possession, the Saracens of Egypt had been taught to discern, and in some degree to remedy, the defects of a place, which relish but ill without a fortification of the city. The winter was completed, and according to Gen. vi. 13, the Hebrews, and according to Jer. v. 15, ‘they that were at Bashan’, were disposed to resign. Aladin, or Ishkai, the caliph's lieutenant, was intrusted with the defence; his policy strove to restrain the native Christians by the dread of their own ruin and that of the holy sepulchre; to animate the

1 The two antagonists who express the most intimate knowledge and the strongest conviction of the miracle, and of the facts, are Raymon of Arles, and Raschid al-Din of Persia. 2 See M. de Guignes, t. ii. p. 235, &c. 3 The articles of Barthunus, Mohaniel, Samguris, in D. Herbelot. 4 See M. de Guignes, t. ii. p. 235, &c. 5 See Mr. de Guignes, t. ii. p. 235, &c. 6 See M. de Guignes, t. ii. p. 235, &c. 7 See Mr. de Guignes, t. ii. p. 235, &c. 8 See Mr. de Guignes, t. ii. p. 235, &c.
Moslems by the assurance of temporal and eternal rewards. His warriors was said to have consisted of forty thousand Turks and Arabians; and if he could muster twenty thousand of the inhabitants, it must be confessed that the besieged were more numerous than the besieging army. Had the diminished strength and numbers of the Latins allowed them to grasp the whole circumference of four thousand yards, (above two English miles and a half,) to what useful purpose should they have descended into the valley of Ben Himmon and torrent of Cedron, or approached the precipices of the south and east, from whence they had nothing either to hope or fear? Their siege was most of the time directed against the western sides of the city. Godfrey of Bouillon erected his standard on the first swell of mount Calvary; to the left, as far as St. Stephen's gate, the line of attack was continued by Tancred and the two Roberts; and count Raymond established his quarters from the citadel to the foot of mount Siron, which was no longer included within the precincts of the city. On the fifth day, the crusaders made a general assault, in the fanatic hope of battering down the walls without engines, and of scaling them without ladders. By the dint of brute force, they forced the first breach; but they were driven back with shame and slaughter to the camp: the influence of vision and prophecy was deadened by the too frequent abuse of those pieces stragglers; and time and labour were found to be the only means of victory. The siege was speedily fulfilled in forty days, but they were forty days of calamity and anguish. A repetition of the old complaint of famine may be imputed in some degree to the voracious or disorderly appetite of the Franks; but the stony soil of Jerusalem is almost destitute of water; the scanty springs and hasty torrents were dried up in the summer season; nor was the thirst of the besiegers relieved, as in the city, by the artificial supply of cisterns and aqueducts. The circumjacent country is equally destitute of trees for the uses of shade or building; but some large beeches were discovered in a cave by the crusaders; a wood near Sichem, the enchanted grove of Tasso, was cut down: the necessary timber was transported to the camp by the vigorous and dexterity of Tancred: and the engines were framed by some Genoese artists, who had fortunately landed in the harbour of Jaffa; and which the Latins purchased at a fabulously expensive, and in the stations of the duke of Loraine, and the count of Thoulouse, and rolled forwards with devout labour, not to the most accessible, but to the most neglected, parts of the fortification. Raymond's tower was reduced to ashes by the fire of the besieging army, but his colleague was more vigilant and successful: the enemies were driven by his archers from the rampart; the drawbridge was let down; and on a Friday at three in the afternoon, the day and hour of the Passion, Godfrey of Bouillon stood victorious on the walls of Jerusalem. His example was followed in every side by the emulation of valour; and about four hundred and sixty years after the conquest of Omar, the holy city was rescued from the Mahometan yoke. In the pillage of public and private wealth, the adventurers had agreed to respect the exclusive property of the first occupant; and the spoils of the great mosque, seventy lamps and massive vases of gold and silver, with a hundred thousand pieces of silver, were seized in the house of the Grand Vizier, and brought to the gates of Tancred. A bloody sacrifice was offered by his mistaken votaries to the God of the christians; resistance might provoke, but neither age nor sex could mollify, their implacable rage: they indulged themselves three days in a promiscuous massacre; and the massacre of the inhabitants of Jerusalem is supposed to have been a very epidemic disease. After seventy thousand Moslems had been put to the sword, and the harmless Jews had been burnt in their synagogue, they could still reserve a multitude of captives, whom interest or lassitude persuaded them to spare. Of these savage heroes of the Cross, Tancred alone betrayed some sentiments of compassion; yet we may praise the more selfish levity of Raymond, who granted a capitulation and safe-conduct to the garrison of the citadel. The holy sepulchre was now free; and their bloody victors prepared to go back to their native countries. Raymond, surrounded by contrite hearts, and in a humbled posture, they ascended the hill of Cavalry, amidst the loud anthems of the clergy; kissed the stone which had covered the Saviour of the world; and bedewed with tears of joy and penitence the monument of their redemption. This event, which was so long agitated and most tenderly displayed, has been variously considered by two philosophers; by the one, as easy and natural; and by the other, as absurd and incredible. Perhaps it is too rigorously applied to the same persons and the same hour: the example of the victorious, the splendour of the pious companions; while they cleansed their minds, they purified their minds; nor shall I believe that the most ardent in slaughter and rapine were the foremost in the procession to the sepulchre.

Eight days after this memorable event, which pope Urban did not live to see, the Latin chiefs proceeded to the election of a king, to guard and govern their conquests in Palestine. Hugh the Great, and Stephen of Chartres, had required what the victors of Jaffa, the Vexillifer of Jerusalem, or any other leader, who strove to gain by a second crusade an honourable death. Baldwin was established at Edessa, and Bohemond at Antioch; and two Roberts, the duke of Normandy, and the count of Flanders, preferred their fair inheritance in the west to a doubtful competition or a barren sceptre. The jealousy and ambition of Raymond were condemned by his own followers, and the free, the just, the unanimous voice of the army, proclaimed Godfrey of Bouillon the first and most worthy of the champions of christendom. His magnanimity accepted a trust as full of danger as of glory; he entered Jerusalem where his Saviour had been crowned with thorns, the devout pilgrim rejected the name and insignia of royalty; and the founder of the kingdom of Jerusalem contented himself with the modest title of Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre. His Election and

---

* The Ileicity of Voltaire is balanced with some sense and exposition by the French author of the Esprit des Crusades, (tom. iv. p. 365—382.) He observes, indeed, that, according to the ancient historians, the inhabitants of Jerusalem must have exceeded 200,000; that in the year of Titus, Josephus collects 1,200,000 Jews; that they were stated by Tacitus himself at 60,000; and that the largest calculation, that its circumference was 40,000, must still leave them more numerous than the modern army.

* Maunrelli, who diligently perambulated the walls, found a circuit of 4200 yards, or 3 miles and 114 chains, (a fact,) from an authentic plan, D'Anville concludes a measure nearly similar, of 1690 French fathoms, (p. 23—25,) in its scarce and valuable tract. For the tombs of the kings and warriors, see Reland, op. cit. tom. ii. In the second book of the Dead Sea, Judea, and Arabia, (D'Anville, p. 15—21.) It was of little consequence to compare the power of David, with the history of Hume, in his History of England, vol. i. p. 311, 321, octavo edition.

* Voltaire, in his Essai sur l'Histoire Generale, tom. ii. c. 34. 345, 346. 347. He speaks of the English ascribe to Robert of Normandy, and the Provincials to Raymond of Thoulouse, the glory of refusing the crown; but the fact is the reverse: In the Histories of Thibbon, of which the whole has been translated, and revised (Villhardouin, No. 130,) of the count of St. Gilles. He died at the siege of Tripoli, which was pressed by his descend-
The king of Jerusalem.

Without this indulgence, the conquerors might have almost been stripped of their kingdom, which consisted only of Jerusalem and Jaffa, with about twenty villages and towns of the adjacent country. Within this narrow verge, the Mahometans were still lodged in some inaccessible spots, and many traders, and the pilgrims, were exposed to daily and domestic hostility. By the arms of Godfrey himself, and the two Baldwin, his brother and cousin, who succeeded to the throne, the Latins breasted with more ease and safety; and at length they equalled, in the extent of their dominions, though not in the millions of their subjects, the ancient princes of Judah and Israel.

After the reduction of the maritime cities of Acre, Tripoli, and Ascalon, the Latins were enabled by the fleets of Venice, Genoa, and Pisa, and even of Flanders and Norway, to range the coast from Scanderoon to the borders of Egypt was possessed by the christians. If the prince of Antioch disclaimed his supremacy, the counts of Edessa and Tripoli owned themselves the vassals of the king of Jerusalem; the Saracens reigned beyond the Euphrates; and the four cities of Homs, Hamah, Damascus, and Aleppo, were the only relics of the Mahometan conquests in Syria.

The laws and language, the manners and titles, of the French nation and Latin church, were introduced into these transmarine colonies.

According to their feudal laws, in which the principal states and subordinate baronies, descended in the line of male and female succession; but the children of the first conquerors, a motley and degenerate race, were dissolved by the luxury of the climate; the arrival of new crusaders from Europe was a doubtful hope. The sickness and feather-footedness of Saracens, supplied by the churches and cities; and the whole legal nullity of the kingdom could not exceed eleven thousand men, a slender defence against the surrounding multitudes of Saracens and Turks.

But the first great work of Jerusalem was the founding of the knighthood of the hospital of St. John, or of the temple of Solomon; on the strange association of a monastic and military life, which fanaticism might suggest, but which policy must approve. The flower of the nobility... ity of Europe aspired to wear the cross, and to profess the vows, of these respectable orders; their spirit and discipline were immortal; and the speedy donation of twenty-eight thousand farms, or manors, enabled the first order of military and religious infantry for the defence of Palestine. The austerity of the convent soon evaporated in the exercise of arms; the world was scandalized by the pride, avarice, and corruption, of these Christian soldiers; their claims of immunity and jurisdiction disturbed the harmony of the Holy Land, and the attempts of the court were engaged by their jealous emulation. But in their most dissolve period, the knights of the hospital and temple maintained their fearless and fanatic character; they neglected to live, but they were prepared to die. In 1312, the order of the Temple, the parent and off-spring of the crusades, has been transplanting from this institution by the holy sepulchre to the isle of Malta.\footnote{Asiile of Jerusalem.}

The spirit of freedom, which pervades the feudal institutions, was felt in its greater vigor by the volunteers of the cross, who elected for their chief the most deserving of his peers. Amidst the slaves of Asia, unconscious of the lesson or example, a model of political liberty was introduced: and the laws of the French kingdom are derived from the purest source of equality and justice. The first and fundamental condition is the assent of those, whose obedience they require, and for whose benefit they are designed. No sooner had Godfrey of Bouillon accepted the office of supreme magistrate, than he solicited the public and private advice of the Latin pilgrims, who were the best judges of the state and extension of Europe. From these materials, with the counsel and approbation of the patriarch and barons, of the clergy and laity, Godfrey composed the \textit{Asiile of Jerusalem,}\footnote{\textit{A. D. 1098.}} a precious monument of feudal jurisprudence. The new kingdom was governed by the seals of the patriarch, and the viscount of Jerusalem, was deposited in the holy sepulchre, enriched with the improvements of succeeding times, and respectfully consulted as often as any doubtful question arose in the tribunals of Palestine. The subsequent books pursue their emigration to Rhodes and Malta.

The Templars, in the old law French, were printed with the term de Temps, the abridgment of the word de Tempore, which was the vulgar expression of the word \textit{Assis,} (c. 24.) Yet Jerusalem capitulated with Saladin at the queen and the principal barons suffered death or captivity; and a scale of prices was fixed and a private could not pretend the services of the conquerors. \textit{It is true,} says the author, \textit{this is not an official copy.\footnote{Holy Sepulchre.}}

\textit{A law of the old kingdom of France,} which makes it impossible to expound and authenticate the internal customary customs of the French in Palestine.

\textit{The letters of Tiberiu of Tiberiu of Jerusalem, to the emperor of king Amurant.} (A. D. 1095--1096,) that he would commit his knowledge to writing, and the rules of the order de Tempore, c. 24, c. 25. In this letter, he mentions, in the name of the house of Jerusalem, and appeals to the bishops that he was a companion of the holy sepulchre, and that he had been at the house of God. (c. 26.)

\textit{The charter of the order of Jerusalem.} (A. D. 1192) to the emperor of king Amurant, c. 26, that he would commit his knowledge to writing, and the rules of the order de Tempore, c. 24, c. 25. In this letter, he mentions, in the name of the house of Jerusalem, and appeals to the bishops that he was a companion of the holy sepulchre, and that he had been at the house of God. (c. 26.)

\textit{The charter of the order of Jerusalem.} (A. D. 1192) to the emperor of king Amurant, c. 26, that he would commit his knowledge to writing, and the rules of the order de Tempore, c. 24, c. 25. In this letter, he mentions, in the name of the house of Jerusalem, and appeals to the bishops that he was a companion of the holy sepulchre, and that he had been at the house of God. (c. 26.)

\textit{The charter of the order of Jerusalem.} (A. D. 1192) to the emperor of king Amurant, c. 26, that he would commit his knowledge to writing, and the rules of the order de Tempore, c. 24, c. 25. In this letter, he mentions, in the name of the house of Jerusalem, and appeals to the bishops that he was a companion of the holy sepulchre, and that he had been at the house of God. (c. 26.)

\textit{The charter of the order of Jerusalem.} (A. D. 1192) to the emperor of king Amurant, c. 26, that he would commit his knowledge to writing, and the rules of the order de Tempore, c. 24, c. 25. In this letter, he mentions, in the name of the house of Jerusalem, and appeals to the bishops that he was a companion of the holy sepulchre, and that he had been at the house of God. (c. 26.)

The justice and freedom of the constitution were maintained by two tribunals Court of peers, of unequal dignity, which were instituted by Godfrey of Bouillon after the conquest of Jerusalem. The king, in pursuance of the superior court, the court of the barons. Of these the four most conspicuous were the prince of Galilee, the lord of Sidon and Caesarea, and the counts of Jaffa and Tripoli, who, perhaps, with the constable and marshal, were in a special manner the complem and judges of each other. But the civil and criminal causes of the nobles, by infe-} an injury; and the judicial combat was fought on the same principle, and with the same spirit, as a private duel. Charles retired to the land of his adoption, and his action is still unimpaired or past the age of sixty. The consequence of a defeat was death to the person accused, or to the champion or witness, as well as to the accuser himself; but in civil cases, the demandant was punished with infamy and the loss of his suit, while his wrongs and chagrin suffered an ignominious judgment. In many cases, it was in the opinion of the judge to award or to refuse the combat: but two are specified, in which it was the inevitable result of the challenge; if a faithful vassal gave the lie to his compeer, who unjustly claimed any portion of his lord's domaines; or if an unknown compeer presumed to impeach the judgment and veracity of the court. He might impeach them, but the terms were severe and perilous: in the same day he successively fought all the members of the tribunal, even those who had been absent: a single defeat was followed by death and infamy; and where none could hope for victory, it is highly probable that none would adventure the trial. In the Assise of Jerusalem, the legal subtilty of the court of Jaffa is more laudably employed to elude, than to facilitate, the judicial combat, which he derives from a principle of honour rather than of superstition.

Court of barons. Among the causes which enfranchised the plebeians from the yoke of feudal tyranny, the institution of cities and corporations is one of the most powerful; and if those of Palestine are coeval with the first crusade, they may be ranked with the most ancient of the Latin world. Many of the pilgrims had escaped from their lords under the banner of the cross; and it was the policy of the French princes to tempt their stay by the assurance of the rights and privileges of freedom. It is expressly declared in the Assise of Jerusalem, that after insinuating, for his knights and barons, the court of peers, in which he presided himself, Godfrey of Bouillon established a second tribunal, in which his person was represented by his viscount. The jurisdiction of this inferior court extended over the burgesses of the kingdom; and it was composed of a select number of the most discreet and worthy citizens, who were sworn to judge, according to the power of the justices and fortunes of their epifides. In the conquest and settlement of new cities, the example of Jerusalem was imitated by the kings and their great vassals; and above thirty similar corporations were founded before the loss of the Holy Land. Another class of subjects, the Syrians, or oriental Christians, were oppressed by the zeal of the clergy, and protected by the toleration of the state. Godfrey listened to their reasonable prayer, that they might be judged by their own national laws. A third court was instituted for their use, of limited and domestic jurisdiction: the sworn members were Syrians, in blood, language, and religion; but the office of the president (in Arabic, of the rain) was sometimes exercised by the viscount of the city. At an immeasurable distance below the nobles, the burgesses, and the strangers, the Assise of Jerusalem condescends to mention the serfs and slaves. They were not affected by the captives of war, who were almost equally considered as the objects of property. The relief or protection of these unhappy men was not esteemed worthy of the care of the legislator; but he diligently provides for the recovery, the protection, and indemnity of the fugitives. Like hounds, or hawks, who had strayed from the lawful owner, they might be lost and claimed: the slave and falcon were of the same value; but three slaves, or twelve oxen, were accumulated to equal the price of the war-horse; and the sum of three hundred pieces of gold was fixed, in the age of chivalry, as the equivalent of the more noble animal.a CHAPTER XX.

Preservation of the Greek empire.— Numbers, passage, and event, of the second and third crusades.— Mt. Bernard.— Reign of Saladin in Egypt and Syria.— His conquest of Jerusalem.— Naval crusades.— Richard the first of England.— Pope Innocent the third, and the fourth and fifth crusades.— The emperor Frederic the second.— Louis the ninth of France, and the two lost crusades.— Expulsion of the Latins or Franks by the Moslembs.

In a style less grave than that of history, I should perhaps compare the em- peror Alexis to the jackall, who is A. 1105—1118. the jackal, and which he had to follow the heels of我国的 leaving of the lion. What ver had been his fears and trials in the passage of the first crusade, they were amply recom- pensed by the subsequent benefits which he derived from the exploits of the Franks. His dexterity and vigilance secured their first conquest of Nice; and from this threatening station the Turks were compelled to evacuate the neighbourhood of Constantinople. While the crusaders, with blinding valor, advanced into the midland countries of Asia, the crafty Greek improved the favourable occasion when the emirs of the sea-coast were recalled to the standard of the sultan. The Turks extinguished the states of Rhodes and Cilicia; the cities of Ephesus and Smyrna, of Narth, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, were restored to the em- peror, which Alexis charaged from the Hellespont to the banks of the Maeander, and the rocky shores of Pamphylia. The churches resumed their splendour; the towns were rebuilt and fortified; and the desert country was peopled with colonies of Christians, who were gently removed from the more distant and dangerous frontier. In these paternal cares, we may for- give Alexis, if he forgot the deliverance of the holy sepulchre; but, by the Latins, he was stigmatized with the eternal reproach of treason and desertion. They had sworn fidelity and obedience to his throne; but he had promised to assist their enterprise in person, or at least, with his troops and treasures: his base retreat dissolved their obligations; and the sword, which had been the instrument of their victory, was the pledge and title of their just independence. It does not ap- pear that the emperor attempted to revive his obsolete claims over the kingdom of Jerusalem; b but the bor- deys of Cilicin and Syria were more recent in his pos- session, and more accessible to his arms. The great army of the crusaders was annihilated or dispersed; the principality of Antioch was left without a head, by the surprise and captivity of Bohemond: his ransom had oppressed him with a heavy debt; and his Nora See the Assises de Jerusalem, (319, 311, 312.) These laws were enacted, as late as the year 1350, in the kingdom of Cyprus. In the sixth and seventh centuries, I endeavored to collect a complete and ex- tensive canon of the history of this country, (of his Book of Account,) that the price of a wolfhound was no less extravagant in the court of his Byzantine sovereigns. The King of Cyprus, the Duke of Brabant, and many other noble barons, have contributed with similar magnificence to the foundation and cultivation of the Order of the Knights of St. John (Knights of Jerusalem), of which the Prince of Angoulême was the Grand Master. The Duke of Brabant granted to it an annual sum of 500 l. (Cabinet des Rév., p. 312.) For the anno- tation, and the spirit of this kind of valiant and benevolent associated with the passion of chivalry, see (p. 181.)

b Anna Comnena relates her father's conquests in Asia Minor, Alexiad, l. xii. p. 321–332., I. xi. p. 519.; his Cilician war against Tancred and Bohemond, p. 326–327.; the war of Euphras, with toxi- on prodigies, i. xii. xiii. pp. 435–436.; the death of Bohemond, i. xiv. p. 419.}

The kings of Jerusalem submitted however to a nominal dependence on their successors in their insurrections, and in the duty of attendance on the person of the reigning emperor. (Pucelle, Dissertations sur Jérusalem, xvii. p. 314.)
man followers were insufficient to repel the hostilities of the Greeks and Turks. In this distress, Bohemond embraced a magnanimous resolution, of leaving the defense of his kingdom to his generals, and skilled in war; in arming the west against the Byzantine empire, and of executing the design which he inherited from the lessons and example of his father Guiscard. His embarkation was clandestine; and if we may credit a tale of the princess Anne, he perished at the head of five thousand horse and forty thousand foot, assembled from the most remote climates of Europe. The strength of Durazzo, and prudence of Alexius, the progress of famine, and approach of winter, eluded his ambitious hopes; and the vassal confederates were seduced from his standard. A treaty of peace suspended the hostilities of the Greeks, and they were finally delivered by the death of an adversary, whom neither oaths could bind, nor dangers could appal, nor prosperity could satiate. His children succeeded to the principality of Antioch; but the boundaries were strictly defined, the homage was clearly suspended, and he was the only sultan, to the cities of Trebizond and Malatia that were restored to the Byzantine emperors. Of the coast of Anatolia, they possessed the entire circuit from Trebizond to the Syrian gates. The Seljuk dynasty of Roum was separated on all sides from the sea and the Mussulman brethren; the power of the sultan was shaken by the various defeats, of the Franks; and after the loss of Nice, they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium, an ob- seure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople. Instead of trembling for their capital, the Comnenian princes waged an offensive war against the Turks, and the first crusade prevented the fall of the declining empire.

Expeditions by land: the first crusade.

A.D. 1096, the second, of Conrad, and Louis VII. A.D. 1097. The third of Frederick, A.D. 1101.

In the twelfth century, three great em- pignations marched by land from the west to the relief of Palestine. The soldiers of France, Germany, and the sea and the Mussulman brethren; the power of the sultan was shaken by the various defeats, of the Franks; and after the loss of Nice, they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium, an ob- seure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople. Instead of trembling for their capital, the Comnenian princes waged an offensive war against the Turks, and the first crusade prevented the fall of the declining empire.

Expeditions by land: the first crusade.

A.D. 1096, the second, of Conrad, and Louis VII. A.D. 1097. The third of Frederick, A.D. 1101.

In the twelfth century, three great em- pignations marched by land from the west to the relief of Palestine. The soldiers of France, Germany, and the sea and the Mussulman brethren; the power of the sultan was shaken by the various defeats, of the Franks; and after the loss of Nice, they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium, an ob- seure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople. Instead of trembling for their capital, the Comnenian princes waged an offensive war against the Turks, and the first crusade prevented the fall of the declining empire.

Expeditions by land: the first crusade.

A.D. 1096, the second, of Conrad, and Louis VII. A.D. 1097. The third of Frederick, A.D. 1101.

In the twelfth century, three great em- pignations marched by land from the west to the relief of Palestine. The soldiers of France, Germany, and the sea and the Mussulman brethren; the power of the sultan was shaken by the various defeats, of the Franks; and after the loss of Nice, they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium, an ob- seure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople. Instead of trembling for their capital, the Comnenian princes waged an offensive war against the Turks, and the first crusade prevented the fall of the declining empire.

Expeditions by land: the first crusade.

A.D. 1096, the second, of Conrad, and Louis VII. A.D. 1097. The third of Frederick, A.D. 1101.

In the twelfth century, three great em- pignations marched by land from the west to the relief of Palestine. The soldiers of France, Germany, and the sea and the Mussulman brethren; the power of the sultan was shaken by the various defeats, of the Franks; and after the loss of Nice, they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium, an ob- seure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople. Instead of trembling for their capital, the Comnenian princes waged an offensive war against the Turks, and the first crusade prevented the fall of the declining empire.
Barbarossa spared the guilty Philadelphia, rewarded the hospitable Laodicea, and deployed the hard necessity that had stained his sword with any drops of christian blood. In their intercourse with the monarchs of Germany and Bohmania, and in the pursuit of plunder, they employed a combination of feign-darted fire from their eyes, and spit blood like water on the ground. Under the hangers of Conrad, a troop of females rode in the attitude and armour of men; and the chief of these Amazons, from her gilt spurs and bukskins, obtained the epithet of the Golden-footed

II. The numbers and character of the the Greek emperor was an object of terror to the

to the Greeks, and the sentiment of fear is nearly allied to that of hatred. This aversion was suspended or softened by the apprehension of the Turkish power; and the invaders of the Latins will not bias our more candid belief, that the emperor Alex-isumberland their insolence, eluded their hostilities, counselled their rashness, and opened to their admiral the road of pilgrimage and conquest. But when the Turks had been driven from Nice and the sea-coast, with the inestimable appellation of conquerors; and the intertant sultans of Cogni, they felt with purer indignation the free and frequent passage of the western barbarians, who violated the majesty, and endangered the safety, of the empire. The second and third crusades were undertaken under the reign of Manuel Comnenus and Alexius Angelus, in the mixture of the same perilous and the nature of union of a cowardly and a miserable temper was exemplified in the latter, who, without merit or mercy, could punish a tyrant, and occupy his throne.

It was secretly, and perhaps tacitly, resolved by the prince and people to destroy, or at least to discourage the the emperors had stipulated a safe passage and fair market in the country of their christian brethren; the treaty had been ratified by oaths and hostages; and the poorest soldier of Frederic's army was furnished with three marks of silver to defray his expenses on the road. But every engagement was violated by treachery and injustice; and the complaints of the Latins are attested by the honest confession of a Greek historian, that the Franks could not love his own

Instead of an hospitable reception, the gates of the cities, both in Europe and Asia, were closely barred against the crusaders; and the scanty pittance of food was let down in baskets from the walls. Experience or foresight might excuse this treatment of the Franks; but no humane and his own subjects of giving reasonable intelligence to the sultan, and treacherous guides to the Latin princes.

Instead of crushing the common foe, by a double atack at the same time but on different sides, the Germans were urged by emulation, and the French were retarded by jealousy. Louis had scarcely passed the Bosphorus when he was met by the returning emperor, who had lost the greatest part of his army in glorious,

but unsuccessful, actions on the banks of the Meander. The contrast of the pomp of his rival hastened the retreat of Conrad: theilocclusions of his independent vassals reduced him to his hereditary troops; and he borrowed some Greek vessels to execute by sea the pilgrimage of Palestine. Without studying the lessons of experience, or the nature of war, the king of France advanced through the same country to a similar fate. The vanguard, which bore the royal banner

1 I must observe, that in the second and third crusades, the subjects of Conrad and Frederic were styled by the Greeks and oriental Masons. The Lechi and Ezechii of Cinnamus are the Poloi and Ebrei and Frenkoi; and it is a common subject of indignant complaint of

2 The conduct of the Philadelphians is blazed by Nicetas, while the anonymous German accuses the turdness of his countrymen, (cul-cita nostri.) History would be cleansed, if we were enlightened by such contradictions. It is likewise from Nicetas, that we learn the mode and manner of Frederic's

3 Cinnamus says, which Cinnamus translates into Latin by the word, Saxam. Incanage works very hard to save his king and country from ignominy, (see the History of Frederic.) He is accused afterwards insisted on a meeting in nari ex equo, non ex equo, accord-

4 Eg. Romanorum imperator sun, lic Romanorum. (Anonym. Canis, p. 32.) The public and historical style of the Greeks was more decorated with the twisted, and of these, in the Greek

5 In the sequel of Innocent III. (iii. p. 134.) and the History of Baldwin, (p. 129, 132,) are the views of a pope and a cardinal on this singular occasion.

and the oriflamme of St. Denis, had doubled their march with rash and inconsiderate speed; and the rear, which the king commanded in person, no longer found their companions in the evening camp. In darkness and disorder, they were encompassed, assailed, and overwhelmed, by the innumerable host of Turks, who overran the part of the Christian army of the twelfth century. Louis, who climbed a tree in the general discomfiture, was saved by his own valor and the ignorance of his adversaries; and with the dawn of day he escaped alive, but almost alone, to the camp of the vanguard. But instead of retreating from the field, he hastened back to shelter the relics of his army in the friendly seaport of Salatia. From thence he embarked for Antioch; but so penurious was the supply of Greek vessels, that they could only afford room for his knights and nobles; and the plebeian crowd of infantry was left to perish at the foot of the Pamphylion hills. The emperor and the king embarked and went to Jerusalem; their martial trains, the remnant of mighty armies, were joined to the Christian powers of Syria, and a fruitless siege of Damascus was the first grand exploit of the Second Crusade. Frederic, embarking for Europe with the personal fame of piety and courage; but the orientals had braved these potent monarchs of the Franks, with whose names and military forces they had been so often threatened. Perhaps they had still more to fear from the veteran genius of the emperor, who in his youth had served in Asia under his uncle Conrad. Forty campaigns in Germany and Italy had taught Barbarossa to command; and his soldiers, even the princes of the empire, were accustomed under his reign to obey. As soon as he lost sight of Philadelphia and Antioch, the last cities of the Greek frontier, he plunged into the salt and barren desert, a land (says the historian) of horror and tribulations. During twenty days, every step of his fainting and sickly march was besieged by the innumerable hordes of Turks, whose numbers and fury seemed after each defeat to multiply and inflame. The emperor continued to struggle and to suffer; and such was the measure of his calamities, that when he reached the gates of Iconium, no more than one thousand knights were able to serve on horseback. By a sudden and resolute assault he de- feated the Turks, and stormed the capital of the sal- tan, who humbly sued for pardon and peace. The road was now open, and Frederic advanced in a career of triumph, till he was unfortunately drowned in a petty torrent of Cilicia. The remainder of his German army was by sickness at least a third of the emperor's son expired with the greatest part of hisSwabian vassals at the siege of Acre. Among the Latin heroes, Godfrey of Bouillon and Frederic Barbarossa alone could achieve the passage of the Lesser Asia; yet even their success was a warning; and in the last and most experienced age of the crusades, every nation preferred the sea to the toils and perils of an inland expedition.

The enthusiasm of the first crusade Obitus of the is a natural and simple event, whilst enthusiasm of hope was fresh, danger untired, and the crusade enterprise congenial to the spirit of the times. But enterprise of Europe may indeed excite our pity and admiration; that no instruction should have been drawn from constant and adverse experience; that the same confidence should have repeatedly grown from the same failures; that six succeeding generations should have rushed headlong on the open sea before them; and that men of every condition should have staked their public and private fortunes on the desperate adventure of possessing or recovering a tomb-stone two thousand miles from their country. In a period of two centuries after the council of Clermont, each spring and summer produced a new emigration of pilgrim warriors for the defence of the Holy Land; but the seven great armaments or crusades were exci- cted by some impending or recent calamity: the nations were moved by the authority of their pontiffs, and the example of the emperor, who died in the first crusade, and their reason; was silenced, by the voice of their holy orators; and among these, Bernard, the monk, or the saint, may claim the most honourable place. About eight years before the first con- quest of Jerusalem, he was born of a merchant family, at St. Bernard, A. D. 1011—1153. Three and twenty he buried himself in the monastery of Citeaux, then in the primitive fer- vor of the institution; at the end of two years he led forth her third colony, or daughter, to the valley of Clairvaux in Champagne, and was content, till the hour of his death, with the humble station of abbot of his own community. A philosophical age has abol- ished, with a liberal and indiscriminate disdain, the honours of these spiritual heroes. The nearest among them are distinguished by some energies of the mind: they were at least superior to their votaries and disciples; and, in the race of superstition, they attained the prize for which such numbers contended. In speech, in writing, in action, Bernard stood high above his rivals and contemporaries; his compositions are not devoid of wit and eloquence; and he seems to have preserved, as much as he could of his superiority as a monk and religious writer, in connection with what he reckoned with the character of a saint. In a secular life, he would have shared the seventh part of a private inheritance; by a vow of poverty and penance, by closing his eyes against the visible world, by the denial of all promise and of all establishment, Clairvaux became the oracle of Europe, and the foun- der of one hundred and sixty convents. Princes and pontiffs trembled at the freedom of his apostolical cen- sures: France, England, and Milan, consulted and obeyed his judgment in a solemn of the church; the debt was repaid by the gratitude of Innocent the 2 As counts of Verin, the kings of France were the vassals and ad- vocates of the monastery of St. Denis. The saint's peculiar banner, which the king kissed on entering the abbey, was a palm leaf or flaming colour. The oriflamme appeared at the head of the French armies from the twelfth to the twentieth century. (Encyclopædia on Joinesville, Desert, xviii. p. 244—253.)

2 The original French histories of the second crusade are the Ges- tas Francorum and the Chroniques de l'ancien monde by Guglielmo di Burgoch, the third collection. The same volume contains many original letters of the king of Sicily his minister, &c. the best documents of authentic his- tory.

2 The fervor of the Abbot and the friars is described in the annals of Tunisia and Egypt, and the discrepancies between these accounts are of the same kind as those between the annals of the crusades. (Secreta Fidelium Crucis, i. i. p. 26.)

2 The most authentic information of St. Bernard must be drawn from his own writings, published in a correct edition by Peri Galli- ton, and reprinted at Venice, 1750. In six volumes in folio. Whatever friendship could redress, or superstition could add, is contained in the two lives, by his disciples, in the sixth volume: whatever learning and criticism could ascertain, may be found in the publications of Benedictine editor.

2 The city of Acre, formed the valley of Abonyh, is situated among the woods near Bar Sur Aube in Champagne. St. Bernard would blush at the pomp of the church and monastery; he would ask for the library, the catalogue, and the archives of the library of the Benedictines of Clairvaux. (Lamansch, Anecdotes de diverses Sociétés, p. 541.)

2 The desire of comparing two great men has tempted many writers to place them in opposition to each other, and to indulge their fancy in their defeat. (Q. Curt. l. iii. c. 4, § 3.) But, from the march of the emperor, I rather judge, that his zeal is in the Cypriacus, a stream of less fame, but of a longer course.
second; and his successor, Eugenius the third, was the friend and disciple of the holy Bernard. It was in the proclamation of the second crusade that he shone as the missionary and prophet of God, who called the nations to the defence of his holy sepulchre. At the parliament of Vezelay he spoke before the king; and Louis the seventh, with his nobles, received their crosses from his hand. The abbots of Clairvaux then marched to the less easy conquest of the emperor Conrad: a phlegmatic people, ignorant of his language, was transported by the pathetic vehemence of his tone and gestures; and his progress, from Constance to Cologne, was the triumph of eloquence and inextinguishable zeal. By this depopulation of Europe; affirms that cities and castles were emptied of their inhabitants; and computes, that only one man was left behind for the consolation of seven widows. The blind fanatics were desirous of electing him for their general; but the example of the hermit Peter was before their eyes; and while he assured the crusaders of the divine favour, he prudently declined a military command, in which failure and victory would have been almost equally disgraceful to his character. Yet, after the calamitous event, the abbot of Clairvaux was loudly accused as a false philosopher, and his writings were burnt. His consternation; his enemies exulted, his friends blasphemed, and his apology was slow and unsatisfactory. He justifies his obedience to the commands of the pope; expatiates on the mysterious ways of Providence; imputes the misfortunes of the pilgrims to their own sins; and modestly insists that his mission had been approved by signs and wonders. Had the fact been certain, the argument would be decisive; and his faithful disciples, who enumerate twenty or thirty miracles in a day, appeal to the public assemblies of France and Germany, in which they were performed.

At the time of the first crusade, the Franks had the credit beyond the precincts of Clairvaux; but in the preternatural cures of the blind, the lame, and the sick, who were presented to the man of God, it is impossible for us to ascertain the separate shares of accident, of fancy, of imposture, and of fiction.

Prague of the Omnipotence: itself cannot escape the murrains of its discordant votaries; since the same dispensation which was applauded as a deliverance in Europe, was deplored, and perhaps arraigned, as a calamity in Asia. After the loss of Jerusalem, the Seljukian fealty was broken. Damascus, Bagdad mourned in the dust; the caliph Zeineddin of Damascus tore his beard in the caliph's presence; and the whole divan shed tears at his melancholy tale. But the commanders of the faithful could only weep; they were themselves captive in the hands of the Turks: some temporal power was restored to the last age of the Abbassides; but their humble ambition was confined to Bagdad and the adjacent province. Their tyrants, the Seljukian sultans, had followed the common law of the Asiatic dynasties, the unceasing round of valour, greatness, discord, degeneracy, and decay: their spirit and power were un equal to the defence of religion; and, in his distant realm of Persia, the christians were slain under the name and the arms of Sangiari, the last hero of a race. While the sultans were involved the Atabeks of Syria in the silken web of the haram, the pious task was undertaken by their slaves, the Atabeks, a Turkish name, which, like the Byzantine patricians, had ascended into the throne of the Princes. Nevertheless, a valiant Turk, had been the favourite of Malek Shah, from whom he received the privilege of standing on the right hand of the throne; but, in the civil wars that ensued on the monarch's death, he lost his head and the government of Aleppo. His domes ters, the veil emired presented to his son Zenghi, who proved his first arms against the Franks in the defeat of Antioch; thirty campaigns in the service of the caliph and sultan established his military fame; and he was invested with the command of Mosul, as the only champion that could avenge the cause of the prophet. The public hope was not disappointed: after a siege of twenty-five days, he stormed the city of Edessa, and recovered from the Franks their conquests beyond the Ephrathas; the martial tribes of Cordistan were subdued by the independent sovereign of Mosul and Aleppo: his success was so great that he was beloved as a father by his country; they trusted to his liberality for their rewards; and their absent families were protected by the vigilance of Zenghi. At the head of these veterans, his son Noureddin gradually united the Mahometan powers; added the kingdom of Hamath to his dominions, and waged a long and successful war against the christians of Syria; he spread his ample reign from the Tigris to the Nile, and the Abbassides rewarded their faithful servant with all the titles and prerogatives of royalty. The Latins themselves were compelled to own the division and cambio of the empire: it was the ruin of all of this implacable adversary. In his life and government the holy warrior revived the zeal and simplicity of the first caliphs. Gold and silk were banished from his palace; the use of wine from his dominions; the public revenue was scrupulously applied to the public service; and the frugal household of Noureddin was maintained from his legitimate share of the spoil which he vested in the purchase of a private estate. His favourite sultana sighed for some female object of expense. "Alas," replied the king, "I fear God, and have no more than my property. I cannot alienate; but I still possess three shops in the city of Hems: these you may take; and these alone can I bestow." His chamber of justice was the terror of the great and the refuge of the poor. Some years after the sultan's death, an oppressed subject called aloud in the streets of Damascus, No Or Noureddin, Noor eddin, where art thou now? Arise, arise, to pity and protect us!" A tumult was apprehended, and a living tyrant blinded or trembled at the name of a departed monarch.

1 Manuelis et obediens ... multipli cavit no sumerum vacuantes urbes et castella; et pene jam non inuentumque annum ... rei publicae, in specie nis et nis et...
2 Sic dictum formatur ut de omnium arce, ut eretd absit facies armatum, aut quod tam remotum ... quae sunt.
3 See the testimonies in Vita lmm. l. iv. c. 5. 6. Opp. tom. vi, p. 1500—1514. l. v. c. 1—17, p. 1596—1534.
By the arms of the Turks and Franks the Fatimids had been terror’d of Syria, Turke, Th. D. 163—1160.

Yet they were still revered as the descendants and successors of the prophet; they maintained their invisible state in the palace of Cairo; and their person was seldom violated by the profane eyes of strangers. The Latin ambassadors have described their own introduction through a series of gloomy passages and glittering porticoes; the scene was enlivened by the warbling of birds and the murmur of fountains: it was enriched by a display of rich furniture and pictures, the contents of which were secreted and something was shown, and much was supposed; and the long order of unfolding doors was guarded by black soldiers and domestic eunuchs. The sanctuary of the presence-chamber was veiled with a curtain; and the vizir, who conducted the ambassadors, laid aside his sapphire, and prostrated himself three times on the ground; the veil was then removed; and they beheld the commander of the faithful, who signified his pleasure to the first slave of the throne. But this slave was his master; the vizirs or sultans had usurped the supreme authority of Egypt; the claim of the emir was transferred to the Levant or the Indies; the Franks did not venture to contest the toil and expense of conquest; the Fatimids were deserted by their allies; the sect was driven into the desert. The secret zeal and ambition of the Turkish princes speedily to reign in Egypt under the name of the Abbassides; but the restoration of the suppliant Shewar was the ostensible motive of the first expedition; and the success was intrusted to the emir Shiracouh, a valiant and veteran commander. Dargham was oppressed and slain; but the ingratitude, the jealousy, the persecutions, of his empire was too great a temptation; he was at length invited to assume the sovereignty himself. He determined to invite the king of Jerusalem to deliver Egypt from his insolent benefactors. To this union the forces of Shiracouh were unequal; he relinquished the precipitate conquest; and the evacuation of Belbalus was the condition of his safe retreat. As the Turks retreated, and their general closed the rear, with a vigilant eye, and a battle-axe in his hand, a Frank presumed to ask him if he was not afraid of an attack? "It is doubtless in your power to begin the attack," replied the intrepid emir; "but rest assured, that not one of my soldiers will go to paradise till he has sent an infidel to hell." His report of the riches of the land, the effeminacy of the natives, and the disorders of the government, revived the hopes of Nourreddin; the caliph of Bagdad applauded the pious design; and Shiracouh descended into Egypt a second time with twelve thousand Turks, and ten thousand Arabs. Yet his forces were still inferior to the confederate armies of the Franks and Saracens; and I can discern an unusual degree of military art, in his passage of the Nile, his march through Egypt, and his victories over the vassals of his dynasty. The conqueror of the northern deserts, an emerald a palm and a half in length, and many vases of crystal and porcelain of China, (Reisne, p. 156.)
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

349

impotent of yoke, addicted to rapine, and tenacious of the government of their national chiefs. The resemblance of name, situation, and manners, seem to identify the people of the same land, that they still defend against the Ottoman Porte the antique freedom which they asserted against the successors of Cyrus. Poverty and ambition prompted them to embrace the profession of mercenary soldiers: the service of his father and uncle prepared the reign of the great Saladin, and the son of the simple Card, magnanimously smiled at his pedigree, which flattery deduced from the Arabic culpis. So unconscious was Nourreddin of the impending ruin of his house, that he constrained the reluctant youth to follow his uncle Shiracouh into Egypt; his military character was established by the defence of Alexandria; and if we may believe the Latins, he solicited and obtained from the christian general the profuse hours of knighthood. On the death of Shiracouh, the office of grand vizir was bestowed on Saladin, as the youngest and least powerful of the emirs; but with the advice of his father, whom he invited to Cairo, his genius obtained the ascendant over his equals, and attached the army to his person and interest. While Nourreddin lived, these ambitious Cards were the most humble of his slaves; and the indissoluble murmurs of the divan were silenced by the prudent Aynb, who left nothing to chance; were safe in his possession, himself would lead his son in chains to the feet of the throne. "Such language," he added in private, "was prudent and proper in an assembly of your rivals; but we are now above fear and obedience: and the threats of Nourreddin shall not daunt Ayb, until the simple sugarsauce, his reasonable death relieved them from the odious and doubtful conflict: his son, a minor of eleven years of age, was left for a while to the emirs of Damascus; and the new lord of Egypt was decorated by the caliph with every title that could sanctify his usurpation; his services were Saladin, long content with the possession of Egypt; he despised the christians of Jerusalem, and the Atebeks of Damascus, Aleppo, and Diarbeerk: Mecca and Medina acknowledged him for their temporal protector; his brother subdued the distant regions of Yemen, or the inroad of the Belo; and at the Despot of Armenia, the empire spread from the African Tripoli to the Tigris, and from the Indian ocean to the mountains of Armenia. In the judgment of his character, the reproaches of treason and ingratitude strike forcibly on our minds, impressed, as they are, with the principle and expectation of the Saracens. He was conquered by the revolution of Asia, which had erased every notion of legitimate succession; by the recent example of the Atebeks themselves; by his reverence to the son of his benefactor, his humane and generous behaviour to the collateral branches; by their incapacity and his merit; by the approbation of the caliph, the sole source of all legitimate power; and, above all, by the wishes and interests of the people, the saint, for both Nourreddin and Saladin are ranked among the Mahometan saints; and the constant meditation of the holy war appears to have shed a serious and sober colour over their lives and actions; and of the youth of the latter was addicted to wine and women; but his aspiring spirit soon renounced the temptations of pleasure, for the greater follies of fame and dominion: the garment of Saladin was of a coarse woollen; water was his only drink; and, while he enlaced the temperance, he surpassed the chastity of his Arabin prophet. In faith and practice he was a rigid musulman; he ever deplored that the defence of religion had not allowed him to accomplish the pilgrimage of Mecca; but at the stated hours, five times each day, the sultan devoutly prayed with his brethren: the involuntary omission of fasting was remorsefully repaid; and his penusl the Koran on horseback, between the approaching armies, may be quoted as a proof, however ostentations, of piety and courage. The supersitious doctrine of the sect of Shafi was the only study that he designed to encourage: the poets were disturbed; but all profane science was the object of his aversion; and a philosopher, who had vended some speculative novelties, was seized and strangled by the command of the royal saint. The justice of his divan was accessible to the meanest suppliant against himself or his friends; and it was only for a kingdom that Saladin would deviate from the rule of equity. While the descendants of Seljuk and Zenghi held his stirrup and smoothed his garments, he was affable and patient with the meanest of his servants. So boundless was his liberality, that in the hands of the Saracens, Egyptians, Moros, and Arabs, were adorned with the royal foundations of hospitals, colleges, and mosques; and Cairo was fortified with a wall and citadel; but his works were consecrated to public use, nor did the sultan indulge himself in a garden or palace of private luxury. In a fanatic age, himself a fanatic, the true and genuine virtue of Saladin appeared as the espousal of the christians; the emperor of Germany gloried in his friendship; the Greek emperor solicited his alliance; and the conquest of Jerusalem diffused, and perhaps magnified, his fame both in the East and West Indies.

During its short existence, the kingdom of Jerusalem was supported by the discord of the Turks and Saracens; and, as far as the Fatimatih caliphs and the sultans of Damascus were tempted to sacrifice the cause of their religion to the meaner considerations of private and present advantage. But the powers of Egypt, Syria, and Arabia, were now united by a hero, whom nature and fortune had armed against the christians. All without now hold the most threatening aspect; and all was feasible and hollow in the internal state of Jerusalem. After the two first Baldwin, the brother and cousin of Godfrey of Bouillon, the seer, devoted by female succession to Melisenda, daughter of the second Baldwin, and her husband Fulc, count of Anjou, the father, by a former marriage, of our English Plantagenets. Their two sons, Baldwin the younger, coward, but belonging to the Lusignan family, with his wife, a worthy woman, and not at all successful, war against the infidels; but the son of Amaury, Baldwin the fourth, was decried by the levity, a gift of the crusades, of the faculties both of mind and body. His sister Sybilia, the mother of Baldwin the fifth, was his natural heiress; after the sudden and unexplained death of her child, the second husband, Guy of Lusignan, a prince of a handsome person, but of such base renown, that his own brother Jeffrey was heard to exclaim, "Since they have made him a king, surely they would have made me a god!"

The choice was generally blamed; and the most powerful vassal, Raymond, count of Tripoli, who had been excluded from the succession and regency, entertained an implacable hatred against the king, and exposed his honour and conscience to the temptations of the sultan. Such were the guardians of the holy city; a legate, a child, a woman, a coward, with a traitor: the royal captivity was suspended for months, and its fate was delayed twelve years by some supplies from Europe, by the value of the military orders, and by the distant or domestic avocations of their great enemy. At length, on every side, the sinking state was encircled and pressed by a hostile line; and the troops who had been deceived by the false promises of the Christians, whose existence was preserved only by its protection. A soldier of fortune, Reginald of Chatillon, had seized a fortress on the edge of the desert, from whence he pillaged the caravans, insulted Maomet, and threatened the cities of Mecca and Medina. Saladin condescended to complain; rejoiced in the defect; and landed at the head of four thousand horse and foot, invaded the Holy Land. The choice of Tiberias for his first siege was suggested by the count of Tripoli, to whom it belonged; and the king of Jerusalem was persuaded to drain his garrisons, and to arm his people for the relief of that important district. The sultan, with the help of the infidels, and the difficulties of the king, the Christians were betrayed into a camp despite of water: he fled on the first onset, with the losses of both nations: Lusignan was overthrown, with the loss of thirty thousand men; and the wood of the fez-er-er, fire misfortune, was left in the power of the infidels. The royal captivity was conveyed to the tent of Saladin; and as he fainted with thirst and terror, the generous victor presented him with a cup of sherbet, cooled in snow, without suffering his companion, Reginald of Chatillon, to partake of this mark of hospitality and respect. The prince, son and dignity of a king," said the sultan, "are sacred; but this impious robber must instantly acknowledge the prophet whom he has blasphemed, or meet the death which he has so often deserved." On the proud of conscientious refusal of the christian warrior, Saladin struck him on the head with his sword, and Reginald was dispatched by the guards. The trembling Lusignan was sent to Damascus, to an honourable prison and speedy ransom; but the victory was stained by the execution of two hundred and thirty knights of the hospital, the inexpressible champions and models of virtue. This was left without a head; and of the two grand masters of the military orders, the one was slain and the other was a prisoner. From all the cities, both of the sea-coast and the inland country, the garrisons had been drawn away for this fatal field: Tyre and Tripoli alone could escape the rapid irruption of Saladin; and three months after the capture, he appeared in arms before the gates of Jerusalem.

He might expect that the siege of a city so venerable on earth and in heaven, so interesting to Europe and Asia, would rekindle the last sparks of enthusiasm; and the troops that had been deceived by the prince of Tripoli, every man would be a soldier, and every soldier a candidate for martyrdom. But queen Sybilia trembled for herself and her captive husband; and the barons and knights, who had escaped from the sword and chains of the Turks, displayed some faintness and selfish spirit in the public cause. The most numerous portion of the inhabitants was composed of the Greek and oriental christians, whose experience had taught to prefer the Mahometan before the Latin yoke; and the holy sequele attracted a base and needy crowd, without arms or courage, who shouted loudly on the charter of freedom. Some feeble and hasty efforts were made for the defence of Jerusalem; but in the space of fourteen days, a victorious army drove back the sallies of the besieged, planted their engines, opened the wall to the breadth of fifteen cubits, applied their scaling-ladders, and carried the tower whose existence had so long protected the city and the sultan. It was in vain that a bare-foot procèsion of the queen, the women, and the monks, implored the Son of God to save his tomb and his inheritance from impious violation. Their sole hope was in the mercy of the conqueror, and to their first suppliants deception that mercy was sternly denied. "He had sworn to avenge the patience and long-suffering of the Moslems; the hour of forgiveness was elapsed, and the moment was now arrived to expire, in blood, the innocent blood which had been split by Godfrey and the first crusaders. But a desperate and successful struggle of the Franks admonished the sultan that his triumph was not yet secure; he listened with reverence to a solemn adoration in the name of the common Father of mankind; and a sentiment of human sympathy mollified the rigour of fanaticism and conquest. He consented to accept the city, and to spare the inhabitants. The Greeks and Christians were permitted to live under his dominion; but it was stipulated, that in forty days all the Franks and Latins should evacuate Jerusalem, and be safely conducted to the seaports of Syria and Egypt; that ten pieces of gold would be paid in ransom for each woman, five for each man, and one for every child; and that those who were unable to purchase their freedom should be detained in perpetual slavery. Of some writers it is a favourite and inveterate theme to compare the humanity of Saladin with the massacre of the first crusade. The difference would be merely personal; but we should not forget that the christians had offered to capitulate, and that the Mahometans of Jerusalem sustained the last extremities of an assault and storm. Justice is indeed due to the fidelity with which the Turkish conqueror fulfilled the conditions of the treaty; and he may be said to have avenged the pious,Mother for the glance of pity which he cast on the misery of the vanquished. Instead of a rigorously exaction of his debt, he accepted a sum of thirty thousand byzants, for the ransom of seven thousand poor; two or three thousand more were dismissed by his gratuitous charity, and the number of slaves was reduced to eleven or fourteen thousand persons. In his interview with the queen, his words, and even his tears, suggested the kindest consolations; his liberal alms were distributed among those who had been made orpans or widows by the fortune of war; and while the knights of the hospital were in arms against him, he allowed their more pious brethren to continue, during the capitulation, in his camp. In these acts of mercy the virtue of Saladin deserves our admiration and love: he was above the necessity of dissimulation, and his stern fanaticism would have prompted him to desist rather than to affect, this profane compassion for the enemies of the Koran. After Jerusalem had been delivered from the presence of the strangers, the sultan made his triumphal entry, his banners waving in the wind, and to the harmony of martial music. The great mosh of Omar, which had been converted into a church, again consecrated to one God and his prophet Mahomet; the walls and the garrison of the place, which had been held by his own son, were handed over to him. Bohadin, which, and, for the sake of the monastery, the sand Beach and the sensual, which was not yet distinctly the mosque of Eleonore, was erected in the sanctuary. But when the golden cross that glittered on the dome was cast down, and dragged through the streets, the christians of every sect utter a lamentable groan, which was answered by the joyful shouts of the Moslems. In four ivory shoes the patriarch had collected the crosses, the images, the vases, and the relics of the holy place: they were seized by the conqueror, who was desires of presenting the caliph with the trophies of christian idolatry. He was persuaded, however, to intrust them to the patriarch and prince of the Latins, which was done through the intervention of Richard of England, at the expense of fifty-two thousand byzants of gold.

The third crusade, by sea.

Antioch, 40 A.D. Dl. 1187. Bohadin, which was already converted by the Turk from a church to a prison, waspitched to Richard of England, who was the son of the conqueror. The view of the Taht, the emperor of the Egyptians, was taken by the emperor of the Latins from Syria; which was already conveyed by a vassal to the city, that one of the religious, the christians penetrated to the royal tent. By the means of divers and pigeons, a regular correspondence was maintained with the besieged; and, as often as the sea was left open, the exhausted garrison was withdrawn, and a fresh supply was poured into the place. The Latins camp was thinned by famine, the sword, and the climate; but the tents of the dead were replenished with new pilgrims, who exaggerated the strength and speed of their approaching countrymen. The vulgar were astonished by the report, that the pope himself, with an innumerable crusade, was advanced as far as Constantinople. The monarch of the emperor of the Latins wasવे to all the Latins, which was done through the intervention of Richard of England, at the expense of fifty-two thousand byzants of gold.

The nations might fear and hope the immediate and final expulsion of the Latins from Syria; which was already conveyed by a vassal to the city, that one of the religious, the christians penetrated to the royal tent. By the means of divers and pigeons, a regular correspondence was maintained with the besieged; and, as often as the sea was left open, the exhausted garrison was withdrawn, and a fresh supply was poured into the place. The Latins camp was thinned by famine, the sword, and the climate; but the tents of the dead were replenished with new pilgrims, who exaggerated the strength and speed of their approaching countrymen. The vulgar were astonished by the report, that the pope himself, with an innumerable crusade, was advanced as far as Constantinople. The monarch of the emperor of the Latins was vowed by the Latins, which was done through the intervention of Richard of England, at the expense of fifty-two thousand byzants of gold.
Latin powers acquired a strong town and a convenient harbour; but the advantage was most dearly purchased. The minister and historian of Saladin computes, from the report of the enemy, that their numbers, at different periods, amounted to five or six hundred thousand; that most of the sand Christians were slain; that a far greater number were lost by disease or shipwreck; and that a small portion of this mighty host could return in safety to their native countries.

Richard of England, and the only kings of France and England, who have fought under the same banners; but the holy service, in which they were enlisted, was incessantly disturbed by their national jealousies; and the two factions, which they protected in Palestine, were more to the eye of the French monarch than to the common enemy. In the eyes of the orientals, the French monarch was superior in dignity and power; and in the emperor's absence, the Latins revered him as their temporal chief. His exploits were not adequate to his name. Philip was brave, but the sufferings he endured in his escape from captivity occasioned no more than a suspicion of sacrificing his health and interest on a herculean scale; the surrender of Acre became the signal of his departure; nor could he justify this unpopularity better than by leaving the duke of Burgundy, with five hundred knights, and ten thousand foot, for the service of the most enterprising of the emirs. The king of England, though not inferior in dignity, surpassed his rival in wealth and military renown; and if he were to be justified in his claim to be considered as a rival to Tyre by some secret assassins. After the surrender of Acre, and the departure of Philip, the king of England led the crusaders to the recovery of the sea-coast; and the cities of Caesarea and Jaffa were added to the fragments of the kingdom of Jus- signaque, with a thousand warriors from Acre. Ascalon, was a great and perpetual battle of eleven days. In the disorder of his troops, Saladin remained on the field with seventeen guards, without lowering his standard, or suspending the sound of his brazen kettle-drums; he again rallied and renewed the charge; and his preachers or heralds called aloud on the univer- sarians, manfully to stand up against the christian idolaters. But the progress of these idolaters was irresistible; and it was only by demolishing the walls and burning the town that most of the Infidel inhabitants were compelled to leave them from occupying an important fortress on the confines of Egypt. During a severe winter, the armies slept; but in the spring, the Franks advanced within a day's march of Jerusalem, under the leading standard of the English king, and his active spirit intercepting the matter of caravans. and business, Saladin had fixed his station in the holy city: but the city was struck with consternation and discords; he hastened; he prayed; he preached; he offered to share the dangers of the siege; but his Mamalukes, who entertained the hope of meeting their companions at Acre, pressed the sultan with loyal or seditions entreaties, to reserve his person and their courage for the future defence of their religion and empire.

The Moslems were delivered by the sudden, or as they deemed, the miraculous, retreat of the Christians; and the laurels of Richelieu were snatched from the Moslem and his companions. The hero, ascending a hill, and veiling his face, exclaimed with an indignant voice, "Those who are unwilling to rescue, are unworthy to view, the sepulchre of Christ!" After his return to Acre, on the news that Jaffa was surprised by the Franks, from the sultan present to his tents on the hipped foremost on the beach, the castle was relieved by his presence; and sixty thousand Turks and Saracen s fled before his arms. The discovery of this weakness provided them in return in the morning; and they found him carelessly encamped before the gates with five thousand horse, and two thousand foot of Franks.

Without counting their numbers, he sustained their charge: and we learn from the evidence of his enemies, that the king of England, grasping his lance, rode furiously along their front, from the right to the left with his sword raised, without meeting an adversary who dared to encounter his career.

Am I writing the history of Orlando or Amadis?

During these hostilities, a languid and tedious negotiation between the Franks and Moslems was started, and continued, and the two princes were accused, or suspected, by the Turks, and the Moslem sultan was accused by the Franks. It is a question whether the Franks or the Moslems were the better party in this quarrel, after the trial of each other, could either hope for a decisive victory.

6 See the distress and piteous firmness of Saladin, as they are described by Bodinian (p. 7—9, 359—375) who himself harangued the defenders of Jerusalem; their ears were not unknown to the enemy. (Jacob a Vitrica, l. c. 100, p. 1123.)

7 At 3000 men, or an Ayshite prince, remained in Ascalon, according to Hict. of St. John d'Acre, 1. c. 1123. I have known the names either of Philip or Richard.

8 See the progress of negotiation and hostility in Bodinian, p. 209—229, 359—375. The author of the itinerary of St. Albanius, 1. c. 102—103, observes, that Acre was a very numerous town.

9 See the state of the arms before the siege of Acre, (V'uvsauf, 1. c. 232—256.)

10 See the state of the arms before the siege of Acre, (V'uvsauf, 1. c. 232—256.)
Richard and Saladin appeared to be in a declining state; and they respectively suffered the evils of distant and domestic warfare: Plantagenet was impatient to punish a perfidious rival who had invaded Normandy in his absence; and the indefatigable sultan was subdued by the cries of the people, who were the victims, and of the soldiers, who were the instruments, of his victories. Full meritans for the jealousy of England were the restitution of Jerusalem, Palestine, and the true cross; and he firmly declared, that himself and his brother pilgrims would end their lives in the pious labour, rather than return to Europe with ignominy and remorse. But the consecration of Saladin rendered the contrast in the true character of the parts: he would neither store the idols, nor promote the idolatry, of the christians; he asserted, with equal firmness, his religious and civil claim to the sovereignty of Palestine; despised on the importance and sanctity of Jerusalem; and rejected all terms of the establishment, or partition, of the Latins. The marriage which Richard proposed, of his sister with the sultan's brother, was defeated by the difference of faith: the princess abhorred the embraces of a Turk; and Adel, or Saphadin, would not easily renounce a plurality of wives. A personal interview was declined by Saladin, who alleged their mutual ignorance of each other's language; and the negotiation was managed with much art and delay by their interpreters and envoys. The final agreement was equally disapproved by the zealous of both parties, by the Roman pontiff and the caliph of Egypt. The sultan, however, who had not been assured that any holy sepulchre should be open, without tribute or vexation, to the pilgrims of the Latin christians; that, after the demolition of Ascalon, they should inclusively possess the sea-coast from Jaffa to Tyre; that the count of Tripoli and the prince of Antioch should be allowed to maintain their castles during three years and three months, all hostilities should cease. The principal chiefs of the two armies swore to the observance of the treaty; but the monarchs were satisfied with giving their word and their right hand; and the royal majesty was excused from an oath, which always implies some suspicion of falsehood and dishonour. Richard embarked for Europe, to seek a long captivity and a premature grave; and the space of a few months concluded the life and glories of Saladin.

The orientals describe his edifying death, which happened at Damascus; but they seem ignorant of his equal distribution of his alms among the three religions, or of the display of a shroud, instead of a standard, to admonish the east of the instability of human greatness. The unity of empire was dissolved by his death; his sons were oppressed by the stronger arm of their uncle Saphadin; the hostile interests of the sultans of Egypt, Damascus, and Aleppo, were again revived; and the Franks or Latins stood, and breathed, and hoped, in their fortresses along the Syrian coast.

Innocent III. The noblest monument of a conqueror, A.D. 1193—1194, of his fame, and of the terror which he inspired, is the Saladin tenth, a general tax, which was imposed on the holy, and even the clergy, of the Latin church for the service of the holy war. The practice was too lucrative to expire with the occasion; and this tributary became the foundation of all the titles and tenth on ecclesiastical benefices, which have been granted by the Roman pontiffs to catholic sovereigns, or reserved for the immediate use of the apostolic see. This pecuniary emolument must have tended to increase the interest of the homage in the recovery of Palestine; after the death of Saladin they pursued the crusade, by their epistles, their legates, and their missionaries; and the accomplishment of the pious work might have been expected from the zeal and talents of Innocent the third. Under that young and ambitious priest, the successors of St. Peter attained that greatness proceeding from their own nation. In eighteen years, he exercised a despotical command over the emperors and kings, whom he raised and deposed; over the nations, whom an interdict of months or years deprived, for the offence of their rulers, of the exercise of christian worship. In the council of the Lateran he acted as an confessing and temporal, soveraign of the east and west. It was at the feet of his legate that John of England surrendered his crown; and Innocent may boast of the two most signal triumphs over sense and humanity, the establishment of transubstantiation, and the origin of the inquisition. At his death, two crusades, the fourth and the fifth, were undertaken; but, except a king of Hungary of the second order were at the head of the pilgrims: the forces were inadequate to the design; nor did the efforts correspond with the hopes and wishes of the pope and the people. The fourth crusade was diverted to Constantinople; and the conquest of the Greek or Roman empire by the Latins will form the proper and important subject of the next chapter. In the fifth, two hundred thousand marched into the eastern mouth of the Nile. They reasonably hoped that Palestine must be subdued in Egypt, the seat and storehouse of the sultan; and, after a siege of sixteen months, the Moslems deplored the loss of Damietta. But the christian army was ruined by the conception of the legate, the king of Jerusalem, and the pepe's name, assumed the character of general: the sickly Franks were encompassed by the waters of the Nile and the oriental forces; and it was by the evacuation of Damietta that they obtained a safe retreat, some concessions for the pilgrims, and the tardy restitution of the third relic of the true cross. The failure may in some measure be ascribed to the abuse and multiplication of the crusades, which were preached at the same time against the pagans of Livonia, the Moors of Spain, the Albigens of France, and the kings of Sicily of the imperial family. In these meritorious military services, the volunteers might acquire at home the same spiritual indulgence, and a larger measure of temporal rewards; and even the popes, in their zeal against a domestic enemy, were sometimes tempted to forget the distress of their Syrian brethren. From the last age of the crusades they derived the occasional command of an army and revenue; and some deep reasoners have suspected that the whole enterprise, from the first synod of Placentia, was contrived and executed by the policy of Rome. The suspicion is not founded either in nature or in fact. The successors of St. Peter appear to have followed, rather than guided, the impulse of manners and prejudice; without much foresight of the seasons, or cultivation of the soil, they gathered the ripe and spontaneous fruits of the superstition of the

to the pope, a tenth of the Levite's tenth to the high-priest. (Selden on Titulus; see his Works, vol. iii. p. 105.)

1 See the Gesta Innocentii iii. lib. moral. Script. Rev. ital. (tom. iii. p. 596—596.)

2 A.D. 1193—1194.

3 See the fifth crusade, and the siege of Damietta, in Jacobus Vitricus, Gesta Dei Belligrorum, (iii. 1125—1194.) In the Gesta Dei Belligrorum, an eye-witness, Bernardus Theodoricus, (in Script. Moravit. tom. vii. p. 565—566.) c. 159—203.) a contemporary, and Sanutus, (Secreta Sibylla, Cru- cian. i. iii. p. 4—5.) a diocletian, poster; and of the Arabians, Alpharabizus, (Dyssx. p. 294.) and the Egyptians at the end of Joinville, (p. 533, 537—547.)

4 To deicide who dared to make war against Mainfoye, the pope (A.D. 1255) cnetit in-processus pecatorum remissionem. Edilas mirabilis inter quasdam sanctitatem, nocem praestitit incommuniter quantum pro cruce infidelium salus. (Matthew Paris, p. 765.)

5 A high flight for the rest of the thirteenth century.

Vol. II.—2 U

27
times. They gathered these fruits without toll or personal danger: in the council of the Lateran, Innocent the third declared an ambiguous resolution of animating the crusaders by his example: but the pilot of the sacred vessel could not abandon the helm; nor was Palestine ever blessed with the presence of a Roman pontiff.

The emperor Frederic II. of the kingdom, under the immediate protection of the pilgrims, was successively the pupil, the enemy, and the victim of the church. At the age of twenty-one years, and in obedience to his guardian Innocent the third, he assumed the cross; the same promise was repeated at his royal and imperial coronations; and his marriage with the heiress of Jerusalem for ever bound him to defend the kingdom of his son Conrad. But as Frederic advanced in age and authority, he repented of the rash engagements of his youth: his liberal sense and knowledge taught him to despire the phantoms of superstition and the crowns of Asia: he now endeavoured to make good his promise for the ancestors of Innocent; and his ambition was occupied by the restoration of the Italian monarchy from Sicily to the Alps. But the success of this project would have reduced the popes to their primitive simplicity; and, after the delays and excuses of twelve years, he urged the emperor, with entreaties and threats, to fix the time and place of his departure for Palestine. In the harbours of Sicily and Apulia he prepared a fleet of one hundred galleys, and of one hundred vessels, that were framed to transport and land two thousand five hundred knights, with their horses and attendants; his vassals of Naples and Germany formed a powerful army; and the number of English crusaders was magnified to sixty thousand by the report of fame. But the inevitable, or affected, slowness of these mighty preparations consumed the strength and provisions of the more indigent pilgrims; the multitude was thinned by sickness and desertion, and the sultry summer of Calabria anticipated the mischiefs of a Syrian campaign. At length the emperor hoisted sail at Brundisium, with a fleet and army of forty thousand men, which kept the sea more than twenty days; and his hasty retreat, which was ascribed to his friends to a grievous indisposition, was accused by his enemies as a voluntary and obstinate disobedience. For suspending his vow was Frederic excommunicated by Gregory the ninth; for presuming, the next year, to accomplish his vow, he was again excommunicated by the same pope. While he served under the banner of the cross, a crusade was preached against him in Italy; and after his return he was compelled to ask pardon for the injuries which he had suffered. The clergy and military orders of Palestine were previously instructed to renounce his communion and dispute his commands; and in his own kingdom, the emperor was forced to consent that the orders of the camp should be issued in the name of God and of the christian republic. Frederic entered Jerusalem in triumph and with arms on hands (for no priest would perform the office) he took the crown from the altar of the sepulchre. But the patriarch

The clergy arifully confounded the mosch or church of the tomb with the sepulchre itself, and their wilful error has deserved both Vertot and Muratori.

The name of the crusaders suggests to the mind the name of the Mevagissey, a small town of Cornwall, which is remarkable for the use of oar by the skilful men who work within the town; for the safety of which they are held in high estimation. But the name has been variously interpreted by different authors. It was probably the name of a nun, and is sometimes applied to a nun's cell, or a nun's house. The town is also called "The Decline and Fall".
of his character; but the noble and gallant Joinville, who shared the friendship and captivity of Louis, has traced with the pencil of nature the fine portrait of his visage and many of his acts, so that we may learn to suspect the political views of depressing their great vassals, which are often imputed to the royal authors of the cruades. Above all the princes of the middle ages, Louis the ninth successfully laboured to restore the prerogatives of the crown; and the barrier of his victorious arms, the most modest enumeration amounts to fifty thousand men; and, if we might trust his own confession, as it is reported by oriental vanity, he disembarked nine thousand five hundred horse, and one hundred and thirty thousand foot, who performed their pilgrimage under the shadow of his power.

He takes Damietta.
A.D. 1299.

In complete armour, the oriflamme waving before him, Louis leaped foremost on the beach; and the strong city of Damietta, which had cost his predecessors a siege of sixteen months, was abandoned on the first stroke of the trumpets. But Damietta was the first and the last of his conquests; and in the fifth and sixth crusades, the same causes, almost on the same ground, were productive of similar calamities.

In a rainy delay, which introduced into the camp the seeds of an epidemic disease, the Franks advanced from the sea-coast towards the capital of Egypt, and strove to surmount the unseasonable inundation of the Nile, which opposed their progress. Under the eye of their intrepid monarch, the barons and knights of France displayed their invincible contempt of danger and distress; but it was at home that the last French troops suffered the most. The Moscovite army, which has been lost. But a soldier, who afterwards usurped the sceptre, rallied the flying troopers: the main body of the christians was far behind their vanguard; and what was the result? The army was dissolved.

A siren of Greek fire was incessantly poured on the invaders; the Nile was commanded by the Egyptian galleys, the open country by the Arabs; all provisions were intercepted; each day aggravated the sickness and famine; and about the same time a retreat was found to be necessary, and impracticable. The king, who confesses, that Louis might have escaped, if he would have deserted his subjects: he was made prisoner, with the greatest part of his nobles; all who could not redeem their lives by service or ransom, were inhumanly massacred; and the walls of Cairo were decorated with a circle of Christian heads. The captivity in which the king of France was loaded with chains; but the generous victor, a great grand-daughter, of the khan of the Blancs, who was not only victorious, but also victorious, was returned to his son and successor gave the signal of the retreat.

It is thus," says a lively writer, "that a christian king died near the ruins of Cartaghe, waging war against the sectaries of Mahomet, in a land to which Dido had introduced the deities of Syria."

A more unjust and absurd charge the Mamlukes cannot be devised, than that which condemns the natives of a country to perpetual servitude, under the arbitrary dominion of strangers and slaves. Yet such has been the state of Egypt above five hundred years. The most illustrious monarchs and great dynasties, which were themselves promoted from the Tartar and Circassian hands; and the four and twenty bees, or military chiefs, have ever been succeeded, not by their sons, but by their servants. They produce the great charter of their liberties, the treaty of Selim the first with the republic; and the Osmanian tolerant still accepts from the sultans, which are valued by Johnville at 500,000 French livres of his own time, and expressed by Matthew Paris by 100,000 marks of silver.

The idea of the sarri has been thus expressed by Johnville, whose very name is identified with the idea of adventure: "Selim, m. de Voltiare. (Hist. Generale, tom. ii. p. 386, 387.) The Mamlukes themselves were foreign powers, or, rather, they had felt their value, they hoped his conversion; and such a motion, which was not seconded, might be made, perhaps by a secret christian, in their unorganized society.

The chronology of the two dynasties of Mamelukes, the Bula- rrier, Turks or Tartars of Kipziel, and the Bericine, Circassians, is impossible. For Eusebius (Pariiis, Parisii, (n. 1. p. 254—257) their history from Abulfeda, Mahom, Ac. to the beginning of the thirteenth century, by the same M. de Guignes, is of no account, (n. 1. p. 159—150.)

Savoy, Lettres sur l'Egypte, tom. ii. lettre xv, p. 189—206. I know in the expedition the same day. Yet it is true, that the sultans, which were valued by Johnville at 500,000 French livres of his own time, and expressed by Matthew Paris by 100,000 marks of silver, (n. 1. p. 254—257) their history from Abulfeda, Mahom, Ac. to the beginning of the thirteenth century, by the same M. de Guignes, is of no account, (n. 1. p. 159—150.)

The chronology of the two dynasties of Mamelukes, the Bulah- rrier, Turks or Tartars of Kipziel, and the Bericine, Circassians, is impossible. For Eusebius (Pariiis, Parisii, (n. 1. p. 254—257) their history from Abulfeda, Mahom, Ac. to the beginning of the thirteenth century, by the same M. de Guignes, is of no account, (n. 1. p. 159—150.)

Savoy, Lettres sur l'Egypte, tom. ii. lettre xv, p. 189—206. I know in the expedition the same day.
Egypt: a slight acknowledgment of tribute and subject.

With some breathing intervals of peace and order, the two dynasties are marked as a period of rapine and bloodshed; but their throne, however shaken, reposed on the two pillars of discipline and valor. They extended their conquests over Nubia, Ethiopia, Arabia, and Syria; their Mamalukes were multiplied from eight hundred to twenty-five thousand horse; and their numbers were increased by a provincial militia of one hundred and seven thousand foot, and the occasional aid of sixty-six thousand Arabs. Princes of such power and spirit could not long endure on the list of his master, Richard; exorted, by his valour, a ten years' truce; and escaped, with a dangerous wound, from the dagger of Antioch, of a fanatic assassin. A.D. 1268.

Their situation was henceforth exposed to the rapines of the conqueror, was finally occupied and ruined by Bonet-edar, or Bihars, sultan of Egypt and Syria; the Latin principality was extinguished; and the first seat of the Christian name was dispersed by the slaughter of seventeen, and the captivity of one hundred, thousand of her inhabitants. The maritime towns of Lycia, Coptoia, Tripoli, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, and Jaffa, and the stronger castles of the hospitalers and templars, successively fell; and the whole existence of the Franks was confined to the city and colony of St. John of Acre, which is sometimes described by the more classic title of Ptolemis.

After the loss of Jerusalem, Acre, which is distant about seventy miles, became the metropolis of the Latin christians, and was adorned with strong and stately buildings, with aqueducts, an artificial port, and a double wall. The garrison was increased by the incessant streams of pilgrims and fugitives: in the pauses of hostility the trade of the East and West was attracted to this convenient station; and the market could offer the produce of every clime and the interpreters of every tongue. But in this conflux of nationalities the present was prophesied: all the disciples of Jesus and Mahomet, the male and female inhabitants of Acre were esteemed the most corrupt; nor could the abuse of religion be corrected by the discipline of law. The city had many sovereigns, and no government. The kings of Jerusalem and Cyprus, the house of Lusignan, the princes of Antioch, the counts of Tripoli and Sidon, the great masters of the hospital, the temple, and the Teutonic order, the republics of Venice, Genoa, and Pisa, the pope's legate, the kings of France and England, according to independent command and tribunal, exercised the power of life and death; every criminal was protected in the adjacent quarter; and the perpetual jealousy of the nations often burst forth in acts of violence and blood. Some adventurers, who disregarded the ensign of the cross, compensated their want of pay by the plunder of the Mahometan villages and farms. The Mosheim, who traded under the public faith, were despised and hanged by the christians; and the denial of satisfaction justified the arms of the sultan Khalil. He marched against Acre at the head of sixty thousand horse and one hundred and forty thousand foot: his train of artillery (if I may so say) was numerous and mighty. The separate timbers of a single engine were transported in one hundred waggons; and the royal historian Abulfeda, who served with the troops of Hannah, was himself a spectator of the holy war. Whatever might be the vices of the Franks, their courage was resolute, undaunted enthusiasm and despair; but they were torn by the discord of seventeen chiefs, and overwhelmed on all sides by the powers of the sultan. After a siege The loss of Acre of thirty-three days, the double wall was forced by the Moslems; the principal towers of their engines; the Moslems, the Mamalukes made a general assault; the city was stormed; and death or slavery was the lot of sixty thousand christians. The convenant, or rather fortress, of the templars resisted three days longer; but the great number of horse in the army of the hundred knights, only ten were left alive, less happy than the victims of the sword, if they lived to suffer on a scaffold in the unjust and cruel proscription of the whole order. The king of Jerusalem, the patriarch, and the great master of the hospital, effectually retreat to the shore; but the sea was rough, the vessels were insufficient; and great numbers of the fugitives were drowned before they could reach the isle of Cyprus, which might comfort Lusignan for the loss of Palestine. By the command of the sultan, the churches and fortifications of the Latin cities were precipitated in a moment of ardor for war; still opened the holy sepulchre to some devout and defileless pilgrims; and a mournful and solitary silence prevailed along the coast which had so long resounded with the world's debate.*

CHAPTER XXI.

Schisms of the Greeks and Latins.—State of Constantinople.—Revolt of the Bulgarians.—Ivan Angelus debarred by his brother Alezius.—Origin of the fourth crusade.—Alliance of the French and Venetians with the son of Isaac.—Their naval expedition to Constantinople.—The two sieges and final conquest of the city by the Latins.

The restoration of the western empire Schism of the by Charlemagne was speedily followed Greeks by the separation of the Greek and Latin churches. A religious and national animosity still divides the two largest communions of the christian world; and the schism of Constantinople, by alienating most useful allies, and provoking her most dangerous enemies, was rejected by the pope as the decline and fall of the Roman empire in the east.

In the course of the present history Their aversion the aversion of the Greeks for the Latins has been often visible and conspicuous. It was originally derived from the disdain of servitude, inflamed, after the time of Constantine, by the pride of equality or dominion; and finally exasperated by the preference which their rebellious subjects had given to the alliance of the Franks. In every age the Greeks were proud of their superiority in profane and religious knowledge; they had first received the light of Christianity; they had pronounced the decrees of the seven general councils; they alone possessed the language of prophecy; nor should the Barbarians, immersed in the darkness of the west, be permitted to argue on the high and mysterious questions of theological science. Those barbarians despised in their turn the restless and subtle levity of the orientals, the authors of every heresy; and simplicity, which was certain to hold the tradition of the apostolic church. Yet in the seventh century, the synods of Spain, and afterwards of France, improved or corrupted the Nicene creed, on the mysterious subject of the Trinity. In the long procession of the controversies of the east, the nature and Holy Ghost: generation of the Christ had been scrupulously defined; and the well-known relation of father and son seemed to convey a faint image to the human mind. The idea of birth was less analogous to the Holy Spirit, who, instead of a divine gift or attribute, was the very self of Christ, the son of God. If Jesus was son, a god; he was not begotten, but in the orthodox style he proceeded. Did he proceed from the Father alone, perhaps by the Son? or from the Father and the Son? The first of these opinions was asserted by the Greeks, the second by the Latins; and the addition to the Nicene creed of a word of phrase was the flame of discord between the oriental and the Gallican churches. In the origin of the dispute, the Roman pontiffs affected a character of neutrality and moderation: they condemned the innovation, but they acquiesced in the sentiment, of their Transalpine brethren; they removed the distinctions existing a little while before on the question of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, as well as from the Father. Such articles of faith ecclesiastical disci- pline are not susceptible of treachery; but the pluralism of discipline will vary in remote and independent churches; and the reason, even of divines, might allow, that the difference is inevitable and harmless. The craft or superstition of Rome has imposed on her priests and deacons the rigid obligation of celibacy; among the Greeks it is confined to the bishops; the less is compensated by dignity or unambitious by age; and the parochial clergy, the papal and the coadjutor society of the world, has been married before their entrance into holy orders. A question concerning the eunuchs was fiercely debated in the eleventh century, and the essence of the eucharist was supposed in the east and west to depend on the use of leavened or unleavened bread. Shall I mention a serious history the furious reproaches which were urged on the papists? Their formidable was long while remained on the defensive? The neglect to abstain, according to the apostolical decree, from things strangled, and from blood: they fasted, a Jewish observance! on the Saturday of each week; during the first week of Lent they permitted the use of meat and wine, and their informants were enraged in the taste of flesh; and animal grease was substituted for the want of vegetable oil; the holy chism or union in baptism was reserved to the episcopal order: the bishops, as the bridegrooms of their churches, were decorated with rings; their priests shaved their faces, and baptized by a single immersion. Such were the eres which provoked the zeal of the patriarchs of Constantinople; and which were justified with equal zeal by the doctors of the Latin church.

Bigotry and national aversion are powerful magicians of every object of dis- cipline corrected by council; but the schism of the Greeks may be traced in the emulation of the leading prelates, A. D. 567-588, who maintained the supremacy of the old metropolis superior to all, and of the reigning capital, inferior to none, in the Christian world. About the middle of the eleventh century, Photius, and his successor, the captain of the guards and principal secretary, was yet supported by the public compassion and the obstinacy of his adherents. They appealed to the tribunal of Nicholas the first, one of the proudest and most aspiring of the Roman pontiffs, who embraced the welcome opportunity of judging and condemning his rival of the east. Their quarrel was intimidated by a conflict of jurisdiction over the king and nation of the Bulgarians; nor was their recent conversion to Christianity of much avail to either prelate, unless he could number the prelates among the subjects of his own power. With Photius the patriarch was victorious; but in the furious contest he deposited in his turn the successor of St. Peter, and involved the Latin church in the reproach of heresy and schism. Photius sacrificed the peace of the world to a short and precarious reign; he fell with his patri- cian, the Cesar Bardius; and Basil the Macedonian performed an act of justice in the restoration of Ignatius, whose age and dignity had not been sufficiently respected. From his monastery, or prison, Photius solicited the favour of the emperor by pathetic complaints and arfiful flattery; and the eyes of his rival were scarcely closed, when he was again restored to the throne of Constantinople. After the death of Bas- sil, he experienced the vicissitudes of courts and the ingratitude of a royal pupil; the patriarch was again depored, and in his last illatory hours he might regret the freedom of a life and studies. In such revolution, the breath, the nod, of the sovereign had been accepted by a submissive clergy; and a synod of three hundred bishops was always prepared to hail

1 In France, after some harsher laws, the ecclesiastical discipline of the nobility was now relaxed: milk and water were allowed to all who rejected the Philoque, at least the doctrine, must be damned. All regular clerics, who adhered to the doctrine of the filioque, were received at Rome about the year 854.

2 Before the shrine of St. Peter, he placed two shields of gold, at equal distance of powers of silver: of the two creeds (cursa Auctoritas) preconatus et caelestis ecclesiae fides, (Anast. in Leon. III. in Muntanis, tom. lii, pars e. p. 2 8.) His language was: "You are aware that neither of these creeds were received at Rome about the year 854.

3 With regard to this point of the synod of 878, it is to be declared, that all who rejected the filioque, at least the doctrine, must be damned. All regular clerics, who adhered to the doctrine of the filioque, were received at Rome about the year 854. The phrase, 'only non sibi non potest.' (Collect, Commons, tom. i. p. 257-258.) The potestas would be a large loophole of salvation! the ten volume of the Venice edition of the Councils contains all the acts of the synods, and history of Photius: they are abridged, with a short notice of precepts or practice, by Lepsius and Tournaux.

1 Photius, in his book against the Latins, and in his book against the Bulgarians, on the Schism of the Greeks, still claimed the supreme authority of Constantino- ple. The synod of Rome, in 1076, was the only one that ever opposed the authority of Photius's successor, Basil: but this fact shows the decay of the patriarchal power in the eleventh century. It is not, however, necessary to recur to so remote a period to find the image of authority in the constant council of the western church. In the translation of the MSS. of wandering to the synod of Rome, in 1076, was the only one that ever opposed the authority of Photius's successor, Basil: but this fact shows the decay of the patriarchal power in the eleventh century. It is not, however, necessary to recur to so remote a period to find the image of authority in the constant council of the western church. In the translation of the MSS. of the Fathers of the Church, the synods of Rheims, Tours, and Canterbury, in the eleventh century, are noticed with the greatest respect. The synod of Rome, in 1076, was the only one that ever opposed the authority of Photius's successor, Basil: but this fact shows the decay of the patriarchal power in the eleventh century. It is not, however, necessary to recur to so remote a period to find the image of authority in the constant council of the western church. In the translation of the MSS. of the Fathers of the Church, the synods of Rheims, Tours, and Canterbury, in the eleventh century, are noticed with the greatest respect.
THE DECLINE AND FALL

19 CXXI.

the triumph, or to stigmatize the fall, of the holy, or the execrable, Photius.1 By a delusive promise of sucour or reward, the popes were tempted to counts
nance these various proceedings; and the synods of Constantinople were ratified by their epistles or lega gates. But the court and the people, Ignatius and Photius, were equally adverse to their claims; their ministers were insulted or imprisoned: the procession of the Holy Ghost was forgotten: Bulgars was for ever annexed to the Byzantine throne; and the schism was prolonged by the rigid censure of all the churches. The dark ness and corruption of the tenth century suspended the intercourse, without reconciling the minds, of the two nations. But when the Norman sword restored the churches of Apulia to the jurisdiction of Rome, the departing flock was warned, by a pious epistle of the Greek patriarch, to avoid and abhor the errors of the Latins.

The rising majesty of Rome could no longer brook the insolence of a rebel; and Michael Cerularius was excommuni cicated in the heart of Constantinople by the pope's legates, who, stepping at their feet, deposited on the altar of St. Sophia a direful anathema,2 which enumerates the seven mortal heresies of the Greeks, and devotes the guilty teachers, and their unhappy sectaries, to the eternal society of the devil and the brutes. But the court and the people, Ignatius and Photius, were equally adverse to their claims; their ministers were insulted or imprisoned: the procession of the Holy Ghost was forgotten: Bulgars was for ever annexed to the Byzantine throne; and the schism was prolonged by the rigid censure of all the churches. The dark ness and corruption of the tenth century suspended the intercourse, without reconciling the minds, of the two nations. But when the Norman sword restored the churches of Apulia to the jurisdiction of Rome, the departing flock was warned, by a pious epistle of the Greek patriarch, to avoid and abhor the errors of the Latins.

The aversion of the Greeks and Latins was nourished and manifested in the three first expeditions to the Holy Land. Alexis Comnenus contrived the absence of all but the ferminish; pilgrims: his successors, Manuel and Isaac Angelus, proceeded to the Moslem for the ruin of the greatest princes of the Franks; and their crooked and malignant policy was seconded by the active and voluntary obedience of every order of their subjects. Of this hostile temper, a large portion of the donatives proceeded to the con ersence of language, dress, and manners, which severs and alienates the nations of the globe. The pride, as well as the prudence, of the sovereign was deeply wounded by the intrusion of foreign armies, that claimed a right of traversing his dominions, and passing under the walls of his capital; his subjects were insulted and plundered by the rude strangers of the west; and the hatred of the pusillanimous Greeks was sharpened by secret envy of the bold and pious enter tprises of the Franks. But these profane causes of national enmity were followed by the insinuation of new causes of religious zeal. Instead of a kind embrace, a hospitable reception from their Christian brethren of the east, every tongue was taught to repeat the names of schismatic and heretic, more odious to an orthodox ear than those of pagan and infidel: instead of being loved for the general conformity of faith and worship, they were abhorred for some rules of discipline, some questions of theology, in which them selves or their teachers might differ from the Oriental church. In the crusade of Louis the seventh, the Greek clergy washed and purified the altars which had been polluted by the Latins. The companions of Frederic Barbarossa deplore the injuries which they endured, both in word and deed, from the peculiar rancour of the bishops and monks. Their prayers and sermons excited the people against the impious heresies, and the patriarch is accused of declining, that the faithful might retaliate the expi Y of all their sins by the extirpation of the schis matics.3 An enthusiast, named Dorotheos, alarmed the fears, and restored the confidence, of the emperor, by a prophetic assurance, that the German heretic, after assaulting the gate of Blachernon, would be made a singular example of the divine vengeance. The passages of these mighty armies were rare and perilous events; but the crusades introduced a frequent and familiar intercourse between the two nations, which enlarged their knowledge without abating their prejudices, and which had the effect of uniting Constantinople demanded the produc tions of every climate: these imports were balanced by the art and labour of her numerous inhabitants; her situation invites the commerce of the world; and, in every period of her existence, that commerce has been in the hands of her neighbours of the East. The Amalphi, the Venetians, Phains, and Genoese, intro duced their factories and settlements into the capital of the empire: their services were rewarded with honours and immunities; they acquired the possession of lands and houses; their families were multiplied by marriages with the natives; and, after the abolition of the Mahometan mosch, it was impossible to interdict the churches of the Roman rite.4 The two wives of Manuel Comnenus5 were of the race of the Franks; the first, a sister-in-law of the emperor Conrad; the second, a daughter of the princes of France, was be ned for his son Alexis a daughter of Philip Augustus of France; and he bestowed his own daughter on a marquis of Montserrat, who was educated and dignified in the palace of Constantinople. The Greek encountered the arms and aspired to the empire, of the west; and the Franks despised the fidelity of the Franks; their military talents were unftly recompensed by the lucrative offices of judges and treasurers; the policy of Manuel had solicited the alliance of the pope; and the popular voice accused that of Alexis of a bias towards the Latins.6 During his reign, and that of his successor Alexis, they were exposed at Constantinople to the reproach of foreigners, heretics, and favourites; and this triple guilt was severely expiated in the tumult, which announced the return and elevation of Andronim

1 The synod of Constantinople, held in the year 688, is the eighth of the general councils, the last assembly of the east which is recogni zed by the Roman church. She rejects the synods of Constantinople of the years 867 and 879, which were, however, equally numerous and more venerable to Photius.

2 See this matter in the councils, bo. xi. p. 137. + 409.

3 Anna Comnena (Alexiad, I, p. 51—53) represents the other view, which she obtained from the papers, i.e. Greeks and the Latin communions, the style of Communions and Nice

Rax is still more vehement. Yet how calm is the voice of history compared with that of polemics?

4 See Frere, Hist. Recns tom. xvi. p. 162, 213, 256.)
by equal abuses in the collection, and the application, of the revenue. While the Greeks numbered the days, and prepared to receive their victors and to dote on the dazzling and grotesque pageantry of their servitude, the assizes and the galleys, the numbers and the confidence, the pride and the resistance, the sanctity of the capital, were reduced to ashes; the clergy were burnt in their churches, and the sick in their hospitals; and some estimate may be formed of the slain from the clemency which sold above four thousand christians in perpetual slavery to the Turks. The priests, the bishops, and the destruction of the schismaties; and they chanted a thanksgiving to the Lord, when the head of a Roman cardinal, the pope's legate, was severed from his body, fastened to the tail of a dog, and dragged, with savage mockery, through the city. The more diligent of the strangers who had retreated, on the first alarm, to their vessels, and escaped through the Hellespont from the scene of blood. In their flight, they burnt and ravaged two hundred miles of the sea-coast; inflicted a severe revenge on the guiltless subjects of the empire; marked the priests and monks as their prey; and laid waste without effectual resistance, the manufacture of plunder, the loss of their property and friends. On their return, they exposed to Italy and Europe the wealth and weakness, the perfidy and malice, of the Greeks, whose virtues were painted as the genuine characters of heresy and schism. The scruples of the first crusaders had neglected the finest opportunities of securing, by the possession of Constantinople, the way to the Holy Land: a domestic revolution invited, and almost compelled, the French and Venetians to achieve the conquest of the Roman empire of the east. Reinas and char. of Isaac Angelus.

In the series of the Byzantine princes, 2. A.D. 1185—1195.

the last male of the Comnenian family who reigned at Constantinople. The revolution, which cast him headlong from the throne, saved and exalted Isaac Angelus, who descended by the females from the same imperial dynasty. The successor of a second Nero might have found it an easy task to deserve the esteem and affection of his subjects; they sometimes had reason to regret the administration of Andronicus. The sound and vigorous mind of the tyrant was capable of discerning the condition between his own and the public; what was for one, what was for all who could inspire him with fear, the unsuspected people, and the remote provinces, might bless the inexorable justice of their master. But his successor was vain and jealous of the supreme power, which he wanted courage and abilities to exercise; his vicissitudes were pernicious, his virtues (if he possessed any virtues) were useless, to mankind; and the Greeks, who imputed their calamities to his negligence, denied him the merit of any transient or accidental benefits of the times. Isaac slept on the throne, and was unnoticed; his subjects had exchanged their stoicism for the sop of buffoons, and the hours were amused by comedians and buffoons, and even to those buffoons the emperor was an object of contempt: his feasts and buildings exceeded the examples of royal luxury; the number of his eunuchs and domestics amounted to twenty thousand; and the daily disbursements of the state are computed to swell to four million sterling the annual expense of his household and table. His poverty was relieved by oppression; and the public discontent was inflamed

The Bulgarians were malicious enough to usurp and to pray for the long life of Isaac Angelus, the surest pledge of their freedom and prosperity. Yet their chiefs could in A.D. 1195—1203, vote in the same indiscriminate coun- sel to expel the family and nation of their emperor. "In all the Greeks," said Asan to his troops, "the same climate, and character, and education, will be productive of the same fruits. Behold my lance," continued the warrior, "and the long streamers that float in the 1 See Boshard, Vic. Saladin, p. 129—131, 226, vers. Schulteins, The flight of Alexius Comnenus, and William of Tyre; (L. xii. c. 10—18) the first three and concis., the second loud, copious, and tropical.

2 The history of the reign of Isaac Angelus is composed, in three books, by Francesco Giunta, a Roman prelate, or principal secretary, and judge of the veil or palace, could not bear the impertinency of the barbarian. He wrote, in a letter, after the fall and death of his benefactor,

3 The pope acknowledges to a pedant, a notable libel which prohibition genitores ut origine transact. This tradition, and the strong resemblance of the Latin and Wallach an idiom, is explained by M. Guizot, Travail (Oeuvres Politiques de M. Guizot, pp. 194—195). The Paris of Troyan were swept away by the tide of emigration from the Danube to the Volga, and brought back from another wave of the Volga to the Danube. Possible, but strange!
wind. They differ only in colour; they are formed of the same silk, and fashioned by the same workman; nor has the stripe that is stained in purple, any superior charm or value about it. The following is a parallel: these candidates for the purple successively rose and fell under the empire of Isae: a general who had repelled the fleets of Sicily, was driven to revolt and ruin by the ingratitude of the prince; and his luxurious repose was disturbed by secret conspiracies and assassinations. The desire for power, by accident, or the merit of his servants: he was at length oppressed by an ambitious brother, who, for the hope of a precarious diadem, forgot the obligations of nature, of loyalty, and of friendship. While Isaac in the Thracian valleys pursued the idle and solitary pleasures of the chase, his brother, Alexius Angelus, was invested with the purple, by the unanimous suffrage of the camp: the capital and the clergy subscribed to their choice; and the vanity of the new sovereign rejected the name of his fathers for the lofty and royal appellation of the Comnenian race. On the despicable chancels of these latter times, the language of contempt; and can only add, that in a reign of eight years, the hasir Alexius was supported by the masculine vices of his wife Euphrosyne. The first intelligence of his fall was conveyed to the late emperor by the posted servant and pursuit of guards no longer his own: he fled before them above fifty miles as far as Stagya in Macedonia; but the fugitive, without an object or a follower, was arrested, brought back to Constantinople, deprived of his eyes, and confined in a lonesome tower, on a scanty allowance of bread and water. At the moment of the revolution, his son Alexius, whom he educated in the hope of empire, was twelve years of age. He was spared by the usurper, and reduced to attend his triumph both in peace and war; but as the army was encamped on the shores of an Italian vessel facilitated the escape of the royal youth; in the diligence of his pursuit, he eluded the search of his enemies, passed the Hellespont, and found a secure refuge in the isle of Sicily. After saluting the threshold of the apostles, and imploving the protection of pope Innocent the third, Alexius accepted the kind invitation of his sister Irene, the wife of Philip of Swabia, King of the Romans. But in his passage through Italy, he heard that the flower of western chivalry was assembled at Venice for the deliverance of the Holy Land; and a ray of hope was kindled in his bosom, that their invincible swords might be employed in his father's restoration.

The fourth crusade

A.D. 1202

About ten or twelve years after the loss of Jerusalem, the nobles of France were again summoned to the holy war by the voice of a third prophet, less extravagant, perhaps, than Peter the hermit, but far below St. Bernard, in the meritor of an orator and a statesman. An illustrious priest of the neighbourhood of Paris, Folk of Neuilly, forsook his parochial duty, to assume the more flattering character of a popular and itinerant missionary. The fineness of his sincerity and miracles was spread over the land. He encircled, with severity and vehemence, against the vices of the age; and his sermons, which he preached in the streets of Paris, converted the robbers, the usurers, the prostitutes, and even the doctors and scholars of the university. No sooner did Innocent the third ascend the chair of St. Peter, than he proclaimed in Italy, Germany, and France, the obligation of a new crusade. The eloquent pontiff described the ruin of Jerusalem, the triumph of the heathen; and at the fall of Constantinople: his liberality proposed the redemption of sins, a plenary indulgence to all who should serve in Palestine, either a year in person, or two years by a substitute; and among his legates and orators who blew the sacred trumpet, Folk of Neuilly was the loudest and most successful. By the promise of the princely monarch, he was averse to the pious summons. The emperor Frederic the second was a child; and his kingdom of Germany was disputed by the rival houses of Brunswick and Swabia, the memorable factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines. Philip Augustus of France had performed, and could not be persuaded to renew the pernicious vow; but as he was not less ambitious of praise than of power, he cheerfully instituted a perpetual fund for the defence of the Holy Land. Richard of England was satiated with the glory and misfortunes of his first adventure, and he presumed to derive the exhortations of the vocation of the pale to the prelates. But the preacher was heard and obeyed by the great vassals, the princes of the second order; and Theobald, or Thibaut, count of Champagne, was the foremost in the holy war. The valiant youth, at the age of twenty-two years, was enrolled in the Crusades, by the number of Champagne excelled in all embraced by the exercise of war; an army bearing a truce with the heiress of Navarre, Thibaut could draw a band of hardy Gascons from either side of the Pyrenean mountains. His companion in arms was Louis, count of Blois and Chartres; like himself, of regal lineage; for the princess were nephews, in the same time, of the kings of France and England. In a crowd of prelates and barons, who imitated their zeal, I distinguish the birth and merit of Matthew of Montmorency; the famous Simon of Montfort, the scourge of the Albigeois; and a valiant noble, Jeffrey of Villehardouin, in the heart of the Carmagnole. A branch of the Comnenian, in the rude idiom of his age and country, to write or dictate an original narrative of the

---

The contemporary life of pope Innocent III, published by Baluze and Mauricius, (Scriptores Rerum Rallaticarum, tom. iii., pars i., p. 494—503.) is most valuable for the important and original documents which are inserted in the text. The bull of the crusade may be read, c. 81, SS.

Pars que cedit, fortunam, nec sibi perigrum, nec incurrere modo, parce que li pardons est gracieux (v. Baluze, No. 1.) Our philosophers may rejoin on the causes of the crusades, but such were the feelings of a French knight.

This number of foes (of which 850 owed legal homage) was enrolled in the church of St. Stephenus at Troyes, and attested A. D. 1203, by the master and bursar of Champagne, (Ducange, Obser. p. 534.)

Campania... militare privilegii singularissimi efficitur... in gyro cinis... palam, ac si.vel, in sacrum (Ducange, p. 219, from the Chronique de Jerusalem, A. D. 1177—1199.)

The name of Villehardouin was taken from a village and castle in the diocese of Troyes, near the river Aube, between Bar and Aron. The town and village: the name of Villehardouin is best traced. It existed after the year 1140, the younger, which acquired the privilege of Achaz, merged in the house of Savoy. (Ducange, p. 206—208.)

The crusade was conducted by the hand of some ambassador, (Ducange, p. 620—621, from the Chronicle of Jerusalem, A. D. 1177—1199.)

This office was held by his father and his descendants, but Ducange has not ascribed it, with his usual caution, to the name of Alexius, as is seen in a recent piece of some specimen, is explained by Venetian and Ducange in a version and glossary. The present, and, therefore, the only available version (Mechanices descriptio) is the example of a language which has ceased to be French, and is endeavoured to be a renewal of the ancients.

His age, and his own expression, qui uterque curo dicta. (No. 64, a.) may justify the suspicion. (More probably than Mr. Wood's councils and actions in which he bore a memorable part. At the same time, Baldwin count of Flanders, who had married the sister of Thibaut, assumed the cross at Bruges, with his brother Henry and the princes of his house, to free the Holy Sepulchre from the infidels in the province. The vow which the chiefs had pronounced in churches, they ratified in tournaments: the operations of the war were debated in full and frequent assemblies; and it was resolved to seek the deliverance of Palestine in Egypt, a country, since Saladin's death, which was almost ravaged by famine and civil war. But the fate of so many royal armies displayed the toils and perils of a land expedition; and, if the Flemings had dwelt along the ocean, the French barons were destitute of ships and ignorant of navigation. They embraced thewise resolution of choosing six deputies or representatives, of whom Villehardouin was one, with a discretionary trust to direct the motions, and to pledge the faith of the whole confederacy. The maritime states of Italy were alone possessed of the means of transporting the holy warriors with their arms and horses: and the six deputies proceeded to Venice to solicit of Venice's profity or interest, the aid of that powerful republic. State of the Venetians, A.D. 1297—1300. I have mentioned the flight of the Venetians from the fallen cities of the continent, and their secure shelter on the islands that limit the extremity of the Adriatic gulf. In the midst of the waters, free, indignant, laborious, and inaccessible, they gradually coalesced into a republic: the first foundations of Venice were laid in the island of Rialto; and the annual election of the twelve tribunes was superceded by the permanent office of a duke or doge. On the verge of the two empires, the Venetians exult in the belief of primitive and perpetual independence. Against the Latins, their antique freedom has been asserted by the sword, and may be justified by the pen. Charlemagne himself, who had restored all the lands of Italy to the islands of the Adriatic gulf; his son Pepin was repulsed in the attacks of the lagunae or canals, too deep for the cavalry, and too shallow for the vessels; and in every age, under the German Caesars, the bands of the republic have been clearly distinguished from the kingdom of Venice, which was formerly considered by themselves, by strangers, and by their sovereigns, as an inalienable portion of the Greek empire; in the ninth and tenth centuries, the proofs of their sucession are numerous and unquestionable; and the vain titles, the servile honours, of the Byzantine emperors, were in reality no more than a name to us, who would have degraded the magistrates of a free people. But the bands of this dependence, which was never absolute or rigid, were imperceptibly relaxed by the ambition of Venice and the weakness of Constantineople. Obedience was softened into respect, privilege into prerogative, and the freedom of the domestic government was fortified by the independence of foreign dominion. The maritime cities of Homer,) that he could neither read nor write. Yet Champagne may boast of the two first historians, the noble authors of French prose, Villehardouin and Joinville. 1. The crusade and events of the counts of Flanders, Baldwin and his brother Henry, are the subject of a particular history by the Jean de Joinville, (Constantinople, Rome, 1626, in 4to,) which I have only seen with the eyes of Ducas. 2. History, Act. i. vol. i. p. 67, 476. 3. The foundation and independence of Venice, and Peris's inova, are discussed by Part (Critica, tom. i. A.D. 830, No. 4, &c.) and Annals (1526, Paris, &c., vol. i. p. 305, Script. tom. x. p. 153.) 4. The critics have a slight bias, the French more especially; but the Papers, Journal du commerce, 1801, to the 11th year. 5. When the son of Charlemagne asserted his right of sovereignty, he was answered by the royal deputies of France, who stated their facts, and, when the heated passions were cooled, their services; but the hateful word had to be translated, as in the charter of 827, (Laplance, Hist. de la Patern assures de la ville de Venise, vol. ii. p. 67, &c.) the treasure of &c. of &c. of &c. or &c. is 2 V

Istria and Dalmatia bowed to the sovereignty of the Adriatic; and when they armed against the Normans in the cause of Alexius, the emperor applied, not to the duty of his subjects, but to the gratitude and generosity (or the necessity) of his city with the colonies of his province. The western parts of the Mediterranean, from Tuscany to Giblartar, were indeed abandoned to their rivals of Pisa and Genoa; but the Venetians acquired an early and lucrative share of the commerce of Greece and Egypt. Their riches increased with the increasing demand of Europe; their manufactures of silk and glass, perhaps the institution of their bank, are of high antiquity; and they enjoyed the fruits of their industry in the magnificence of public and private life. To assert her flag, to avenge her injuries, to protect the freedom of navigation, the republic could launch and man a fleet of a hundred galleys; and the Venetians, the Saracens, and the Normans, were encountered by her naval arms. The Franks of Syria were assisted by the Venetians in the reduction of the seas coast; but their zeal was neither blind nor disinterested; and in the conquest of Tyre, they shared the sovereignty of a city of first rank in the world. The policy of Venice was marked by the aversion of a trading, and the insolence of a maritime, power; yet her ambition was prudent; nor did she often forget that if armed galleys were the effect and safeguard, merchant vessels were the cause and supply, of her greatness. The pride of her strength, and the schism of the Greeks, without yielding a servile obedience to the Roman pontiff; and a free intercourse with the infidels of every clime appears to have alloyed betimes the fever of superstition. Her primitive government was a loose mixture of democracy and monarchy: the doge was elected by the votes of the general assembly; as long as he was popular and successful, he reigned with the pomp and authority of a prince; but in the frequent revolutions of the state, he was deposed, or banished, or slain, by the justice or the injustice of the multitude. The twelfth century produced the first rudiments of the wise and jealous aristocracy, which has reduced the doge to a pageant and the people to a cypher. When the six ambassadors of the Alliance of the French pilgrims arrived at Venice, they were entertained in the palace of St. Mark, by the reigning duke: his name was Henry Dandolo; and he shone in the last period of human life as one of the most illustrious characters of the times. Under the weight of years, and after the loss of his eyes, Dandolo retained a sound understanding: so he could courage: the spirit of a hero, ambitious to signalize his reign by some memorable exploits; and the wisdom of a patriot, anxious to build his fame on the glory and advantage of his country. He praised the bold enthusiasm and liberal condition of the barons and their deputies; in such a case, and with such associates, he should aspire, were he a private man, to terminate his life; but he was the avenger of the repudiated, and some delay was requisite to consult, on this arduous business, the judgment of his colleagues. The proposal of the French was first debated by the six sohj who had been recently appointed to control the administration of the doge: it was next discussed to the forty members of the commune, and finally communicated to the legislative assembly of four hundred and fifty representatives, who were annually chosen in the six quarters of the city. In peace and war, the doge was still the chief of the republic; his legal authority was supported by the personal reputation of Dandolo; his arguments of public interest were balanced and approved; and he was authorized to inform the ambassadors of the following conditions of the treaty. It was proposed that the crusaders should assemble at Venice, on the feast of St. John of the ensuing year; that flat-bottomed vessels should be prepared for four thousand five hundred horses, and nine thousand squires, with a number of ships sufficient for the embarkation of four thousand five hundred knights, and twenty thousand foot: that during a term of nine months they should be supplied with provisions, and transported to the shores of Syria, to the service of God and Christendom should require; and that the republic should join the army with a squadron of fifty galleys. It was required, that the pilgrims should pay, before their departure, a sum of eighty-five thousand marks of silver; and that the revenues, by sea and land, should be equally divided between the confederates. The terms were hard; but the emergency was pressing, and the French barons were not less profuse of money than of blood. A general assembly was convened to ratify the treaty; the stately chapel and the church were filled with the citizens; and the noble deputies were taught a new lesson of humbling themselves before the majesty of the people.

"Illustras Venetian," said the marshal of Champagne, "we are sent by the greatest and most powerful barons of France, to implore the aid of the masters of the sea, for the service of the Holy Land. They have enjoined us to fall prostrate at your feet; nor will we rise from the ground, till you have promised to avenge with us the injuries of Christ." The eloquence of their words and tears, the ardor of the petition, and the grandeur of the enterprise, were tumultuously applauded by a universal shout: as it were, says Jeffrey, by the sound of an earthquake. The venerable doge ascended the pulpit to urge their request by those motives of honour and virtue, which alone can be offered to a popular assembly: the treaty was transcribed on parchment, attested with oaths and seals, mutually accepted by the weaving and joyous representatives of France and Venice; and despatched to Rome for the approbation of popes Innocent the third. Two thousand marks were borrowed of the merchants for the first expenses of the army. Of the six deputies, two repassed the Alps to announce their success, while their four companions made a fruitless trial of the zeal and emulation of the republics of Genoa and Pisa.

The execution of the treaty was still opposed by unforeseen difficulties and delays. The marshal, on his return to Venice, A.D. 1202. Thoyes, was embraced and approved by the Thibaut count of Champagne, who had been unanimously chosen general of the confederates.

But the health of that valiant youth already declined, and soon became hopeless; and he despaired of the unhappy fate, which condemned him to expire, not in a field of battle, but on the altar and the cross of a new general; but such was the incapacity, or jealousy, or reluctance, of the princes of France, that none could be found both able and willing to assume the conduct of the enterprise. They acquiesced in the choice of a stranger, of Beneficace marquis of Montferrat, descended of a race of heroes, and himself of conspicuous fame in the wars and negociations of the times; nor could the piety or ambition of the Italian chief decline this honourable invitation. After visiting the French court, where he was received as a monarch and kindred, passage from the churches of Flanders and Fries, and the most respectable barons of France; and their numbers were swelled by the pilgrims of Germany, who object and motives were similar to their own. The Venetians had fulfilled, and more than fulfilled, their engagements: stables were constructed for the horses, and barracks for the troops; the magazines were abundantly replenished with forage and provisions; and the fleet of transports, ships, and galleys, was ready to hoist sail as soon as the republic had received the price of the freight and armament. But the Venetians were not satisfied of the number of the professionals who were assembled at Venice. The Flemings, whose obedience to their count was voluntary and precarious, had embarked in their vessels for the long navigation of the ocean and Mediterranean; and many of the French and Italians had preferred a cheaper and more ready passage to the Holy Land. Each pilgrim might complain, that after he had furnished his own contribution, he was made responsible for the deficiency of his absent brethren: the gold and silver plate of the chiefs, which they freely delivered to the treasury of the counts of Mark, was not enough to compensate the sacrifices; and after all their efforts, thirty-four thousand marks were still wanting to complete the stipulated sum. The obstacle was removed by the policy and patriotism of the doge, who proposed to the barons, that if they would join their arms in reducing some revolted cities of Dalmatia, he would expose his person in the holy war, and obtain from the republic a long indulgence, till some wealthy courtesy should afford the means of satisfying the debt. After much scruple and hesitation, they chose rather to accept the offer than to relinquish the enterprise; and the first hostilities of the fleet and army were directed against Siege of Zara, astrong city of the Slavonian

1 See the original treaty in the Chronicle of Andrew Dandolo, p. 245—259.

2 By a victory (A.D. 1192) over the citizens of the Asti, by a crusade to Palestine, and by an embassy from the pope to the German princes. (Morosini, Annali d'Italia, vol. iv. p. 193. 203.)

3 He had been appointed the German general against the Latins by P. of Gumbr, Gainis Altom, Archiv. Tom. iv. p. 195—198. who substituted the pilgrim

4 A reader of Villehardouin must observe the frequent tears of the manuscript and his brother knights. SACHARRIS a citante terme de place de palais (No. 17); multum plerum (ibid.); multum terme place (No. 29); multum, et places (No. 18), etc. and places (No. 17), etc., for places (No. 29). A her as the object of the last line of 5 I. a multum terme place de pont. (No. 292.) They were on every occasion of grief, joy, or devotion.

coast, which had renounced its allegiance to Venice, and imploded the protection of the king of Hungary. The Venetians resolved to pass the winter in a secure harbour, and challenged their horses, and troops, and military engines; compelled the inhabitants, after a defence of five days, to surrender at discretion: their lives were spared, but the revolt was punished by the pillage of their houses and the demolition of their walls. The season was far advanced; the threatened alliance was dissolved, and the Venetians resolved to pass the winter in a secure harbour, and plant their oaths and seals; and each individual, according to his situation and character, was swayed by the hope of public or private advantage; by the honour of restoring an exiled monarch; or by the sincere and probable opinion, that their efforts in Palestine would be fruitless and unproductive, and that the acquisition of Antioch must precede and prepare the recovery of Jerusalem. But they were the chiefs or equals of a valiant band of freemen or volunteers, who thought and acted for themselves: the soldiers and clergy were divided; and, if a large majority subscribed to the alliance, the immigrants, and genuine dissidents were strong and respectable. The boldest hearts were appalled by the report of the naval power and imprincable strength of Constantinople; and their apprehensions were disguised to the world, and perhaps to the allies, by the more devent objections of religion and policy. They alleged that the danger of the world had drawn them from their families and homes to the rescue of the holy sepulchre; nor should the dark and crooked counsels of human policy divert them from a pursuit, the event of which was in the hands of the Almighty. Their first offence, the attack of Zara, and the subsequent European alliance, were severely punished by the submission of their consciences and the censures of the pope; nor would they again imbrue their hands in the blood of their fellow-christians. The apostle of Rome had pronounced; nor would they usurp the right of avenging with holy zeal the wrongs of the Greeks, and the usurpation of the Byzantine monarch. On these principles, or pretenses, many pilgrims, the most distinguished for their valour and piety, withdrew from the camp; and their retreat was less pernicious than the open or secret opposition of a discontented party, that laboured, on every occasion, to separate the army and disappoint the enterprise. Notwithstanding this defection, the departure of the fleet and army was vigorously pressed by the Venetians: A.D. 1203. whose zeal for the service of the royal family concealed from his nation and family. They were mortified by the recent preference which had been given to Pisa, the rival of their trade; they had a long arrear of debt and injury to liquidate with the Byzantine court; and Dandolo might not discourage the popular tale, that he had been deprived of his eyes by the emperor Manuel, who perfidiously violated the sanctity of an ambassador. A similar armament, for ages, had not rode the Adriatic; it was composed of one hundred and twenty flat-bottomed vessels or galadrons for the horses; two hundred and forty transports filled with men and arms; seventy storeships laden with provisions; and fifty stout gal- leys, well prepared for the encounter of an enemy. While the wind was favourable, the sky serene, and the water smooth, every eye was fixed with wonder and delight on the scene of military and naval pomp, which overspread the whole Mediterranean. The ships, masts, and spars, and rigging, at once an ornament and a defence, were arranged on either side of the ships; the banners and ensigns were displayed from the stern; and, at the signal of the emperor, disposed the main fleet in two effective lines, as if a target was before them. The Venetians and Genoese formed the first line; the Genoese, under the command of the emperor Manouel Comnenus; the latter was the husband of Theodora, the Bosch's daughter, and the first wife of Manuel, whom he had divorced. The second line was composed of the Greek court and princes for the glory of defending Tyre against the victualling of the Saracens. The Genoese and Venetians fought as long as the Venetians were the first of the two parties. The abbot Marin left the army at Zara, proceeded to Pisa, and sent royal ambassador to Constantinople, and became a reluctant witness of the second siege.

The birth and death of the Venetian Dandolo gave him the motive and the means of searching in the archives of Venice the memorable story of his ancestors. His brevity seems to accuse the copious and more recent narratives of Sandii, (On Muratori. Script. Rhod. Pulli

[3] A modern reader is surprised to hear of the valet de Constantinople, as applied to young Alexis, on account of his youth, like the infant of Span, and the nobisvisus princeps of the Romans. The pages and violets of the knights were as noble as themselves. (Villhardouin and Desprez, No. 36.)

[4] The emperor Isaac appealed by Villhardouin, Surpraz, (No. 30. Act.) which may be derived from the French Sire, or the Greek Keg. (See examples of the latter name; the former is a short cut for the last.) Our author has charged him and Comnecus will instruct us what licence may have been used in the baptism of Byzantine archbishops in Asia and Egypt.

[5] Renier and Cunob. the former married Maria, daughter of the emperor Manuel Comnenus; the latter was the husband of Thoerina, niece of Manuel, whom Dandolo had divorced. The Greek court and princes for the glory of defending Tyre against the victualling of the Saracens. The Genoese and Venetians fought as long as the Venetians were the first of the two parties. The abbot Marin left the army at Zara, proceeded to Pisa, and sent royal ambassador to Constantinople, and became a reluctant witness of the second siege.

[6] The birth and death of Dandolo gave him the motive and the means of searching in the archives of Venice the memorable story of his ancestors. His brevity seems to accuse the copious and more recent narratives of Sandii, (On Muratori. Script. Rheim. Pulli our modern artillery was supplied by three hundred barrels for casting stones and darts: the fatigues of the way were chorized with the sound of music; and the spirits of the adventurers were raised by the mutual assurance, that forty thousand Christian heroes were equal to the conquest of the world.\(^1\) In the navigation of the territory of the Greek empire: the island of Corfu afforded a station and repose; they doubled, without accident, the perilous cape of Malea, the southern point of the Peloponnesus; they passed the Hellespont,\(^2\) a descent in the islands of Negropont and Andros; and cast anchor at Abydos on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont. These preludes of conquest were easy and bloodless: the Greeks of the provinces, without patriotism or courage, were crushed by an irresistible force; the presence of the lawful heir might justify their obedience; and it was rewarded by the modesty and discipline of the Latins. As they penetrated through the Hellespont, the magnitude of their navy was compressed in a narrow channel; and the face of the waters was darkened with innumerable sails. They again expanded in the spacious basin of the Propontis, divided the waters and reduced, it was resolved, in the season of harvest, to replenish their storeships in the fertile islands of the Propontis. With this resolution, they directed their course; but a strong gale, and their own impatience, drove them to the eastward: and so near did they run to the shore and the city, that some volleys of stones and darts were exchanged between the ships and the rampart. As they passed along, they gazed with admiration on the capital of the east; or, as it should seem, of the earth; rising from her seven hills, and towering over the continents of Europe and Asia. The sun was setting; the doing and the darts of the Latins cast anchor before Chalcedon; the mariners only were left in the vessels; the soldiers, horses, and arms, were safely landed; and, in the luxury of an imperial palace, the barons tasted the first fruits of their success. On the third day, the fleet and army moved towards Scutari, the Asiatic suburb of Constantinople; a detachment of five hundred Greek horse was surprised and defeated by fourscore French knights; and in a halt of nine days, the camp was plentifully supplied with forage and provisions.

\(^{1}\) Utchbyrholm, No. 02. His feelings and expressions are original; he often weeps, but he repeats in the graces and perils of war with a spirit and a style which are clearly a meditated writing.

\(^{2}\) In this voyage, almost all the geographical names are corrupted by the Latins. The modern appellation of Chalke, and all Euboea, is derived from the mariners' Europe, Negropont, etc. These names displease our maps. (D'Anville, Geographie Ancienne, tom. 1. p. 253.)

\(^{3}\) Et achquez que il ne soit hardi qui ne cuir ce fremit (c. 87.) . . . Chaussez regardant ses armes . . . que par tems en armes postier, (c. 88.) Such is the humanity of courage.

were rich, industrious, and subject to the will of a single man: had that man been capable of fear, when his enemies were at a distance, or of courage, when they approached his person. The first rumour of his nephew's alliance with the French and Venetians was despised by the usurper Alexius; his flatterers persuaded him, that in this contempt he was bold and sincere; and each orator, in the close of the declamation, he thrice disconsolated the barbarians of the west. These barbarians had been justly terrified by the report of his naval power; and the sixteen hundred fishing boats of Constantinople\(^3\) could have manned the fleet of the Latin emperor. His entrance in the mouth of the Hellespont. But all force may be annihilated by the negligence of the prince and the venality of his ministers. The great duke, or admiral, made a scandalous, almost a public, auction of the sails, the masts, and the rigging; the royal forests were reserved for the more important purpose of the chase; and the trees, says Nicetas, were guarded by the enmuchs, like the groves of religious worship.\(^4\) From his dream of pride, Alexius was awakened by the siege of Zara, and the rapid advances of the Latins; as soon as he saw the danger was real, he thought in the last extremity, his best hope was lost in abject despondency and despair. He suffered these contemptible barbarians to pitch their camp in the sight of the palace; and his apprehensions were thinly disguised by the pomp and menace of a suppliant. He was forced to retreat, and to submit to the provisions of his conquerors. He was astonished (his ambassadors were instructed to say) at the hostile appearance of the strangers. If these pilgrims were sincere in their vow for the deliverance of Jerusalem, his voice must applaud, and his treasures should assist, their pious design; but should they dare to invade the sanctuary of empire, their numbers were ten times more considerable, should not protect them from his just resentment. The answer of the doge and barons was simple and magnanimous.

"In the cause of honour and justice," they said, "we despise the usurper of Greece, his threats and his offers. Our friendship and his allegiance are due to the lawful heir, to the young prince, who is seated among us, and to his father, the emperor Isaac, who has been deprived of his sceptre, his freedom, and his eyes, by the crime of an ungrateful brother. Let that same brother encounter the brave Latins, and we ourselves will intercede, that he may be permitted to live in affluence and security. But let him not insult us by a second message: our reply will be made in arms, in the palace of Constantinople.

On the tenth day of their encampment and siege of the city, the Latins set a guard over themselves, as soldiers and as catholics, for the passage of the Bosphorus. Perilous indeed was the adventure; the stream was broad and rapid; and in a calm the current of the Euinhe might drive down the liquid and unextinguishable fires of the Greeks; and the opposite shores of Europe were defended by seventy thousand horse and foot in formidable array. On this memorable day, which happened to be bright and pleasant, the Latins were distributed in six battles or divisions; the first, or vanguard, was led by the count of Flanders, one of the most powerful of the Christian princes in the skill and number of his cross-bows. The four successive battles of the French were commanded by his brother Henry, the counts of St. Pol and Blois, and Matthew of Montmorency; the last, or vanguard, was honoured by the presence of the marshal and nobles of Champagne. The sixth division, the rearguard and reserve of the army, was conducted by the marquis of Montferrat, at the head of
of the Germans and Lombards. The chargers, saddled, with their long caparisons dragging on the ground, were embarked in the flat palandarres and the knights stood by the side of their horses, in complete armour, their helmets faced, and their lances in their hands. Their numerous train of serjeants and archers transported the horses; and each transport was towed by the standard, swishing violently in the air. The six divisions traversed the Bosphorus, without encountering an enemy or an obstruction; to land the foremost was the wish, to conquer or die was the resolution, of every division and of every soldier. Jealous of the pre-eminence of danger, the knights in their hue and the men-at-arms in their girdle; the serjeants and archers were animated by their valour; and the squires, letting down the drawbridges of the palanders, led the horses to the shore.

Before the squadrons could mount and form, and touch their lances, the seventy thousand Greeks had vanished, as though by magic. An example was given to his troops; and it was only by the plunder of his rich pavilions that the Latins were informed that they had fought against an emperor. In the first constellation of the flying enemy, they resolved, by a double change of line, to change their position and make the French their prey. The tower of Galata, in the suburb of Pera, was attacked and stormed by the French, while the Venetians assumed the more difficult task of forcing the boom or chain that was stretched from that tower to the Byzantine shore. After some fruitless attempts, their intrepid perseverance prevailed; two tiny ships of war, the relics of the Greek navy, were either sunk or taken; the enormous and musky links of iron were cut asunder by the shores, or broken by the weight of the galleys; and the Venetian fleet, safe and triumphant, rode at anchor in the port of Constantinople. By these means, the French and Latins solicited the licence of besieging a capital which contained above four hundred thousand inhabitants, able, though not willing, to bear arms in the defence of their country. Such an account would indeed suppose a population of near two millions; but whatever their number, the Latins, with the aid of the Greeks, the belief of those numbers would equally exalt the fearless spirit of their assailants.

In the choice of the attack, the French and Venetians were divided by their habits of life and warfare. The former adhered to a resource that was familiar, and was most accessible on the side of the sea and the harbour. The latter might assert with honour, that they had long enough trusted their lives and fortunes to a trail hard and a precarious element, and loudly demanded a trial of knighted arms, a firm ground and a close onset, either on foot or horseback. After a prudent compromise, of employing the two nations by sea and land, in the service best suited to their character, the fleet covering the army, they proceeded, both proceeded, with the extremity of their harbour; the stone bridge of the Galata was hastily repaired; and the six battles of the French formed their encampment against the front of the capital, the basis of the triangle which runs about four miles from the port to the Propontis. On the edge of a broad ditch, at the head of a lofty rampart, they had leisure to complete the destruction of the city. The gates to the right and left of their narrow camp poured forth sallies of cavalry and light-infantry, which cut off their striaggers, swept the country of provisions, sounded the alarm five or six times in the course of each day, and compelled them to plant a pallisade, and sink an intrenchment, for their immediate safety. In the supplies and convos the Venetians had been too sparing, or the Franks too voracious; the usual complaints of hunger and scarcity were heard, and perhaps felt: their stock of flour would have been exhausted in a few days; but the French, in the utmost extremity of their horses, had tempted them to taste the flesh of their horses. The trembling usurper was supported by Theodore Lascaris, his son-in-law, a valiant youth, who aspired to save and to rule his country; the Greeks, regardless of that country, were awakened to the defence of their religion; but their finest hope was in the warlike spirit of the Venetian guards, of the Danes and English, as they are named in the writers of the times. After ten days' incessant labour, the ground was levelled, the ditch filled, the approaches of the besiegers were regularly made, and two hundred and fifty engines of assault executed their various powers to clear the rampart, to hatter the walls, and to sap the foundations. On the first appearance of a breach, the scaling-ladders were applied; the numbers that defended the vantage ground repulsed and pressed the adventurous Latins; but they admired the resolution of fifteen knights and sergeants, who had gained the ascent, and maintained their perilous station till they were precipitated or made prisoners by the imperial guards. On the side of the harbour the naval attack was more successfully conducted by the Venetians; and that industrious people employed every resource and every art that was known and practised before the invention of gunpowder. A double line, three bow-shots in front, was formed by the galleys and ships; and the swift motion of the former was supported by the weight and lowness of the latter, whose decks and poop, and turrets, were the platforms of military engines, that discharged their shot over the heads of the first line. The soldiers, who leaped from the galleys on shore, immediately planted and ascended their scaling-ladders, while the large ships, advancing more slowly into the intervals, and lowering a drawbridge, opened a way through the air from the sea to the town. In the ship of the doge, a venerable and conspicuous form, stood aloof, in complete armour, on the prow of his galley. The great standard of St. Mark was displayed before him; his threats, promises, and exhortations, urged the diligence of the defenders; the vengeful spirit of the Venetian soldo was the first warrior on the shore. The nations admired the magnanimity of the blind old man, without reflecting that his age and infirmities diminished

---

1. From the version of Venere I adopt the well-sounding word, palander, which is still used, I believe, in the Mediterranean. But I had written in French, I should have preferred the original and expressive denomination of vessali, or hanseri, from the huns, or door, which was let down sight to: a bridge; but a drawbridge, at sea, was clove into the side of the ship. (See Ducange in Villehardouin, No. 14 and No. 15.)

2. To avoid the vague expressions of the followers, &c. in use after Villehardouin, the word accounts for all homines who were not knights.

3. If we visit the parade and Westminster-hall, we may observe the arms of the doge, (Ducange, Glosston, Latin, Socles. &c. tom i. p. 236—237.)

4. It is needless to observe that on the subject of Galata, the chain, &c. Ducange in accurate and faith. Comme likewise the proper chapters of the P. Christians of the same author.

5. The inhabitants of the city were reduced to a very straitened condition by the want of bread. In the taxonomia of Benevento, the text of Benevento, nor did he care enough to consider the topography of the particular city. The word could have been used with more propriety.

6. Quatre crus taillons outres plus. (Villehardouin, No. 131.) must be understood as more than a military age. La Bru in (Hist. des Rel. Em- paler, tom. ii. p. 417.) allows Constantinople a multitude of inhabitants, of whom 60,000 horses, and an immense number of foot soldiers. In its greatness it contained not less than 20,000 souls. (Bell's Travels, vol. ii. p. 91, 92.) but as the Turks keep no registers, and as the Europeans are barbarians, it is impossible to as- certain. (Niebuhr, Voyages en Turkie, tom. i. p. 17.) The real popu- lation of their cities.

7. On the most correct plans of Constantinople, I know not how to measure more than 300,000 souls. Le Bru in (Hist. des Rel. Em- paler, tom. ii. p. 417.) allows Constantinople a multitude of inhabitants, of whom 60,000 horses, and an immense number of foot soldiers. In its greatness it contained not less than 20,000 souls. (Bell's Travels, vol. ii. p. 91, 92.) but as the Turks keep no registers, and as the Europeans are barbarians, it is impossible to as- certain. (Niebuhr, Voyages en Turkie, tom. i. p. 17.) The real popu- lation of their cities.
the price of life, and enhanced the value of immortal glory. On a sudden, by an invisible hand, (for the standard-bearer was probably slain,) the banner of the republic was fixed on the rampart: twenty-five towers were rapidly occupied by the garrison, and the crew expelled by gunpowder. The doge had despatched the intelligence of his success, when he was checked by the danger of his confederates. Nobly declaring, that he would rather die with the pilgrims than gain a victory by their destruction. He had not the means to send for his troops, nor time to call his, and hastened to the scene of action. He found the six weary diuinative battles of the French encompassed by sixty squadrons of the Greek cavalry, the least of which was more numerous than the largest of their divisions. Shame and despair had provoked Alexius to the last effort of a general sally; but he was awed by the firm order and manly aspect of the Latins; and, after skirmishing at a distance, withdrew his troops in the close of the evening. The silence or tumult of the night evaporated his fears; and the timid garrison, collecting a treasure of ten thousand pounds of gold, basely deserted his wife, his people, and his fortune; threw himself into a bark, stole through the Bosphorus, and landed in shameless safety in an insecure harbour of Thrace. As soon as they were apprized of his flight, the Greek nobles sought pardon and indulgence. The doge was unremissed, and Isaac expected each hour the visit of the executioner. Again saved and exalted by the vicissitudes of fortune, the captive in his imperial robes was replaced on the throne, and surrounded with prostrate slaves, whose real terror and affected joy he was incapable of discerning. At the declining day hostilities were suspended; and the Latin chiefs were surprised by a message from the lawful and reigning emperor, who was impatient to embrace his son, and to reward his generous deliverance.

Restoration of the emperor Isaac Angelus, and his son Alexius, July 13.

But these generous deliverers were unwilling to release their hostages, till they had obtained from his father the payment, or at least the promise, of their recompense. They chose four ambassadors, Matthew of Montmorency, our historian, the marshal Chailhorn, and two Alexians, to conduct and accompany the emperor. The gates were thrown open on their approach, the streets on both sides were lined with the battle-axes of the Danish and English guards; the presence chamber glittered with gold and jewels, the house was a subduer of virtue and power; by the side of the blind Isaac, his half-dead wife was seated by the sister of the king of Hungary; and by her appearance, the noble matrons of Greece were drawn from their domestic retirement, and mingled with the circle of senators and soldiers. The Latins, by the mouth of the marshal, spoke like men conscious of their merits, but who respected the work of their own hands; and the emperor clearly understood, that his son’s engagements with Venice and the pilgrims must be ratified without hesitation or delay. Withdrawing into a private chamber, the emperor, a chamberlain, an interpreter, and the four ambassadors, the latter of whom was inquired with some anxiety into the nature of his stipulations. The submission of the eastern empire to the pope, the succour of the Holy Land, and a present contribution of two hundred thousand marks of silver. These conditions were weighty; was his prudent engraver explicable: they are hard to accept, and difficult to perform. But no conditions can exceed the measure of your services and deserts. After this satisfactory assurance, the ambassadors mounted on horseback, and introduced the of Constantiople to the city and palace: his youth and marvellous adventures engaged every heart in his favour, and Alexius was solemnly crowned with his father in the dome of St. Sophia. In the first days of his reign he despatched armed expeditions against two nations disturbed by intestine dissension; and the posterity of plenty and peace, were delighted by the joyful catastrophe of the tragedy; and the discontent of the nobles, their regret, and their fears, were covered by the polished surface of pleasure and loyalty. The mixture of two discordant nations in the same capital excited many alarms, and his frequent expeditions were endanger'd; and the suburb of Galata, or Pera, was assigned for the quarters of the French and Venetians. But the liberty of trade and familiar intercourse was allowed between the friendly nations; and each of the pilgrims was tempted by interest and curiosity to visit the churches and palaces of Constantinople. Their rude minds, insensible perhaps of the finer arts, were astonished by the magnificent scenery: and the poverty of their native towns enhanced the populousness and riches of the first metropolis of Christendom. Descending from his state, young Alexius was prompt to the interests and pleasures of the age. The nine months intervene between the summer and the winter. But the climate of Constantinople is changeable, and the grandeur of the season may be experienced amidst the tracts of the Scythia, or the cold, and the ice of the Alps. The short residence of Isaac and his son is despatched in five chapters, p. 352—382.
In a peremptory tone, they recapitulated their services and his engagements; and boldly declared, that unless their just claims were fully and immediately satisfied, they should no longer hold him either as a sovereign or a friend. After this defiance, the first that had ever wounded an imperial ear, they departed without betraying any symptoms of fear; but their escape from a servile palace and a famous city astonished the ambassadors themselves; and their return to the camp was the signal of mutual hostility.

Among the Greeks, all authority and wisdom were overthrown by the impetuous multitude, who mistook their rage for their valour, their emotion for their fanaticism for the support and inspiration of Heaven. In the eyes of both nations, Alexius was false and contemptible: the base and spurious race of the Angeli was rejected with clamorous disdain; and the people of Constantinople encompassed the senate, to demand at their hands a more worthy emperor. To every senator, conspicuous by his birth or dignity, they successively presented the purple: by each senator the deadly garment was repulsed; the contest lasted three days; and we may learn from the historian Nicetas, one of the memoirs of the assembly, that fear and weakness were the guidelines of their choice. A phantom, which vanished in oblivion, was forcibly proclaimed by the crowd; 1 but the author of the tumult, and the leader of the war, was a prince of the house of Ducas; and his common appellation of Alexius was chiefly to be discerned by the epithets Flandrino, which in the vulgar idiom was the close juncture of his black and snaggy eye-brows. At once a patriot and a courtier, the perfidious Mourzoufle, who was not destitute of cunning and courage, opposed the Latins both in speech and action, inflamed the passions of the Greeks for strength and their fanaticism with the example of his cousin Isaac, who became the object of universal esteem and confidence, while Alexius, who trusted him with the office of great chamberlain, and tinged his buckskin with the colours of royalty. At the dead of night, he rushed into the bed-chamber with an affrighted aspect, exclaiming that the palace was attacked by the people; and betrayed by the guards. Starting from his couch, the unsuspecting prince threw himself into the arms of the enemy, who had contrived his escape by a private staircase. But that staircase terminated in a prison: Alexius was seized, stripped, and loaded with chains; and, after tasting the bitterness of death, he was delivered to the fury of the mob, who crowned his escape by a private staircase.

The death of the emperors, and the usurpation of Mourzoufle, had changed January—April, the nature of the quarrel. It was no longer the disagreement of allies who overvalued their services, or neglected their obligations; the French and Venetians were now as much at variance with Alexius as the Latins, although they did not deliberate on the untimely fate of their companion, and swore revenge against the perfidious nation who had crowned his assassin. Yet the prudent doge was still inclined to negotiate; he asked as a debt, a subsidy, or a fine, fifty thousand pounds of gold, about two millions sterling; nor would the conference have been abruptly broken, if the zeal, or policy, of Mourzoufle had not refused to sacrifice the Greek church to the safety of the state. 2 Amidst the invectives of his foreign and domestic enemies, we may discern that he was not unworthy of the character which he had assumed, of the public champion: the second siege of Constantinople was for more than a thousand years afterwards the subject of daily talk. The city was replenished, and discipline was restored, by a severe inquisition into the abuses of the former reign; and Mourzoulé, an iron mace in his hand, visiting the posts, and affecting the port and aspect of a warrior, was an object of terror to his soldiers, at least, and to his enemies. The Latins and the Greeks made two vigorous and well-conducted attempts to burn the navy in the harbour; but the skill and courage of the Venetians repulsed the fire-ships; and the vanguard of the Latins deserted themselves without injury in the sea.

---

1 His name was Nicholas Combai; he deserved the praise of Niceas and the vengeance of Mourzoufle (p. 362). 2 Villhardouin (No. 116) speaks of him as a favourite, without meaning that he was otherwise; for he wrote to the emperor of Ducas, who, p. 362.) 3 This negotiation, probable in itself, and attested by Niceas (p. 365), is entitled as scandalous by the delirium of Danilo and Villhardouin.

In a naval battle: the Greek emperor was vanquished by Henry, brother of the count of Flanders; the advantages of number and surprise aggravated the shame of his defeat; his buckler was found on the field of battle; and the imperial standard, a divine image of the Virgin, was presented, as a trophy and a relic, to the Cinisician monks of St. Bernard.

Near three months, without excepting the holy season of Lent, were consumed in skirmishes and preparations, before the Latins were ready or resolved for a general assault. The land fortifications had been found impregnable; and the Venetians, we are informed, that the shore off the Propontis, the anchorage was unsafe, and the ships must be driven by the current far away to the straits of the Hellespont; a prospect not unpleasing to the reluctant pilgrims, who sought every opportunity of breaking the army. From the harbour, therefore, the Venetians established a fleet on shore opposite to the besieged; and the emperor placed his scarlet pavilions on a neighbouring height, to direct and animate the efforts of his troops. A fearless spectator, whose mind could entertain the ideas of pomp and passion, and admire the grandeur of such an array of embattled armies which extended above half a league, the one on the ships and galleys, the other on the walls and towers raised above the ordinary level by several stages of wooden turrets. Their first fury was spent in the discharge of darts, stones, and fire, from loophole windows, but the Netherlands, the Venetians were skilful; they approached the walls; and a desperate conflict of swords, spears, and battle-axes, was fought on the trembling bridges that grappled the floating to the stable battlements. In more than a hundred places, the assault was urged, and the defence was sustained. Till the superiority of ground and numbers finally prevailed, and the Latin trumpets sounded a retreat. On the ensuing days, the attack was renewed with equal vigour, and a similar event; and in the night, the doge and the barons held a council, apprehensive only for the public danger: not a voice pronounced the words of escape or treaty; and each warrior, according to his temper, embraced the hope of victory, or the assurance of a glorious death.

By the experience of the former siege, the Latins were instructed, but the Latins were animated; and the knowledge that Constantinople might be taken, was of more avail than the local precautions which that knowledge had inspired for its defence. In the third assault two armies were linked together to double their strength; a strong north wind drove them on the shore; the bishops of Troyes and Soissons led the van; and the auspicious names of the

---

1 Baldwin, and all the writers, honour the names of these two heroes.

2 With an allusion to Homer, Nicetas calls him ὑπέρτατος, πλήρως, ἵρυξαν, ἁπέτειον, or eighteen yards high, a nature which would, indeed, have excused the terror of the Greeks. On this occasion, the historian seems fond of the marvellous, than of his country, or perhaps of truth. Baldwin exclaims in the words of the psalmist, peremptorily unus ex nobis cenotum alium.

3 Williams, at the 130th is again ignorant of the author of this more legitimate fire, which is ascribed by Gunther to a golden comet Tucuonius (c. 14.) They seem ashamed, the incendiaries.

4 For the destruction of the Electum see Villehardouin, (N. 113-114.) Baldwin's second Epistle to Innocent III, appendix, p. 300, 1. 153, with the same Tormentin and Gascières, of the Chronicle of the Greeks, (p. 255, 256.) and born with some hints from Dandolo, (Chron. Venet. p. 323, 324.) and Gunther, (Hist. C. P. c. 14.) who add the decorated jubilee, and Cross of the foot, and the Cincture or the Elymian synib, of a great armament on the Adriatic, under a very different name, and of the same kind. The foot, and Cross are a fiction anterior to the fact.

5 Constans says the church of the civium quasi duo milia, &c. (Gunther, c. 15.) Arithmetic is an excellent touchstone to try the amplifications of passion and rhetoric.
In this great revolution we enjoy the mimicry of the singular fidelity of comparing the narrations of Villehardouin and Nicetas, the opposite feelings of the marshals and the singular benefits accruing to the conquerors from the three final quartets which annihilated so vast a portion of the buildings and riches of the city! What a stock of such things as could neither be used or transported, was maliciously or wantonly destroyed! How much treasure was idly wasted in gaming, debauchery, and riot! And what precious objects were bestowed for a vile price by the impotence or ignorance of the soldiers, whose reward was stolen by the base industry of the last of the Greeks! Those alone, who had nothing to lose, might derive some profit from the revolution; but the misery of the upper ranks of society was strongly painted in the personal adventures of Nicetas Chater. His fortune had been reduced to ashes in the second conflagration, and the senator, with his family and friends, found an obscure shelter in another house which he possessed near the church of St. Sophia. It was the only benefit of this mean habitation that his friend, the eminent merchant, guarded in the disguise of a soldier, till Nicetas could save, by a precipitate flight, the relics of his fortune and the chastity of his daughter.

In a cold winter season, these fugitives, nursed in the lap of prosperity, departed on foot; their wife was mounted on a horse; and their daughter was carried on them to carry their baggage on their own shoulders; and their women, whom they placed in the center, were exhorted to conceal their beauty with dirt, instead of adorning it with paint and jewels. Every step was exposed to insult and danger; the threats of the strangers were less painful than the taunts of the plebeians, with whom they were now levelled; nor did the exiles breathe in safety till their mournful pilgrimage was concluded at Selymbria, above forty miles from the capital. On the way they overtook the patriarch, without his horse and also without his mule, riding on an ass, and reduced to a state of apostolic poverty, which, had it been voluntary, might perhaps have been meritorious. In the mean while, his desolate churches were profaned by the licentiousness and party zeal of the Latins. After stripping the gems and pearls, they converted the chalices, sagrario and into drinking-cups; their tables, on which mockery, they gamed and feasted, were covered with the pictures of Christ and the saints; and they trampled under foot the most venerable objects of the Christian worship. In the cathedral of St. Sophia, the ample veil of the sanctuary was rent asunder for the sake of the golden fringes; and the altar, a monument of art and riches, was broken in pieces and shared among the captors. Their mules and horses were laded with the wrought silver and guilt earrings, which they tore down from the doors and chimneys of the buildings, and the beasts stumbled under the burden, they were stabbed by their patient drivers, and the holy pavement streamed with their impure blood. A prostitute was seated on the throne of the patriarch; and that daughter of Belial, rated the revenue of the crown, as below that of the foreign clergy, which amounted to 60,000 marks a year. (Matthew Paris, p. 454 Horne's History of England, vol. ii. p. 379.)

The disorders of the country of Constantinople, and his own adventures, are feebly described by Nicetas, p. 367—369, and in the Supplement to the Chronicles of the Church of Rome, pp. 292—295. The adventures of Villehardouin are justified by Innocent III. (Istituta, c. 92,) but Villehardouin does not betray a symptom of pity or regret.

At the council of Lyons, A.D. 1245, the English ambassadors

Vol. 11. — W 21
as she is styled, sung and danced in the church, to ridicule the hymns and processions of the orientals. Not a shade of the inadequate and dead feeling from violation: in the church of the apostles, the tombs of the emperors were rifled; and it is said, that after six centuries, the corpse of Justinian was found without any signs of decay or putrefaction. In the streets, the French and Flemings elbowed themselves and their horses in painted robes and flowing head-dresses of linen: and the coarse insensibility of their feasts insulted the splendid sobriety of the east. To expose the arms of a people of scribes and scholars, they affected to display a pen, an inkhorn, and a sheet of paper, without discerning that the instruments of science and valour were alike feeble and useless in the hands of the modern Greeks.

Destruction of the statues. Their reputation and their language encouraged them, however, to despise the ignorance, and to overlook the progress of the, Latins. In the love of the arts, the national difference was still more obvious and real; the Greeks preserved with reverence the works of their ancestors, which they could not imitate; and, in the destruction of the statues which resemble people, complaints and invective of the Byzantine historian. We have seen how the rising city was adorned by the vanity and despotism of the imperial founder; in the ruins of paganism, some gods and heroes were saved from the axe of superstition; and the forum and hippodrome were adorned with the fragments of a better age. Several of these are described by Nicetas, in a florid and affected style; and, from his descriptions, I shall select some interesting particulars. 1. The victorious charioteers were cast in bronze, at their own, or the public expense, and fully placed in the hippodrome; they stood aloft in their chariots, wheeling round the goal; the spectators could admire their attitude, and judge of the resemblance; and of these figures, the most perfect might have been transported from the Olympic stadium. 2. The sphynx, horse-horn, and crocodile, denote the climate and manufacture of Egypt, and the spoil of that ancient province. 3. The she-wolf, suckling Romulus and Remus; a subject alike pleasing to the old and the new Romans: but which could rarely be treated before the decline of the Greek sculpture, 4. An eagle holding and tearing a serpent in his talons: a domestic monument of the Byzantines, which they ascribed, not to a human artist, but to the magic power of the philosopher Apollonius, who by this talisman delivered the city from several calamities. 5. A statue and his dray, which were erected by Augustus in his colony of Nicopolis, to commemorate a verbal omen of the victory of Actium. 6. An equestrian statue; which passed in the vulgar opinion, for Joshua, the Jewish conqueror, stretching out his hand to stop the course of the descending sun. A more classical tradition recognized the figures of Bellerophon and Pegasus; and the free attitude of the steed seemed to mark that he trod on air, rather than on earth. 7. A square and lofty obelisk of brass; the sides were embellished with a variety of picturesque and rural scenes; birds singing, rusties labouring, or playing on their pipes; sheep bleating; lambs skipping; the sea, and a scene of fish; and the country table with victual, playing, and pelting each other with apples; and, on the summit, a female figure turning with the slightest breath, and thence denominated the wind's attendant.

8. The Phrygian shepherd presenting to Venus the prize of beauty, the apple of discord. 9. The head of a destitute poor man, which might have moved her barbarian disciples to pity and remorse. 10. The man, or divinity, form of Hereleus, as he was restored to life by the master-hand of Lyssipus; of such magnitude, that his thumb was equal to the waist, his leg to the situate, a common man his chest ample, his shoulders broad, his limbs strong and muscular, his hair curt his aspect commanding. Without his bow, or quiver, or club, his lion's skin carelessly thrown over him, he was seated on an osier sofa, his arm laid on a leg and his head reclining, his left knee bent, and supporting his elbow, his left hand, on his left hand, his countenance indignant and pensive. 11. A colossal statue of Juno, which had once adorned her temple of Samos; the enormous head by four yoke of oxen was laboriously drawn to Constantinople; and the palace of the emperors, which stood on the Acropolis, thirty feet in height, and representing with admirable spirit the attributes and character of the martial maid. Before we accuse the Latins, it is just to remark, that this Pallas was destroyed after the first siege, by the fire and superstition of the Greeks themselves. The other statues of brass which I have enumerated, were broken and melted by the unfeeling avarice of the crusaders; the cost and labour were consumed in a moment; the soul of genius evaporated in smoke; and the remnant of base metal was coined into money for the payment of the troops. Bronze is not the most durable of monuments; from the marble forms of Phidias and Praxiteles, the Latins might turn aside with stupid contempt; but unless they were crushed by some accidental injury, those useless stones stood secure on their pedestals. The most enlightened of the strangers, above the gross and sensual pursuits of their countrymen, more piously exercised the right of conquest in the search and seizure of the relics of the saints. Immense was the supply of heads and bones, crosses and images, that were carried from this renowned city; to the churches of Europe; and such was the increase of pilgrimage and obligation, that no branch, perhaps, of more lucrative plunder was imported from the east. Of the writings of antiquity, many that still existed in the twelfth century are now lost. But the pilgrims were not solicitous to save or transport the volumes of an unknown tongue: the perishable substance of paper or parchment can only be preserved by the multiplication of

4 To illustrate the statues of Hercules, Mr. Harris quotes a Greek epigram, and engraves a beautiful gem, which does not however copy the attitude of the statue: in the latter Hercules had not his club, nor his belt girded on his hips, nor his workman's bag, nor his pack of wines and pease, nor his golden cap of liberty, nor anything to indicate his strength.
5 Transcribe these proportions, which appear to me inconsistent with each other, and with any attempt to express the spectacle of a bound baited boar; of Nicetas was no more than aftication and vanity.
6 Nicetas in Basco Angelico et Abaco, c. 3. p. 535. The Latin editor very properly observes, that the historian, in his bombastic style, produces ex police elephanto.
7 Le Collectanea historico topographica, p. 508. (Ed. Paris, 1744. p. 390. 419.) The Latins are branded with the livelli reproch, foto la pla deh sper- si, avena, fper inscription in the t 겁니다 of they took the head and breast of a horse for a bear, and the leg for an arm.
8 Yet the Venetians had the merit of removing four bronze horses from Constantinople to the place of St. Mark, (Sanuto. Viet del Dogi, in Rerum Jtalianarum, tom. i. p. 272.)
9 Winkelmann, Hist. de l'art, tom. i. p. 599. 592.
10 Southern robberies of the abbots Marin, which fraud, shame, or rather carelessness, has dropped in the common editions. It is proposed to engrave this plate to the work at the press of Mr. Harris, (Bodleian, Gr. 847.) and immoderately praised by the late ingenious Mr. Harris of Salisbury, (Philological Inquiries, p. iii. c. p. 304-305.)
CHAPTER XXII.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

copies; the literature of the Greeks had almost centered in the metropolis; and, without computing the extent of our loss, we may drop a tear over the libraries that have perished in the triple fire of Constantinopole.1

After the death of the lawful princess, the French and Venetians, confident of justice and victory, agreed to divide and regulate their future possessions.2 It was stipulated by treaty, that twelve electors, six of either nation, should be nominated; that a majority should choose the emperor of the east; and that, if the votes were equal, the decision of chance should ascertain the successful candidate. To him, with all the titles and prerogatives of the Byzantine throne, they assigned the two principal districts of the empire, with a fourth part of the Greek monarchy. It was defined that the three remaining portions should be equally shared between the republic of Venice and the barons of the Latins, with a fourth part of the Greek monarchy.7

1 I shall conclude this chapter with the notice of a modern history, which illustrates the taking of Constantinople by the Latins; but which, from the manner in which the event has been otherwise related, the historian has thought proper to suppress. The confusion of names is almost beyond correction. Paolo Romano, the son of the compiler of voyages, was directed by the senate of Venice to write the history of the conquest; and this order, which he receivanced in the year 1307, he executed in a manner so correct, as to be included in the list of the noble families of Venice. His work is entitled, 'Historia de Venediis in oriente.'

2 The eastern conquests of the Latins were the result of a rapid series of victories, which were crowned with the sack of Constantinople, and the loss of the empire of the East. The Greeks, under their despot, the emperor Alexius Comnenus, endeavored to resist
the advance of their conquerors; but their efforts were in vain.

3 The Latin conquest of Constantinople was the result of a rapid
series of victories, which were crowned with the sack of Constantinople, and the loss of the empire of the East. The Greeks, under their despot, the emperor Alexius Comnenus, endeavored to resist
the advance of their conquerors; but their efforts were in vain.

4 The Latin conquest of Constantinople was the result of a rapid
series of victories, which were crowned with the sack of Constantinople, and the loss of the empire of the East. The Greeks, under their despot, the emperor Alexius Comnenus, endeavored to resist
the advance of their conquerors; but their efforts were in vain.

5 The Latin conquest of Constantinople was the result of a rapid
series of victories, which were crowned with the sack of Constantinople, and the loss of the empire of the East. The Greeks, under their despot, the emperor Alexius Comnenus, endeavored to resist
the advance of their conquerors; but their efforts were in vain.

6 The Latin conquest of Constantinople was the result of a rapid
series of victories, which were crowned with the sack of Constantinople, and the loss of the empire of the East. The Greeks, under their despot, the emperor Alexius Comnenus, endeavored to resist
the advance of their conquerors; but their efforts were in vain.

7 The Latin conquest of Constantinople was the result of a rapid
series of victories, which were crowned with the sack of Constantinople, and the loss of the empire of the East. The Greeks, under their despot, the emperor Alexius Comnenus, endeavored to resist
the advance of their conquerors; but their efforts were in vain.
Division of the emperor. Dionysius the Areopagite, in his testament, says, that the dominion of the Venetians was more ample than that of the Latin emperor. No more than four or five of his subjects could be compared with the other people, that is, the people of the Venetian dominion.

The fall of the Lusignans on the island of Cyprus, and the consequent accession of the Genoese to the throne of the island, had occasioned the expedition of the Genoese of the Ionian coast to the war against the Turks.

The Venetian fleet, under the command of Bartolomeo Colonna, and theGenoese fleet, under the command of Giovanni Gradenigo, met in the bay of Alexandria, on the coast of Egypt, and joined forces to attack the Turkish fleet, which was coming from the Red Sea.

The battle took place on the 2nd of June, 1583, and the Venetian and Genoese fleets were victorious.

The Venetian fleet, under the command of Bartolomeo Colonna, and the Genoese fleet, under the command of Giovanni Gradenigo, met in the bay of Alexandria, on the coast of Egypt, and joined forces to attack the Turkish fleet, which was coming from the Red Sea.

The battle took place on the 2nd of June, 1583, and the Venetian and Genoese fleets were victorious.

The Venetian fleet, under the command of Bartolomeo Colonna, and the Genoese fleet, under the command of Giovanni Gradenigo, met in the bay of Alexandria, on the coast of Egypt, and joined forces to attack the Turkish fleet, which was coming from the Red Sea.

The battle took place on the 2nd of June, 1583, and the Venetian and Genoese fleets were victorious.
Theodore Lascaris, emperor of Nica, A.D. 1204–1222.

Theodore Lascaris, known as Theodore II Lascaris, was a Byzantine emperor who reigned from 1204 to 1222. He was the younger son of William II of Nicaea and a member of the Lascaris dynasty, which had roots in Italian descent. Theodore's reign was marked by significant military campaigns and administrative reforms.

The Lascaris dynasty was influential in the history of the Byzantine Empire, particularly after the fall of Constantinople in 1204. Theodore II is known for his efforts to restore the Byzantine Empire's lost territories and the capital city of Constantinople. His reign saw the establishment of the Latin Empire in Constantinople, which was later challenged by the Byzantine Empire's attempt to reclaim the city.

Theodore's reign was also characterized by the struggle against the Latin forces that had occupied Constantinople, and his efforts to establish control over territories that had been lost. Despite these challenges, Theodore's rule was marked by significant achievements and the establishment of a new capital, Nicaea.

Theodore's legacy includes his contributions to the Byzantine military and administrative structure, and his efforts to maintain the Byzantine Empire's cultural and spiritual heritage. His rule was a period of transition, as the Byzantine Empire faced new challenges and the political landscape of the region was undergoing significant changes.

Theodore Lascaris's reign was a time of both opportunities and constraints, as the Byzantine Empire had to navigate the complex political and military landscape of the late 12th and early 13th centuries. His efforts to reclaim lost territories and maintain the Byzantine Empire's status as a major power in the region are a testament to his leadership and determination.
gated by national hatred, the firmest band of association and secrecy; the Greeks were impatient to sheath their daggers in the breasts of the victorious strangers; but the execution was prudently delayed, till Henry, the emperor's brother, had transported the thevans and his troops beyond the Hellespont. Most of the towns and villages of Thrace were true to the moment and the signal: and the Latins, without arms or suspicion, were slaughtered by the vile and merciless revenge of theirkinsmen. From Demotica, the first scene of the massacre, the surviving vassals of the count of St. Pol escaped to Adrianople; but the French and Venetians, who occupied that city, were slain or expelled by the furious multitude; the garrisons that could effect their retreat fell back on each other towards the metropolis; and the fortress to which they repaired, was taken by surprise, its garrison, who drank, as it was said, the blood of their captives, and sacrificed the christians on the altars of their gods. Alarmed by the sudden and growing danger, the emperor despatched a swift messenger to recall envoys from Henry and his troops; and had Baldwin expected the return of his gallant brother, with a supply of twenty thousand Armenians, he might have encountered the invader with equal numbers and a decisive superiority of arms and discipline. But the spirit of chivalry could seldom discriminate caution from cowardice: and the emperor took the field with a hundred and forty knights, and their train of archers and sergeants. The marshal, who dissuaded and obeyed, led the van guard in their march to Adrianople; the main body was held behind the count of St. Pol, who, when the trumpet's sound, the cavalry should mount and form; but that none, under pain of death, should abandon themselves to a desultory and dangerous pursuit. This wise injunction was first disobeyed by the count of Brienne, who involved the only road against the royal captives, in his rashness and ruin. The Comans, of the Poutrian or Tartar school, fled before their first charge; but after a career of two leagues, when the knights and their horses were almost breathless, they suddenly turned, rallied, and encompassed the heavy squadrons of the Franks. Peter and Capet, with the count, were slain on the field; the victory of Baldwin, A.D. 1205, was not decided one disdained to fly, if the other refused to yield, their personal bravery made a poor atonement for their ignorance, or neglect, of the duties of a general. Proud of his victory and his royal prize, the Bulgarian advanced to relieve Adrianople and achieve the destruction of the Latins. They must inevitably have been destroyed, if the marshal of Romania had not dis played a cool courage and consummate skill; uncommon in all ages, but most uncommon in those times, when war was a passion, rather than a science. His grief and fears were poured into the firm and faithful bosom of the doge; and while in the camp he diffused an assurance of safety, which could only be realized by the general belief. All day he maintained his perilous station between the city and the barbarians. Villehardouin decamped in silence at the death of St. Pol; and the masterly reason of three days would have deserved the praise of Xenophon, and the ten thousand. In the rear, the marshal supported the weight of the pursuit; in the front, he moderated the impatience of the fugitives; and wherever the Comans approached, they were repelled by a line of im penetrable spears. On the third day, the weary troops beheld the sea, the solitary town of Rodosto, and their friends, who had landed from the Asiatic shore. They embraced, they wept; but they united their arms and counsels; and, in his brother's absence, count Henry assumed the regency of the empire, at once in a state of calamity. The Venetians drew from the summer heats, seven thousand Latins, in the hour of danger, deserted Constantinople, their brethren, and their vows. Some partial success was overbalanced by the loss of one hundred and twenty thousand Comans. The Venetian and Genoese lines were unequal to the main, no more was left than the capital, with two or three adjacent fortresses on the shores of Europe and Asia. The king of Bulgaria was resistless and inexorable; and Calo-John respectfully eluded the demands of the pope, who conjured his new proleyle to restore peace and the emperor to the afflicted Latins. The deliverance of Baldwin, he said, was no longer in the power of man: that prince had died in prison; and the manner of his death is various related—

Death of Baldwin.

Alarmed by ignorance and credulity. The lovers of peace imputed the death of the aged king to the perversity of the aged captives, who, in the generosity of the emperor, was tempted by the amorous queen of the Bulgarians; that his chaste refusal exposed him to the falsehood of a woman and the jealousy of a savage; that his hands and feet were severed from his body; that his bleeding trunk was cast among the carcasses of dogs and horses; and that he breathed three days, before he was devoured by the birds of prey. About twenty years afterwards, in a wood of the Netherlands, a hermit announced himself as the true Baldwin, the emperor of Constantinople, and lawless champion of the Latins. The pope, hearing of his escape, his adventures, and his penances, among a people prone to believe and to rebel; and, in the first transport, Flanders acknowledged her long-lost sovereign. A short examination before the French court detected the impostor, who was punished with an ignominious death; but the Flemings still adhered to the pleasing error; and the countess Jane is accused by the gravest historians of sacrificing to her ambition the life of an unfortunate father.

In all civilized hostility, a treaty is established the exchange or ransom of prisoners: and if their captivity be prolonged, their condition is known, and they are treated according to their rank with humanity.

The Comans were a Tartar or Turkmen horse, which encompassed in a Tartar or Turkmen horse, which encompassed in

A.D. 1205, place Rondato three days' journey town, from Adrianople: but Vigierans, in his version, has most abundantly substituted the three days to this error, which, as Vigierans has has entrapped several moderns, whose names I shall spare. A.D. 1205, place Rondato three days' journey, town, from Adrianople: but Vigierans, in his version, has most abundantly substituted the three days for this error, which, as Vigierans has has entrapped several moderns, whose names I shall spare.

A.D. 1205, place Rondato three days' journey town, from Adrianople: but Vigierans, in his version, has most abundantly substituted the three days for this error, which, as Vigierans has has entrapped several moderns, whose names I shall spare.

A.D. 1205, place Rondato three days' journey town, from Adrianople: but Vigierans, in his version, has most abundantly substituted the three days for this error, which, as Vigierans has has entrapped several moderns, whose names I shall spare.

A.D. 1205, place Rondato three days' journey town, from Adrianople: but Vigierans, in his version, has most abundantly substituted the three days for this error, which, as Vigierans has has entrapped several moderns, whose names I shall spare.
ty or honour. But the savage Bulgarian was a stranger to the laws of war; his prisoners were involved in darkness and silence; and above a year elapsed before the Latins could be aroused to guard the peace of the throne. Before his brother, the regent Henry, would consent to assume the title of emperor. His moderation was applauded by the Greeks as an act of rare and inimitable virtue. Their light and perfidious ambition was eager to seize or anticipate the moment of a vacancy, while in Bulgaria, a people, who found in their arms and people, was gradually defined and confirmed in the monarchies of Europe. In the support of the eastern empire Henry was gradually left without an associate, as the heroes of the crusades retired from the world or from the war. The doge of Venice, the venerable Dardelo, in the diminished republic, and the Frank sunk into the grave. The marquis of Montferrat was slowly recalled from the Peloponnesian war to the revenge of Baldwin and the defense of Thessalonica. Some nice disputes of feudal homage and service were reconciled in a personal interview between the emperor and the king: they were arranged by mutual esteem and the common danger; and their alliance was sealed by the nuptials of Henry with the daughter of the Italian prince. He soon deplored the loss of his friend and father. At the persuasion of some faithful Greeks, Boucicace made a bold adventure and went to the aid of Henry, who was at that time engaged in the war against the Bulgarians. On the king of Thessalonica was presented to Calo-John, who enjoyed the honours, without the merit, of victory. It is here, at this melancholy event, that the pen or the voice of Jeffrey of Villehardouin seems to drop or to expire; and if he still exercised his military oaths, it was with murmurs and reproaches. The mind of the emperor was still more disheartened by his son's death. The character of Henry was not unequal to his arduous situation: in the siege of Constantinople, and beyond the Hellespont, he had deserved the fame of a valiant knight and a skilful commander; and his courage was tempered with a degree of prudence and mildness unknown to his impetuous brother. In the double war against the Greeks of Asia and the Bulgarians of Europe, he was ever the foremost on shipboard or on horseback; and though he cautiously provided for the success of his arms, the drooping Latins were not equal to them. Of the Latins, described as the second fearless emperor. But such efforts, and some supplies of men and money from France, were of less avail than the errors, the cruelty, and death, of their most formidable adversary. When the despaire of the Greek subjects invited Calo- John as their deliverer, they hoped that he would protect their liberty and adopt their laws: they were soon taught to compare the degrees of national ferocity, and to execute the savage conqueror, who no longer deserved his intention of dispossessing Thrace, of demolishing the cities, and massacring the Latins was extinguished. Many towns and villages of Thrace were already evacuated; a heap of ruins marked the place of Philippopolis, and a similar calamity was expected at Demotika and Adrianoopolis, by the first authors of the revolt. They raised a cry of grief and repentance to the throne of Henry: the emperor alone had the magnanimity to forgive and trust them. No more than four hundred knights, with their sergeants and archers, could be assembled under his banner; and with this slender force he fought and repulsed the Bulgarian, who, besides his infantry, was at the head of forty thousand horse. In this expedition, Henry felt the difference between a hostile army and the discipline and valor of the Latins, preserved by his arms; and the savage, with shame and loss, was compelled to relinquish his prey. The siege of Thessalonica was the last of the evils which Calo- John inflicted or suffered; he was stabbed in the night in his tent; and the general, perhaps the assassin, found him weltering in his blood, satirized the blow with general applause to the lance of St. Demetrius. After several victories, the prudence of Henry concluded an honourable peace with the successor of the tyrant, and with the Greek princes of Nice and Epifro. If he ceased some doubtful limits, an ample victory was gained for him, his followers; and his reign, which lasted only ten years, afforded a short interval of prosperity and peace. Far above the narrow policy of Baldwin and Boniface, he freely trusted to the Greeks the most important offices of the state and army: and this liberality of sentiment and practice was the more reasonable, as the princes of Nice and Epifro had already learned to seduce and employ the mercenary valour of the Latins. It was the aim of Henry to unite and reward his deserving subjects of every nation and language; but he appeared to be less solicitous of returning to Europe, than to unite the two churches. Polagius, the pope'slegate, who acted as the sovereign of Constantinople, had interdicted the worship of the Greeks, and sternly imposed the payment of tithes, the double procession of the Holy Ghost, and a blind obedience to the Roman pontiff. As the weaker party, they pleased the duties of conscience, and implored the rights of toleration: "Our bodies," they said, "are Caesar's, but our souls belong only to God." The persecution was checked by the firmness of the emperor; and if we can believe that the same prince was poisoned by the Greeks themselves, what may we not surmise of the idea of the sense and gratitude of mankind. His valour was a vulgar attribute, which he shared with ten thousand knights; but Henry possessed the superior courage to oppose, in a superstitious age, the pride and avarice of the clergy. In the cathedral of St. Sophia he po sumed to place his throne on the right hand of the patriarch; and this presumption excited the sharpest censure of pope Innocent the third. By a salutary edict, one of the first examples of the laws of mortmain, he prohibited the alienation of fields: many of the Latins, desiring to sell or exchange their estates to the church for a spiritual or temporal reward; these holy lands were immediately discharged from military service; and a colony of soldiers would have been gradually transformed into a colony of priests. The virtuous Henry died at Thessalonica, in the defence of that kingdom, and of an infant, the son of his friend Boniface. In the two first emperors of Constantinople, the male line of the counts of Flanders, was extinguished. Many towns and villages of Thrace were already evacuated; a heap of ruins marked the place of Philippopolis, and a similar calamity was expected at Demotika and Adrianoopolis, by the first authors of the revolt. They raised a cry of grief and repentance to the throne of Henry: the emperor alone had the magnanimity to forgive and trust them. No more than four hundred knights, with their sergeants and archers, could be assembled under his banner; and with this slender force \footnote{3 Villehardouin, No. 237. I quote, with regret, this lamentable conclusion, where we lose at once the original history, and the richest source of information may be drawn. See Henry's two Enquiries to Innocent III. (Gesta, c. 106, 107.)}

\footnote{4 See the treaty and league of Pepper and the popes; De la Barre, p. 234, 251-252.}

1 The church of this patron of Thessalonica was served by the monks of the holy sepulchre, and contained a divine ointment which distilled daily and was the most abundant and miraculous of all the church of Constantinople. (c. 17.) J. Barbet (Hist. du Bas Empire, tom. xxii. p. 120—122.) has found, perhaps in Serdica, some of the remains of this church, which determined the service of the holy sepulchre, and the prerogative of the emperor.}

Peter of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople, A. D. 1217. April 9.
the princess Yolande, with her husband Peter of Courtenay, count of Auxerre, was invited by the Latins to assume the empire of the East. The royal birth of his father, the noble origin of his mother, recommended to the barons of France the first cousin of their customary greatness. To assert and adorn this title he was reduced to sell or mortgage the best of his patrimony. By these expedients, the liberality of his royal kinsman Philip Augustus, and the national spirit of chivalry, he was enabled to pass the Alps at the head of one hundred and forty knights, and five thousand five hundred sergeants and archers. After some hesitation, pope Honorius the third was persuaded to crown the successor of Constantine: but he performed the ceremony in a church without the walls, lest he should seem to imply or to bestow any right of sover- eignty on a war, who was regarded as the enemy of the Latins. The Venetians had engaged to transport Peter and his forces beyond the Adriatic, and the emperor, with her four children, to the Byzantine palace; but they required, as the price of their service, that he should respect Durazzo from the deposit of Epirus. Michael Angelus, or Courtenay, the first of the dynasty that besieged the succession of his power and ambition to Theodore, his legitimate brother, who already threatened and invaded the establishments of the Latins. After discharging his debt by a fruitless assault, the emperor raised the siege to prosecute a long and perilous journey over land from Durazzo to Thessalonicæ. He was soon lost in the mountains of Epirus: the passes were fortified; his provisions exhausted: he was delayed and deceived by a treacherous negociation of peace and, after Peter of Courtenay and the Roman legate had been arrested in A.D. 1217-1219, a banquet, the French troops, without leaders or hopes, were eager to exchange their arms for the delusive promise of mercy and bread. The Vatican thundered; and the impious Theodore was threatened with a war, who was engaged to sustain the emperor. But the captives emperor and his soldiers were forgotten, and the reproaches of the pope are confined to the imprisonment of his legate. No sooner was he satisfied by the deliverance of the priest and a promise of spoliating the town, than he paralyz'd the despot of Epirus. His peremptory commands suspended the armour of the Venetians and the king of Hungary; and it was only by a natural or untimely death that Peter of Courtenay was released from his hopeless captivity.

Robert emperor of Constantinople.

A.D. 1221-1228.

Yolande, his wife or widow, delayed the proclamation of a new emperor. Before her death, and in the midst of her grief, she was deliv- ered of a son, who was named after his mother. He was the last and most unfortunate of the Latin princes of Constantinop- le. His birth endeared him to the barons of Roman- nia; but his childhood would have prolonged the troubles of a minority, and his claims were superseded by the elder claims of his brethren. The first of these was Philip of Courtenay, who derived from his mother the inheritance of Namur, had the wisdom to prefer the substance of a marquisate to the shadow of an empire; and on his refusal Robert, the second of the sons of Peter and Yolande, was called to the throne of Con- stantinople. Warned by his father's mischance, he pursued his slow and secure journey through Germa- ny and along the Danube: a passage was opened by his sister's marriage with the king of Hungary; and in 1221-1228, the emperor of the Latins crowned in the cathedral of St. Sophia. But his reign was an era of calamity and disgrace: and the colony, as it was styled, of New France, yielded on all sides to the Greeks of Nice and Epirus. After a victory, which he owed to his perfidy rather than his courage, Theodore Angelus entered the kingdom of Thessalonicæ, expelled the feeble Demetrius, the son of the mar- quis Boniface, erected his standard on the walls of Adrianople; and added, by his vanity, a third or fourth name to the list of rival emperors. The relics of the Es, once so decorously swept away by John Vataees, the son-in-law and successor of Theodore Lascaris, and who, in a triumphant reign of thirty-three years, displayed the virtues of both peace and war. Under his discipline the swords of the French mercenaries were the most effectual instrument of his conquests, and of the empire. He was not at once a symptom and a cause of the rising ascendant of the Greeks. By the construction of a fleet, he obtained the command of the Hellespont, reduced the islands of Lesbos and Rhodes, attacked the Vene- tians of Candia, and intercepting their commerce, swept the whole of the Aegean. Once more, the Latin emperor sent an army against Vataees; and in the defeat of that army, the veteran knights, the last of the original conquerors, were left on the field of battle. But the success of a foreign enemy was less painful to the pusillanimous Robert than the insouciance of his Latin subjects, who confounded the weakness of the emperor and the empire. His personal misfor- tunes will prove the anarchy of the government and the fœtidness of the times. The amorous youth that neglected his Greek bride, the daughter of Vataee, to introduce into the palace a beautiful maid, of a private, though noble, family of Artois; and her mother had been tempted by the lustre of the purple to forfeit her engagements with a gentleman of Burgundy. His love was converted into rage; he assembled his friends, forced the palace gates, threw the mother into the sea, and inhumanly cut off the nose and lips of the wife or concubine of the emperor. Instead of punishing the offender, the barons avowed and applauded the savage deed, which as a prince and as a baron he ought to have prevented. He escaped from the guilty city to implore the justice or compassion of the pope: the emperor was coolly exorted to return to his station; before he could obey, he sunk under the weight of grief, shame, and impo- liti<ref>see</ref>ence.

It was only in the age of chivalry that Baldwin II. and value could ascend from a private station to the thrones of Jerusalem and Constantino- ple. The titulare kingdom of Je- A.D. 1226-1254. rusalem had devolved to Mary, the daughter of Isabela, a and of Foulques de Montfort, and granddaughter of Almeric or Amoury. She was given to John of Brienne, of a noble family in Champagne, by the public voice, and the judgment of Philip Augustus, who named him as the most worthy champion of the Holy Land. In the fifth crusade, he led a hundred thousand and Latins to the conquest of Egypt; by the siege of Damiette was achieved; and the subsequent

---

Footnotes:

1. Apollonius (c. 1. 1) affirms, that Peter of Courtenay died by the sword (σταυροτυμός), but from his dark expressions, I should prefer to bequeathed (φαντασάμενος). The chronicle of Auxerre describes the emperor's death till the year 1219; and Auxerre is in the neighbourhood of Courtenay.

2. See the reign and death of Peter of Courtenay, in Ducange. (Hist. de C. P. I. ii. c. 22-33.) who feebly strives to excuse the neglects of the emperor by Honorius III.
failure was justly ascribed to the pride and aversion of the Legate. After the marriage of his daughter with Frederic the second, he was provoked by the emperor's ingratitude to accept the command of the army of the church; and though advanced in life, and despised of royalty, the sword and spirit of John of Brienne were still ready for the service of christendom. In the reign of his great-uncle Baldwin of Courtenay had not emerged from a state of childhood, and the barons of Romania felt the strong necessity of placing the sceptre in the hands of a man and a hero. The veteran king of Jerusalem might have disdained the name and office of regent; they agreed to invest him for his loyalty and prowess. In the regency of emperor, on the sole condition, that Baldwin should marry his second daughter, and succeed at a mature age to the throne of Constantinople. The expectation, both of the Greeks and Latins, was heightened by the renowned, the choice and the presence of John of Brienne: and they admired his martial aspect, his green and vigorous age of more than fourscore years, and his size and stature, which surpassed the common measure of mankind. But averseness, and the love of ease, appear to have chilled the ardour of enterprise: his troops were dis-band, and two years rolled away without actual resistance of Rome. The dangerous alliance of Vataes emperor of Nice, and of Azan, king of Bulgaria. They besieged Constantinople by sea and land, with an army of one hundred thousand men, and a fleet of three hundred ships of war; while the entire force of the Latin emperor was reduced to one hundred and sixty knights and a small addition of sergeants and archers. 'I tremble to relate, that instead of defending the city, the hero made a sally at the head of his cavalry; and that of forty-eight squadrons of the enemy, no more than three escaped from the edge of his invincible sword. Fired by his example, his soldiers, with an arm of fifty thousand men that anchored close to the walls; and twenty-five were dragged in triumph into the harbour of Constantinople. At the summons of the emperor, the vassals and allies armed in his defence; broke through every obstacle that opposed their passage; and in the succeeding year obtained a second victory over the same enemies. By the rude poets of the age, John of Brienne is compared to Hector Roland, and Judas Macabæus: but their credit and glory, receives some abatement from the silence of the Greeks. The empire was soon deprived of the last of her champions: and the dying monarch, was directed to enter paradise in the habit of a Franciscan friar.

Baldwin II. In the double victory of John of Brienne, I cannot discover the name or exploits of his pupil Baldwin, who had attained the age of military service, and who succeeded to the imperial dignity on the decease of his adoptive father. The royal youth was employed on a commission more suitable to his temper; he was sent to visit the western courts, of the pope more especially, and of the king of France; to excite their pity by the view of his innocence and distress; and to obtain some supplies of men or money for the relief of the sinking empire. He thrice repeated these mendiant visits, in which he seemed to prolong his stay, and postpone his return; of the five and twenty years that number were spent abroad than at home; and in no place did the emperor deem himself less free and secure than in his native country and capital. On some public occasions, his vanity might be soothed by the title of Augustus, and by the honours of the purple; and at the general council of Lyons, when Frederick was deposed, and deposed, his oriental colleague was enthroned on the right hand of the pope. But how often was the exile, the vagrant, the imperial beggar, humbled with scorn, insulted with pity, and degraded in his own eyes and those of the nations! In his first visit to England, he was stopped at Dover by a severe remon- strand, that he should presume, without leave, to enter an independent kingdom. After some delay, Baldwin, however, was permitted to pursue his journey, was entertained with cold civility, and thankfully departed with a present of seven hundred marks. From the emperor he was careful of his sight, and of the proclaima- tion of a crusade, and a treasure of indulgences: a coin, whose currency was depreciated by too frequent and lusierisamine abuse. His birth and misfortunes recommended him to the generosity of his cousin Louis the ninth; but the martial zeal of the saint was diverted from Constantinople to Egypt and Palestine; and the public and private property of Baldwin was alleviated, for a moment, by the abatement of the mar- quisate of Namur and the lordship of Courtenay, the last remains of his inheritance. By such shameful or ruinous expediens, he once more returned to Roma- nia; and thirty thousand of his adherents, whose numbers were doubled in the apprehension of the Greeks. His first despatches to France and Engild announced his victories and his hopes; he had reduced the country round the capital to the distance of three days' journey; and if he succeeded against an impor- tant though nameless city, (most probably Chitori,) the frontier would be safe and the passage accessible. But these expectations (if Baldwin was sincere) quickly vanished like a dream; the troops and treasures of France melted away in his unskillful hands; and the throne of the Latin emperor was protected by a dishon-able and servile alliance with the emperor of Rome. To secure the former, he consented to bestow his niece on the unbelieving sultan of Cogni: to please the latter, he complied with their pagan rites; a dog was sacrificed between the two armies; and the contracting parties tasted each other's blood, as a pledge of their fidelity. In the palace, or prison, of Constanti- nople the successor of Augustus demolished the vacant houses for winter-fuel, and stripped the lead from the churches for the daily expense of his family. Some usurious loans were dealt with a scanty hand by the imperial Phalangistes of Hungary; and the Franks of Comanas wereawaned at Venice as the security for a debt. Thirst, hunger, and nakedness, are positive evils; but wealth is relative; and a prince, who would be rich in a private station, may be exposed by the increase of his wants to all the anxiety and bitterness of poverty.

1 Giaimoane (istoria Civile, tom. ii. liv. p. 390—395) discourses the matter in his history, and the double union of the crowns of Naples and Jerusalem.

2 Acaphela, c. 27. The historian was at that time a boy, and resided at Constantinople. In 1223, when he was eleven years old, his father bought the Latin crown, left it a splendid fortune, and escaped to the Greek court of Nice, where his son was raised to the highest honours.

3 Philip Monkas, bishop of Tournay, (A. D. 1271—1282.) has composed a poem, or rather a string of verses, in bad old French, on the Latin emperors of Constantinople, which Ducange has published at the end of his work; see p. 234. For the reign of John of Brienne.

N'Aye, Ector, Roll' no Ogles Ne Jades Machaon no fera Tan ma fit (arpens en service) Com de J.-Es for la traiton. Est il defait et il declarut Est il tout droit et il hardiment qu'il avot.

4 See the reign of John de Brienne, in Ducange, Hist. de C. P. i. liv. c. 15—20.

5 See the reign of Baldwin II. till his expedition from Constantin-opolis, in Ducange, Hist. de C. P. i. iv. c. 1—34, the end, i. v. c. 32.

Vol. II. — N 2
The holy crown But in this abject distress the empe- ror and empire were still possessed of an ideal treasury, which drew its fantastic value from the supposed merit of the true cross. This treasure was somewhat impaired by its frequent division; and a long captivity among the infidels might have placed some suspicion on the fragments that were prod- uced in the east and west. But another relic of the Passion was preserved in the imperial chapel of Con- stantinople, the crown of thorns, of which had been placed on the head of Christ was equally precious and authentic. It had formerly been the practice of the Egyptian debtors to deposit, as a security, the mummy of their parents; and both their honour and their religion were bound for the redemption of the pledge. In the same manner, and in the absence of the emperor, the barons of Romanover borrowed the sum of thirteen thousand one hundred and thirty-four pieces of gold, on the credit of the holy crown: they failed in their performance of the contract, and a rich Venetian, Nicholas Querini, undertook to satisfy their impatient creditors, on condition that the relic should be lodged at Venice, to become his absolute property, if it were not redeemed within a short and definite term. The barons apprized their sovereign of the hard treaty and impending loss; and as the empire could not afford a ransom, the sovereign pontiff pontificating, Baldwin was anxious to snatch the prize from the Venetians, and, in a more honour and emolument in the hands of the most Christian king. Yet the negotiation was attended with some delicacy. In the purchase of relics, the saint would have started at the guilt of usury; but if the manner of expression had been changed, he might lawfully repay the debt, accept the gift, and acknowledge the obligation. His ambassadors, two Dominicans, were despatched to Venice, to redeem and receive the holy crown, which had escaped the dangers of the sea and the galleys of Venice. On their return, they recognized the crown of thorns, the doge and barons, which were applied on a shrine of silver: and within this shrine the monument of the Passion was enclosed in a golden vase. The reluctant Venetians yielded to justice and power; the emperor Frederick granted a free and honourable pass- age of France advanced as far as Troyes in a chariot; to meet with devotion this inestimable relic; it was borne in triumph through Paris by the king himself, barefoot, and in his shirt; and a free gift of ten thousand marks of silver reconciled Baldwin. The sovereign pontiff threatened the Latin emperor to offer with the same generosity the remaining furniture of his chapel; a large and authentic portion of the true cross, the baby-doll of the Son of God; the lance, sponge, and the chain, of his Passion; the rob of Moses; and part of the skull of St. John the baptist. For the reception of these spiritual treasures, twenty thousand marks were expended by St. Louis on a statly foundation, the holy chapel of Paris, on which the museum of Boileau has bestowed a comic immortality. The truth of such crowns and relics cannot be denied by any human testimony, must be admitted by those who believe in the miracles which they have performed. About the middle of the last age, an in- veterate ulcer was touched and cured by a holy prickle of the holy crown;4 the prodigy is attested by the most

4 Under the words Perpurras, Perperras, Hyperpereras, Ducange is short and vague: Monistum persus. From a corrupt passage of Guette- ron, Ducange corrected the form of Persus. It is known that a piece of the auric, the fourth part of a mark of silver, or about ten shillings and sixpence, was used as money in the Commune of Paris as late as 1345. for ecclesiastical purposes, and need not be considered miraculous. For the translation of the holy crown, &c. from Constantinople to Paris, see Ducange (Hist. de la P. L. en, 11-12, 22-23) and Fleurie, Hist. Eccle., tom. xxi. p. 231-234.

5 belly and flaws, a generous and large measure, as the name is derived from the Sainte Chapelle; and many facts relative to the institution are collected and explained by his commentators, Brunet and de St. Marc.

6 It was performed A. D. 1608. March 31, on the feast of Fasci; ious and enlightened christians of France; nor will the fact be easily disproved, except by those who are armed with a general antido to against religious cred-

4 The Latio of Constantinople were on all sides encompassed and pressed: their sole hope, the last delay of their ruin, was in the division of their Greek and Bulgarian enemies, and of this hope they were able to avail themselves by the defection of Venetian emperor of Nice. From the Propontis to the rocky coast of Pamphylia, Asia was peaceful and prosperous under his reign; and the events of every campaign extended his influence in Europe. The strong cities of the hills of Macedonia and Thrace were rescued from the Bulgarians; and the ambition of the empire was circumscribed by its present and proper limits, along the southern banks of the Danube. The sole emperor of the Romans could no longer brook that a lord of Epirus, a Comnenian prince of the west, should presume to dispute or share the honours of the pur- ple; and the humble Demetrius changed the colour of his buskins, and accepted with gratitude the appella- tion of despot. His own subjects were exasperated by his baseness and incapacity: they implored the protection of their supreme lord. After some resis- tance, the emperor of Nice capitulated to the emperor of Nice; and Vatertes resigned without a com- petitor from the Turkish borders to the Adriatic gulf. The princes of Europe revered his merit and power, and had he subscribed an orthodox creed, it should seem that the pope would have abandoned without re- buttance the Latin throne of Constantinople. After the death of Vatertes, the short and busy reign of Theodore his son, and the helpless infancy of his grandson John, suspended the restoration of the Greeks. In the next chapter, I shall explain their domestic revolu- tions; in this place, it will be sufficient to observe that the young prince was oppressed by the ambition of his guardian and colleague Michael Pal- palo-logos, who displayed the virtues and services that belong to the founder of a new dynasty. The emperor Baldwin of the first prelude of his arms. A victory was followed by a defeat; if the race of the Comneni or Angeli survived in these mountains his efforts and his reign; and that superior genius, with Arnaud, Nicole, &c. were on the spot, to believe and attend a miracle which confused the Jesuits, and the Bishop of Nantes, Dom Gervais de Racine, tom. vi. p. 175-187, in his eloquent History of the Popes. Vol. I., p. 127. In 1637, just before the publication of his work, he described the military and religious manifestations of this historical year 1634 with more skill and success, seized the battery, and turned the scales in favour of the controversial Bernardin. The gradual losses of the Latins may be traced in the third, fourth, and fifth books of the compilation of Ducange; but of the Greek conquest he has dropped many circumstances, which may be recovered from the large history of George Apollodorus, and the third book of the Commonwealth of Greece, written in the same year 1639, and published by the same series, who have had the good fortune to meet with learned editors, Capodecastro, and John Bovius in the Academia of Inscriptio-
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

379

the captivity of Villehardouin, prince of Achaia, deprived the Latins of the most active and powerful vessel of their expiring monarchy. The republics of Venice and Genoa disputed, in the first of their naval wars, the command of the sea and the commerce of the east. Pride and interest attached the Venetians to the defence of Constantinople; their rivals were tempted to the same adventure by the glory of victory, and the alliance of the Genoese with the schismatic conqueror provoked the indignation of the Latin church.

Constantinople. Intent on this great object the Emperor Michael visited in person and

A.D. 1254. strengthened the troops and fortifications of the city. His generals and officers were driven from their last possessions: he assaulted without success, the suburb of Galata; and corresponded with a perilous baron, who proved unwilling or unable to open the gates of the metropolis.

The next spring, his favourite general Alexius Strategopulus, whom he had decorated with the title of Caesar, passed the Hellespont with eight hundred horses and some infantry, on a secret expedition. His instructions enjoined him to approach, to listen, to watch, but not to risk any doubtful or dangerous enterprise against the city. The adjacent territory between the Black sea and Sardis was infested by a hardy race of peasants and outlaws, exercised in arms, uncertain in their allegiance, but inclined by language, religion, and present advantage, to the party of the Greeks. They were styled the volunteers, and by their free service the army of Alexius, with the regular troops, was augmented to the number of five and twenty thousand men. By the ardour of the volunteers, and by his own ambition, the Caesar was stimulated to disobey the precise orders of his master, in the just confidence that success would plead his pardon and reward. The wild but audacious design was entertained by the Latins, were familiar to the observation of the volunteers; and they represented the present moment as the most propitious to surprise and conquer. A rash youth, the new governor of the Venetian colony, had sailed with thirty gallies, accompanied by the best of the French knights, on a wild expedition to Daphnusis, a town on the Black sea, at the distance of forty leagues; and the remaining Latins were without strength or suspicion. They were informed that Alexius had passed the Hellespont; but their apprehensions were nullified by the smallness of his original numbers; and their imprudence had not watched the subsequent increase of his army. If he left his main body to second and support his operations, he might advance unperturbed in the night with a chosen detachment. While some applied scaling-ladders to the lowest part of the walls, they were secure of an old Greek, who could introduce their companions through a subterraneous passage into his house; they could soon on the inside break an entrance through the golden gate, which had been long obstructed; and the conqueror would be in the heart of the city, before the Latins could recover from the surprise. Some debate, the Caesar resigned himself to the faith of the volunteers; they were trusty, bold, and successful; and in describing the plan, I have already related

The execution and success. But no sooner had Alexius passed the threshold of the golden gate, than he trembled at his own rashness; he hesitated; till the desperate volunteers urged him forward, by the assurance that in a retreat lay the greatest and most inevitable danger. Whilst the Caesar kept his regulars in firm array, the Comans dispersed themselves, alarmed for their own safety; an alarm was sounded, and the threats of fire and pilage compelled the citizens to a decisive resolution. The Greeks of Constantinople remembered their native sovereigns; the Genoese merchants their recent alliance and Venetian foes; every quarter was in arms; and the air resounded with the name of "Long life and victory to Michael and John, the august emperors of the Romans." Their rival, Baldwin, was awakened by the sound; but the most pressing danger could not prompt him to draw his sword in the defence of a city which he desirous, perhaps, with more pleasure than regret; he fled from the palace to the seashore, where he described the welcome sails of the fleet returning from the vain and fruitless attempt on Daphnusis. Constantinople was irrecoverably lost: but the Latin emperor and the principal families embarked on board the Venetian galleys, and steered for the Isle of Euboa, where they were entertained by the pope and Sicilian king with a mixture of contempt and pity. From the loss of Constantinople to his death, he consumed thirteen years, soliciting the Catholic powers to join in his restoration: the lesson had been familiar to his youth; nor was his language more remote: he still expected an outcome of the former pilgrimages to the courts of Europe. His son Philip was the heir of an ideal empire; and the pretensions of his daughter Catharine were transported by her marriage to Charles of Valois, the brother of Philip the Fair, king of France. The house of Courtenay, in the form of alliances, till the title of emperor of Constantinople, too bulky and sonorous for a private name, modestly expired in silence and oblivion.

After the narrative of the expeditions of the Latins to Palestine and Constantinople I cannot dismiss the subject without reviving the general consequences on the countries that were the scene, and on the nations that were the actors, of these memorable crusades. So soon as the arms of the Franks were withdrawn, the Saracens, who had not the anxiety, were raised in the powerful realms of Egypt and Syria. The faithful disciples of the prophet were never tempted by a profane desire to study the laws or language of the idolaters; nor did the simplicity of their primitive manners receive the slightest alteration from their intercourse in peace and war with the unknown strangers of the west. The Greeks, who thought themselves proud, but who were only vain, showed a disposition somewhat less inflexible. In the efforts for the recovery of their empire, they emulated the valour, discipline, and tactics, of their antagonists. The modern Latins, they might have taught them, if its free spirit would instruct them in the rights of man; and some institutions of public and private life were adopted from the French. The corresponding knowledge of Constantinople and Italy diffused the knowledge of the Latin tongue; and several of the fathers and classics were at length honoured with a Greek version.\(^5\) But the national and religious prejudices of the orientals were inflamed by persecution; and the reign of the Latins confirmed the separation of the two churches.

1 The Greeks, ashamed of any foreign aid, disavow the alliance and succour of the Genoese; but the fact is proved by the testimony of J. Villani, (Chron. i. vi. c. 7, in Muratori, Script. rerum italic. comment. 1, p. 362. During the Progress of Baldwin into Asia, in the year 1204, William de Saulieu, who had been in St. Louis, p. 254, in the Loivre (Ixx.), two imaginary saviors; and U. d. L. (xxiv.), who says, as some preconceived notions must be used in reconciling the discordant opinions of Nicolaus of Lyra and Spanish and Italian Dugan, i. e. c. 21) the Greeks and Seyrathia of Arcapetra, and the numerous army of Michael, in the Epitome de pop. urb. IV. c. 42, &c.)

2 They are described and named by Pachymer, (G. ii. c. 26, &c.)

3 It is needless to seek these Comans in the deserts of Tartary, or even in Moldavia. A part of the hordes had submitted to John Vatha, and was probably united as a nursery of soldiers on some waste lands of Thrace, (Cautan, l. i. c. 2.)

If we compare, at the era of the crusades, the Latins of Europe with the Greeks and Arabians, their respective degrees of knowledge, industry, and art, our rude ancestors must be content with the third rank in the scale of nations. Their successive improvements of superiority more and more ascended the peculiar energy of character, to an active and imitative spirit, unknown to their more polished rivals, who at that time were in a stationary or retrograde state. With such a disposition, the Latins should have derived the most early and essential benefits from a series of events which opened to their eyes the prospect of the world, and introduced them to a long and frequent intercourse with the more cultivated regions of the east. The first and most obvious progress was in trade and manufactures, in the arts which are strongly promoted by the thirst of wealth, the calls of utility, and the gratification of the sense of vanity. Among the crowd of unthinking fanatics, a captive or a pilgrim might sometimes observe the superior refinements of Cairo and Constantinople: the first importer of wind-mills was the benefactor of nations; and if such a sight could have been enjoyed without they grateful and transported, the memory, history has condescended to notice the more apparent luxuries of silk and sugar, which were transported into Italy from Greece and Egypt. But the intellectual wants of the Latins were more slowly felt and supplied: the ardour of studious energy was awakened in Europe by different causes and more recent events; and, in the age of the crusades, they viewed with careless indifference the literature of the Greeks and Arabians. Some rudiments of mathematical and medicinal knowledge might be imparted in practice and in figures; necessity might produce some interpreters for the grosser business of merchants and soldiers; but the commerce of the orientals had not diffused the study and knowledge of their languages in the schools of Europe.\(^6\) If a similar principle of religion repulsed the idiom of the Koran, it should have had a preservative existence and currency in the original text of the gospel; and the same grammar would have unfolded the sense of Plato and the beauties of Homer. Yet in a reign of sixty years, the Latins of Constantinople disdained the speech and learning of the ancients, and those manuscripts were the only treasures which the natives might enjoy without rapine or envy. Aristotle was indeed the oracle of the western universities, but it was a barbarous Aristotle; and, instead of ascending to the fountain head, his Latin votaries humbly accepted a corrupt and remote version from the Jews and Moors of Andalusia. The principle of the crusade was a savage fanaticism; and the most important effects were analo gous to the cause. Each pilgrim was assigned to return with his sacred spoils, the relics of Greece and Paris: the results of his return were made and followed by a train of mischiefs and visions. The belief of the Catholics was corrupted by new legends, their practice by new superstitions; and the establishment of the inquisition, the mendicant orders of monks and friars, the last abuse of indulgences, and the final progress of idolatry, flowed from the baleful fountain of the holy war. The active spirit of the Latins preyed on their laziness, and the years of the ninth and tenth centuries were the times of darkness, the thirteenth and fourteenth were the age of absurdity and fable.

In the profession of Christianity, in the cultivation of a fertile land, the northern conquerors of the Roman empire continued to labour, and ascribed the most signal exceptions of providence and miracles, and rekindled the embers of the arts of antiquity. Their settlements about the age of Charlemagne had acquired some degree of order and stability, when they were overwhelmed by new swarms of invaders, the Normans, Saracens, and Hungarians, who re defeated the western countries of Europe into their former state of anarchy and barbarism. About the eleventh century, the second tempest had subsided by the expulsion or conversion of the enemies of chris tendom: the tide of civilization, which had so long been checked, set in with a steady and un course; and a fairer prospect was opened to the hopes and efforts of the rising generations. Great was the increase, and rapid the progress, during the two hundred years of the crusades; and some philosophers have applauded the propitious influence of these holy wars, as an essential period of the progress of mankind. But towards the maturity of Europe, \(^7\) the lives and labours of millions, which were buried in the east, would have been more profitably employed in the improvement of their native country: the accumulated stock of industry and wealth would have overflowed in navigation and trade; and the Latins would have been enriched and enlightened by a pure and friendly correspondence with the eminates of the east. In one respect I can indeed perceive the accidental operation of the crusades, not so much in producing a benefit as in removing an evil. The larger portion of the in habitants of Europe were chained to the soil, without freedom, or property, or knowledge; and the two orders of ecclesiastics and nobles, whose numbers were comparatively small, alone deserved the name of citizens and men. This oppressive system was supported by a period of barbarism, that was far to understand the arts of the clergy and the swords of the barons. The authority of the priests operated in the darker ages as a salutary antidote: they prevented the total extinction of letters, mitigated the fierceness of the times, shielded the poor and defenceless, and pro cested the arts. But the independence, rapine, and discord, of the feudal lords were unmix'd with any semblance of good; and every hope of industry and improvement was crushed by the iron weight of the martial aristocracy. Among the causes that undermined that Gothic edifice, a conspicuous place must be allowed to the crusades. The estates of the barons were dissipated, and their race was often extinguished, in these costly and perilous expeditions. Their poverty extorted from their pride those charters of freedom which unlocked the chains of stony letters. Their制度s and followings were dispersed, and the shop of the artificer, and gradually restored a substance and a soul to the most numerous and useful part of the community. The configuration which destroyed the tall and baren trees of the forest gave air and scope to the vegetation of the smaller and nutritive plants of the soil.

\(^{5}\) A short and superficial account of these versions from Latin into Greek, is given by Huet, de Interpretatione et de claris Interpretibus, b. p. 131—153. Maximos Flavolus, a monk of Constantinople, (A. D. 1143.) with the consent of the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, the son of Constantine, was entitled Bibliothecarum, the Metamata, the Metaraepe, and Hercules of Ovid, (A. F. Breydel, tom. i. p. 553.)

\(^{6}\) Wind-mills, first identified in the dry country of Asia Minor, were used in Normandy as early as the year 1165, (Jos. Prives de Francia, t. ii. p. 474.)

\(^{7}\) See the complaints of Roger Bacon, (Scopiosis Britannica, vol. i. chap. xiv.) Yet if Bacon lamented, under whatever name, the loss of Greece, they were prodigies, and owed nothing to the commerce of the east.

\(^{8}\) See the opinion of the great Leibnitz, (Guerre de Fontenelle, tom. i. p. 242.) a master of the history of the middle ages, I shall only instance the pedagogy of the gymnastic, and the flight of the house of Lorena, which were both derived from Palatinus.

\(^{9}\) If I rank the Saracens with the barbarians, it is only relative to their wars, or rather insurrections, in Italy and France, where their sole purpose was to plunder and destroy.

\(^{10}\) On this interesting subject, the progress of society in Europe, a nation of barbarians, which has preserved in a very strong and flourishing state its valour, its freedom, and its constitution, under the same religious name, 200 years has been known Scotland in the times; and it is as private, as well as public, regard, that I repeat the names of Humfry, Robertson, and Adam Smith.

\(^{11}\) Desirous of subject a work by Herenn, entitled Essai sur l'Inter ces des Crusades, (Paris, 1828.) in which the beneficial, though late, results of those holy wars are developed with as much philoso pic sagacity as erudition. — G. T.
Dissertation on the Family of Courtenay.

The purple of three emperors, who have reigned at Constantinople, will authorize me to excuse a dissertation on the origin and singular fortunes of the house of Courtenay, in the three principal branches, I. Of Edessa; II. Of France; and, III. Of England; of which the last only has survived the revolutions of eight hundred years.

Origin of the Family of Courtenay.
A.D. 1029.

I. Before the introduction of trade, which scatters riches, and of knowledge, which dispels prejudice, the prerogative of birth is most strongly felt and most humbly acknowledged. In every age, the laws and manners of the Germans have discriminated the ranks of society: the dukes and counts, who shared the empire of Charlemagne, converted their office to an inheritance; and to his children, each feudal lord bequeathed his honour and his sword. The proudest families are content to lose, in the darkness of the middle ages, the tree of their pedigree, which, however deep and lofty, must ultimately rise from a plebeian root; and their historians must descend ten centuries below the christian era, before they can ascertain any linear succession by the evidence of surnames, of arms, and of authentic records. With the first rays of light, we discern the nobility and opulence of Atho, a French king, whose descendant we now see stripped and dishonoured, without father; his opulence, in the foundation of the castle of Courtenay in the district of Gâtinois, about fifty-six miles to the south of Paris. From the reign of Robert, the son of Hugh Capet, the barons of Courtenay are conspicuous among the immediate vassals of the crown; and Joscelin, the grandson of Atho and a noble dame, is enrolled among the heroes of the first crusade. A domestic alliance (their mothers were sisters) attached him to the standard of Baldwin of Bruges, the second count of Edessa; a prince of inestimable value, which he was worthy to defend, and receive, and able to maintain, an account of the number of his martial followers: and after the departure of his cousin, Joscelin himself was invested with the county of Edessa on both sides of the Euphrates. By the economy in peace, his territories were replenished with Latin and Syrian subjects; his magnificence, of the ancient, double form, with gold and silver, with arms and horses. In a holy warfare of thirty years, he was alternately a conqueror and a captive: but he died like a soldier, in a horse-litter at the head of his troops; and his last glance beheld the flight of the Turkish invaders who had professed him, and left him, in his age and infirmity. His son and successor, of the same name, was less deficient in valor than in vigilance; but he sometimes forgot that dominion is acquired and maintained by the same arts. He challenged the hostility of the Turks, without securing the friendship of the prince of Antioch; and, amidst the painful luxury of Trebizond, in Syria, Joscelin neglected the defence of the christian frontier beyond the Euphrates. In his absence, Zenghi, the first of the Abbeks, besieged and stormed his capital, Edessa, which was feebly defended by a timorous and disaffected cross-keeper; the Franks were oppressed in a bold attempt for his recovery, and Courtenay ended his days in the prison of Aleppo. He still left a fair and ample patrimony. But the victorious Turks were oppressed on all sides the weakness of a widow and orphan; and, for the equivalent of an annual pension, they resigned to the Greek emperor the charge of defending, and the revenue of his territories, which had been lost by the Latin conquest. The count as dowager of Edessa retired to Jerusalem with her two children; the daughter, Agnes, became the wife and mother of a king, the son, Joscelin the third, accepted the office of seneschal, the first of the kingdom, and held his new estates in Palestine by the service of fifty knights. His name appears with honour in all the transactions of peace and war; but he finally vanishes in the fall of Jerusalem; and the name of Courtenay, in this branch of Edessa, was lost by the marriage of his two daughters with a French and German baron.

II. While Joscelin reigned beyond the Euphrates, his elder brother Milo, the son of Joscelin, the son of Atho, continued, near the Seine, to possess the castle of their fathers, which was at length inherited by Rainaud, or Reginald, the youngest of his three sons. Examples of genius or virtue must be rare in the annals of the old families: and, in a remote age, their pride will embrace a deed of rapine and violence; such, however, as could not be perpetrated without some superiority of courage, or, at least, of power. A descendant of Reginald of Courtenay may blush for the public robber, who, several times, threatened to repeat the pursuit, which they had satisfied the king's duties, at Sens and Orleans. He will glory in the offence, since the bold officer could not be compelled to obedience and restitution, till the regent and the count of Champagne prepared to march against him at the head of an army. Reginald bestowed his estates on his eldest daughter, and his daughter on the wife of the royal seventh son of king Louis the Fat; and, A.D. 1193, their marriage was crowned with numerous offspring. We might expect that a private should have merged in a royal name; and that the descendants of Peter of Courtenay, who would have enjoyed the title and honours of princes of the blood. But this legitimate claim was long neglected and finally denied; and the cause of their disgrace will represent the story of this second branch. I. Of all the families now extinct, the most celebrated and the bloodiest is that of the house of France, which has occupied the same throne above eight hundred years, and descends, in a clear and lineal series of miles, from the middle of the ninth century. In the age of the crusades, it was already revered both in the east and west. But from Hugh Capet to the present, the sires or reigns or generations have elapsed; and so precarious was their title, that the eldest sons, as a necessary precaution, were previously crowned during the lifetime of their fathers. The princes of France have long maintained their precedence before the younger branches of the royal line, nor had the princes of the blood, in... the twelfth century, acquired that hereditary lustre which is now diffused over the remote candidates for the succession. 2. The barons of Courtenay must have held their high position, as they continued to do in the rest of the world, since they could impose on the son of a king the obligation of adopting for himself and all his descendants the name and arms of their daughter and his wife. In the marriage of an heiress with her inferi or or her equal, such exchange was often required and allowed a higher position, as they continued to do in the regal stem, the sons of Louis the Fat were incessantly confounded with their maternal ancestors; and the new Courtenays might deserve to forfeit the honour of their birth, which a motive of interest had tempted the Duke of France. 3. The shiner was far more permanent than the reward, and a momentary blaze was followed by a long darkness. The eldest son of these nuptials, Peter of Courtenay, had married, as I have already mentioned, the sister of the counts of Flanders, the two first emperors of Constantinople, he rashly accepted the invitation of the princes of Romania: his two sons, Robert and Baldwin, successively held and lost the remains of the Latin empire in the east, and the grand-daughter of Baldwin the second again mingled her blood with the blood of France and of Valois. To support the expenses of a truce at Constantinople, during the reign of Baldwin the first, the lands were mortgaged or sold; and the last emperors of Constantinople depended on the annual charity of Rome and Naples.

While the elder brothers dissipated their wealth in romantic adventures, and the castle of Courtenay was prolonged by a public loan in brown, the title of that adopted name were propagated and multiplied. But their splendour was clouded by poverty and time: after the decease of Robert, great butcher of France, they descended from princes to barons; the next generations were confounded with the simple gentry; the descendants of Hugh Capet, could no longer be visible in the rural lords of Touraine and of Champignolles. The more adventurous embraced without dishonour the profession of a soldier: the least active and equable might sink, like their cousins of the branch of Bourgogne, in the obscurity of the countship of the Courtenays of France.

The right of wardship enabled a feudal lord to reward his vassal with the marriage and estate of a noble heiress; and Reginald of Courtenay acquired a fair establishment in Devonshire, where his posterity has been seated above six hundred years.

From a Norman baron, Baldwin the Britton, the English conqueror, Hawise, the wife of Reginald, derived the honour of Okew, which was held by the service of ninety-three knights; and a female might claim the only offices of hereditary viscount or sheriff, in the fashionable house of the royal castle of Exeter. Their son Robert married the heiress of Devon; at the end of a century, on the failure of the family of Rivers, his great-grandson, Hugh the second, succeeded to a title which was still considered as a territorial dignity; and twelve earls of Devonshire have flourished in a period of two hundred and twenty years. They were ranked among the chief of the barons of the realm; nor was it till after a strenuous dispute, that they yielded to the feet of Aundel the first place in the parliament of England.

The twelfth century, acquired that hereditary lustre which is now diffused over the remote candidates for the succession. 2. The barons of Courtenay must have held their high position, as they continued to do in the rest of the world, since they could impose on the son of a king the obligation of adopting for himself and all his descendants the name and arms of their daughter and his wife. In the marriage of an heiress with her inferior or her equal, such exchange was often required and allowed a higher position, as they continued to do in the regal stem, the sons of Louis the Fat were incessantly confounded with their maternal ancestors; and the new Courtenays might deserve to forfeit the honour of their birth, which a motive of interest had tempted the Duke of France.

III. According to the old register of III. The Courte Ford Abbey, the Courtenays of Devonshires are descended from prince Florus, the second son of Peter, and the grandson of Louis the Fat. Their family has been, great and richly distinguished, and respectably entertained by our antiquaries, Camden, and Dugdale: b but it is so clearly repugnant to truth and time, that the rational pride of the family now refuses to accept this imaginary founder. The most faithful historians believe, that after giving his daughter, the queen of Rome, to the emperor of the East, he left a descent to the family, by his son, who was raised to the dukedom.

Principia nomum suaeam in Gallia tributum, nisi ille qui par turbae; sed cum esse angare, omnem reputant; adeo, ut est minus suo nomine, plus minus memoriae commemoratus; nam Corneliae et Doctores, a cunctis literis, universitate, de privilegio nobis comprehensius, et de honoribus, quae in archetypis sibi accepserunt, nullius literae, manu, spectabilis ornamentum. Nuper, et in vobis, Claudii, et nostris annis, editor valetudinis, de regibus, et de regina, etc., in libris editis, et ab aliis transmissis, reponi, et reponere de rebus, quae praeceperunt, et praebuerunt, in una collecta, et sistematis, libento inter eo minime reconsideratis, et neque ab alienis, neque ab autrique, praebentur, et in unum redactis, et reductis, satisfaciens vobis, et omnibus, qui in hac Heredis, et Regulis suis, sanctitatem, et gloria adhibere festim desiderat.

Dugdale, Monumentum Anglicanum, vol. i. p. 756. Yet this table must not be inferred before the reign of Edward III. The fullest devotion of the three first generations to Ford Abbey, was followed by an acted abdication, and migration on the other; and in the sixth century, the monks ceased to register the births, actions, and deaths of their patrons.

It is in my history of Pickering, p. 356.

In his Baronage, p. 631, he refers to his own Monument, a MS. of the year 1620, which contains an account of the register of Ford Abbey, and ascertained the phantom Florus, by the unquestionable evidence of the French historians.

He has published the third and most valuable book of Cleveland's History, I have consulted Dugdale, the father of our genealogical business, Barlow, and the Monument of the Courtenays.

This great family, of Ripurarior, or of Redvers, of Rivers, ended in Edward the third's time, in Isabella of Ferrara, a famous and potent dowager, who left a son, with her brother and husband (Dugdale, Baronage, p. 1. p. 516. 517. 518.)
their alliances were contracted with the noblest families, the Veres, Despensers, St. Johns, Talbots, Bohuns, and even the Plantagenets themselves; and in a contest with John of Lancaster, a Courtenay, bishop of London, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, might be accused of profane confidence in the strength and number of kindred. In peace, the earls of Devon resided in their numerous castles and mansions of the west; their ample revenue was appropriated to devotion and hospitality; and the epitaph of Edward, surmounted, from his misfortune, the blind, from his virtues, the good, eulogized with much ingenuity a man serene of spirit; he may however be thoughtless generosity. After a grateful commemoration of the fifty-five years of union and happiness, which he enjoyed with Mabel his wife, the good earth thus speaks from the tomb:

What we gave, we have;
What we spent, we had;
What we left, we lost.8

But their houses, in this sense, were far superior to their gifts and expenses; and their heirs, not less than the poor, were the objects of their paternal care. The sums which they paid for livery and esculin, attest the greatness of the family; and several estates have remained in their family since the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. In war, the Courtenays of England fulfilled the duties, and deserved the honours, of chivalry. They were often intrusted to levy and command the militia of Devonshire and Cornwall; they often attended their supreme lord to the borders of Scotland; and in foreign service, for a stipulated price, they sometimes maintained fourscore men at arms and as many archers. By sea and land they fought under the standards of the Edwards and Henrys: their names are conspicuous in battles, in tournaments and in the list of the order of the Garter; three brothers shared the Spanish victory of the Black Prince; and in the lapse of six generations, the English Courtenays had learned to despise the nation and country from which they derived their origin. In the quarell of the two roses, the earls of Devon adhered to the house of Lancaster, and three brothers successively died, either in the field or on the scaffold. Their honours and estates were restored by Henry the seventh; a daughter of Edward the fourth was not disgraced by the nuptials of a Courtenay; their son, who was created marquis of Exeter, enjoyed the favour of the king, quietly the eighth, and in the camp of Cloth of Gold, he broke a lance against the French monarch. But the favour of Henry was the prelude of disgrace; his disgrace was the signal of death; and of the victims of the jealous tyrant, the marquis of Exeter is one of the most noble and guiltless. His son Edward lived a prisoner in the Tower, and died an exile at Padua; and the secret love of Queen Mary, whom he slighted, perhaps for the princess Elizabeth, has shed a romantic colour on the story of this beautiful youth. The relics of his patrimony were conveyed into strange families by the marshal's order of the eighteenth; but if they had been legally extinct, were revived by the patents of succeeding princes. But there still survived a lineal descendant of Hugh the first earl of Devon, a younger branch of the Courtenays, who have holden the ancient castle above four hundred years, from the reign of Edward the third to the present hour. Their estates have been increased by the grant and improvement of lands in Ireland, and they have been recently restored to the honours of the peerage. Yet the Courtenays still retain the plaintive motto, which appeared on the east front of their ancient house,9 while they sigh for their past greatness, they are doubtless sensible of present blessings; in the long series of the Courtenay annals, the most splendid era is likewise the most unfortunate; nor can an opulent peer of Britain be inclined to envy the emperors of Constantinople, who wanted over Europe the support of their dignity and the defence of their capital.

Chap. XXIII.

The Greek emperors of Nice and Constantinople. — Elevation and reign of Michael Palaeologus. — His false union with the pope and the Latin church. — Hostile designs of Charles of Anjou. — Revolt of Sicily. — War of the Latin Kings in Asia and Greece. — Revolution and present state of Athens.

The loss of Constantinople restored a remonstrance to the momentary vigour to the Greeks. From Greek empire, their palaces, the princes and nobles were driven into the field; and the fragments of the falling monarchy were grasped by the hands of the most vigorous or the most skilful candidates. In the long and barren banquets which the restoration of the empire was made easy task to equal the two characters of Theodore Lascaris and John Ducus Vatatzes,1 who Theodore Lascaris replenished and upheld the Roman standard at Nice in Bithynia. The difference A.D. 1204–1222. of the value of these virtues was happily suited to the diversity of their situation. In his first efforts, the fugitive Lascaris commanded only three cities and two thousand soldiers: his reign was the season of generous and active despair; in every military operation he staked his life and crown; and his enemies, of the Hellenes-point and the Macedon, were surprised by his celerity.2 He was created, and subdued by his boldness. A victorious reign of eighteen years expanded the principality of Nice to the magnitude of an empire. The throne of his successor and son-in-law John Ducus Vatatzes was founded on a more solid basis. — A.D. 1222–1453. a larger scope, and more plentiful resources; and it was the temple, as well as the interest, of Vatatzes to calculate the risk, to expect the moment, and to insure the success, of his ambitious designs. In the decline of the Latins, I have briefly exposed the progress of the Greeks; the prudent and gradual advances of a conqueror, who, in a reign of thirty-three years, rescued the provinces from national and foreign usurpers, till he pressed on all sides the imperial city, a leafless and sapless trunk, which must fall at the first stroke of the axe. But his interior and peaceful administration is still more deserving of notice and praise.3 The calamities of the times had wasted the numbers and the substance of the Greeks; the motives and the means of agriculture were extinguished; and the most fertile lands were left without cultivation or inhabitants. A portion of this vacant property was occupied and improved by the command, and for the benefit, of the emperor; a powerful hand compelled the land, and maintained, a peaceful and useful management, the minute diligence of a private farmer: the royal domain became the garden and granary of Asia; and without impoverishing the people...

9 Cleveland, p. 412. By some it is assigned to a Sire, earl of Devon; but the English denotes the fifteenth, rather than the thirteenth century. 1204 and i: we feel the motto which was probably adopted by the Powderham branch, after the loss of the earldom of Devonshire, ple, the sovereign acquired a fund of innocent and productive wealth. According to the nature of the soil, his lands were sown with corn or planted with vines; the olives were filled with olives, the sheep and hogs; and when Vataces presented to the empress a crown of diamonds and pearls, he informed her with a smile, that this precious ornament arose from the sale of the eggs of his innumerable poultry. The produce of his domain was applied to the maintenance of his palace and households, the calls of dignity and benevolence; the lesson was still more useful than the revenue; the plough was restored to its ancient security and honour; and the nobles were taught to seek a sure and independent revenue from their estates, instead of adorning their splendid beggary by the oppression of the Italian losses. "The demands of nature and necessity," was he accustomed to say, "are indispensable; but the influence of fashion may rise and sink at the breath of a monarch;" and both his precept and example recommended simplicity of mode and use of domestic industry. The education of youth and the revival of learning were the most sovereign objects of his care: and, without deciding the precedence, he pronounced with truth, that a prince and a philosopher are the two most eminent characters of human society. His first wife was Irene, the daughter of Theodore Lascaris, a woman more illustrious by her personal merit, the milder virtues of her sex, than by the blood of the Angelii and Comneni, that flowed in her veins, and transmitted the inheritance of the empire. After her death he was contracted to Anne, or Constance, a natural daughter of the emperor Frederick the second; but as he had not accomplished the years of puberty, Vataces placed in his solitarily bed an Italian damsel of her train; and his amorous weakness bestowed on the concubine the honours, though not the title, of lawful empress. His frugality was evidenced as a dailigous and damnable sin by the monks; and their rude invectives exercised and displayed the patience of the royal lover. A philosophic age may excuse a single vice, which was redeemed by a crowd of virtues; and in the review of his faults, and the more incommensurable passions of Lascaris, the judgment or the use of domestic industry was attributed to the second founders of the empire. The slaves of the Latins, without law or peace, applauded the happiness of their brethren who had resumed their national freedom; and Vataces employed the laudable policy of convincing the Greeks of every dominion that it was their interest to be enrolled in the number of his subjects.

A strong shade of degeneracy is visible between John Vataces and his son Theodore, between the founder who sustained the weight and the heir who enjoyed the splendour, of the imperial crown. Yet the character of Theodore was not devoid of energy; he had been educated in the school of his father, in the exercise of war and hunting; Constantinople was yet spared; but in the three years of a short reign he thrice led his armies into the heart of Bulgaria. His virtues were sullied by a choleric and suspicious temper; the first of these may be ascribed to the ignorance of control; and the second might naturally arise from a dark and imperfect view of the world. The son of Vataces was sown with original errors, and the Greek logothete, George Acropolia, presumed to offend him by the declaration of a free and honest opinion. The emperor half-unsheathed his seminary; but his more deliberate rage reserved Acropolia for a future blow. One of the first offices of the empire was ordered to dismount, stripped of his robes, and extended on the ground in the presence of the prince and army. In this posture he was chastised with so many and such heavy blows from the clubs of two guards or executioners, that when Theodore commanded them to cease, the great warrior was scarcely able to rise and crawl away to his tent. After a seclusion of some days, he was recalled by a peremptory mandate to his seat in council; and so dead were the Greeks to the sense of honour and shame, that it the great dominie, who so equably himself that we acquire the knowledge of his disgrace. The cruelty of the emperor was exaggerated by the pangs of sickness, the approach of a premature end, and the suspicion of poison and magic. The lives and fortunes, the eyes and limbs, of his kinsmen and nobles, were sacrificed to his caprices and caprices; and event theputed the emperors and calumnies of the desiring son of Vataces might deserve from the people, or at least from the court, the appellation of tyrant. A Marion of the family of the Paleologi had provoked his anger by refusing to bestow her beautiful daughter on the vile plebeian who was recommended by his empire. Without regard to her birth or age, her body, as high as the neck, was enclosed in a sack with several cats, who were pricked with pins to irritate their fury against their unfortunate fellow-captive. In his last hours the emperor testified a wish to forgive and to be forgiven, a just anxiety for the fate of John, his son and successor, who, at the age of eight years, was left with no other son of Vataces might deserve from the people, or at least from the court, the appellation of tyrant. A Marion of the family of the Paleologi had provoked his anger by refusing to bestow her beautiful daughter on the vile plebeian who was recommended by his empire. Without regard to her birth or age, her body, as high as the neck, was enclosed in a sack with several cats, who were pricked with pins to irritate their fury against their unfortunate fellow-captive. In his last hours the emperor testified a wish to forgive and to be forgiven, a just anxiety for the fate of John, his son and successor, who, at the age of eight years, was left with no other
Michael Palaeologus, the most illustrious in birth and merit, of the Greek nobility, was one of those who are proud of their ancestors: and so of Michael, the far greater part must be content with Palaeologus, with local or domestic renown; and few there are who dare trust the memorials of their family to the public annals of their country. As early as the middle of the eleventh century, the family of the Palaeologi was conspicuous in the Byzantine history: it was the valiant George Palaeologus who placed the father of the Commenti on the throne; and his kinsmen or descendants continue, in each generation, to lead the armies and counsels of the state. The passion for revenge, which had pursued him during the law of succession, and female succession, been strictly observed, the wife of Theodore Lascaris must have yielded to her elder sister, the mother of Michael Palaeologus, who afterwards raised his family to the throne. In his person, the splendour of birth was dignified by a soldier and a statesman: in his early youth he was promoted to the office of constable or commander of the French mercenaries: the private expenses of a day never exceeded three pieces of gold; but his ambition was rapacious and profuse; and his gifts were doubled by the graces of his conversation, which was so choice as to elude the jealousy of the court; and Michael thrice escaped from the dangers in which he was involved by his own imprudence or that of his friends. I. Under the reign of Justice and Vataces, a dispute arose between two officers, one of whom accused the other of maintaining the heretical right of the Palaeologi. The cause was decided, according to the new jurisprudence of the Latins, by single combat: the defendant was overthrown; but he persisted in declaring that himself alone was guilty; and that he had uttered these heretical words under the compulsion of ambition or knowledge of his patron. Yet a cloud of suspicion hung over the innocence of the constable: he was still pursued by the whispers of malevolence; and a subtle courtier, the archbishop of Philadelphia, urged him to accept the judgment of God in the fiery proving, by seduction and seduction, and by the signet of the throne. In a word, he, and would boldly enter the lists with my accusers; but a layman, a single man, I am not endowed with the gift of miracles. Your piety, most holy prelate, may deserve the interposition of heaven, and from your hands I will receive the feral globe, the pledge of my innocence." The archbishop started; the emperor smiled; and the absolution or pardon of Michael was approved by new rewards and new services. II. In the succeeding reign, as he held the government of Nice, he was secretly informed, that the mind of the absent prince was possessed with jealousy; and that death, or blindness, would be his final reward. Instead of awaiting the return and sentence of Theodore, the constable with some followers escaped from the city and the empire; and though he was plundered by the Turkans of the desert, he found an hospitable refuge in the court of the sultan. In the ambiguous state of an exile, Michael reconciled the duties of gratitude and loyalty to his former and his present masters; admonishing the garrisons of the Roman limit; and, promising, by his influence, the restoration of peace, in which his pardon and recall were honourably included. III. While he guarded the west against the Mosquito of France, he fortified his capital, and condemned in the palace; and such was his loyalty or weakness, that he submitted to be led in chains above six hundred miles from Durazzo to Nice. The civility of the messenger alleviated his disgrace; the emperor's sickness dispelled his danger; and the last part of the death of Theoden, which recommended his infant son, at once acknowledged his innocence and the power of Palaeologus.

But his innocence had been too un- His elevation to the worthy treated, and his power was too strongly felt, to curb an aspiring subject in the fair field that was opened to his ambition. I. To council after the death of Theodore, he was the first to pronounce, and the last to violate, the oath of allegiance to Muzalon; and so dexterous was his conduct, that he reapplied the benefit, without incurring the guilt, or at least the reproach, of the subsequent massacre. In the choice of barons, the interests of the state were already abolished of under candidates; turned their envy and hatred from himself against each other, and forced every competitor to own, that after his own claims, those of Palaeologus were best entitled to the preference. Under the title of great duke, he accepted or assumed, during a long minority, the active powers of government; but his name was a venerable name; and the factious nobles were seduced, or suppressed, by the ascendant of his genius. The fruits of the economy of Vataces were deposited in a strong castle on the banks of the Hermus, in the custody of his faithful Varangian; the constable retained his command or influence over the foreign troops; he employed the guards to possess the treasure, and the treasure to corrupt the guards; and whatever might be the abuse of the public money, his character was above the suspicion of private avarice. By himself, or by his minions, he strove to persuade every rank of subjects, that their own prosperity would rise in just proportion to the establishment of his authority. The weight of taxes was suspended, the perpetual theme of popular complaint; and he prohibited the trials by the ordeal and judicial combat. These barbarities, on the contrary, were already abolished in France and England; and the appeal to the sword offended the sense of a civilized, and the temper of an unwarlike, people. For the future maintenance of their wives and children, the veterans were grateful; the priest and the philosopher applauded his ardent zeal for the advancement of religion and learning; and his vague promise of rewarding merit, was applied by every candidate to his own hopes. Consious of the influence of the clergy, Michael successsor a Without comparing Tacitrus to Thucydides, or Tacitus, I will encrease his narrative, and I. See Acropolita, c. 75, 76, 77, 78, who lived too near the times; Palaeologus (c. 650) who was probably too near of the world; and Acropolita (c. 675, 676) who had the advantage of the world.

b The pedigree of Palaeologus is explained by Ducas. (Famille Byzantine, c. 111.)

To an exhaustive research of the Palaeologi and Gregorios (t. 1, i. c. 7, 12, 29, 30) with visible fight to the father of the reigning dynasty.

c See Acropolita, c. 650, 675, 676, with the account of the beginning of the last century.

d Yet an impenetrable darkness concealed to me in imitation of this practice, 1. That in nations emerging from barbarism, it moderates the licence of private war and arbitrary revenge. 2. That it is ales abridges the measure of wrongs. 3. That it is less savage and more personal; a check to the most vain and ferocious passions; and that the danger of a trial might be some check to a malicious perserverance, and useful barrier against injustice-supported by power. The gallant and unexamined empire of Surrinagne, if doubtless, probably had in his unremitted fate, not had the demand of the combat against his accuser been overruled.
fully laboured to secure the suffrage of that powerful order. Their expensive journey from Nice to Magnesia, Eordaia, Dobris, and Amphilochia; the leading prelates were tempted by the liberality of his nocturnal visits; and the incorruptible patriarch was flattered by the homage of his new colleague, who led his mule by the bridle into the town, and removed to a respectable distance the importunity of the crowd. Without receiving a present by royal descent, Palaeologus encouraged a free discussion into the advantages of elective monarchy; and his adherents asked, with the insolence of triumph, what patient would trust his wealth, or what merchant abandon his vessel, to the hereditary skill of a physician or pilot? The youth of the emperor, the dangerous dangers of his captivity, required the support of a mature and experienced guardian; and an associate raised above the envy of his equals, and invested with the name and prerogatives of royalty. For the interest of the prince and people, without any selfish views for himself or his family, the great duke consented to guard and instruct the son of Theodore; but he signified the happy moment when he might restore to his firmer hands the administration of his patrimony, and enjoy the blessings of a private station. He was first invested with the title and prerogatives of despot, which bestowed the purple garments, and the second place in the Roman monarchy. It was afterwards agreed that John and Michael should be proclaimed as joint emperors, and raised on the buckler, but that the pre-eminence should be reserved for the birth-right of the former. A mutual league of severity and a policy of precaution between the rival partisans and in case of a rupture, the subjects were bound by their oath of allegiance to decree the mis- selves against the aggressor; an ambiguous name, the seed of discord and civil war. Palaeologus was content; but on the day of the coronation, and in the cather- dral of Nice, his zealous adherents most vehemently urged the just priority of his age and merit. The un- seasonable dispute was eluded by postponing to a more convenient opportunity the coronation of John Lascaris; and he walked with a slight diadem in the train of his guardian, who alone received the imperial crown from the hands of the patriarch. It was a great and extreme re- fusal that Arsenius abandoned the cause of his pupil; but the Varangians branded their battle-axes; a sign of assent was extorted from the trembling youth; and sophs, who were now the child should no longer impede the settlement of the na- tion. A full harvest of honours and employments was distributed among his friends by the grateful Palaeolo- gus. In his own family he created a despot and two se- bastocrats; Alexis Stratophenopius was decorated with the title of Caesar; and that veteran commander soon repaid the obligation, by restoring Constantinople to the Greek emperor.

It was in the second year of his reign, while he resided in the palace and gar- dens of Nymphæum, "near Smyrna, that the first messenger arrived at the dead of night; and the stupendous intelligence was conveyed to Michael, after he had been greatly waked by the tender precaution of his sister Eulogia. The man was known or obscure; he produced no letters from the victorious Caesar; nor could it easily be conjectured, after the defeat of Vataces and the recent failure of Palaeologus himself, that the capital had been surpris- ed by a detachment of eight hundred soldiers. As an hostage, the doubtful author was confined, with the assurance for an ample presence; and the imperial court was left some hours in the anxiety of hope and fear, till the messengers of Alexius arrived with the authentic intelligence, and displayed the trophies of the conquest, the sword and sceptre, the bracelets and ornaments, which he had dropped in his precipitate flight. A general assembly of the bishops, senators, and nobles, was immediately con- vened, and never perhaps was an event received with more heartfelt and universal joy. In a studied oration, the new sovereign of Constantineople congratulated his own and the public fortunes. "There was a time," he said, "a far distant time, when the Roman empire extended to the Adriatic, the Tigris, and the confines of Ethiopia. After the loss of the provinces, our capital itself, in these last and calamitous days, has been wrested from our hands by the barbarians of the Franks. But the Great Virgin has again returned in our favour; but our prosperity was that of fugitives and exiles: and when we were asked, which was the country of the Romans, we indicated with a blush the empyrean of the globe and the quarter of the heavens. The divine Providence has now restored to our arms the city of Constantinople, the sacred seat of religion and empire; and it will depend on our valour and conduct to render this important acquisition the pledge and omen of future victories." So eager was the value of the princes who returned from the inhabited world, and the wealth and experience of the Latins. The emperor, accompanied by his triumphal entry into Constantineople only twenty days after the expulsion of the Latins. The golden gate was thrown open at his approach; the devout emperor dismounted from his horse, and the princes of his family and court placed a marble column beside the road, on which Michael Palaeologus, A.D. 1203.

II

his triumphal entry into Constantineople only twenty days after the expulsion of the Latins. The golden gate was thrown open at his approach; the devout emperor dismounted from his horse, and the princes of his family and court placed a marble column beside the road, on which Michael Palaeologus, A.D. 1203.

He was hailed on the summit of a precipice, by the old commandant of the city, who was concealed in the palace of his predecessor. His triumphal entry was accompanied by the acclamations of the people, who were cheered by the peace and safety which they enjoyed. The city was restored to its ancient and ancient state, and the inhabitants were not only presents, but the expense of the republic. Before the Emperor's return, the Genoese had sent to the Emperor's court, and the brave redoubters were seated in the capital city, and had been recovered by their arms. The French barons and the principal families had retired with their empe- ror; but the patient and humble crowd of Latins were attached to the country, and indifferent to the change of masters. Instead of banishing the factories of the Pisans, Venetians, and Genoese, the prudent con- querer accepted their oaths of allegiance, encouraged their industry, confirmed their privileges, and allowed them to live under the jurisdiction of their proper magistrates. Of these nations, the Pisans and Venet- ians preserved their respective quarters in the city; but the services and power of the Genoese deserved at the same time the gratitude and jealousy of the Greeks. Their independent colony was first planted at the sea-port town of Heraclea in Thrace. They were speedily recalled, and settled in the country.

1 The sceptre, the emblem of justice and power, was a long staff, such as was used by the heroes in Homer. By the latter Gregory it was formed of one piece of wood, and the imperial sceptre of the usual by the red or purple colour.

2 The description of this banquet is in the fashion foam; but from the rubric at the point or summit, Decanage (Hist. of C. P. L. v. c. 25, 29) believes that it was the high crowned hat of the Greeks. Could Acropolita mistake the ears of his own court.
The recovery of Constantinople was celebrated as the era of Palaesogus; and, by the right of the sword, renewed his coronation in the church of St. Sophia; and the name and honours of John Lascaris, his pupil and lawful sovereign, were insensibly abolished. But his claims still lived in the minds of the people; and his spirit, though muted for many years of humiliation and bondage. By fear or conscience, Palaesogus was restrained from dippings his hands in innocent and royal blood; but the anxiety of a usurper and a parent urged him to secure his throne, by one of those infamous crimes so familiar to the modern Greeks. The loss of sight incapacitated the young prince for the active business of the world: instead of the brutal violence of tearing out his eyes, the visual nerve was destroyed by the intense glare of a red-hot basin; and John Lascaris was removed to a distant castle, where he spent many years in deep oblivion. Such stoical self control and deliberate guilt seem incompatible with remorse; but if Michael could trust the mercy of Heaven, he was not inaccessible to the reproaches and vengeance of mankind, which he had provoked by cruelty and treason. His cruelty imposed on a service court the duties of an executioner; but the gentle blood of Vespasian condemned his inflexible spirit, so repugnant to the unbounded forgiveness of the gospel. The emperor had artfully instigated, that, if he were still rejected at home, he might seek, in the Roman pontiff, a more indulgent judge; but it was far more easy and effectual to find or to place that judge at the head of the Byzantine church. Arsenius was involved in a vague rumour of conspiracy and disaffection; some irregular steps in his distribution and government were liable to censure; a synod deposed him from the episcopal office; and he was transported under a guard of soldiers to a small island of the Propontis. Before his exile, he suddenly requested that a strict account might be taken of the treasures of the church; boasted, that his sole riches, three pieces of gold, had been earned by transcribing the psalms; continued to assert the freedom of his mind; and denied, with his last breath, the pardon which was implored by the national deputation. The history of Adraniopole, was translated to the Byzantine throne; but his authority was found insufficient to support the absolution of the emperor; and Joseph, a revered monk, was substituted to that important function. This edifying scene was represented in the presence of the senate and the people. At the end of six years, the humble penitent was restored to the communion of the faithful; and humanity would rejoice, that a milder treatment of the captive Lascaris was stipulated as a proof of his remorse. But the spirit of Arsenius still survived in a powerful faction of the monks and clergy, who persevered above forty-eight years in an obstinate schism. Their scruples were treated with tenderness and respect by Michael and his son; and the reconciliation of the Arsenites was the serious labour of the church and state. In the confidence of fanaticism, they had proposed the destruction of a class, the abjuration of a miracle; and when the two papers, that contained their oath and the adverse cause, were cast into a fiery braser, they expected that the catholic verity would be respected by the flames. Alas! the two papers were indiscriminately consumed, and this unforeseen accident confirmed the quarrel of an age. The final treaty displayed the victory of the Arsenites: the clergy abstained during forty days from all ecclesiastical functions; a slight penance was imposed on the laity; the body of Arsenius was deposited in the sanctuary; and in the name of the departed saint, the prince and people were released from the sins of their fathers.

The establishment of his family was

The crime and excommunication of Michael are fairly told by Pachymer (II. c. 10. 14. 15. 16.) and Gregoras (I. c. 4.) His con- clusion and penitence restored their freedom.

Pachymer relates the exile of Arsenius: (G. iv. c. 1—16) he was one of the commentators who visited him in the desert island. The following passage in the treatise of the emperor is an authentic document: "The treatment of the emperor Pachymer to the emperor Nicephorus: Bibilhice, Ecclesiastique, tom. a. p. 55.

Pachymer (I. vii. p. 199) relates the Pachymer trial like a philosopher, and treats with similar contempt a plot of the Arsenites, to hide retribution in the cloister of some old saint. (I. vii. c. 14.) He compensates this incredibility by an image that weeps when it is dry. (I. vii. c. 2.) and the miraculous cures of a deaf and a mute patient. (I. vii. c. 52.)

The story of the Arsenites is spread through the thirteen books of Pachymer. Their undue triumphs are narrated by Gregoras. (G. iv. c. 5.)

The crime and excommunication of Michael are fairly told by Pachymer (II. c. 25—33.) Accropolita. (c. 56.) Nicophares Gregoras (I. c. 1.) and for the treatment of the subject, Latina, D'angeville. (v. c. 30. 31.)

This maladroit invention for extinguishing the sight, was tried by the emperor. Pachymer, in the treatise of the emperor Nicephorus: Bibilhice, Ecclesiastique, tom. a. p. 55.

Pachymer (I. viii. p. 199) relates the Pachymer trial like a philosopher, and treats with similar contempt a plot of the Arsenites, to hide retribution in the cloister of some old saint. (I. vii. c. 14.) He compensates this incredibility by an image that weeps when it is dry. (I. vii. c. 2.) and the miraculous cures of a deaf and a mute patient. (I. vii. c. 52.)

The story of the Arsenites is spread through the thirteen books of Pachymer. Their undue triumphs are narrated by Gregoras. (G. iv. c. 5.)

The crime and excommunication of Michael are fairly told by Pachymer (II. c. 25—33.) Accropolita. (c. 56.) Nicophares Gregoras (I. c. 1.) and for the treatment of the subject, Latina, D'angeville. (v. c. 30. 31.)

This maladroit invention for extinguishing the sight, was tried by the emperor. Pachymer, in the treatise of the emperor Nicephorus: Bibilhice, Ecclesiastique, tom. a. p. 55.

Pachymer (I. viii. p. 199) relates the Pachymer trial like a philosopher, and treats with similar contempt a plot of the Arsenites, to hide retribution in the cloister of some old saint. (I. vii. c. 14.) He compensates this incredibility by an image that weeps when it is dry. (I. vii. c. 2.) and the miraculous cures of a deaf and a mute patient. (I. vii. c. 52.)

The story of the Arsenites is spread through the thirteen books of Pachymer. Their undue triumphs are narrated by Gregoras. (G. iv. c. 5.)

The crime and excommunication of Michael are fairly told by Pachymer (II. c. 25—33.) Accropolita. (c. 56.) Nicophares Gregoras (I. c. 1.) and for the treatment of the subject, Latina, D'angeville. (v. c. 30. 31.)

This maladroit invention for extinguishing the sight, was tried by the emperor. Pachymer, in the treatise of the emperor Nicephorus: Bibilhice, Ecclesiastique, tom. a. p. 55.

Pachymer (I. viii. p. 199) relates the Pachymer trial like a philosopher, and treats with similar contempt a plot of the Arsenites, to hide retribution in the cloister of some old saint. (I. vii. c. 14.) He compensates this incredibility by an image that weeps when it is dry. (I. vii. c. 2.) and the miraculous cures of a deaf and a mute patient. (I. vii. c. 52.)

The story of the Arsenites is spread through the thirteen books of Pachymer. Their undue triumphs are narrated by Gregoras. (G. iv. c. 5.)

The crime and excommunication of Michael are fairly told by Pachymer (II. c. 25—33.) Accropolita. (c. 56.) Nicophares Gregoras (I. c. 1.) and for the treatment of the subject, Latina, D'angeville. (v. c. 30. 31.)

This maladroit invention for extinguishing the sight, was tried by the emperor. Pachymer, in the treatise of the emperor Nicephorus: Bibilhice, Ecclesiastique, tom. a. p. 55.

Pachymer (I. viii. p. 199) relates the Pachymer trial like a philosopher, and treats with similar contempt a plot of the Arsenites, to hide retribution in the cloister of some old saint. (I. vii. c. 14.) He compensates this incredibility by an image that weeps when it is dry. (I. vii. c. 2.) and the miraculous cures of a deaf and a mute patient. (I. vii. c. 52.)

The story of the Arsenites is spread through the thirteen books of Pachymer. Their undue triumphs are narrated by Gregoras. (G. iv. c. 5.) of the purple. Andronicus, afterwards surnamed the Elder, was proclaimed and crowned emperor of the Romans, in the fifteenth year of his age; and, from the first area of his reign, he held himself, as he had held under his father, to be the august title nine years as the colleague, and nay as the successor of his father. Michael himself, had he died in a private station, would have been thought more worthy of the empire: and the assaults of his temporal and spiritual enemies left him few moments to labour for a problem, favoring the happiness of his subjects. He wrested from the Franks several of the noblest islands of the Archipelago, Lesbos, Chios, and Rhodes: his brother Constantine was sent to command in Malvasia and Sparta; and the eastern side of the Morea, from Argos and Naphel, Cape Tanareus, was repossessed by the Greeks. This effusion of christian blood was loudly condemned by the patriarch; and the insolent priest presumed to impede his fears and scruples between the arms of princes. But in the prosecution of these western conquests, the countries beyside the Hellespent were left naked to the Turks and their depredations verified the prophecy of a dying senator, that the recovery of Constantinople would be the ruin of Asia. The victories of Michael were achieved by his lieutenants; his sword rusted in the palace; and, in the transactions of the emperor with the popes, the标ing of Naphel, his political arts were stained with cruelty and fraud.

1. The Vatican was the most natural refuge of a Latin emperor, who had been driven from his throne; and pope Urban the fourth appeared to pity the misfortunes, and vindicate the cause, of the fugitive Baldwin. A crusade, with plenary indulgence, was proounced by his command against the schismatic Greeks; he excommunicated their allies and adherents; solicited Louis the ninth in favour of his kinsman; and demanded a tenth of the ecclesiastical revenues of France and England for the service of the holy war. The subtle Greeks, who watched the rising tempest of the west, attempted to suspend or soothe the hostility of the popes, by suppliant emissaries and respectful letters; but he intimated that the establishment of peace must prepare the reconciliation and obedience of the eastern church. The Roman court could not be deceived by so gross an artifice; and Michael was admonished, that the repentence of the son should precede the forgiveness of the father; and that faith (an ambiguous word) was the guarantee of the basis of alliance and alliance. After a long and affected delay, the approach of danger, and the importunity of Gregory the tenth, compelled him to enter on a more serious negotiation: he alleged the example of the great Vatæces; and the Greek clergy, who understood the intentions of their prince, were not alarmed by the first steps of reconciliation and respect. But when he pressed the consideration of the treaty, they strenuously declared, that the Latinus, though not in name, were heretics in fact, and that they despised those strangers as the vilest and most abhorred of man, who had taken refuge in the place which was the task of the emperor to persuade, to corrupt, to institute, the most popular ecclesiasties, to gain the vote of each individual, and utterly to urge the arguments of christian charity and the public welfare.
The texts of the fathers and the arms of the Franks were balanced in the theological and political scale;
and without approving the addition to the Nicæan creed, the most moderate were taught to confess, that the two hostile propositions of proceeding from the Father by the Son, and proceeding from the Father to the Son, might be reduced to a safe and catholic sense. The supremacy of the pope was a doctrine more easy to conceive, but more painful to acknowledge; yet Michael represented to his monks and prelates, that they might submit to name the Roman bishop as the first of the patriarchs; and that their distance and discordance should guard the liberties of the western church from the mischievous consequences of the right of appeal. He protested that he would sacrifice his life and empire rather than yield the smallest point of orthodox faith or national independence: and this declaration was sealed and ratified by a golden bull.
The patriarch Joseph withdrew to a monastery, to resign or resume his throne, according to the event of the treaty: the letters of union and obedience were subscribed by the emperor, his son Andronicus, and thirty-five archbishops and metropolitans, with their servants and canons; and the compromise was multiplicated by many dioceses which were annihilated under the yoke of the infidels. An embassy was composed of some trusty ministers and prelates; they embarked for Italy, with rich ornaments and rare perfumes, for the altar of St. Peter; and their secret orders authorized the virtual declaration of a new church. Books were received in the general council of Lyons, by pope Gregory the tenth, at the head of five hundred bishops. He embraced with tears his long-lost and renounced children; accepted the oath of the ambassadors, who adjured the schism in the name of the two emperors; adored the prelates with the ring and tri-itre; chanted in Greek and Latin the Nicæan creed with the addition of filioque; and rejoiced in the union of the east and west, which had been reserved for his reign. To consummate this pious work, the Byzantine deputies were speedily followed by the pope's nuncios; and their instruction disclosed the policy of the Vatican, which could not be satisfied with the vain title of supremacy. After viewing the temper of the prince and people, they were enjoined to absorb the schismatic clergy, who should subscribe and swear their abjuration and obedience; to establish in all the churches the use of the perfect creed; to prepare the entrance of a cardinal legate, with the full powers and dignity of his office; and to instruct the emperor in the advantages which he might derive from the temporal union.

But they found a country without a friend, a nation in which the names of the Greeks, Rome and Union were pronounced with A.D. 1277-1282.
abhorrence. The patriarch Joseph was indeed removed; his place was filled by Vecceus, an ecclesiastis.of learning and moderation; and the emperor was still urged by the same motives, to persevere in the same professions. But in his private language Palaeologus affected to deplore the pride, and to blame the innovations, of the Latins; and while he dehased his character by his hostiliti, he justified by his example the abhorrence of his subjects. By the joint suffrage of the new and the ancient Rome, a sentence of excommunication was pronounced against the obstinate schismatics; the censures of the church were executed by the sword of Michael; on the failure of persuasion, he tried the arguments of prison and exile, of whip-

- Of the thirteen books of Pachymer, the first six and the fourth and fifth of the tenth and sixteenth contain the life of Michael, at the time of whose death he was forty years of age. Instead of break-ning off, like his two great predecessors, he overleapd his own row Ducange and Cousin, who number the thirteen books in one hour.

Ducange, Hist. de C. P. i. v. c. 33, &c, from the Epitites of Urban IV.

From their mercantile intercourse with the Venetians and Genoes, they branded the Latins as 'etruscan and unstable, (Pachymer, 1.
v. c. 128,) "Some of the Greeks at times were like the Latins in their etiquette, but the learned Vecceus, (l. v. c. 12) who soon afterwards were converted, (c. 15, 16) and a patriarch, (c. 21.)

21. See the acts of the council of Lyons in the year 1274, Fleury.

22. l. c. 35.

23 A curious instruction, which has been drawn with more or less pertinence, from the Gospels, says, "And he that shall be last in the Vatican, is given in an abstract or version by Fleury, (tom. xviii.
p. 245-246.)
ping and mutilation; those touch-stones, says an historian, of cowards and the brave. Two Greeks still reigned in Ætolia, Æpirus, and Thessaly, with the ap- parent support of the eastern empire, the claims of Constantinople, but they rejected the chains of the Roman pontiff, and supported their refusal by successful arms. Under their protection, the fugitive monks and bishops assembled in hostile synods; and forgot the name of heretic with the galling addition of apostate. The Latins, though they assume the forfeit title of emperor; and even the Latins of Negropont, Thebes, Athens, and the Morea, were suspected of the convert, to join, with open or clandestine aid, the enemies of Palæologus. His fa- vorite generals, of his own blood and family, success- sively deserted, or betrayed, the meretricious truce. His sister Eulogia, a niece, and two female cousins, conspired against him; another niece, Mary queen of Bulgaria, negotiated his ruin with the sultan of Egypt; and, in the public eye, their treason was conspired and foretold him the virtue. To the pope's munificence, who urged the consummation of the work, Palæologus exposed a naked relic of all that he had done and suffered for their sake. They were assured that the guilty sectaries, of both sexes and every rank, had been deprived of their honours, their fortunes, and their liberty; by a spreading list of confiscation and punishment, which involved many persons, the dearest to the emperor, or the best deserving of his favour. They were conducted to the prison, to behold four princes of the royal blood chained in the four corners, and shaking their fetters in an agony of grief and rage. Two of these captives were afterwards released; one by submission, the other by death: but the obsta- nency of their two companions was chastised by the loss of their eyes; and the Greeks, the least adverse to the union, deplore the cruel and ignominious tragedy. And is it possible that any man whom they oppress; but they commonly find some consolation in the testimony of their conscience, the applause of their party, and, perhaps, the success of their undertaking. But the hypocrisy of Michael, which was prompted only by political motives, must have hisfillers and his persecutors; and-to esteem and envy the rebel champions by whom he was detested and despised. While his vi- olation was abhorred at Constantinople, at Rome his slowness was arraigned, and his sincerity suspected; till at length pope Martin the fourth excluded the Greek emperor from the pale of a church, into which he was striving to reduce a schismatic people.

The union dis- solved.

No sooner had the tyrant expired, than the union was dissolved, and abjured by unanimous consent; the churches were purified; the penitents were reconciled; and his son Andronicus, after weeping the sins and errors of his youth, most piously denied his father the burial of a prince and a christian. 3

II. In the distress of the Latins, the walls and towers of Constantinople had fallen to decay; they were restored and fortified by the policy of Michael, who deposited a plenteous store of corn and salt provisions, to sustain the siege which he might hourly expect from the resentment of the western powers. Of these, the two Sicilies was the most formidable neighbour; but as long as they were possessed by Mainfroy, the bastard of Frederic the second, his monarchy was the bulwark, rather than the annoyance, of the eastern empire. The usurper, though a bloody and active prince, was sufficiently employed in the defence of his throne: his prescription by successive popes had separated Mainfroy from the common cause of the Latins; and the forces that might have besieged Constantinople were detained in a crusade against the Turks. The price of the crown of the two Sicilies, was won and worn by the brother of St. Louis, by Charles count of Anjou and Provence, who led the chivalry of France on this holy expedition. The disaffection of his christian subjects compelled Mainfroy to enlist colony of heretics whom his father had planted in Apulia; and this odious succour will explain the deficiency of the catholic hero, who rejected all terms of accommodation. "Bear this message," says Charles, "to the sultan of Oceora, that God and the sword are u impartial, and that he shall either send me to paradise, or I will send him to the pit of hell." The armies met, and though I am ignorant of Mainfroy's doom in the other world, in this he lost his friends, his kingdom, and his life, in the bloody battle of Ben- evento. Naples and Sicily were immediately peopled with a warlike and French nobility; and the rising leader embraced the future conquest of Africa, Greece and Palestine. The most specious reasons might point his first arms against the Byzantine empire; and Palæologus, indignant of his own strength, repeatedly appealed from the ambition of Charles to the humanity of St. Louis, who promised him a just descendant over the mind of his ferocious brother. For a while the attention of that brother was confined at home by the invasion of Comrad, the last heir of the imperial house of Swabia; but the hapless boy sunk in the cruel extremity of his reign, and his successor, the once terror of the world, was exiled by the political scaffold taught the rivals of Charles to tremble for their heads as well as their dominions. A second respite was obtained by the last crusade of St. Louis to the African coast; and the double motive of interest and duty urged the king of Naples to assist, with his powerful fleets and his presence at the siege, the enterprise of the last day's journey round the city, for the imperial domain. In this perilous moment Palæologus was the most eager to subscribe the creed, and implore the protection, of the Roman pontiff, who assumed, with propriety and weight, the character of an angel of peace, the common father of the christians. By his voice, the sword of Charles was chased in the seashore; and the Greek ambassadors beheld him in the pope's anti-chamber, biting his ivory sceptre in a transport of fury, and devoutly resuming the refusal to enfranchise and consecrate his arms. He appears to have respected the disinterested mediation of Gregory

3. This frank and authentic confession of Michael's distress, is exhibited in barbarous Latin by Ogcrius, who signs himself Proconsul Iniunorum, and translated byWalsh, from the Musaeiell of the Vatican. (A. D. 1378. No. 5.) His Annals of the Franciscan order, the Ptolemæi, in the Ptolemaesi Chronicles of Riccardino Malaspina, c. 731-155.) Francesco Giovanni Villani, Liv. II. 19. The authenticity of this work is established by Muratori in the eight and thirteenth volumes of the histories of Italy. In his Annals, (com. c. 15. p. 56-72) he has abridged these great volumes, which are, like his own works, divided into the fragments or portions, to which they are also divided, in the Rapifenn, tome ii. l. xix. tom. iii. l. xx.

4. From the sixth book of Pachymer, particularly the chapters i. 11. 16. 18. 24. 27. He is more the credible, as he speaks of this persecution, in the first of his works, 1734. 1735.)

5. Pachymer, l. iv. c. i.-ii. 17. The speech of Andronicus the Eparch, of the Sicilians, is in the Discourse of Giovanni Villani, (c. 155. 230.) which is published with great facility, by Muratori in the eight and thirteenth volumes of the histories of Italy. In his Annals, (com. c. 15. p. 56-72) he has abridged these great volumes, which are, like his own works, divided into the fragments or portions, to which they are also divided, in the Rapifenn, tome ii. l. xix. tom. iii. l. xx.

6. From the sixth book of Pachymer, particularly the chapters i. 11. 16. 18. 24. 27. He is more the credible, as he speaks of this persecution, in the first of his works, 1734. 1735.)

7. Pachymer, l. iv. c. i.-ii. 17. The speech of Andronicus the Eparch, of the Sicilians, is in the Discourse of Giovanni Villani, (c. 155. 230.) which is published with great facility, by Muratori in the eight and thirteenth volumes of the histories of Italy. In his Annals, (com. c. 15. p. 56-72) he has abridged these great volumes, which are, like his own works, divided into the fragments or portions, to which they are also divided, in the Rapifenn, tome ii. l. xix. tom. iii. l. xx.
widely diffused and so freely circulated the secret was preserved above two years within the Venetian discretion; and each of the conspirators imbibed the maxim of Peter, who declared that he would cut off his left hand if it were conceivable of the intentions of his right. The mine was prepared with deep and dangerous artifice; but it may be questioned, whether the instant explosion of Palermo were the effect of accident or design.

On the vigil of Easter a procession of the unarmed citizens visited a church Vespers, without the walls; and a noble damsel, The Sicilian was rudely insulted by a Frenchman, 2 Peter of Arragon, who sailed from the African coast to Palermo, was saluted as a king, and the large fortune of the island was given to a people on whom he had so long trampled with impunity. Charles was astonished and confounded; and in the first agony of grief and devotion, he was heard to exclaim, “O God! if thou hast decreed to humble me, let it be that I may be lifted up from the pinnacle of greatness! 3” His fleet and army, which already filled the sea-port of Italy, were hastily recalled from the service of the Greek war; and the situation of Messina exposed that town to the first storm of his revenge. Feeble in themselves, and dishonored by a foreign successor, their lives and fortunes have repented, and submitted on the assurance of full pardon and their ancient privileges. But the pride of the monarch was already rekindled; and the most fervent entreaties of the legate could exert no more than a promise, that he would forgive the remainder, after a chosen list of eight hundred rebels had been yielded to his discretion. The despair of the Messinian renewed their courage; Peter of Arragon approached to their relief; 4 and his rival was driven back by the failure of provision and the terror of the equinox to the Calabrian shore. At the same moment, the Catalan admiral, the famous Roger de Loria, swept the channel with an invincible squadron; the French fleet of Charles, fleet, more numerous in transports than Oct. 2 in galleys, was either burnt or destroyed; and the French ships, independent of Sicily and the safety of the Greek empire. A few days before the death, the emperor Michael rejoiced in the full of an enemy whom he hated and esteemed: and perhaps he might be content with the popular judgment, that had they not been matched with each other, Constantinople and Italy must speedily have obeyed the same master. 5 From this disastrous moment, the life of Charles was a series of misfortunes; his capital was insulted, his son was made prisoner, and he sunk into 1 After enumerating the sufferings of his country, Nicholas Speculaeus, a Disciple of Italian Jewellery, Quem omnibus in gravidum, de arbitrio, predicto anno Nostro, secundum annis Speculatii, c. 1, p. 293.

---

2 The French were long taught in this bloody lesson: “Si ipse persequi, haec terribilis iuris: ‘Haec erit et arcessus imperii mei, subito, et dine at Naples.’” — Yemen majesty (replied the Spanish ambassador): “May perhaps arrive at Sicily for vespers.”
3 This result with the subsequent victory, are related by two national writers, Bartholomaeus Sogastus, (in Muratori, tomi. xxi. v. c. 29.) and James de Chazelles, (in the contemporary history of the next century. The part of Speculaeus, the author of Speculum, who has been the subject of the following essay, (nobilissima conserentur) who happened to be with a fleet and army on the African coast, (in l. c. 4. 9.)
4 Nicholas Speculaeus (in l. c. 4. 8.) admires the wisdom of Providence in this equal balance of states and princes. For the honour of Speculaeus, I have rather balanced this account by an imitative writer. of the grave without recovering the isle of Sicily, which, after a war of twenty years, was finally severed from the throne of Naples, and transferred, as an independent kingdom, to a younger branch of the house of Aragon.

I shall not, I trust, be accused of sur- pretion: but I must remark, that even in this world, the natural order of events, A.D. 1280—1307: names of moral retribution. The first Palaeologus had saved his empire by involving the kingdoms of the west in rebellion and blood; and from the Black Andalis, and disdained, the empire of his son. In modern times, our debts and taxes are the secret poison, which still corrodes the bosom of Greece; but in the weak and disorderly government of the middle ages, it was niggled by the present evil of the disbanded armies. Too idle to work, too proud to beg, the mercenaries were accustomed to a life of rapine: they could rob with more dignity and effect under a banner and a chief; and the sovereign, to whom their service was useless, and their presence intolerable, had to yield them to some neighbouring countries. After the peace of Sicily, many thousands of Genoese, Catalans, &c. who had fought, by sea and land, under the standard of Anjou or Aragon, were blended into one nation by the resemblance of their manners and interest. They became the terror of the four seas, and desolated, even by the Turks: they resolved to share the harvest of prey and plunder; and Frederic king of Sicily most liberally contributed the means of their departure. In a warfare of twenty years, a ship, or a camp, was become their country; arms were their sole property and prosperity; value was the only virtue which they knew; their women had imbibed the fearless temper of their lovers and husbands: it was reported, that, with a stroke of their broadsword, the Catalonians would cleave a horseman and a horse; and the report itself was a powerful weapon. Roger de Flor was the most popular of their chiefs; and his personal merit overshadowed the dignity of his prouder rivals of Arragon. The offspring of a marriage between a German gentleman of the court of Frederic the second and a damsel of Brindisi, Roger was successively a templar, and a crusader, and a murderer; he was the most powerful admiral of the Mediterranean. He sailed from Messina to Constantinople, with eighteen galleys, four great ships, and eight thousand adventurers: and his previous treaty was faithfully accomplished. The emperor, the most powerful of men, was without a government: while the princes, captivated by the princely sport that made laughter joy and terror this formidable succour. A palace was allotted for his reception, and a niece of the emperor was given in marriage to the valiant stranger, who was immediately created great duke or admiral of Romania. After a decent repose, he transported his troops over the Propontis, and boldly led them against the Turks: in two bloody battles thirty thousand of the Moslems were slain: he raised the siege of Philadelphia, and deserved the name of the deliverer of Asia. But after a short season of prosperity, the emperor soon fell a victim to his success: every one of his predecessors had been stabbed by the Alban guards; and, though the deed was imputed to his private revenge, his countrymen, who dwelt at Constantinople in the security of peace, were involved in the same proscription. The hangers-on by the prince were chieftains, and he was afraid lest his courtiers should be intimated the crowd of adventurers, who hoisted the sails of flight, and were soon scattered round the coasts of the Mediterranean. But a veteran band of fifteen hundred Catalans or French, stood firm in the strong fortress of Gallipoli on the Hellespont, displayed the banners of Arragon, and offered to revenge and justify their chief by an equal combat of ten or a hundred warriors. Instead of accepting this bold defiance, the emperor Michael, the son and colleague of Andronicus, resolved to oppress them with the weight of multitudes of allies; every nerve was strangled to form an army of thirteen thousand horse and thirty thousand foot; and the Propontis was covered with the ships of the

which they had rescued, they considered as their own; the willing or reluctant maid was saved from the race of circumcision for the embraces of a christian soldier: the exaction of fines and supplies was enforced by licentious rape and arbitrary executions; and, on the resistance of Magnesia, the great duke besieged a village. The policy of the Roman emperors was to be excused by the wrongs and passions of a victorious army; nor would his own authority or person have been safe, had he dared to punish his faithful followers, who were defrauded of the just and covenanted price of their services. The threats and complaints of Andronicus deeply affected the emperor. His Golden bull had invited no more than five hundred horse and a thousand foot soldiers; yet the crowds of volunteers, who migrated to the east, had been enlisted and fed by his spontaneous bounty. While his bravest allies were content with three byzants or pieces of gold, for their monthly pay, an oanice, or even two ounces, of gold, were assigned to the Catalans, whose annual pension would thus amount to near a hundred pounds sterling: one of their chiefs had modestly rated at three thousand crowns the value of his future applause and merit: and thousands had been issued from the treasury for the maintenance of these costly mercenaries. A cruel tax had been imposed on the corn of the husbandman: one third was retrenched from the salaries of the public officers; and the standard of the coin was so shamefully debased, that twenty parts of silver were equal to one part of gold. At the summons of the emperor, Roger evacuate a province which no longer supplied the materials of rapine: but he refused to disperse his troops; and while his style was respectful, his conduct was independent and high. He protested, that if the emperor should recur against him, he would advance forty paces to kiss the ground before him, but in rising from this prostrate attitude Roger had a life and sword at the service of his friends. The great duke of Romania condescended to accept the title and ornaments of Caesar; but he reverted to the new proposals of the government of Asia with a subsidy of corn and money, on condition that he should reduce his troops to the harmless number of three thousand men. Assassination is the last resource of cowards. The Caesar was tempted to visit the royal residence of Adriano with his imperial consort; in the intervals of the most powerful admiral of the Mediterranean. He sailed from Messina to Constantinople, with eighteen galleys, four great ships, and eight thousand adventurers: and his previous treaty was faithfully accomplished. The emperor, the most powerful of men, was without a government: while the princes, captivated by the princely sport that made laughter joy and terror this formidable succour. A palace was allotted for his reception, and a niece of the emperor was given in marriage to the valiant stranger, who was immediately created great duke or admiral of Romania. After a decent repose, he transported his troops over the Propontis, and boldly led them against the Turks: in two bloody battles thirty thousand of the Moslems were slain: he raised the siege of Philadelphia, and deserved the name of the deliverer of Asia. But after a short season of prosperity, the emperor soon fell a victim to his success: every one of his predecessors had been stabbed by the Alban guards; and, though the deed was imputed to his private revenge, his countrymen, who dwelt at Constantinople in the security of peace, were involved in the same proscription. The hangers-on by the prince were intimated the crowd of adventurers, who hoisted the sails of flight, and were soon scattered round the coasts of the Mediterranean. But a veteran band of fifteen hundred Catalans or French, stood firm in the strong fortress of Gallipoli on the Hellespont, displayed the banners of Arragon, and offered to revenge and justify their chief by an equal combat of ten or a hundred warriors. Instead of accepting this bold defiance, the emperor Michael, the son and colleague of Andronicus, resolved to oppress them with the weight of multitudes of allies; every nerve was strangled to form an army of thirteen thousand horse and thirty thousand foot; and the Propontis was covered with the ships of the

8 Some idea may be formed of the population of these cities, from the 36,000 inhabitants of Tripolis, which, in the preceding reign, was considered by the emperor, and ruined by the Turks. (Pachymer, i. v. c. 39. 21.)

9 I have collected these pecuniary circumstances from Pachymer, (i. xii. c. 31. l. vi. c. 31.) who describes the process of the degradation of the gold coin. Even in the prosperous times of John Ducas Vatier, the byzants were computed in equal proportions of the pure and the base metal. The poverty of Michael Palaeologus compelled him to strike a new coin, with nine parts, or carats, of gold, and fifteen of copper, and of this coin they were reduced to ten carats, till in the public distress it was reduced to the moiety. But the mandate of the emperor was not executed, and the prince was relieved by the conclusion of a truce; but these were forever blased. In France, the gold coin is of twenty-two carats (one-twelfth alloy), and the standard of England and Holland is still lighter.
Greeks and Genoese. In two battles by sea and land, these mighty forces were encountered and overthrown by the despair and discipline of the Catalans; the young emperor fled to the palace; and an insufficient garrison was left to protect the frankish realms of the open country. Victory renewed the hopes and numbers of the adventurers: every nation was blinded under the name and standard of the great company; and three thousand Turkish proslavies deserted from the imperial service to join this military association. In the possession of Gallipoli, the Catalans intercepted the trade of Constantinople and the Black sea, while they spread their devastations on either side of the Hellespont over the confines of Europe and Asia. To prevent their approach, the greatest part of the Byzantine territory was laid waste by the Greeks themselves: the peasants and their cattle retired into the city; and myriads of sheep and oxen, for which neither place nor food could be procured, were unprofitably slaughtered on the same day. Four times the emperor Andronicus sued for peace, and four times he was indecisely repulsed, till the want of provisions, and the discord of the chiefs, compelled the Catalans to evacuate the banks of the Hellespont and the neighbourhood of the capital. After their separation from the Turks, the remains of the great company pursued an unsettled career among the Maeotians and Thessalians to seek a new establishment in the heart of Greece.

4 Revolutions of Greece.

After some ages of oblivion, Greece was awakened to new misfortunes by the arms of the Latinins. In the two hundred and fifty years between the first and the last conquest of the people, that once rich and fruitful land was populated by a multitude of petty tyrants; without the comforts of freedom and genius, her ancient cities were again plunged in foreign and intestine war; and, if servitude be comparable to slavery, they might reasonably be considered over the Turkish yoke. I shall now pursue the obscure and various dynasties, that rose and fell on the continent or in the isles; but our licence on the fates of Athens4 would argue a strange ingratiation to the first and purest school of liberal science and amusement. In the partition of the empire, the principality of Athens was assigned to Otho de la Roche, a noble warrior of Burgundy, with the title of great duke, which the Latins understood in their own sense, and the Greeks more foolishly derived from the age of Constantine. Otho followed the example of the marcher lords of Montferrat, to the ample state which he acquired by a miracle of conduct or fortune, was peaceably inherited by his son and two grandsons, till the family, though not the nation, was changed, by the marriage of an heiress into the elder branch of the house of Brienne. The son of that marriage, Walter de Brienne, succeeded to the dignity of marched duke of Athens, and had as his companions Italian mercenaries, whom he invested with fiefs, reduced above thirty castles of the vassal or neighbouring lords. But when he was informed of the approach and ambition of the great company, he collected a force of seven hundred knights, six thousand four hundred horse, and eight thousand foot, and boldly met them on the banks of the river Cephissus in Boeotia. The Catalans amounted to no more than three thousand five hundred horse, and four thousand foot; but the deficiency of numbers was compensated by stratagem and order. They formed round their camp an artificial inundation; the duke and his knights advanced without fear or precaution on the verdant meadow; their horses plunged into the bog; and he was cut in pieces, with the greatest part of the French cavalry. His family and nation were expelled; and his son Walter de Brienne, the titular duke of Athens, the tyrant of Florence, and the constable of France, lost his life in the field of Poitiers. Attica and Boeotia were the rewards of the victorious Catalans; they married the widows and daughters of the slain; and during fourteen years, the great company was the terror of the Grecian states. Their factions drove them to acknowledge the sovereignty of the house of Arragon; and during the remainder of the fourteenth century, Athens, as a government or an appanage, was successively bestowed by the kings of Sicily. After the French and Catalans, the third dynasty was that of the Acarnanians, a family, plebeian at Florence, potent at Naples, and sovereign in Greece. Athens, which they embellished with new buildings, became the capital of a state, that extended over Thessaly, Argos, Corinth, Delphi, and Athens. The petty Greek knighthood was finally determined by Mahomet the second, who strangled the last duke, and educated his sons in the discipline and religion of the seraglio.

Athens, though no more than the present state of shadow of her former self, still contains about eight or ten thousand inhabitants; of these, three-fourths are Greeks in religion and language; and the Turks, who compose the remainder, have relaxed, in their intercourse with the citizens, somewhat of the pride and gravity of their national character. The political power of the sultans is all that remains; but the city has the honour of Mount Hymettus lost any part of its exquisite flavour: but the languid trade monopolized by strangers; and the agriculture of a barren land is abandoned to the vagrant Wallachians. The Athenians are still distinguished by the subtlety and acuteness of their understandings; but these qualities are less ennobled by freedom, and enlightened by study, will degenerate into a low and selfish cunning; and it is a proverbial saying of the country, From the Jews of Thessalonica, the Turks of Negropont, and the Franks of Athens, good Lord deliver them! This ancient people has eluded the tyranny of the Turkish bashaws, by an expedient which alleviates their servitude and aggravates their shame. About the middle of the last century, the Athenians chose for their protector the kin-after a long siege or a chief black mound of the sergilo. This Athenian slave, who possesses the sultan's ear, condescends to accept the tribute of thirty thousand crowns, in the order of the event. Some friends, in the city of St. Sophia, in the distant hope of discovery and revenge. At the end of four years, some youths, climbing by a ladder in search of pigeons' nests, detected the fatal secret; and, as Andronicus felt himself touched and bound by the excommunication, he trembled on the brink of the abyss which had been so treacherously dug under his feet. A synod of bishops was instantly convened to debate this important question:
the rashness of these clandestine anathemas was generally condemned; but as the knee could be untied only by the same hand, and that hand was now deprived of the crosier, it appeared that this posthumous decree was irrepeable by any earthly power. Some faint testimonies of repentance and pardon were extorted from the author of the mischief; but the conscience of the emperor was still wounded, and he desired, with no less ardour than Athanasius himself, the restoration of a patriarch, by whom alone he could be healed.
At the dead of night, a monk rudely knocked at the door of the royal bed-chamber, announcing a revelation of plague and famine, of inundations and earthquakes.
Andronicus started from his bed, and spent the night in prayer, till he fell, or thought that he felt, a slight mote of the earth. The emperor, not knowing the opposite of the emperor on foot led the seraglio.
and monks to the cell of Athanasius, and, after a proper resistance, the saint, from whom this message had been sent, consented to absolve the prince, and govern the church of Constantinople. Untamed by disgrace, and hardened by solitude, the shepherd was more than ever devoted to his cell, and his eloquence was a singular, and, as it proved, a successful, mode of revenge. In the night they stole away the foot-stool or foot-cloth of his throne, which they secretly placed with the decoration of a satirical picture.
The emperor was painted with a bridle in his mouth, and Athanasius leading the tractable beast of the feet of Christ. The authors of the libel were detected and punished; but as their lives had been spared, the Christian priest in sullen indignation retired to his cell; and the eyes of Andronicus, which had been opened for a moment, were again closed by his successor.
If this transaction should be one of the most discreditable and important of a reign of fifty years, I cannot at least accuse the brevity of my materials, since I reduce into some few pages the enormous folios of Pachymer, Cantacuzene, and Nicephorus Gregoras, who have composed the prolix and labyrinthine history of the name and subversion of the emperor John Cantacu zene might inspire the most lively curiosity. His memorials of forty years extend from the revolt of the younger Andronicus to his own abdication of the empire; and it is observed, that, like Moses and Cesar, he was the principal actor in the scenes which he describes. But in this eloquent work we should vainly seek the sincerity of a hero or a poet. Retired in a cloister from the vices and passions of the world, he prescuds not a confession, but an apology, of the life of an ambitious statesman. Instead of unfolding the true circumstances of the events, he displays the smooth and spacious surface of events, highly varnished with his own praises and those of his friends.
Their motives are always pure: their ends always leg-imate: they conspire and rebel without any views of in-

A. Vol. 2.

After an interval of twelve years, from the first publication of Pachy-mer (1740, C. 321) to the last, (1769, C. 692,) and from the first book (c. 1—89, p.
9—153,) relates the civil war, and the civil wars of the year. The Nicenian and Constantinopolitan views, both of which are antedated by the Former; the latter of which is precedent only to the years of the reign of Andronicus, and the reigns of his father and son (1740, c. 89—93, C. 1.) The Nicenian views, both of which are
antedated by the Former; the latter of which
is precedent only to the years of the reign of Andronicus, and the reigns of his father and
son (1740, c. 89—93, C. 1.) The Nicenian
views, both of which are
antedated by the Former; the latter of which
is precedent only to the years of the reign of Andronicus, and the reigns of his father and son (1740, c. 89—93, C. 1.) The Nicenian
The Decline and Fall

Chapter XXIV.

Three civil wars

Three civil wars, adhered to the person, or at least to between the two the government, of the old emperor; and the army, was in the former years, by flight, the emperor, the latter by revolt, and foreign succour, that the malcontents could hope to vindicate their cause and subvert his throne. The soul of the enterprise was the great domestic John Cantacuzene; the sally from Constantinople is the first date of his ancient of its patriotic, an unfriendly historian has not refused to celebrate the zeal and ability which he displayed in the service of the young emperor. That prince escaped from the capital under the pretence of hunting; erected his standard at Adrianople; and, in a few days, assembled fifty to a hundred horse and foot, whom neither honor or duty could have armed against the barbarians. Such a force might have saved or commanded the empire; but their counsels were discordant, their motions were slow and doubtful, and their progress was embarrassed by intrigue and dissimulation.

The quarrel of the two brothers was protracted, and suspended, and renewed, during a ramified period of seven years. In the first treaty, the relics of the Greek empire were divided: Constantinople, Thessalonica, and the islands, were left to the elder; while the younger acquired the sovereignty of the greatest part of Thrace, from Philippi to the Byzantine limits. By the second treaty, he stipulated the payment of his troops, his immediate coronation, and an adequate share of the power and revenue of the states involved in his appanage. It was a triumphal surprise of Constantinople, the final retreat of the old emperor, and the sole reign of his victorious grandson.

The reasons of this delay may be found in the characters of the men and of the times. When the heir of the monarchy first pleaded his wrongs and his apprehensions, his adherents repeated on all sides the inconsistent promise, that he would increase the pay of the soldiers and alleviate the burthens of the people. The grievances of forty years was mingled in his revolt; and the rising generation had witnessed the misfortunes of the state, whose favourites and maxims were of other times. The youth of Andronicus had been without spirit, his age was without reverence; his taxes produced an annual revenue of five hundred thousand pounds; yet the richest of the sovereigns of Christendom was incapable of maintaining three thousand horse and twenty galley, to resist the destructive progress of the Turks. 1 "How different," said the younger Andronicus, "is my situation from that of the son of Philip! Alexander might complain, that his father would leave him nothing to conquer; alas! my grandsire will leave me nothing to lose." But the Greeks were soon admonished, that the public disorders could not be healed by a civil war; and that their young favourite was not destined to be the saviour of a falling empire. On the first repulse, his party was broken by his own levity, their intestine discord, and the intrigues of the ancient court. He attempted each malcontent to desert or betray the cause of rebellion. Andronicus the younger was touched with remorse, or fatigued with business, or deceived by negotiation; pleasure rather than power was his aim; and the licence of maintaining a thousand hounds, a thousand hawks, and a thousand bowmen, was insufficient to sully his fame and disannihil his ambition.

---

1 He was crowned May 26th, 1295, and died October 12th, 1299. (Ducange, Fam. Byz. p. 266.) His brother Theodore, the second marquis, inherited the marquisate of Montferrat, apostatized to the religion and manner of the Latins, and assumed the title of grand marquis of Nicephorus Gregoras, to the bishop of Chalcis, the vizier of Andronicus, and was ex- genius. Greg. L. ix. (1328.) 1. (Cau- of the islands of Italy, of which he was ex- 972-973 A.D. 1293. (Ducange, Fam. Byz. p. 219-221.) 1 We are indebted to Nicephorus Gregoras (I. viii. c. 1.) for the knowledge of the adventures, which were extremely conceals the vices of Andronicus the Younger, of which he has given an account in the associate, 12.C.) of Nicephorus Gregoras (I. viii. c. 13.) with Cantacuzene, (1214) c. 1.) ever guiltless in his intention, the younger Andronicus might imitate a brother's and a father's death to the consequence of his own vices; and deep was the sigh of thinking and feeling men, when they perceived, instead of sorrow and repentance, his ill-assembled joy on the removal of two odious competitors. By these melancholy events, and the increase of his disorders, the mind of the elder emperor was gradually alienated; and after many fruitless reproofs, he transferred on another grandson his hopes and affections. The change was announced by the new oath of allegiance to the reigning sovereign, and the person whom he should appoint for his successor: and the acknowledged heir, after a repetition of insults and complaints, was exposed to the indignity of a public trial. Before the sentence, which would probably have condescended to a dum-
Let us now survey the catastrophe of this busy plot, and the final situation of the principal actors. The age of Andronicus was consumed in civil discord; and, amidst the events of war and treaty, his power and reputation continually decayed, till the fall of his great house. His two wives were chosen by the enraged and paltry pagans, without resistance, to his grandson. His principal commander scorned the repeated warnings of danger; and retiring to rest in the vain security of ignorance, abandoned the feeble monarch, with some priests and pages, to the terrors of a sleepless night. The protector of the young princes was driven from his situation of instant death, which proclaimed the titles and victory of Andronicus the younger; and the aged emperor, falling prostrate before an image of the Virgin, despatched a supplicant message to resign the sceptre, and to obtain his life at the hands of the conqueror. The answer of his grandson was decent and pious; at the prayer of his friends the younger Andronicus assumed the sole administration; but the elder still enjoyed the name and pre-eminence of the first emperor, the use of the great palace, and a pension of twenty-four thousand pieces of gold, one half of which was assigned on the royal table, and the other half divided among the principal fighting men, who were, according to the last will of the young Andronicus, to supply the army. But his impotence was soon exposed to contempt and oblivion: the vast silence of the palace was disturbed only by the cattle and poultry of the neighbourhood, which roved with impunity through the solitary court; and a reduced allowance of a thousand pieces of gold was all that he could ask, and more than he hoped could. His calamities were imputable without the guilt of the native of the public; but his misfortune in his son, Andronicus or Antony, expired in a cell, in the seventy-fourth year of his age; and the last strain of adulation could only promise a more splendid crown of glory in heaven than he had enjoyed upon earth.

The only child of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.

The son of the emperor was the younger Andronicus, which October 17, 1324. Born May 25, 1314. Died June 13, 1346.
France, the heroes of those races which, in the thirteenth century, were translated and read by the Greeks. (Ducange, Fam. Byz.

and the recent lustre of the purple was amply compensated by the energy of a private education. We have seen that the young emperor was saved by Cantacuzene from the power of his grandfather; and, after six years of civil war, the son-in-law of his father was back in triumph to the palace of Constatinople.

Under the reign of Andronicus the younger, the great domestic ruled the emperor and the empire; and it was by his valor and conduct that the isle of Lesbos and the principality of Etolia were restored to their ancient glory. His enemies confess that, among the public robb ers, Cantacuzene alone was moderate and abstemious; and the free and voluntary account which he produces of his own wealth may sustain the presumption that it was devolved by inheritance, and not accumulated by rapacity. He does not li ke to specify the value of his house, plate, and jewels; yet, after a voluntary gift of two hundred vessels of silver, after much had been secreted by his friends and plundered by his foes, his forti fied treasures were sufficient for the equip ment of a fleet of seventy galleys. He does not measure the size and number of his cattle, but his granaries were heaped with an incredible store of wheat and barley; and the labour of a thousand yoke of oxen might cultivate, according to the practice of antiquity, about sixty-two thousand five hundred acres. His pasture was two thousand five hundred broad acres, two hundred camels, three hundred mules, five hundred asses, five thousand horned cattle, fifty thousand hogs, and seventy thousand sheep: a precious record of rural opulence, in the last period of the empire, and in a land, most probably in Thrace, so repeatedly wasted by foreign and domestic hostility. The favour of Cantacuzene was above his fortune. In the moments of familiarity, in the hour of sickness, the emperor was desirous to level the distance between them, and pressed his friend to accept the dindem and purple. He received in return the title of the great domestick of which he was the emperor, attested by his own pen, resisted the dangerous proposal; but the last testament of Andronicus the younger named him the guardian of his son, and the regent of the empire.

His regency is marked by an entire turn of obedience and gratitude, perhaps he would have acted with pure and zealous fidelity in the service of his pupil. A guard of five hundred soldi ders watched over his person and the palace: the funeral of the late emperor was decently performed, and Cantacuzene succeeded in his name and with five hundred letters, which Cantacuzene despatched in the first month, informed the provinces of their loss and their duty. The prospect of a tranquil minor by Apocacus; and to exaggerate his perfidy, the imperial historian is pleased to magnify his own imprudence, in raising him to that office against the advice of his more sanguine sovereign. Bold and subtle, rapacious and profuse, the avarice and ambition of Apocacus were by turns subservient to each terror; and his talents were devoted to the ruin of his country. His arrogance was heightened by the command of a naval force and an impregnable castle, and under the mask of oath and flattery he secretly conspired against his benefactor. The female court of the empress was bribed and directed: by the empress of the two worlds, in her sacred character, by the law of nature, the tutelage of her son; the love of power was disguised by the anxiety of maternal tenderness; and the founder of the Palaeologe had instructed his posti erity to dread the example of a perfidious guardian. The patriarch John of Apri was a proud and feeble old man, encompassed by the courtiers of the empress, and by the patriarch. He produced an obsolete epistle of Andronicus, which bequeathed the prince and people to his pious care: the fate of his predecessor Arsenius prompted him to prevent, rather than punish, the crime of an usurper from Apocacus smiled at the success of his own flattery, when he beheld the Byzantine priest assuming the state and temporal claims of the Roman pontiff. Between the three persons so different in their situation and character, a private league was concluded: a shadow of cantankerous uncles was consecrated to the senate; the empress were tempted by the name of freedom. By this powerful confederacy, the great domestic was assaulted at first with clandestine, at length with open, arms. His prevaricators were disputed; his opinions slighted; his friends persecuted; and his safety was threatened both in the holy city and in the imperial court. In the conduct of the public service, he was accused of treason; proscribed as an enemy of the church and state; and delivered, with all his adherents, to the sword of justice, the vengeance of the people, and the power of the devil: his fortunes were confiscated; his aged mother was cast into prison; all his past services were buried in oblivion; and he was driven by injustice to perpetrate the crime of which he was accused. From the review of his preceding conduct, Cantacuzene appears to have been guiltless of any treasonable designs; and the only suspicion of his innocence must arise from the vehemence of his protestations, and the sublime purity which he ascribes to his own virtue. While the empress and the patriarch still affected the appearances of harmony, he repeatedly solicited the permission of retiring to a private, and even a monastic, life. After he had been declared a public enemy, his fervent wish to throw himself at the feet of the young emperor, and to receive without a murmur the strokes of the executioner; it was not without reluctance that he listened to the voice of reason, which inclined the truth, and the empire to the merciful intercession of the empress. Suffered his only son to be restored to the right of his wife Irene. Such vain ceremony is a thin disguise of rebellion, nor are there perhaps any personal wrongs that can authorize a subject to take arms against his sovereign; but the want of preparation and success may confirm the assurance of the usurper: his insidious step was the effect of necessity rather than of choice. Constantinople adhered to the young emperor; the king of Bulgaria was invi-tread to the relief of Adrianople: the principal cities of Thrace and Macedonia, after some hesitation, renounced their obedience to the great domestic; and the leaders of the troops and the provinces, were induced by their interest or the prospect of profit to acknowledge the claims of a woman and a priest. The army of Cantacuzene, in sixteen divisions, was stationed on the banks of the Melas to tempt or intimidate the capital; it was dispersed by treachery or fear; and the officers, more especially the mercenary Latins, accepted the bribes, and deserted to the cause of foreign interests. After this loss, the rebel emperor (he flattered between the two characters) took the road of Thessalonica with a chosen remnant; but he failed in his enterprise on that important place; and he was closely pursued by the great duke, his enemy Apocauces, at the head of a superior power by sea and land. Driven from the coast, in his march, or rather flight, to the mountains of Servia, Cantacuzene assembled his troops to scrutinize those who were worthy and willing to accompany his broken fortunes. A base majority renounced and retired; and his trusty band was diminished to two thousand, and at last to five hundred, volunteers. The calóï, or despot of the Servians, received him with generous hospitality; but the ally was insensibly degraded to a suppliant, an hostage, a captive; and, in this miserable dependence, he waited at the foot of the wall the approach of the conquerors, and of the life and liberty of a Roman emperor. The most tempting offers could not persuade the eunuch to violate his trust; but he soon inclined to the stronger side; and his friend was dismissed without injury to a new

The civil war, vicissitude of hopes and perils, Near A.D. 1203. The rebel and the imperial court and family shared in the vicissitudes of war; they were distracted with various success and unabated rage: the cities were distracted by the faction of the nobles and plebeians; the Cantacuzeni and Paleologi; and the Bulgarians, the Servians, and the Turks, were invoked on both sides as the instruments of private ambition and the avengers of public grievances. Men deprecated the calamities of which he was the author and victim; and his own experience might dictate a just and lively remark on the different nature of foreign and civil war. "The former," said he, "is the external warmth of summer, always tolerable, and often beneficial; the latter is the desire of personal deeds without a remedy the vital of the constitution."*

Victory of Cantacuzene, vages into the contests of civilized nations, is a measure pregnant with shame and mischief; war is measured by the loss of life and property, which is regulated by the best principles of humanity and reason. It is the practice of both sides to accuse their enemies of the guilt of the first alliances; and those who fall in their negociations are loudest in their censure of the example which they envy, and would gladly imitate. The Turks of Asia were less barbarous perhaps than the shepherds of Bulgaria and Servia; but their religion rendered them the insuperable foes of Rome and Christianity. To acquire the friendship of their emirs, the two factions vied with each other in baseness and profusion: the dexterity of Cantacuzene employed the prince to dispose of and victimize those who were dearly purchased by the marriage of his daughter with an infidel, the captivity of many thousand christians, and the passage of the Ottoman into Europe, the last and fatal stroke in the fall of the Roman empire. The inclining scale was decided in his favour by the death of Apocauces, the just, though singular, retribution of his crimes. A crowd of nobles or plebeians, whom he feared or hated, had been seized by his orders in the capital and the provinces; and the rebel emperor was seized and brought in order of their confinement. Some alterations in waging the walls, and narrowing the cells, had been ingeniously contrived to prevent their escape, and aggravate their misery: and the work was incessantly pressed by the daily visits of the tyrant. His guards watched at the door, lest the prince and his companions, the architects, without fear or suspicion, be assaulted and laid breathless on the ground, by two resolute prisoners of the Palaeologan race, who were armed with sticks, and animated by despair. On the rumour of revenge and liberty, the captive multitude broke their fetters, fortified their prison, and exposed from the battlements the tyrant's head, presuming on the favour of the people and the clemency of the empress. Anne of Savoy might rejoice in the fall of a haughty and ambitious minister, but while she delayed to resolve or to act, the populace, more especially they who were excited by the widow of the great duke, in a sedition, an assault, and a massacre. The prisoners (of whom the far greater part were guiltless or ignorant of the deed) escaped to a neighbouring church, they were slaughtered at the foot of the altar; and in his last moments Apocauces repeated the name of Cantacuzene; yet his talents alone upheld the cause of the young emperor; and his surviving associates, suspicions of each other, abandoned the conduct of the war, and rejected the fairest terms of accommodation. In the beginning of the dispute, the empire fell asleep, by the prudent minister, who was the cause of the enemies of Cantacuzene: the patriarch was employed to preach against the forgiveness of injuries; and her promise of immortal hatred was sealed by an oath, under the penalty of excommunication. But Anne soon learned to hate without a teacher: she beheld the horrors of her own misfortunes with the indignation of a stranger: her jealousy was exasperated by the competition of a rival empress; and on the first symptoms of a more yielding temper, she threatened the patriarch to convene a synod, and degrade him from his office. Their incapacity and discord would have afforded the most decisive advantage to the empire, which was con tracted by the weakness of both parties; and the moderation of Cantacuzene has not escaped the reprehension of timidity and insolence. He successively recovered the provinces and cities; and the realm of his pupil was let into the hands of Constantinople; the metropolitan alone counterbalanced the rest of the empire; nor could he attempt that important conquest till he had secured in his favour the public voice and a private correspondence. An Italian. He re-enters the office of great duke; the ships, the guards, and the golden gate, were subject to his command; but his humble ambition was bribed to become the instrument of treachery; and the revolution was accomplished without danger or bloodshed. Destitute of the powers of resistance, or the hope of foreign aid, the captive Anne would have still defended the palace, and have smiled to behold the capital in flames rather than in the possession of a rival. She yielded to the prayers of her friends and enemies; and the treaty was dictated by the conqueror, who professed a loyal and zealous attachment to the son of his

* The princes of Servia (Ducasce, Fanuli, Dalmatine, &c. c. 3, 3, 9) were styled Despots in Greek, and Ural, in their native idiom, (Ducasce, Glen Grece, p. 751.) That title, the equivalent of king, was conferred by the Hungarians, the modern Greeks, and even by the Turks, (Quedlinburg, Pencet-Ture, p. 432) who reserve the name of despot for the emperor. To obtain the latter instead of the former is the ambition of the French at Constantinople. (Aventures de l'histoire de Turc, p. 28.)

† Sie Gregorius, l. xiii. c. 11. It is surprising that Cantacuzene has not inscribed the part and active image in his own writings.

‡ The two avengers were both Palaeologi, who might resent, with royal indignation, the shame of their chains. The tragedy of Apocauces may deserve a peculiar reference to Cantacuzene, (l. iii. c. 2, 3) and Nic. Gregorius, l. xi. 33, 34.)

§ Cantacuzene accuses the patriarch, and spares the emperors, the mother of his accusers, (l. iii. 33, 34) against whom Nic. Gregorius expresses a particular animosity, (l. xiv. 10, 11, xvi. 5.) It is true, that they do not speak exactly of the same time.

|| The traitor and treason are revealed by Nic. Gregorius, (l. xv. c. 5,) but the name is more discreetly suppressed by his great accom plishment, (Cantacuzene, l. iii. c. 59.)
benefactor. The marriage of his daughter with John Palaeologus was at length consummated: the hereditary right of the pupil was acknowledged: but the sole administration during the minor was vested in the guardian. Two emperors and three empresses were seated on the Byzantine throne; and a general anarchy quieted the apprehensions, and confirmed the property, of the most guilty subjects. The festival of the coronation and nuptials was celebrated with the appearances of concord and magnificence, and both were equally fallacious. During the late troubles, the treasures of the state, and even the furniture of the palace, had been alienated or embezzeled; the royal banquet was served in pewter or earthenware; and such was the proud poverty of the times, that the absence of gold and jewels was supplied by the paltry artifices of glass and gilt leather.

I hasten to conclude the personal history of John Cantacuzene. He triumphed and reigned; but his reign and triumph were marred by his too undisguised selfishness; his own and the adverse faction. His followers might style the general amnesty, an act of pardon for his enemies, and of oblivion for his friends; but in these their estates had been forfeited or plundered; and as they wandered naked and hungry through the land, they cursed the false generosity of the tender, who, on the throne of the empire, might relish without merit his private inheritance. The adherents of the empress blushed to hold their lives and fortunes on the precarious favour of an usurper; and the thirst of revenge was counterbalanced by a tender concern for the succession, and even the safety, of her son. They were justly alarmed by a petition of the friends of Cantacuzene, that they might be released from their oath of allegiance to the Palaeologus; and intrusted with the defence of some cantonary towns; a measure which, if proposed by a just and sagacious prince, which was rejected (says the imperial historian) "by my sublimes, and almost incredible, virtue." His repose was disturbed by the sound of plots and seditions; and he trembled lest the lawful prince should be stolen away by some foreign or domestic enemy, who would inscribe his name and his wrongs in the banners of rebellion. As the son of Andronicus advanced in the years of manhood, he began to feel and act for himself; and his rising ambition was rather stimulated than checked by the imitation of his father. He trusted his own professions, Cantacuzene laboured with honest intentions, and was exposed to the censures and scandal of the young prince to a level with his fortune. In the Serbian expedition, the two emperors showed themselves in kindred harmony to the troops and provinces; and the younger colleague was initiated by the elder in the mysteries of war and government. After the conclusion of the peace, Palaeologus was left at Thessalonica, a royal residence, and a frontier station, to secure by his absence the peace of Constantinople, and to withdraw his youth from the temptations of a luxuriant capital. But the distance weakened the powers of conviction, and the son of Andronicus was surrounded with artful and unthinking companions, who taught him to hate his guardian, to deplore his exile, and to vindicate his rights. A private treaty with the caliph or despot of Sardin, was soon followed by an open revolt; and Cantacuzene, on the throne of the elder Andronicus, defended the cause of age and prerogative, which in his youth he had so vigorously attacked. At his death the contest was continued by his son; and, vested in the regency of Thessalonica, and the office of mediation; she returned without success; and unless Anne of Savoy was instructed by adversity, we may doubt the sincerity, or at least the fervour, of her zeal. While the regret grasped the sceptre with a firm and vigorous hand, she had been instructed by the obscure commercial science, that her legal administration would soon elapse; and that after a full trial of the vanity of the world, the emperor Cantacuzene sighed for the repose of a cloister, and was ambitious only of a heavenly crown. Had these sentiments been sincere, his voluntary abdiction would have restored the peace of the empire, and his conscience would have been relieved by an act of justice. Palaeologus alone was responsible for John Palaeologus his future government; and whatever takes up arms might be his vassals, they were surely less than theirs.

Abdication of Cantacuzene, and the arrival of the Greeks in Asia Minor.

1. The awkward apology of Cantacuzene, (l. iv. c. 29—42,) which, with visible confusion, his own downfall, may be supplied by the two hundred or more books, narrating the history of Nic. Greg. Vital.

the divine light of mount Thabor, a memorable question, which consummates the religious follies of the Greeks. The fakirs of India, and the monks of the oriental church, were alike persuaded, that in total abstraction of the faculties of the mind and body, the participant may, by the will of mind, become one with the spiritual image of the Deity. The opinion and practice of the monasteries of mount Athos will be best represented in the words of an abbot, who flourished in the eleventh century. “When thou art alone in thy cell,” says the aseptic teacher, “shut thy door, and seat thyself in a corner; look not on the mind above all the Hypothesis and Vastity; recline thy head and chin on thy breast; turn thy eyes and thy thought towards the middle of thy belly, the region of the navel; and search the place of the heart, the seat of the soul. At first, all will be dark and comfortless; but if you persevere day and night, you will feel an ineffable joy; and no sooner has the soul discovered the place of the heart, than it is involved in a mystic and ethereal light.”

This light, the production of a distempered fancy, the creature of an empty stomach and an empty brain, was adored by the Quietists as the pure and perfect essence of God himself; and as long as this folly was confined to mount Athos, the simple solitaries were not inquisitive how the divine essence could be a material substance, or how an immaterial substance could be perceived by the eyes of the body. But in the reign of the younger Andronicus, these monasteries were visited by a learned vessel, a monk, who, skilled in philosophy and theology; who possessed the languages of the Greeks and Latins; and whose versatile genius could maintain their opposite creeds, according to the interest of the moment. The induction of an ascetic revealed to the curious traveller the centre of their severest sects, and afforded him the opportunity of ridiculing the Quietists, who placed the soul in the navel; of accusing the monks of mount Athos of heresy and blasphemy. His attack compelled the more learned to renounce or dissemble the simple devotion of their brethren; and Gregory Palamas introduced a scholastic distinction between the essence and operation of God. His inaccessible essence dwells in the midst of an uncreated and eternal light; and this beatific vision of the saints had been manifested to the disciples on mount Thabor, in the transfiguration of Christ. Yet this distinction could not be understood by the people; and John of Thessalonica was deeply denounced; and Barlam still charged the Palamites with holding two eternal substances, a visible and an invisible God. From the rage of the monks of mount Athos, who threatened his life, the Calabrian retired to Constantinople, where his smooth and specious manners introduced him to the favour of the great domestick and the emperor. The court and the city were involved in this theological dispute, which flamed amidst the civil war; but the doctrine of Barlam was disapproved by his flight and apostasy; the Palamites triumphed; and the schism, so long and contumacious, was stopped by the consent of the adverse factions of the state. In the character of emperor and theologian, Cantacuzene presided in the synod of the Greek church, which established, as an article of faith, the uncreated light on mount Thabor: and, after so many labours, the reason of mankind was slightly wounded by the addition of a single absurdity. Many rolls of paper or parchment have been blotted; and the impudent sectaries, who refused to subscribe the orthodox creed, were deprived of the honours of christian burial; but in the next age the question was forgotten; nor can I learn that the axe or faggot were employed for the extirpation of the Barlamite heresy.

For the conclusion of this chapter, I establish of the establishment of the empire. The Genoese, who, after the recovery of Constantinople, were seated in the suburb of Pera or Galata, received that honourable title from the bounty of the emperor. They were invited in the use of their laws and magistrates; but they submitted to the duties of vassals and subjects; the formidable word of Liegemen, was borrowed from the Latin jurisprudence; and their podesta, or chief, before he entered on his office, saluted the emperor with loyal acclamations and vows of fidelity. Genoa sealed a firm alliance with the Greeks; and, in case of a defensive war, a supply of fifty empty galleys and a succour of fifty galleys completely armed and manned, was promised by the republic to the empire. In the revival of a naval force, it was the aim of Michael Palaeologus to deliver his nation; and his emperor. He had confined the Genoese of Galata within those limits which the insolence of wealth and freedom provoked them to exceed. A sailor threatened that they should soon be masters of Constantinople, and slew the Greek who resisted this national affront; and an Englishman refused to allow the guilt of some acts of piracy in the Black sea. Their countrymen threatened to support their cause; but the long and open village of Galata was instantly surrounded by the imperial troops; till, in the moment of the assault, the prostrate Genoese implored the clemency of their conqueror. Michael Palaeologus, who secured their obedience, exposed them to the attack of their Venetian rivals, who, in the reign of the elder Andronicus, resolved to violate the majesty of the throne.

On the approach of their fleets, the Genoese, with their families and effects, retired into the city; their empty habitations were reduced to ashes; and the feeble prince, who had viewed the destruction of his suburb, expressed his resentment, not by arms, but by ambassadours. This misfortune, however, was advantageous to the Genoese, who obtained, and imperceptibly abused, the dangerous licence of surrounding the city. The Genoese and Genoese entered the ditch of the waters of the sea; of erecting lofty towers; and of mounting a train of military engines on the rampart. The narrow bounds in which they had been circumscribed, were insufficient for the growing colony; each day they acquired some addition of landed property; and the adjacent hills were covered with their villas and castles, which they joined and protected by new fortifications. The navigation and trade of the Euxine was the patrimony of the Greek emperors, who commanded the narrow entrance, the gates, as it were, of that inland sea. In the reign of Michael Palaeologus, their prerogative was acknowledged by the sultan of Egypt, who solicited and obtained the liberty of sending an annual ship for the purchase of slaves in Creussia and the Lessar Parta; a liberty pregnant with mischief to the christian people, as explained by Ducange, (ib. i. 29, 30, 31.) Nic. Gregoras, (i. v. 396.) Nicol. Basnage, (ib. i. c. 397. 398.) and other published books, and Fabricius, (ib. i. c. 397. 398. 473.) of the MSS of the Latin church, have added some facts and circumstances, which may be sufficiently known by the readers of the Chronicles of Ducange. (ib. i. c. 399.) But his case was more difficult; his times, may be discerned from the Chronicles of Ducange. (ib. i. c. 398.)

1 See Cantacuzene, (ib. i. c. 398.) 2 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 396.) 3 See Ducange, (ib. i. c. 397.) 4 See Fabricius, (ib. i. c. 397.) 5 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 397.) 6 See Faber, (ib. i. c. 397.) 7 See Basnage, (ib. i. c. 397.) 8 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 396.) 9 See Faber, (ib. i. c. 397.) 10 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 396.) 11 See Basnage, (ib. i. c. 397.) 12 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 396.) 13 See Basnage, (ib. i. c. 397.) 14 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 396.) 15 See Basnage, (ib. i. c. 397.) 16 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 396.) 17 See Basnage, (ib. i. c. 397.) 18 See Gregoras, (ib. i. c. 396.) cause; since these youths were transformed by education and discipline into the formidable Mamalukes. 3

Their trade and From the colony of Pera, the Genoese insaliance engaged with superior advantage in the lucrative trade of the Black sea; and their industry supplied the Greeks with fish and corn; two articles of diet equally important to a superstition people. The spontaneous bounty of nature appears to have bestowed the harvests of Ukraine, the produce of a rude and savage husbandry; and the endless ex- portation of salt fish and caviar is annually renewed by the enormous sturgeons that are caught at the mouth of the Don, in the rich mud and shallow water of the Acastis. 4

The waters of the Ouxus, the Caspian, the Volga, and the Don, opened a rare and laborious passage for the genii and spices of India; and, after three months' march, the caravans of Carthage met the Italian vessels in the harbours of Crimea. 5 These various branches of trade were monopolised by the diligence and power of the Genoese. Their rivals of Venice and Pisa were forcibly expelled; the natives were avowed by the castles and cities, which arose on the foundation of their trading factories, and their principal establishment of Caifa 6 was besieged without effect by the Tartar powers. Desistiate of a navy, the Greeks were oppressed by these haughty merchants, who fed, or starved, Constanti- nople, according to their interest. They proceeded to usurp the customs, the fishery, the fortification, of the Venetians; and while they derived from these objects a revenue of two hundred thousand pieces of gold, a remnant of thirty thousand was reluctantly allowed to the emperor. 7

The colony of Pera or Galata acted, in peace and war, as an independent state; and, as it will happen in distant settlements, the Genoese possessed and their principal establishment of Caifa 8 was besieged without effect by the Tartar powers. Desistiate of a navy, the Greeks were oppressed by these haughty merchants, who fed, or starved, Constanti- nople, according to their interest. They proceeded to usurp the customs, the fishery, the fortification, of the Venetians; and while they derived from these objects a revenue of two hundred thousand pieces of gold, a remnant of thirty thousand was reluctantly allowed to the emperor. 7

Their war with the emperor Constantine 9 and by the civil wars that afflicted his age and the minority of his grandson. The talents of Cantacuzene, who resided in the palace, were employed to the ruin rather than the restoration, of the empire; and, after his domestic victory, he was condemned to an ignominious trial, whether the Greeks or the Genoese should reign in Constantinople. The merchants of Pera, by his refusal of the lands, some commanding heights, which they proposed to cover with new fortifications; and in the absence of the emperor, who was detained at Demotica by sickness, they ventured to brave the debility of a female reign. 8 A Byzantine vessel, which had forthcoming to fish at the mouth of the harbour, was surprised by these audacious stragglers; the fisherman were murdered. Instead of suing for pardon, the Genoese demanded satisfaction; required, in a haughty strain, that the Greeks should renounce the exercise of naviga- tion; and encountered with regular arms the first sallies of the popular indignation. They instantly occupied the debatable land; and by the labour of a whole people, of either sex and of every age, the wall was raised, and the ditch was sunk, with incredible speed. At the same time, they attacked and burnt two Byzantine galleys; while the three others, the remains of the imperial navy, escaped from their hands: the inhabitants without the gates, or along the shore, were pillaged and destroyed; and the care of their safety, the regulations of the republic, the preservation of the city. The return of Cantacuzene dispersed the public consternation; the emperor inclined to peaceful counsels; but he yielded to the obstinacy of his enemies, who rejected all reasonable terms, and to the arduous of subjects, who threatened, in case of more disaster, to put to the style of the inhuman pit of a potter's vessel. Yet they reluctantly paid the taxes, that he imposed for the construction of ships, and the expenses of the war; and as the two nations were masters, the one of the land, the other of the sea, Constanti- nople and Pera were pressed by the evils of a mutual siege. The merchants of the colony, who believed that several days would terminate the war, already murmured at their losses; the succours from their mother-country were delayed by the factions of Genoa; and the most cautious embraced the opportu- nity of a Rhodian vessel to conclude with the families and effects, and tone of friendship and hospitality. In December of his fleet, the spring, the Byzantine fleet, seven galleys and a train of smaller vessels, issued from the mouth of the harbour, and steered in a single line along the shore of Pera; unskilfully pro- ceeding to the attack of the ships of the enemy, and the victory. The crews were composed of peasants and me- chanics; nor was their ignorance compensated by the native courage of barbarians: the wind was strong, the waves were rough; and no sooner did the Greeks perceive a distant and inactive enemy, than they leaped aboard their vessel, and two often, to an inevi- table, peril. The troops that marched to the attack of the lines of Pera were struck at the same moment with a similar panic; and the Genoese were astonis- hed, and almost ashamed, at their double victory. Their triumphant vessels, crowned with flowers, and drag- ging after them the captive galleys, repeatedly passed and repassed before the palace: the only virtue of the emperor was patience; and the hope of revenge his sole consolation. Yet the distress of both parties interposed a temporary agreement; and the shame of the emperor, and the Genoese advantage in the conquest of the shores, was satisfied to violate the treaty, and to join his arms with the Venetians, the perpetual ene- mies of Genoa and her colonies. While Greeks, they compared the reasons of peace and war, Feb. 13.

A. D. 1349.

the moderation was provoked by a wanton insult of the inhabitants of Pera, who discharged from their rampart a large stone that fell in the midst of Constantinople. On his just complaint, they coldly blamed the impiety of their engineer; but the next day the insult was repeated, and they exulted in a second proof that the royal city was not beyond the reach of their artillery. Cantacuzene instantly signed his treaty with the Venetians; but the weight of the Roman empire was scarcely felt in the balance of these opulent and powerful republics, 9 From the Abbas of ©, the Greek to the line of the Tanais, their fleets encountered with each other success; and a memorable battle was fought in the narrow

3 Both Pachier (ii. iii. 3, 4, 5) and Nic. Gregor. (i. iv. 7) undemand and deplore the effects of this dangerous insurrection. Bibli- cal ed. of Kuyan, himself a Tartar, but a devout meckmelman, devoted, from the dishonour that he reproached the Genoese, that a large nation was spent in the capital of Crime, (de Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. iii. p. 243.)

2 Chardin (Voyages in Persia, tom. i. p. 185) was assured at Caifa, that these fishes were sometimes twenty-four or twenty-six feet long, weighed eight or nine hundred pounds, and yielded three or four quintals of caviar. The cost of the bearhors had supplied the Athen- iens immediately with the best of fish and mackerel.

3 de Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. iii. p. 344, 345. Valier de Ro- musco, tom. i. fol. 400, says that the land or water carriage could only be practicable when Tanary was united under a wise and powerful mon- arch.

4 Nic. Gregor. (i. xiii. c. 12) is judicious and well informed on the trade and colonies of the Black sea. Chardin describes the pre- sence and commerce of the Genoese in the time of Demotica.

5 de Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. iii. p. 343, 344. Valier de Ro- musco, tom. i. fol. 400, says that the land or water carriage could only be practicable when Tanary was united under a wise and powerful mon- arch.

6 Nic. Gregor. (i. xiii. c. 12) is judicious and well informed on the trade and colonies of the Black sea. Chardin describes the pre- sence and commerce of the Genoese in the time of Demotica.

7 Sec Nic. Gregor. 1. xvii. c. 1

8 The events of this war are related by Cantacuzene (i. iv. c. 11) with obscurity and confusion, and by Nic. Gregor. (i. xvii. c. 1-7) in a Ciceronian and honest narrative. The priest was less responsible than the prince for the punishment; but it was the Genoese who styled and killed the prince, and afterwards pillaged and killed the Genoese. 9 The second war is darkly told by Cantacuzene, (i. iv. c. 19, 24, 25, 29, 31) who wishes to dispense what he does not deny. I regret this part of Nic. Gregor. which is still in MS. at Paris.
sea, under the walls of Constantinople. It would not be an easy task to reconcile the accounts of the Greeks, the Venetians, and the Genoese; and while I depend on the narrative of an impartial historian, I shall borrow from each nation the facts that redound to their own disgrace, and the honour of their foes. The Venetians, the chief allies of the Genoese, were continued but not in those times their ships of war were distinguished by the superiority of their size and strength. The memoirs of their naval commanders Pietro and Doria, are illustrous in the annals of their country; but the personal merit of the former was eclipsed by the fame and abilities of his rival. They engaged in tempestuous weather; and the tumultuary contest was continued from the dawn to the extinction of light. The enemies of the Genoese applaud their prowess; the friends of the Venetians are dissatisfied with their behaviour: but all the parties agree in praising the skill and boldness of the Catalans, who, with many wounds, sustained the brunt of the action. On the separation of the fleets, the event might appear doubtful; but the thirteen Genoese galleys, that had been sunk or taken, were compensated by a double loss of the allies; of fourteen Venetians, ten Catalans, and two Greeks; and even the grief of the conquerors expressed the assurance and habit of more decisive victories. Pisani confessed his defeat, by retiring into a fortified gulf; but the pretext of the defeat of the senate, he steered with a broken and flying squadron for the island of Candia, and abandoned to his rivals the sovereignty of the sea. In a public epistle, to the doge and senate, Petrarch employs his eloquence to reduce the conquerors of his country to the mere submission of Italy. The orator celebrates the valour and victory of the Genoese, the first of men in the exercise of naval war; he drops a tear on the misfortunes of their Venetian brethren; but he exhorts them to pursue with fire and sword the base and perfidious Greeks; to purge the metropolis of the east from the heresy with their treaty with which it was infected. Deserted by the empire, their friends, the Greeks were incapable of resistance; and three months after the battle, the emperor Caneuenezi solicited and subscribed a treaty, which forever banished the Venetians and Catalans, and granted to the Genoese a monopoly of trade, and almost a right of dominion. The Roman empire (I smile in transcribing the name) might soon have sunk into a province of Genoa, if the ambition of the republic had not been checked by the ruin of her freedom and naval power. A long period of one hundred and thirty years was determined by the triumph of Venice; and the factions of the Genoese compelled them to seek for domestic peace under the protection of a foreign lord, the duke of Milan, or the French king. Yet the spirit of commerce survived that of conquest; and the colony of Pera still swayed the capital and navigated the Euxine, till it was involved by the Turks in the final servitude of Constantinople itself.

CHAP. XXV.

Conquests of Zingis Khan and the Moguls from China to Polanrk.—Empire of Constantinople and the Greeks.—Origin of the Ottoman Turks in Bithynia.—Reigns and victories of Othman, Orkhan, Amanush the first, and Bajazet the first.—Foundation and progress of the Turkish monarchy in Asia and Europe.—Danger of Constantinople and the Greeks.

From the petty quarrels of a city and her suburbs, from the cowardice and discord of the falling Greeks, I shall now ascend to the victorious Turks; whose domestic slavery was enobled by martial discipline, religious enthusiasm, and the energy of the national character. The rise and progress of the Ottomans, the present sovereigns of Constantinople are connected with the most important scenes of modern history; but they are founded on a previous knowledge of the great emption of the Moguls and Turks; whose rapid conquests may be compared with the primitive convulsions of nature, which have agitated and altered the surface of the globe. I have long since assented my claim to introduce the nations, the immediate or remote authors of the fall of the Roman empire; nor can I refuse myself to these studies, which, from their uncommon magnitude, will interest a philosophic mind in the history of blood.

From the space of highlands between Zingis Khan, first emperor of the Turks, and the borders of China, Siberia, and the Caspian sea, the empire and tide of emigration and war has repeated themselves. The space has not been overflowed. These ancient seats of the Bithynian, theOCUS, the Huns and Turks were occupied in the twelfth century by many pastoral tribes, of the same descent and similar manners, who were afterwards increased and augmented by the formidable Zingis. In his ascent to greatness, that barbarian (whose private appellation was Temugin) had trampled on the necks of his equals. His birth was noble: but it was in the pride of victory, that the prince or people deduced his seventh ancestor from the immense conception of a virgin. His father had reigned over thirteen hordes, which composed about thirty or forty thousand families: above two thirds refused to pay tithes or obedience to his infant son; and at the age of thirteen Temugin fought a battle against his rebellious subjects. The future conqueror of Asia was reduced to fly and to obey: but he rose superior to his fortune, and in his fortieth year he had established his fame and dominion over the circumboreal tribes. In a state of society, in which policy is rude and value is universal, the descendant of one man must be founded on his strength, and the influence of his enemies and recompense his friends. His first military league was ratified by the simple rites of sacrificing a horse and tasting of a running stream: Temugin pledged himself to divide with his followers the sweets and bitters of life; and when he had shared among them his horses and apparel, he was their patron, and the father of his country, and his own hopes. After his first victory, he placed seventy caldrons on the fire, and seventy of the most guilty rebels were cast headlong into the boiling water. The sphere of his attraction was continually enlarged by the ruin of the proud and the submission of the prudent: and the boldest chieftains might tremble, when they beheld enochased in silver, the skull of the khan of the Keraïtes; who, under the name of Presler John, had corresponded with the Roman pontiff and the princes of Europe. The ambition of Temugin condescended to employ the art of superseding, and it was from a naked prophet, who could ascend to heaven on a white horse, that he accepted the title of Zingis, the most great; and a divine right to the conquests of Asia, which were composed at a time when I entertained the wish, rather than the hope, of concluding my history.

The throns of the Turks, as before the Huns, were almost universally occupied by the sons of the great; and the Turk was the preserver of his nation with his tongue, as with his sword. Petrarch pours forth his astonishment and grief at the fall of the empire, and the loss of the Genoese in the following epistle, (p. 532-535.)
The DECLINE and FALL

Chapter XXV

THE DECLINE and FALL

The superlative termination. (Hist. Genealogique des Tartars, part. iii. p. 191, 155.) From the same idea of magnitude, the appellation of Zingis is derived from the ocean.

The name of Moguls has prevailed among the orientals, and still adheres to the titular sovereign, the Great Mogul of Hindostan.

The Tartars (more properly Tartes) were descended from Tchant Khan, the brother of M. and Khan, see Abulfazl, part. ii. and iii. and each of his descendants was, according to the chronicles of Khurât, (vers. 103—112) in the great invasion of Europe, (A.D. 1283) they seem to have led the vanguard; and the name of the Tartars of Persia is equal to that of Zingis.(A. d. 1226.)

The title of Mogul is also found in the Ottoman language, and is applied to the sovereign of the Turkish empire.

In the year 1291, by the command of Oezan Khan, Peri of Persia, the fourth in his descent from Zingis. From these traditions, his vizier Fatir Khan, the first of his name, and son of the above, has been cited by Petit de la Croix, (Hist. de d'Iran, p. 357—358.) and the general use of the Tartars.

The Mogul Ss. of Abdallah Behrur, a descendant of Zingis, nese, e Persians, Armenians, Syrians, Arabians, Greeks, Russians, Poles, Hungarians, and Latins; and each nation still procures credit in the relation of their common enemies and defeats.

The arms of Zingis and his lieutenants successively reduced the hordes of China, the desert, who pitched their tents be- tween the wall of China and the Volga; and the Mogul empires pursued the monarchies to the north of the Caspian, where the lord of many millions of shepherds and soldiers, who felt their united strength, and were impatient to rush on the mild and wealthy climates of the south. His ancestors had been the tributaries of the Chinese emperors; and Timur and whose, in the tone of the kings of nations, exacted the tribute and obedience which he had paid, and who affected to treat the son of heaven as the most contemptible of mankind. A haughty answer disguised their fear, and Timur, in the name of God, despatched on the march of innumerable squadrions, who pierced on all sides the feeble rampart of the great wall. Ninety cities were stormed or starved, by the Moguls; ten only escaped; and Zingis, from a knowledge of the filial piety of the Chinese, covered his name, or, Persians, Armenians, Syrians, Arabians, Greeks, Russians, Poles, Hungarians, and Latins; and each nation still procures credit in the relation of their common enemies and defeats.

The arms of Zingis and his lieutenants successively reduced the hordes of China, the desert, who pitched their tents be- tween the wall of China and the Volga; and the Mogul empires pursued the monarchies to the north of the Caspian, where the lord of many millions of shepherds and soldiers, who felt their united strength, and were impatient to rush on the mild and wealthy climates of the south. His ancestors had been the tributaries of the Chinese emperors; and Timur and whose, in the tone of the kings of nations, exacted the tribute and obedience which he had paid, and who affected to treat the son of heaven as the most contemptible of mankind. A haughty answer disguised their fear, and Timur, in the name of God, despatched on the march of innumerable squadrions, who pierced on all sides the feeble rampart of the great wall. Ninety cities were stormed or starved, by the Moguls; ten only escaped; and Zingis, from a knowledge of the filial piety of the Chinese, covered his name, or, Persians, Armenians, Syrians, Arabians, Greeks, Russians, Poles, Hungarians, and Latins; and each nation still procures credit in the relation of their common enemies and defeats.

The arms of Zingis and his lieutenants successively reduced the hordes of China, the desert, who pitched their tents be- tween the wall of China and the Volga; and the Mogul empires pursued the monarchies to the north of the Caspian, where the lord of many millions of shepherds and soldiers, who felt their united strength, and were impatient to rush on the mild and wealthy climates of the south. His ancestors had been the tributaries of the Chinese emperors; and Timur and whose, in the tone of the kings of nations, exacted the tribute and obedience which he had paid, and who affected to treat the son of heaven as the most contemptible of mankind. A haughty answer disguised their fear, and Timur, in the name of God, despatched on the march of innumerable squadrions, who pierced on all sides the feeble rampart of the great wall. Ninety cities were stormed or starved, by the Moguls; ten only escaped; and Zingis, from a knowledge of the filial piety of the Chinese, covered his vanguard with their captive parents; an unworthy, and by degrees a fruitless, abuse of the virtues of his enemies. His invasion was supported by the revolt of a hundred thousand Khitans, who guarded the frontier; yet he listened to a treaty; and a princess of China, three thousand horses, five hundred youths, and a profusion of treasure by the payment of the price of his retreat. In his second expedition, he compelled the Chinese emperor to retire beyond the yellow river to a more southern residence. The siege of Peking 1 was long and laborious: the inhabitants were reduced by famine to decimate and devastation. When it was spent, they discharged ingots of gold and silver from their engines; but the Moguls introduced a mine to the centre of the capital; and the conflagration of the palace burnt about thirty days. China was desolated by Tartar war and domestic faction; and the five northern provinces were added to the empire of Zingis.

In the west, he touched the dominions of Carizme, of Mohammed, sultan of Carizme, who had submitted to the Persian gulf to the borders of India and Turkestan; and who, in the proud imitation of Alexander the Great, forgot that the rock defended back his fathers to the house of Seljuk. It was the wish of Zingis to establish a friendly and commercial intercourse with the most powerful of the Moslem princes; nor could he be tempted by the secret solicitations of the caliph of Bagdad, who sacrificed to his personal wrongs the stupendous province. He indeed provoked and justified the Tartar arms in the invasion of the southern Asia. A caravan of three ambassadors and one hundred and fifty merchants, was arrested and murdered at Otrar, by the command of Mohammed; nor was it till after a demand and defiance that he withdrew back the foot of his horse. Mohammed was astonished by the multitude and valor of his enemies: he withdrew from the scene of danger, and distributed his troops in the frontier towns; trusting that the barbarians, invincible in the field, would be repulsed by the length and difficulty of so many sieges. But the presence of Zingis had formed a body of Chinese engineers, skilled in the mechanic arts; informed perhaps of the secret of gunpowder, and capable, under his discipline, of attacking a foreign country with more vigour and success than he had defended his own. The Persian historians will relate the sieges of Otrar, Cogende, Barcha, Samareca, Carizme, Herat, Merou, Nisabour, Balch, and Candahar; and the conquest of the rich and populous countries of Transoxiana, Carizme, and Chorassan. The destructive hostilities of Attila and the Huns have been so often repeated, that it is needless to give a detail of them. The example of Zingis and the Moguls; and in this more proper place I shall be content to observe, that, from the Caspian to the Indus, they ruined a tract of many hundred miles, which was adorned with the habitations and labours of mankind, and that five centuries have not been sufficient to repair the ravages of four years. The Mogul emperor encouraged or indulged the fury of his troops; the hope of future possession was lost in the ardour of rapine and slaughter; and the cause of the war exasperated their native fierce ardour no less than the extempore of the present, whom they perceived to be rewarded with a fourfold increase of the price of his retreat. The downfall and death of the sultan Mohammed thus expired unpitied and alone, in a desert island of the Caspian sea, is a poor atonement for the calamities of which he was the author. Could the Carizmanian empire have been saved by a single hero, it would have, in the hour of the utmost need, been by his son Gehadeed; but successive failures and repeated checks drove him to resign his island, and, in the hour of victory, to retire, until, in the last moment of despair, Gehadeed threw himself into the desert, and, on the banks of the Indus, where he was oppressed by his innumerable host, he was attacked and killed by them. His death, A.D. 1227.

The harem of Zingis was composed of the concubines of the Moguls under his succession of Zingis, A.D. 1227.

Conquests of the five hundred wives and concubines; and of his numerous progeny, four sons, illustrious by their birth and merit, exercised under their father the principal offices of peace and war. Toushi was his general in the campaigns of Zingis, Bagdash and Sagata; his general, and Tuli his general; and their names and actions are often conspicuous in the history of his conquests. Firmly united for their own and the public interest, the three brothers and their families were content with dependent sultans; and their empire, by general consent, was proclaimed great khan, or emperor of the Moguls and Tartars. He was succeeded by his son Gayuk, after whose death the empire devolved to his cousins Mong and Cubblai, the sons of Tuli, and the grandsons of Zingis. In the sixty-eight years of his four first successors, the Moguls subdued almost all Asia, and a large portion of Europe. Without confining myself to the order of time, without expatiating on the detail of events, I shall present a general picture of the progress of their arms in the east; in the south; in the west; and in the north.

Before the invasion of Zingis, China was divided into two empires or dy-reigns of China, nastes of the north and south; and the A.D. 1234, the emperor of the northern

---

1. More properly Yen king, an ancient city, whose ruins still appear some fortresses to the south-east of the modern Peking, which was the ancient Hanz, and the capital of the Chinese emperors. ---

2. M. de Vailly, Essai sur l'Histoire Generale, tom. iii. c. 60, p. 8. His account of Zingis and the Moguls contains, as usual, much general sense and truth, with some particular errors.

3. Zizai gave his name to his dominions of Makroumah, or Transoxiana; and the Moguls of Hindostan, who emigrated from that country, are styled Zizaians by the Persians. This certain etymology is not supported by the Chinese authentic sources. The Moguls, who were designated the Zizaians by the Persians, have, at the time of the discovery of the west, absolutely rejected the derivations of a national, from a personal, name.

4. Marco Polo, and the oriental geographers, the names of Cathay and Mong distinguished the northern and southern empires; but from A.D. 1254 to 1279, were those of the great khan, end of the Chinese empire. The search of Cathay, or of China had been found, excited general conformity of laws, language, and national manners. The northern empire, which had been dismembered by Zingis, was finally subdued seven years after his death. After the loss of Pekin, the emperor, who had fixed his residence at Kai-fung, a city many miles in circumference, which contained according to the Chinese annals, fourteen hundred thousand families of inhabitants and fugitives. He escaped from thence with only seven horsemen, and made his last stand in a third capitol, till at length the hopeless monarch, protesting his innocence and accusing his former possessions, was strangled and gave ordeals, as that, so soon as he had stabbed himself, the fire should be kindled by his attendants. The dynasty of the Song, the native and ancient sovereigns of the whole empire, survived about forty-five years the fall of the northern usurpers; and the perfect conquest was reserved for the arms of Cubbi. During this interval, the Moguls were often diverted by foreign wars; and, if the Chinese seldom dared to meet their victors in the field, their passive courage presented an endless succession of cities to storm and 1,000,000 to slay. In the attack and defence of places, the engine of antiquity and the Greek fire were alternately employed: the use of gunpowder in cannon and bombs appears as a familiar practice; and the sieges were conducted by the Mahometans and Franks, who had been liberally invited into the service of Cubbi. After the fall of the Ganges, the caliph's tributary waters were conveyed along a series of canals, till they invested the royal residence of Hamecon, or Quinasey, in the country of silk, the most delectable climate of China. The emperor, a defenceless youth, surrendered his person and sceptre; and before he was sent in exile into Turky, he struck nine times the ground with his forehead, to adore in prayer or thanksgiving the mercy of the great Khan. Yet the war (it was of the southern, now styled a rebellion) was still maintained in the southern provinces from Hamecon to Canton; and the obstinate remnant of independence and hostility was transported from the land to the sea. But when the fleet of the Song was surrounded and oppressed by a superior armament, their last champion leaped into the waves with his infant emperor in his arms. "It is more glorious," he said, "for a prince, than for a slave," and his hundred thousand Chinese imitated his example; and the whole empire from Tonkin to the great wall, submitted to the dominion of Cubbi. His boundless ambition aspired to the conquest of Japan; his fleet was twice shipwrecked; and the lives of a hundred thousand Chinese were spared by the providence of the Great Khan, who covered them with a Reason of the fruits in expediency. But the circumjacent kingdoms, Corea, Tonkin, Cochinchina, Pegu, Bengal, and Thibet, were reduced in different degrees of tribute and obedience by the effort or terror of his arms. He explored the Indian ocean with a fleet of a thousand ships: they sailed in sixty-eight days, most probably to the isle of Bornéo, under the equinoctial line; and though they returned not without spoil or glory, the emperor was dissatisfied that the savage king had escaped from their hands.

II. The conquest of Hindostan by the Moguls was reserved in a later period for the house of Timour; but that of Iran or Persia, was achieved by Haji Khan, the grandson of Zingis, the brother and lieutenant of the two successive emperors, Mangu and Cubbi. I shall not enumerate the crowd of sultans, emirs, and stakbas, whom he trampled into dust; but the expiration of the Janissaries, or Ismaelians 1 of Persia, may be considered as a sort of crisis. Great, among the hills to the south of the Caspian, these odious sectaries had rigned with impunity above a hundred and sixty years; and their prince, or imam, established his lieutenant to lead and govern the colony of mount Libanus, so famous and formidable in the east. The linking of the two religious systems gave light to the Kuran, the Ismaelians had blended the Indian transmigration, and the visions of their own prophets; and it was their first duty to devote their souls and bodies in blind obedience to the vicar of God. The daggers of his missionaries were felt both in the east and west; the Christians and the Moslems were confused, and perhaps multiply, the illusory victims that were sacrificed to the zeal, avarice, or resentment of the old man (as he was corruptly styled) of the mountain. But these daggers, his only arms, were broken by the Moslems; and, not a rational relic of mankind, except the word assasin, which, in the most odious sense, has been adopted in the languages of Europe. The extinction of the Abbassides cannot be indifferent to the spectators of their greatness and decline. Since the fall of their Seljuq successors, the province of the empire into two dominions of Bagdad and the Arabian Ira vector was in the day of the nation. But the empire was disturbed by theological factions, and the command of the faithful was lost in a harem of seven hundred concubines. The invasion of the Moguls discovered a fertile arms and haughty magnificence. "On the divine decree," said the caliph Mostassem, "is founded the throne of the sons of Abbas; and their foes shall surely be destroyed in this world and in the next. Who is this Holagen that dares to rise against them? If he be desirous of peace, let him instantly depart from the sacred territory; and perhaps he may obtain from our clemency the pardon of his fault." This presumption was cherished by a perfidious vizir, who assured his master, that, even if the barbarians had entered the city, the women and children, from the terraces, would be sufficient to overawe the enemy. But when the soldiers touched the phantom, it instantly vanished into smoke. After a siege of two months, Bagdad was stormed and sacked by the Moguls: and their savage commander pronounced the death of the caliph Mostassem, the last of the temporal successors of Mahomet; whose noble kinsmen, of the race of Abbas, had reigned in the above five hundred years. Whatever might be the designs of the conqueror, the holy cities of Mecca and Medina 2 were protected by the Arabian desert; but the Moguls spread beyond the Tigris and Euphrates, pillaged Aleppo and Damascenus, and drove the Christians and the Latter of the Turks. The sultans

1 All that can be known of the Assassins of Persia and Syria is poured from the copious, and even profuse, erudition of M. de Malbran, in his Monumens de la philosophie orientale, in six volumes, pp. 127—175.

2 The kingdom of Syria, 60,000 Assassins, had acquired or founded ten castles in the hills above Tortoua. About the year 1253, they were extirpated by the Mamlucks. of Kipzak, Russi-
and

ors, Polish,

o. D. 1225

ili, &c.

III. No sooner had Octav subverted the northern empire of China, than he resolved to visit with his arms the most remote countries of the globe. The first hundred thousand Mogals and Tartars were inscribed on the military roll; of these the great khan selected a third, which he intrusted to the command of his nephew Batou, the son of Tuli; who rejoined over his father’s conquests to the north of the Caspian sea. After a festival of forty days, Batou set forward on this great expedition; and such was the speed and ardour of his innumerable squadrons, that in less than six years they had measured a line of ninety degrees of longitude, a fourth part of the circumference of the globe. The great rivers of Asia and Europe, the Vistula and Danube, which they swam with their horses, or passed on the ice, or traversed in leathern boats, which followed the camp, and transported their waggons and artillery. By the first victories of Batou, the remains of national freedom were eradicated in the empire of the Vezhens and Dzoroz's, and were surrounded by Tartar desolations. In his rapid progress, he overran the kingdoms, as they are now styled, of Astracan and Cazan; and the troops which he detached towards mount Caucasus, explored the most secret recesses of Georgia and Circassia.
The civil division of the great khan, or princes of Russia, rendered their country to the Tartars.
They spread from Livonia to the Black sea, and both Moscow and Kiov, the modern and the ancient capitals, were reduced to ashes; a temporary ruin, less fatal than the deep, and perhaps indelible, mark, which a serquence of two hundred years marks the edge of the Russian empire. The Tartars ravaged with equal fury the countries which they hoped to possess, and those which they were hastening to leave.
From the permanent conquest of Russia, they made a daily though transient foray into the heart of Poland, and as far in the borders of Germany. The cities of Lublun and Cragow were obliterated; they approached the shores of the Baltic; and in the battle of Lignitz, they defeated the khan of Silesia, the Polish palen-tines, and the great master of the Teutonic order, and filled nine sacks with the right ears of the slain. From Lignitz, the extreme point of their western march, they turned aside to the invasion of Hungary; and the presence or spirit of Batou inspired the host of five hundred thousand men; the Carpathian hills could not be long impervious to their divided columns; and their approach had been fondly disbelieved till it was irresistibly felt. The king, Bela the fourth, assembled the military force of his counts and bishops; but he had alienated the nation by adopting a vulgar horde of forty thousand families of Comans, and these savage guests were provoked to revolt by the suspicion of treachery and the murder of their prince. The whole country north of the Danube was in a disorder and depopulated in a summer; and the ruins of cities and churches were overspread with the bones of the natives, who expiated the sins of their Turkish ancestors. An ecclesiastic, who fled from the sack of Warsaw, informed the estates of Lithuania, which had also suffered; and the sanguiinary rage of sieges and battles is far less atrocious than the treatment of the fugitives, who had been allowed from the woods under a promise of peace and pardon, and who were cooly slaughtered as soon as they had performed the labours of the harvest and vintage. In the winter, the Tartars passed the Danube on the ice, and advanced to Grain or Strigovitum, a German colony, and the metrócapital of Hungary. They set fire against the walls; the ditches were filled with racks of earth and dead bodies; and after a promiscuous massacre, three hundred noble matrons were slain in the presence of the khan. Of all the cities and fortresses of Hungary, three alone survived the Tartar invasion, and of these Batou raised the siege: for Bela hid his head among the islands of the Adriatic.

The Latin world was darkened by this cloud of savage hostility; a Russian fugitive carried the alarm to Sweden; and the remote nations of the Baltic and the ocean trembled at the approach of the Tartars; whom their victories and ignorance were inclined to separate from the human species. Since the invasion of the Arabs in the eighth century, Europe had never been exposed to a similar calamity; and if the disciples of Mahomet would have opportred her religion and liberty, it might be apprehended that the shepherds of Scythia would extinguish her cities, her arts, and all the institutions of civil society. The Roman pontiff attempted to appease and convert these invincible pagans by a mission of Franciscean and Dominican friars; but he was astonished by the reply of the khan, that the sons of God and of Zingis were invested with a divine powner to subdue or moderate the nations; and that he would be involved in the universal destructin unless he visited in person, and as a suppliant, the royal hore. The emperor Federic the second embraced a more generous mode of def-nce; and his letters to the kings of France and England, and the princes of Ger-manya, represented the situation of his empire, and urged them to arm their vessels in this just and rational crusade. The Tartars themselves were awed by the fame and valor of the Franks; the town of Newstead in Austria was bravely defended against them by fifty knights and twenty cross-bows; and they raised the siege on the appearance of a German army.

I. Even the poor and frozen regions of Siberia, from the north attracted the arms of the A. D. 1225, &c.

Megule: Shibibani khan, the brother of the great Batou, led a horde of fifteen thousand families into the wilds of Siberia; and his descendants reigned at Tobolskoy above three centuries till the Russian conquest.
The spirit of enterprise which pursued the course of the Oby and Yenisei must have led to the discovery of the icy sea. After brushing away the monstrous fables of men with drags' heads and clown feet, we shall find, that, fifteen years after the death of Zingis, the Moguls were informed of the name and manners of the Samoyedes in the neighbourhood of the polar circle, who dwelt in subterraneous huts, and derived their furs and their food from the sole occupation of hunting.

2 In the year 1225, the inhabitants of Godia (Scren) and Frise were prevented, by their fear of the Tartars, from rending, as usual, their ships to the herring fishery, on the coast of England; and another injection, forty or fifty of these fish were sold for a shilling. (Chartres Paris, p. 292.) It is whimsical enough, that the orders of a Mongol khan, who reigned on the borders of China, should have lower-ened the price of herrings.

3 I shall copy his characteristic and flattering epitaphs of the different countries of Europe: Fureus ac fervens ad animar Germaniam, atnme Francia, bellicosus ad animar Hungaria, divus et villanus, totius vere et classe miscuit futila Anglica, impetuosi bellatoribus reftoria Almarazia, navalis Dacia, indolenta Italia, parts interas bargabi, impetuosa Aquila, cum mariis Graci, Adriatici, et Tyrhenum isulam, pyricos et invictos, Creia, Cypret, Sicilia, cum Oceanos contiversa miscula, et civilitatem, cruenta Hispania, cum ferrum lustrosa Scotia, glacialis Norwegen, mem spectant marinum sub vacnil fructus destinantis, &c. (Chartres Paris, p. 293.)

4 See Carpin's relation in Hackley, tient. i. p. 30. The pedigree of the khan of Siberia is given by Alonzo Carmon. (Hist. 455—457.) The Russians found no Tartar Chronicles at Tobolskoy.
While China, Syria, and Poland, were invaded at the same time by the Moguls and Tartars, the authors of the mighty mischief were content with the knowledge and destruction which comprised their banquets and a distribution in one day of five hundred waggons of gold and silver. The ambassadors and princes of Europe and Asia were compelled to undertake this distant and laborious pilgrimage: and the life and reign of the great invader were despised by the kings of Georgia and Armenia, the sultans of Iconium, and the emirs of Persia, were decided by the crown or smile of the great khan. The sons and grandchildren of Zingis had been accustomed to the pastoral life; but the village of Cara-coram was gradually ennobled by their election and residence. A change of manners is implied in the removal of Octai and Mangu from the tent to a house; and their example was imitated by the princes of their family and the great officers of the empire. Instead of the boundless forest, the enclosure of a park afforded the more indolent pleasures of the chase; their new habitations were decorated with gardens and statu-ture; their superfluous treasures were cast in fountains, and basins, and statues of mussy silver; and the artists of China and Paris vied with each other in the service of the great khan. Caracoram contained two streets, the one of Chinese and Tartar traders and the places of religious worship, one Nestorian church, two mosques, and twelve temples of various idols, may represent in some degree the number and division of inhabitants. Yet a French missionary declares, that the town of St. Doris, near Pekin, was more considerable than either Constantinople, or the town of the great khan. The whole palace of Mangu was scarcely equal to a tenth part of that Benedictine abbey. The conquests of Russia and Syria might amuse the vanity of the great khan; but they were settled on the borders of China; the acquisition of that empire was the nearest and most interesting object; and that the Moguls assumed the luxury of the cities of Persia; but the princes and their hordes were alike disposed for the reception of a foreign worship. After some hesitation between the Gospel and the Koran, they confirmed to the religion of Mahomet; and while they adopted for their brothers the Arabs and Persians, they pronounced all intercourse with the ancient Moguls, the idolaters of China. In this shipwreck of nations, some surprise may be excited by the escape of the Roman empire, whose relics, at the time of the Mogul invasion, were hardly inhabited by the Greeks and Latins. Less potent than Alexander, they were pressed, like the Macedonian, both in Europe and Asia, by the shepherds of Seytiin; and had the Parsis come near to the walls of the city, they were yielded to the fate of Pekin, Samarcand, and Bagdad. The glorious and voluntary retreat of Batou from the Danube, was insulted by the vain triumph of the Franks and Greeks; and in a second expedition death surprised him in full march to attack the capital of the Cæsars. His brother Borgia carried the Tartar arms into Bulgaria and Thrace; but he was diverted from the Byzantine war by a visit to Novgorod, in the fifty-seventh degree of latitude, where he numbered the inhabitants and regulated the tributes of Russia. The Mogul khan formed a design to make the mountains of Persia three hundred thousand horse penetrated through the gates of Derbend; and the Greeks might rejoice in the first example of domestic war. After the recovery of Constantinople, Michael Palaeologus was distanced at a distance from Constantine. The Mogul army was dissolved in a vast and populous country; and their emperors adopted with pleasure a political system, which gives to the prince the solid substance of despotism, and leaves to the subject the advantage of freedom and public obedience. Under the reign of Kubilai, letters and commerce, peace and justice, were restored; the great canal, of five hundred miles, was opened from Nankin to the capital; he fixed his residence at Pekin; and displayed in his court the magnificence of the greatest monarch of Asia; his halls were adorned with paintings and sculptures from the pure and simple religion of his great ancestor; he sacrificed to the idol Fo; and his blind attachment to the lamas of Thibet and the hordes of China provoked the censure of the disciples of Confucius. The Mogul emperors were lost in the division of the empire, A. D. 1299—1420. They were over the dependent branches of their house, the khans of Kipzak and Russia, the khans of Zaghari, or Transoxiana, and the khan of Iran or Per-
isa. The Tartar khans were leagued with their Tartar cousins; the Tartars subdued the Franks by their freedom and public obedience. The Tartars inhabited the ten thousand families of the mountains of Persia; and the Tartars were in the mountains of Persia; and the Tartars were in

---

1 The map of D'Aulnay, and the Chinese Itineraries (the Guntrus, tom. i. part ii. p. 57) seem to mark the position of Mubin, or Carac-coram, within the limits of the kingdom of Tekin. The agree-tance between Selenschian and Pekin is near 200 Russian leagues, between Pekin and the kingdom of the Chinese Tartars (De Travel, vol. ii. p. 67.)

2 Rubenius found at Caracoram his countrymen, the Franciscans Henc-er, orfere de Paris, who had executed for the khan a silver tree, supported by four lions, and erecting four different inscriptions of gil-ghazi (part iv. p. 338.) mentions the painters of King of China.

---

3 A The attachment of the khan, and the hatred of the mandarins, to the bounces and lamans (Pohalde, Hist. de la Chine, tom. i. p. 502, 503.) causes to resemble the princes of. The wandering (De Travel, vol. ii. p. 67.)

4 Some repose of the Moguls in Hungary (Matthew Paris, p. 342, 343;) might propagate and colour the report of the union and victory of the Transylvanians. The account of the battle of Parnita (Dinastia, p. 2103) after forty years, beyond the Tigris, might be easily deceived.

---

5 See Foster, Lib. i. c. 55. and i. c. n. 66, 27, and the false claim of ciscopos Greces, 1. v. c. 6.
Chap.

XXV.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

his court and army, was surprised and surrounded, in
But
a Thracian castle, by twenty thousand Tartars.
the object of their march was a private interest: they came to the deliverance of Azzadin, the Turkish sultan ; and were content with his person and the treaTheir general Nogo, whose sure of the emperor.
name is perpetuated in the hordes of Astracan, raised a formidable rebellion against Mengo Timour, the third of the khans of Kipzak ; obtained in marriage Maria the natural daughter of Palajologus ; and guarded the dominions of his friend and father. The subsequent invasions of a Scythian cast were those of outlaws and fugitives : and some thousands of Alani and Comans, who had been driven from their native seats, were reclaimed from a vagrant life, and enlisted in Such was the influence in the service of the empire.
Europe of the invasion of the Moguls. The first terror of their arms secured, rather than disturbed, the peace of the Roman Asia. The sultan of Iconium solicited a personal interview with John Vataces ; and his artful policy encouraged the Turks to defend their barrier against the common enemy."
That barrier indeed was soon overthrown ; and the servitude and ruin of the Seljukians exposed the nakedness of the Greeks.
The formidable Holagou threatened to march to Constantinople at the head of four hundred thousand men ; and the groundless panic of the citizens of Nice will present an image of the terror which lie had inspired.
The accident of a procession, and the sound of a dole-1 fill litany, "From the fury of the. Tartars, good Lord, deliver us," had scattered the hasty report of an assault and massacre.
In the blind credulity of fear, the streets of Nice were crowded with thousands of both sexes, who knew not. from what or to whom they fled ; and some hours elapsed before the firmness of the military officers could relieve the city from this imaginary foe.
But the ambition of" Holagou and his successors was fortunately diverted by the conquest of their Bagdad, and a long vicissitude of Syrian wars hostility to the Moslems inclined them to unite with the Greeks and Franks j° and their generosity or contempt had offered the kingdom of Anatolia as the reward of an Armenian vassal. The fragments of the Seljukian monarchy were disputed by the emirs who had occupied the cities or the mountains ; but they all confessed the supremacy of the khans of Persia ; and he often interposed his authority, and sometimes his arms, to check their depredations, and to preserve the peace and balance of his Turkish frontier. The death Decline of the of Cazan,P one of the greatest and most Mogul khans of accomplished princes of the house of 6 Zingis, removed this salutary control ;
A.'d. 1304.
May 31.
and the decline of the Moguls gave a free scope to the rise and progress of the Ottoman
:

Empire.

11

Origin of the

After the retreat of Zingis, the sultan

Gelaleddin of Carizme had returned from j [u |j a t0 [| 1R possession and defence of his Persian kingdoms.
In the space of eleven years,
that hero fought in person fourteen battles and such
was his activity, that he led his cavalry in seventeen days from Teflis to Kerman, a march of a thousand miles.
Yet he was oppressed by the jealousy of the Moslem princes, and the innumerable armies of the Moguls and after his last defeat, Gelaleddin perish-

Ottomans,
A. D. 1240, &c.

;

:

407

ed ignobly in the mountains of Curdistan.
His death dissolved a veteran and adventurous army, which included under the name of Carizmians or Corasmins many Turkman hordes, that had attached themselves to the sultan's fortune.
The bolder and more powerful chiefs invaded Syria, and violated the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem the more humble engaged in the service of Aladin, sultan of Iconium ; and among these were the obscure fathers of the Ottoman line.
They had formerly pitched their tents near the southern banks of the Oxus, in the plains of Mahan and Nesa ; and it is somewhat remarkable, that the same spot should have produced the first authors of the Parthian and Turkish empires.
At the head, or in the rear, of a Carizmian army, Soliman Shah was drowned in the passage of the Euphrates: his son Orthogrul became the soldier and subject of Aladin, and established at Surgut, on the banks of the Sangar, a camp of four hundred families or tents, whom he governed fifty-two years both in peace and war.
lie
was the father of Thaman, or Athman, R e i»nofOth:

whose Turkish name has been melted

"man, 1326 the appellation of the caliph Oth- A D 12 man ; and if we describe that pastoral chief as a shepherd and a robber, we must separate from those characters all idea of ignominy and baseness.
Othman
-

into

"-

possessed, and perhaps surpassed, the ordinary virtues of a soldier ; and the circumstances of time and place were propitious to his independence and success.
The Seljukian dynasty was no more; and the distance and decline of the Mogul khans soon enfranchised him from the control of a superior. He was situate on the verge of the Greek empire the Koran sanctified his gazi, or holy war, against the infidels ; and their political errors unlocked the passes of mount Olympus, and invited him to descend into the plains of Bilhynia.
Till the r< ign of Palajoli gus, these passes had been vigilantly guarded by the militia of the country, who were repaid by their own safety and an exemption from taxes. The emperor abolished iheir privilege and assumed their office ; but the tribute was rigorously collected, the custody of the passes was neglected, and the hardy mountaineers degenerated into a trembling crowd of peasants without spirit ot discipline.
It was on the twenty-seventh of July,
in the year twelve hundred and ninety-nine of the christian asra, that Othman first invaded the territory of Nicomedia ; ' and the singular accuracy of the date seerns to disclose some foresight of the rapid and destructive growth of the monster.
The annals of the twenty-seven years of his reign would exhibit a repetition of the same inroads; and his hereditary troops were multiplied in each campaign by the accession of captives and volunteers.
Instead of retreating to the hills, he maintained the most useful and defensible posts ; fortified the towns and castles which he had first pillaged ; and renounced the pastoral life for the baths and palaces of his infant capitals.
But it was not till Othman was oppressed by age and infirmities, that he received the welcome news of the conquest of Prusa, which had been surrendered by famine or treachery to the arms of his son Orchan.
The glory of Othman is chiefly founded en that of his descendants ; hut the Turks have transcribed or composed a royal testament of his last counsels of justice and mo:

deration."
o Abulpharagius, who wrote in the year 1284, declares, that I lie Moguls, since the fabulous defeat of Baton, had not attacked either the Franks or Greeks ; and of this he is a competent witness. Hayton, likewise, the Armeniac prince, celebrates their friendship fur himself and his nation.
P Pachymer gives a splendid character of Cazan Khan, the rival of Cyrus and Alexander, (1. xii. c. 1.) In the conclusion of his history, (1. xiii. c. 36.) he hopes much from the arrival of 30,0J3 Tochars or Tartars, who were ordered by (he successor of Cazan to restrain the Turks of Bilhynia, A. D. 1308.
4 The origin of the Ottoman dynasty is illustrated by the critical learning of M, M. de Guignes (Hist, des Huns. totn. iv. p. 320—337.) and D'Anville, (Kmpire Turc, p. 14—22.) two inhabitants of Paris, from whom the orientals may learn the history and geogrjphy of their n

own country.

r See Pachymer, 1. x. c. 25, 26. 1. xiii. c. 33—36. and concerning the guard of the mountains, 1. i. c. 3—6. Nicephorus Gregoras, 1. vii. c.
1. and the first book of Laonicas Chalcondyles, the Athenian.
s I am
ignorant whether the Turks have any writers older than Mahomet II. nor can 1 reach beyond a meagre chronicle, (Annates Turcici ad Annum 1350.) translated by John Gaudier, and published by Leunclayius, (ad calcem Laonic. Chalcond. p. 311—350.) with copious pandects, or commenlaries. The history of the Growth and Decay (A. D. I3C0— I6S3.) of the Othman empire, was translated into English from the Latin IMS. of Demetrius Canlemir, prince of Moldavia, (Loudon, 1731, in folio.) The author is euiliy cf strange Hunders in oriental history; but he was conversant with ihe language, Cathemir partly
the annals, and the institutions of the Turks.
draws his materials front the Synopsis ofSaadi Effendi of Larissa, dedicated in the year 1606 to sultan Mustapha, and a vnluable abridg


Relying on Orchan, the conquest of Prusa, we may
A.D. 1334—1339. date the true era of the Ottoman empire.
The lives and possessions of the Christian subjects were redeemed by a tribute or ransom of thirty thousand crowns of gold; and the city, by the labours of Orchan, assumed the aspect of a Mahometan capital; Prusa was recovered by a modern in the shape of a collegiate church, and a hotel for the students of lyceum; the Seljukian coin was changed for the name and impression of the new dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arabic students from the ancient schools of oriental learning. The Turks, at this time, inhabited by their hind and the royal foundation; the Seljukian coin
was changed for the name and impression of the new dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arab
students from the ancient schools of oriental learning.
The Turks, at this time, inhabited
the wisdom and the royal foundation; the Seljukian coin
was changed for the name and impression of the new
dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and
divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arab
students from the ancient schools of oriental learning.
The Turks, at this time, inhabited their hind and the royal foundation; the Seljukian coin
was changed for the name and impression of the new
dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and
divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arab
students from the ancient schools of oriental learning.
The Turks, at this time, inhabited
by their hind and the royal foundation; the Seljukian coin
was changed for the name and impression of the new
dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and
divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arab
students from the ancient schools of oriental learning.
The Turks, at this time, inhabited
the wisdom and the royal foundation; the Seljukian coin
was changed for the name and impression of the new
dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and
divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arab
students from the ancient schools of oriental learning.
The Turks, at this time, inhabited
by their hind and the royal foundation; the Seljukian coin
was changed for the name and impression of the new
dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and
divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arab
students from the ancient schools of oriental learning.
The Turks, at this time, inhabited
their hind and the royal foundation; the Seljukian coin
was changed for the name and impression of the new
dynasty; and the most skilful professors, of human and
divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arab
students from the ancient schools of oriental learning.
nate friend, to visit his wife, or to taste the luxuries of the palace; sustained in his test the rigour of the winter; and rejected the hospitable gift, that he might share the hardships of two thousand companions, all as deserving as himself of that honour and distinction. Necessity and revenge might justify his preatory excursions by sea and land; he left nine thousand five hundred men to guard his camp against the morrow. Travell ed in the fruitless search of Cantacuzene, till his embarking was hastened by a fictitious letter, the severity of the season, the clamours of his independent troops, and the weight of his spoils and captives. In the prosecution of the civil war, the prince of Ionia throughout the tumults he was disposed to beset the city of the emperor; besought Thessalonica, and threatened

Constantinople. Calumny might affix some reproaches on his imperfect aid, his hasty departure, and a bribe of ten thousand crowns, which he accepted from the Byzantine court; but his friend was sustained and the conduct of Amir is excused by the more sacred duty of defending against the Latins his hereditary dominions. The maritime powers of the Turks had united the pope, the king of Cyprus, the republic of Venetier, and the order of St. John, in a landable cause. The church of Ionia was reconquered; but Amir was slain with an arrow, in the attempt to wrest from the Rhodian knights the citadel of Smyrna. Before his death, he generously recommended another ally of his own nation; not more sincere or zealous than himself, but more able to afford a prompt and powerful aid. The new will of the prince of Ionia was admitted, and crowned the daughter of Cantacuzene, he would invariably fulfill the duties of a subject and a son. Parental tenderness was silenced by the voice of ambition; the Greek clergy convened at the marriage of a christian princess with a sectary of Mahomet; and the father of Theophylact, with shameless satisfaction, pronounced the dishonour of the purple. A body of Turkish cavalry attended the ambassadors, who disembarked from thirty vessels before his camp of Selymbria. A stately pavilion was erected, in which the empress Irene passed the night with her ladies in the coast of Ionia; and her son, the heir to the empire, was set on a throne, which was surrounded with curtains of silk and gold; the troops were under arms; but the emperor alone was on horseback. At a signal the curtains were suddenly withdrawn, to disclose the bride, or the victim, enplied by kneeling eunuchs and by numeral torches; the sound of flutes and trumpets proclaimed the joyful event; and her pretended happiness was the theme of the nuptial song, which was chanted by such poets as the age could produce. Without the rites of the church, Theophylact was delivered to her harrowing lot; but he had been stipulated, that she should preserve her religion in the harem of Boursa; and her father celebrates her charity and devotion in this ambiguous situation. After his peaceful establishment on the throne of Constantinople, the Greek emperor visited his Turkish ally, who, with four sons, had made the coast of Ionia; and his son, Linut, on the Asiatic shore. The two princes partook, with seeming cordiality, of the pleasures of the banquet and the chase; and Theodora was permitted to repaiss the Bosphorus, and to enjoy some days in the society of her mother. But the friendship of Orchan was subservient to his religion and interest; and in the Genoese war he joined without a blush the enemies of Cantacuzene.

In the treaty with the empress Anne, the Ottoman prince had inserted a singular condition, that it should be lawful for the conquerors at Constantinople, to reduce, or transport them into Asia. A naked crowd of christians of both sexes and every age, of priests and monks, of matrons and virgins, was exposed in the public market; the whip was frequently used to quicken the charity of redemption; and the indi viduals of both sexes were led away to the worst of evils of temporal and spiritual bondage. Cantacuzene was reduced to subscribe the same terms; and their execution must have been still more pernicious to the empire: a body of ten thousand Turks had been detached to the assistance of the empress Anne; but the entire forces of Orchan were exerted in the service of his father. Yet these calamities were of a transient nature; as soon as the storm had passed away, the fugitives might return to their habitations; and at the conclusion of the civil war, it was condescended in the name of the hands of the Moslems of Asia. It was in his last quarter with his pupil that Cantacuzene inflicted the deep and deadly wound, which could never be healed by his successors, and which is poorly expiated by his theological dialogues against the prophet Mahomet. Ignorance, the fruit of their own misfortunes, rendered them incapable of defending their first and their final passage of the Hellespont; and describe the son of Orchan as a nocturnal robber, who, with eighty companions, explores by stratagem a hostile and unknown shore. Soliman, at the head of ten thousand horse, was transported in the vessels, which had continued the habitation of their caravan, and the first payment had been made, when an earthquake shook the walls and cities of the provinces; the dismantled places were occupied by the Turks; and Galata, the key of Constantinople, was abandoned by the garrisons, which had been expelled by the policy of Soliman. The abdication of Cantacuzene dissolved the feeble bands of domestic alliance; and his last advice admonished his countrymen to decline a rash contest, and to compare their own weakness with the numbers and valour, the discipline and enthusiasm, of the Moslems. His prudent counsels were despised by the headstrong vanity of youth, and soon justified by the victories of the Ottomans. But as he practised in the field, and at his death the exercise of the jereid, Soliman was killed; and his son Soldan, by a fall from his horse, and the aged man, Orchan went and expired on the tomb of his valiant son.

But the Greeks had not time to rejoice in the death of their enemies; and the Turkish sesiman was wielded with the same spirit by Amurrath the first, the son of Orchan, and the brother of Soliman. The reign and European com pilations of Amur-

1 The most lively and concise picture of this captivity, may be found in the history of Ducas, (c. 5) who fairly describes what Cantacuzene confounds with a guilty blush!

2 In this passage, and the first compatriot of Europe, Contender (p. 27, &c.) gives a miserable idea of his Turkish guide; nor am I much better satisfied with Ciofano (a. 1), who has not consulted the most authentic record, the fourth book of Cantacuzene. I do not want for the letters of which are written, and which are not meant, to modernize, of Niphres

4 After the conclusion of Cantacuzene and Gregoras, there follows a less interval of a few years, during which the Emperor Constantine and Lucianos Chalcedon, all three write after the taking of Constantinople.
The Decline and Fall

chap. xxv.

we can discern, that he subdued without resistance the whole province of Romania or Thrace, from the Hellespont to Mount Hermon and the declivities of the capes; and that Adrastos was choson for the royal seat of his government and religion in Europe. Constantipol, whose decline is almost ceciv with her foundation, had often, in the lapse of a thousand years, been assaulted by the barbarians of the east and west; but his ancient towers had been re-erected, both in Asia and Europe, by the arms of the same hostile monarchy. Yet the prudence or generosity of Amurath postponed for this while his easy conquest; and his pride was satisfied with the frequent and humble attendance of John Paleologus and his four sons, who, followed at his summons the crown and camp of their Ottoman prince. He marched against the Servian nations between the Danube and the Adriatic, the Bulgarians, Servians, Bosnians, and Albanians; and these warlike tribes, who had so often insulted the majesty of the empire, were repeatedly broken by his destructive threats. Their countries did not abound either in gold or silver; nor were their rustic hamlets and townships enriched by commerce, or decorated by art of luxury. But the natives of the soil have been distinguished in every age by their hardness of mind and body; and they were converted by the Sufis into the firmest and most faithful supporters of the Ottoman greatness. The vizir of Amurath reminded his sovereign that, according to the Mahometan law, he was entitled to a fifth part of the spoil and captives; and that the duty might easily be levied, if vigilant officers were stationed at Gallipoli, to watch the passage, and to select for his use the stoutest and most beautiful of the Christian youth. The advice was followed; the edict was proclaimed; many thousands of the European captives were educated in religion and arms; and the new militia was consecrated and named by himself. Standing in front of their ranks, he stretched the sleeve of his gown over the head of the foremost soldier, and his blessing was delivered in these words: "Let them be called Janizaries; (genci cheri, or new soldiers;) may their countenance be ever bright! their hand victorious! their sword keen! may their spear always hang over the heads of their enemies! and wheresoever they go, may they return with a white face!" Such was the origin of these haughty troops, the terror of the nations, and sometimes of the sultans themselves. Their valour has declined, their discipline is relaxed, and their tumiditary array is incapable of contending with the order and weapons of modern tactics; but at the time of their institution, they possessed a decisive superiority in war; since a regular body of infantry, in constant exercise and pay, was not maintained by any of the princes of Christendom. The janizaries fought with the zeal of proselytes against their intolerable countrymen; and in the battle of Cossova, the league and independence of the Servian tribes was finally crushed. As the conqueror walked over the field, he observed that the greatest part of the slain consisted of beardless youths; and listened to the flattering reply of his vizir, that age and wisdom would have taught them not to oppose his irresistible arms. But the sword of his janizaries could not defend him from the dagger of despair; a Servian soldier started from the corpse of his master, and pierced in the belly with a mortal wound. The grandson of Othman was mild in his temper, modest in his apparel, and a lover of learning and virtue; but the Moslems were scandalized at his absence from public worship. Their value has declined, their discipline is relaxed, and that which was once a system composed the abstract part of the scaffold of the Ottoman state. The grand vizir, who dared to reject his testimony in a civil cause; a mixture of servitude and freedom not unfrequent in Oriental history.

The death of Bajazet, the son and successor of Amurath, is strongly expressed in the biographer's work. "He was pressed in his surname of Idercin, or the lightening; and he might glory in an epithet, which was drawn from the fiery energy of his soul and the rapidity of his destructive march. In the fourteen years of his reign, he moved against the northern frontier, to which he applied the force of his armies, from Boursa to Adrianople, from the Danube to the Euphrates; and, though he strenuously laboured for the propagation of the law, he invaded, with impartial ambition, the Christian and Mahometan princes of Europe and Asia. From Angria to Constantinople, the Ottoman conquerors were more or less successful in the conquests of Anatolia were reduced to his obedience; he stripped of their hereditary possessions, his brother emirs of Ghermania and Caramania, of Aldin and Sarukhan; and after the conquest of Ionium the ancient kingdom of the Seljukians again revived in the Ottoman dynasty. Nor were the conquests of Bajazet less rapid or important in Europe. No sooner had he imposed a regular form of servitude on the Servians and Bulgarians than he passed the Danube to seek new enemies and new subjects in the Russian and Polaish states. The ruin of the Greek empire in Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly, acknowledged a Turkish master: an obsequious bishop led him through the gates of Thermopyle into Greece; and we may observe, as a singular fact, that the widow of a Spanish chieftain, who possessed the ancient seat of the kings of the Visigoths, immediately showed him the sacrifice of a beauteous daughter. The Turkish communication between Europe and Asia had been dangerous and doubtful. He stationed at Gallipoli a fleet of galleys, to command the Hellespont and intercept the Latin succours of Constantinople. While the monarch indulged his haughtiness in the plate and dungeon, and cruelty, he imposed on his soldiers the most rigid laws of modesty and abstinence; and the harvest was peacefully reaped and sold within the precincts of his camp. Provoked by the loose and corrupt administration of justice, he collected in a house the jurists and lawyers of his dominions, who expected that in a few moments the fire would be kindled to reduce them to ashes. His ministers trembled in silence; but an Ethiopian hussar presumed to intimate the true cause of the evil; and future vexation was left without excuse, by annexing an adequate salary to the office of codifier; the humble title of emir was no longer suitable to the Ottoman greatness; and Bajazet condescended to accept a patent of sultan from the caliphs who served in Egypt under the yoke of the Namekukes; a last and frivolous homage that was yielded by force to opinion, by the Turkish conquerors to the house of Abbas and the successors of the Arabian prophet. The ambition of the sultan was inflamed by the obligation of deserving this august title: and he turned his arms against the 1 See the life and death of Moro; or Amurath I in Cantemir, p. 33—15, the first book of Chalcondyles, and the Amasian Turck of Lascavius. According to another story, the sultan was stabbed by a young man who resented this accusation against him. (Epit. l. 58) as an excuse for the unwarranted precaution of pinioning him, it was attended with the loss of one attendant, an ambassador's page, whose head was introduced to the royal presence.

---

2 The reign of Bajazet I or Idercin Bayazid, is contained in Cantemir, p. 231, and of the Badr. The surnames of Bajazet, or Idercin, is, in an example, that the conquerors of the world, who are every age hallowed by the sanctity of a system, which derives its sublimes from the principle of terror. Cantemir, who celebrates the victories of the great Stephen over the Turks, (Amurath II) composed the annals of the history of the sultans, the principality of Moldavia, which has been long promised, and is still unaccomplished, p. 386. The surnames of Bajazet, or the conqueror of the East, which of the observants of the Turks themselves, we may consult the feeling of the Turks themselves. (D'Herbelot, Biblio. Orient. p. 324, 267, 233, 232, 231.

3 See Cantemir, who attests the victory of the great Stephen over the Turks, (Amurath II) composed the annals of the history of the sultans, the principality of Moldavia, which has been long promised, and is still unaccomplished, p. 386. The surnames of Bajazet, or the conqueror of the East, which of the observants of the Turks themselves, we may consult the feeling of the Turks themselves. (D'Herbelot, Biblio. Orient. p. 324, 267, 233, 232, 231.

4 The fact, which is attested by the Arabic history of the Seljuks. The commander of the Seljuks, Amurath I (see Cantemir, p. 336) destroys the testament of Saladin in Egypt, and present (p. 14, 15.) of the election of Othman to the dignity of sultan.
kingdom of Hungary, the perpetual theatre of the Turkish victories and defeats. Sigismund, the Hungarian king, was the son and brother of the emperors of the west: his cause was that of Europe and the church; and, on the report of his danger, the bravest knights of France and Germany were eager to march under his standard and that of the cross. In the Battle of Nicopolis, the French and the Hungarians formed a confederate army of a hundred thousand Christians, who had proudly boasted, that if the sky should fall, they could uphold it on their shoulders. The greater part were slain or driven into the Danube. Sigismund, escaping to Constantinople, went by the river and crossed into Greece, and resided on a long circuit to his exhausted kingdom. The pride of victory Bajazet threatened that he would besiege Buda; that he would subdue the adjacent countries of Germany and Italy; and that he would feed his horse with a bushel of oats on the altar of St. Peter at Rome. His progress was checked, not by the miraculous interposition of the apostle, nor by a crusade of the christian powers, but by a long and painful fit of the gout. The disorders of the moral, are sometimes corrected by those of the physical, world; and an accursious humour falling on one fibre of one man, may prevent or suspend the misfortune of the whole.

Such is the general idea of the Hungarian war: but the disastrous adventure of the French has procured us some memorials which illustrate the victory and character of the Turks. The duke of Burgundy, sovereign of Flanders, and uncle of Charles the fifth, yielded to the adoration of his son, John count of Nevers; and the fearless youth was accompanied by four princes, his cousins, and those of the French monarch. His experience was guided by the sire de Coucy, one of the bravest of ten thousand knights, for the constable, admiral, and marshal, of France, commanded an army which did not exceed the number of a thousand knights and squires. These splendid names were the source of presumption and the bane of discipline. So many might aspire to command, that none were willing to obey; their national spirit despised both their enemies and their allies: and in the persuasion that Bajazet would fly, or must fall, they began to compute how soon they should visit Constantinople and deliver the holy sepulchre. When their scouts announced the approach of the Turks, the gay and thoughtless French retired without a single captain, with dry fullness, and in their retiration left the wine; they instantly clasped their armour, mounted their horses, rode full speed to the vanguard, and re-entered as an avant the advice of Sigismund, which would have deprived them of the right and honour of the foremost attack. The battle of Nicopolis would not have lost if the French would have obeyed the prudence of the Hungarians: but it might have been gloriously won, had the Hungarians imitated the valour of the French. They dispensed the first line, consisting of the troops of Austria; forced a rampart of stakes, which had been planted against the cavalry; broke, after a bloody conflict, the janissaries and themselves; and were at length overwhelmed by the numerous squadrons that issued from the woods, and charged on all sides this handful of intrepid warriors. In the speed and secrecy of his march, in the order and evolutions of his camp, and in the thoroughness of the military talents of Bajazet. They accuse his prudence in the use of victory. After reserving the count of Nevers, and four and twenty lords, whose birth and riches were attested by his Latin interpreters, the remainder of the French captives, who had survived the slaughter of the day, were led before him; and he refused to abjure their faith, were successively beholden in his presence. The sultan was exasperated by the loss of his bravest janizaries; and if it be true, that, on the eve of the engagement, the French had massacred their Turkish prisoners, they might impute to themselves the consequences of a just retaliation. A knight, whose life had been spared, was permitted to return to Paris, that he might relate the deplorable tale, and solicit the ransom of the noble captives.

In the meanwhile, the count of Nevers, with the princes and barons of France, were dragged along in the march of the Turkish army, that was expected to meet the Moslems of Europe and Asia, and strictly confined at Bousra, as often as Bajazet resided in his capital. The sultan was pressed each day to expiate with their blood the blood of his martyrs; but he had pronounced, they should live, and either for mercy or destruction his word was inviolable. He was defiled by their value and importance by the return of the messenger, and the gifts and intercessions of the kings of France and of Cyprus. Lusignan presented him with a gold salt-cellar of curious workmanship, and of the best that he could procure, and Charles the sixth was dispatched by the war of Hungary, Axemian hawks, and six horse-loads of scarlet cloth, of fine linen of Rheims, and of Arras tapestry, representing the battles of the great Alexander. After much delay, the effect of distance rather than of art, Bajazet agreed to accept a ransom of two hundred thousand ducats for the count of Nevers and the surviving princes and barons: the marshal Boucicaut, a famous warrior, was of the number of the fortunate; but the admiral of France had been slain in the battle; and the constable, with the sire de Coucy, died in the prison of Bousra. This heavy loss of the principal of the nobility was felt, and the Frenchmen, who were bound by the feudal laws to contribute for the knighthood and captivity of the eldest son of their lord. For the faithful discharge of the debt, some merchants of Genoa gave security to the amount of five times that sum; a lesson to those warlike times, that commerce and credit are the links of the society of nations. It had been stipulated in the treaty, that the French captives should swear never to bear arms against the person of their conqueror; but the former restraint was abolished by Bajazet himself. "I despair," said he to the heir of Burgundy, "thy oaths and thy arms. Thou art young, and mayst be ambitious of effacing the disgrace or misfortune of thy first chivalry. Assembly thy powers, proclaim thy design, and be assured that Bajazet will relieve to the death the horsemen in the field of battle." Before their departure, they were indulged in the freedom and hospitality of the court of Bousra. The French princes admired the magnificence of the Ottoman, whose hunting and hawking equipage was composed of seven thousand huntsmen and seven thousand falcons. In their presence, and at his command... mand, the belly of one of his chamberlains was cut open, on a complaint against him for drinking the goat's milk of a poor woman. The strangers were astonished by this act of justice; but it was the justice of a sultan who declines to balance the weight of evidence, or to measure the degrees of guilt.

The emperor

John Paleologus

A.D. 1321, Jan. 8.

After his enfranchisement from an op-pressing guardian, John Paleologus remained thirty-six years the helpless, and, at last, the helpless and对象, of the public ruin. Love, or rather lust, was his only vigorous passion; and in the embraces of the wives or virgins of the city, the Turkish slave forgot the disho-nour of the emperor of the Romans. Andronicus, his eldest son, had formed, at Adrianople, an intimate and guilty friendship with Suanzes, the son of Amurath; and the two youths conspired against the lives and authority of their parents. The presence of Amurath in Europe soon discovered and dissipated their rash counsels; and, after depriving Suanzes of his sight, the Ottoman threatened his vassal with the treatment of an accomplice and an enemy, unless he inflicted a similar punishment on his own son. Paleologus trembled and obeyed; and a cruel precaution involved in the same sentence the childhood and innocence of John the son of the criminal. But the operation was so mildly, or so unfelt, performed, that he retained the sight of an eye, and the other was affected only with Discord of the the infirmity of squinting. Thus excluded from the succession, the two princes were confined in the tower of Aeneas; and the piety of Manuel, the second son of the reigning monarch, was rewarded with the gift of the imperial crown. But at the end of two years, the turbulence of the Latins and the levity of the Greeks produced a revolution; and the two emperors were buried in the tower from whence the two prisoners were exalted to the throne. Another plot affected Palaeologus, and Manuel, by the means of escape: it was contrived by the magic, or subtlety of a monk, who was alternately named the angel or the devil: they fled to Scutari; their adherents armed in their cause; and the two Byzantine factions displayed the ambition and animosity with which Caesar and Pompey had disputed the dominion of the world. The Roman world was now contracted to a corner of Thrace, between the Propontis and the Black sea, about fifty miles in length and thirty in breadth: a space of ground not more extensive than the lesser principalities of Europe, who, in the days of Constantine, had not still represented the wealth and popu-nousness of a kingdom. To restore the public peace, it was found necessary to divide this fragment of the empire; and while Palaeologus and Manuel were left in possession of the capital, almost all that lay without the walls was ceded to the blind princes, who fixed their residence at Rhodos and Selymbria. In the tranquil slumber of royalty, the passions of John Palea-olous survived his reason and his strength: he deprived his favourite and heir of a blooming princess of Trebizond; and while the feeble emperor laboured to consummate his nuptials, Manuel, with a hundred of the noblest Greeks, was sent on a peremptory summons to the Ottoman porte. They served with honour in the wars of Bajazet; but a plan of fortifying Constantinople excited his jealousy; he threatened their lives; and the new works were instantly demolished; and we shall bestow a praise, perhaps above the merit of Palaeologus, if we impute this last humiliation as the cause of his death.

The earliest intelligence of that event was communicated to Manuel, who escaped with speed and scep-tively by the palace of Broun to the Byzantine throne. Bajazet affected a proud indifference at the loss of this valuable A.D. 1321–1326.

Jul. 23.

The emperor

Manuel

Condemned, p. 50–53. Of the Greeks, Ducas subjoins c. 13. 12. acknowledges the Turkish cadi at Constantinople. Yet even Ducas describes the case, c. 13. 12. 1. 12.

Memories, de Mesciare Jean le Malgre, dit Boucicault, Maré-chal de France, partie i. c. 50, 55.

CHAPTER XVI.

Elevation of Timour to Tamerlane to the throne of Samarcand.—His con posts in Persia, Georgia, Turky, Russia, India, Syria, and Anatolia.—His Turkish war.—Defeat and captivity of Jengiz.—Death of Timour.—Conflict of Jengiz.—First invasion of the Turkish monarchy by Mahomet the first.—Siege of Constantinople by Amurath the second.

The conquest and monarchy of the Mongol or Turcoman world was the first object of the ambitious schemes of Timour. To live in the memory and esteem of future ages, was the second wish of his mind, and his magnanimous spirit. The lustre of his actions of his reign were diligently recorded in the journals of his secretaries; the authentic narrative was revised by the persons best informed of each particular transaction; and it is believed in the empire and family of Timour, that the monarch himself composed the commentaries of his life, and the institutions of his government. But these cares were inessential for the preservation of his fame, and these precious memorials in the Mogul or Persian language were concealed from the world, or, at least, from the knowledge of Europe. The nations which he vanquished and subdued, and whom he imposed upon, his ignorance has long repeated the tale of calumny, which had disfigured the birth and character, the person, and even the name, of Tamerlane. Yet his real merit would be enhanced, rather than debased, by the elevation of a peasant to the throne of Europe, in the theme of reproach, unless he had the weakness to blush at a natural, or an honourable, infamy.

In the eyes of the Moguls, who held the indefeasible succession of the house of Zingis, he was doubted to be a real successor, and he sprang from the tribe of Persch; his fifth ancestor, Caraharor Nivan, had been the vizir of Zingati, in his new realm of Transoxiana; and in the descent of some generations, the branch of Timour is confounded, at least by the females, with the imperial stem. He was born forty miles to the south of Samarcand, in the village of Sezbar, in the fruitful territory of Cash, of which his fathers were the hereditary chiefs, as well as a number of ten thousand. His name is equal to that of one of those periods of anarchy which announced the fall of the Asiatic dynasties, and opened a new field to adventurous ambition. The khan of Kazgati were extinct; the emirs aspired to independence; and their domestic feuds could only be suspended by the conquest and tyranny of the khans of Kasbai, who, with an army of Geets or Calumacs, invaded the Transoxian kingdom. From the twelfth year of his age, Timour had entered the field of action; in the twenty-fifth, he stood forth as the deliverer of his country; and as the eyes and will of the people were turned towards a hero who suffered in their cause. The chiefs of the law and the army had pledged their salvation to support him with their lives and fortunes; but in the hour of danger they were silent and afraid; and, after waiting seven days on the hills of Samarcand, he retreated to the desert with only sixty horsemen. The fugitives were overtaken by a thousand Geets, whom he repulsed with incredible slaughter, and his enemies were forced to exclaim, "Timour is a wonderful man; fortune and the divine favour are with him." But in this bloody action his own followers were reduced to seven; a number was so small that he soon directed the composition of three Carizmians. He wandered in the desert with his seven companions, and four horses; and sixty-two days was he plunged in a leathern dungeon, from whence he escaped by his own courage and the remorse of the oppressor. After examining the brave and rapid history of the Jingo, or Oxus, he led, during some months, the life of a vagrant and outlaw, on the borders of the adjacent states. But his fame shone brighter in adversity; he learned to distinguish the friends of his person, the merit of his services, and to apply the various characters of men for their advantage, and above all, for his own. On his return to his native country, Timour was successively joined by the parties of his confederates, who anxiously sought him in the desert; nor can I refuse to describe, in his pathetic simplicity, one of their fortunate expeditions, and the magnificent method in which he chose as guide to three chiefs, who were at the head of seventy horse. "When their eyes fell upon me," says Timour, "they were overwhelmed with joy; and they slighted from their horses; and they came and knelled; and they kissed my stirrup. I also came down from my horse, and took up their arms. And I put my turban on the head of the first chief; and my girdle, rich in jewels and wrought with gold, I bound on the loins of the second; and the third, I clothed in my own coat. And they wept, and I wept also; and the hour of prayer was arrived, and we prayed. And we mounted our steeds, and came to my dwelling; and I collected my people, and made a feast."

His trusty bands were soon increased by the bravest of the tribes; he led them against the nineth of Timour, were brothers, and they agreed, that the posterity of the elder should succeed to the dignity of khan, and that the younger should be the descendants of the youngest. In this matter he is general. This tradition was at least convenient to justify the first steps of Timour's ambition. (Institutions, p. 24, from the MS. fac-simile of Timour's History.)

1. See the preface of Sheherezād, and Abulafia's Geography (Chosamian, Æ., Description, p. 60 sqq.) in the third volume of Homer's Minor Greek Geography.

2. To see his narrative of Herodotus, (Syntagma, ii. p. 495) it was cast by the astrologers of his grandson Ulagh Beg. He was born A.D. 1535. April 9th 37° P. M. I found that they could not do otherwise, having the horsepower and the imagination of the Jingo, or the disposition of the khan of Kasbai, without whom, like other conquerors and prophets, Timour received the sanctification of Shafee's Razes, or master of conjunctions. (C idolat. Orient. p. 579.)

3. In the Institutions of Timour, these subjects of the khan of Kasbar are most ingeniously narrated; and the branch belongs to another branch and country of Tartars, (Abulafia, Æ., vol. ii. p. 77, vol. v. p. 78. c. 3.) Cast and in the original I would boldly pronounce, that the Institutions were framed a century after the death of Timour, since the establishment of the Turks in Transoxiana.
superior foe; and, after some vicissitudes of war, the Gates were finally driven from the kingdom of Transoxiana. He had done much for his own glory; but much remained to be done, much art to be exerted, much firmness to be displayed, before the grandeur and power of the Mogul empire could teach the equals to obey him as their master. The birth and power of Humseua compelled him to accept a vicious and unworthy colleague, whose sister was the best beloved of his wives. Their union was short and jealous: but the policy of Timour, in their frequent quarrels, exposed his rival to the reproach of injustice and perfidy: and, after a final defeat, Humseua was slain by some sagacious friends, who presumed for the last time, to disobey the commands of their lord. At the age of thirty-four, and in a general diet or con-

He ascended the pulpit, he was invested with imperial throne of Zungis, and while the emir Timour reigned over Zangat and the east, a nominal khan served as a private officer in the armies of his servant. A fertile kingdom, five hundred miles in length with the Mifti, might have satisfied the ambitious and subject; but Timour aspired to the dominion of the world; and before his death, the crown of Zangat was one of the twenty-seven crowns which he had placed on his head. Without expiating on the victories of thirty-five campaigns, without describing the triglory of his march, which he repaired on the continent of Asia. I shall briefly represent his conquests in, I. Persia, II. Tartary, and, III. India,* and from thence proceed to the more interesting narrative of his Ottoman war.

I. For every war, a motive of safety or revenge, of honour or zeal, of right or convenience, may be readily found in the jurisprudence of conquerors. No sooner had Timour re-united to the patrimony of Zangat the dependent countries of Carizma, and the emir who then was his subject, to the kingdoms of Irak and Persia. From the Oxus to the Tigris, that extensive country was left without a lawful sovereign since the death of Aboues, the last of the descendants of the great Houlacou. Peace and justice had been banished from the land above forty years; and the Mogul invader might perceive in the lives of the Russian, kissed the footstool of the imperial throne. His peace offerings of silks, horses, and jewels, were composed, according to the Tartar fashion, each article of nine pieces; but a critical spectator observed, that there were only eight alibis. "I myself am the ninth," said a khan, who was prepared for the remark; and his flattery was rewarded by the smile of Timour. Shah Mansour, prince of Fars, or the proper Persia, was one of the least powerful, but most dangerous, of his enemies. In a battle under the walls of Shiraz, his horse, with three or four thousand horses, the main body of thirty thousand horse, where the emperor fought in person. No more than fourteen or fifteen guards remained near the standard of Timour; he stood firm as a rock, and received on his helmet two weighty strokes of a semitaur; * the Moguls rallied; the head of Mansour was thrown at his feet; and he declared his esteem of the valour of a foe, by extirpating all the males of so intrepid a race. From Shiraz, his troops advanced to the Persian gulf; and the Timurid dominions. Barck, who, for the purpose of his geographical history, gives the annual tribute of six hundred thousand dinars in gold. Bagdad was no longer the city of peace, the seat of the, but when the noblest conquests of Houlacou could not be overlooked by his ambitious successor. The whole course of the Persians and Euphrates, from the mouth of the rivers, to the Tyrian oak, I. Persia, II. Tartary, and, III. India,* and from thence proceed to the more interesting narrative of his Ottoman war.

His conquests in,

1330—1410. I. Persia, A. D.
1350—1390, II. Tartary, and, III. India,* and from thence proceed to the more interesting narrative of his Ottoman war.

1. For every war, a motive of safety or revenge, of honour or zeal, of right or convenience, may be readily found in the jurisprudence of conquerors. No sooner had Timour re-united to the patrimony of Zangat the dependent countries of Carizma, and the emir who then was his subject, to the kingdoms of Irak and Persia. From the Oxus to the Tigris, that extensive country was left without a lawful sovereign since the death of Aboues, the last of the descendants of the great Houlacou. Peace and justice had been banished from the land above forty years; and the Mogul invader might perceive in the lives of the Russian, kissed the footstool of the imperial throne. His peace offerings of silks, horses, and jewels, were composed, according to the Tartar fashion, each article of nine pieces; but a critical spectator observed, that there were only eight alibis. "I myself am the ninth," said a khan, who was prepared for the remark; and his flattery was rewarded by the smile of Timour. Shah Mansour, prince of Fars, or the proper Persia, was one of the least powerful, but most dangerous, of his enemies. In a battle under the walls of Shiraz, his horse, with three or four thousand horses, the main body of thirty thousand horse, where the emperor fought in person. No more than fourteen or fifteen guards remained near the standard of Timour; he stood firm as a rock, and received on his helmet two weighty strokes of a semitaur; * the Moguls rallied;
Lithuania; again returned to the banks of the Volga; and, after fifteen battles with a domestic rival, at last perished in the wilds of Siberia. The pursuit of a flying enemy carried Timour into the tributary provinces of Russia: a duke of the reigning family was made prisoner amidst the ruins of his capital; and Yetzet, by a stratagem, was led on by the bottomless gulf to be confounded with the genuine metropolis of the nation. Moscow trembled at the approach of the Tartar, and the resistance would have been feebler, since the hopes of the Russians were placed in a miraculous image of the Virgin, to whose protection they ascribed the safety of their capital. Admirable and prudence recalled him to the south, the desolate country was exhausted, and the Mogul soldiers were enriched with an immense spoil of precious fur, of linen of Antioch, and of ingots of gold and silver.

On the banks of the Don, of Tanais, he received an humbler deputation from the consuls and merchants of Egypt, Venice, Genoa, Catalonia, and Biscay, who occupied the commerce and city of Tana, or Azoef, at the mouth of the river. They offered their gifts, admired his magnificence, and trusted to his royal word. But the peaceful visit of an emir, who explored the situation, was vixir to destroy the ruin left by the destructive presence of the Tartars. The city was reduced to ashes: the Moslems were pillaged and dismissed; but all the Christians, who had not fled to their ships, were condemned either to death or slavery. Revenge prompted him to burn the cities of Serbia, and to execute several of his captains; and his vanity proclaimed, that he had penetrated to the region of perpetual daylight, a strange phenomenon, which authorized his Mahometan doctors to dispense with the obligation of evening prayer.

III. Of Hindostan.

A.D. 1199, 1199.

III. When Timour first proposed to his son the expedition of India or Hindostan, he was answered by a murmúr of discontent: "The rivers! and the mountains and deserts! and the soldiers clad in armour! and the elephants, destroyers of men! But the display of the emperor was dreadful among these terrors; and his superior reason was convinced, that an enterprise of such tremendous aspect was safe and easy in the execution. He was informed by his spies of the weakness and anarchy of Hindostan: the subahs of the provinces had erected the standard of rebellion; and the partial infants of sultan Mahmoud were despised even in the harem of Delhi. The Mogul army moved in three great divisions: and Timour observes with pleasure, that the ninety-two squadrons of a thousand horse most fortunately corresponded with the ninety-two names or epithets of the prophet Mahomet. Between the Sihoon and the Indus they crossed one of the ridges of mountains, which are styled by the Arabian geographers, The stony girdles of the earth. The highland robbers were subdued or expelled; but great numbers of men and horses perished in the snow; the emperor himself was set down a precipice on a portable scaffold, the ropes were one hundred and fifty cubits in length; and, before he could escape danger, the bottomless gulf again opened, and the times repeated. Timour crossed the Indus at the ordinary passage of Attok; and successively traversed, in the footsteps of Alexander, the Punjab, or five rivers, that fall into the master-stream. From Attok to Delhi, the high road measures no more than six hundred and twenty miles; but the two conquerors calculated it in the south-east: and the motive of Timour was to join his grandson, who had achieved by his command the conquest of Moulain. On the eastern bank of the Hyphasis, on the edge of the desert, the Macedonian hero wept: the Mogul entered the desert, reduced the fortress of Bannir, and stood in arms before the gates of Delhi, a great and flourishing city, which had subsisted three centuries under the dominion of the Mahometan kings. The siege, more especially of the castle, might have been a work of time; but he tempted, by the appearance of weakness, the sultan Mahmoud. The sultan Mahmoud and his son, the prince, attracted him with promises of a Moscow, forty thousand of his foot-guards, and one hundred and twenty elephants, whose tusks are said to have been armed with sharp and poisoned daggers. Against these monsters, or rather against the imagination of his troops, he condoned to use some extraordinary precaution of fire and a ditch, of iron spikes, and a rampart of bucklers; but the event taught the Moguls to smile at their own fears; and, as soon as these unwieldy animals were routed, the inferior species (the men of India) disappeared from the field. Timour made his triumphal entry into the capital of Hindostan, and, although with innumerous monuments, of the stately mosch; but the order and licence of a general pillage and massacre polluted the festival of his victory. He resolved to purify his soldiers in the blood of the idolaters, or Gentoo, who still survived, in a period of ten years, the number of the Moslems. In this pious design, he advanced one hundred miles to the north-east of Delhi, passed the Ganges, fought several battles by land and water, and penetrated to the famous rock of Crapele, the statue of the cow, that seems to discharge the mighty river, whose sources are in India, and which winds through the country of Thibet. His return was along the skirts of the northern hills; nor could this rapid campaign of one year justify the strange foresight of his emirs, that their children in a warm climate would degenerate into a race of Hindoos.

It was on the banks of the Ganges that Timour was informed, by his speedy messenger, of the disturbances which had arisen on the confines of Georgia and Anatolia, of the revolt of the Christians, and the ambitious designs of the sultan Bajazet. His vigour and mind both were not inspired by sixty-four years, and innumerable fatigues; and, after experiencing some tranquil months in the palace of Samarend, he proclaimed a new expedition of seven years into the western countries of Asia. To the soldiers who had served in the Indian war, he granted the choice of routes, and his army advanced in the East and West. But they were not to enter into Syria as before. The rivers of the Punjab, the five eastern branches of the Indus, had been laid down for the first time with truth and accuracy in Major Renou's incomparable map of Hindostan. In his Critical Memoir he illustrates with judgment and learning the matches of the Arabs, the Khan, and Timour.

1 See the Institutions, p. 141, to the end of the first book, and Sherchefdin (c. v. c. 16) to the entrance of Timour into Syria.
The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

In his day, Timour was the greatest conqueror since Alexander. Yet he was a great trial to his countrymen, who had to endure the conquests and devastations of Timour. The Mogul conquest of Persia and the Ottoman conquests of Georgia were the final explosions of Timour's reign. The Mogul and Ottoman conquests were followed by the rise of the Turkish emirates, which were to be the scourge of the Near East for the next two centuries.

The military reputation of the Mughuls was restored by Timour, who had led his troops to victory over the Persians. Timour's conquests were not without their cost, however. The Ottoman emirate of Bajazet was still engaged in the blockade of Constantinople, and a Mogul conqueror checked his pursuit, and turned aside to the invasion of Syria and Egypt. In these transactions, the Ottoman prince, by the Kaisir of Rome, the Caesars of the Romans, a title which, by a small anticipation, might be given to a monarch who possessed the provinces, and threatened the city, of the successors of Constantine the Great.

The military reputation of the Mammalanes was still retained in Egypt and Syria: but the dynasty of the Turks was overthrown by that of the Circassians and their favourite Barkok, from a slave and a prisoner, was raised and restored to the throne. In the midst of rebellion and discord, he asserted his power by compelling the emirs to pay tribute and to assemble their forces to repel the Turks. The Ottoman emirate of Bajazet was still engaged in the blockade of Constantinople, and a Mogul conqueror checked his pursuit, and turned aside to the invasion of Syria and Egypt. In these transactions, the Ottoman prince, by the Kaisir of Rome, the Caesars of the Romans, a title which, by a small anticipation, might be given to a monarch who possessed the provinces, and threatened the city, of the successors of Constantine the Great.

The military reputation of the Mammalanes was still retained in Egypt and Syria: but the dynasty of the Turks was overthrown by that of the Circassians and their favourite Barkok, from a slave and a prisoner, was raised and restored to the throne. In the midst of rebellion and discord, he asserted his power by compelling the emirs to pay tribute and to assemble their forces to repel the Turks. The Ottoman emirate of Bajazet was still engaged in the blockade of Constantinople, and a Mogul conqueror checked his pursuit, and turned aside to the invasion of Syria and Egypt. In these transactions, the Ottoman prince, by the Kaisir of Rome, the Caesars of the Romans, a title which, by a small anticipation, might be given to a monarch who possessed the provinces, and threatened the city, of the successors of Constantine the Great.
OF traversed and another conversation. It was a question of the real nature of the Ottoman emperors, and the true martyrs, of those who are slain on my side, or on that of my enemies!

But he was silenced, or satisfied, by the dexterity of one of the cadis of Aleppo, who replied in the words of Mahomet himself, that the motive, not the ensign, constitutes the martyr; and that a man may be a martyr without ever having fought only for the glory of God, may deserve that sacred appellation. The true succession of the caliphs was a controversy of a still more delicate nature, and the frankness of a doctor, too honest for his situation, provoked the emperor to exclaim, Ye are as false as those of Damascus: Murshid was a usurper, Zeyd a tyrant, and Ali alone is the lawful successor of the prophet." A prudent explanation restored his tranquillity; and he passed to a more familiar topic of conversation.

"What is your age?" said he to the calif. Fifty years and a half would be the age of my eldest son. He has not yet seen me here (continuing)—a poor, lame, decrepit mortal. Yet by my arm has the Almighty been pleased to subdue the kingdoms of Iran, Tournay, and the Indies. I am not a man of blood; and God is my witness, that in all my wars I have never been the aggressor; and that my enemies have always been my fellow-countrymen.

"During this peaceful conversation, the streets of Aleppo streamed with blood, and re-echoed with the cries of mothers and children, with the shrieks of violated virgins. The rich plunder that was abandoned to his soldiers, and the spoil of millions, which the Mogul had thus won, and which was conveyed back to the east, was re-echoed by the perspicuous command of producing an adequate number of heads, which, according to his custom, were curiously piled in columns and pyramids: the Moguls celebrated the feast of victory, while the surviving Moslems passed the night in tears, and in chains. I shall not dwell on the march of the destroyer from Aleppo to Damascus, where he was rudely encountered, and almost overthrown, by the armies of Egypt. A retrograde motion was imputed to his distress and despair; one of his nephews deserted to the enemy; and Syria rejoiced in the tale of his downfall, when the sultan was driven by the revolution of the Manuels to escape with precipitation and shame to his palace of Cairo. Abandoned by his prince, the inhabitants of Damascus still defended their walls; and Timour consented to raise the siege, if they would adorn their retreat with a gift or ransom; each article of nine pieces. But no sooner had he introduced himself into the city, under colour of a truce, than he perfidiously violated the treaty; imposed a contribution of ten millions of gold; and animated his troops to chastise the iniquity of those Syrians who had rebelled, or approved, the murder of the grandson of Mahomet. A family which had given honourable service to the head of Hossein, and a colony of artificers, whom he sent to labour at Samarqand, were alone reserved in the general massacre; and after a period of seven years, the emperor of Persia is reported as having been driven by the Mogul to cross the desert to Baghdad, to make an attack on the Persian dominions. Again, the Moslem sultan, of whom you have been so long in search, has been killed in the solitude of the desert. I am told that this is the truth."

DAMASCUS.

Nov. 22.

"The marches and occupations of Timur between the Syrian and Ottoman wars, are represented by Sheerefaddin, (c. v. 29—43) and Arabanah, (tom, ii. c. 15—15.)"

"This number of 500,000 men was extracted by Arabanah, or rather by Ebn Schoumeh, ex raisonario Timuri, on the authority of the Czarinian officer of war, (t. i. 5, &c.) who, in his respect for the Czar of Russia (Pharaon, i. 1. 22) adds no more than 20,000 men. Péguy reckons 1,000,000; another Latin contemporary (Chom, Tartishmam, p. 125) 1,100,044; and the enormous sum of 1,600,000 is attested by a German soldier, who was present at the battle of Angora, and who, as a native of that city, is, in his Institutions, has not designed to calculate his troops, his subjects, or his revenues."

"A wide latitude of non-effectiveness was allowed by the Great Mogul for his own pride and the benefit of his officers. Bernard's patronage of the Duke of Pejrag-Hazan, and the number of 300,000 men which he reports to have been disor- dunged past the Euphrates, (from the Ottoman army, (Institutum, p. 153) which is reduced to 160,000 by Pharaon (i. 1. 22) and sanctioned by the German soldier to 1,000,000. It is evident, that the Mogul numbers were the means of his success."

"It may not be useless to mark the distances between Angora and the neighboring rivers, by the progress of the carriage, each of twenty or twenty-five miles: to Smyrna twenty; to Konia ten; to Bousos ten; to Casaracta eight; to Simnep ten; to Niconemada nine; to Silfimundive, twelve, or thirteen. (See Tournefort, Voyage au Levant, tom. ii. letter xxl.)" tion, whose force still consisted in the missile weapons, and rapid evolutions, of a numerous cavalry. From a single troop to a great army, the mode of attack was the same; a foremost line first advanced to the charge, and was supported in a just order by the squadrons of the great vanguard. The general's eye was now fixed, and the front and rear of the right and left wings successively moved forwards in their several divisions, and in a direct or oblique line; the enemy was pressed by eighteen or twenty attacks; and each attack afforded a chance of victory. If they all proved fruitless or unsuccessful, which did not happen, then the emperor himself, who gave the signal of advancing to the standard and main body, which he led in person. But in the battle of Angora, the main body itself was supported, on the flanks and in the rear, by the bravest squadrons of the reserve, commanded by the sons and grandsons of Timour. The conqueror of Hindostan ostentatiously showed a line of elephants, the trophies, rather than the instruments, of victory: the use of the Greek fire was familiar to the Moguls and Ottomans: but had they borrowed from Europe the recent invention of the arquebus, the art of conqueror in either nation must have turned the fortune of the day. In that day Bajazet displayed the qualities of a soldier and a chief: but his genius sunk under a stronger ascendant: and, from various motives, the greatest part of his troops failed him in the decisive moment. But Timour, with the plunder in his hands, could not but rejoice in their deliverance from a dangerous and domestic foe, and a parallel was drawn between the two rivals, by observing that Timour, in fourteen days, had reduced a fortress which had sustained seven years the siege, or at least the blockade, of Bajazet.

The iron cage in which Bajazet was the history of imprisonment by Tamerlane, so long and his iron cage so often repeated as a moral lesson, is now rejected as a fable by the modern writers, who smile at the vulgar credulity. They appeal with confidence to the Persian authors, who have preserved to us an account of his situation, and of the manner of his death, which had occasioned so much curiosity to Tamerlane, and which, in an apocryphal version, was more worthy than the story of his captivity. In Bajazet's situation at the time of his capture, by the means of his height, and the length of his horse's neck, the conqueror, in his pride, had asked of Timour, as a compliment, to receive him, seated by his side, and mangled with just reproaches a soothing pity for his rank and misfortune.

"Alas!" said the emperor, "the decree of fate is now accomplished by your own fault: it is the web which you have woven, the thorns of the tree which yourself have planted, and which now undo you. I wished to spare you, but you rejected my offer; and you have destroyed the champion of the Moslems: you have broken our oaths; you despised our friendship; you forced us to enter your kingdom with our invincible armies. Behold the event! Had you vanquished, I am not ignorant of the fate which you reserved for myself and my troops. But I disdain to retaliate: your life and honour are secure; and I shall express my gratitude to God by my clemency to man."

The royal captive showed some signs of repentance, accepted the humiliation of a rebuke of honour, and embraced tears and lamentations. He had enticed into death, by his inhumanity, the Sultan, the champion of the Moslems. Timour, however, did notExact translation not possible due to the limitations of the OCR.
invested by a patent in red ink with the kingdom of Anatolia, and in the portrait of a generous conqueror, which has been extracted from his own memorials, and dedicated to his son and grandson, nineteen years after his death, and, at a time when the truth was remembered by thousands, a manifest falsehood would have implied a satire on his real conduct. Weighty indeed many passages at least in the sixteenth century, is attested yet flattery, more especially in the east, is base and audacious; and the harsh and ignominious treatment of Bajazet is attested by a chain of witnesses, some of whom shall be produced in the order of their time appearing, by place and country. 1. The reader has not fortunately the original French and Italian documents, for the marshal Bouiccault left behind him for the defence of Constantinople. They were on the spot to receive the earliest and most faithful intelligence of the overthrow of their great adversary; and it is more than probable, that some of them accompanied the Greek embassy to the camp of Tamerlane. From their account, the hardships of the prison and death of Bajazet are affirmed by the marshal's servant and historian, within the distance of seven years. 2. The name of Poggio the Italian, 4 is deservedly famous among the revivers of learning in the fifteenth century. He offers an example so opposite to his theme as the Ottoman monarch, whom the Seythian confined like a wild beast in an iron cage, and exhibited a spectacle to Asia. I might add the authority of two Italian chronicles, perhaps of an earlier date, which would prove at least that the same story, whether false or true, was imported into Europe by the French, with the first tidings of the revolution. 3.
by the Arabs. 5. At the time when Poggio flourished at Rome, Ahmed Elbn Arabshah composed at Damascus the florid and malevolent history of Timour, for which he had collected materials in his journeys over Asia and Tartary. 8 Without any possible correspondence between the Latin and the Arabian writer, they agree in the fact of the iron cage; and their agreement is a striking proof of their common veracity.
Ahmed Arabshah likewise relates another outrage, which Bajazet endured, of a more domestic and tender nature. His indiscernment mention of women and divorces was deeply resented by the jealous Tartar: in the hour of victory he was served by female cupbearsers, and the sultan held his death leapfrogged and wives confined among the slaves, and exposed without a veil to the eyes of intemperance. To escape a similar indignity, it is said, that his successors, except in a single instance, have abstained from legitimate nuptials; and the Ottoman practice and belief, at least in the sixteenth century, is attested by the observing Busbequis, 9 ambassador from the court of Vienna to the great Soliman. 4 Such by the Greeks;
the separation of language, that the testimony of a Greek is not less than that of a Latin or an Arab. I suppress the names of Chal-does and Drusilla, the two learned Jesuits, who had spoken in a less positive tone; but more attention is due to George Pharanza, 4 protovestiari of the last emperors, and who was born a year before the battle of Angora. Twenty-two years after that event, he was sent ambassador to Amurath the second; and the historian might converse with some veteran junior aries, who had been made prisoners with the sultan, and had themselves seen him in his iron cage. 5. The last evidence, in every sense, is that of the Turkish annals, which have been consulted or trancribed by Leunachius, Pococke, and Cantemir. They unanimously deploire the capacity of the iron cage; and some credit may be allow-ted to national historians, who cannot stigmatize the Tartar without uncovering the shame of their king and country.
From these opposite premises, a fair probable conclusion and moderate conclusion may be deduced.
I am satisfied that Shereffeddin Ali has faithfully described the first ostentation interview, in which the conqueror, whose spirits were harmonized by success, effected the character of generosity. But his mind was insensibly alienated by the unseasonable arrogance of Bajazet; they committ themselves, and Bajazet prisoners; an iron cage on a waggon might be invented, not as a wanton insult, but as a rigorous precaution. Timour had read in some fabulous history a similar treatment of one of his predecessors, a king of Persia; and Bajazet was condemned to represent the person, and expiate the guilt, of the Roman Cassin. 6
But the strength and spirit of Bajazet5 fainted under the trial, and his premature death might, without injustice, be ascribled to the severity of Timour. He warred not with the dead; a tear and a sepulture was all that he could bestow on a captive who was delivered from his power; and if Mousa, the son of Bajazet, was permitted to reign over the ruins of Boursa, the greatest province of the part of Anatolia had been restored by the conqueror to their lawful sovereigns.
From the Irish and Volga to the Persian gulf, and from the Ganges to the Masnus and the Archipelago, Asia was in the hands of Timour; his armies were invincible, his ambition was boundless, and his zeal might aspire to conquer and convert the christian kingdoms of the world. 7

1. See the History of Shereffeddin, (l. c. 39, 52, 53, 56.) This work was finished at Shiraz, in the year 1434, and dedicated to Salman ibni, the son of Sharch, who reigned in Persia in his father's lifetime.
2. After the period of Khoshnawd, Elbn Schonaw, &c. the learned H'Herbelot (Bibl. Orientale, p. 862.) may affirm, that this fable is not mentioned in the most authentic histories; but his denial of the credible testimony of Arabshah leaves some room to suspect his accuracy.
3. Eutychius, (Decem, p. 30.) certifies, that he never saw a horse (Bajazet) price, et mene en prison, en laquelle mourut de douce mort! Memoires de Bouiccault, p. i. 27. These memorials were composed while the marshaI served in the army of Ottoman armies, and subsequently collected and published by the Indian ambassador, (Muratori, Annales Illalii, tom. xiii. p. 476, 474.)
4. The reader will find a satisfactory account of the life and writings of Poggio, in the Poggiana, an entertaining work of M. Len-fant, in which the most learned moderns of Bareilly, (tom. v. p. 360—366.) Poggio was born in the year 1396, and died in 1463.
5. The dialogue of Variante Fortunato (of which a complete and elegant edition has been published at Paris in 1729, in 8vo,) was composed probably by the same hand that wrote the Life of Martin V. (p. 53. and consequently about the year 1330.)
7. The following passage confirm the same assertion in thearrangement of Timour's campaigns of 1392, and 1394, as vivum caput, curaque in modo fere inclusum per annum Asiaticum, (Decline et Fall, p. 239.) in theFragmenta Historiae Byzantinae, (Script. Byzant. p. 46.) among the chronicles of Timour, (tom. xiii. p. 940.) and in the Atmades Estes, (tom. xiv. p. 974.) Marchantius, in his Compendium Docen, and Quero, and Jones at Delhi, were both contemporaries, and both chancellors, the one of the Tartars, the other of the Calender, and remain in the Arabic, with the other action, positive.
8. See arabshah, tom. ii. c. 28. 34. He travelled in regions Rome,
The decline and fall. Chap. XXVI.

Chap. the he the and and but their Sherefeddin

The romance of expansion: the conquests of Galipoli, and Gallipoli, were personal, the one by the Christians, the other by the Turks. On this great occasion, they forgot the difference of religion, to act with union and firmness in the common cause: the double straits were guarded with ships and fortifications; and they separately withheld the approach of the Moslems. Timour demanded the submission of either nation, or the surrender of their chief, on the pretence of attacking their enemy. At the same time, they soothed his pride with tributary gifts and suppliant embassies, and prudently tempted him to retreat with the honours of victory. Soliman, the son of Bairuzdet, implored his clemency for his father and himself; accepted, by a red patent, the investiture of the kingdom of Romania, which he already held by the sword; and reiterated his ardent wish, of casting himself in person at the feet of the king of the world. The Greek emperor (either John or Manuel) submitted to him in a tributary alliance which he had stipulated with the Turkish sultan, and ratified the treaty by an oath of allegiance, from which he could absolve his conscience so soon as the Mogul arms had retired from Anatolia. But the fears and fancy of nations ascribed to the ambitious Tamerlane a new design of vast and romantic empire. He design of subduing Egypt and Africa, marching from the Nile to the Atlantic Ocean, entering Europe by the straits of Gibraltar, and, after imposing his yoke on the kingdoms of Christendom, of returning home by the deserts of Russia and Tartary. This remote, and perhaps imaginary, danger was averted by the submission of the sultans of Egypt: the honours of the prayer and the coin, attested at Cairo the supremacy of Timour; and a rare gift of a giraffe, or camelopard, and nine ostriches, represented at Samarcand the tribute of the African world. Our imagination is not less astonished by the portrait of a Mogul, who, in his camp, before Smyrna, meditates, and almost accomplishes, the invasion of the Chinese empire.

Timour was urged to this enterprise by national honour and religious zeal. The torrent which he had shed of musculman blood could be expiated only by an equal destruction of the idolatries of China, founding mosques in every city, and establishing the profession of faith in one God, and his prophet Mahomet. The expedition of Timour, therefore, was an insult on the Mogul name; and the disorders of the empire afforded the fairest opportunity for revenge. The illustrious Hongvon, founder of the dynasty of Ming, died four years before the battle of Angora; and his grandson, a weak and unfortunate youth, was burnt in his palace, after a million of Chinese had perished in the civil war. Before he evacuated Anatolia, Timour despatched beyond the Sihoon a numerous army, or rather colony, of his old and new subjects, to open the road, to subdue the pagan Caimcums and Mungals, and to found cities and magazines in the desert; and by the diligence of his lieutenant, he soon received a perfect map and description of the unknown regions, from the source of the Irrit to the wall of China. During these preparations, the emperor achieved the final conquest of Georgia; passed the winter on the banks of the Araxes; appeased the troubles of Persia; and restored his capital, after a campaign of four years and nine months.

On the throne of Samarcand, he displayed, in a short repose, his magnificence and power; listened to the complaints of the people; distributed a just reward, or a just punishment, according to the merits of either nation, under the pretence of attacking their enemy. At the same time, they soothed his pride with tributary gifts and suppliant embassies, and prudently tempted him to retreat with the honours of victory. Soliman, the son of Bairuzdet, implored his clemency for his father and himself; accepted, by a red patent, the investiture of the kingdom of Romania, which he already held by the sword; and reiterated his ardent wish, of casting himself in person at the feet of the king of the world. The Greek emperor (either John or Manuel) submitted to him in a tributary alliance which he had stipulated with the Turkish sultan, and ratified the treaty by an oath of allegiance, from which he could absolve his conscience so soon as the Mogul arms had retired from Anatolia. But the fears and fancy of nations ascribed to the ambitions of Timour a new design of vast and romantic empire. He design of subduing Egypt and Africa, marching from the Nile to the Atlantic Ocean, entering Europe by the straits of Gibraltar, and, after imposing his yoke on the kingdoms of Christendom, of returning home by the deserts of Russia and Tartary. This remote, and perhaps imaginary, danger was averted by the submission of the sultans of Egypt: the honours of the prayer and the coin, attested at Cairo the supremacy of Timour; and a rare gift of a giraffe, or camelopard, and nine ostriches, represented at Samarcand the tribute of the African world. Our imagination is not less astonished by the portrait of a Mogul, who, in his camp, before Smyrna, meditates, and almost accomplishes, the invasion of the Chinese empire.

Timour was urged to this enterprise by national honour and religious zeal. The torrent which he had shed of musculman blood could be expiated only by an equal destruction of the idolatries of China, founding mosques in every city, and establishing the profession of faith in one God, and his prophet Mahomet. The expedition of Timour, therefore, was an insult on the Mogul name; and the disorders of the empire afforded the fairest opportunity for revenge. The illustrious Hongvon, founder of the dynasty of Ming, died four years before the battle of Angora; and his grandson, a weak and unfortunate youth, was burnt in his palace, after a million of Chinese had perished in the civil war. Before he evacuated Anatolia, Timour despatched beyond the Sihoon a numerous army, or rather colony, of his old and new subjects, to open the road, to subdue the pagan Caimcums and Mungals, and to found cities and magazines in the desert; and

6 Arabshah (tom. ii. c. 25) describes, like a curious traveller, the straits of Gallipoli and Constantinople. To acquire a just idea of these events I have consulted the narratives and prejudices of the Morax, Turks, Greeks, and Arabians. The Spanish ambassador mentions the holy union of the Christians and Ottomans. (Vie de Timour, p. 96.)

7 Since the name of 'Casar' had been transferred to the oulains of Russia, from the Greek principality of Constantinople (Strabo-feddin, i. c. 54.) were confirmed with the christian lords of Gallipoli. (Thesalonicia. c.)

8 S. A. D. 2368, when the sultan of Russia, by corruption of the genitive sp. casar. (Cantemir, p. 14.)

9 Abulfeda (c. 4.) who wrote, in a just manner, the road to China, which Abulfeda (tom. c. 33.) paints in various and theatrical terms. He passes the straits of Gallipoli, and Constantinople, without a sight of the S. A. D. 2368.

of Timour. His designs were vast; his armies were disbanded; China was saved; and fourteen years after his decease the most powerful of his children sent an embassy of friendship and commerce to the court of Timour.

Character and merits of Timour.-East and west, his posterity is still inveted with the imperial title; and the admiration of his subjects, who revered him almost as a deity, may be justified in some degree by the praise or confession of critics and historians. He was lame of a hand and foot, his form and stature were not unworthy of his rank; and his vigorous health, so essential to himself and to the world, was corroborated by temperament and exercise. In his familiar discourse he was grave and modest, and if he was ignorant of the Arabic language, he spake with fluency and elegance the Persian and Turkish idioms. It was his delight to converse with the learned on topics of history and science; and the amusement of his leisure hours was the game of chess, which he improved or corrupted with new refinements. In his religion, he was eclectic, though not perhaps orthodox, a Mahometan, but his sound understanding may tempt us to believe, that a superstitious reverence for omen and prophecies, for saints and astrologers, was only affected as an instrument of policy. In the government of a vast empire, he stood alone and absolute, without dependence on the councils of his ministers, or the Javascript seduce his affections, or a minister to mislead his judgment. It was his firmest maxim, that whatever might be the consequence, the word of the prince should never be disputed or recalled; but his foes have marvelously observed, that the commands of any king were more frequently rescinded than those of beneficence and favour. His sons and grandchildren, of whom Timour left six and thirty at his decease, were his first and most submissive subjects; and whenever they deviated from their duty, they were corrected according to the laws of Zingis, with the hastitude, and afterwards restored to honour and command. Perhaps his heart was not devoid of the social virtues; perhaps he was not incapable of loving his friends and praising his enemies; but the rules of God are founded on the public interest; and it may be observed, that he had ample occasion to value the liberty by which he is not impoverished, and the justice by which he is strengthened and enriched. To maintain the harmony of authority and obedience, to chastise the proud, to protect the weak, to reward the deserving, to banish vice and idleness from the ranks of his subjects, he risked the animosity and menace of the priesthood, to restrain the depredations of the soldier, to cherish the labours of the husbandman, to encourage industry and learning, and by an equal and moderate assessment, to increase the revenue, without increasing the taxes, are indeed the duties of a prince; but, in the discharge of these duties, he finds an ample and immediate recompense. Timour might boast, that, at his accession to the throne, Asia was the prey of anarchy and rapine, whilst under his prosperous monarchy a child, fearless and unhurt, might carry a purse of gold from the east to the west. Such was his confidence of merit, that from this reformation he derived excuse for his victories, and a title to universal dominion. The four following observations will serve to appreciate his claim to the public gratitude.

1. If some partial disorders, some local oppressions, were healed by the sword of Timour, the remedy was far more pernicious than the disease. By their rapine, cruelty, and discord, the petty tyrants of Persia might gratify their subjects; but whole nations were crushed under the footsteps of the reformer. The ground which had been occupied by flourishing cities, was often marked by his abominable trophies, by columns, or pyramids, of human heads. Astaraen, Carmaen, Delhi, Isphahan, Bagdad, Aleppo, Damascus, Bieraa, Smyrna, and a thousand others, were sacked, burnt, or utterly destroyed, in his presence, and by his troops; and perhaps his conscience would have been startled, if a priest or philosopher had dared to number the millions of victims whom he had sacrificed to the establishment of peace and order. 2. His most destructive wars were rather inroads than expeditions. He invaded Turkestan, Kipzzak, Russia, Hindustan, Syria, Anatolia, Armenia, and Georgia, without a hope or a desire of preserving those distant provinces. From thence he departed laden with spoil; but he left behind him neither troops to raise the contumacious, nor auxiliaries to support an obedient population. If he had broken the fabric of their ancient government, he abandoned them to the evils which his invasion had aggravated or caused, nor were these evils compensated by any present or possible benefits. 3. The kingdoms of Transoxiana and Persia were the proper inheritance of his family, and which he had established and defended as a perpetual inheritance of his family. But his peaceful labours were often interrupted, and sometimes blasted, by the absence of the conqueror. While he triumphed on the Volga or the Ganges, his servants, and even his sons, forgot their master and their cause. The public and private injuries were poorly redressed by the tardy rigour of inquiry and punishment; and we must be content to praise the institutions of Timour, as the specious idea of a perfect monarchy. 4. Whatever might be the blessings of his administration, or the magnificence with which he evaporated wealth and power, which was the ambition of his children and grandchildren, the enemies of each other and of the people. A fragment of the empire was upheld with some glory by Sharokh, his youngest son; but after his decease, the scene was again involved in darkness and blood; and before the end of a century, Transoxiana and Persia were trampled by the Uzbeks from the north, and the Turkmans of the black and white sheep. The race of Timour would have been extinct, if a hero, his descendant in the fifth degree, had not fled before the Uzbeks arms to the conquest of Hindostan. His successors (the great Moguls) extended their sway from the mountains of Cashmir to Cape Comorin, and from Candahar to the gulf of Bengal. Since the reign of Aurungzebe, their empire has been dissolved; their treasures of Delhi have been rifled by a Persian robber; and the richest of their kingdoms is now possessed by a company of English merchants, of a remote island in the northern ocean.

a See the translation of the Persian account of their embassy, a curious and original piece, (in the fourth part of the Relations de la France, droite et gauche.) He learned the language of this monarch with which Timour had formerly dealt. It was in the year 1419, that they departed from the court of Herat, to which place they returned in 1421 from Pekin.

b From Arabshah, tom. ii. c. 59. The bright or sober colours are bore of the present day. These two accounts will be found reproached with the fable of the Koran: the peasant, or law of Zingis (see the "Mahometan" 3) nor will he believe that Sharokh had abolished the use and authority of that pagan code.

c Besides the bloody passages of this narrative, I must refer to an anticipation in the Pechin and Fall, which in a single note (vol. 4. p. 465) note "on 300,000 lands of the eastern world". Except in Rowe's play on the 5th of November, I did not expect to hear of Timour's "unsurpassed magnificence" (p. 77). Yet I can excuse a generous enthusiasm in the reader, and still more in the editor, of the Institutions.

d Consult the last chapters of Sheereeddin and Arabshah, and M. de Guignes, ( Hist. des Huns, tom. iii. xxx) Frurer's History of the Moguls, p. 1-69. Timour's "person and actions" are perfectly told; and the second and third parts of Sheereeddin are unknown.

e Shah Allam, the present Mogul, is in the fourteenth degree from Timour, by Mirjan Shah, his third son. See the second volume of Dow's History of Hindostan.
Far different was the fate of the Ottoman sultan's son, Mustapha, who was sentenced to death for his part in the rebellion against his father, Sultan Selim I. Upon his release from prison, Mustapha, now the heir to the Ottoman throne, was ordered to travel to Edirne, where he was to be killed. This was done in a fit of pique by Selim I, who was incensed by Mustapha's rebellion. The Ottomans were a dynasty of military leaders, and the death of Mustapha was a tragic event in the history of the Ottoman Empire.

The death of Mustapha was not the only event that marked the decline of the Ottoman Empire. The empire was suffering from a variety of problems, including internal strife, economic decay, and military defeats. The Ottoman Empire was once a great power, but by the 19th century, it was on the decline. The empire was weakened by internal discord, and by the time of the Treaty of Adrianople in 1829, the Ottomans were forced to accept the loss of many of their territories. The Treaty of Adrianople was a significant event in the history of the Ottoman Empire, and it marked the beginning of the end for the empire. and d'Amurath, the bravest of his sons, in the van of the army of Europe. The sultan and five hundred guards embarked on board the admiral's ship; which was manned by eight hundred of the bravest Franks. His life and liberty were in their hands; nor can we, without reluctance, applaud the fidelity of d'Adorno, who, in the midst of this decisive battle, was impatient of the delay caused by a discharge of his arrears of tribute. They landed in sight of Mustapha and Gallipoli; two thousand Italians, armed with lances and battle-axes, attended Amurath to the conquest of Adrianople; and this venal service was soon repaid by the ruin of the commerce and colony of Phocaea.

State of the Greek empire, the request, and to the relief, of the Greek emperor, he might be entitled to the praise and gratitude of the Christians. But a massalulm, who entered into Georgia the sword of persecution, and respected the holy warfare of Bajazet, was not disposed to pity or succor the idolaters of Europe. The Tartar followed the impulse of ambition; and the deliverance of Constantinople was the accidental consequence. When Manuel abdicated the government, it was known that the people of Constantinople would have saved him. The church and state might be delayed beyond his unhappy days; and after his return from a western pilgrimage, he expected every hour the news of the sad catastrophe. On a sudden, he was astonished and rejoiced by the intelligence of the retreat, the overthrown, whose progress was checked by the insuperable barrier lately sailed from Modon in the Morea, ascended the throne of Constantinople, and dismissed his blind competitor to an easy exile in the isle of Lesbos. The ambassadors of the son of Bajazet were soon introduced to his presence; but their pride was fallen, their tone was modest; they were avowed by the just apprehension, lest the Greeks should open to the Moguls the gates of Europe. Soliman saluted the emperor by the name of father; solicited at his hands the government or gift of Romania; and promised to deserving by his invincible friendship, and the restitution of Thessalonica, which the Turks were unable to defend, the Propontis, and the Black sea. The alliance of Soliman exposed the emperor to the enmity and revenge of Mousa; the Turks appeared in arms before the gates of Constantinople; but they were repulsed by sea and land; and upon the island of Strymon, on the rampage on the rampart, over the cenotaphs, the Greeks must have wondered at their own triumph. But, instead of prolonging the duration of the Ottoman powers, the policy or passion of Manuel was esteemed to assist the most formidable of the sons of Bajazet. He concluded a treaty with Mahomet, the champion of our heterodoxy, who was beloved by Gallipoli; the sultan and his troops were transported over the Bosphorus; he was hospitably entertained in the capital; and his successful sally was the first step to the conquest of Romania. The ruin was suspended by the prudence and moderation of the conqueror: he faithfully discharged his own obligations and those of Soliman, respected the laws of gratitude and peace; and left the emperor guardian of his two young sons, the heir-presumptive of Europe, and the fiendish cruelty of their brother Amurath. But the execution of his last testament would have offended the national honour and religion; and the divan unanimously pronounced, that the royal youths should never be abandoned to the custody and education of a christian dog. On this refusal, the sultan regarded it as a insult but the age and caution of Mahomet yielded to the supposition of his son John; and they unhesitatingly a dangerous weapon of revenge, by dismissing the true or false Mustapha, who had long been detained as a captive and a hostage, and for whose maintenance they received an annual pension of three hundred thousand aspers.

At the door of his prison, Mustapha subscribed to every proposal; and the keys of Gallipoli, or rather of Europe, was stipulated as the price of his deliverance. But no sooner was he seated on the throne of Romania, than he insulted the Greek ambassadors with a smile of contempt, declaring, in a pious tone, that, at the day of judgment, he would rather answer for the violation of an oath, than for the surrender of a massalulmian city into the hands of the infidels. The emperor was at once the enemy of the two rivals; from whom he shewed that he had such a faith in assimilating their courage. A fire more injurious than the victory of Amurath was followed, in the ensuing spring, by the siege of Constantinople.

The religious merit of subduing the siege of Constantinople, when the city was invested, is only shared by a crowd of voluntary sappers, whose heads were crowned with the crown of martyrdom; their military ardour was inflamed by the promise of rich spoils and beautiful females; and the sultan's ambition was conspired against by the presence and prediction of Seid Bechar, a descendant of the prophet, who arrived in the camp, on a mule, with a venerable train of five hundred disciples. But he might blush, if a fanatic could blush, at the failure of his assurances. The strength of the walls resisted an army of two hundred thousand Turks; their assaults were repelled by the sallies of the Greeks and their foreign mercenaries; the old resources of defence were opposed to the new energies of attack; and the enthusiasm of the dervish, who was smitten with the change of the Christians, who beheld the Virgin Mary, in a violet garment, walk-}

---

5 For the spirit of navigation, and freedom of ancient Phocaea, or rather of the Phocaeans, consult the first book of Herodotus, and the Geographical Index of his last and learned French translator, M. Lavoisier, viii. (p. 229.)

6 Phocaea is not enumerated by Ptolomy, (Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 52.) among the places productive of amber; he reckons Eryx as the first, and for the second book of Herodotus, who alone speaks of amber, he has the authority of Tomsenfort, (tome i. lettre iv.) a traveller and naturalist. After the long and bloody civil wars which had disputed the island of Prusa, and the Black sea, and the Scythus, or Bosphorus, in the more ancient, and the Scythus in the more modern history of Constantine, the Turks must have wondered at their own triumph. But, instead of prolonging the duration of the Ottoman powers, the policy or passion of Manuel was esteemed to assist the most formidable of the sons of Bajazet. He concluded a treaty with Mahomet, the champion of our heterodoxy, who was beloved by Gallipoli; the sultan and his troops were transported over the Bosphorus; he was hospitably entertained in the capital; and his successful sally was the first step to the conquest of Romania. The ruin was suspended by the prudence and moderation of the conqueror: he faithfully discharged his own obligations and those of Soliman, respected the laws of gratitude and peace; and left the emperor guardian of his two young sons, the heir-presumptive of Europe, and the fiendish cruelty of their brother Amurath. But the execution of his last testament would have offended the national honour and religion; and the divan unanimously pronounced, that the royal youths should never be abandoned to the custody and education of a christian dog. On this refusal, the sultan regarded it as a insult but the age and caution of Mahomet yielded to the supposition of his son John; and they unhesitatingly a dangerous weapon of revenge, by dismissing the true or false Mustapha, who had long been detained as a captive and a hostage, and for whose maintenance they received an annual pension of three hundred thousand aspers.

At the door of his prison, Mustapha subscribed to every proposal; and the keys of Gallipoli, or rather of Europe, was stipulated as the price of his deliverance. But no sooner was he seated on the throne of Romania, than he insulted the Greek ambassadors with a smile of contempt, declaring, in a pious tone, that, at the day of judgment, he would rather answer for the violation of an oath, than for the surrender of a massalulmian city into the hands of the infidels. The emperor was at once the enemy of the two rivals; from whom he shewed that he had such a faith in assimilating their courage. A fire more injurious than the victory of Amurath was followed, in the ensuing spring, by the siege of Constantinople.

The religious merit of subduing the siege of Constantinople, when the city was invested, is only shared by a crowd of voluntary sappers, whose heads were crowned with the crown of martyrdom; their military ardour was inflamed by the promise of rich spoils and beautiful females; and the sultan's ambition was conspired against by the presence and prediction of Seid Bechar, a descendant of the prophet, who arrived in the camp, on a mule, with a venerable train of five hundred disciples. But he might blush, if a fanatic could blush, at the failure of his assurances. The strength of the walls resisted an army of two hundred thousand Turks; their assaults were repelled by the sallies of the Greeks and their foreign mercenaries; the old resources of defence were opposed to the new energies of attack; and the enthusiasm of the dervish, who was smitten with the change of the Christians, who beheld the Virgin Mary, in a violet garment, walk-
THE DECLINE AND FALL

CHAP. XXV.

Hereditary acc. In the establishment and restoration of the Turkish empire, the first merit must doubtless be assigned to the personal qualities of the sultans; since, in human life, the most important results will depend on the character of a single actor. By some shades of wisdom and virtue, they may be discriminated from each other; but, except in a single instance, a period of nine reigns, and two hundred and sixty-five years, is occupied, from the elevation of Othman to the death of Soliman, by a rare series of warlike and active princes, who impressed their subjects with obedience and their enemies with terror. Instead of the slavish luxury of the seraglio, the heirs of royalty were educated in the counsel and the field; from early youth they were instructed by their fathers with the command of provinces and armies; and this manly institution, which was often productive of civil war, must have essentially contributed to the discipline and vigour of the monarchy. "The Ottomans cannot style themselves, like the Arabian caliphs, the descendants or successors of the apostle God; and the sultans, or divines, are Tatars." The house of Zingis, appear to be founded in flattery rather than in truth. Their origin is obscure; but their sacred and indestructible right, which no time can eraze, and no violence can infringe, was soon and unalterably fixed in the minds of the subjects. An active or vicious sultan may be deposed and strangled; but his inheritance devolves to an infant or an idiot; nor has the most daring rebel presumed to ascend the throne of his lawful sovereign. * While the transient dynasties of Asia have been continually unsubdued by a crafty visit in the palace, or a victorious general in the camp, the Ottoman succession has been confirmed by the practice of five centuries, and is now incorporated with the vital principle of the Turkish nation.

Education and discipline of the sultan, a strong influence on Turks. To the spirit and constitution of that body, a strong influence may however be ascribed. The primitive subjects of Othman were the four hundred families of wandering Turkmans, who had followed his ancestors from the Oxus to the Sangar; and the plains of Anatolia are still covered with the white and black tents of their rustic brethren. But this original drop was dissolved in the mass of voluntary and vanquished subjects, who, under the name of Turks, are united by the common ties of religion, language, and manners. In the cities, from Erzeroum to Belgrade, that national assembly of men, to all intents the first and most honourable inhabitants; but they had preserved their air of distinction, at least in Romania, the villages, and the cultivation of the land, to the christian peasants. In the vigorous age of the Ottoman government, the Turks were themselves excelled from all civil and military honours; and a servile class, an artificial people, was raised by the discipline of education to obey, to conquer, and to command. * From the time of Orchan and the first Amurath, the sultans were persuaded that a government of the sword must be renewed in each generation with new soldiers; and that such soldiers must be sought, not in effeminate Asia, but among the hardy and warlike natives of Europe. The provinces of Thrace, Macedonia, Albania, Bulgarin, and Servia, became the perpetual seminary of the Turkish army; and when the royal fathers of the captives was diminished by conquest, an inhuman tax, of the fifth child, or of every fifth year, was rigorously levied on the christian families. At the age of twelve or fourteen years, the most robust youths were torn from their parents; their names were enrolled in a book; and from that moment they were clothed, taught, and maintained, for the public service. While the exigencies of the state required their strength; they learned to wrestle, to leap, to run, to shoot with the bow, and afterwards with the musket; till they were drafted into the chambers and companies of the janizaries, and severely trained in the military or monastic discipline of the observant. The youths most conspicuous for birth, talents, and beauty, were admitted into the inferior class of agiamogluans, or the more liberal rank of ichogluans, of whom the former were attached to the palace, and the latter to the person of the prince. In four successive schools, under the discipline of the Tartar khan. See p. 321. In the fifth, the training the youth, the fifth, was rigorously conducted the young khan. The Ottomans were taught, in the school of the jehviel, their daily work, while those of a more studious cast applied themselves to the study of the Koran, and the knowledge of the Arabic and Persian tongues. As they advanced in seniority and prudence, they were admitted to the council of the civil, and even ecclesiastical employments; the longer they stay, the higher was their expectation; till, at a mature period, they were admitted into the number of the Forty agas, who stood before the sultan, and were promoted by his choice to the government of provinces and the first honours of the empire. Such a mode of institution was admirably adapted to the form and spirit of a despotic monarchy. The ministers and generals were, in the strictest sense, the slaves of the emperor, to whose bounty they were indebted for their independence; but their rank, like that of the soldiers, was based on the principle of hereditary tenure, and suffered their beards to grow as the symbol of enslavement, they found themselves in an important place, without faction or friendship, without parents and without heirs, dependent on the hand which had raised them from the dust, and which, on the slightest displeasure, could break in pieces those statues of glass, as they are aptly termed by the Turkish proverb. In the slow and painful steps of education, their character and talents were unfolded to a discerning eye: the man, naked and alone, was reduced to the standard of his personal merit; and, if the fifteenth son possessed a more active and boundless liberty of choice. The Ottoman candidates were trained by the virtues of abstinence to those of action; by the habits of submission to those of command. A similar spirit was diffused among the troops; and their silence and sobriety, their patience and modesty, have extorted the reluctant praise of their christian enemies. Nor can the victory appear doubtful, if we compare the discipline and exercise of the janizaries with the pride of birth, the independence of chivalry, the ignorance of the moderns, the mutual contempt of the veterans, and the vices of intemperance and disorder, which do long united the armies of Europe.

The only hope of salvation for the Turkish and the Greek empire, and the adjacent kings of the vonderen, would have been some more powerful weapon; some discovery in the art of war, that should give them a decisive superiority over their Turkish foes. Such a weapon was in their hands; such a discovery had been at this critical period of their fate. The chemists of China or Europe, had found, by casual or accidental means, a method to increase the power and efficacy of gunpowder. The letter to the pope was written on the 23rd of December, 1327, and confirmed, or, as the Turks say, the pope's name was written on the same page; but the letter and spectacle of the redcap had no effect on the Ottoman policy, and the transmission of christan children into Turkish soldiers.

* See Ricaut. (I. c. 13.) The Turkish sultans assume the title of khan, or master of the world, in imitation of their Asiatic cousins.
* The third grand vizier of the name of Kupreli, who was slain at the battle of Varna. In 1401. (Castro, p. 372) presumed to say that all the success of Julian had been fools or tyrants, and that it was true to say, "he was the race. (Mansuzi Stato Militare, &c. p. 252.)
* This political heretic was well received by the French ambassador the revolution of England. (Mignet, Hist. des Ottomans, &c. p. 517.) His enemies condemned the singularity of his position as an exception of arbitrary office in the same family.
* A description of the janizaries, p. 298. In the Turkish university, the name of the students were written in the redcap of the Ottoman policy, and the transmission of christan children into Turkish soldiers.

1 This description of the Turkish education and discipline is chiefly borrowed from Ricaut's State of the Ottoman empire, the State Militaire of the Turks, &c. (p. 318, &c.) A Description of the Seraglio, approved by Mr Graves himself, (Facsimile of the Text, 2vo.)
2 From the series of one hundred and fifteen verses, till the siege of Vienna, and the account of the capture of Constantinople. (p. 13, &c.) Their place may be valued at three years, or a half purchase.
3 See the entertaining and judicious letters of Basquepoint.
elaborate experiments, that a mixture of saltpetre, sulphur, and charcoal, produces, with a spark of fire, a tremendous explosion. It was soon observed, that if the expansive force were compressed in a strong tube, a ball of stone or iron might be expelled with irresistible and destructive velocity. The precise area of the invention and application of gunpowder is involved in doubtful traditions and equivocal language; yet we may clearly discern, that it was known before the middle of the fourteenth century; and that before the end of the same, the use of artillery in battles and sieges, by sea and land, was familiar to the states of Germany, Italy, Spain, France, and England. The priority of nations is often obscured by the reflection of modern success; but in the common improvement, they stood on the same level of relative power and military silence. It was not possible to circumscribe the secret within the pale of the church; it was disseminated to the Turks by the treachery of apostates and the selfish policy of rivals; and the sultans had sense to adopt, and wealth to reward, the talents of a Christian engineer. The Genoese, who transported Amurath into Europe, must be accused as his preceptors; and it was probably by their hands that his cannon was east and directed at the siege of Constantinople. The success of the first assault and investment was not altogether successful; but in the general warfare of the age, the advantage was on their side who were most commonly the assailants: for a while the proportion of the attack and defence was suspended; and this thundering artillery was pointed against the walls and towers which had been erected only to resist the less potent engines of antiquity. By the Venetians, the use of gunpowder was communicated without reproach to the sultans of Egypt and Persia, their allies against the Ottoman power; the secret was soon propagated to the extremities of Asia; and the advantage of the European war was transferred to the advantage of the new world. If we contrast the rapid progress of this mischievous discovery with the slow and laborsome advances of reason, science, and the arts of peace, a philosopher, according to his temper, will laugh or weep at the folly of mankind.

Applications of the eastern emperors to the west.—Visits to the west, of John the first, Manuel, and John the second, Palaeologus.—Union of the Greek and Latin churches, promised by the third council of Basil, and concluded at Paris and Florence.—State of literature at Constantinople.—Its revival in Italy by the Greek fugitives.—Curiously and eminently of the Latins.

In the four last centuries of the Greek emperors, their friendly or hostile aspect towards the pope, and the Latins may be observed as the thermometer of their prosperity or distress; as the scale of the rise and fall of the barbarian dynasties. When the Turks of the house of Seljuk pervaded Asia, and threatened Constantinople, we have seen at the council of Piacenza, the suppliant ambassadors of Alexius importing the protection of the common father of the Christians. No sooner had the army of the French pilgrims removed the sultan from Nice to Jerusalem, than the Greeks would, if not avowed, their genuine hatred and contempt for the schismatics of the west, which precipitated the first downfall of their empire. The date of the Mogul invasion is marked in the soft and charitable language of John Vates. His measure, on the recovery of Constantinople, the throne of the first Paleologi, the house of Philotheus endangered by foreign and domestic enemies: as long as the sword of Charles was suspended over his head, he basely courted the favour of the Roman pontiff; and sacrificed to the present danger his faith, his virtue, and probably his soul. For the independence of Michael, the prince and people asserted the independence of the church, and the purity of their creed: the elder Andronicus neither feared nor loved the Latins; in his last distress pride was the safeguard of superstition; nor could be decently retract in his age the firm and orthodox declarations of his youth. His grandson, the younger Andronicus, was less a slave in his temper and situation; and the conquest of Bithynia by the Turks, admonished him to seek a temporal and spiritual alliance with the western princes. After a separation and silence of fifty years, a secret agent, the monk Barlaam, was dispatched by the sultan of the twelfth; and his artful instructions appear to have been drawn by the master-hand of the great domestic.*

Chap. xxvii.

Applications of the eastern emperors to the west.—Visits to the west, of John the first, Manuel, and John the second, Palaeologus.—Union of the Greek and Latin churches, promised by the third council of Basil, and concluded at Paris and Florence.—State of literature at Constantinople.—Its revival in Italy by the Greek fugitives.—Curiously and eminently of the Latins.

In the four last centuries of the Greek emperors, their friendly or hostile aspect towards the pope, and the Latins may be observed as the thermometer of their prosperity or distress; as the scale of the rise and fall of the barbarian dynasties. When the Turks of the house of Seljuk pervaded Asia, and threatened Constantinople, we have seen at the council of Piacenza, the suppliant ambassadors of Alexius importing the protection of the common father of the Christians. No sooner had the army of the French pilgrims removed the sultan from Nice to Jerusalem, than the Greeks would, if not avowed, their genuine hatred and contempt for the schismatics of the west, which precipitated the first downfall of their empire. The date of the Mogul invasion is marked in the soft and charitable language of John Vates. His measure, on the recovery of Constantinople, the throne of the first Paleologi, the house of Philotheus endangered by foreign and domestic enemies: as long as the sword of Charles was suspended over his head, he basely courted the favour of the Roman pontiff; and sacrificed to the present danger his faith, his virtue, and probably his soul. For the independence of Michael, the prince and people asserted the independence of the church, and the purity of their creed: the elder Andronicus neither feared nor loved the Latins; in his last distress pride was the safeguard of superstition; nor could be decently retract in his age the firm and orthodox declarations of his youth. His grandson, the younger Andronicus, was less a slave in his temper and situation; and the conquest of Bithynia by the Turks, admonished him to seek a temporal and spiritual alliance with the western princes. After a separation and silence of fifty years, a secret agent, the monk Barlaam, was dispatched by the sultan of the twelfth; and his artful instructions appear to have been drawn by the master-hand of the great domestic.*

Chap. xxvii.

Applications of the eastern emperors to the west.—Visits to the west, of John the first, Manuel, and John the second, Palaeologus.—Union of the Greek and Latin churches, promised by the third council of Basil, and concluded at Paris and Florence.—State of literature at Constantinople.—Its revival in Italy by the Greek fugitives.—Curiously and eminently of the Latins.
ty. Under his reign Avignon was the seat of pomp and pleasure; in his youth he had surpassed the licentiousness of a baron; and the palace, my, the bedchamber, of the pope, was adorned, or polluted, by the visits of his female favourites. The wars of France and England, of the House of Anjou and the Ghibelines, in which his vanity was amused by the splendid idea; and the Greek ambassadors returned with two Latin bishops, the ministers of the pontiff. On their arrival at Constantinople, the emperor and the nuncios admired each other's piety and eloquence; and all their frequent conferences were the object of public promises, by which both parties were amused, and neither could be deceived. "I am delighted," said the devout Cantacuzene, "with the project of our holy war, which must redound to my personal glory, as well as to the public benefit of Christendom. My dominions will give a free passage to the armies of France: my troops, my galleys, my treasuries, shall be consecrated to the common cause; and happy would be my fate, could I deserve and obtain the crown of martyrdom. Words are insufficient to express the ardour with which I propose the re-union of the Eastern members of Christ. If my death could avail, I would gladly present my sword and my neck; if the spiritual phoenix could arise from my ashes, I would erect the pile, and kindle the flame with my own hands." Yet the Greek emperor presumed to observe, that the artisans of the empire would not fail to exceed, in the magnificence of their preparations, those introduced by the pride and precipitation of the Latins: he exclaimed the servile and arbitrary steps of the first Palaeologus; and firmly declared, that he would never submit his conscience unless to the decree of a free and universal synod. "The situation of the empire and the power are sufficient to assure me, by the undeviating influence of the gospels, that the emperor and myself to meet either at Rome or Constantinople; but some maritime city may be chosen on the verge of the two empires, to unite the bishops, and to instruct the faithful, of the east and west." The nuncios seemed content with the proposition; and Cantacuzene affects to excuse the failure of his hopes, which were soon overthrown by the death of Clement, and the different temper of his successor. His own life was prolonged, but it was prolonged in a cloister; and, except by his prayers, the humber monk was incapable of directing the counsels of his pupil or the state. Yet of all the Byzantine princes, that Treaty of John pupil, John Palaeologus, was the best Palaeologus I, with innocent and quiet, with an amiable obedience, the shepherd of the west. His was a soft and motherly influence, epitomized in the bosom of the Latin church: her marriage with Andronicus imposed a change of name, of apparel, and of worship, but her heart was still faithful to her country and religion; she had formed the infancy of her son, and she governed the emperor, after his mind, or at least his pleasure, was enlarged to the size of man. In the first year of his deliberation and restoration, the Turks were still masters of the Hellepont; the son of Cantacuzene was in arms at Arindropol; and Palaeologus could depend neither on himself nor on his people. By his mother's influence, however, and the help of foreign aid, he asserted the rights both of the church and state; and the act of slavery, subscribed in purple ink, and sealed with the golden bull, was privately intrusted to an Italian agent. The first article of the treaty is an oath of fidelity and obedience to Innocent X, the ninth successor of the pontiff who restored the Roman and catholic church. The emperor promises to entertain with due reverence their legates and nuncios; to assign a palace for their residence, and a

5 The ambiguity of this title is happy and ingenious; and modernly, it is synonymous to rector, governor, is a word of classical, and even of sacred meaning, which may be connected in the Olymic of Ducasrane, but in the Thesaurus of Robert Stephens.

6 The first epistle (nine apiece) of Petrarch exposes the danger of the monk, and the incapacity of the pedlar. Hor. iner, v, 116, 112, where the pedlar, person, dani, jones, buto, two persons, praece, auxes (utamam solius rot.,... Heu quarto felicis patro, turrmi solvenc subrat, quam scilbam pecuniarum ascend. set, this satire contains his biography to the virtues and virtues of Benedict XII, which have been exaggerated by Guelphs and Papists; (see the Memoires de l'Academie des Sciences. Mem. du Pierre, tom. i. p. 299, &c. of the same, p. 136. &c. He gave occasion to the saying, Romans conquer.

7 See the original Lives of Clement VI. in Muratori; (Script. Rerum Italicarum, iii. p. 530-350) Matteo Villani, (Chron. l. 22. vol. iii. p. 261) Giovanni Villani, (ibid.) Maffeo Ghiberti, (ibid.) Filippo Neri, (ibid.) cavallefino, poco religioso; Flory (Hist. Eccles. tom. xx. p. 126.) and Signore de Petrarca, (ibid. i. p. 152-153.) The Abbe de Sade treated him with the most indulgence; but he is a gentleman as well as a monster.

8 Her name (most probably corrupted) was Zampani. She had accompanied and alone remained with her mistress at Constantinople, where her prudence, address, and politeness, deserved the praises of the Greeks themselves (Cantacuzene. l. c. 42.)
selyte, Urban strove to rebuild the zeal of the French king, and the powers of the west; but he found them cold in the general cause, and some of them in their domestic quarrels. The last hope of the emperor was in an English mercenary, John Hawkwood,1 or Acuto, who with a band of adventurers, the white brotherhood, had ravaged Italy from the Alps to Calabria; sold his services to the hostile states; and incurred a just excommunication by a serious breach against the papal residence. A special licence was granted to negotiate with the outlaws, but the forces, or the spirit, of Hawkwood were unequal to the enterprise; and it was for the advantage, perhaps, of Paleologus to be delivered of a scourge that must have been costly, that could not be cured internally, and which might have been dangerous.2 The disconsolate Greek3 prepared for his return, but even his return was impeded by a most ignominious obstacle. On his arrival at Venice, he had borrowed large sums at exorbitant usury; but his coffers were empty, his creditors were impatient, and his person was detained as the best security for the payment. His eldest son Andronicus, the regent of Constantinople, was repeatedly urged to exhaust every resource; and, even by stripping the churches, to extricate his father from captivity and disgrace. But the unbounded youth and unsoundness of the disgrace, and secretly pleased with the captivity of the emperor; the state was poor, the clergy were obstinate; nor could some religious scruple be wanting to excuse the guilt of his indifference and delay. Such unprofitable neglect was severely reproved by the pious brother Manuel, who instantly sold or mortgaged all that he possessed, embarked for Venice, relieved his father, and pledged his own freedom to be responsible for the debt. On his return to Constantinople, the parent and king dis-tinguished his two sons with suitable rewards: but the colourless, smooth, and unprofitable Paleologus had not been improved by his Roman pilgrimage; and his apostasy or conversion, devoid of any spiritual or temporal effects, was speedily forgotten by the Greeks and Latins.4

Thirty years after the return of Paleologus, his son and successor, Manuel, peer of the Turks from a similar motive, but on a larger scale, again visited the countries of the west. In a preceding chapter I have related his treaty with Bajazet, the violation of that treaty, the siege or blockade of Constantinople, and the French successor under the command of the gal- lant Henry IV.1 He, with his ambassadors, Manuel had solicited the Latin powers; but it was thought that the presence of a distressed monarch would draw tears and supplies from the hardest barbarians; and the marshal who advised the journey, prepared the reception, of the Byzantine prince. The land was occupied by the Turks; but the navigation of Venice was

2广告 seu quisquam ad usitatem Romanorum. Yet his title of imperator Graecorum was no longer disputed. (Vit. Urban V. Palaeologus, c. xii.)

3 It was confined to the successors of Charlemagne, and to three other cases. On account of this signal and solemn step, these three emperors were content to serve the pope, as he said, with the book and the crozier. Yet the Abbe de Sade generously thinks that the merants of Charles IV. might have entitled him, though not on the proper day (A. D. 1354, November 1.) to the whole privilege. He seems to 4 This torrent of English (by birth or service) overflowing from France into Italy after the death of Becket in 1520. Yet the exclusion of the English was not Mohun's; the true name of our adventurous countryman, (Thomas Walsingham, Hist. Anglic. Inter. Scriptores, 1581.) of the latter's name, Manuel had solicited the Latin powers; but it was thought that the presence of a distressed monarch would draw tears and supplies from the hardest barbarians; and the marshal who advised the journey, prepared the reception, of the Byzantine prince. The land was occupied by the Turks; but the navigation of Venice was safe and open: Italy received him as the first, or at least as the second, of the christian princes; Manuel was pitied as the champion and confessor of the faith; and the dignity of his behaviour prevented that pity from sinking into contempt. From Venice, where he was conducted by Pio della Valle, and the duke of Milan, a secret ally of Bajazet, gave him safe and honourable conduct to the verge of his dominions. On the con-to the court of France, the royal officers undertook the care of his person, journey, and expenses; and a number of the richest and best citizens, in arms and on horseback, came forth to meet him as far as Charenton, in the neighbourhood of the capital. At the gates of Paris, he was saluted by the chancellor and the parliament; and Charles the sixth, attended by his princes and nobles, saluted his brother with a cordial embrace. The successor of Constantine was clothed in a robe of white silk, and mounted on a milk-white steed, a circum-cumstance, in the French ceremonial, of singular importance; the white colour is considered as the symbol of sovereignty; and, in a late visit, the German emperor, who, after a hearty demand and sweetish refusal, had been reduced to content himself with a black coat, Manuel was lodged in the Louvre; a succession of feasts and balls, the pleasures of the banquet and the chase, were ingeniously varied by the politeness of the French, to display their magnificence and sumptuousness; the grandeur of the house, the magnificence of the gardens, the ancient remains of the liberty of his chapel; and the doctors of the Sorbonne were astonished, and possibly scandalized, by the language, the rites, and the vestments, of his Greek clergy. But the slightest glance on the state of the kingdom must teach him the precariousness of an empire; and how easily the unfortunate Charles, though he enjoyed some lucid intervals, continually relapsed into furious or stupid insanity: the reins of government were alternately seized by his brother and uncle, the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, whose factional competition prepared the miseries of civil war. The former was a gay youth, dissolving in luxury and love; the latter was the father of John count of Nevers, who had so lately been ransomed from Turkish captivity; and, if the fearless son was ardent to revenge his defeat, the more prudent Burgdundy was content with the cost and peril of the first expedition. The emperor, Manuel, having prepared, and perhaps fatigued the patience, of the French, he resolved on a visit to the adjacent island. In his progress from Dover, he was entertained at Canterbury with due reverence by the archbishop; and Blackheath, king Henry the fourth, with the English court, saluted the Greek hero, (I copy our old historian,) who, during many days, was lodged and treated in London as emperor of the east. But the state of England was still more adverse to the design of the holy war. In the same year, the hereditary sovereign had been deposed and murdered: the reigning prince was a successful usurper, whose ambition was punished by jealousy and remorse; nor could Henry of Lancaster withstand his person or forces from the defence of a throne incessantly shaken by conspiracy and rebellion. He pitied, he praised, he feasted, the emperor of Constantinople; but if the English monarch assumed the cross, it was only to appease his people, and perhaps his conscience, by the merit or semblance of this pious intention. Satisfied, however, with this return, he reversed his route, and returned to Paris; and, after a residence of A.D. 1462, two years in the west, shaped his course through Germany and Italy, embarked at Venice, and patiently expected, in the Morea, the moment of his ruin or deliverance. Yet he had escaped the ignominious necessity of offering his submission to private zeal. The Latin church was distracted by the great schism: the kings, the nations, the universities, of Europe, were divided in their obedience between the popes of Rome and Avignon; and the emperor, anxious to continue the friendship of both parties, allowed him no corresponde with the indigent and unpopular rivals. His journey coincided with the year of the juhile; but he passed through Italy without desiring, or deserving, the plenary indulgence which abolished the guilt or penance of the sins of the faithful. The Rom-ian pope, whoRgb by this neglect, hastened him to reverse the image to an image of Christ; and exhibited the princes of Italy to reject and abandon the obstinate schismatic.

During the period of the crusades, the Greek know-ledges himself with astonishment and delight; he enjoyed the benefits of the last visit of Constantine the second, and was admitted to the island of Corfu, to which he was conducted by the governor; but in the island of Corfu, to which he was conducted by the governor, but in the island of Corfu, to which he was conducted by the governor, but in the island of Corfu, to which he was conducted by the governor, but in the island of Corfu, to which he was conducted by the governor, but in the island of Corfu, to which he was conducted by the governor, but in

Shakespeare begins and ends the play of Henry IV, with that prince's vow of a crusade, and his belief that he should die in Jerusalem.

1 This fact is preserved in the Historia Polonica, A.D. 1591—1473.

2 This modern Turkish history of Lascaris Corfu, which the Greek emperor refused to worship, was probably a work of sculpture.

3 The modern Turkish history of Lascaris Corfu, which the Greek emperor refused to worship, was probably a work of sculpture.

4 This modern Turkish history of Lascaris Corfu, which the Greek emperor refused to worship, was probably a work of sculpture.
of France; II. The kingdom of France is spread above fifteen or twenty days' journey from Germany to Spain, and from the Alps to the British ocean; containing many distinct provinces, among these Paris, the seat of the king, which surpasses the rest in riches and luxury. Many princes and lords alternately wait in his palace, and acknowledge him as their sovereign; the most powerful are the dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy, of whom the latter possesses the wealthy province of Flanders, whose harbours are frequented by the ships and merchants of their own, and the more remote, seas. The French are an ancient and opulent people; and their language and manners, though somewhat different, are not dissimilar from the rest of those of the same origin. The city of Charlemagne, of their victories over the Saracens, and of the exploits of their heroes, Oliver and Rowland; they esteem themselves the first of the western nations; but this French arrogance has been recently humbled by the unfortunate events of their wars against the English, the first invasion of the British island. III. Britain, in the ocean, and opposite to the shores of Flanders, may be considered either as one or as three islands; but the whole is united by a common interest, by the same manners, and by a similar government. The measure of its extent is so great, and its provinces so extensive, that the land is overspread with towns and villages; though destitute of wine, and not abounding in fruit-trees, it is fertile in wheat and barley, in honey and wool; and much cloth is manufactured by the inhabitants. In populousness and power, in riches and extent of territory, there are few nations in the world that can compare with the French. From them the French language is derived. Its word order is different from that of the English, the use of the longbow is peculiar and decisive advantage of the English. Their language bears no affinity to the idioms of the continent: in the habits of domestic life, they are not easily distinguished from their neighbours of France; but the most singular circumstance of their manners is their disregard of conjugal honour and of female chastity. In their mutual visits, as the first acts of hospitality, the guest is welcomed in the embraces of their wives and daughters; among friends they are lent and borrowed without shame; nor are the islanders offended at this strange commerce, and its inevitable consequences. Informed as we are of the customs of old England, and assured of the virtue of our mothers, we may smile at the credulity, or resent the injustice, of the Greek, who must have confounded a modest salute with a criminal embroilment. But the Greek's enormity and injustice may teach us an important lesson; to suspend the accounts of foreign and remote nations, and to suspend our belief of every tale that deviates from the laws of nature and the character of man.

After his return, and the victory of Indulgence of Timour, Manuel reigned many years in peace and prosperity, and a great part of the islanders of his dominion solicited his friendship in 1412-1417, and spared his dominions, he was satisfied with the national religion; and his leisure was employed in composing twenty theological dialogues for its defence. The appearance of the Byzantine ambassadors at the council of Constance announced the restoration of the Turkish power, as well as of the Latin church; the conquest of the sultuns, Mahomet and Amurath, reconciled the emperor to the Vatican; and the siege of Constantiopolis almost tempted him to acquiesce in the double procession of the Holy Ghost. When Martin the fifth afterwards visited the emperor at the monastery of St. Peter, a friendly intercourse of letters and embassies was revived between A.D. 1417-1425. On one side, and distress on the other, dictated the same desirous language of charity and peace: the artful Greek expressed a desire of recovering his dominions by marrying his daughters princesses; and the Roman, not less artful, despatched the daughter of the marquis of Montfort, with a company of noble virgins, to soften, by their charms, the obstinacy of the schismatics. Yet under this mask of zeal, a discerning eye will perceive that all was hollow and insincere in the court and church of Constantinople. According to the vices and misanthrope, the emperor advanced or retreated; alternately instructed and disavowed his ministers; and escaped from an importunate pressure by urging the duty of inquiry, the obligation of observing the tone of his patriarchs and bishops, and the impossibility of convening them at a time when the Turkish arms were at the gates of his capital. From a review of the public transactions it will appear, that the Greeks insisted on three successive measures, a concord, a marriage, and an embassy. The Greek emperor, the second, and only promised the first, as a consequent and voluntary reward of the third. But we have an opportunity of unfolding the private most secret intentions of Manuel, as he explained them in a private conversation without artifice or disguise. In his declining age, the emperor had associated John Paleologus, the second of the name, and the eldest of his sons, on whom he devolved the greatest part of the authority and weight of government. One day, in the presence only of the historian Phranza, his favourite chamberlain, he opened to his colleague and successor the true principle of his negotiations with the pope. 1 "Our last resource," said Manuel, "against the Turks is their fear of our union with the Latins, of the warlike nations of the west, who may arm for our relief and for their destruction. As often as they are threatened by the miscreants, they resent this danger before their eyes. Propose a council; consult on the means; but ever delay and avoid the convocation of an assembly, which cannot tend either to our spiritual or temporal advantage. The Latins and Greeks are obviously hostile; neither party will recede or retract; and the attempt of a peaceful union will confirm the schism, alienate the churches, and leave us, without hope or defense, at the mercy of the barbarians."

Impatient of this singular lesson, the royal youth arose from his seat, and departed in silence; and the wise monarch (continues Phranzes) casting his eyes on me, thus resumed his discourse: "My son deems himself a great and heroic prince; but, alas! our miserable age does not afford scope for heroism or greatness. His daring spirit might have suited the happier times of our ancestors; but the present age requires not an emperor; but a capable steward of the last relics of our fortunes. Well do I remember the lofty expectations which he built on our alliance with Mustapha; and much do I fear, that his rash courage will urge the ruin of our house, and that even religion may precipitate our downfall."

Yet he proposed the union and authority of Manuel presided over the peace, and eluded the council; till, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and in the habit of a monk, he terminated his career, dividing his precious movables among his children and the poor, and his physical remains among the Greeks. Of his six sons, Andronicus the second was invested with the principality of Thessalonica, and died of a leprosy soon after the sale of that city to the Venetians and its final conquest by the Turks. Some unfortunate incidents had restored Paleologus, or the Morea, to the empire; and in his more profligate days, he had fortified the narrow isthmus of six miles 1 with a stone wall and one hundred and fifty-three towers. The wall was overthrown by the first blast of the Ottomans: the fertile peninsula might have been sufficient for the four younger brothers, Theodore and Constantine, John and Theodore; but they who loved their own, and in domestic contests the remains of their strength; and the least successful of the rivals were reduced to a life of dependence in the Byzantine palace.

Of the eldest of the sons of Manuel, John Palaeologus II. Palaeologus the second, was acknowledged, after his death, as the sole emperor of the Greeks. He immediately proceeded to repudiate his wife, and to contract a new marriage with the princess of Trebizond: beauty was in his eyes the first qualification of an empress; and the clergy had yielded to his firm assurance, that unless he might be indulged in a divorce, he would retire to a cloister, and leave the throne to his brother Constantine. The first, and in truth the only, victory of Palaeologus, was over a Jew, 2 whom, after a long and learned dispute, he converted to the Christian faith; and this momentous occasion is carefully rec

1 See Phranzes, i. c. 13. While so many manuscripts of the Greek original are extant in the libraries of Rome, Milan, the Encyclopaedia, &c., it is in a matter of shame and regret, that we should be reduced to the Latin version, or abstract, of James Fontanus, (ad calendas Ianu.) and to these manuals, as to many others, we must recur in our manuscripts, for accuracy and elegance. (Fabric, Biblio, Graec. vol. vi. p. 615--620.)

2 Ducange, Fino, Byzanz. p. 243--245.

The value of the Hellenic manuscript, from sea to sea, was 3000 syri, or twice, of six Greek crowns. (Phranzes, i. c. 35.) which would produce a crown in gold, or sixteen times, that of six French francs, which is assigned by D‘Anville as still in use in Turkey. For the cost of the manuscripts, the monks were assessed for the benefit of the isthmus. See the Travels of Spurt, Wother, and Ch. meder.

The first objection of the Jews is on the death of Christ: if it were not for his death, there was a suicide, committed with a mystery. They then dispute on the conception of the Virgin, the person of the prophets, &c. (Phranzes, i. c. 17, a whole chapter.)

corded in the history of the times. But he soon resumed the design of uniting the east and west; and, regardless of his father’s advice, listened, as it should seem with sincerity, to the proposal of meeting the pope in a general council beyond the Adriatic. This vigorous project was encouraged by Martin V., and coldly entertained by his successor Eugenius, till, after a tedious negociation, the emperor received a summons from the Latin assembly of a new character, the independent prelates of Basil, who styled themselves the representatives and judges of the catholic church.

The Roman pontiff had fought and corruption of the conquered in the cause of ecclesiastical Latin church freedom; but the victorious clergy were soon exposed to the tyranny of their deliverer; and his sacred character was inviolable to those pretensions, so keen and effectual against the civil magistrate. Their great charter, the right of election, was annulled by appeals, evaded by trusts or commendams, disappointed by reverential grants, and superseded by previous and arbitrary reservations. 3 A public auction was instituted in the court of Rome: the cardinal and favourites were enriched with the spoils of nations; and every country might complain that the most important and valuable benefices were accumulated on the heads of aliens and absentees. During their residence at Avignon, the ambition of the popes was to arrogate to themselves the authority of an empire; they rigorously imposed on the clergy the tributes of first-fruits and tithes; but they freely tolerated the impunity of vice, disorder, and corruption. These manifold scandals were so severe, so new, and so wide-spread over the west, which continued above fifty years. In the furious contests of Rome and Avignon, the vices of the rival were mutually exposed; and their precarious situation degraded their authority, relaxed their discipline, and multiplied their wants and exactions. To heal the wounds, and restore the Council of Pisa, monarchy of the church, the syrods of Pisa and Constance 4 were successively convened; but these great assemblies, conscious of their strength, resolved to vindicate the privileges of the christian aristocracy. From a perceptible decline of both parties, the first was recovered, and a third, their acknowledged sovereign, whom they deposed, the fathers of Constance proceeded to examine the nature and limits of the Roman supremacy; nor did they separate till they had established the authority, above the pope, of a general council. But it was not in the ability of any one assembly, in the institution of the church, such assemblies should be held at regular intervals; and that each synod, before its dissolution, should appoint the time and place of the subsequent meeting. By the influence of the court of Rome, the next convocation at Sienna was easily eluded; but the hold and vigorous proceedings of the council of Basel 5 had almost been fatal to the reigning pontiff, Of Basle, A. D. 1431--1433.

3 In the treatise delle Materia Beneficarii di Fra Paolo, (in the teno, et, and Basel) the present system is deeply studied and freely described. Should Rome and its dignity be annihilated, this great volume may still survive, a philosophical history, and a faithful warning.

4 Pope John XXII. in (1334) left behind him, at Avignon, eighteen milliards of gold ducats, and the value of seven millions more in plate and jewels. See the Chronicle of John Villani, (xii. c. 23,) in Mura- lo, which states the property of the church to be sixty times the sum, which the papal treasurers were able to pay in the form of taxes, (as a tax paid to the papal treasurers. A treasure of six or eight millions survive in the fourteenth century in enormous, and almost incredible, sums. A large part of this wealth, and the loss of much of it, is due to the faulty history of the councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basel, in six volumes in quarto, but the last part 1 the most holy and imperial, exists, except the account of the troubles of Bohemia."

5 The representation of the six centuries of the council of Basel, are preserved in the public library, in twelve volumes in folio. Basil was a free city, conveniently situated on the Rhine, and bounded by the mountains of the Vosges. The church of Basel was founded by Pope Pius II. (Enneas Sylvius) who had been secretary to the council. But what is a council, or a university, to the purposes of 6 Elsa and the stories of Heraclius?" Eugenius the fourth. A just suspicion of his design prompted the fathers to hasten the pronouncement of their first decree, that the representatives of the church militant on earth were invested with a divine and spiritual authority over all Christians; without pleasing the pope; and that a general council could not be dissolved, prorogued, or transferred, unless by their free deliberation and consent. On the notice that Eugenius had fulminated a bull for that purpose, they ventured to summon, to admonish, to threaten, to issue the council; the immediate successor of St. Peter. Their opposition many delays, to allow time for repentance, they finally declared, that, unless he submitted within the term of sixty days, he was suspended from the exercise of all temporal and ecclesiastical authority. And to mark their jurisdiction over the prince as well as the priest, they assumed the government of Avignon, annulled the alienation of the sacred patrimony, and protected Rome from the imposition of new taxes. Their holdness was justified, not only by the general opinion of the clergy, but by the support and power of the first monarchs of Constantinople: the emperor Sigismund declared himself the servant and protector of the synod; Germany and France adhered to their cause; the duke of Milan was the enemy of Eugenius; and he was driven from the Vatican by an insurrection of the Roman people. Rejected at the same time by his temporal and spiritual subjects, submission was his only choice: by a most humiliating bull, the pope repealed his own acts, and ratified those of the council; incorporated his legates and cardinals with that venerable body; and seemed to resign himself to the decrees of the supreme legislature. Their fame pervaded the countries of the east and west; and the council united, within the pale of the church; and their deputies invited the emperor and patriarch of Constantinople to unite with an assembly which possessed the confidence of the western nations. Palaeologus was not averse to the proposal; and his ambassadors with the legates disputed the dispute, but were unsuccessful. But the choice of the place appeared to be an insuperable obstacle, since he refused to pass the Alps, or the sea of Sicily, and positively required that the synod should be adjourned to some convenient city in Italy, or at least on the Danube. The other articles of the conditional visitor were agreed to defy the travelling expenses of the emperor, with a train of seven hundred persons, to remit an immediate sum of eight thousand ducats for the accommodation of the Greek clergy; and in his absence to supply a grant of ten thousand ducats, with three hundred archeists and some galleys, for the protection of Constantinople. The city of Avignon advanced the funds for the preliminary expenses; and the embarkation was prepared at Marseilles with some difficulty and delay.

John Palaeologus. In his distress the friendship of Philip Megas was disputed by the ecclesiastical pope's allies, A.D. 1435, 1436. In the critical powers of the west; but the dexter-ous activity of a monarch prevailed over the slow debates and inflexible temper of a republic. The decrees of Basil continually tended to circumscribe the despotic power of the pope, and erect a supreme and perpetual tribunal in the church. Eugenius was impatient of the delay; and the Greeks might afford a decent pretext for translating a rebellious synod from the Rhine to the Po. The independence of the fathers was lost if they passed the Alps: Savoy or Avignon, to which they ascribed with reluctance, were described at Constantinople as a short distance far beyond the pillars of Hercules. The emperor and his clergy were apprehensive of the dangers of a long navigation; they were offended by a haughty declaration, that after suppressing the new heresy of the Bohemians, the council would soon eradicate the old heresy of the Greeks. On the side of Eugenius, all was smooth, and yielding, and respectful; and he invited the Byzantine monarch to heal by his presence the schism of the Latin, as well as of the eastern church. Ferrara, near the coast of the Adriatic, was proposed for their amicable interview; and with some indulgence of forgery and theft, a superscription decree was transferred to the pope, who was induced to give his own consent, to that Italian city. Nine galleys were equipped for this service at Venice, and in the isle of Candia; their diligence anticipated the slower vessels of Basil: the Roman admiral was commissioned to burn, sink, and destroy; and these priestly squanders might have been engaged against the Turks in the seas where Athens and Sparta had formerly contended for the pre-eminence of glory. Assailed by the impertiunity of the factions, who were ready to fight for the possession of his person, Palaeologus hesitated before he left his palace and country on a per- nicious adventure; his father's advice was impartial. Since he adhered to the majority, and it was enforced by the strange belief, that the German Caesar would nominate a Greek his heir and successor in the empire of the west. Even the Turkish sultan was a counsellor whom it might be unsafe to trust, but whom it was dangerous to confide. Anaurath was unskilled in the arts, but ambitious of the safety of the Christians. From his own treasures, he offered to relieve the wants of the Byzantine court; yet he declared with seeming magnanimity, that Constantinople should be secure and inviolate, in the absence of her sovereign. The resolution of Palaeologus was exceed by the magnanimous gifts of the emperor; who gave the council enormous promises; he wished to escape for a while from a scene of danger and distress; and after dismissing with an ambiguous answer the messengers of the council, he declared his intention of embarking in the Roman galleys. The age of the patriarch Joseph was more susceptible of fear than of hope; he trembled at the door of death.
the perils of the sea, and expressed his apprehension, that his feeble voice, with thirteen of his orthodox brethren, would be oppressed in a foreign land by their unfeeling masters. He yielded to the royal mandate, to the flattering assurance, that he would be heard as the oracle of nations, to and to the secret wish of learning from his brother of the west, to deliver the church from the yoke of kings. The five cross-bearers, or dignitaries, of St. Sophia, who attended the patriarch, were the great ecclesiarch or prelate, Sylvester Syropoulos, who composed a free and curious history of the false union. Of the clergy that reluctantly obeyed the summons of the emperor and the patriarch, submission was the first duty, and patience the most useful virtue. In the church of the metropolis, we discover the imperial titles of Heraclius and Cyriacus, Nice and Nice media, Ephesus and Trebizond, and the personal merit of Mark and Basarion, who, in the confidence of their learning and eloquence, were promoted to the episcopal rank. Some monks and philosophers were named to display the science and sanctity of the Greek church; and the service of the choir was performed by a select band of singers and musicians. The patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, appeared by their genuine and fictitious deputies; the primate of Russia reported the refusal of the more orthodox Greeks, in content with the Latins, in the extent of their spiritual empire. The precious vases of Sophia were exposed to the waves and waves, that the patriarch might officiate with becoming splendor; whatever gold the emperor could procure, was expended in the massy ornaments and chariots of the church and state, while they continued to strive for the ancient fortune, they quarreled for the division of fifteen thousand ducats, the first alms of the Roman pontiff. After the necessary preparations, John Palaeologus, with a numerous train, accompanied by his brother Demetrius, and the most respectable persons of the church and state, embarked in eight vessels with sails and oars, which steered through the Turkish straits of Gallipoli to the Archipelago, the Morea, and the Adriatic Gulf.

His triumph entered Venice, Feb. 9, 1439.

After a tedious and troublesome navigation of seventy-seven days, this religious squadron cast anchor before Venice; and their reception proclaimed the joy and magnificence of that powerful republic. In the command of the feeble world, the modest Augustus had never claimed such honors from his subjects as were paid to his feeble successor by an independent state.

The Pope, in the Council of Ferrara, passed an Edict of Excommunication against the Greeks, who were dissatisfied with their journey, with themselves, and with the pope. The excommunication was subsequently confirmed by another council at Sutri, and the patriarchs of Venice and Ferrara, But (sacramentum Imperatoris adoratus) which are more slightly modified by the Latin, (ii. i. c. 14—16.)

The Congress of Ferrara was held in the palace of a Greek prince, which had been converted into a French Ambassadors' lodge of Philippe de Comines, (i. v. c. 17.) at the sight of Venice, absolved the Emperor from his promise to the patriarchs, and most splendid of the Christian cities. For the spoils of Constantinople, the Greeks complained to the Syropoulos, (p. 87.)

The Greek Emperor, who was crowned and enthroned, on the 24th of May, 1449, was the last of the ancient emperors of the East. Nicholas III. of Italy, reigned for forty-eight years, (A.D. 1395—1444), and was lord of Ferrara, Modena, Reggio, Parma, Rovigo, and Mantua. The two Emperors, John and Manuel, were percussioned by the former, in the 90th year of their age, June 20, 1461.

The Latin vulgus was provoked to laughter at the strange dresses of the Greeks, and especially the handful of their garments, their hair, and their beards; nor was the emperor distinguished, except by the profane sight of his eyes and his diadem of crown and episcopal tiara.

The Latin vulgus was laughcd at the strange dresses of the Greeks, and especially the handful of their garments, their hair, and their beards; nor was the emperor distinguished, except by the profane sight of his eyes and his diadem of crown and episcopal tiara.

The Latin vulgus was provoked to laughter at the strange dresses of the Greeks, and especially the handful of their garments, their hair, and their beards; nor was the emperor distinguished, except by the profane sight of his eyes and his diadem of crown and episcopal tiara. (Haly de Graces Illustres, p. 31.)

Yet another spectacle confutes, that the Greek Emperor was given up by the Turks to the pope and the Latins. (Verona, in Vita Eugenii IV. in Marzotti, tom. xxv. p. 261.)
est part of whom were the subjects or countrymen of the Italian pontiff. Except the duke of Burgundy, none of the pontificates of the west descended to a person, or by their ambassadors; nor was it possible to suppress the judicial acts of Basil against the dignity and person of Eugenius, which were finally concluded by a new election. Under these circumstances, a truce or delay was asked and granted, till Paleologus could expect an unfavourable tête-à-tête, recompensed with a reward for an unpopular union; and after the first session, the public proceedings were adjourned above six months. The emperor, with a chosen band of his favourites and janizaries, fixed his summer residence at a pleasant spacious monastery, six miles from Ferrara; formed a council of cardinals without the church and state; and persisted in destroying the game, without listening to the just complaints of the marquis or the husbandman. In the mean while, his unfortunate Greeks were exposed to all the miseries of exile and poverty; for the support of each stranger, a monthly allowance was assigned of three or four gold florins; and although the entire sum did not amount to seven hundred florins, a long arrear was repeatedly incurred by the indigence or policy of the Roman court. They sighed for a speedy deliverance; but their escape was prevented by the increased security of the emperor's forces, which was required at the gates of Ferrara; the government of Venice had engaged to arrest and send back the fugitives; and inevitable punishment awaited them at Constantinople: excommunication, fines, and a sentence, which did not respect the sacerdotal dignity, that they should be stripped and crucified, with that and what could be worse done. It was only by the alternative of hunger or dispute that the Greeks could be persuaded to open the first conference; and they yielded with extreme reluctance to attend from Ferrara to Florence the rear of a flying synod. This new translation was urged by inevitable necessity; and two questions of the very first importance to the dignity of the marquis might be suspected; the mercenary troops of the duke of Milan were at the gates; and as they occupied Romagna, it was not without difficulty and danger that the pope, the emperor, and the bishops, explored their way through the unfrequented paths of that kingdom.

Yet all these obstacles were surmounted by time and policy. The violence of the fathers of Basil rather promoted than injured the cause of Eugenius: the nations of Europe adhered to the schism, and disowned the election, of Felix the fifth, who was successively a dethroned pope, a prisoner, and a private individual, and a great prince was gradually reconciled by his competitor to a favourable neutrality and a firm attachment. The gates, with some respectable members, deserts to the Roman army, which insensibly rose in nine bishops, and three hundred of the inferior clergy: |

---

1 For the emperor's hunting, see Syropulis, (p. 173, 114, 157.) The pope sent him eleven miserable hawks; but he bought a strong and swift horse that came from Russia. The name of janizaries may surprise; but the issue, rather than the institution, had passed from the sultan to the Byzantine court, and is often used in the last age of the empire.

2 The Greeks obtained, with much difficulty, that instead of provisions, they should be supplied with live hams, four florins per month to the persons of honorable rank, and three florins to their servants, with an addition of thirty over the marquis, twenty to the patriarch, and twenty to the prince, or despot, Demetrius. The payment of the first month amounted to 54,557 florins, from which will not allow us to reckon above 203 Gregori of equal condition. (Syropulis, p. 114, 147.) On the 20th of October 1415, there was an arrest of four months: in April 1416, there was another, and a half in May; and finally a perpetual union, (p. 172, 223, 271.)

3 The residence of it lasted from 1417 to 1421, 231, 221.) deprives the imputation of the Greeks, and the tyranny of the emperor and patriarch.

4 The wars of Italy are not clearly represented in the Chronicle of the Annalio of Byzantium. The historian of Syropulis, (p. 113.), appears to have exaggerated the force and disorder of the pope in his retreat from Ferrara to Florence, and this impression might have been somewhat more discreet and deliberate.

5 The union was signed by the patriarchs in a single council of Basel. The error is manifest, and perhaps voluntary. That extraordinary number could not be supplied by all the ecclesiastics of every degree who were present at the council, nor by all the absent bishops of the west, who, expensively or tacitly, might adhere to its decrees.

6 The Greeks, who disliked the union, were unwilling to salute from it the new pontiff, (p. 175, 183, 195, 206, of Syropulis.) The name of the Latins was aggrandized by their producing an old MS. of the first council of Nice, with filioque in the Nicene and Arian formula, (p. 172.)

7 See the perplexity of the Greeks, (p. 217, 225, 226, 355, 273.)
alone accomplish the purposes of their interview; and the obstinacy of public dispute was softened by the arts of private and personal negotiation. The patriarch Joseph had sunk under the weight of age and infirmities; his dying voice breathed the consolations of charity and concord, and his vacant benedict might tempt the hopes of the elect. The ready and active obedience of the archbishops of Russia and Nice, of Isidore and Bessarion, was prompted and recompensed by their speedy promotion to the dignity of cardinals. Bessarion, in the first debates, had stood forth the most strenuous and eloquent champion of the Greek cause, and had been��en by the Greeks, and by the bishopric of his country, he appears in ecclesiastical story a rare example of a patriot who was recommended to court-favour by loud opposition and well-timed compliance. With the aid of his two spiritual conductors, the emperor applied his arguments to the general situation and personal characters of the bishops, and each was successively moved by authority and example. Their revenues were in the hands of the Turks, their persons in those of the Latins; an episcopal treasure, three robes and forty ducats, was soon exhausted: the hopes of deposition still depended on the plunders of office and the alms of Rome; and such was their indigence, that their arrears, the payment of a debt, would be accepted as a favour, and might operate as a bribe. The danger and relief of Constantinople might excite some prudent and pious disquisition, and the Greeks was insinuated, that the application of strategies who should resist the consent of the east and west, would be abandoned in a hostile land to the revenge or justice of the Roman pontiff. In the first private assembly of the Greeks, the formulary of union was approved by twenty-four, and rejected by twelve, members; but the five

Charles-Michel de Saint-Simon.

a Syropulus, a remarkable passage of Ducas, (c. 31.) One had possessed, for his whole property, three old gowns, &c. By teaching one and twenty years in his monastery, Bessarion himself had collected forty gold ducats; but of these, the archbishop had expended twenty-eight in his voyage from Peloponnese, and the remainder as an act of身上fate to the Latins. Syropulus denotes that the Greeks received any money before they had subscribed the union (p. 683.) Syropulus, however, and to his enemies, was a restraint, and a pledge. Syropulus, rather than subscribe, would have assisted, as the least evil, at the ceremony of the union. He was compelled to do both; and the great ecclesiarch poorly excused his submission to the emperor, (p. 299-322.)

5 None of these original acts of union can at present be produced. Of the two copies of the act of union preserved, (Syrop. p. 652, 653.) one is at Florence, Bologna, Venice, Paris, and London) nine have been examined by the present commission. The other is executed in the Greek characters for the variety and imperfections of the Greek signatures. Yet scarce an hundred and fifty copies were preserved as originally subscribed at Florence, before 20th August 1439, the final separation of the pope and emperor. (Memoire de l’Academie des Inscriptions, vol. iii.)

6 In the original lives of the Popes, in Muratori’s Collection, (com. lib. p. tom. xxvi. the name of Eugene II. appears to have been corrected, and patriarchy. He was, however, the successor of Eugene, and to his enemies, was a restraint, and a pledge. Syropulus, rather than subscribe, would have assisted, as the least evil, at the ceremony of the union. He was compelled to do both; and the great ecclesiarch poorly excused his submission to the emperor, (p. 299-322.)

7 None of these original acts of union can at present be produced. Of the two copies of the act of union preserved, (Syrop. p. 652, 653.) one is at Florence, Bologna, Venice, Paris, and London) nine have been examined by the present commission. The other is executed in the Greek characters for the variety and imperfections of the Greek signatures. Yet scarce an hundred and fifty copies were preserved as originally subscribed at Florence, before 20th August 1439, the final separation of the pope and emperor. (Memoire de l’Academie des Inscriptions, vol. iii.)

8 In the original lives of the Popes, in Muratori’s Collection, (com. lib. p. tom. xxvi. the name of Eugene II. appears to have been corrected, and patriarchy. He was, however, the successor of Eugene, and to his enemies, was a restraint, and a pledge. Syropulus, rather than subscribe, would have assisted, as the least evil, at the ceremony of the union. He was compelled to do both; and the great ecclesiarch poorly excused his submission to the emperor, (p. 299-322.)

9 None of these original acts of union can at present be produced. Of the two copies of the act of union preserved, (Syrop. p. 652, 653.) one is at Florence, Bologna, Venice, Paris, and London) nine have been examined by the present commission. The other is executed in the Greek characters for the variety and imperfections of the Greek signatures. Yet scarce an hundred and fifty copies were preserved as originally subscribed at Florence, before 20th August 1439, the final separation of the pope and emperor. (Memoire de l’Academie des Inscriptions, vol. iii.)
kiss the feet of the Roman pontiff, and to announce the obedience and the orthodoxy of the east. These oriental embassies, unknown in the countries which they presumed to represent,1 diffused over the west the fame of Eugenius; and a clamour was artfully propagated against the remnant of a schism in Switzerland and Spain, which so much excited the admiration of the Christian world. The vigour of opposition was succeeded by the histrionic desire: the council of Basil was silently dissolved, and Felix, renouncing the tiara, again withdrew to the devout or diligent hermitage of Ripalle.5 A general peace was secured by these concessions, but it was at the expense of a complaint; all ideas of reformation sub- jected: the popes continued to exercise and abuse their ecclesiastical despotic; nor has Rome been since disturbed by the mischiefs of a contested election.5

Final peace of the Greek Church at Constantinople.

A.D. 1439.

State of the Greek Church at Constantinople, A.D. 1300-1453.

The journeys of three emperors were unravelling for their temporal, or perhaps their spiritual, salvation; but they were productive of a beneficial consequence; the revival of the Greek learning in Italy, from whence it was propagated to the last nations of the west and north. In their lowest servitude and degradation, these illustrious princes were still possessed of a golden key that could unlock the treasures of antiquity; of a musical and prolific language, that gives a soul to the objects of sense, and a body to the abstractions of philosophy. Since the barriers of the monarchials, and even of the capital, had been taken from the Greeks, the gleaning of their languages, doubtless corrupted the form and substance of the national dialect; and ample glossaries have been composed, to interpret a multitude of words of Arabic, Turkish, Selavonic, Latin, or French origin.1 But a purer idiom was spoken in the coast towns between the eighteenth and fourteenth centuries, and the learning of the state of the language is described, and perhaps embellished, by a learned Italian,2 who, by a long and noble marriage, was naturalized at Constantinople about thirty years before the Turkish conquest. "The vulgar speech," says Philibeltus,3 has been depraved by the people, and infected by the multitude of strangers and merchants who every day flock to the city and mingle with the inhabitants. It is from the disciples of such a school that the Latin language received the versions of Aristotle and Plato; so obscure in sense, and in spirit so poor. But the Greeks who have escaped the conquest which the Byzantines have endured, alone are worthy of our imitation. In familiar discourse, they still speak the tongue of Aristophanes and Euripides, of the historians and philosophers of Athens; and the authors of their writings is more elaborated and correct. The persons who, by their birth and education, have mingled in the Byzantine city, who maintain, with the least ally, the ancient standard of elegance and purity; and the native grace of language most conspicuously shine among the noble matrons, who are excluded from all intercourse with foreigners. With foreigners do I say! They live sequestered and circumscribed by the eyes of their fellow-citizens. Seldom are they seen in the streets; and when they leave their houses, it is in the dusk of evening, on visits to the churches and their nearest kindred. On these occasions, they are on horseback, covered with a veil, and encompassed by their parents, their servants,4 the peasantry.

Among the Greeks, a numerous and opulent clergy was dedicated to the service of religion: their monks and bishops have ever been distinguished by the gravity and austerity of their manners; nor were they diverted, like the Latin priests, by the pursuits and pleasures of a secular, and even military, life. After a large deduction for the time and talents that were lost in the devotion, the laxness, and the discord, of the church and cloister, the more inquisitive and ambitious minds would explore the sacred and profound tradition of their language, and the learning that preceded over the education of the youth; the schools of philosophy and eloquence were perpetuated till the fall of the empire; and it may be affirmed, that more books and more knowledge were included within the walls of Constantinople, than could be dispersed over the extensive countries of the west.

Comparison of the Greeks and the Latins.

But an important distinction has been already noticed: the Greeks were sta- tionary or retrograde, while the Latins were advancing with a rapid and progressive motion. The nations were excited by the spirit of independence and emulation; and even the little wars of the Latin States contained more people and industry than the decreasing circle of the Byzantine empire. In Europe, the lower ranks of society were relieved from the yoke of feudal servitude; and freedom is the first step to civilization and knowledge. The people of the east were the first to suffer from the corruptions of the west; and the eloquent Petrach, by his lessons and his example, may justly be applauded as the first harbingers of the day.

A purer style of composition, a more generous and rational strain of sentiment, flowed from the study and imitation of the masters of ancient Rome; and the disputes of Cicero and Virgil approached, with reverence and love, the sanctity of their Greek masters. In the sack of Constantinople, the French, and even the

1 So necessary, or rather so fabulous, are these reunions of the Nestorians, Jacobites, &c., that I have turned them over, without success, that this is the fourth time of my mentioning them.
2 Antonio Sanmicheli, a Florentine, and secretary to the cardinal of the Vatican.
3 The site is near Thonizin Savoy, on the southern side of the lake of Geneva. It is now a Cartusian abbey; and Mr. Ad- dison (Travels into Italy, vol. ii. p. 178, 179) of Banker's edition of his Travels into Italy, of which of the accuracy of those pages and the forcible argument of the author, the father of prose, and the father of Basil, applaid the absurd life of the ducal house of Savoy, and the power of the Savoy-ruins.
4 But the last of his office.
5 The language of the ancients, and the one to which the ancients have been commended, is described and embellished by a learned Italian, who, by a long and noble marriage, was naturalized at Constantinople about thirty years before the Turkish conquest. The vulgar speech, says Philibeltus, has been depraved by the people, and infected by the multitude of strangers and merchants who every day flock to the city and mingle with the inhabitants. It is from the disciples of such a school that the Latin language received the versions of Aristotle and Plato; so obscure in sense, and in spirit so poor. But the Greeks who have escaped the conquest which the Byzantines have endured, alone are worthy of our imitation. In familiar discourse, they still speak the tongue of Aristophanes and Euripides, of the historians and philosophers of Athens; and the authors of their writings is more elaborated and correct. The persons who, by their birth and education, have mingled in the Byzantine city, who maintain, with the least ally, the ancient standard of elegance and purity; and the native grace of language most conspicuously shine among the noble matrons, who are excluded from all intercourse with foreigners. With foreigners do I say! They live sequestered and circumscribed by the eyes of their fellow-citizens. Seldom are they seen in the streets; and when they leave their houses, it is in the dusk of evening, on visits to the churches and their nearest kindred. On these occasions, they are on horseback, covered with a veil, and encompassed by their parents, their servants, the peasantry.

Among the Greeks, a numerous and opulent clergy was dedicated to the service of religion: their monks and bishops have ever been distinguished by the gravity and austerity of their manners; nor were they diverted, like the Latin priests, by the pursuits and pleasures of a secular, and even military, life. After a large deduction for the time and talents that were lost in the devotion, the laxness, and the discord, of the church and cloister, the more inquisitive and ambitious minds would explore the sacred and profound tradition of their language, and the learning that preceded over the education of the youth; the schools of philosophy and eloquence were perpetuated till the fall of the empire; and it may be affirmed, that more books and more knowledge were included within the walls of Constantinople, than could be dispersed over the extensive countries of the west.

But an important distinction has been already noticed: the Greeks were sta- tionary or retrograde, while the Latins were advancing with a rapid and progressive motion. The nations were excited by the spirit of independence and emulation; and even the little wars of the Latin States contained more people and industry than the decreasing circle of the Byzantine empire. In Europe, the lower ranks of society were relieved from the yoke of feudal servitude; and freedom is the first step to civilization and knowledge. The people of the east were the first to suffer from the corruptions of the west; and the eloquent Petrach, by his lessons and his example, may justly be applauded as the first harbingers of the day.

A purer style of composition, a more generous and rational strain of sentiment, flowed from the study and imitation of the masters of ancient Rome; and the disputes of Cicero and Virgil approached, with reverence and love, the sanctity of their Greek masters. In the sack of Constantinople, the French, and even the

1 Philibeltus, abundantly enough, derives this Greek or Oriental ju- bishment from the manners of ancient Rome.
2 See the state of learning in the thirteenth and fourteenth cen- turies, in the learned and very excellent Memoirs of the exhibition of the great in the early part of the fourteenth century, 431-440, 490-494.)
3 At the end of the fourteenth century, there existed in Europe about fifteen universities, and of these the foundation of ten or twelve is prior to the year 1300. They were created in proportion to the number of persons engaged in commerce, and commerce contains 10,000 students, chiefly of the civil law. In the year 1357 the number at Oxford had decreased from 30,000 to 6000 students. (See Hallam's History of Great Britain, vol. iv. p. 475.) Yet even this decrease is much superior to the present list of the members of the university.

2 Joseph.}

5 See the state of learning in the thirteenth and fourteenth cen- turies, in the learned and very excellent Memoirs of the exhibition of the great in the early part of the fourteenth century, 431-440, 490-494.)
3 At the end of the fourteenth century, there existed in Europe about fifteen universities, and of these the foundation of ten or twelve is prior to the year 1300. They were created in proportion to the number of persons engaged in commerce, and commerce contains 10,000 students, chiefly of the civil law. In the year 1357 the number at Oxford had decreased from 30,000 to 6000 students. (See Hallam's History of Great Britain, vol. iv. p. 475.) Yet even this decrease is much superior to the present list of the members of the university.

2 Joseph.}
Venetians, had despaired and destroyed the works of Lysippus and Homer; the monuments of art may be annihilated by a single blow; but the immortal mind is renewed and multiplied by the copies of the poets; and such copies it was the ambition of Petrarch and his friends to compose, for the destruction of the Turks undoubtedly pressed the flight of the muses; yet we may tremble at the thought, that Greece might have been overwhelmed, with her schools and libraries, before Europe had emerged from the deluge of barbarism, that the seeds of science might have been lost entirely. Several fragments, before the Italian soil was prepared for their cultivation.

Revival of the Greek learning. The most learned Italians of the fifteenth century have confessed and openly plained the restoration of Greek literature, after a long oblivion of many hundred years. Yet in that country, and beyond the Alps, some names are quoted; some profound scholars, who in the darker ages were honourably distinguished by their knowledge of the Greek tongue; but national vanity has been loud in the praise of such rare examples of erudition. There must be no mistaking the truth; that the revival of ancient learning is a cause, and without an effect; that it was easy for them to satisfy themselves, and their more ignorant contemporaries; and that the bilom, which they had so marvellously acquired, would produce no schools, but only be taught in any university of the west. In a corner of Italy, it faintly existed as the popular, or at least as the ecclesiastical, dialect.

The first impression of the Dorer and Ilicene colonies has never been completely erased: the Calabrian churches were long attached to the throne of Constantinople; and the monks of St. Basil pursued their studies in mount Athos and the schools of the east. Calabria was the native country of Barlaam, who has already appeared as a sectary and an ambassador; and Barlaam was the first who revived, beyond the Alps, the language, or at least the writings, of Homer. He is described, by Petrarch and Boccaccio, as a man of a dimuitive stature, though truly great in the measure of learning and genius; of a piercing discernment, though not capable of the highest elegance. For many ages (as they affirm) Greece had not produced his equal in the knowledge of history, grammar, and philosophy; and his merit was celebrated in the attestations of the princes and doctors of Constantinople. One of these attestations is still extant; and the emperor, at length, the protector of his adversary, is forced to allow, that Euclid, Aristotle, and Plato, were familiar to that profound and subtle logician.

In the court of Avignon, he formed an intimate connexion with Petrarch, the first of the Latin scholars; and the desire of mutual instruction was the principle of their literary commerce. The Tuscan tranch, applied himself with eager curiosity and assiduous diligence to the study of the Greek language; and, in a laborious struggle with the dryness and difficulty of the first rudiments, he began to reach the sense, and to feel the spirit, of poets and philosophers, whose minds were congenial to his own. But he was soon deprived of the society and lessons of this useful assistant; Barlaam relinquished his trifling principality, and, on his return to Greece, rashly provoked the swarms of fanatic monks, by attempting to substitute the light of reason to that of their navel. After a separation of three years, the two friends again met in the court of Naples; but the novelty of the most prodigious pair of eyes, and the pride of his own name, provoked him; and by his recommendation Barlaam was finally settled in a small bishopric of his native Calabria. The manly avocations of Petrarch, love and friendship, his various correspondence and frequent journeys, the Roman haunt, and his elaborate compositions in prose and verse, in Latin and French, diverted him from a foreign idiom; and as he advanced in life, the attainment of the Greek language was the object of his wishes rather than of his hopes. When he was about fifty years of age, a Byzantine ambassador, his friend, and a master of both tongues, presented Petrarch with a manuscript of Homer, which Petrarch is at once expressive of his elocution, gratitude, and regret. After celebrating the generosity of the donor, and the value of a gift more precious in his estimation than gold or rubies, he thus proceeds: the pious recollection of the genuine and original divine poetry, that fountain of all wisdom, is worthy of yourself and of me: you have fulfilled your promise, and satisfied my desires. Yet your liberality is still imperfect; with Homer you should have given me yourself; a guide, who could lead me into the fields of light, and elsewise to my wondering eyes the specious miracles of the Iliad and Odyssey. But, alas! Homer is dumb, or I am deaf; nor is it in my power to enjoy the beauty which I possess. I have seated him by the side of Plato, the prince of poets near the prince of philosophers; and I glory in the sight of my illustrious guests. Of their immortal writings, whatever had been translated into the Latin idiom I had already acquired; but, if there be no profit, there is some pleasure, in beholding these venerable Greeks in their proper and national habit. I am come to see, to hear, to venerate, to adore. I embrace the silent volume, I exclaim with a sigh, illustrious bard! with what pleasure should I listen to thy song, if my sense of hearing were not obstructed and lost by the death of one friend, and in the much-lamented absence of another. Nor do I yet despair; for I see the advent of the god of hope, and fire, since it was in the last period of age that he attained the knowledge of the Greek letters.

The prize which eluded the efforts of Boccaccio, Petrarch, was obtained by the fortune A.D. 1359, &c. and industry of his friend Boccaccio, the father of the Tuscan prose. That popular writer, who derives his reputation from the Decameron, a hundred novels of pleasantry and love, may aspire to the more serious praise of restoring in Italy the study of the Greek language. In the year one thousand three hundred and sixty-six, a disciple of Barlaam, whose name was Leo, of 9 Of those writers who professedly strove for the restoration of the Greek learning in Italy, the two principal are Hodom, Dr. Humphry Holy, and Barlaam of Calabria. Lusignan Georgia (Georgius) was Parthenus madearius in Nuestra (London, 1712. In large octavo) and Tirabosi, (Hodierna della Letteratura Italiana, tom. p. 384—387. tom. viii. p. 113—120.) The Oxford professor is a laborious scholar, but the liberallity of Modena enjoys the superiority of a modern and national historian.

10 In Calabria quia illum magna Gracia desiderat, colonia Gracie recepta est, diu delirata in fabula, postea in calumnia perierat, at Romana sull, et aspectus ad Romanam audebat. (Giannone, Asta, di Roma, tom. i. p. 231.)

11 Barbari (says Petrarch, the French and German) via, non dies. Quod non fuerit mater hominum et periculorum, in that respects, the thirteenth century was less happy than the age of Charlemaign.

12 See the character of Barlaam, in Boccaccia, chronology, Decuria, R. 5, 6.

13 Canossa, l. i. c. 26.

14 For the connexion of Petrarch and Barlaam, and the two interviews, at Avignon in 1359, and at Naples in 1359, see the excellent Memorias sur la Vie de Parlaam, tom. p. 89. 10. tom. i. p. 73—77.

The bishopric to which Barlaam retired, was the old Locii, in the middle ages Sancta Cynara, and by corruption Hippolita, Gracce, (Cruers, Chronologiae Historiae mediae, p. 382.) The division of the longs time remained poor, and lost by the death of one friend, and in the much-lamented absence of another. Nor do I yet despair; for I see the advent of the god of hope, and fire, since it was in the last period of age that he attained the knowledge of the Greek letters.

The prize which eluded the efforts of Boccaccio, Petrarch, was obtained by the fortune A.D. 1359, &c.

10 The bishopric to which Barlaam retired, was the old Locii, in the middle ages Sancta Cynara, and by corruption Hippolita, Gracce, (Cruers, Chronologiae Historiae mediae, p. 382.) The division of the longs time remained poor, and lost by the death of one friend, and in the much-lamented absence of another. Nor do I yet despair; for I see the advent of the god of hope, and fire, since it was in the last period of age that he attained the knowledge of the Greek letters.

The prize which eluded the efforts of Boccaccio, Petrarch, was obtained by the fortune A.D. 1359, &c. and industry of his friend Boccaccio, the father of the Tuscan prose. That popular writer, who derives his reputation from the Decameron, a hundred novels of pleasantry and love, may aspire to the more serious praise of restoring in Italy the study of the Greek language. In the year one thousand three hundred and sixty-six, a disciple of Barlaam, whose name was Leo, of Leoninus Pilatus, was detained in his way to Avignon by the advice and hospitality of Boccace, who lodged the stranger in his house, prevailed on the republic of Florence to allow him an annual stipend, and devoted his leisure to the first Greek professor, who taught that language in that city. The appearance of Leo might disgust the most eager disciple; he was clothed in the mantle of a philosopher, or a mendicant; his countenance was hideous; his face was overshadowed with black hair; his beard long and thick; his eye, his tepid gravity and insouciant; nor could he grace his discourse with the ornaments, or even the perspicuity, of Latin eloquence. But his mind was stored with a treasure of Greek learning; history and fable, philosophy and grammar, were alike at his command; and he read the problems of Home in the schools of Florence. It was from his explanation that Boccace composed and transcribed a literal prose version of the Iliad and Odyssey, which satisfied the thirst of his friend Petrarch, and which perhaps, in the succeeding century, was clandestinely used by Laurentius Valla, the Latin lexicographer. Petrarch, in the same Boccace collected the materials for his treatise on the genealogy of the heathen gods, a work, in that age, of stupendous erudition, and which he ostentatiously sprinkled with Greek characters and passages, to excite the wonder and applause of his more ignorant readers. The highest schools of learning, and the coasts of Italy, had always been the honoured and beneficent station. In his passage, Petrarch entertained him at Padua a short time; he enjoyed the scholar, but was justly confounded with the gloomy and unseemly temper of the man. Discontended with the world and the women of Italy, he left it in 1390 and returned to his native Calabria; in the company of the Latins he disdained their language, religion, and manners; no sooner was he landed at Constantinople, than he again wished to change the wealth and population of Italy for the grandeur of Florence. His Italian friends were deaf to his importunity; he depended on their curiosity and indulgence, and embarked on a second voyage; but on his entrance into the Adriatic, the ship was assailed by a tempest, and the unfortunate teacher, who like Ulysses had fastened himself to the mast, was struck dead by a flash of lightning. The humane Petrarch dropped a tear on his disaster; but he was most anxious to learn whether some copy of Euphrases or Sophocles might not be saved from the hands of the mariners.

Leoni Pilatus, fuit pro eth per leoniius. 1

1 Boccace indicates an honest vanity; Quo nationum rosa Graecia crescar in arte, quam si cresceret episcopi, scilicet inter Erasmas Gracici ut cernamus. Nunc ego fui Leoninum Pilatum, &c. (see Generallium Diction. I. v. c. 7. p. 19.)

2 The name of Arezzo appears in the exarchate of Ravenna; and the Latin classics were explained by John of Ravenna, the humanist of the Italian school; and the name of Arezzo, 1443, has remained in the name of Arezzo, in the exarchate of Ravenna.

3 See the article of Eumelos, or Manuel Chrysoloras, in Holy (p. 541) and Timbs. (p. 542.) The present of a manuscript of the Aretius, 1413, on his arrival dates between the years 1390 and 1400, and is only confirmed by the regnal date 1390.

4 The name of Arezzo has been assumed by five or six nations of Arezzo in Tuscany, of whom the most famous and the most worthy has lived in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and the name of the learned disciple of Chrysoloras, a linguist, an orator, and an historian, the secretary of four successive popes, and the chancellor of the republic of Florence, who died A.D. 1424, at the age of seventy-five. (Fabric. Biblic. med. Ev.)

5 The passage in Arcin, Comment. Romanuino Tempore in Graecorum litteris, quos dictarum, spectat, is the genuine letter of Arcin, 555, for affirmin, that the Greek letters were received in Italy 1390 and 1415.

6 Of S. 541.)

7 His of S. (p. 541.)

8 In this domestic discipline, Petrarch, who loved the youth, often complained of the rage curiosity, restless temper, and proud feelings, which announce the spirit of a Latin scholar.

9 The name of Arezzo is a genuine work, Guenier Philalethes, Leonardo Arcinio, Cardacel. de ples, nos tamquam ex eqm ex quo; nos, Franciscus amor Boccace, &c. But I am of opinion whether the Greek Chrysoloras would allow Chrysoloras all the erudite scholars of his own school.

10 It has been said, that Petrarch, who loved the youth, often complained of the rage curiosity, restless temper, and proud feelings, which announce the spirit of a Latin scholar.
destitute of fortune, and endowed with learning, or at least with language. From the terror or oppression of the Turkish arms, the natives of Thessalonica and Constantinople escaped to a land of freedom, curiosity, and safety; a similar migration of the Florentine exiles, the Apostles of the light of the Greek church and the oracles of the Platonic philosophy; and the fugitives who adhered to the union, had the double merit of renouncing their country, not only for the Christian, but for the Catholic cause. He, who sacrificed to the private and social virtues: he no longer bears the reproachful epithets of slave and apostate; and the consideration which he acquires among his new associates, will restore in his own eyes the dim reflection of his lost name. Cardinal Bessarion was rewarded with the Roman purple; he fixed his residence in Italy, and the Greek cardinal, the titular patriarch of Constantinople, was respected as the chief and protector of his nation; his abilities were exercised in the legations of Bologna, Venice, Germany, and France; and his election to the chair of St. Peter floated for a moment on the uncertain breath of a conclav. His ecclesiastical honours diffused a splendid and pre-eminent over his literary merit and services: his palace was a school; as often as the cardinal was in criticism, he was surrounded by a "learned train of both nations;" men of applause by themselves and the public; and whose writings, now overspread with dust, were popular and useful in their own times. I shall not attempt to enumerate the masters of Greek literature in the fifteenth century: a special treatise is requisite to mention with gratitude the names of Theodore Gaza, of George of Trebizond, of John Argyropulus, and Dometrios Chalcondyles, who taught their native language in the schools of Florence their faults and their fame. Their labours were not injurious to those of their countrymen; they revered, and whose fortune was the secret object of their envy. But the lives of these grammarians were humble and obscure: they had declined the lucrative paths of the church; their dress and manners excluded them from the commerce of the world; and still, as they confined them to the study of the Greek language and itsetymology, they might be content with the rewards of learning. From this character, Janus Lascaris would desire an exception. His eloquence, politeness, and imperial descent, recommended him to the French monarchs; and in the same cities he was in turn taught to speak and to write. And what added to the dignity and importance of these claims, was the study of the Latin language; and the most successful attained the faculty of writing and speaking with fluency and elegance in a foreign idiom. But they ever retained the ineradicable vanity of their country; their praise, or at least their esteem, was reserved for the national writers, to whom they owed their fame and subsistence; and they sometimes betrayed their contempt in licentious satire or on Virgil’s poetry and the oratory of Tully. The superiority of these masters arose from the familiar use of a living language; and their first disciples were incapable of discerning how far they had degenerated from the knowledge, and even the practice, of their great predecessors. Their erudition had been the secret soul of harmony; were, to this extent, destroyed the artists, who then had a taste for the merest outward beauty, and used the most unmeaning marks, in prose superfluous, and troublesome in verse. The art of grammar they truly possessed; the valuable fragments of Apollonius and Herodion were transfixed into their lessons; and their correct version of the Psalms, and their translations of the psalmist, and his philosophic spirit, are still useful to the Greek student.

In the shipwreck of the Byzantine libraries, each fugitive seized a fragment of treasure, a copy of some author, who, without his industry, might have perished: the transcripts were multiplied by an assiduous, and sometimes an elegant, pen. The text was corrected and explained by their own comments, or those of the elder scholars. The sense, though not the spirit, of the Greek classics, was interpreted to the Latin world: the beauties of style evaporate in a version; but the judgment of Theodore Gaza selected the maxims of authors, and translated the sublime and the natural histories of animals and plants opened a rich fund of genuine and experimental science.

Yet the fleeting shadows of metaphysics, the Platonic 273) were pursued with more curiosity and ardour. After a long oblivion, Plato was recovered in Italy by a venerable Greek, who taught in the house of Cosmo de’ Medici. While the synod of Florence was involved in theological debate, some beneficial consequences might flow from the study of his elegant philosophy: his style is the purest standard of the Greek idiom. His works, whose parts were, at first, adapted to familiar conversation, and sometimes adorned with the richest colours of poetry and eloquence. The dialogues of Plato are a dramatic picture of the life and death of a sage; and, as often as he descends from the clouds, his moral system inundates the love of virtue in the bosom of our countrymen, whom an exception and example of Socrates recommended a modest doubt and liberal inquiry: and if the Platonists, with blind devotion, adored the visions and errors of their divine masters, their enthusiasm might correct the dry dogmatic method of the Peripatetics, who, at the anniversary of Plato, Aristotle, they may be balanced in endless controversy; but some spark of freedom may be produced by the collision of adverse servitudes. The modern Greeks were divided between the two sects: with more fury than skill they fought under the banner of their leaders; and the field of battle was removed in their flight from Constantinople to Rome. But this philosophical debate soon degenerated into an angry and personal quarrel of grammarians; and Bessarion, though an advocate for Plato, protected the national honor, by interposing the advice and authority of a mediator.

In the gardens of the Medici, the academical doctrine was enjoyed by the polite and learned; but their philosophy and learned manuscript, and the darkening writings of the Attic sage were perused in the closet, the more powerful Stagirite continued to reign the oracle of the church and school.

Emulation and progress of the merits of the Greeks; yet it must be admitted that, though the learning of the Latins was surpassed by the ardor of the Latins, Italy was divided into many independent states; and at that time, it was the ambition of princes and republics to vie with each other in the encouragement and reward of literature. The fame of Nicholas the first has been adequate to his merits. From a plebeian origin he raised himself by his virtue and learning; the character of the man prevailed over the interest of the pope; and he sharpened those weapons which were soon pointed against the Roman church. He has been the friend of the Latin scholarship of the age: he became their patron; and such was the humility of his manners, that the change was scarcely discernible either to them or to himself. If he pressed the acceptance of a liberal gift, it was not as the measure of desert, but as the proof of benevolence. Such an influence as he was able to apply by his munificence on the education of the youth, he accepted it would have a consciousness of his own worth; "ye will not always have a Nicholas among you." The influence of the holy seep pervaded Christendom; and he exerted that influence in the search of, not of bibles, but of books. From the ruins of Athens and Rome, he replenished his scholars with the most valuable works of Plato and Aristotle, of Polyenus and Theophrastus, and of the fathers of the Greek church. The example of the Roman pontiff Cosmo and Leo was preceded or limited by a Florence of Cosmo, who professed the faith without arms and without a title. Cosmo of Medici was the father of a line of princes, whose name and age are almost synonymous with the restoration of learning; his credit was ennobled into fame; his riches were dedicated to the service of mankind; he corresponded at once with Cairo and London: and a cargo of Indian spices and Greek books was often imported in the same vessel. The genius and education of his grandson Lorenzo rendered him not only a patron, but a judge, and candidate, in the literary race. In his palace, distress was entitled to relief, and merit to reward; his leisure hours were delightfully spent in the Platonic academy: he encouraged the emulation of Demetrius Chalcodyles and Angelo Politian; and his active missionary Janus Lascaris returned from the east with a treasure of two hundred manuscripts, of which one third was unknown in the libraries of Europe. The rest of Italy was animated by a similar spirit, and the progress of the nation repaid the liberality of her princes. The Latins held the exclusive property of their own literature; and these disciples of Greece were soon capable of surpassing the learning of the schools of which they had imbibed. After a short succession of foreign teachers, the tide of emigration subsided; but the language of Constantinople was spread beyond the Alps; and the natives of France, Germany, and England, imparted to their country the sacred fire which they had kindled in the schools of Florence and Rome. The productions of the mind, as in those of the soil, the gifts of nature are excelled by industry and skill: the Greek authors, forgotten on the banks of the Jissus, have been illustrated on those of the Eube and the Zaimus: the Hellenic and Latine, had the superiour science of the barbarians; the accuracy of Budapes; the taste of Erasmus, the copiousness of Stephens, the edification of Scaliger, the discernment of Reiske, or of Bentley. On the side of the Latins, the discovery of printing was a casual advantage; but this useful art has been applied by them to their ancient works, to perpetuate and multiply the works of antiquity. A single manuscript imported from Greece is revisited in ten thousand copies; and each copy is fairer than the original. In this form Homer and Plato would peruse with more satisfaction their own writings; and the Governments must resign the prize to the labours of our western editors.

Before the revival of classic literature, use and abuse of the barbarians in Europe were immersed in ancient learning, in ignorance: and their vulgar tongues were marked with the rudeness and poverty of their manners. The students of the more perfect civilizations of Rome and Greece were introduced to a new world of light and science: to the society of the free and polished nations of antiquity; and to a familiar converse with those immortal men who spoke the sublime language of eloquence and reason. Such an intercourse must tend to refine the taste, and to elevate the genius, of the moderns; and, yet, from the first experiments, it may appear that the study of the ancients had given letters, rather than wings, to the human mind. However valuable, the spirit of imitation is of a servile cast; and the first disciples of the Greeks were, in the midst of strangers in the midst of their age and country. The minute and laborious diligence which explored the an-

* The state of the Platonic philosophy in Italy, is illustrated by Bolin, (Mona. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tom. ii. p. 712, 725.) and Tiranboli, (tom. vi. p. 229-238.)

* For a history of the human letters, see the contemporary authors, Janus Manetti (tom. iii. p. 322-352) and Vespasian of Florence, Meneghino, (tom. v. p. 150-155.)

* Lord Bingley's, observes with truth, and spirit, that the popes in this instance were more politicians than the mufti, and that the emperor, which had bound mankind for so many ages, was broken by the machiavellian.

* The press of Aldus Manutius, a Roman, was established at Venice about 1470; he printed above sixty considerable works of Greek literature, almost all for the first time; several containing more than thirty thousand words, and of seven folio and four quarto editions. (Fabric. Biblic. Graec. tom. xiii. p. 663, &c.) Yet his first works were not translated, but copied, and his Latin Grammar of Constantine Lascaris, was printed at Milan in 1475; and that the Florence Homer of 1485 displays all the luxury of the patronage of the Medici, and the Bibliotheca Instructive of De Bure, a knowing bookseller of Paris.
tivities of remote times, might have improved or adorned society by the like of society; and that the ancients, as well as the moderns, were the slaves of Aristotle: the poets, historians, and orators, were proud to repeat the thoughts and words of the Augustan age; the works of nature were observed with the eyes of Pliny and Theophrastus; and some Pagans venerated a secret devotion to the gods of Homer and Plato. The empire of the Italians was oppressed by the strength and numbers of their ancient auxiliaries: the century after the deaths of Petrarch and Boccace was filled with a crowd of Latin imitators, who deckly rejoice on our shelves: but in that era of learning, it will not be easy to discover a real discovery of nature, a work of invention or eloquence, in the popular language of the country. But as soon as it had been deeply saturated with the celestial dew, the soil was quickened into vegetation and life; the modern idioms were refined; the classics of Athens and Rome inspired a pure taste and a generous emulation; and in Italy, as afterwards in France and England, the pleasing reign of poetry and fiction was succeeded by the light of speculative and experimental philosophy. Genius may anticipate the season of maturity; but in the education of a people, as in that of an individual, the period must be exercised. The powers of reason and fancy can be expanded; nor may the artist hope to equal or surpass, till he has learned to imitate, the works of his predecessors.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The respective merits of Rome and Constantinople are compared and celebrated. The triumph of the ancient capital, the seat of his ancestors, surpassed the most sanguine expectations of Emanuel Chrysoloras; and he no longer blamed the exclusion of an old sophist, that Rome was the habitation, not of men, but of gods. Those gods had vanished, but lingering, as if to mock the eye of liberal enthusiasm, the majesty of ruin restored the image of her ancient prosperity. The monuments of the consuls and Caesars, of the martyrs and apostles, engaged on all sides the curiosity of the philosopher and the Christian; and he confessed, that in every age the arms and the religion of Rome were destined to reign over the earth. While Chrysoloras admired the venerable beauties of the mother, he was not forgetful of his native country, her fairest daughter, her imperial colony; and the Byzantine patriot expatiates with zeal and truth, on the eternal advantages of nation, and the more transitory glories of art and dominion, which it is often distinguished, between the Antic and the Othman. Yet the perfection of the copy still re durability (as he modestly observes) to the honour of the original, and parents are delighted to be renewed, and even excel, by the superior merit of their children. " Constantinople," says the orator, "is situate on a commanding point between, europe and Asia, between the Archaic and the pelago and the Euxine. By her interposition, the two seas, and the two continents, are united for the common benefit of nations; and the gates of commerce may be shut or opened at her command. The harbour, encompassed on all sides by the sea and the continent, is the common outlet of all the nations, and the ports of ships. The gates of Constantinople may be compared with those of Babylon; the towers are many; each tower is a solid and lofty structure; and the second wall, the outer fortification, would be sufficient for the defence and dignity of an ordinary capital. A broad and rapid stream may be introduced into the ditches; and the artificial island may be encompassed, like Athens, by land or water." Two strong and natural causes are alleged for the perfection of the model of new Rome. The royal founder reigned over the most illustrious nations of antiquity; and his designs, the power of the Romans was combined with the art, and science of the Greeks. Other cities have been reared to maturity by accident and time; their beauties are mingled with disorder and deformity; their inhabitants, unknown to their natal spot, are incapable of correcting the errors of their ancestors, and the original vices of situation or climate. But the free idea of Constantinople was formed and executed by a single mind; and the primitive model was improved by the obedient zeal of the successors of the first model. The adjacent isles were stored with an inexhaustible supply of marble; but the various materials were transported from the most remote shores of Europe and Asia; and the public and private buildings, the palaces, churches, aqueducts, cisterns, porticoes, columns, baths, and hippodromes, were adapted to the greatness of the capital of the east. The superfluity of wealth was spread along the shores of Europe and Asia; and the Byzantine territory, as far as the Euxine, the Hellespont, and the long wall, might be considered as a national deposit, free from the tribute of foreign nations. In the mattering picture, the past and the present, the times of prosperity and decay, are artfully confounded; but a sigh and a confession escape from the orator, that his wretched country was the shadow and sepulchre of his former self. The works of ancient sculpture had been cast down, tombs of the emperors were scattered amongst the ruins; the fairest structures were demolished; and the marbles of Paros or Numidia were burnt for lime; or applied to the meanest uses. Of many a statue, the place was marked by an empty pedestal; of many a column, the site was determined by a broken capital; the stroke of time was accelerated by storms and earthquakes; and the vacant space was adorned, by vulgar tradition, with fabulous monuments of gold and silver. From these wonders, which lived only in memory or belief, he distinguishes, however, the paraplyar pilar, the column and colonnades of Justinian, and the church, more especially the dome, of St. Sophia; the best conclusion, since it could not be describ bed according to its merits, and after it no other object could deserve to be mentioned. But he forgets, that a century before, the trembling fabrics of the collegiate and the church had been saved and supported by the tion preferred, and after the emperor had fortified St. Sophia with two new buttresses or pyramids, the eastern hemisphere suddenly gave way; and the images, the altars, and the sanctuary, were crushed by the falling ruin. The mischief was indeed speedily repaired; the rubbish was cleared and the instauration labor of the work was age; and the poor remains of riches and industry were conserved by the Greeks to the most stately and venerable temple of the east. 4

The Greek schism was now at an end; the empire was placed in the harmony of the mother and daughter, in the mater- 5

The last hope of the falling city and empire was put in the mechanism of the sophies, and the filial piety of the Romans. In the synod of Florence, the Greeks and Latins had embraced, and inscribed, and promised; but these signs of friendship were pernicious or fruitless; and the baseless fabric of concord was thrown down and his prelates returned home in the Venetian gal- 6 leys: but as they touched at the Morea and the isles of Cerba and Lesbos, the subjects of the Latins complained that the pretended union would be an instrument of oppression. No sooner did they land on the Byzas, the emperor of Constan- 7 tinel, sailed, with a general murmur of zeal and discontent. During their absence, above two years, the capital had been deprived of its civil and ecclesiastical rulers; fanaticism fermented in anarchy; the most furious monks reigned over the conscience of women and big- 8 ters, and the hatred of the Latin name was the principle of nature and religion. Before his departure for Italy, the emperor had flattered the city with the assurance of a prompt relief and a powerful succour; and the clergy, confident in their orthodoxy and science, had promised themselves and their flocks an easy victory over the blind shepherds of the west. The double disappointment exasperated the Greeks; the conscience of the subscribing prelates was awak- 9

ened; the hour of temptation was past; and they had more to dread from the public resentment, than they could hope from the favour of the emperor or the pope. Instead of justice and unity, they found and their weakness, professed their contrition, and cast themselves on the mercy of God and of their brethren. To the reproachful question, what had been the event of the use of their Italian synod they answered with signs and tears, "Alas! we have made a new fault; we have been seduced by distress, by fraud, and by the hopes and fears of a transitory life. The hand that has signed the union should be cut off; and the tongue that has pronounced the Latin creed deserves to be torn from the root." The best proof of their repen- 10

tation, and of their sincerity, was the union of the three races and the most incomprehensible doctrines; and an absolute separation from all, without excepting their

4 See the decay and repairs of St. Sophia, in Nicopoulos Gregoras, (147, 12, 1. xly. 2.) The building was pruned by Andronicus in 1387, the eastern hemisphere fell in 1395, and the western part in 1423; but the present appearance of the church is nearly as beautiful as at its first building, the whole of the three domes, and of the towers and apses, are fossilized with stones. 5

6 On the schism of Constantinople, see Plaronas, (G. L. 16, 2.) Les- jins Choniophylos, (G. L. v. 153, 150,) and Ducas, (C. 3, 1.) the last of whom, in order to avoid the reproach of schism, supposes that the emperor was not a real emperor, but a usurper, and that the destruction of the name of albanian was the work of St. Basil, and the construction of the name of ethnic was the work of the Eastern Church. 7

7 On the schism of Constantinople, see Plaronas, (G. L. 16, 2.) Les- jins Choniophylos, (G. L. v. 153, 150,) and Ducas, (C. 3, 1.) the last of whom, in order to avoid the reproach of schism, supposes that the emperor was not a real emperor, but a usurper, and that the destruction of the name of albanian was the work of St. Basil, and the construction of the name of ethnic was the work of the Eastern Church. 8

8 On the schism of Constantinople, see Plaronas, (G. L. 16, 2.) Les- jins Choniophylos, (G. L. v. 153, 150,) and Ducas, (C. 3, 1.) the last of whom, in order to avoid the reproach of schism, supposes that the emperor was not a real emperor, but a usurper, and that the destruction of the name of albanian was the work of St. Basil, and the construction of the name of ethnic was the work of the Eastern Church. 9

9 On the schism of Constantinople, see Plaronas, (G. L. 16, 2.) Les- jins Choniophylos, (G. L. v. 153, 150,) and Ducas, (C. 3, 1.) the last of whom, in order to avoid the reproach of schism, supposes that the emperor was not a real emperor, but a usurper, and that the destruction of the name of albanian was the work of St. Basil, and the construction of the name of ethnic was the work of the Eastern Church.
domestic aid. The sword of his brother Demetrius, who in Italy had maintained a prudent and popular silence, was half unsheathed in the cause of religion; and Amurath, the Turkish sultan, was displeased and alarmed by the seeming friendship of the Greeks and Latins.

Religious character of Amur-
ath II.

Feb. 9, 1512—1513.

"Sultan Murad, or Amurath, lived forty-nine, and reigned thirty, years, six months, and eight days. He was a just and valiant prince, of a great soul, patient of labours, learned, merciful, religious, charitable; a lover and encourager of the studious, and of all who excelled in any art or office; a great emperor, and a great general. No man obtained more or greater victories than Amurath; Belgrade alone withstood his attacks. Under his reign, the soldier was ever victorious, the citizen rich and secure. If he subdued any country, his first care was to build mosques and caravanseras, hospitals and colleges. Every year he gave a thousand pieces of gold to the sons of the prophet; and sent two thousand five hundred to the religious persons of Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem.1 This portrait is transcribed from the historian of the Ottoman Empire. But the appearance of the superstitious people has been lavished on the worst of tyrants; and the virtues of a Sultan are often the vices most useful to himself, or most agreeable to his subjects. A nation ignorant of the equal benefits of liberty and law, must be awed by the flashes of abstractive lightning. But the cruelty of a despot will assume the character of justice; his profession, of liberality; his obstinacy, of firmness. If the most reasonable excuse be rejected, few acts of obedience will be found impossible; and guilt must tremble, where innocence cannot always be secure. The security of the people, and the discipline of the troops, were best maintained by perpetual action in the field; war was the trade of the janizaries; and those who survived the peril, and divided the spoil, applauded the generous ambition of their sovereign. To propugate the true religion, was the duty of a faithful Mussulman; the unbelievers were his enemies, and these of the prophet; and, in the hands of the Turks, the seymitar was the only instrument of conversion. Under these circumstances, however, the justice and moderation of Amurath are attested by his conduct, and acknowledged by the Christians themselves; who consider his prosperous reign and peaceful death as the reward of his singular merits. In the vigour of his age and military power, he seldom engaged in a war till he was justified by a previous and adequate provocation; the victory, who was disarmet; and in the observance of treaties, his word was inviolate and sacred.2 The Hungarians were commonly the aggressors; he was provoked by the revolt of Scanderbeg; and the pernicious Caramanian was twice vanquished and twice pardoned, by the Ottoman monarch. Before he invaded the Morea, Thebes had been surprised by the despot; in the conquest of Thessalonic, the grandson of Bajazet might dispute the recent purchase of the Venetians; and after the first siege of Constantinople, the sultan was never tempted by the distress, the absence, or the injuries of Pa leologus, to extinguish the dying light of the Byzantine empire.

The double abolition life and character of Amurath, is the double abdication of the Turkish throne; and, were not the monarch an ally in the universal superstition, we must pray the royal philosopher;3

who at the age of forty could discern the vanity of human greatness. Resigning the sceptre to his son, he retired to the pleasant residence of Magnesia; but he retired to the society of saints and hermits. It was not till the fourth century of the Hegira, that the religion of Mahomet had been corrupted by an institution so scandalous to his genius. But he was soon awakened from this dream of enthusiasm, by the Hungarian invasion; and his obedient son was the foremost to urge the public danger and wishes of the people. Under the banner of their veteran leader, the janizaries fought and conquered; but he withdrew from the field of Warm, again to pray, to fast, and to turn round with his Magnesian brethren. These pious occupations were again interrupted by the danger of the state. A victorious army disdained the inexperience of their youthful ruler: the city of Adrianople was taken by him; and a servile and unanimous divan implored his presence to appease the tumult, and prevent the rebellion, of the janizaries. At the well-known voice of their master, they trembled and obeyed; and the reluctant sultan was compelled to suppress his splendid servitude, till, at the end of four years, he was relieved by the arrival of the Mamluk. Age or disease, misfortune or caprice, have tempted several princes to descend from the throne; and they have had leisure to repent of their irretrievable step. But Amurath alone, in the full liberty of choice, after the trial of empire and solitude, has repeated his preference of a private life.

After the departure of his Greek brethren, Eugenius had not been unmindful of their temporal interest; and his tender regard for the Byzantine empire was accompanied by a just apprehension of the Turks, who approached, and might soon invade, the borders of Italy. But the spirit of the crusades had expired; and the coldness of the Franks was not less unreasonable than their headlong passion. In the eleventh century, a fanatic monk could precipitate Europe on the field of Hattin; and, by the recovery of the holy sepulchre, the state of things was considere by the Turks of the fifteenth, the most pressing motives of religion and policy were insufficient to unite the Latins in the defence of Christendom. Germany was an inexhaustible storehouse of men and arms; but that complex, and the world, was betrayed to the hands of the Turks; and Frederic the third was alike impatient in his personal character and his imperial dignity. A long war had impaired the strength, without satiating the animosity, of France and England; but Philip, duke of Burgundy, was a vain and magnificient prince; and Eugenius forms a league against the Turks.

A. D. 1413.

1 See Conantu, History of the Ottoman empire, p. 81. Murad, or Murat, may be more correct; but I have preferred the popular name to that obscure diligence which is rarely successful in transmitting an oriental name, in the Greek alphabet.

3 See Voltaire (Essai sur l'Histoire Generale, c. 9. p. 253, 254.) ad and he enjoyed, without danger or expense, the adventures of his subjects, who sailed a gallant fleet, from the coast of Flanders to the Hellespont.

The maritime republies of Venice and Genoa were less remote from the scene of action; and their hostile fleets were associated under the standard of St. Peter. The kingdoms of Hungary and Poland, which covered as they were the interests of the Latin church, were the most nearly concerned to the event; and the pride of their court was not wanting in the Turks. Arms were the property of the Scythians and Sarmatians, and these nations might appear equal to the contest, could they point, against the common foe, those swords that were so wantonly drawn in bloodless battles. But the spirit was adverse to concord and obedience; a poor country, and a limited monarch are incapable of maintaining a standing force; and the loose bodies of Polish and Hungarian horse were not armed with the sentiments and weapons which, on some occasions, have given irresistible weight to the French cavalry. Yet, on this side, the designs of the Roman pontiff, and the eloquence of cardinal Julian, his legate, were promoted by the circumstances of the time; by the union of the two crowns on the head of Ladislaus, a young and ambitious soldier; by the valour of a hero, whose name was henceforth to be a synonym of energy and valor among the christians, and formidable to the Turks. An endless treasure of pardons and indulgences was scattered by the legate; many private warriors of France and Germany enlisted under the holy banner; and the crusade derived some strength, or at least some reputation, from the new allies both of Europe and Asia. A fugitive despot of Servia exaggerated the distress and ardour of the christians beyond the Danube, who would unanimously rise to vindicate their religion and liberty. The Greek emperor, with a spirit unknown to his fathers, engaged to guard the Byzantine coast from Constantinople at the head of his national and mercenary troops. The sultan of Caramania announced the retreat of Amurath, and a powerful division in the heart of Anatolia; and if the fleets of the west could occupy at the same moment the straits of the Hellespont, the Ottoman monarchy would be dismembered and destroyed. Heaven and earth must rejoice in the perdition of the insurgents; and the legate, with prudent ambiguity, stirred the opinion of the invisible, perhaps the visible, aid of the Son of God, and his divine mother.

Ladislaus, king of Hungary, march'd against them.

Of the Polish and Hungarian diets, of the second, of Poland, and Ladislaus, after passing the Danube, led an army of his confederate subjects as far as Sophia, the capital of the Bulgarian kingdom. In this expedition they obtained two signal victories, which were justly ascribed to the valor and conduct of Hunnius. In the first, with a vanguard of ten thousand men, he surprised the Turkish camp; in the second, he vanquished and made prisoner the most renowned of their generals, who possessed the double advantage of age and numbers. The approach of winter, and the natural and artificial obstacles of the Danube, arrested the progress of the hero, who measured a narrow interval of six days' march from the foot of the mountains to the hoslite shores of Adrianopoli, and the fixed camp of the Greek empire. The retreat was undisturbed; and the entrance into Buda was at once a military and religious triumph. An ecclesiastical procession was followed by the king and his warriors on foot: he nobly balanced the merits and rewards of the two nations; and the pride of his court was contented by the humble temper of christianity. Thirteen boshaws, nine standards, and four thousand captives, were unquestionable trophies; and as all were willing to believe, and none present to contraddle, the crusaders multiplied. But such were the Turks whom they had left on the field of battle! The most solid proof, and the most salutary consequence, of victory, was a deputation from the divan to solicit peace, to restore Servia, to ransom the prisoners, and to evacuate the Hungarian frontier. By this treaty, the rational objects of the war were obtained: the king, the despot, and Hunnius himself, in the diet of Segedin, were satisfied with public and private emolument; a truce of ten years was concluded; and the followers of Jesus and Mahomet, who swore on the Gospel and the name of God, attested their faith of each other. Peace was the signal of truth and the avenger of perfidy. In the place of the gospel, the Turkish ministers had proposed to substiute the eucharist, the real presence of the catholic deity; but the christians refused to profane their holy mysteries; and a superstitious conscience is less forcibly bound by the spiritual emblem, than by the outward and visible symbols, of an oath. During the whole transaction, the cardinal legate had observed a sullen silence, unwilling to approve, and unable to oppose, the consent of the king and people. But the treaty, which was concluded before Julian, was confirmed by the welcome intelligence, that Anatolia was invaded by the Caramanian, and Thrace by the Greek emperor; that the fleets of Genoa, Venice, and Burghundy, were masters of the Hellespont; and that the allies, informed of the victory, and ignorant of the treaty, of Ladislaus, were conducted to the camp of his victorious army. 'And is it thus,' exclaimed the cardinal, 'that you will desert their expectations and your own fortune! It is to them, to your God, and your fellow-christians, that you have pledged your faith; and that prior obligation annihilates a new and glorious oath to the execution of a holy war! His victory on earth is the Roman pontiff; without whose sanction you can neither promise nor perform. In his name I absolve your perjury and sanctify your arms; follow my footsteps in the paths of glory and salvation; and if still ye have scruples, devote on my head the punishment and the sin.' This mischievous casuistry was seconded by his respectable character, and the levity of popular assemblies; war was resolved on the same spot where peace had so lately been sworn; and, in the execution of the treaty, the Turks were assaulted by the christians; to whom, with some reason, they might apply the epithet of infidels. The falsehood of Ladislaus to his word and oath, was pulsed by the literature of the times; the most perfect, or at least the most popular, excuse would have been the naked and undressed story, in their letters to the emperor Frederick III. The Hungarians shew 39,000 Turks in one battle, but the modest Julian reduces the slaughter to 6000 to even 2000. Cyprianus, lib. i. p. 434. (Cypriani, Vita et epist. 41, St. ab Spondanum.)

The Greek historians, Panzaks, Chatzoulydes, and Dacos, do not mention the name of Vondanus, the son of the former; he seems to have promoted by his writings, and injured by his faults, the interest of a particular sect, or party, of which he transcribes his animating epistles to the king of Hungary. But the Mahometan powers are seldom informed of the state of Christianity, and the situation and correspondence of the knights of Rhodes must connect them with the sultan of Caramania.
success of his arms and the deliverance of the eastern church. But the same treaty which should have bound his conscience, had diminished his strength. On the proclamation of the peace, the French and German volunteers departed with indignant murmurs; the Poles were exasperated by distrust and disappointed disgust with foreign command; and their palatines accepted the first licence, and hastily retired to their provinces and castles. Even Hungary was divided by faction, or restrained by a laudable scruple; and the relics of the crusade that marched in the second expedition, were lessened by desertion, and perhaps reduced by disgust with foreign command; and their palatines accepted the first licence, and hastily retired to their provinces and castles. Even Hungary was divided by faction, or restrained by a laudable scruple; and the relics of the crusade that marched in the second expedition, were lessened by desertion, and perhaps reduced by discouragement.

...twenty thousand men. A Walachian chief, who joined the royal standard with his vassals, presumed to remark that their numbers did not exceed the hunting reinte that sometimes attended the sultan; and the gift of two horses of matchless speed, might admonish Ladislaus of his secret foresight of the event. But the despot of Servia, after the restoration of his country and children, was tempted by the promise of new realms; and the inexperience of the king, the enthusiasm of the legate, and the martial pretension of Hunyadis himself, were persuaded that every obstacle must yield to the invincible virtue of the sword and the cross. After the passage of the Danube, two roads might lead to Constantinople and the Hellespont; the one direct, abrupt, and difficult, through the mountains of Haumus; the other more tedious and secure, by the coast of the country, and the utmost part of the Euxine, in which their flanks, according to the Scythian discipline, might always be covered by a mobile fortification of wagons. The latter was judiciously preferred; the catholics marched through the plains of Bulgaria, burning, with wanton cruelty, the churches and villages of the christian natives; and their last station was at Warna, near the sea-shore; on which the defeat and death of Ladislaus have bestowed a memorable name.

Battle of Warna, A.D. 1444. On finding a confederate fleet to second the expedition, their operations, they were alarmed by the approach of Amurath himself, who had issued from his Magnesian solitude, and transported the forces of Asia to the defence of Europe. According to some writers, the Greek emperor had been awed, or seduced, by the overbearing and indelible stain of corruption was fixed on the Genuese, or the pope's nephew the catholic admiral, whose mercenary connivance betrayed the guard of the Hel-lespont. From Adrianople, the sultan advanced by hasty marches at the head of sixty thousand men; and the garrisons of Oranum, Kandil, and Hunyadis had taken a nearer survey of the numbers and order of the Turks, these ardent warriors proposed the tardy and impracticable measure of a retreat. The king alone was resolved to conquer or die; and his resolution had almost been crowned with a glorious and salutary victory. The princes were opposite to each other in the centre; and the Beglehegs, or generals of Anatolia and România, commanded on the right and left, against the adverse divisions of the despot and Huna- des. The Turkish wings were broken on the first onset. The French and German, who were fatigued and rash victors, in the heat of the pursuit, were carried away far from the annoyance of the enemy, or the support of their friends. When Amurath beheld the flight of his squadrons, he despised of his fortune and that of the enemy. A German janizary seized his horse's bridle; and he had no opportunity to parley with a soldier who dared to perceive the terror, and arrest the flight of his sovereign. A copy of the treaty, the monument of christian perfidy, had been displayed in the front of battle; and it is said, that the sultan in his distress, lifting his eyes and his hands to heaven, implored the protection of the God of truth; and called on the prophet Jesus himself to avenge the impious murder of his apostles, and to send the Hungarians, numbers and disordered ranks, the king of Hungary rushed forwards in the confidence of victory, till his career was stopped by the impenetrable phalanx of the janizaries. If we may credit the Ottoman annals, the sultan, whose horse was perished by the javelin of Death of Ladislaus, 4 he fell captive among the infantry; and a Turkish soldier proclaimed with a loud voice, "Hungarians, behold the head of your king!" The death of Ladislaus was the signal of their defeat. On his return from an intemperate pursuit, Hunyadis deprived his error and the bursting loss, he strove to rescue the royal body, till he was over-whelmed by the tumultuous crowd of the victors and vanquished; and the last efforts of his courage and conduct were exerted to save the remnant of his Wala-chian cavalry. Ten thousand christians were slain in the dinner; and the latter was comforted by the more considerable in numbers, bore a smaller propor-tion to their total strength; yet the philosophic sultan was not ashamed to confess, that his ruin must be the consequence of a second and similar victory. At his command a column was erected on the spot where Ladislaus fell; and he exclaimed, "If the old Avars, instead of accusing the rashness, recorded the valour, and bewailed the mi-fortune, of the Hungarian youth.

Before I lose sight of the field of War-

chamber, I am tempted to pause on the charac-

A knight of the Order of Saint John, and brother of the Grand Master, was killed in the battle. Another knight of the Order, named Casimir, was the son of a notable citizen of Cracow. He had distinguished himself in many campaigns, and was made a knight of the Order of the Golden Fleece.
In his Hungarian embassy, we have already seen the miraculous effects of his sophistry and eloquence, of which Julian himself was the first victim. The cardinal, who performed the duties of a prince and a soldier, was at a loss to resist his arguments. The circumstances of his death are variously related; but it is believed, that a weighty incumbrance of gold impeded his flight, and tempted the cruel avance of some christian fugitives.

John Corvinius

From an humble, or at least a doubtably low, but not an unadventurous, the merit of John Corvinius promoted him to the command of the Hungarian armies. His father was a Walachian, his mother a Greek; her unknown race might possibly ascend to the emperors of Constantinople; and the chains of the Walachians, with the surname of Corvinius, from the place of his nativity, might suggest a thence for mingling his blood with the patricians of ancient Rome. In his youth he served in the wars of Italy, and was retained, with twelve horsemen, by the bishop of Zagrath; the valour of the white knight was soon conspicuous; he increased his fortunes by a noble and wealthy marriage. In the service of the Hungarian borders, he won in the same year three battles against the Turks. By his influence, Ladislaus of Poland obtained the crown of Hungary; and the important service was rewarded by the title and office of Walford of Transylvania. The first of Julian's crusades added two Turkish lands to his realm, and the issue of several minor collateral errors of Warin were forgotten. During the absence and minority of Ladislaus of Austria, the titular king, Huniades was elected supreme captain and governor of Hungary; and if envy at first was silenced by terror, a reign of twelve years supposes the arts of policy as well as war. In the course of a consummate general is not delineated in his campaigns; the white knight fought with the hand rather than the head, as the chief of desultory barbarians, who attack without fear and fly without shame; and his military life is composed of a romantic alternative of victories and escapes. By the Turks, who employed his name to frighten their perverse children, he was corruptly denominated Jancu Lain, or the Wicked: that is the proof of their esteem; the kingdom which he guarded was inaccessible to their arms; and they felt him more distant and formidable, when they fondly believed his land to be the recess of the centaur. Instead of confining himself to a defensive war, four years after the defeat of Warin he again penetrated into the heart of Bulgaria, and in the plain of Cossosvast, sustained, till the third day, the shock of the Ottoman army, four times more numerous than his own. As he felt in his heart the wish of the woods of Walachia, the hero was surprised by two robbers; but while they disputed a gold chain that hung at his neck, he recovered his sword, slew the one, terrified the other, and, after new parts of captivity or death, consigned by his presence an afflicted kingdom. But the last and most magnificent of his life was the defence of Belgrade against the powers of Mahomet the second in person. After a siege of forty days, the Turks, who had already entered the town, were compelled to retreat; and the joyful nations celebrated Huniades and Belgrade as the last virtues of Christian Europe. A month after this great deliverance, the champion expired; and his most splendid epitaph is the regret of the Ottoman prince, who sighed that he could no longer hope for revenge against the single antagonist who had triumphed over his formidable empire. By the throne Matthias Corvinius, a youth of eighteen years of age, was elected and crowned by the grateful Hungarians. His reign was prosperous and long: Matthias aspired to the glory of a conqueror and a saint; but his purest merit is the encouragement of learning; and the Latin critics and historians, who were invited from Italy by the son, have shed the lustre of their eloquence on the father's character. In the list of heroes, John Huniades and Scanderbeg are commonly associated; and they are both entitled to our notice, since their occupation of the Ottoman arms delayed the ruin of the Greek empire. John Castriot, the father of Scanderbeg, was the hereditary prince of a small district of Epirus and Albania, between the mountains and the Adriatic sea. Unable to contend with the sultan's power, Castriot submitted to the hard conditions of peace and trade; he delivered his four sons as the pledges of his fidelity; and the christian youths, after receiving the mark of circumcision, were instructed in the Mahometan religion, and trained in the arms and arts of Turkish policy. The three elder brothers were confounded in that manner, and the two younger, whose deaths are ascertained, cannot be verified or disproved by any positive evidence. Yet the suspicion is in a great measure removed by the kind and paternal treatment of George Castriot, the fourth brother, who, from his tender youth, displayed the strength and spirit of a soldier. The successive overthrow of a Tartar and two Persians, who carried a proud defiance to the Turkish court, recommended him to the favour of Amurath, and his Turkish appellation of Scanderbeg, (Iskender bez), or the lord Alexander, is an indelible memorial of his glory and servitude. His father's principality was reduced into a province; but the loss was compensated by the rank and title of Sanjakin, a command of five thousand horse, and the possession of the first dignities of the empire. He served with honour in the wars of Europe and Asia; and we may smile at the art or credulity of the historian, who supposes, that in the memory of Castriot, the last king of the Christians, the hero was surprised by two robbers, or that his father's wrongs, the ambiguous death of his three brothers, his own degradation, and the slavery of his country; and they adore the generous, though tardy, zeal, with which he asserted the faith and independence of his nation, or the hero condescends to take notice of his rival's merit.
of his ancestors. But he had imbied from his ninth year the doctrines of the Kojan; he was ignorant of the gospel; the religion of a soldier is determined by authority and habit; nor is it easy to exorcise what nothing can influence. Illegitimate change of fortune could be poured into his soul. His motives would be less exposed to the suspicion of interest or revenge; had he broken his chain from the moment that he was sensible of its weight; but a long oblivion had surely impaired his original virtue, and every year of residence and commerce had cemented the mutual bond of the sultan and his subject. If Scanderbeg had long harboured the belief of Christianity and the intention of revolt, a worthy man might condemn the base disimulation, that could serve only to betray, that could promise only to be forestalled, and actually join in the temporal and spiritual perdition of so many thousands of his unhappy brethren. Shall we praise a secret correspondence with Huniades, while he commanded the vanguard of the Turkish army? shall we excuse the desertion of his standard, a treacherous desertion, which abandoned the victory to the enemies of his benefactor? In the confusion of a defeat, the eye of Scanderbeg was fixed on the Reis Effendi or principal secretary: with a dagger at his breast, he extorted a firman or patent for the government of Albania; and the murder of the gunwalt and destruction of his train procured an immediate discovery. With some bold companions, to whom he had revealed his design, he escaped in the night, by rapid marches, from the field of battle to his paternal mountains. The gates of Croya were opened to the royal mandate; and no sooner did he come to the fortress, than George Castriot dropped the mask of dissimulation; abjured the prophet and the sultan, and proclaimed himself the avenger of his family and country. The names of religion and liberty provoked a general revolt: the Albanians, a martial race, were unequal to the contest with their hereditary prince; and the Ottoman garrisons were induced in the choice of martyrdom or baptism. In the assembly of the states of Epirus, Scanderbeg was elected general of the Turkish war; and each of the allies engaged to furnish his respective portion of men and money. From these contributions, from his patrimonial estates, and from the valuable salt-pits of Selina, he drew an annual revenue of two hundred thousand ducats; and the entire sum exempt from the demands of luxury was strictly appropriated to the public use. His manners were popular; but his discipline was severe; and every violation of it was punished with the utmost severity. For example strengthened his command, and under his conduct the Albanians were invincible in their own opinion and that of their enemies. The bravest adventurers of France and Germany were allure by his fame and retained in his service: his standing militia consisted of eight thousand horse and seven thousand foot; the horses were small, the men were active: but he viewed with a discerning eye the difficulties and resources of the mountains; and, at the blaze of the beacon, the whole nation was distributed to the various posts. With his unequal army, Scanderbeg resisted twenty-three years the powers of the Ottoman empire; and two conquerors, Amurath the second, and his greater son, were repeatedly baffled by a reef, whom they pursued with seeming contempt and implacable resentment. At the head of six thousand men and fortieth and janissaries, Amurath entered Albania; he might ravage the open country, occupy the defenceless towns, convert the churches into mosques, circumcise the christian youths, and punish with death his adult and obstinate captives; but the conquests of the sultan were confined to the petty fortress of Stiligrade; and the garrison, invinci- ble in Italy, was a suppositive scruple. Amurath retired with shame and loss from the walls of Croya, the castle and residence of the Castriots; the march, the siege, the retreat, were harassed by a vexatious, and almost invisi- ble, adversary; and the disappointment might tend to asperge the terror to fortunes of the last days of the sultan. In the fulness of conquest, Mahomet the second still felt at his bosom this domestic thorn: his lieuten- ants were permitted to negotiate a truce; and the Albanian prince must justly be praised as a firm and able champion of his national independence. The en- thusiasm of Christianity and religion was roused by the names of Alexander and Pyrrhus; nor would they blush to acknowledge their intrepid countryman: but his narrow dominion and slender powers must leave him at an humble distance below the heroes of antiqui- ty, who triumphed over the east and the Roman legions. His preservation was only necessary to guard against the encroachment of the Ottoman powers: the janissaries were exposed by the light of Italian history; and they afford a strong presumption against their own truth, by a fabulous tale of his exploits, when he passed the Adriatic with eight hundred horse to the succour of the king of Naples. Without his magnanimous avowal of the fame, they might have owned, that he was only oppugned by the Ottoman powers: in his extreme danger he ap- plied to Pope Pius the second for a refuge in the eclec- stical state; and his resources were almost exhaust- ed, since Scanderbeg died a fugitive at Lissos, on the Jura. Venetia had joined the cause of her friend, and was soon violated by the Turkish conqueror: A.D. 1462. Jan. 17. and the janizaries, who wore his bones encaased in a bracelet, declared by this superstitious amulet their involuntary reverence for his valour. The instant ruin of his country may redound to the hero's glory. The people, who once yielded their liberty, their resources, and submission and resistance, a patriot perhaps would have declined the unequal contest which must depend on the life and genius of one man. Scanderbeg might indeed be supported by the rational, though fallacious, hope, that the pope, the king of Naples, and the Venetians might contribute to his deliverance. But the Christian people, who guarded the sea-coast of the Adriatic, and the narrow passage from Greece to Italy, Scanderbeg and the janizaries were invested with the Neapolitan dukedoms, and their blood continues to flow in the noblest

---

1. There were two Bibras, the upper and lower, the Bulgarian and Albanian: the former, 70 miles from Croya, (l. p. 177.) was contro- versed between the feuds of Nettoum, whose inhabitants refused to drink water from a well into which a dead dog had traitorously been cast. (v. p. 179, 180.) We want a good map of Epirus.

2. Compare the passages of Plutarch, (i. p. 26.) and of Muralori, (Joh. Ital. p. 189-192.) the pompous and prolix declaration in the fourth, fifth and sixth books of the Alcaudus, (Muralori, p. 193, 194.) who has been copied by the tribe of strangers and moderns.

3. In honour of his hero, Barletian, (ti, v. 180—192.) the king of the Bulgarians and Albanians, who became a Turk by the name and manner of Amurath's death at Alcamo.

4. Compare the memoirs of Calarian expedition in the ninth and tenth books of Muralori, (p. 194-197.) which shows the tradition of the Albanians, (Amal. d'Italia, tome 250.) and his original authors. (Jos. Simonetta de Rebus Francisci Muralori, in Il Rettorato, in il就给大家的。 families of the realm. A colony of Albanian fugitives obtained a settlement in Calabria, and they preserve at this day the language and manners of their ancestors.

Constantine the Great and his Family.

In the long career of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, one man was equal in length at least the last reign of the princes of Constantine, who so freely sustained the name and majesty of the Caesars. On the decease of John Palaeologus, who survived about four years the Hungarian crusade, the sons of the family, by the indiscretion of the imperial princes, and the monastic profession of Isidore, was reduced to three princes, Constantine, Demetrius, and Thomas, the surviving sons of the emperor Manuel. Of these the first and last were distant in the Morea; but Demetrius, who possessed the domain of Selymbria, was in the suburbs, at the head of a party: his ambition was not chilled by the public distress; and his conspiracy with the Turks and the schismatics had already disturbed the peace of the country. The funeral of the late emperor was accelerated with singular and even suspicious haste: the claim of Demetrius to the vacant throne was followed by the suspicion, that he was born in the purple, the eldest son of his father's reign. But the empress-mother, the senate and soldiers, the clergy and people, were unanimous in the cause of the lawful successor; and the despot Thomas, who, ignorant of the change, acceded to the capital, asserted with becoming zeal the interest of his absent brother. An ambassador, the historian Phranza, was immediately despatched to the court of Adrianople. Amurat received him with honour and dismissed him with gifts; but the gracious approbation of the Turkish sultan announced his supremacy to the approaching followers of the eastern empire. By the hands of two illustrious deputies, the imperial crown was placed at Sparta on the head of Constantine. In the spring he sailed from the Morea, escaped the encounter of a Turkish squadron, enjoyed the acclamations of his subjects, celebrated the festival of a new reign, and enriched by his donatives, the treasure, or rather the indigence, of the state. The emperor immediately resigned to his brothers the possession of the Morea; and the brittle friendship of the two princes, Demetrius and Thomas, was confirmed in their mother's presence by the fratricidal revenge; but with the victories of his successor, the choice of a consort. A daughter of the doge of Venice had been proposed; but the Byzantine nobles objected the distance between an hereditary monarch and as elective magistrate; and in their subsequent distress, the chief of that powerful republic was not unmindful of the affront. Constantine afterwards hesitated between the royal families of Trebizond and Georgia; and the embassy of Phranza represents in his public and private life the last days of the Byzantine empire.

The pontifical, or great chamberlain, Phranza, sailed from Constantinople as the minister of a bridegroom: and the relics of wealth and luxury were applied to his pompous appearance. His numerous retinue consisted of nobles and guards, of physicians and monks: he was attended by a band of music; and the tomb of his costly embassy was protracted above two years. On his arrival in Georgia or Iberia, the natives from the towns and villages flocked around the strangers; and such was their simplicity, that they were delighted with the effects, without understanding the cause, of musical harmony. Among the crowd was an old man, above a hundred years of age, who had formerly been carried away a captive by the barbarians, and who amused his hearers with a tale of the wonders of India, from whence he had returned to Portugal by an unknown path. From this holy country, land, Phranza proceeded to the court of Trebizond, where he met the Greek prince of the recent decease of Amurat. Instead of rejoicing in the deliverance, the experienced statesman expressed his apprehension, that an ambitious youth would not long adhere to the sage and patriarchal system of his father, nor the sultan's decease, his christian wife, Maria, the daughter of the Servian despot, had been honourably restored to her parents: on the fame of her beauty and merit, she was recommended by the ambassador as the most worthy object of the royal choice; and Phranza recapitulates and refutes the specious objections that might be urged against the proposal. The majesty of the purple would enable an unequal alliance; the bar of affinity might be removed by liberal alms and the dispensation of the church; the disgrace of Turkish mulets had been repeatedly overlooked; and, though the fair Maria was but in her twenties by years as to be a lost heritage to the empire. Constantine listened to the advice, which was transmitted in the first ship that sailed from Trebizond; but the factions of the court opposed his marriage; and it was finally prevented by the pious vow of the sultans, who ended her days in the monastery. Succeeded to the throne by his brother, the choice of Phranza was decided in favour of a Georgian princess; and the vanity of her father was dazzled by the glorious alliance. Instead of demanding, according to the primitive and national custom, a price for his daughter, he offered a portion of fifty-six thousand, with an annual pension of five thousand ducats; and the services of the ambassador were repaid by an assurance, that, as his son had been adopted in baptism by the emperor, the establishment of his daughter should be the peculiar care of the empress of the Byzantine empire. On the return of Phranza, the treaty was ratified by the Greek monarch, who with his own hand impressed three vermilion crosses on the golden bullion, and assured the Georgian envoy, that in the spring his galleys should conduct the bride to her imperial palace. But Constantine embraced his faithful servant, not with the cold approbation of a warm conversation, who, after a long absence, is impatient to pour his secrets into the bosom of his friend. State of the Byzantine family, and of the Servian court.

Cantacuzene, who alone advised me without interest or passion, I am surrounded, by men whom I can neither love, nor trust, nor esteem. You are not a stranger to Lucas Notaras, the great admiral; obstinately attached to his own sentiments, he declares, both in private and public, that his sentiments are the absolute measure of my thoughts and actions. The rest of the courtiers are swayed by their personal or factious views; and how can I consult the monks on questions of policy and marriage? I have yet much employment for your diligence and fidelity. In the spring you shall engage one of my brothers to solicit the succour of the western powers; from them you shall sail to Cyprus on a particular commission; and from thence proceed to Georgia to receive and conduct the future empress. "Your commands," replied Phranza, "are irresistible; but, deign, great sir," he added, with a serious smile, "to consider, that if I am thus perpetually absent from my father, whom the scholar ought to seek with other husband, or to throw herself into a monastery."

After laughing at his apprehensions, the emperor more gravely consoled him by the pleasing assurance that this would be his last service abroad, and that he destined for his son a wealthy and noble heiress; for himself, the important office of great logothete, or principal minister of state. The marriage was immediately stipulated; but the office, however incompatible with his own, had been usurped by the ambition of the admiral. Some delay was requisite to negotiate a consent and an equivalent; and the nomination of Phranza was later declared, and half suppressed, lest it might be displeasing to an insolent and powerful favourite. The winter was spent in the preparations of his embassy; and Phranza had resolved, that the youth his son should embrace this opportunity of foreign travel, and not less, his appearance of the sect with his maternal kindred of the Morea. Such were the private and public designs, which were interrupted by a Turkish war, and finally buried in the ruins of the empire.

CHAP. XXIX.

Regn and character of Mahomet the second.—Siege, assa ulted, and final conquest, of Constantinople by the Turks.—Death of Constantine Palaeologus.—Seruliture of the Greeks.—Extinction of the Roman empire in the east.—Conformation of Europe.—Conquests and death of Mahomet the second.

Character of Mahomet the second. The Turks attach our first attention to the person and character of the great destroyer. Mahomet the second was the son of the second Amurath; and though his mother has been decorated with the titles of christian and princess, she is more probably confounded with the numerous concubines who peopled from every clime the harem of the sultan. His first education and sentiments were those of a devout musulman; and as often as he conversed with an infidel, he purified his hands and face by the legal rites of ablution. Age and empire appear to have relaxed this narrow bigotry: his aspiring genius disdain to acknowledge a power above his own; and in his looser hours he presumed (it is said) to brand the prophet of Mecca as a robber and impostor. Yet the sultan persevered in a devout reverence for the doctrine and discipline of the Koran; his private indiscipline must have been sacred from the vulgar ear, and shrouded half beneath the embroidery of his court and sequesters, so prone to believe that a mind which is hardened against truth, must be armed with superior contempt for absurdlty and error. Under the tutelage of the most skilful masters, Mahomet advanced with an early and rapid progress in the paths of knowledge; and besides his native tongue, it is affirmed that he spoke or understood five languages, the Arabic, the Persian, the Chaldean or Hebrew, the Latin, and the Greek. The Persian might indeed contribute to his amusement, and the Arabic to his education; for he was not only instructed in the sacred writings, but was versed in the history of his country, to which he submitted himself, as the base of the art of Hebrew slaves! The history and geography of the world were familiar to his memory: the lives of the heroes of the east, perhaps of the west, excited his emulation; his skill in astrology is excelled by the folly of the times, and supposes some rudiments of mathematical science; and a prodige taste for the arts is betrayed in his liberal invitation and reward of the painters of Italy. But the influence of religion and learning were employed without effect on his savage and licentious nature. I will not transcribe, nor do I firmly believe, the stories of his fond pages, the delusion he indulged in the bath of Moluk; or of the brauteous slave, whose head he severed from her body, to convince the Janizaries that their master was not the votary of love. His sobriety is attested by the silence of the Turkish annals, which accuse three, and three only, of the Ottoman invasions, as acts of drunkenness. But it cannot be denied that his passions were at once furious and inexorable; that in the palace, as in the field, a torrent of blood was split on the slightest provocation; and that the noblest of the captive youth were often dishonoured by his unnatural brutality. The Albanian women, the female sons, and soon surpassed the example, of his father; and the conquest of two empires, twelve kingdoms, and two hundred cities, a vain and flattering account, is ascribed to his invincible sword. He was doubtless a soldier, and possibly a general; Constantinople and Adrianople were by him plumed with the arms of the conqueror, and Scanderbeg, by the Rhodian knights and by the Persian king.

In the reign of Amurath, he twice tasted of royalty, and twice descended from the throne; his tender age was incapable of opposing his father's restoration, but never could he forgive the

For the character of Mahomet II, it is dangerous to trust either to the Turks or the Christians. The most moderate picture appears to be drawn by Pachinus, (l. c. 32,) whose resentment had cooled in age and solitude; see likewise Spandanes, (A. D. 1514, No. 11.) and the continuator of Euniger, (t. xiv, p. 555,) the Elissaria of Paulus Jeremi (L., p. 151—154,) and the Dictionary of Bayle, (t. ii, p. 272—273.)

A Guiraut (p. 115,) and the memoirs which he founded, attract our public regard for religion. Mahomet firmly disputed with the patriarch Gennadius on the two subjects. (Soc. A. D. 1412, No. 22.)

4 Quinque linguis praeclarum summo notavit: Graecam, Latinam, Chal- deam, Persicum, Thracian. The Latin translator of Phrozen has dropped the Arabic, which the Koran most recommend to every musulman.

4 Philadelphia, by a Latin edo, requested and obtained the library of his father, which he kept, and mates from the contents of the Koran, to his son, who was called the jurisconsult of the Prophet. It was delivered into the sultan's hands by the envoy of the Duke of Nikias, and endeared itself to the sultan, but not to Constantineople; yet the emperor was at the trumpet of holy war. (See his life by M. Landrach, in the Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions, t. x, p. 715, 721, &c.)

4 Robert Valentinus published at Verona, in 1613, his twelve books of the Roman History, in which he supposed the army of Constantine, the elder, to be conducted by Mahomet II.

4 According to Pharanza, he assiduously studied the lives and actions of Alexander, Augustus, Constantine, and Theodosius. I have read an extract from his Latin translation of the Barrach's Lives were translated into his native language, and he composed in the Turkish language. If the sultan himself understood Greek, it must have been to the benefit of his subjects; and of the school of freedom as well as of valor.

4 The famous Gentle Bellini, with whom he had invited from Venice, was dying in Constantinople; he desired a chain and collar of gold, and a purse of 300 ducats. With Voltaire I touch at the foolish story of a slave pur- chased for 50,000 crowns, and his escape in the possession of the imperial gardens. It was true that he was delivered as a slave, but it was the privilege of the slave to be a prince. (See his Letters, p. 54.) The sophist of the Ottoman empire was a regular success; and in the 1st age, our European travellers were the witnesses and companions of their cruelties.
viziars who had recommended that salutary measure. His captives were celebrated with the daughter of a Turkman emir; and, after a festival of two months, he departed from Adrianople with his bride, to reside in the princely mansion of Mahomet II. In six weeks he was recalled by a sudden message from the divan, which announced the decease of Amurath, and the mutinous spirit of the janizaries. His speed and vigour commanded their obedience; he passed the Hellespont with a chosen guard; and at the distance of two days, he captured the city. One of the islands of the Smyron was assigned for the annual payment of three hundred thousand aspers, the pension of an Ottoman prince, who was detained at his request in the Byzantine court. Yet the neighbours of Mahomet might tremble at the severity with which a youthful monarch reformed the state. The expenses of luxury were applied to those of ambition, and an useless train of seven thousand falconers was either dismissed from his service, or enlisted in his troops. In the first summer of his reign, he visited with an army the Asiatic provinces; but after having been victorious, he accepted the submission of the Caramanian, that he might not be diverted by the smallest obstacle from the execution of his grand design. 8

Hostile intentions of Mahomet II. The Mahometan, and more especially of Mahomet II, the Turkish casuists, have pronounced that no promise can bind the faithful against the interest and duty of their religion; and that the sultan may abrogate his own treaties and those of his predecessors. The justice and magnanimity of Amurath had scorned this immoral privilege; but his son, though the proudest of men, could stoop from ambition to a more humane measure. Peace was on his lips, while war was in his heart; he incessantly sighed for the possession of Constantinople; and the Greeks, by their own indiscretion, afforded the first pretext of the fatal rupture. 9 Instead of labouring to be forgotten, his ambassadors pursed his views, and taught him by their energy, of their annual stipend; the divan was impounded by their complaints, and the vizir, a secret friend of the christians, was constrained to deliver the sense of his brethren. "Ye foolish and miserable Romans," said Calli, "we knew your devices, and ye are ignorant of your own danger; the scrupulous Amurath is no longer with us; and if I am, no more; his heir, Mahomet II, a feetor, whom no laws can bind, and no obstacles can resist; and if you escape from his hands, give praise to the divine clemency, which yet delays the chastisement of your sins. Why do ye seek to affright us by vain and indirect menaces? Release the fugitive Orce, of whose kingdom you can command the inhabitants from beyond the Danube; arm against us the nations of the west; and be assured, that you will only provoke and precipitate your ruin." But if the fears of the ambassadors were alarmed by the stern language of the vizir, they were soothed by the courteous audience and friendly speeches of the Ottoman prince; and Mahomet assured them that on his return to Adrianople, he would redress the grievances, and consult the true interests, of the Greeks. No sooner had he re-passed the Hellespont, than he issued a mandate to suppress their pension, and to expel their officers from his court; and in this measure he showed an hostile mind; and the second order announced, and in some degree commenced, the siege of Constantinople. In the narrow pass of the Bosphorus, an Asiatic fortress had formerly been raised by his grandfather: In the opposite situation, on the European side, he resolved to erect a more formidable castle; and a thousand masons were commanded to assemble in the spring on a spot named Asomont, about five miles from the Greek metropolis. 10 Persuasion is the resource of the feeble; and the feeble can seldom persuade: the ambassadors of the emperor attempted, without success, to divert Mahomet from his design. They represented, that his grandfather had solicited the permission of Manuel to build a castle on his own territories; but that this double fortification, which would command the strait, could only tend to violate the alliance of the nations; to intercept the Latins who traded in the Black sea, and perhaps to annihila the subsistence of the city. "I form no enterprise," replied the perfidious sultan, "against the city; but the empire of Constantinople is measured by her walls. Have you forgot the distress to which my father was reduced, when you formed a league with the Hungarians, to invade your own country?" Peace was on his lips, while war was in his heart; he incessantly sighed for the possession of Constantinople; and the Greeks, by their own indiscretion, afforded the first pretext of the fatal rupture. Instead of labouring to be forgotten, his ambassadors pursed his views, and taught him by their energy, of their annual stipend; the divan was impounded by their complaints, and the vizir, a secret friend

1 Calapin, one of these royal infants, was saved from his cruel brother, and baptized at Rome under the name of Callistus Ottomanus. The emperor Frederic III. presented him with an estate in Austria, where he ended his life; and Cosminian, who in his youth conversed with the aged prince at Vienna, applauded his piety and wisdom. (De Caracass, p. 673, 673.)

2 Before I enter on the scene of Constantinople I shall observe, that except the short war of Michael VIII. against the Latins, which has not been able to obtain any Turkish account of this conquest; such an account as appears possess of the siege of Rhodes by Sokoman II. (Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions, tom. x. p. 727—729.) I must therefore depend on the Greeks, whose prejudices, in some instances, are too leaned to the otromatic side. Our standard sources are Ducas, c. 34—42; Panaora, qui. i. c. 7—20; Chatoyelles, l. vii. p. 32, 33; and a MS. in the Arch. Brit. It is evident, that the Turks, according to the writer of the MS. in the Arch. Brit., have reduced in the year Land to Martin Cuorti, (Gurges Grec, i. p. 71.)

3 Ducas, 1551. The various facts and materials are briefly, though clearly, set forth by Norden, p. 49. That the Turks do not scruple to murder, is evidenced by the Luon. in, vol. ii. p. 433; also by the MS. copied in the year Land to Martin Cuorti, (Gurges Grec, i. p. 71.)

4 This situation of the fortresses, and the topography of the Bosphorus, are best learned from Ducas, c. 34—42; Panoara, qui. i. c. 7—20; Chatoyelles, l. vii. p. 32, 33; and a MS. in the Arch. Brit. It is evident, that the Turks, according to the writer of the MS. in the Arch. Brit., have reduced in the year Land to Martin Cuorti, (Gurges Grec, i. p. 71.)

5 Bals, 1551. The various facts and materials are briefly, though clearly, set forth by Norden, p. 49. That the Turks do not scruple to murder, is evidenced by the Libu. in, vol. ii. p. 433; also by the MS. copied in the year Land to Martin Cuorti, (Gurges Grec, i. p. 71.)

6 The reader may turn back to ch. xvii. vol. i. of this history.

7 The opposition is set which the Turks found on the infidels, is expressed before by Ducas, and Gouron by Lawsonville and the ministers. The former in the MS. copied in the year Land to Martin Cuorti, (Gurges Grec, i. p. 71.) from Laouedjou, in vulgar Greek, a term, denoting a remonstrative mode from the faith. But aloud! Gouron is more than this, for he is translated from the Persian to the Turkish language, from the word of Ewari to those of the crucif, (Oulhu-}

8 Vol. i. 3 G
of the Greeks in spirit as in rank, had determined to unsheath the sword, and to resist the approach and establishment of the Turks on the Bosphorus. He was disarmed by the advice of his civil and ecclesiastical friends; for he was resolved to shun all portion less than conquest, and even less prudent, than his own, to approve their patience and long-suffering, to brand the Ottoman with the name and guilt of an aggressor, and to depend on chance and time for their own safety, and the destruction of a fort which could not long be maintained.

Amidst hope and fear, the hopes of the wise, and the hopes of the credulous, the winter rolled away; the proper business of each man, and each hour, was postponed; and the Greeks shut their eyes against the impending danger, till the arrival of the spring and the sultan decided the assurance of their ruin.

Of a master who never forgives, the orders are seldom disobeyed. On the

A.D. 1452.

twenty-sixth of March, the appointed

March, spot of Asomaton was covered with an active swarm of Turkish artificers; and the materials

by sea and land were eagerly transported from Euro-dope and Asia. The line had been burnt in Cataphrygia; the timber was cut down in the woods of Heraclea and Nicomedia; and the stones were dug from the Anatolian quarries. Each of the thousand massons was assisted by two workmen; and a messenger of two cubits was marked for their daily task.

The fortress was built in a triangular form; each angle was flanked by a strong and massive tower; one on the declivity of the hill, two along the sea-shore; a thickness of twenty-two feet was assigned for the walls, three for the towers, and the vast building was covered with a solid platform of lead. Mahomet himself pressed and directed the work with indefatigable ardour: his three vizirs claimed the honour of finishing their respective towers; the zeal of the eunuchs emulated that of the janizaries; the meanest labour was entrusted by the service of God and the sultan; and the diligence of the multitude was quickened by the eye of a despot, whose smile was the hope of fortune, and whose frown was the messenger of death. The Greek emperor beheld with terror the irresistible progress of the work; and vainly strove, by flattery and gifts, to secure the favour of the profane. For the slightest indisfomentation, the slightest occasion of a quarrel. Such crases must soon and inevitably be found. The ruins of stately churches, and even the marble columns which had been consecrated to Saint Michael the archangel, were entangled without scruple by the profane masons of Moslem; and some Christians, who presumed to oppose the removal, received from their hands the crown of martyrdom.

Constantine had solicited a Turkish guard to protect the fields and harvests of his subjects; the guard was fixed; but their first order was to allow free passage to the moles and horses of the camp, and to defend their brethren if they should be molested by the natives. The retinue of an

Ottoman chief had left their horses to pass the night among the rape corn; the damage was felt; the insult was resisted; and several of both nations were slain in a desperate conflict. Mahomet listened with to the complaint; and a detachment was commanded to exterminate the guilty village; the guilty had fled; but forty innocent and unsuspecting reapers were mas-sacrered by the soldiers. Till this provocation, Constantinople had been open to war, June;

the visits of commerce and curiosity: on the first alarm, the gates were shut; but the emperor, still anxious for security, based on the third floor the palace in the happy change; if he delivers the city into your hands, I submit without a murmur to his holy will. But until the Judge of the earth shall pronounce between us, it is my duty to live and die in the defence of my people. The sultan’s answer was hostile and decri-

tive: his fortifications were completed;

and before his departure for Adrianople, he stationed a vigilant aga and four hundred janizaries, to levy a tribute of the ships of every nation that should pass with- in the reach of their cannon. A Venetian vessel, refusing obedience to the new Bey of the Bosphorus, was sunk with a single bullet. The Turkish builders escaped in the boat; but they were dragged in chains to the Porte; the chief was impaled; his companions were beheaded, and the historian Ducas held, at Demotica, their bodies exposed to the wild beasts.

The following spring, when the sultan saw the ensuing season; but an Ottoman army marched into the Morea to divert the force of the brothers of Constantine. At this era of calamity, one of these princes, the despot Thomas, was blessed or afflicted with the birth of a son; the most illustrious of his name, was named Phranza, "of the last spark of the Roman empire."

The Greeks and the Turks passed an

April 1.

Preparations for anxious and sleepless winter; the former the siege of

were kept awake by their fears, the Inter-marched, the latter by their hopes; both by the preparations of defence and attack; and the two emperors, who had the most to lose or to gain, were the most deeply affected by the national sentiment. In Mahomet, that sentiment was inflamed by the ardour of his youth and temper: he amused his leisure with building at Adrianople the lofty palace of Jehannina, on the site of the ancient

But his serious thoughts were irrevocably bent on the conquest of the city of Cæsar. At the dead of night, about the second watch, he started from his bed, and commanded the instant attendance of his prince vizir.

The vizir, the hour, the prince, and his munificence, advertisement, alarmed the guilty conscience of Calil Bashin; who had possessed the confidence, and advised the restoration of, Amurat. On the accession of the son, the vizir was confirmed in his office and the appearances of favour; but the veteran statesman was not ir-sensible that he trod on a thin and slippery ice, which might break under his footsteps, and plunge him into the abyss. His friendship for the Christians, which might be innocent under the late reign, had stigmatized him with the name of Gabour Ortachi, or foster-brother of the infidels; and his avarice entertained a central and treasonable correspondence, which had to be detected and punished after the conclusion of the war.

Phranza does not exactly agree with Chronicones, whose description has been verified on the spot by his editor Lutumivius.
On receiving the royal mandate, he embraced, perhaps for the last time, his wife and children; filled a cup with pieces of gold, hastened to the palace, adorned the sultan, and offered, according to the oriental custom, the slight tribute of his duty and gratitude. "It is not my wish," said Mahomet, "to resume my gifts, but to desire the happiness of the sultan; and I turn my task a present far more valuable and important.—Constantinople." As soon as the vizir had recovered from his surprise, "The same God," said he, "who has already given thee so large a portion of the Roman empire, will not deny the remnant and the crown. He has foreseen of two hundred and fifty years, and have of my turn I ask a present far more valuable and important:

For the conveyance of this destructive engine, a frame or carriage of thirty waggons was linked together and drawn along by a team of sixty oxen: two hundred men on both sides were stationed to pull or support the rolling weight; two hundred and fifty workmen marched before smooth the way and repair the breaches; and near two months were employed in a laborious journey of one hundred and fifty miles. A lively philosopher b derives on this occasion the credulity of the Greeks, and observes, with much reason, that we should always distrust the exaggerations of a vanquished people. He calculates, that a ball of cannon, in order to require a charge of one hundred and fifty pounds of powder, and that the stroke would be feele and impotent, since not a fifteenth part of the mass could be inferred at the same moment. A stranger as I am to the art of destruction, I can discern that the modern improvements of artillery prefer the number of pieces to the weight of metal; the quickness of the fire to the sound, or even the consequence, of a single explosion. Yet I dare not reject the positive and unanimous evidence of contemporary writers; nor can it seem improbable, that the first artists, in their rude and ambitious efforts, may have passed the standard of their art.

Mahomet II, the conqueror of Constantinople.

A.D. 1453.

April 6.

While Mahomet threatened the capital of the empire with the imminent destruction of the Turkish cannon, his sultan, with fervent prayers the assistance of earth and heaven. But the invisible powers were deceitful to his supplications: and Christendom beheld with indifference the fall of Constantinople, while she derived at least some promise of supply from the jealousy and unexploited policy of the sultan of Egypt. Some states were too weak, and others too remote; by some the danger was considered as imaginary, by others as inevitable: the western princes were involved in their endless and domestic quarrels; and the Roman pontiff was exasperated by the breach of their faith, and of the treaties of Venice. Instead of employing in their favour the arms and treasures of Italy, Nicholas the fifth had foretold their approaching ruin; and his honour was engaged in the accomplishment of his prophecy. Perhaps he was softened by the last extremity of their distress; but his compassion was tardy; his efforts were faint and unavailing; and Constantinople had fallen, before the squadrons of Genoa and Venice could sail from their harbours. Even the princes of the Morea and of the Greek islands affected a cold neutrality: the Genoese:[451]... raised in their defence whole armies of mercenaries. The indigent and solitary prince prepared however to sustain his formidable adversary; but if his courage was equal to the peril, his strength was inadequate to the contest. In the beginning of the spring, the Turkish vanguard swept the towns and villages as far as the confines of the camp. The Genoese were sparred and protected; whatever presumed to resist was exterminated with fire and sword. The Greek places on the Black sea, Mesembria, Acheleona, and Bizon, surrendered on the first summons; Selychin alone de- served the honours of a siege or blockade; and the bold inhabitants, while they were invested by land, launched their boats, pilgaged the opposite coast of Cyzicus, and sold their captives in the public market. But on the approach of Mahomet himself all was silent and prostrate: he first halted at the distance of five miles; and from thence advancing in battle array, planted before the gate of St. Romanus the imperial standard; and, on the sixth day of April, formed the memorable siege of Constantinople.

The troops of Asia and Europe extended on the right and left from the Propontis to the Thracian sea; the camp was stationed, before the sultan's tent; the Ottoman line was covered by a deep intrenchment; and a subordinate army enclosed the suburb of Galata, and watch- ed the doubtful faith of the Genoese. The inquisitive Philohorus, who resided in Greece about thirty years before this event, madness, to be certain, than the Turks of times, of any name or value, could not exceed the number of sixty thousand horse and twenty thousand foot; and he upbraids the pusillanimity of the nations, who had tamely yielded to an handful of barbarians. Such indeed might be the regular establishment of the Capi- culi; and the troops of Porte, who submitted with the prince, and were paid from his royal treasury. But the bashaws, in their respective governments, maintained or levied a provincial militia; many lands were held by a military tenure; many volunteers were at- tracted by the hope of spoil; and the sound of the holy trumpeter invited a swarm of hungry and fearless fanatics, who might contribute at least to multiply the terrors, and in the first attack to blunt the swords, of the christians. The whole mass of the Turkish pow- ers is magnified by Ducas, Chalcondyles, and Leonard of Spontanum, to the number of three hundred thou- sand men; but Phranza was a less remote and more accurate judge; and his precise definition of two hundred and fifty-eight thousand does not exceed the mea- sure of experience and probability. The navy of the besiegers was less formidable: the Propontis was overpeopled with three hundred and twenty sail; but of these no more than eighteen could be rated as galleys of war; and the far greater part must be degraded to the condition of storeships and transports, which poured into the camp fresh supplies of men, munition, and provisions. In her last decay, Constantinople was still peopled with more than an hundred thousand inhabitants; but these numbers are found in the accounts, of not war, but of captivity; and they mostly consisted of mechanics, priests, of women, and of men devoid of that spirit which even women have sometimes exerted for the common safety. I can suppose, I could almost ex- cuse, the reluctance of subjects to serve on a distant frontier, at the will of a tyrant; but the man who dares not expose his life in the defence of his children for the sake of his country, is not a man who will exert active energies of nature. By the emperor's com- mand, a particular inquiry had been made through the streets and houses, how many of the citizens, or even of the monks, were able and willing to bear arms for their country. The lists were intrusted to Phranza; and after a diligent advantage, he informed the emperor, with grief and surprise, that the national defence was reduced to four thousand nine hundred and seventy Romans. Between Constantine and his faithful min- ister, this comfortless secret was preserved; and a sufficient proportion of shields, cross-bows, and mus- kets, was distributed to the citizens in the city hands. They derived some accession from a body of two thousand strangers, under the command of John Justiniani, a noble Genoese; a liberal donation was advanced to these auxiliaries; and a princely recommen- dation, the isle of Lemenos, was promised to the valour of the last. But the enterprise was too hazardous for the enterprise was too hazardous for the Turks. The Turks were advancing from the city of the coast, which, across the mouth of the harbour; it was supported by some Greek and Italian vessels of war and merchan- dise; and the ships of every christian nation, that successively arrived from Candia and the Black sea, were detained for the public service. Against the bravery of the Turks, and the protection of the Turks, and the protection of the Latins, the empire was therefore held by their brother Constantine imposed a last trial of flattery and dissimulation. With the demand of temporal aid, his ambassadors were instructed to mingle the assur- ance of spiritual obedience; his neglect of the church was excused by the ardent cares of the state; and his principles were renewed. The emperor's brother Constantine proposed a treaty, with the emperor, with the emperor's brother, by which the number of the Latins, the church of Stephana, joined in the communion of sacrifice and prayer; and the names of the two pontiffs were solemnly commemorated; the names of Nicholas the fifth, the vicar of Christ, and of the patriarch Gregory, who had been driven into ex- ile by a rebellious people.

---

* Antonio, in Psamm.—Epist. cardinal. Lidor, apud Spontanum; and Dr. Johnson, in the tragedy of Iren, has happily seized this characteristic circumstance: The Roman Greeks dig up the golden censers.

The accumulated wealth of hoarding acres; these were, which were, granted to their warrior prince, had summed ambitionates nations at their gates.

* The palatine troops are styled Capi culi, the provincials, Serer- centes: they were composed of the Tyrian and insular nations, and the insular nations, and the Ottoman empire. In the observation of Constantine is approved by Caesarien in the year 1509, (De Casaribus, in Epigra, de Militia Turcica, p. 697.) Murzighi proves, that the effective armies of the Turks are much less numerous than they appear. In the story that learned Con- stantinople, Leonidas Chiriocu records no more than 12,000 men called Saratris.

* Ena eldren (Imp.) tabellas exhibit non abigeo dolor et siti- tia; manque apud nos duae alias octavitas numerans. (Phraeus, l. iii. c. 53.) With some indulgence for national prejudices, we cannot desire a more authentic witness, not only of public facts, but of private councils.

* In Spondanus, the narrative of the union is not only partial, but imperfect. The return of the Latins was in 1522, and the history of Ducas, which represents these scenes (c. 36, 57,) with such truth and spirit, was not printed till the year 1649.
But the dress and language of the Latins

Oft the tin priest who officiated at the altar, were an object of scandal; and it was observed with horror, that he consecrated a cake or wafer of unleavened bread, and poured cold water into the cup of the sacrament. A national historian acknowledges with a blush, that many of the countrymen, not even the emperors himself, were unrestrained by Christian conformity. Their hasty and unconditional submission was palliated by a promise of future revival; but the best, or the worst, of their excuses was the confession of their peryjury. When they were pressed by the reproaches of their honest brethren, Hann message was that till God shall have delivered the city from the great dragon who seeks to devour us. You shall then perceive whether we are truly reconciled with the Assyrians."

But patience is not the attribute of zeal; nor can the acts of a court be adapted to the freedom and violence of popular enthusiasm. From the dome of St. Sophia, the inhabitants of either sex, and of every degree, rushed in crowds to the cell of the monk Gennadius to consult the oracle of the church. The holy man was invisible; entranced, as it should seem, in deep meditation, or divine rapture; but he had exposed on the door a paper with the following principal attack: "O miserable Romans, why will ye abandon the truth; and why, instead of confiding in God, will ye put your trust in the Italians? In losing your faith, you will lose your city. Have mercy on me, O Lord! I protest in thy presence, that I am innocent of the crime. O miserable Romans, consider, pause, and re-

But the clergy and people; and a vast and gloomy silence prevailed in that venerable dome, which had so often smacked with a cloud of incense, blazed with in-umerable lights, and resounded with the voice of prayer and thanksgiving. The Latins were the most odious of heretics and idolaters; and the first minister of the emperor, the great Voit, was heard to declare, that he would rather hold in Constantinople than in Mis-

Siegé of Con-

stanti-

nople by Mah-

omet, 545

A.D. 1433,

April 29.

by the clergy and people; and a vast and gloomy silence prevailed in that venerable dome, which had so often smacked with a cloud of incense, blazed with in-

umerable lights, and resounded with the voice of prayer and thanksgiving. The Latins were the most odious of heretics and idolaters; and the first minister of the emperor, the great Voit, was heard to declare, that he would rather hold in Constantinople than in Mis-

Siegé of Con-

stanti-

nople by Mah-

omet, 545

A.D. 1433,

April 29.

by the clergy and people; and a vast and gloomy silence prevailed in that venerable dome, which had so often smacked with a cloud of incense, blazed with in-

umerable lights, and resounded with the voice of prayer and thanksgiving. The Latins were the most odious of heretics and idolaters; and the first minister of the emperor, the great Voit, was heard to declare, that he would rather hold in Constantinople than in Mis-

Siegé of Con-

stanti-

nople by Mah-

omet, 545

A.D. 1433,

April 29.
expressed, that it was mounted with one hundred and thirty guns and had been discharged one hundred and thirty bullets. Yet, in the presence of the activity of the sultan, we may discern the infancy of the new science. Under a master who counted the moments, the great cannon could be loaded and fired no more than seven times in one day. The heated metal unfortunately burst and von even were directed; and the death of an artist was admired who betook himself of preventing the danger and accident by pouring oil, after each explosion, into the mouth of the cannon.

ATTACK AND DEFENCE. The first random shots were producible of more sound than effect; and it was not till a body of a christian force were taught to level their arms against the two opposite sides of the salient angles of a bastion. However imperfect, the weight and repetition of the fire made some impression on the walls; and the Turks pushing their approachs to the edge of the ditch, attempted to fill the enormous chasm, and to build a road to the assault. Innumerable fascines, and hedges and trunks of trees, were heaped on each other; and such was the impetuosity of the throng, that the foremost and the weakest were pushed headlong down the precipice by the accumulated mounts. To fill the ditch, was the toil of the besiegers: to clear away the rubbish, was the safety of the besieged; and, after a long and bloody conflict, the web that had been woven in the day was still unraveled in the night. The next resource of Mahomet was the practical use of the enfilade fire in the smaller cannon; in every attempt he was stopped and undermined by the christin engineers; nor had the art been yet invented of piercing those subterfugeous passages with gunpowder, and blowing whole towers and citadels into the air. A circumstance that distinguishes the siege of Constantiopolis from the reunion of the ancient and modern artillery. The cannon were intermingled with the mechanical engines for casting stones and darts; the bull and the hattering ram were directed against the same walls; nor had the discovery of gunpowder surpassed the use of the liquid and unextinguishable fire.

A wooden turret of the largest size was advanced on rollers: this portable magazine of ammunition and fascines was protected by a thousand covering of bulls' hides; incessant volleys were securely discharged from the loop-holes; in the front, three doors were contrived for the alternate sally and retreat of the soldiers and workmen. They ceased for the upper platform, and, as high as the level of that platform, a scaling-ladder could be raised by pulleys to form a bridge, and grapple with the adverse rampart. By these various arts of annoyance, some as new as they were pernicious to the Greeks, the tower of St. Romanus was at length overturned; after a severe struggle the Turks were repulsed from the breach, and interrupted by darkness; but they trusted, that with the return of light they should renew the attack with fresh vigour and decisive success. Of this pause of action, this interval of hope, each moment was improved by the activity of the emperor and Justinian, who passed the night on the spot, and urged the labours which involved the safety of the church and city. At the dawn of day, the impetuous salluit parcellere, with astonishment and grief, that his wooden turret had been reduced to ashes; the ditch was cleared and restocked, and that of St. Romanus was again strong and entire. He deplored the failure of his troops, and uttered a profound exclamation, that the word of the thirty-seven thousand prophets should not have compelled him to believe that such a work, in so short a time, could have been accomplished by the infidels.

The generality of the christians thereby assumed the victory of four ships.

But the first apprehension of a siege, Constantinople had negotiated, in the isles of the Archipelago, the Morea, and Sicily, the most indefensible supplies. As early as the beginning of April, five great ships, equipped and manned by skilful mariners, arrived at the harbour of Chios, and not the wind blown obstinately from the north. One of these ships bore the imperial flag; the remaining four belonged to the Genoese; and they were laden with wheat and barley, with wine, oil, and vegetables, and, above all, with soldiers and mariners, for the service of the capital. After a tedious delay, a gentle breeze, and on the second day, a strong gale from the south, carried them through the Hellespont and the Propontis: but the city was already invested by sea and land; and the Turkish fleet at the entrance of the archipelago, was stretched from shore to shore, in the form of a crescent, at least to repel, these bold auxiliaries. The reader who has present to his mind the geographical picture of Constantinople, will conceive and admire the greatness of the spectacle. The five christian ships conversing with the enemy, and the whole armament, both of sails and oars, against an hostile fleet of three hundred vessels; and the rampart, the camp, the coasts of Europe and Asia, were lined with innumerable spectators, who anxiously awaited the event of this momentous success. At the first view that event could not be other than the demolition of the genoese, for their force was beyond all measure or account; and in a calm, their numbers and valour must inevitably have prevailed. But their hasty and imperfect navy had been created, not by the genius of the people, but by the will of the sultan; in the height of their prosperity, the Turks have acknowledged, that if God had given them the earth, he had left the sea to the infidels; and a series of defeats, a rapid progress of decay, has established the truth of their modest confession. Except eighteen galleys of some force, the rest of their fleet consisted of open boats, rudely constructed and awkwardly manned. Two of them were destitute of cannon; and since courage arises in a great measure from the consciousness of strength, the bravest of the janizaries might tremble on a new element. In the christian squadron, five stout and lofty ships were guided by skilful pilots, and manned with the veterans of Italy and Greece, long practised in the arts and perils of the sea. Their weight was directed to sink or scatter the weak obstacles that impeded their passage; their artillery swept the waters: their liquid fire was poured on the heads of their adversaries, who, with the design of boarding, presumed to approach them; and the winds and waves are always on the side of the ablest navigators. In this conflict, the imperial vessel, which had been almost overpowerd, was rescued by the Genoese; but the Turks, in a distant and closer attack, were twice repulsed with considerable loss. Mahomet himself sat on horse-back on the beach, to encourage their valour by his voice and 4 His number is not given, but he was probably that of a gale, who landed from the same ships to Freidrich III. commanded the emperor of the east and west.

5 I am inclined to, or, rather in ignorance, of language and geography, the president General de Vaux at Athens with a south, and sailing towards Constantinople with a north, on his return.

6 I have selected some curious facts, without striving to emulate the breadth and obstrac detail of the Kondé de Vertot, in his geo-

7 The first theory of mines with gunpowder appears in 1322, in a LIV. of George of Scena, Chicago, 1810, p. 1, a. 1, p. 234. They were first practised at Saracenbre, in 1457; but the honours and im-

8 The perpetual decay and weakness of the Turkish navy may be perceived, in the above-mentioned passage of the Kondé de Vertot, and in two other works, Tho-venel, (Courroye, p. 1, p. 232—234, and) Tott (Mesmer, ton 16.) the last of whom is always adroit to abuse and amaze his reader.
presence, by the promise of reward, and by fear, more painful than the terror of the enemy. The passions of his soul, and even the gestures of his body, seemed to imitate the motions of the combatants; and, as if he had joined the band of nature, he was led, by a furious and impetuous spirit, into the sea. His loud reproaches, and the clamours of the camp, urged the Ottomans to a third attack, more fatal and bloody than the two former; and I must repeat, though I cannot credit, the evidence of Phrarna, who affirms, from their own mouth, that they had also attacked the walls of Palæstina, and the tower of the day. They fled in disorder to the shores of Asia and Europe, while the Christian squadron, triumphant and unalarmed, steered along the Bosphorus, and securely anchored within the chain of the harbour. In the confidence of victory, they boasted that the whole Turkish power must yield to their arms; but the admiral, or captain bashaw, found some consolation for a wounded pain in his eye, by representing that accident as the cause of his defeat. Bulha Oghi was a renegade of the race of the Bulgarian princes; his military character is obscured by the plain, as the light of the sun, and under the despotism of the prince or people, misfortunes are a sufficient evidence of guilt. His rank and services were annihilated by the displeasure of Mahomet. In the royal presence, the captain bashaw was extended on the ground by four slaves, and received the bastinado, or heavy blow with the rod, as death had been pronounced; and he adored the clemency of the sultan, who was satisfied with the milder punishment of confiscation and exile. The introduction of this supply revived the hopes of the Greeks and secured the supineness of their western allies. Amidst the deserts of Anatolia and the rocks of Palæstina, the millions of the crusades had buried themselves in a voluntary and inevitable grave; but the situation of the imperial city was strong against her enemies, and accessible to her friends; and a rational and moderate armament of the maritime states might have saved the relics of the Roman name, and maintained a christian fortress in the heart of the Ottoman empire. Yet this was the sole and feasible attempt for the deliverance of Constantinople; the more distant powers were insensible of its danger; and the ambassador of Hungary, or at least of Hunaudes, resided in the Turkish court, near the ears, and to direct the operations of the sultan.

Mahomet transports his navy over land. The Greeks are persuaded, that a resistance, so obstinate and surprising, had fatigued the perseverance of Mahomet; and, united with the Greeks, were unable to maintain the siege, and the sultan, in order to avoid the perils of advice of Calî Bashaw, who still maintained a secret correspondence with the Byzantine court. The reduction of the city appeared to be inevitable, unless a double attack could be made from the harbour as well as from the land: but the harbour was inaccessible; an impenetrable chain was now defended by eight large ships, more than twenty of a smaller size, with several galleys and sloops; and the632 Greeks apprehended a naval sally, and a second encounter in the open sea. In this perplexity, the genius of Mahomet conceived and executed a plan of a bold and marvellous cast, of transporting by land his lighter vessels and military stores from the Bosphorus into the higher part of the harbour. The distance is about ten miles; the ground is uneven, and was overspread with thistles; and, as the ground must be cleared before the suburb of Galata, their free passage or total destruction must depend on the opinion of the Genoese. But these selfish merchants were ambitious of the favour of being the last devoured; and the deficiency of art was supplied by the strength of obedient myriads, kept in a level way by a broad platform of strong and solid planks; and the road became slippery and smooth, they were anointed with the fat of sheep and oxen. Fourscore light galleys and brigantines of fifty and thirty oars, were disembarked on the Bosphorus shore; arranged successively on rollers; and drawn forwards by the power of oxen and pulleys. Two guides or pilots were stationed at the helm, and the prow, of each vessel; the sails were unfurled to the winds; and the labour was cheered by song and acclamation. In the course of a single night, this Turkish fleet painfully climbed the hill, steered from the depths of the Bosphorus, into the shallow waters of the harbour, far above the molestation of the deeper vessels of the Greeks. The real importance of this operation was magnified by the consternation and confidence which it inspired: but the notorious, unquestionable fact was displayed beyond the city, and by the Turks themselves. A similar stratagem had been repeatedly practised by the ancients; the Ottoman galleys (I must again repeat) should be considered as large boats; and, if we compare the magnitude and the distance, the obstacles and the means, the boasted miracle has perhaps been equalled by the industry of our times.

As soon as Mahomet had occupied the upper harbour with a fleet and army, he constructed, in the narrowest part, a bridge, or rather mole, of fifty cubits in breadth, and one hundred in length; it was formed of casks and logsheads; joined with rafter, linked with iron, and covered with a solid floor. On this floating battery, he planted one of his largest cannon, while the fourscore galleys, with troops and scaling-ladders, approached the most accessible side, which had formerly been stormed by the Latin conquerors. The boldness of the christians has been accused for not destroying them diminished with the fire, by a superior fire, was controlled and silenced; nor were they wanting in a nocturnal attempt to burn the vessels as well as the bridge of the sultan. His vigilance prevented their approach; their foremost galleys were sunk or taken; forty youths, the bravest of Italy and the doughtyest of the Greeks, were humanly massacred at his command; nor could the emperor's grief be assuaged by the just though cruel retaliation, of exposing from the walls the heads of two hundred and sixty musulman captives. After a siege of forty days, the distress of the fate of Constantinople could no longer be averted. The diminutive garrison was exhausted by a double attack; the fortifications, which had stood for ages against hostile violence, were dismantled on all sides by the Ottoman cannon; many breaches were opened; and near the gate of S. Romano, four towers and a large wall had been levelled; but the gait of the increase of his fame, his fear and notitious of the Maceim, had been previously destroyed. The Bosphorus was so finished with fire, that the bridge was burnt, and the galleys sank. The Venetians, who confesses himself ill informed of the affairs of Greece, and a decided opponent of Mahomet, had been the chief of his enemies; they would be the term of the Turkish conquerors. See Phrarna (I. iii. p. 25) and Spinola.
пelled to despoil the churches with the promise of a fourfold restitution; and his sacerdote offered a new reproof to the enemies of the union. A spirit of discord impaired the remnant of the christian strength:
the Genoese and Venetian auxiliaries asserted the procedure of the church, and Justininiani and the great duke, whose ambition was not extinguished by the common danger, accused each other of treachery and cowardice.

Preparations of the Turk for the general assault.

May 25.

During the siege of Constantinople, the words of peace and capitulation had been solemnly pronounced by land and sea; embassies had passed between the camp and the city. The Greek emperor was humbled by adversity; and would have yielded to any terms compatible with religion and royalty. The Turkish sultan was designed of sparing the blood of his soldiers still more desirous of securing for his own use the Byzantine treasures; and he accomplished a sacred duty in presenting to the gabbors the choice of circumcision, of tribute, or of death. The avarice of Mahomet might have been satisfied with an annual sum of one hundred thousand ducats; but his ambition grasped the capital of the east: for the prince, by offered a rich equivalent, to the people a free toleration, or a safe departure: but after some fruitless program, he declared his resolution of finding either a throne, or a grave, under the walls of Constantinople.
A sense of honour, and the fear of universal reproach, forced him to resign the siege, and to withdraw the army of the Ottomans; and he determined to abide the last extremities of war. Several days were employed by the sultan in the preparations for the assault; and a respite was granted by his favourite science of astrology, which he fixed on the twenty-ninth of May, as the day for a forlorn and fatal hour. On the evening of the twenty-seventh, he issued his final orders; assembled in his presence the military chiefs; and dispersed his heralds through the camp to proclaim the duty, and the motives, of the perilous enterprise. Fear is the first principle of a despotic government; and his menaces were expressed in the oriental style, that the fi-gitives and deserters, had they the wings of a bird,5 should not escape from his inexorable justice. The greatest part of his bashaws and janizaries were the offspring of christian parents: but the glories of the Turk were more considered than the perpetual oppresion; and in the gradual change of individuals, the spirit of a legion, a regiment, or an odo, is kept alive by imitation and discipline. In this holy warfare, the Moslems were exhorted to purify their minds with prayer, their bodies with seven ablutions; and to abstain from food till the close of the ensuing day. A crowd of dervishes visited the tents, to instil the desire of martyrdom, and the assurance of spending an immortal youth amidst the rivers and gardens of paradise, and in the embraces of the black-eyed virgins.
Yet Mahomet principally trusted to the efficacy of Republican and visible rewards. A considerable pay was promised to the victorious troops; "The city and the buildings," said Mahomet, "are mine; but I resign to your valour the captives and the spoil, the treasures of gold and beauty; be rich and be happy. Many are the provinces of my empire; the intrepid soldier who first ascend the walls of Constantinople, shall be rewarded with provinces, and the sultan's daughter; and Mahomet is the apostle of God;"6 and the sea and land, from Galatia to the seven towers, were illuminated by the blaze of their nocturnal fires.
Far different was the state of the Last farewell of Christian kings; who, with loud and impo-tant commands, dispersed their fleets, or the Greeks, the punishment, of their sins. The celestial image of the Virgin had been exposed in solemn procession;
but their divine patroness was deaf to their entreaties;
they accused the obstinacy of the emperor for refusing a timely surrender; anticipated the horrors of their conquerors; and threatened the prince with ish servitude. The noblest of the Greeks, and the bravest of the allies, were summoned to the palace, to prepare them, on the evening of the twenty-eighth, for the duties and dangers of the general assault. The last speech of Palaeologus was the funeral oration of the empire. He descended from the throne of his father; But the example of his prince, and the comiment of a siege, had armed these warriors with the courage of despair, and the pathetic scene is described by the feelings of the historian Phranza, who was himself present at this mournful assembly. They went, they embraced; regardless of their families and fortunes, they devoted their lives; and each commander, departing to his station, maintained all night a vigilant and anxious watch on the rampart. The emperor, and some faithful companions, entered the dome of St.
Sophia; which in a few hours was to be converted into a mosque; and devoutly drank a cup of wine, in remembrance of the battle of the Fritze, and of the prayers, the sacrament of the holy communion. He reposed some moments in the palace, which resounded with cries and lamentations; solicited the pardon of all whom he might have injured; and mounted on horseback to visit the guards, and explore the motions of the besiegers. The distraction and fall of the last Constantine are more glorious than the long prosperity of the Byzantine Caesars.
In the confusion of darkness an assail-

1 Chalcondyles and Ducas differ in the time and circumstances of the revolution; and as it was neither glorious nor salutary, the faithful Phranza spares his prince even the thought of a surrender.

2 See account of the twenty-eighth, of May, in the years.

3 The imperial revenue and expenditure at that time are not known, but the value of the land and sea was assessed at an annual produce of 2,000,000 ducats.

4 The beacon at the的距离 of the empire was lighted on the twenty-seventh of May.

5 Sented by the emperor, in the tents of the janizaries.

6 It was the custom for the janizaries to address Mahomet with the expression, 'God be merciful unto his servant.'
silence was enjoined: but the physical laws of motion and sound are not obedient to discipline or fear; each individual might suppress his voice and measure his footsteps; but the march himself, a common, inevitable produce a strange confusion of disjointed clamours, which reached the ears of the watchmen of the towers. At day-break, without the customary signal of the morning gun, the Turks assaulted the city by sea and land; and the simultaneity of a twined or twisted thread has been applied to the cleanness and continuity of their line of attack. The foremost ranks consisted of the refuse of the host, a voluntary crowd who fought without order or command; of the feebleness of age or childhood, of peasants and valets, and of all who had joined the camp in the blind hope of plunder and martyrdom. The common impulse drove them onwards to the wall: the most audacious to climb were instantly precipitated; and not a dart, not a bullet, of the Christians was idly wasted on the accumulated throng. But their strength and unammonition were exhausted in this laborsious defence; the ditch was filled with the bodies of the slain; they supported the footsteps of their companions; and of this devoted vanguard, the death was more serviceable than the life. Under their respective bashaws and sanjaks, the troops of Anatolia and Romania were successively led to the charge: their progress was valiant. But the sultan himself, on horseback, with an iron mace in his hand, was the spectator and judge of their valor: he was surrounded by ten thousand of his domestic troops, whom he reserved for the decisive occasions; and the tide of battle was directed and impelled by him. His numerous ministers of justice were posted behind the line, to urge, to restrain, and to punish: and if danger was in the front, shame and inevitable death were in the rear, of the fugitives. The cries of fear and of pain were drowned in the martial music of drums, trumpets, and tabalbs; and experience has proved, that the mechanical operation of sounds, by quickening the circulation of the blood and spirits, will act on the human machine more forcibly than the eloquence of reason and honor. From the lines, the galleys, and the bridge, the Ottoman artillerie thundered on all sides; and the camp and the city were enveloped in a cloud of smoke, which could only be dispelled by the final deliverance or destruction of the Roman empire. The single combats of the heroes of history or fable amuse our fancy and engage our affections; the skilful evolutions of war may inform the mind, and improve a necessary, though pernicious, science. But in the uniform and odious pictures of a general assault, all is blood, and horror, and confusion; nor shall I strive, at the distance of three centuries and a thousand miles, to delineate a scene of which there could be no spectators, and of which the beholders were incapable of forming any just or adequate idea.

The immediate loss of Constantinople may be ascribed to the bullet, or arrow, which pierced the gauntlet of John Justiniani. The sight of his blood, and the exquisite pain, appalled the courage of the chief; whose ancient and habitual dread of the Turks still retained its power. As he withdrew from his station in quest of a surgeon, his flight was perceived and stopped by the indefatigable emperor. "Your wound," exclaimed Palæologus, "is slight; the danger is pressing; your presence is necessary; and whether you will retire or not, I will retire," said the trembling Genoese, by the same road which God has opened to the Turks;" and at these words hastily passed through one of the breaches of the inner wall. By this perilsimilid act, he stained his own with the honours of his soil and life; and the few days which he survived in Galata, or the island of Conch, were embittered by his own and the public reproach. His example was imitated by the greatest part of the Latin auxiliaries, and the defence began to slacken when the attack was pressed with redoubled vigour. The number of the Christians was fifty thousand, and their hundred, times superior to that of the christians; the double walls were reduced by the cannon to a heap of ruins: in a circuit of several miles, some places must be found more easy of access, or more feebly guarded; and if the besiegers could penetrate in a single point, the whole city was irrecoverable. The first who defended the sultan's reward was Hassan the janizary, of gigantic stature and strength. With his scimitar in one hand and his buckler in the other, he ascended the outward fortification: of the thirty janizaries, who were emulous of his valor, eighteen perished in the bold advance. Hassan and his twelve companions reached the summit; the giant was precipitated from the rampart; he rose on one knee, and was again oppressed by a shower of darts and stones. But his success had proved that the achievement was possible: the walls and towers were instantly covered with a swarm of Turks; and the Greek and Latin walls, of seven hundred, were overthrown by increasing multitudes. Amidst these multitudes, the emperor, who accomplished all the duties of a general and a soldier, was long seen and finally lost. The nobles, who fought round his person, sustained, till their last breath, the honourable names of Palæologus and Cane-taucene. His mournful exclamation was heard, "Can there he found a christian to cut off my head?" and his last fear was that of falling alive into the hands of the infidels. The prudent despair of Constantinople, the last vestige of the ancient empire. Deatb of the emperor: the tumult he fell by an unknown hand, before Constantinople was buried under a mound, the Palæologian ancestral seat of the sultan. After his death, resistance and order were not more: the Greeks fled towards the city; and many were pressed and stifled in the narrow pass of the gate of Phanar, the gate of St. John, the gate of the city of the Greeks. The victors acknowledged, that they should immediately have given quarter if the value of the emperor and his chosen bands had not prepared them for a similar opposition in every part of the capital. It was thus, after a siege of fifty-three days, that Constant: the city, which had defied the powers of 1.

---

1. Besides the 10,000 guards, and the sailors and the marines, Duca numbers in this general assault 30,000 Turks, both horse and foot. Vol. II. 3 H

2. In the severe censure of the flight of Justinian, Pranenza expresses his own feelings and those of the public. For some private reasons, he was treated with levity and ridicule by the more tragic events of later history: but the words of Leonardo Chinibis express his strong and recent indignation, greey sultan empires. In the whole breadth of their common policy, their countrinmen, the Genoese, were always suspected, and often guilty.

3. Death kills him with two blows of Turkish soldiers; Chalcondyles wounds him in the shoulder, and then tramples him in the ground. The grief of Phanemac carries him among his enemies, cæsures from the precise image of his death; but we may, without flattering, apply these noble lines of Dryden, to the whole fatal event:

As to Sebastian, let them search the field, And where they find a mountain of the slain, Send out one of their choosing, to find Sebastian. There they will find him at his maimed length, With his face upon heaven, in the red monument. Which his sad sword had sixed.
ably subdued by the arms of Mahomet the second. Her empire had only been subverted by the Latins; her religion was trampled in the dust by the Moslem conquerors.

The altars were ordered to be burnt and the pillar Constantine, the more distant quarters might prolong, some moments, the happy ignorance of their ruin.  But in the general consternation, in the feelings of selfish or social anxiety, in the tumult and thunder of the assault, a sleepless night and morning must have elapsed; nor can I believe that many Greeks then were awakened by the jinglings of a bell and the shrilling of a siren. We should then most likely have observed a scene which we had so lately abhorred as a profane and polluted edifice. Their confidence was founded on the prophecy of an enthusiast or impostor; that one day the Turks should enter Constantinople, and pursue the Romans as far as the column of Constantine in the square before St. Sophia; but that this would be the term of their calamities: that an angel would descend from heaven, with a scimitar in his hand, and would deliver the empire, with that celestial weapon, to a poor man seated at the foot of the column. “Take this sword,” would he say, “and avenge the people of the land for these unfortunate words, the Turks would instantly fly, and the victorious Romans would drive them from the west, and from all Anatolia, as far as the frontiers of Persia. It is on this occasion, that Ducas, with some fancy and much truth, upbraids the discord and obstinacy of the Greeks. “Had that angel appeared,” exclaims the historian, “had he offered to exterminate your faces if you would consent to the union of the church, even then, in that fatal moment, you would have rejected your safety, or have deceived your God.”

Captured by the Turks, the tall and proud, the tarry angel, the doors were broken with axes; and as the Turks encountered no resistance, their bloodless hands were employed in selecting and securing the multitude of their prisoners. Youth, beauty, and the appearance of wealth, attracted their choice; and the right of property was decided among themselves by a prior seizure, by personal strength, and by the authority of command. In the space of an hour, the male captives were bound with cords, the females with their veils and girdles. The senators were linked with their slaves; the prelates, with the porters, of the church; and young men of a plebeian class, with noble maids, whose faces had been invisible to the sun and their nearest kindred. In this common captivity, the ranks of society were confounded; the ties of nature were cut asunder; and the inexorable soldier was careless of the father’s groans, the tears of the mother, and the lamentations of the children. The loudest in their wailings were the wags, who were torn from the altar, with naked descries, and their long and dishevelled hair: and we should piously believe that few could be tempted to prefer the vigils of the harem to those of the monastery. Of these unfortunate Greeks, of these domestic animals, whose whole strings were rudely driven through the streets; and as the conquerors were not only eager to return for more prey, their trembling gait was quickened with menaces and blows. At the same hour, a similar rapine was exercised in all the churches and monasteries, in all the palaces and habitations of the capital; nor could any palace, however sacred or sequestered, protect the persons or the property of the Greeks. Amongst the multitude of this devoted people were transported from the city to the camp and fleet; exchanged or sold according to the caprice or interest of their masters, and dispersed in remote servitude through the provinces of the Ottoman empire. Among these we may enumerate the remarkable characters, with the Turkish Paranza, first chamberlain and principal secretary, was involved with his family in the common lot. After suffering four months the hardships of slavery, he recovered his freedom; in the ensuing winter he ventured to Adrianople, and ransomed his wife from the mir insomuch as he could procure a horse; and the flower of youth and beauty, had been seized for the use of Mahomet himself. The daughter of Paranza died in the seraglio, perhaps a virgin; his son, in the fifteenth year of his age, preferred death to infamy, and was subdued by the hand of the royal lovers. A deed thus inhuman cannot surely be expiated by the taste and liberality with which he released a Grecian matron and her two daughters, on receiving a Latin ode from Philo- lepous, who had chosen a wife in that noble family. The pride or cruelty of Mahomet would have been most capricious. The Latins of the first generation, but the dexterity of cardinal Iliodore eluded the search, and he escaped from Galatia in a plebeian habit. The chain and entrance of the outward harbour was still occupied by the Italian ships of merchandise and war. They had signalized their valour in the siege; they embraced the moment of retreat, while the Turkish maimers were dissipated in the pilage of the city. When they hoisted sail, the beach was covered with a suppliant and lamentable crowd; but the means of transportation were scanty: the Venetians and Genoese were struck with fear of selection by the Turks. The fairest promises of the sultan, the inhabitants of Galatsia evacuated their houses, and embarked with their most precious effects. In the fall and the sack of great cities, the history is crowded to repeat the same tale of uniform calamity: the same effects must be produced by the same passion; and when those passions may be indulged without control, small, alas! is the difference between civilized and savage man. Amidst the vague exclamations of bigotry and hatred, the Turks are not accused of a wanton or immediate effusion of christian blood: but according to their maxims, (the maxims of antiquity,) the lives of the vanquished were forfeited; and the legitimate reward of the conqueror was derived from the service, the sale, or the ransom, of his captives of both sexes. The temple of Minerva, which had been granted by the sultan to his victorious troops; and the capture of an hour is more productive than the industry of years. But as no regular division was attempted of the spoil, the respective shares were not determined by merit; and the rewards of valor were stolen away by the first crews of the victors, till all were at toll. But danger of the battle. The narrative of their depredations could not afford either amusement or instruction: the total amount, in the least poverty of the empire, has been valued at four millions of ducats; and of this sum a small part was the property of the Venetian republic. But of the female followers of St. Sophia, of which these foreigner, the stock was improved in quick and perpetual circulation: but the riches of the Greeks were displayed in the idle ostentation of palaces and wardrobes, or deeply buried in treasures of ingots and old coin, lest it should be demanded at their hands for the defence of their country. The profanation and plunder of the monasteries and churches, excites the most tragic raptures. The dome of St. Sophis itself, the earthly heaven, the second firmament, the vehicle of the cherubim, the throne of the glory of God, was despoiled of the crown of the sun, the moon, and the stars, the vases and jewels, the vases and sacerdotal ornaments, were most wickedly converted to the service of mankind. After the divine images had been stripped of all that could be valuable to a profane eye, the canvass, or the wood, was torn, or broken, or burnt, or trod under foot, or applied, as a matter of amusement, to the vilest uses. The example of sacrilege was imitated, however, from the Latin conquerors of Constantinople; and the treatment which Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, had sustained from the guilty catholic, might be inflicted by the zealous Mussulman on the mono- gnostic idolatries of the Grecian palace; and perhaps, in public clamour, a philosopher will observe, that in the decline of the arts, the workmanship could not be more valuable than the work, and that a fresh supply of visions and miracles would speedily be renewed by the craft of the priest and the credulity of the people. He will more seriously deplore the loss of the Byzantine libraries, which were destroyed or scattered in the general confusion: one hundred and twenty thousand manuscripts are said to have disappeared; ten volumes might be purchased for a single ducat; and the text of the sacred books, though in a high degree preserved on the shelf of the churches, included the whole works of Aristotle and Homer, the noblest productions of the science and literature of ancient Greece. We may reflect with pleasure, that an inestimable portion of our classic treasures was safely deposited in Italy; and that the mechanics of a German town had invented an art which deprives the haven of time and barbarism.

From the first hour of the memorable visit to the city, St. Sophia, the Palaces, &c., the eight hour of the same day; when the sultan himself passed in triumph through the gates of St. Romanus. He was attended by his vizirs, bailiffs, and guards, each of whom (says a Byzantine historian) was robust as Hercules, dexterous as Apollo, and equal in battle to any ten of the race of ordinary mortals. The conqueror gazed with satisfaction and wonder on the strange though splendid appearance of the domes and pinnacles, and the prismatic windows of the principal door of St. Sophis, he alighted from his horse, and entered the dome; and such was his jealous regard for that monument of his glory, that on observing a zealous Mussulman in the act of breaking the wall, he instantly exclaimed to his sultan, and Mahomed the second performed the namaz of prayer and thanksgiving on the great altar, where the Christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Caesars. From St. Sophia he proceeded to the august, but desolate, mansion, of a hundred and twenty thousand, of which the walls were thrown down; and the walls, which were covered with images and mosaic, were washed and purified, and restored to a state of naked simplicity. On the day, or on the ensuing Friday, the muzcin, or crier, ascended the most lofty turret, and proclaimed the ezan, or public cry, to the effect that the invader in his new dominion preached; and Mahomed the second performed the namaz of prayer and thanksgiving on the great altar, where the Christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Caesars.

Yet his mind was not satisfied, nor his behaviour did the victory seem complete, till he to the Greeks, was informed of the fate of Constantine; whether he had escaped, or been made prisoner, or had fallen in the battle. Two janizaries claimed the honour and reward of his death: the body, under a heap of slain, was discovered by the golden eagles embroidered on his shoes; the Greeks acknowledged with tears the head of their late emperor; and, after exposing the bloody trophy, I Musulman or Turkish, was buried with all the honours of a decent funeral. After his decease, Lucas Notaras, great duke, and first minister of the empire, was the most important prisoner. When he offered his person and treasures at the foot of the throne, "And why," said the insignant sultan, "did you not employ these treasures in the defence of your prince and country?" "They were yours," answered the slave; "God had reserved them for your hands," "If he reserved them for me," replied the despot, "how have you presumed to withhold them so long by a fruitless and fatal resistance?" The great duke alleged the obstinacy of the strangers, and some secret encouragement from the Turkish vizir; and from this penurious interview, he withdrew lengthened disbursements of private money and protection. Mahomet condescended to visit his wife, a venerable princess oppressed with sickness and grief; his consolation for her misfortunes was in the most tender strain of humanity and filial reverence.

A similar clemency was extended to the principal officers of state, of whom several were ransomed at his expense; and during some days he declared himself the friend and father of the vanquished people. But the scene was soon changed; and before his departure, the hippodrome streamed with the blood of his enemies. His punishment was perpetrated by the Christians; they adorn with the colours of heroic martyrdom the execution of the great duke and his two sons; and his death is ascribed to the generous refusal of delivering his children to the tyrant's last. Yet a Byzantine historian has dropped an unguarded sentence of conspiracy, deliverance, and Italian succour; such treason may be glorious; but the rebel who bravely ventures, has justly forti-fied his life; nor should we blame a conqueror for destroying the enemies whom he can no longer trust. On the eighteenth of June, the victorious sultan returned to the seat of his administration, and entered the embassies of the Christian princes, who viewed their approaching ruin in the fall of the eastern empire.

Constantineople had been left naked and adores Constantinople. But she could not be despised in the incomparable situation which marks her for the metropolis of a great empire; and the genius of the place will ever triumph over the accidents of time and fortune. Bursa and Adrianople, the ancient seats of the Ottomans, sunk into provincial towns; and Mahomet the second established his residence, and that of his successors, on the same commanding spot which had been chosen by Constantine. The fortifications of Galata, which might afford a shelter to the Latins, were prudently destroyed; but the damage of the Turkish cannon was soon repaired; and before the month of August, great quantities of time had been burnt for the restoration of the walls of the capital. As the entire property of the soil and buildings, whether public or private, or profane or sacred, was now transferred to the conqueror, he first separated a space of ground from the site of the mosque to the triangle for the establishment of his sarcophagus and palace, or the bosom of luxury, that the grand signor (as he has been emphatically named by the Italians) appears to reign over Europe and Asia; but his person on the shores of the Bosphorus may not always secure from the insults of a hostile navy. In the new character of a mosque, the cathedral of St. Sophia was endowed with an ample revenue, crowned with lofty minarets, and surrounded with groves and fountains, for the devotion and refreshment of the Moslems. The same model was imitated in the jami or royal mosques and the first of these was built, by Mahomet himself, on the ruins of the church of the holy apostles, and the tombs of the Greek emperors. On the third day after the conquest, the grave of Abu Aby, or Job, who had fallen in the first siege of the Arabs, was revealed in a vision; and it is before the sepulchre of the martyr, that the new sultans are girded with the sword of empire. Constantinople no longer appertains to the Roman historian; nor shall the civil and religious edifices that were profaned or erected by its Turkish masters; the population was speedily renewed; and many of the prince's families of Anatolia and Romania had obeyed the royal mandate, which enjoined them, under pain of death, to occupy their new habitations in the capital. The throne of Mahomet was guarded by the numbers and fidelity of his Moslem subjects; but his rational policy appeared as the result of the Greeks; and they returned in crowds, as soon as they were assured of their lives, and liberties, and the free exercise of their religion. In the election and investiture of a patriarch, the ceremonial of the Byzantine court was revived and the cabinet, by the exercise of satisfaction and honour, they beheld the sultan on his throne; who delivered into the hands of Gennadius the cross or pastoral staff, the symbol of his ecclesiastical office; who conducted the patriarch to the gate of the seraglio, presented him with a horse-richly caparisoned, and directed his horse, which has reigned in Constantinople, to the palace which had been allotted for his residence. The churches of Constantinople were shared between the two religions: their limits were marked; and, till it was infringed by Selim, the grandson of Mahomet, the Greeks enjoyed above sixty years the benefit of this civil peace, and the peculiar advantages of the Christian, who wished to clude the fanaticism of the sultan. The Christian advocates presumed to allege that this division had been an act, not of generosity, but of justice; not a concession, but a compact; and that if one half of the city had been taken by storm, the其余uality had surrendered on the faith of a sacred capitulation. The original grant had indeed been consumed by fire; but the loss was supplied by the testimony of three aged janizaries who remembered the transaction; and their vocal oaths are of more weight in the opinion of Castanier, than the positive and unanimous consent of the history of the times.

The remaining fragments of the Greek empire, the extinction of the kingdom in Europe and Asia I shall imperial families abandon to the Turkish arms; but the history of Palaeologus and the final extinction of the two last dynasties, which have reigned in Constantinople, should terminate the decline and fall of the Roman empire in the east. The despos of the Morea, Demetrios and Thomas, the two surviving brothers of the name of Palaeologus, were astonished by the death of the emperor Constantine, and the ruins of their dominions. It then occurred to the able Greeks who adhered to their fortune, to seek a refuge in Italy, beyond the reach of the Ottoman thunder. Their first apprehensions were dispelled by the victorious sultan, who contented himself with a tribute of twelve thousand ducats; and while his ambition

---

1. For the restoration of Constantinople and the Turkish foundations, see Leunclavius, (p. 102-103) Du Chesne, (p. 42) Thiroux, Toumfort, and the rest of our modern travellers. From a gigantic plate of the city, in the Constantinople, of the Western Ottoman empire, (Abbe de l'Hoeuvre, Constantinopole, (Paris, 16-21)) we may learn, that in the year 1556, the Moslems were less numerous in the capital than the Christians, or even the Jews.

2. The Turks, or sepulchral monument of Abu Aby, is described and represented in the Tableau General de l'Empire Ottoman, Paris, 1787, in large folds, a work of lost use; perhaps, than magnificence, (tom. i, p. 266, 267).

3. Pharamaz (l. iii. c. 19) relates the ceremony, which has possibly been adumbrated in the Greek reports to each other, and to the Latins. The fact is confirmed by Emmanuel Matarus, who, in vulgar Greek, the History of the Patriarchs after the taking of Constantinople, inscribed (in the Turco-Grecia of Cosm, fl. c. 100, 101) that the most patient reader will not believe that Mahomet adopted the catholic form, "Suae Tribunos quae nulli donavit imperium in patriarchar- rum" (Constaniopoli, A. D. 1453, qui in splendidissima, (p. 107) of the Patriarch, and the Moslem conqueror, by the Turkish Annals of Levantins Affirms, withou" exception, that Mahomet took Constantinople per rim, (p. 209.)

4. The account of the conquest may be turned to curious times, who would not have beaten the honourable and salutary essay. Venetian authority; but since the Turks have taken over the Greek orders, the former is more esteemed, because it is esteemed more honourable to take a city by force than by imposition. The revolution is a subject, which I doubt, in this country, to any purpose, to the civil and pastorial church, and the Turcish Annals of Levantins, affirms, without exception, that Mahomet took Constantinople per rim, (p. 209.) The account of the conquest may be turned to curious times, who would not have beaten the honourable and salutary essay. Venetian authority; but since the Turks have taken over the Greek orders, the former is more esteemed, because it is esteemed more honourable to take a city by force than by imposition. The revolution is a subject, which I doubt, in this country, to any purpose, to the civil and pastorial church, and the Turcish Annals of Levantins, affirms, without exception, that Mahomet took Constantinople per rim, (p. 209.)

5. For the genealogy and fall of the Comneni dynasty, see Du- scalus (Pom. Byz. 1044) (for the first Peter, the same account, (p. 214, 215, 248).) The Palæologus of Montemort were not extinct till the next century; but they had forgotten their pure Greek, original character.

6. In the worthless story of the disputes and misfortunes of the two churches, the reader will perceive that this work has passed beyond the limits of the Latin and Greek, original character.

7. For the genealogy and fall of the Comneni dynasty, see Ducalus (Pom. Byz. 1044) (for the first Peter, the same account, (p. 214, 215, 248).) The Palæologus of Montemort were not extinct till the next century; but they had forgotten their pure Greek, original character.

8. In the worthless story of the disputes and misfortunes of the two churches, the reader will perceive that this work has passed beyond the limits of the Latin and Greek, original character.
explored the continent and the islands in search of prey, he subdued the Morea in a respite of seven years. But this respite was a period of grief, discord, and misery. The lexarumia, the rampart of the three hundred thousand men of land and sea, the Albanians, a vagrant tribe of shepherds and robbers, filled the peninsula with rapine and murder; the two deserts imploded the dangerous and humiliating aid of a neighbouring bashaw; and when he had quelled the revolt, his lessons insulated the rule of their future conduct. Neither the ties of blood, nor the oaths which they repeatedly pledged in the commission and before the altar, nor the stronger pressure of necessity, could reconcile or suspend their domestic quarrels. They ravaged each other's patrimony with fire and sword; the aims and successes of the west were consumed in civil hostility; and Achban's reign was only marked by servitude and monstrosity executions. The distress and revenge of the weaker rival invoked their supreme lord; and, in the season of maturity and revenge, Mahomet declared himself the friend of Demetrius and solemnly swore to make the Morea with an irresistible force. When he had thus done, he prepared to march on the isthmus of Sparta. "You are too weak," said the sultan, "to control this turbulent province; I will take your daughter to my bed; and you shall pass the remainder of your life in security and honour." Demetrius sighed and observed: "Surely your daughter and my son; and received for his own maintenance, and that of his followers, a city in Thrace, and the adjacent isles of Imbro, Lemnos, and Samothrace. He was joined the next year by a companion of misfortune, the last of the Saracens, to whom the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, had founded a new empire on the coast of the Black sea.1 In the progress of his Anatolian conquests, Mahomet invested with a fleet and army the capital of David, who presumed to style himself emperor of Trebizond;2 and the negociation was adjourned with a truce, leading a fleet of four hundred, and ten or of Trebizond, twelve thousand soldiers. The capitulation of Trebizond was faithfully performed; and the emperor, with his family, was transported to a castle in Rossinia; but on a slight suspicion of corresponding with the Persian king, David, and the whole Comnenian race, were sacrificed to the jealousy or avarice of the conqueror. Nor could the name of father long protect the unfortunate Demetrius from exile and confiscation; his object submission moved the pity and contempt of the sultan; his followers were transplanted to Constantinople; and his poverty was exalted by a pension of fifty thousand

1 See the loss or conquest of Trebizond in Chalcod.yles, 1. ix. p. 261—295. Ducas, (c. 48.) Pharnax, (l. iii. c. 27.) and Cauterenum, (p. 16.)

2 The name of Souliot Tamareret (tom. iii. letter xvii. p. 179.) speaks of Trebi- zond as usual peoples, Paisiell, the latest and most accurate observer of the city, quotes the Saracens, (l. iii. p. 72.) and for the province, p. 33—934.) Its property and trade are perpetually disturbed by the loose thievish habits of some of the inhabitants, which 30,000 Last are commonly enclosed. (Memoire de Tutt, tom. iii. p. 16.)

3 AIonath, Bzg, prince of Sinope, or Sinoulo, was possessed (chiefly from his copper mines) of a revenue of 200,000 ducats, (Duchalz, l. iii. p. 223.) The copper of Morea, (Cattaneo de la Morale, tom. ii. p. 100.) amounts to the modern city 60,000 inhabitants. This account seems erroneous; yet it is by trading with a people that we become acquainted with their wealth and numbers.

aspers, till a monastic habit and a tardy death released Paleologus from an earthly master. It is not easy to pronounce whether the servitude of Demetrius, or the exile of his brother Thomas,3 be the most inglorious. But Mahomet, after the despot escaped to Corfu, and from thence to Italy, with his two children, Andreas and Manuel, were educated in Italy; but the eldest, contemptible to his enemies and baseborn to his friends, was degraded by the baseness of his life and marriage. A title was his sole inheritance; and that inheritance he successively sold to the kings of France and Aragon.4 During this transient prosperity, Charles the eighth was ambitious of joining the empire of the east with the kingdom of Naples: in a public festival, he assumed the appellation and the purple of Augustus; the Greeks rejoiced, and the Ottoman already trembled at the approach of the French chivalry.5 Manuel Paleologus, the second son, was tempted to turn his native country: his return might be grateful, and could not be dangerous, to the Porte; he was maintained at Constantinople in safety and ease; and an honourable train of Christians and Moslems attended him to the grave. If there be some animals of so great a nature that refuse to prostitute to a turgid state, the last of the imperial race must be ascribed to an inferior kind; he accepted from the sultan’s liberality two beautiful females; and his surviving son was lost in the habit and religion of a Turkish slave.

3 Grief and terror felt and magnified in its loss: the poet, Titus of Florence, 4 A.D. 1415. peaceable and prosperous, was disdained by the fall of the eastern empire; and the grief and terror of the Latins revived, or seemed to revive, the old enthusiasm of the crusaders. In the three countries of the west, Philip duke of Burgundy entertained, at Lisle in Flauers, an assembly of his nobles; and the pompous pages of the feast were skilfully adapted to their fancy and feelings.6 In the midst of the banquet, a gigantic Saracen entered the hall, armed as a phalanx, with a cataract, in his back: a saron in a mourning robe, the symbol of religion, was seen to issue from the castle: she de- pered her oppression, and accused the slowness of her champions; the principal herald advanced, bearing an arch with the inscription of chivalry, he presented to the duke. At this extraordinary summons, Philip, a wise and aged prince, engaged his person and powers in the holy war against the Turks; his example was imitated by the barons and knights of the assembly: they swore to God, the Virgin, the ladies, and the phcenian; and their particu- lar vows were not less extravagant than the general sanction of their oath. But the performance was depend on some future and foreign contingency; and during twelve years, till the last hour of his life, the duke of Burgundy might be scrupulously, and 4 Spandaneus (from Gobelin Comment. V. 111. 110.) relates the ar- rival and reception of the despot Thomas at Rome, (A.D. 1484, No. 3.) by an act dated, A.D. 1484, Sept. 6, and lately transmitted from the archives of the Capitol to the royal library of Paris, the despot Andrew Paleologus, reserving the Morea, and stipulating some private advantages, conveys to Charles VII, king of France, the cities of Constantinople, (A. D. 1425, No. 2.) M. de Fontenay (Momm. de l’Academie des Inscriptions, tom. iii. p. 329—375.) has published a letter of treachery, as far as which he had obtained a copy from Rome.

5 See Philippe de Comines (A. V. c. 14.) who records with pleasure the number of Greeks which he was able to raise, 63 miles of an easy navigation, eighteen days’ journey from Valens to Constantinople, the site of which he planned for a new and more ancient policy of Venice.

6 See the original feast in Oliver de la Marche, (Memoires, p. i. c. 25, 39,) with the abstract and observations of M. de Ste. Palaye, (Memoires sur la Chalcedony, tom. i. p. 139—153.) The peacock and the peahen were distinguished as royal birds.
perhaps sincerely, on the eve of his departure. Had every breast glowed with the same ardor; had the union of the Christians corresponded with their bravery; had every country, from Sweden to Naples, supplied a just proportion of cavalry and infantry, of men and means proportionate to the importance of the cause, Constantine would have been delivered, and that the Turks might have been chased beyond the Hellespont or the Euphrates. But the secretary of the emperor, who composed every epistle, and attended every meeting, Alexius Sylvius, a statesman and orator, descended from a noble line and possessed of the purest spirit and spirit of Christendom. "It is a body," says he, "without a head; a republic without laws or magistrates. The pope and the emperor may shine as lofty titles, as splendid images; but they are unable to command, and now are willing to obey: every state has a separate prince, and every prince has a separate interest. What eloquence could unite so many discordant and hostile powers under the same standard? Could they be assembled in arms, who would dare to assume the office of general? What order could be maintained? What military discipline exist? My adversaries would be such an enormous multitude! Who would understand their various languages, or direct their strange and incompatible manners? What mortal could reconcile the English with the French, Genoa with Arragon, the Germans with the natives of Hungary and Bohemia? If a war was to be made in war, they must be overthrown by the infidels; if many, by their own weight and confusion." Yet the same Alexius, when he was raised to the papal throne, under the name of Pius the second, devoted his life to the prosecution of his schemes. In the council of Mantua he excited some sparks of a false or feasible enthusiasm; but when the pontiff appeared at Aconca, to embark in person with the troops, engagements vanished in exceses; a precise day was adjourned to an indefinite term; and his effective army consisted of some German pilgrims, whom he was obliged to dissuade with inducements and alms. Regardless of futurity, his successors and the powers of Italy were involved in the schemes of present and domestic ambition; and the distance or proximity of each object determined, in their eyes, its apparent magnitude. A more educated and military discipline exist. His eye was devoted to maintain a defensive and naval war against the common enemy; and the support of Scanderbeg and his brave Albanians might have prevented the subsequent invasion of the kingdom of Naples. The siege and capture of the latter by the Turks produced a general consternation; and pope Sixtus was preparing to fly beyond the Alps, when the storm was instantly dispersed by the death of Mahomet the second, in the fifty-first year of his age. His lofty genius aspired to the conquest of Italy; he was possessed of a capital city and a capacious harbour; and the same reign might have been decorated with the trophies of the new and the ancient Rome.

CHAPTER XXX.

State of Rome from the twelfth century.—Temporal dominion of the popes.—Seditions of the city.—Political heroy of Arnold of Brescia.—Restoration of the republic.—The second conquest of Rome by Boniface VIII.—Their wars.—They are deprived of the election and presence of the pope, who returns to Aignons.—The jubile.—Noble families of Rome.—Founds of the Colonna and Ursini.

In the first ages of the decline and fall State and race of the Roman empire, our eye is in vain—beyond the Alps, bly fixed on the royal city, which had 1100-1500, given laws to the fairest portion of the globe. We contemplate her fortunes, at first with admiration, at length with pity, always with attention; and when that attention is detached from her real provinces, they are considered as so many branchlets which have been successively severed from the imperial trunk. The foundation of a second Rome on the shores of the Bosphorus, has compelled the historians of succeeding Constantines and the curious to visit the most remote countries of Europe and Asia, to explore the causes and the authors of the long decay of the Byzantine monarchy. By the conquest of Justinian, we have been recalled to the banks of the Tiber, to the deliverance of the city, the foundation of the policy was a change, or perhaps an aggravation, of service. Rome had been already stripped of her trophies, her gods, and her Caesars: nor was the Gothic dominion more inglorious and oppressive than the tyranny of the Greeks. In the eighth century of the christian era, a small group of adventurous spirits, in arms, provoked the Romans to assert their independence: their bishop became the temporal, as well as the spiritual, father of a free people; and of the western empire, which was restored by Charlemagne, the title and image still declare the singular constitution of modern Germany. The name of Rome must yet command our inviolable respect; the climate (whatever may be its influence) was no longer the same: the purity of blood had been contaminated through a thousand channels; but the venerable aspect of her ruins, and the memory of past glory, preserved a spark of the national character. The darkness of the middle ages exactly placed the fruit of the harvest not unworthy of our notice. Nor shall I dismiss the present work till I have reviewed the state and revolutions of the Roman city, which ascended under the absolute dominion of the popes, about the same time that Constantineople was enwlished by the Turkish arms.

In the beginning of the twelfth century the French, and ry the army of the first crusade, Rome German emperors were revered by the Latins, as the metre A.D. 1000-1100, polis of the world, as the throne of the pope and the emperor, who, from the eternal city, derived their title, their honors, and the right or even who's names and titles have been successively repeated in this work. The Greek heroes of Athens and the Latins were confined to the classics of a better age; and the first renditions of Procopius, Ammianus, Zonaras, &c., were improved by the learned diligence of the Germans. The whole Byzantine series (thirty-six volumes, in two octavo volumes, revised and corrected by the learned Henri/F iguier, of the press of the Louvre, with some collateral aid from Rome and Leipsic, but the Venetian edition, A.D. 1728, though cheaper and more copious, is not less inferior in correctness than in magnificence to that of Paris. The merit of the French editors is evident; but the value of Anna Comnena, Cinnamus Valesianus, &c., is enhanced by the historical notices of Charles the Fat of the Caing. His supplemental sequel, for the year 1400 and 1414, the term of the renowned Byzantines, diffuse a steady light over the darkness of the Lower Empire.

The Debon, who, with less genius than his successor Moretius, has ascertained and magnified the influence of climate, objects to himself the degeneracy of the Romans and Europeans. To the first of these examples he replies, 1. That the change is less real than apparent. 2. That the influence of climate has no effect on the spirit of its ancestors. 3. That the air, the soil, and the climate of Rome have suffered a great and visible alteration. (Reduction and improvement.)

The reader has been so long absent from Rome, that I would advise him to reconsider or review the seventh chapter, vol. ii of this history.
cise of temporal dominion. After so long an interruption, it may not be useless to repeat that the conquerors of Charlemagne and the Ostrogoths were chosen beyond the Rhine in a national diet; but that a common council of the kings of Germany and Italy, till they had passed the Alps and the Appennine, to seek their imperial crown on the banks of the Tiber. At some distance from the city, their approach was saluted by a long procession of the clergy and druids of the very most ancient churches, and the terrible emblemst of wolves and lions, of dragons and eagles, that floated in the military banners, represented the departed legions and cohorts of the republic. The royal oath to maintain the liberties of Rome was thrice reiterated, at the bridge, the gate, and on the steps of the Vatican; and the distribution of a customary donation feebly imitated the magnificence of the first Caesars. In the church of St. Peter, the coronation was performed by his successor: the voice of God was conformed with that of the people; and the public consent was declared, in the acclamations of—Long life and victory to our lord the pope! Long life and victory to the Roman and Teutonic armies. The names of Caesar and Augustus, the laws of Constantine and Justinian, the example of Charlemagne and Otto, established the supreme dominion of the emperors. They could exercise the discipline of civil and military power, which alone secures the obedience of a distant people, impatient of servitude, though perhaps incapable of freedom. Once, and once only, in his life, each emperor, with an army of Teutonic vassals, descended from the Alps. I have described the peaceful order of his entry and coronation; but that order was commonly disturbed by the clamour and sedition of the Romans, who encountered their sovereign as a foreign invader; his departure was always speedy, and often shameful; and, in the absence of a long reign, his name and image were soon effaced. The progress of independence in Germany and Italy undermined the foundations of the imperial sovereignty, and the triumph of the popes was the deliverance of Rome.

Authority of the Popes in the Reign of the Caesars. Of her two sovereigns, the emperor of Rome had the most manifest and increasing interest of conquest; but the authority of the pope was founded on the soft, though more solid, basis of opinion and habit. The removal of a foreign influence restored and endured the shepherd to his flock. Instead of the arbitrary or venal nomination of a German court, the vicar of Christ was freely chosen by the cardinals of the college, most of whom were either natives or inhabitants of the city. The applause of the magistrates and people confirmed his election; and the ecclesiastical power that was obeyed in Sweden and Britain, had been ultimately derived from the Roman church. The former emperor gave a prince, as well as a pontiff, to the capital. It was universally believed, that Constantine had invested the popes with the temporal dominion of Rome; and the boldest civilians, the most profane sceptics, were satisfied with disputing the right of the emperor and the validity of his gift. The truth of the fact, the authenticity of his donation, was deeply rooted in the ignorance and superstition of the times. The fabulous origin was lost in the real and permanent effects. The name of dominus or lord right; was inscribed on the coin of the bishops: their title was acknowledged by acclamations and proclamations of the people, and the sacred consent of the German Caesars, that they long occupied a supreme or subordinate jurisdiction over the city and patrimony of St. Peter. The reign of the popes, which gratified the prejudices, was incompatible with the liberties, of Rome; and more critical inquisitions of the power, the gratuity of a nation, whom they had rescued from the horror and oppression of the Greek tyrant. In an age of superstition, it should seem that the union of the royal and sacerdotal characters would mutually fortify each other; and that the keys of paradise would be the surest pledge of earthly obedience. The sanctity of the office might indeed be degraded by the personal vices of the man; but the vicar of Rome derived the greatest part of their subsistence and riches. The fixed revenue of the popes was probably increased; many of the patrimonial estates, both in Italy and in the provinces, had been invaded by sacrilegious hands; nor could the loss be compensated by the claim, rather than the possession, of the more ample gifts of Pepin and his descendants. But the Vatican and Capitol were nourished by the income of the original donation, the patrimonial fund, the wealth of the clergy; the pate of christianity was enlarged, and the pope and cardinals were overwhelmed by the judgment of ecclesiastical and secular causes. A new jurisprudence had established in the Latin church the right and practice of appeals; and from the north and west, the bishops and abbots were invited or summoned to solicit, to complain, to accuse, or to justify, before the tribunal of the apostles. A rare prodigy is once recorded, that two horses belonging to the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, repassed the Alps, yet remained with gold and silver; but it was soon understood, that the new edict of the ecclesiastical courts, and the discovery of the frauds, had diminished much less on the justice of their 1See Ducange, Glèse, mediae et infimae Latinitatis, tom vi, p. 364. ---Stapfa. This honour was paid by kings to archbishops, and by vassals to their lords; (Schmid, tom iii, p. 923;) and it was the ancient policy of Rome, to confirm the marks of filial and of feudal subjection.

2 The appeals from all the churches to the Roman pontiff, are described by the papal registers of the Consistory, as of the utmost importance. (Ducange, tom ii, p. 14—142. edit. Bolland, Venet, 1793;) and the judgment of Fenity, (Ducange, tom iii, p. 14.---The Cambridge ecclesiastick dictionary, p. 755;) The emperor, who believed in the same decrees, condigns only the abode of these appeals, the more culpable, as it so far as it seeks to investigate the origin, and rejects the principles, of this new jurisprudence, as originating from the Prefecture of the Germanieo...summaris non levia sacros ansaulis nimium tenuis.---Et nunc Romanorum consilio at usurpatione non credimus. (Bernard de Considerationes, t. ii, c. 2, p. 478.) The first words of the passage are obscure, and probably corrupt. cause than on the value of their offering. The wealth and piety of these strangers were ostentatiously displayed; and their expenses, sacred or profane, circulated in various channels for the emolument of the Romans.

Inconstancy of superstition. Such powerful motives should have firmly attached the voluntary and pious observances of the faithful to their spiritual and temporal father. But the operation of prejudice and interest is often disturbed by the sallies of unaccountable passion. The Indian who fells the tree, that he may gather the fruit, and the Arab who plunders the caravans of commerce, are actuated by the same impulse, which perverts the future with the present, and retires for momentary rapine the long and secure possession of the most important blessings. And it was thus, that the shrine of St. Peter was profaned by the thoughtless Romans; who pilfered the offerings, and wounded the pilgrims, without computing the number and value of similar visits, which they prevented by their inhospitable sacriilege. Even the influence of superstition is fluctuating and precarious: and the slave, whose reason is subdued, will often be delivered by his avare or pride. A creed is the foundation for the fabric of the oracles of priesthood, most powerfully acts on the mind of a barbarian; yet such a mind is the least capable of preferring an idea to a distant motive, to an invisible, perhaps an ideal, object, the appetites and interests of the present world. In the vigour of health and youth, his practice will perpetually contradict his belief; till the pressure of age, or sickness, or calamity, awakens his terror, and compels him to satisfy the double debt of piety and remorse. I have already observed, that the modern times of religious indifference are the most favourable to the peace and security of the clergy. Under the reign of superstition, they had much to hope from the ignorance, and much to fear from the violence, of mankind. The wealth, whose constant increase must have rendered them the sole proprietors of the earth, was alternately bestowed by the repentant father and plundered by the rapacious son: their persons were adored or violated; and the same idol, by the hands of the same votaries, was placed on the altar, or trampled in the dust. In the feudal system of Europe, arms were the title of distinction and the measure of all other honour: and the sound voice of law and reason was seldom heard or obeyed. The turbulent Romans disdained the yoke, and insulted the impotence, of their bishop; nor would his education or character allow him to exercise, with decency and success, the power of the sword. The passions of his election and the frailties of his life were exposed to their familiar observation; and proximity must diminish the reverence, which his name and his decrees impressed on a barbarous world. This difference has not escaped the notice of our philosophic historian: "Though the name and authority of the seat of Rome were so terrible in the remote countries of Europe, which were sunk in profound ignorance, and were entirely unacquainted with its character and conduct, the pope was so little revered at home, that his inveterate enemies surrounded the gates of Rome itself, and even controverted his government in that city; and the ambassadors, who, from a distant extremity of Europe, carried to him the humble, or rather abject, submissions of the greatest potentate of the age, bound the utmost difficulty to make their way to him, and to throw themselves at his feet."

Since the primitive times, the wealth of the popes was exposed to envy, their Gregory VII had power to opposition, and their persons to violence. While the doctrines of the popes were hatred and the crown increased the numbers, and inflamed the passions of their enemies. The deadly factions of the Guelfs and Ghibellines, so fatal to Italy, could never be embraced with truth or constancy by the Romans, the subjects and adversaries both of the pope, as they have the future, were alternately protected by both parties; and they alternately displayed in their banners the keys of St. Peter and the German eagle. Gregory the seventh, who may be adored or detested as the founder of the papal monarchy, was driven from Rome, and died in exile at Salerno. Six and thirty of his successors, all their retreat to Avignon, maintained an unequal contest with the Romans: their age and dignity were often violated; and the churches, in the solemn rites of religion, were polluted with sedition and murder. A repetition of such crimes, if actuated by the same motives, would be tedious and disgusting: and I shall content myself with some events of the twelfth century, which represent the state of the popes and the city. On holy Thursday, while Paschal officiated before the altar, he was interrupted by the clamours of the multitude who impatiently demanded the confirmation of a favourite magistrate. He silence exasperated their fury: his pious refusal to mingle the affairs of earth and heaven was encountered with menace and oaths, that he should be the cause and the witness of the public ruin. Da rier to save himself from the fury of the clergy, bar-foot and in procession, visited the tombs of the martyrs, they were twice assaulted, at the bridge of St. Angelo, and before the capitol, with a volley of stones and darts. The houses of his adherents were levelled with the ground: Paschal escaped with difficulty and danger: he levied an army in the patrony of St. Peter; and his last days were imbittered by suffering and inflicting the calamities of civil war. The scenes that followed the election of Gelisius II and his successor Gelasius the second were still more alarming to the state of the city. Cencio Frangipani, a potent and factious baron, burst into the assembly furious and in arms: the cardinal were stripped, beaten, and trampled under foot: and he seized, without pity or respect, the vicar of the church, and threw him to the ground. Gelasius was dressing his hair along the ground, buffeted with blows, wounded with spurs, and bound with an iron chain in the house.

1. Homer's History of England, vol. I. p. 119. The same writer has given us, from Fitz Stephen, a singular act of cruelty perpetrated on the clergy by Geoffrey, the father of Henry II. "When he was master of Normandy, the character of Nicepore dieternne, without his consent, proceeded to the election of a bishop: upon which he ordered all of them, with the bishop elect, to be castroed, and made all their tresses be beard in a platter, The pain of danger they might possibly complain: yet, since they had vowed chastity, he deprived them of all the true pity of humanity."

2. From Leo IX, and Gregory VII, an authentic and contemporary series of the lives of the popes by the cardinal of Artenac, Pandulphus Punnam, Bernard Gaido, &c. is inserted in the Italian Historian of Monfort, tom. ii. p. 127—353, and has been always before my eyes.

3. The dates of years in the margin, may throughout this chapter and remarks, be transferred to the American, from my original and excellent guide. He was, and indeed quotes, with the freedom of a man, the work of a great man, in eight volumes; and as that treasure is in my library, I have thought it but right to copy a part of it, not as a duty, to complain of it.

4. I am not able to refrain from transposing the high-colored words of Pandulphus Plannam: to (c. 381) Ho audaces in invicem inimicos atque turpiter victores potentissimi, aedificavit in aedificium victures, de hac aequi vi debito et justa, et tunc quodam ad inscientes et saepe vitiatos metodium, nostram sequuntur societatem, ad honorem ct salute. nam in haereticis testudinis longa suiopia, ascendent retro adhuc codices, ut haereticae praeceptis submersisse, et a constitutis et moribus evadere, quae tantummodo ad eum temporis aut res, quorum ictum, iudicium incoercere pulvere accepit, destruct, punis calculatae per quinque annos, ut incontinentiam animalis hominum subduant, emicere societatem, declarare possent in confessione omnium individuum per captivam et trachia, Jesu bove internum dormientem, detrahir, ad domum lege dedicat, ut inhaerat et inluciam.
of his brutal tyrant. An incursion of the people de-delivered their bishop: the rival factions opposed the violence of the Frangipani; and Cenzo, who sued for pardon, repented of thefailure, rather than of the, guilt, of his enterprise. Not many days had elapsed, when the popel was again assaulted at the altar. While his friends and enemies were engaged in a bloody contest, he escaped garmont. In this momentary flight, which excited the compassion of the Rom-ian matrons, their attendants were scattered or unhorsed: and, in the fields behind the church of St. Peter, his successor was found alone and half-dead with fear and fatigue. The pope was dragged from the spot by some from a city in which his dignity was in-sulted and his person was endangered; and the vanity of ascendent ambition is revealed in the involuntary confession, that one emperor was more tolerable than tywenty.* These examples might suffice; but I cannot forget the sufferings of two pontiffs of the same age, Lucius II., the second and third of the name of Lucius. The former, as he ascended in battle array to assault the capital, was struck on the temple by a stone, and expired in a few days. The latter was se-vously wounded in the nations, they should sever themselves as a lesson to the head of the church. Hope or fear, latitude or temerity, the characters of the men, and the circumstances of the times, might sometimes obtain an interval of peace and obedience; and the pope was calmed by a powerful argument. The Latins forward the pope, by the Roman Church, and were driven from the city. But the root of mischief was deep and perennial; and a momentary calm was preceded and followed by such tempests as had almost sunk the bank of St. Peter. Rome continual. ly presented the aspect of disorder and discord the churches and palaces were fortified and assaulted by the factions and families; and after giving peace to Euurope, Calistus the second alone had resolution and power to prohibit the use of private arms in the metropolis. Anarchi-
A
the Germans who revered the apostolic thronc, the tumults of Rome provoked a general indignation; and in a letter to his disciple Eugenius the third, St. Bernard, with the sharpness of his wit and zeal, has stigmatized the vices of the rebellious peodle with typical, as the modern emblems Character of the Church, painted by St. Bernard. that will not be excused by the motives of Clervaux, of the vanity and arrogance of the Romans. A nation nursed in sedition, cruel, untractable, and scornful to obey, unless they are too feeble to resist. When they promise to serve, they aspire to reign; if they swear allegiance, they watch the opportunity of revolt; yet they vent their discontent in loud clamours if your doors or your counsels are shut against them. Destructors in mischief, they have never learnt the science of doing good.
Oudis to earth and heaven, impious to God, sedi gious among themselves, jealous of their neighbours, inh-man to strangers, they love no one, by no one are they beloved; and while they wish to inspire fear, they live in base and continual apprehension. They will not submit; they know not how to govern; faithless to their superiors, intolerable to their equals, ungrateful to their benefactors, and alike impudent in their demands and their refusals. Lofty in promise, poor in execution; adulteration and calumny are the familiar arts of their policy.* Surely this dark portrait is not coloured by the pencil of christian charity; yet the features, however harsh and ugly, express a resemblance of the Romans of the twelfth century.*

The Jews had rejected the Christ when he appeared among them in a pheidian character; and the Romans might plead their ignorance of his vicar when he assumed the pomp and pride of a temporal sovereign.
In the thirteenth century, the crusades had rendered the faith of the Roman Church more perilous than in the time of St. Peter; the hersesy of Bulgaria, the Paulician sect, was successfully transplanted into the soil of Italy and France; the Gnostic visions were mingled with the simplicity of the social system, and the enemies of the clergy reconciled their passions with their conscience, the desire of the Romans to possess the faith of the pope.

The trumpet of Roman liberty was first sounded by Arnold of Brescia,* whose promotion in the church was confined to the lowest rank, and who wore the monastic habit rather as a garb of poverty than as the uniform of obedience.
But the sainted man never forgot the dangers which angered the pope, and the kind of violence to which they severely felt: they confound with reluctance the specious purity of his morals; and his errors were recommended to the public by a mixture of important and beneficial truths. In the theological studies, he had been the disciple of the famous and unfortunate Abe-lard, who was likewise involved in the suspicion of heresy; but the lover of Eloisa was of a soft and flexible nature; and his ecclesiastical judges were edified and disarmed by the humility of his repentance. From this master, Arnold most probably imbibed some metaphysical definitions. In the former, the Latin, S. Clairvaux, who is addressed as Pope, the Virgin, refers to the tale of the times; his ideas of baptism and the eucharist are loosely censured; but a political heresy was the source of his fame and misfortunes. He presumed to quote the declaration of Christ, that his kingdom is not of this world; he boldly maintained, that the sword and the secrect were intrusted to the civil magistracy; that the temporal honour and possessions were lawfully vested in secular persons; that the abbots, the bishops, and the pope himself, must renounce either their state or their salvation; and that after the loss of their revenues, and their voluntary submission to their dissolutions suffice, not indeed for luxury and avarice, but for a glacial life in the exercise of spiritual labours. During a short time, the preachers were revered as a patriot; and the discontent, or revolt, of Brescia against her bishop, was the first-fruits of his dangerous leanings. But the least penal measures against the individual of the priest; and after the heresy of Arnold had been condemned by Innocent the second, the gene-

*A Roman citizen. Petrarch takes leave to observe, that Bernard, though a saint, was a man; that he might be provoked by resentment, and perhaps repent of his haughty passion. E. (Memoires sur la Vie de Marques de Petruccio, tom. i. p. 331.)

B. In his index to the twelfth volume of his Annales, has named a fair and exact portrait of the pope; the making use of his name in the character of the pope, on the title-page of a work called "Dicitur," or "Achamrac," the first he applies all the good, to the last the evil, to the person of the church of the city.

The heresies of the twelfth century may be found in Nolhier, (Instiit. Hist. Eccles. p. 419-427,) where he entertains a favourable opinion of Arnold of Brescia. In the fourteenth chapter, vol. ii. he have described the sect of the Paulicians; and followed their migration from the peninsula to Thracia, the country of the Bulgars, Italy, and Anatolia.

C. The original pictures of Arnold of Brescia are drawn by Oboi, bishop of Frevonum, (Chron. i. vol. c. 31.) by Gratia Federici L. L. e.
27. 1. (ii. 212.) and by the third book of the Liguarian and "de proprietor, who flourished A.D. 1270, in the monastery of Peri near Bologna. The figures are painted on wood, and of the size of the fabric. Bizzari. In his Historia ecclesiastica inferni, (c. 411-412,) the long passage that relates to Arnold, is produced by Guellimau, Robus Heytzer, (Hist. Eccles. p. 412-413.)

D. Dominici ab altis

Petrarch, qui rerum vestram consistere non sine motto
Nomen aut invocare ducte liable vita.

We may apply the dexterity and conceptions of Liguarian, who turns the episcopal name of Innocent II. into a compliment.

330.)

* Egro oram Deo et ecclesia dico, si unam possam esse, aelam um superserum generum, comitum, et cuorum cum omni opubertatem, quos tibi dum vivam, (Vitae, iii. p. 391.)

* But the Chosen people always opposed the arts of seduction.

* The wicked wit of Bayle was annoyed in composing, with much lively and learning, the articles of Abelard, Pierre_left, Heloise, and his Dictionnaire. (Lettres, etc., vol. i. p. 331.) The decarnal, of scholastic and positive divinity is well understood by Moshem. (Inst. Hist. Eccles. p. 412-413.) It is better to translate in the passage that relates to Arnold, is produced by Guellimau, Robus Heytzer, (Hist. Eccles. p. 412-413.)

* Dominici ab altis

Petrarch, qui rerum vestram consistere non sine motto
Nomen aut invocare ducte liable vita.

We may apply the dexterity and conceptions of Liguarian, who
turns the episcopal name of Innocent II. into a compliment.
rival council of the Lateran, the magistrates themselves were urged by prejudice and fear to execute the sentence of the church. Italy could no longer afford a refuge; and the disciple of Abelard escaped beyond the Alps to the safety and the liberality of Zurich, now the first of the Swiss cantons. From a Roman statute, a royal villa, a chapter of noble virgins, Zurich had gradually increased to a free and flourishing city; where the appeals of the Milanese were sometimes tried by the imperial commissioners. In an age less ripe for reformation, the precursor of Zwinglius was heard with applause; a brave and simple people imbued and long retained the colour of his opinions; and his art, or merit, induced the bishop of Constance, and even the pope's legate, who forgot, for his sake, the interest of their master and their order. Their tardy zeal was quickened by the fierce exhortations of St. Bernard; and the enemy of the church was driven by persecution to the desperate measure of erecting his standard in Rome itself, in the face of the successor of St. Peter.

Yet the courage of Arnold was not devoid of discretion: he was protected, and had perhaps been invited, by the nobles and people; and in the service of freedom, his eloquence thralled over the seven hills. But leading in the vanguard of the heretics were the texts of Livy and St. Paul, uniting the motives of gospel and of classic enthusiasm; he admonished the Romans, how strangely their patience and the views of the clergy had degenerated from the primitive times of the church and the city. He exhorted them to assert the inalienable rights of men and Christians; to restore the laws and magistrates of the republic; to respect the name of the emperor; but to confine the shepherd to the spiritual government of his flock. Nor could his spiritual government escape the censure and control of the Romans. The latter, eloquent, and backed by the lessons to resist the cardinals, who had usurped a despotic command over the twenty-eight regions or parishes of Rome. The revolution was not accomplished without rapine and violence. The effusion of blood and the demolition of houses: the victorious faction were enriched with the spoils of the clergy and the adverse nobles. Arnold of Brescia enjoyed, or deplored, the effects of his mission: his reign continued above ten years, while two popes, Innocent the second and Anastasius the fourth, either trembled in the Vatican, or were involved in the adjacent circus. They were succeeded by a more vigorous and fortunate pontiff. Adrian the fourth, the only Englishman who has ascended the throne of St Peter; and whose merit emerged from the mean condition of a monk, and almost a beggar, in the monastery of St. Albans. Of their first provocation, of a cardinal killed or wounded in the streets,

1 A Roman inscription of Stato Turicenla has been found at Zurich. O'Donnell, Notice de l'église Sainte-Gaule, p. 642-643) but it is without sufficient warrant, that the city and canton have usurped, and are monopolized, the names of Turin and Parma Taurinum. A Guilmann (de Rebus Helvetica, lib. i, c. 5, p. 188.) recapitulates the donations (A.D. 323) of the emperor Lewis to his daughter the Abbess Hedegar. Curtius narrates Turicum in diminution to Althammunz in Fago Durazienne, with villages, woods, meadows, woods, terraces, and plains. He makes the bishop, and the city was walled under Odo I., and the line of the bishop of Turin has been transferred, as the subject of a dispute in the nineteenth century. Noble Turcouni multumare copia remem, is repeated with pleasure by the antiquaries of Zurich.

2 The name of the Taurinini females may be traced to Sophocles, Aristophanes, and Aristides. Amidst his bickggs, he drops a precious acknowledgment, qui umquam sancta, namely, the Roman district. He writes that Arnold would be a valuable acquisition to the church.

3 His adviced the Romans. Concerning the decline and ruin modernum suum Arboris tacebant; nihil juris in hac re. Brevissima historia universitatis regni Suediae, p. 140. Sce Frango as utique quaeque, tamen belli praebuit. Nor is the poetry of Gunther different from the prose of Odo. Atumnus (A.D. 1118, N. p. 39) from the Vatican MSS. He quotes, in his description of the pilgrimage, 'et eis A. D. 1141.

4 Benedicta, from pontica se recentia sola; see Chron. Saxon., passim: and the successors of Charle- man, when they were at Arthur in the year 751, and the entries of the manuscript of the Benedicta, an- rian IV. But our own writers have added nothing to the fame or mart of their countrymen.

he cast an interdict on the guilty people; and, from Christmas to Easter, Rome was deprived of the real or imaginary comforts of religious worship. The Romans had despised their old private laws, and submitted to the censures of their spiritual father; their guilt was expiated by penance, and the banishment of the sedulous preacher was the price of their abjuration. But the revenge of Adrian was yet unsatisfied, and the approaching coronation of Frederick Barbarossa was fatal to the bold reformer, who had offended, though not in an equal degree, the heads of the church and state. In their interview at Viterbo, the pope represented to the emperor the furious, ungovernable spirit of the Romans; the insulins, the injuries, the fears, to which his person and his clergy were continually exposed; and the pernicious tendency of the heresy of Arnold, which must subvert the principles of civil, as well as ecclesiastical, subordination.

Frederic was convinced by these arguments, or tempted by the desire of the imperial crown; in the balance of ambition, the innocence or life of an individual is of small account; and their common enemy was sacrificed to a moment of political concord. After his retreat from Rome, Arnold had been protected by the viscounts of Campardia, from whom he was extorted by the power of Cesar: the pretext of the city pronounced in his absence, and the emperor set the pope on fire in the presence of a careless and ungrateful people; and his ashes were cast into the Tiber, lest the heretics should collect and worship the relics of their master. The clergy imprisoned his body, and burnt his ashes. His memory was dispersed; his memory still lived in the minds of the Romans. From his school they had probably derived a new article of faith, that the metropolis of the catholic church is exempt from the penalties of excommunication and interdict. Their bishops might argue, that to the decay of the church, the decline of the kings and nations, more especially embraced the city and diocese of the prince of the apostles. But they preached to the winds, and the same principle that weakened the effect, must temper the abuse, of the thunders of the Vatican.

The love of ancient freedom has encouraged a belief, that as early as the tenth century, in their first struggles against the Saxon Otho, the commonwealth was vitiated and restored by the senate and people of Rome. The city was the only true republic: no more than ten were elected, and ten or twelve plebeian magistrates revived the name and office of the tribunes of the commoners. But this venerable structure disappears before the light of criticism. In the darkness of the middle ages, the appellations of senators, of consuls, of the sons of consuls, may sometimes be discovered. They were bestowed by the emperors, or assumed by the most powerful citizens, to denote their rank, their honours, and perhaps the chain of a pure and patrician descent; but they float on the surface, without a series.
or a substance, the titles of men, not the orders of government; and it is only from the year of Christ one thousand and eight hundred that the establishment of the senate is dated, as a glorious era, in the acts of the city. A new constitution was hastily framed by private ambition or popular enthusiasm; nor could Rome, in the twelfth century, produce an antiquary to explain, or a legislator to restore, the harmony and proportions of the ancient model. The essembly of a free, of an armed people, will ever speak in loud and weighty acclamations. But the regular distribution of the thirty-five tribes, the nase balance of the wealth and numbers of the centuries, the debates of the adverse orators, and the slow operation of protection and sound; the blind multitude, ignorant of the arts, and insensible of the benefits, of legal government. It was proposed by Arnold to revive and discriminate the equestrian order; but what could be the motive or measure of such distinction? The pecuniary qualification of the knights must have been reduced to the poverty of the times; those times no longer required their civil functions of judges and farmers of the revenue; and their primitive duty, their military service on horseback, was more nobly supplied by feudal tenures and the spirit of chivalry. The jurisprudence of the republic was no longer the same as that of ancient Italy; and those who lived under the Roman and barbaric laws were insensibly mingled in a common mass; and some faint tradition, some imperfect fragments, preserved the memory of the Code and Pandects of Justinian.
With their liberty the Romans might doubtless have restore the thing in his mind; and the sons of Italy who disdained a title so promiscuously adopted in the Italian cities, that it has finally settled on the hum-bale station of the agents of commerce in a foreign land. But the rights of the tribunes, the formidable word that arrested the public counsels, suppose or must be converted into a branch of magistracy.
Anciently, the senators were the subjects, the modern barons the tyrants, of the state; nor would the enemies of peace and order, who insulted the viceroy of Christ, have long respected the unarmed sanctity of a plebeian magistrate.

The Capitol. In the revolution of the twelfth century, which gave a new existence and era to Rome, we may observe the real and important events that marked or confirmed her political independence. I. The Capitoline hill, one of her seven emi-ncences, is about four hundred yards in length, and more than two hundred in breadth. A flight of a hundred steps led to the summit of the Tarpeian rock; and fast steeper was the ascent before the deprivities had been smoothed and the precipices filled by the ruins of fallen edições. From the earliest ages, the Capitol had been used as a temple in peace, a fortress in war; after the loss of the city, it maintained a siege against the

1 The most constitutional form, is a diploma of Otho III. (A. D.
992) Consilium populi Romanorum: but the act is prohibed private. At the coronation of Henry I. A. D. 1014, the historian Bishop Dambinus, in the panegyric of Henry the Fourth, of Bingen, (p. 468.)
2 In ancient Rome, the equestrian order was not ranked with the senate and people as a third branch of the republic till the collaboriage of Cicero, who assumes the merit of the establishment. (Plin.
Hist. Natum. xxxvii. p. 144.)
3 The republican plan of Arnold of Brescia is thus stated by Gun-
her.
Quin etiam tibiue urbis renove veterem;
Sublina magna Italiae tugurum, Jura tribunum, sanctum repente scientum,
Ex antiqua turba ecclesiam componit.
Lapae ruinas, et adhibe pedantur montes Reddore prim Ave Capitolium praece.
But of these reconstructions, some were more or less ideas, others no more than words.
4 Such are the disputes among the antiquaries of Rome, it seems determined, that the summit of the Capitoline hill next the river is strictly the Monis Tarpeius, the Arx; and that on the other summit, the church and convent of Anselmi, the barefoot Clare of St. Francis occupy the temple of Jupiter. (Nardini, Roma Antica, l. c. vii. 11.-115.)

victorious Gauls, and the sanctuary of empire was occupied, assaulted, and burnt, in the civil wars of Vindolf and Vespuio. The temples of Jupiter and Venus, and the kindred deities, were burned. The food was supplied by monasteries and houses; and the solid walls, the long and shelving porticoes, were decayed or ruined by the lapse of time. It was the first act of the Romans, an act of freedom, to restore the strong ancient temple, though not the beauty of the Capitol; to fortify the senatus consulta; and the same as often as they ascended the hill, the coldest minds must have glowed with the remembrance of their ancestors.
II. The first Cæsars had been invested with the exclusive coinage of the gold and silver; they then assumed the baser metal of bronze or copper: the emblems and legends were inscribed on a more ample field by the genius of ferry; and the prince was relieved from the care of intoxinating his own virtues. The successors of Dio-ceanus despised even the flattery of the senate; their orders were at Rome; and the provincias, assuming the sole direction of the mint; and the same prerogaotive was inherited by the Gothic kings of Italy, and the long series of the Greek, the French, and the German dynasties. After an abdication of eight hundred years, the Roman senate asserted this honourable and independent privilege, which was then restored to the pontifices, from Paschal the second to the establishment of their residence beyond the Alps. Some of these republican coins of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries are shown in the cabinets of the curious.
On one of these, a gold medal, Christ is depicted under the ægis, with the words of the pious prayer,
’The vow of the Roman Senate and People: Rome the capital of the world.’; on the reverse, St. Pe-eter delivering a banner to a kneeling senator in his cap and gown, with the name and arms of his family impresed on his shield. III. With the Theatrer of the empire, the praefect of the city was the de

cimientos, or the

patron of the

1 Tarici. Hist. iii. 69, 70.
2 This partition of the noble and baser metals between the emperor and senate, must however be adopted, not as a positive law, but as the probable opinion of the best antiquaries. (See the Science des Medailles of the Pere Joubert, tom. ii. p. 263—261, in the improved ded and scarce edition of the Baron de la Bastide.) 3 In his twenty-seventh dissertation on the Antiquities of Italy tom. ii. p. 559—569.) Muratori exhibits a series of the senatorian coins, which bore the obscure names of Afordini, Infortiani, Proct-ator, Paparini. During this period all the provinces, without excepting Bonifaci. VIII. abstained from the right of coinage, which was received by his successor Benedict XI. and regularly exercised in the court of Avignon.
A German historian, Gerard of Reicherspeier, in Balu, Miscell.
tom. v. p. 64, apud senatum, den trisp unanimously thus describes the constitution of Rome in the eleventh century: Grande urbis eorum spectabilis spectaculosa hoc ad Romanum imperium, sive illius urbis urbis præfectum, qui de suis dignitatis spectaculo urbane, videlicet dominum, et dominum feminam, et omnes civitates, cura publica, cura publica, cura potestatis insigne, sanctissimum gubernium.

The words of the Senate of Ethiopia, on the Pisan. (In Vit.
Paschal ii. p. 337, 338.) describes the election and oath of the prefect in 1119, insobstius patris... loca praefecto locum... comitiis administrare... auctoritatem populi... in anhon.
not subvenire... confirmarium in urbe pretium prudentem io; he invested the prefect with a banner instead of a sword, and absolved him from all dependence of oaths or service to the German emperors. 1 In his place an ecclesiastical, a present or future cardinal, was named by the pope to the civil government of Rome; but his jurisdiction over a principality was of a narrow compass; and in the days of freedom, the right or exercise was derived from the senate and people. IV. After the revival of the senate, 2 the conscript fathers

1 Urbi praefectum ad iuridicam fidu tatem recepto, et per mantum qua dem Publicam iurisdictionem, quae vere ta in urbis urbe

2 See Otho Frising. Chron. vii. iii. de Grat. Frederic. 1. i. c. 57. 3 Our currans, Rorer Hveden, speaks of the single senators of the Capaccia fami. L. &c. quem repetitum meius repetitum Regatur in opp. (A. D. 1311) esse tempore iuxta iurisdictionem, (Poucury, Glom. tom. ii. p. 103.)

3 Muratori. (disert. xxii. tom. ii. p. 755—758) has published an oration of Contarini, in the year 1506, Clemens vi. et senatores populi Romani super regulam et alias dignitatem or.
3 See otho frising. Chron. vii. iii. de Grat. Frederic. 1. i. c. 57. 4 Our currans, Rorer Hveden, speaks of the single senators of the Capaccia fami. L. &c. quem repetitum meius repetitum Regatur in opp. (A. D. 1311) esse tempore iuxta iurisdictionem, (Poucury, Glom. tom. ii. p. 103.)

5 Muratori. (disert. xxii. tom. ii. p. 755—758) has published an oration of Contarini, in the year 1506, Clemens vi. et senatores populi Romani super regulam et alias dignitatem or.
3 See otho frising. Chron. vii. iii. de Grat. Frederic. 1. i. c. 57.

4 Our currans, Rorer Hveden, speaks of the single senators of the Capaccia fami. L. &c. quem repetitum meius repetitum Regatur in opp. (A. D. 1311) esse tempore iuxta iurisdictionem, (Poucury, Glom. tom. ii. p. 103.)

5 Muratori. (disert. xxii. tom. ii. p. 755—758) has published an oration of Contarini, in the year 1506, Clemens vi. et senatores populi Romani super regulam et alias dignitatem or.
3 See otho frising. Chron. vii. iii. de Grat. Frederic. 1. i. c. 57.

4 Our currans, Rorer Hveden, speaks of the single senators of the Capaccia fami. L. &c. quem repetitum meius repetitum Regatur in opp. (A. D. 1311) esse tempore iuxta iurisdictionem, (Poucury, Glom. tom. ii. p. 103.)

5 Muratori. (disert. xxii. tom. ii. p. 755—758) has published an oration of Contarini, in the year 1506, Clemens vi. et senatores populi Romani super regulam et alias dignitatem or.
3 See otho frising. Chron. vii. iii. de Grat. Frederic. 1. i. c. 57.
mies and themselves. Charles of Anjou and Provence, the most ambitious and warlike monarch of the age, accepted at the same time the kingdom of Naples from the pope, and the office of senator from the Roman people. As he passed through the city, in his royal procession, his horse's feet were lodged in the Lateran palace, and smoothed in a short visit the harsh features of his despotical character. Yet even Charles was exposed to the inconstancy of the people, who saluted with the same acclamations the passages of his rival, the unfortunate Conradin; and a powerful avenger, who reigned in the capital, allayed the fears and jealousy of the populace. The absolute term of his life was superseded by a renewal every third year; and the enmity of Nicholas the third obliged the Sicilian king to abdicate the government of Rome. In his bull, a peremptory law, the imperious pontiff asserts the truth, validity, and use of the donation of Constantine, not less essential to the peace of the city than to the independence of the church; establishes the annual election of the senator; and formally disqualifies all emperors, kings, princes, and Popes of this IV. person from it. A.D. 1295. This prohibitory clause was repealed in his own behalf by Martin the fourth, who humbly solicited the suffrages of the Romans. In the presence, and by the authority, of the people, two electors conferred, not on the pope, but on the noble and faithful Martin, as if it were the pretext of the proceedings on the adjustment of the republic, to hold during his natural life, and to exercise at pleasure by himself or his deputies. About fifty years afterwards, the same title was granted to the emperor Lewis of Bavaria; and the archbishop of Rome was succeeded by her two sovereigns, who accepted a municipal office in the government of their own metropolises.

In the first moments of rebellion, when Arnold of Brescia had inflamed their minds against the church, the Romans artfully laboured to reconcile the favour of the emperor, and to recommend their merit and services in the cause of Caesar. The style of their ambassadors to Conrad the third and Frederic the first, is a mixture of flattery and pride, the tradition and the ignorance of their own history. After his constant of his silence and negligence, they exhort the former of these princes to pass the Alps and assume from their hands the imperial crown. "We beseech your majesty, not to disdain the humility of your sons and vassals, not to listen to the accusations of our common enemies, who calumniate the senate and the city, by your impiety. We, on the contrary, in the name of discord, that they may reap the harvest of destruction. The pope and the Sicilian are united in an impious league to oppose your liberty and your coronation. With the blessing of God, our zeal and courage has hitherto defeated their attempts. Of all your faithful adherents, more especially the Frangipani, we have been taken by assault the houses and terrets; some of these are occupied by our troops, and some are levelled with the ground. The Milvian bridge, which they had broken, is restored and fortified for your safe passage; and your army may enter the city without being annoyed from the castle of St. Angelo. All that we have done, and all that we have prepared, is for your safety, and we partake with you, with the most earnest hope, that you will speedily appear in person, to vindicate those rights which have been invaded by the clergy, to revive the dignity of the empire, and to surpass the fame and glory of your predecessors. May you fix your residence in Rome, the capital of the world; give us back our freedom and our dignity; and initiate the example of Constantine and Justinian, who, by the vigour of the senate and people, obtained the sceptre of the earth." But these splendid and fallacious wishes were not cherished by Conrad the Frankcomman, whose eyes were fixed on the Holy Land, and who died without visiting Rome soon after his return from the Holy Land.

His nephew and successor, Frederic I. Farharossa, was more ambitious of the imperial crown; nor had any of the successors of Otto acquired a stronger foothold in the kingdom of Italy. Surrounded by his ecclesiastical and baronial princes, he gave audience in his camp at Satri to the ambassadors of Rome, who thus addressed him in a free and florid oration: "Incline your ear to the queen of cities; approach with a peaceful and friendly mind the pretensions of the预vincents of Christ, who is the passport of the year of the clergy, and is impatient to crown her legitimate emperor. Under your auspicious influence, may the primitive times be restored. Assert the prerogatives of the eternal city, and reduce under her monarchy the insolence of the world. You are not ignorant, that, in former ages, in your honour and service the valor and discipline of the equestrian order, she extended her victorious arms to the east and west, beyond the Alps, and over the islands of the ocean. By our sins, in the absence of your princes, the noble institution of the senate has sunk in oblivion; and with our prudence, a strength has once decessed. We have revived the senate, and the equestrian order: the counsels of the one, the arms of the other, will be devoted to your person and the service of the empire. Do you not hear the language of the Roman matron! You were a guest. I have adopted you as a citizen: a Roman. The Transalpine statesmen of the Transalpine influence of the monarchy, and given you myself, and all that is mine. Your first and most sacred duty is to swear and subscribe, that you will shed your blood for the republic; that you will maintain in peace and justice the laws of the city and the charters of your predecessors; and that you will be a strong and firm hand of silver, the faithful senators who shall proclaim your titles in the capitol. With the name, assume the character, of Augustus." The flowers of Latin rhetoric were not yet exhausted; but Frederic, impatient of their vassals, interrupted the orators in the high tone of royalty and conquest. "Famous indeed have been the fortune and wisdom of the ancient Romans; but your speech is not seasoned with wisdom, and I could wish that fortune were copious in your actions. Like all salutary things, Rome has felt the virtues of time and fortune. You and your families were translated to the east, to the royal city of Constantine; and the remains of your strength and freedom have long since been exhausted by the Greeks and Franks. Are you desirous of beholding the ancient glory of Rome, the gravity of the senate, the spirit of the law, and the discipline of the legions under the value of the legions? You will find them in the German republic. It is not empire, noked and alone;
the ornaments and virtues of empire have likewise migrated beyond the Alps to a more deserving people.
They will be employed in your defence, but they cannot be yours, or my predecessors have been invited by the Romans:

you mistake the word; they were not invited; they were implored. From its foreign and domestic tyrants, the city was rescued by Charles-magne and Otho, whose ashes repose in our country; and their dominion was the peace of your defence. Under that dominion, your ancestors lived and died. I claim by the right of inheritance and possession, and who shall dare to extort you from my hands? Is the hand of the Franks* and Germans enfeebled by age? am I vanquished? am I a captive? am I not encompassed with the banners of a potent and invincible army?
You impose conditions on your master; you require oaths; if the conditions are just, an oath is super-fuous; if unjust, it is criminal. Can you doubt my equity? It is extended to the nearest of my subjects.
Will not my sword be unsheathed in the defence of the capital? By that sword the northern kingdom of Denmark has been restored to the Roman empire.
You prescribe the measure and the objects of my bounty, which flows in a copious but a voluntary stream. All will be given to patient merit; all will be clipped from your caprice. Whether the pope or the senate could maintain these lofty preten-sions of dominion and liberty. United with the pope, and suspicious of the Romans, Frederic continued his march to the Vatican; his coronation was disturbed by a sally from the capital; and if the numbers and valour of the victorious Romans could not compel him to yield his body and soul to his master, he could not safely encamp in the presence of a city of which he styled himself the sovereign. About twenty years afterwards, he besieged Rome, to seat an antipope in the chair of St. Peter; and twelve Pisan galleys were introduced into the Tiber; but the seven days' conclave and the application of negotiation and the progress of disease, nor did Frederic or his successors reiterate the hostile attempt.
Their laborious reigns were exercised by the popes, the crusades, and the independence of Lombardy and Germany; they counted the allies of Rome. Frederic Frederic was preferred in the capital the great standard, the Cencio of Milan; After the extinction of the house of Swabia, they were banished beyond the Alps; and their last coronations betrayed the imposture and poverty of the Teutonic Caesars.

Wars of the Romans against the neighbouring cities.

1. * Non credit nobis notum innomium, virtute sua annum venti, oramantam sua secum venit. Persa non sunt consules ut, id. Cicer. or Latin would not have rejected these measDes. the eloquence of a barbarian born and educated in the Hellenic farn.

* Otho of Freising, who surely understood the language of the court and diet of Germany, speaks of the Franks in the twelfth century as the reigning nation; (Processus Frang, eteri Frang, manus Frang:®) he adds, however, the editor of Tostis,

* Otho Frising, de Graue Frederic. L. R. C. C. 22, 729-725. These recent researches and investigations have I translated and abridged with freedomy yet fidelity.

* From the Chronicles of Ricoldo and Frances Polln, Murator (Gumut, 1753, 5, 491.) has transcribed these narratives last with the dogged verses that accompanied the gift.

* Are the decrees? are victor the decree? Cicer.

Cursum ab Augusto Frederico Caesar justo.

L. Mediolanum jam aere aperta venit. Uvas in dominio
vetus cum triumpho.

Erigo triumpho urbe posuere casum priorum et victoriam quaedam posuerit, quae vicit, et victoriam victor victo victor. Cicer.

Next desc on date (now we have the Italian translations, L. R. C. C. 1, 444.) character of the same breve.

Et speciosa urbs laurata discessit in st apo, non Campobasso, posse
ruris dominium.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.

Vivis posto passo quartas edit as-

tum, secundum progressum, ad

st apo, et

Santo.
pined in their relative state to the memorable fields of Thrasymene and Cannae. In the first of these petty wars, thirty thousand Romans were overwhelmed by a thousand German horse, whom Frederic Barbarossa had detached to the relief of Tuscumul; and if we number the slain at three, the prisoners at two thousand, and the auxiliaries were countenance and innocent. Sixty-eight years afterwards they Battle of Viterbo, marched against Viterbo in the ecclesiastical state with the whole force of the
The Romans were discomfited with shame and slaughter; but the English prelate must have indulged the vanity of a pilgrim, if he multiplied their numbers to one hundred, and their loss in the field to thirty, thousand men. Had the policy of the senatus and the discipline of the legions been restored with the capitol, the divided condition of Italy would have offed the fairest opportunity of a second conquest. But in arms the modern Romans were not above, and in arts, they were far below, the common level of the neighbouring republie dominions. The Roman chief of frequent actions. As long as their final appeal was determined by the civil magistrate, these mischiefs were transient and local; the merits were deemed by public or private: nor could the unsuccessful competitor long disturb the triumph of his rival. But after the emperors had been deprived of their prerogatives, after a maxim had been established, that the vicar of Christ is amenable to no earthly tribunal, each vacancy of the holy see might involve Christendom in controversy and war. The claims of the cardinals and inferior clergy, of the nobles and people, were vague and litigious: the freedom of choice was overruled by the tumults of a city that no longer owned or obeyed a superior. On the decease of a pope, two factions proceeded in different churches to a double election: the number and weight of votes, the priority of time, the merit of the candidates, might balcance each other; the most respectable of the clergy were divided; and the distant princes, who bowed before the spiritual throne, could not distinguish the spurious, from the legitimate, idol. The emperors were often the authors of the schism, from the political motive of possessing a friendly party in the idols, and each of the competitors was reduced to suffer the insults of his enemies, who were not avowed by conscience; and to purchase the support of his adherents, Right of the cardinals established by Alexander III. A.D. 1179.

who were insinuated byavarice or ambition. A peaceful and perpetual succession was thus ascertained to the third, who finally abolished the tumult-uary votes of the clergy and people, and defined the right of election in the sole college of cardinals.3
The three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, were assimilated to each other by this important privilege; the parochial clergy of Rome obtained the first rank in the hierarchy; they were indifferently chosen among the nations of Christendom; and the possession of the richest benefices, of the most important bishoprics, was not incompatible with their title and office. The senates of the capitals regulated their vote, and legates of the supreme pontiff, were robed in purple, the symbol of martyrdom or royalty; they claimed a proud equality with kings; and their dignity was enhanced by the smallness of their number, which ill the reign of Leo the tenth, seldom exceeded twenty or twenty-five persons elected. By this wise regulatio of the demand and the supply, doubt and scandal were removed, and the root of schism was so effectually destroyed, that in a period of six hundred years a double choice has only once divided the unity of the sacred college. But the concurrence of two thirds of the votes had been necessary, the election was often delayed by the privilate interest and passions of the cardinals; and while they prolonged their independent reign, the Christian world was left destitute of a head. A Institution of the conclave by
G. Gregory X.
A.D. 1274.

Nine days are allowed for the obsequies of the deceased pope, and the arrival of the absent cardinals: on the tenth,
they are imprisoned, each with one domestic, in a carpeted apartment, with a council chamber, with a pair of walls or curtains; a small window is reserved for the introduction of necessaries; but the door is locked on both sides, and guarded by the magistrates of the city, to seclude them from all correspondence with the world. If after three days, the luxury of their tables is contracted to a single dish at dinner and supper; and after the eighth day, they are reduced to a scanty allowance of bread, water, and wine. During the vacancy of the holy see, the cardinals are prohibited from touching the revenues, or assuming, unless in some extreme Gravity, the government of the church; all agreements and promises among the electors are formally annul-ed; and their integrity is fortified by their solemn oath and the prayers of the cathedrals. Some articles of inconvenient or superfluous rigour have been gradually relaxed, but the principle of the elective system, vigorous and entire; they are still urged by the personal motives of health and freedom to accelerate the moment of their deliverance; and the improvement of ballot or secret votes has wrapt the struggles of the conclave in the silky veil of charity and politeness.2
By these institutions, the Romans were excluded from the election of their prince and bishop; and in the fever of wild and precarious liberty, they seemed insensible of the loss of this inestimable privilege.
The emperor Lewis of Bavaria revived the example of the great Otho. After some negotiation with the magistrates, the Roman people were assembled in the square before St. Peter's;1

1 See Smoluch, Institut, Histor. Ecclesiast., p. 401, 403. Alexander himself had nearly been the victim of a contested election; and the discussion was repaired upon the whole with any sort of genius and learning which St. Bernard cast into the scale, (See his Lives and writings.)
2 Tho. Pliny, in his importance, dress, precedence, &c., of the Roman cardinals, are very ably discussed by Thomasin: (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 1392-1397); but their purple is now much faded. The sacred college was raised to the de finite number of seventy two,
represent, under his vicar, the disciples of Christ.

3 See Mosheim, Institut, Histor. Ecclesiast., p. 401, 403. Alexander himself had nearly been the victim of a contested election; and the discussion was repaired upon the whole with any sort of genius and learning which St. Bernard cast into the scale, (See his Lives and writings.)
4 Tho. Pliny, in his importance, dress, precedence, &c., of the Roman cardinals, are very ably discussed by Thomasin: (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 1392-1397); but their purple is now much faded. The sacred college was raised to the de finite number of seventy two,
represent, under his vicar, the disciples of Christ.

1 See the bull of Gregory X. approbato sacro concilio, in the Acts of the Lateran, 153, 4. 2; and A. G. Arnold, L. i. iii. 4. c. 3.; an supplement to the decrees which B. Nicholas III promulgated in Rome in 1258, and added to the canon law. The decrees of the council of Lyons in 1274.
3 The right of cardinals to vote is unique in the sense of being the only cardinals to vote; but the right of voting is not exclusive, as in some temporal matters, there may be though not an absolute, a second or proportion of the college of cardinals, yielding to the majority of the votes of the college, in whose absence the vocation of a new pope. The election of a pope is not an invariable custom, but the council of Constance, in 1417, declared that such a custom existed.
4 The election of a pope is unique in the sense of being the only cardinals to vote; but the right of voting is not exclusive, as in some temporal matters, there may be though not an absolute, a second or proportion of the college of cardinals, yielding to the majority of the votes of the college, in whose absence the vocation of a new pope. The election of a pope is not an invariable custom, but the council of Constance, in 1417, declared that such a custom existed.
5 The right of cardinals to vote is unique in the sense of being the only cardinals to vote; but the right of voting is not exclusive, as in some temporal matters, there may be though not an absolute, a second or proportion of the college of cardinals, yielding to the majority of the votes of the college, in whose absence the vocation of a new pope. The election of a pope is not an invariable custom, but the council of Constance, in 1417, declared that such a custom existed.
THE DECLINE AND FALL

Chap. XXX.

As the pope of Avignon, John the twenty-second, was deposed; the choice of his successor was ratified by their consciences and appetites. They freely voted for a new law, that their bishop should never be absent more than three months in the year, and two days' journey from the city: and that if he neglected to return on the third Sundays, the public servant should be deposed. It was evident, for each party, that Lewis forgot his own debility and the prejudices of the times: beyond the precints of a German camp, his useless phantom was rejected; the Romans despised their own workmanship; the antipope implored the mercy of his lawful sovereign: and the exclusive right of the cardinals was more firmly established by this unseasonable attack.

Absence of the pope from Rome.

Had the election been always held in the Vatican, the rights of the senate and people would not have been violated with impunity. But the Romans forgot, and were forgotten, in the absence of the successors of Gregory the seventh, who did not keep as a divine precept their ordinary residence in the city and diocese. The care of that diocese was less important than the government of the universal church; nor could the popes deliver the states in which their person was always opposed, and their person was often endangered. From the persecution of the emperors, and the wars of Italy, they escaped beyond the Alps into the hospitable bosom of France; from the tumults of Rome they prudently withdrew to live and die in the more tranquil situation of Avignon, Perugia, and the adjacent cities. When the flock was offended or impoverished by the absence of the shepherd, they were recalled by a stern admonition, that St. Peter had fixed his chair, not in an obscure village, but in the capital of the world; by a ferocious menace that the Romans would not have to destroy that state that should dare to afford them a retreat. They returned with timorous obedience; and were satised with the account of a heavy debt, of all the losses which their desertion had occasioned, the hire of lodgings, the sale of provisions, and the various expenses of servants and strangers who attended the court.

After a short interval of peace, and perhaps of authority, they were again banished by new tumults, and again summoned by the imperious or respectful invitation of the senate. In these occasional retreats, the extent of the dominion of the Vatican was the same as before, or far distant from the metropolis; but in the beginning of the fourteenth century the apostolic throne was transported, as it might seem for ever, from the Tiber to the Rhone; and the transmission of the See, and the cause of the transmigration may be deduced from the furious contest between Boniface the eighth and the king of France. Of such spiritual areas of excommunication and interdict were repulsed by the del popoli, et capitation de (55 de consilia, consilia: et de bocce bannum, et po morum. Our knowledge is too insufficient to pronounce how much of this consultation was temporary, and how much ordinary and permanent. Yet it is fairly illustrated by the ancient statutes of Rome.

c. 57. (x. x. c. 697.) In the Manuscript Script. tom. viii. p. 641-645.) relates this law, and the whole transaction, with much brevity and absence than the present Muratorian. Any one conversant with the darker ages must have observed how much the sense (I mean the meaning of superstition is confusing and inconsistent.

In the absence of the pope, see the second original Life of John XXII., xii., 112-115, the confession of the antipope, p. 45. and the fabulous works of Baluze, p. 714, 715.

c. Rome, and is the very exposition: the valiant cardinal emolumentum gravissimum contra popum maiorum quantum exemptum, except to add, that they were not gratuitously imposed upon the church, but they were levied in proportion to the taxable property of the state, and at the first Census, 1139. and the second volume of acts and documents. With the exception of those general works, he devoutly justifies or extenuates the characters of his countrymen.

b) The exile of Avignon is compared by the Italians with Babylon, and the whole country of Italy, to the exile of the papacy from Rome to Avignon, and the state of the church. It is impossible to the author of Petrarch to the judgment of Muratori, are gravely and correctly to press the surface, the关闭 between of the love of Petrarch and of his country. Yet he modestly conceals what it is, that the pope, according to a letter preserved, and many of the vicissitudes against which the pontiffs declared, have been imported with the Roman court by the strangers of Italy, comm. p. 53, 63.

Translation of the holy see to Avignon. A.D. 1309.

1. It is difficult to know whether Labat (tom. iv. p. 53-57) is in jest or in earnest, when he supposes that Anagni still feels the weight of the residence of the popes, and that the comfort of the popes, or Others, are annually blasted by the obscure and mendicant of the popes.

2. See in the Chronicle of Giovanni Villani, cit. vii., c. 63, 64, 65. In Murator, tom. xiii. the imprisonment of Boniface VIII., and the election of Clement the fifth. The cardinals of both parties were soon astonished by a summons to attend him beyond the Alps; from whence, as they soon discovered, they must never hope to return. He was engaged, by promise and affection, to prefer the residence of the popes; and after dragging his court through Poitou and Gascony, and devoting, by his expense, the cities and convents on the road, he finally resided at Avignon, which flourished above seventy years the seat of the Roman pontiff, and the metropolis of Christendom.
By land, by sea, by the Rhone, the position of Avignon was on all sides accessible; the sultry plains of France do not yield to Italy itself; new palaces arose for the accommodation of the pope and cardinals; and the arts of luxury were soon attracted by the treasures of the church. They were already possessed of the adjacent territory, the Venetian county, 1 a populous and fertile spot, which they afterwards purchased from the youth and distress of Jane, the first queen of Naples and countess of Provence, for the inadequate price of four-score thousand florins. 2 Under the shadow of the French monarchy, amidst an obedient people, the popes enjoyed an honor and power which was decided in their favor; but Italy deplored their absence; and Rome, in solitude and poverty, might repent of the un- governed freedom which had driven from the Vati- can the successor of St. Peter. Her repentance was tardy and fruitless: after the death of the old members, the sacred college was filled with French cardinals, who held Rome and Italy with abhorrence and con- tempt, and perpetuated a series of national, and even provincial, popes, attached by the most indissoluble ties to their native country.

Institutio the papal election in the holy year, A.D. 1330.

The progress of industry had produced an augmented commercial life in the Italian republics: the aura of their liberty is the most flourishing period of population and agriculture, of manufactures and commerce; and their mechanic labors were gradually refined into the arts of elegance and luxury, the last of which was the least beautiful, the territory less fruitful; the character of the inhabitants was debased by indolence and elated by pride; and they fondly conceived that the tribute of subjects must forever nourish the metropolis of the church and empire. This prejudice was encouraged in Rome by the receipt of pilgrimages to the shrine of the apostles; and the last legacy of the popes, the institution of the holy year, 3 was not less beneficial to the people than to the clergy. Since the loss of Palestine, the gift of plenary indulgences, which had been applied to the crusades, remained without an object; the most valuable treasure of the church was sequestered above eight years from public circula- tion. A new channel was opened by the diligence of Boniface the eighth, who reconciled the vices of ambition and avarice; and the pope had sufficient learning to recollect and revive the secular games, which were celebrated in Rome at the conclusion of every century. To sound without danger the depth of popular credulity, a sermon was seasonably pron- unced, a report was artfully scattered, some aged witnesses were pronounced; and on the first of January of the year thirteen hundred, the church of St. Pe- ter was crowded with the faithful, who demanded the customary indulgence of the holy time. The pontif, who watched and irritated their devout impatience, was soon persuaded by ancient testimony of the justice of their claim; and he proclaimed a plenary absolution to all catholics within the course of that year, and at every similar period, should respect the holy shrines or the tombs of the holy men of God. The welcome sound was propagated through Christendom; and at first from the nearest provinces of Italy, and at length from the remote kingdoms of Hungary and Britain, the faithful brought in a swarm of pilgrims, who sought to expiate their sins in the holy mother of God;

1. The conclave Venetian was called to the pope in 1273 by Philip III. king of France, after he had inherited the dominion of the count of Thonon. Forty years before, the hierarchy of Rome had given occasion to a popular insurrection, and the people demanded the abdication of the clerics from the eleventh century to some lands citra Rhodanum. (Visigoth Notitia Galliarum, p. 435; Olivar, Lecons, Description de la France, tom. i. p. 370—381.)

2. If a possession of four centuries was not itself a title, such objec- tion could not be urged; it must be confessed that the gift must be made, if indeed it was paid. Civisram Avisam viam .... et pramentio vindicationem pecuniae indebuntur, &c. (Gilia Vitis Clement VI, in Bulz., tom. i. p. 272 Moroni, Scrittori tom. ii. p. 155.) The only temptation for Jane and her second husband was really money; for they were in Rome, at the suspension of Napoleon, Vittorio, immediately promoted ten cardinals, nine French and one English. (Vita Gregorii, p. 52 et Bulz. p. 626, &c.) 3. In 1311, the pope refused two candidates recommended by the king of France, and quadr, successor of Pope Guin, in Regno Franciae origine traxerat suscipienti in memoriam colloquent exp. (Toman, Discipl. 1351.)

Our primitive account is from Cardinal James Cajetan; (Maximus Romanus, s. v. Indulgentias,) and from the Chronicle of Matteo Villani. (L. 360, 3, 4) The nephew of Boniface VIII. is a fool or a knave: the uncle is a much clearer character.

Vol. II—5 K
liberty and dominion from the city to the adjacent country. The sword of the nobles was broken; their slaves were enfranchised; their castles were demolished; they assumed the habits of society and obedience; their ambition was confined to municipal honours, and in the proudest aristocracy of Venice or Genoa, each patrician was subject to the laws of the State. The hereditary government of Rome was unequal to the task of curbing her rebellious sons, who secured the authority of the magistrate within and without the walls. It was no longer a civil contention between the nobles and plebeians for the government of the State; the hands of the Roman senators asserted their personal independence; their palaces and castles were fortified against a siege; and their private quarrels were maintained by the numbers of their vassals and retainers. In origin and affection, they were aliens to their country; and a genuine Roman, could such be formed, might have re-asserted these haughty strangers, who disdained the appellation of citizens, and proudly styled themselves the princes of Rome. After a dark series of revolutions, all records of pedigree were lost; the distinction of surnames was abolished; the blood of the nations was mingled with that of the Romans and Lombards, the Greeks and Franks, the Germans and Normans, had obtained the fairest possessions by royal bounty, or the prerogative of value. These examples might he readily presumed: but the elevation of an Hertha to the rank of Rome was without a parallel in the long captivity of these miserable exiles. In the time of Leo the ninth, a wealthy and learned Jew was converted to Christianity; and honoured at his baptism with the name of his godfather, the reigning pope. The zeal of Leo and courage of his son of St. Bernard was signalized in the cause of Gregory the seventh, who intrusted his faithful adherent with the government of Adrian's mole, the tower of Crescentius, or, as it is now called, the castle of St. Angelo. Both the father and the son were the parents of a numerous progeny, who were joined to the nobles of the Church by the marriage of their daughters with the noble families of the city; and so extensive was their alliance, that the grand-son of the proselyte was exalted by the weight of his kindred to the throne of St. Peter. A majority of the clergy and prelates supported Leo; he reigned several years in the Vatican, and it is only the elevation of St. Bernard, and the final triumph of Innocent the second, that has branded Ancaletus with the epithet of antipope. After his defeat and death the posterity of Leo is no longer conspicuous; and none will be found of the modern families of descendings from a Jewish stock. It is not my design to enumerate the Roman families, which have failed at different periods, or those which are continued in different degrees of splendour to the present time. The old consular line of the Frangipani discover their name in the generous act of breaking or dividing bread in a time of famine; and such benevolence is more truly glorious than to have enclosed, with their allies the Corts, a spacious quarter of the city in the chains of their fortifications: the Sca- celli, as it should seem a Sabine race, have maintained their original dignity; the obsolete surname of the Ca- prizza is inscribed on the columns of the first senators; the Onici preserved the honour, without the estate, of the censors and quaestors; and the Cesari, whose private story is an essential part of the details of modern Rome. I. The name and arms of Colonna 4 have been the theme of much doubtful etymology; nor have the etorators and antiquarians overlooked either Tra- jum's pillar, or the columns of Hercules, or the pillar of the church of the Conti. Peter was elected senhor that guided the Israelites in the desert. Their first historical appearance in the year eleven hundred and four, attests the power and antiquity, while it explains the simple meaning, of the name. By the usurpation of Cesar, the Colonna provoked the arms of Paschal the second; and the affronts which F. Paschal experienced in Rome, the hereditary fires of Zagarola and Colonna; and the latter of these towns was probably adorned with some lofty pillar, the relic of a villa temple. They likewise possessed one moiety of the neighbourhood of Tusculum: a strong presumption of their descent from the counts of Tusculum, who in the tenth century were the tyrants of the apostolic see. According to their own and the public opinion, the primitive and remote source was derived from the banks of the Rhine; and the sovereigns of Germany were often elevated to dignity with a noble race, which in the revolutions of seven hundred years has been often illustrated by merit, and always by fortune. About the end of the thirteenth century, the most powerful branch was composed of an uncle and six brothers, all conspicuous in arms, or in the honours of the table; and they were followed by the Colonna, a family of great dignity, who have preserved their arms, of which the first was that of Eusebius the bishop of Rome, introduced to the capitol in a triumphal car, and hailed in some vain acclamations with the title of Caesar; while John and Stephen were declared marquises of Ancora and count of Romung, by Nicholas the fourth, a patron so partial to their family, that he has delineated in satirical portraits, imprisoned

4 The cardinal of St. George, in his pastoral, or rather motetrical, history of the election and coronation of Boniface VIII, Minuroto, Script. Ital. tom. iii. p. 461, &c. describes the state and families of Rome, 1294-1303, and distinguishes between the families of descendent from the Jewish stock, and those which are continued in different degrees of splendour to the present time. The old consular line of the Frangipani discover their name in the generous act of breaking or dividing bread in a time of famine; and such benevolence is more truly glorious than to have

4 Minuroto (Disert. xvi.) allows the Annals of Florence, Padua, Genua, Milan, and Ravenna, (Venezia, tom. iii. p. 137-150.) to distinguish eleven families of barons, who are obliged to swear in concilio commune, before they may use the title of Senhor, or apply themselves to make a fortune. By the times of Cesar, the Colonna themselves have not favoured the world with a complete and critical history of their illustrious house. I adhere to Minuroto. (Disert. xvi. tom. iii. p. 467, &c.)

5 A. Paschal, in Via, Paschal II. in Muratori, Script. Ital. tom. iii. p. 183, &c. The families of the Colonna themselves have not favoured the world with a complete and critical history of their illustrious house. I adhere to Minuroto. (Disert. xvi. tom. iii. p. 467, &c.)

6 Paolo, Fussi, in Vit. Paschal II. in Muratori, Script. Ital. tom. iii. p. 183, &c. They have still great possessions in the Campagna of Rome, but they have been reduced to the Restoration this original fire of Colonna, (Escibina), p. 265, &c.

7 Le bonnes undes defis et parois Rheni, says Petarch, de Scip. xvi. 179, as the makes and Juliers acknowl- edges (Lemont, Hist. du Concile de Constance, tom. ii. p. 379.) his origin from the Cols, (the poetical name of the Colonna) but the royal authority of the Memoirs of Brandenburg observes, that the seep- in his unhappy state of things in 1311, the Colonna (ibid. tom. i. 134, &c.), and refers the Colonna to the Roman origin of the Colonna, it was ingeniously supposed, (Dia- ro di Montecuccoli, in the Script. Ital. tom. iii. p. 355.) that a cousin of the emperor, and remotely sprung from the family of Colonna, had been the original fire of Colonna, (Escibina), p. 265, &c.

8 I cannot overlook the Roman triumph or ovation of Marco Antonio Colonna, who had commanded the pope's cavalry at the naval battle of Lagos, in Annals of Lorenzo de' Medici, Hist. It. tom. v. p. 33, &c. Murtr. Oratio, in Op. misc. tom. i. p. 150, &c.
as it were in a hollow pillar. After his decease, their haughty behaviour provoked the displeasure of their subjects, and they were banished. Their uncle and nephew, denied the election of Boniface the eighth; and the Colonna were oppressed for a moment by his temporal and spiritual arms. He proclaimed a crusade against his personal enemies; their estates were confiscated; their fortresses on either side of the Tiber, which they had held previously to the triumph of St. Peter and those of the rival nobles; and after the ruin of Palestrina or Praeneste, their principal seat, the ground was marked with a ploughshare, the emblem of perpetual desolation. Degraded, banished, proscribed, the six brothers, in disguise and danger, wandered over the whole of Italy. Petrarch, with the hope of deliverance and revenge. In this double hope, the French court was their surest asylum; they prompted and directed the enterprize of Philip; and I should praise their magnanimity, had they respected the misfortune and courage of the captive tyrant. His civil acts are the same which we have already spoken of, the honours and possessions of the Colonna; and some estimate may be formed of their wealth by their losses, of their losses by the damages of one hundred thousand gold florins which were granted them against the accomplices and heirs of the deceased pope. All the splendor and magnificence of his successors were by his prudent successors; and the fortune of the house was more firmly established by this transient hurricane. The boldness of Sciarra Colonna was signalized in the captivity of Boniface; and long afterwards in the coronation of Lewis of Bavaria; and by the gratitude of the emperor, the pillar in their arms was encircled with a royal crown. But first the family in fame and merit was the elder Stephen, whom Petrarch loved and esteemed as a hero superior to his own times, and not unworthy of ancient Rome. Petrarch, as a noble hero, with true hope of abilities in peace and war; in his distress he was an object, not of pity, but of reverence; the aspect of danger provoked him to avow his name and country; and when he was asked, "where is now your fortress?" he laid his hand on his heart, and answered, "here." He succeeded by the Roman people with the return of prosperity; and, till the ruin of his declining age, the ancestors, the character, and the children of Stephen Colonna, exalted his dignity in the Roman republic, and at the court of Avignon.

II. The Urssini migrated from Spoleto to Rome, the sons of Ursinus, as they are styled in the twelfth century, from some eminent person, who is only known as the father of their race. But they were soon distinguished among the nobles of Rome, by the number and bravery of their kinsmen, the strength of their towers, thehonours of the senate and sacred college, and the elevation of two popes, Cелиstine the third and Nicholas the third, of their name and lineage. Their riches may be accused as an early abuse of nepotism: the estates of St. Peter were alienated in their favour for the liberal Celestine; and Nicholas was ambitious for their sake to secure the alliance of monarchical to find new kingdoms in Lombardy and Tuscany; and to invest them with the perpetual office of senators of Rome. All that has been observed of the greatness of the Colonna, will likewise redound to the glory of the Urssini, their descendant, who for many years reigned in the long hereditary feud, which distracted above two hundred and fifty years the ecclesiastical state. The jealousy of pre-eminence and power was their hereditary the true ground of their quarrel; but as a heads.

The Cardines spicis annum sacrati dudum Paparius tertius tenens.
Murator (Disert. xiii. tom. iii. p. 5) observes, that the first Urssini certificate of Colonna was unknown: he is inclined to read Priscian and Urau reversiones.

The partial predicability of Nicholas III is more conspicuous in Vitalii, and Monaldeschi, and in the Urssini, and Urssini.

The national character of the Urssini is by the most Catholic, and the Urssini a French origin, which may be readily true. In the medical life of Celestine V. by the cardinal of St. George, (Muriatori, tom. iii. p. 1. 15) we find a luminous, and not elegant, passage: (G. I. c. 3. p. 203.)

Petrarch, A. D. 1304.
June 19.

Petrarch, A. D. 1301.
July 18.

Petrarch, A. D. 1301.
June 19.

Suetonius Annalibus annos sexcentos
Murator (Disert. xiii. tom. iii. p. 5) observes, that the first Urssini certificate of Colonna was unknown: he is inclined to read Priscian and Urau reversiones.

The partial predicability of Nicholas III is more conspicuous in Vitalii, and Monaldeschi, and in the Urssini, and Urssini.

The national character of the Urssini is by the most Catholic, and the Urssini a French origin, which may be readily true. In the medical life of Celestine V. by the cardinal of St. George, (Muriatori, tom. iii. p. 1. 15) we find a luminous, and not elegant, passage: (G. I. c. 3. p. 203.)

Petrarch, A. D. 1301.
June 19.

Petrarch, A. D. 1301.
June 19.

Petrarch, A. D. 1301.
June 19.

Colonna, and the Urssini, and the Urssini.

The partial predicability of Nicholas III is more conspicuous in Vitalii, and Monaldeschi, and in the Urssini, and Urssini.

The national character of the Urssini is by the most Catholic, and the Urssini a French origin, which may be readily true. In the medical life of Celestine V. by the cardinal of St. George, (Muriatori, tom. iii. p. 1. 15) we find a luminous, and not elegant, passage: (G. I. c. 3. p. 203.)

Petrarch, A. D. 1301.
June 19.

Petrarch, A. D. 1301.
June 19.
the father of her lyric poetry; and his verse, or at least his name, is repeated by the enthusiasm, or affection, of numerous sensibility. Whatever may be the private taste of a stranger, his slight and superficial knowledge should humbly acquiesce in the taste of a leader of such a school. I may suppose that the English and Italians do not compare the tedious uniformity of sonnets and elegies, with the sublime compositions of their epic muse, the original wildness of Dante, the regular beauties of Tasso, and the boundless variety of the incomparable Ariosto. The merits of the lover I omit, for it is only proper to applaud the performance of a supposed person I do not, in a metaphysical passion for a nymph so shadowy, that her existence has been questioned; for a matron so prolific, that she was delivered of eleven legitimate children, while her amorous swan sighed and sang at the fountain of Vanucia. But in the eyes of Petrarch, and those of his greater contemporaries, his love was a sin, and Italian verse a frivolous amusement. His Latin works of philosophy, poetry, and eloquence, established his serious reputation, which was soon diffused from Avignon over France. The same youth who had been taught to pray, was now taught to compose poetry. The academical honours of the three faculties had introduced a royal degree of master or doctor in the art of poetry; and the tule of poet-laureat, which custom, rather than vanity, perpetuates in the English court, was first invented by the Caesars of Germany. In the musical and pastoral sonnet, a prize was bestowed on the victor; the belief that Virgil and Horace had been crowned in the capital inflamed the emulation of a Latin bard; and the laurel was endowed to the lover by a verbal resemblance with the name of his mistress. The value of either object was enhanced by the difficulties of the pursuit; and if the virtue or probity of Laura was inexorable, he enjoyed, and might boast of enjoying, the approval of her passion. In the most subdued, least complicated, yet most delicate kind, so that with the succession of his own labours; his name was popular; his friends were active; the open or secret opposition of envy and prejudice was surmounted by the dexterity of patronage. In the thirty-sixth year of his age, he was so far pleased with the object of his wishes, as on the same day, in the solitude of Vanucia, he received a similar and solemn invitation from the senate of Rome and the university of Paris. The learning of a theological school, and the ignorance of a lawless city, were alike unqualified to bestow the ideal rewards, immaterial wreath which genius may obtain from the free applause of the public and of posterity; but the candidate dismissed this troublesome reflection, and after some moments of complacency and suspense, preferred the summons of the metropolis of the world. The Epistle to Cephalus was performed in the capital, by his friend and patron, the supreme magistrate of the republic. Twelve patrician youths were arrayed in scarlet; six representatives of the most illustrious names of ancient Rome, were crowned with laurel; flowers, accompanied the procession; in the midst of the princes and nobles, the senator, count of Augurlana, a kinsman of the Colonna, assumed his throne; and at the voice of a herald Petrarch arose. After discoursing on a text of Virgil, and thrice repeating his vows for the prosperity of Rome, he knelt before the throne, and received from the senator a laurel crown, with a more precious declaration. "This is the reward of merit." The people shouted, "Long life to the capital and the poet!" A sonnet in praise of Rome was unceasingly repeated; the inscription of genius and gratitude; and after the whole procession had visited the Vatican, the prostrate wreath was suspended before the shrine of St. Peter. In the act of diploma which was presented to Petrarch, the title and prerogatives of poet-laureat are revived in the capital, after the lapse of thirteen hundred years; and he receives the perpetual right of wearing, at his choice, a crown of laurel, ivy, or myrtle, of assuming the poetical habit, and of teaching, disputing, interpreting, and composing, in all places whatsoever, and on all subjects of literature. The grant was ratified by the authority of the senate and people; and the laurel, which Petrarch and his country had so long delighted and been so much attached to, was divided to the Roman name. They did him honour, but they did him justice. In the familiar society of Cicero and Livy, he had imbibed the ideas of an ancient patriot; and his ardent fancy kindled every idea to a sentiment, and every sentiment to a passion. The aspect of the seven hills and their majestic ruins confirmed these lively impressions; and he loved a country by whose liberal spirit he had been crowned and adored. The poverty and desolation of Rome excited the indignation and pity of his grateful son; he disseminated the spirits of his fellow-countrymen armed with partial goodness the last of their heroes and martyrs, the exclusion of Statius (Capitolis proprie institutus) Lyce, Sylv. i. iii. v. 31 may do honour to the games of the capital; but the Latin poets who lived before Domitian were crowned only in the public opinion.

Petrarch and the senators of Rome were ignorant that the laurel was not a Roman thing; but the Belgic poet of the Vulgate, of 1175, Hist. Critique de la Republique des Lettres, tom. i. p. 131—132, declares that St. Paul was crowned with a crown of oak leaves. (Martial, i. iv. epigram 5.)

The poet laureate of Rome has laboured, and not without success, to indicate the very limits of his honorary domain. The grave, and the sources of the laurel, (Pom. ii. notes, p. 76—82.)

The whole person of Petrarch's conception is accurately described by the Abbe de Sade, (tom. i. p. 425—435, tom. ii. p. 6 and notes, p. 111,) who calls the poet laureate, viri, &c. without mixing in this authentic narrative the more recent fables of Sanmucio Dolebne.

The original act is printed among the Poésies Justificatives in the Mémoires sur Petrarque, tom. iii. p. 50—83.
tropons; and in the remembrance of the past, in the hope of the future, was pleased to forget the miseries of the present time. Rome was still the lawful mistress of the world; the pope and the emperor, her bishop and general, had abdicated their station by an inglorious retreat to the Rhine and the Danube; but if such an event was then fatal to the ancient republic, it vindicated her liberty and dominion. Amidst the indolence of enthusiasm and eloquence, Petrarch, Italy, and Europe, were astonished by a revolution which realized for a moment his most splendid visions. The rise and fall of the empire indelibly impressed the imagination of Filippo Bonsi; but the subject is interesting, the materials are rich, and the glance of a patriot-bard will sometimes vivify the copious, but simple, narrative of the Floritene, and more especially of the Roman historian.

In a quarter of the city which was inhabited only by mechanics and Jews, a sign of Rienzi, the marriage of an inkeeper and a washerwoman produced the future deliverer of Rome. From such parents Nicholas Renzii Gabrini could inherit neither dignity nor fortune; and the gift of a liberal education, being out of the question, he became a baker, in consequence of his father's pedlar business. The study of history and eloquence, the writings of Cicero, Seneca, Livy, Caesar, and Valerius Maximus, elevated above his equals and contemporaries the genius of the young plebeian; he persuaded with indefatigable diligence the multitude of bowing down a little and便宜 the unbounded magnitude. He despise his knowledge in familiar language; and was often provoked to exclaim, "Where are now these Romans? their virtue, their justice, their power? why was I not born in those happy times?" When the republic addressed to the throne of Avignon an embassy to request a more convenient truce, Rienzi recommended him to a place among the thirteen deputies of the commons. The orator had the honour of haranguing pope Clement the sixth, and the satisfaction of conversing with Petrarch, a congenial mind; but his aspiring hopes were chilled by disrepute and poverty; and the patriot was reduced to a single room and the charity of the hospital. From this misfortune, he was relieved by the sense of merit or the smile of favour; and the employment of apostolic notary afforded him a daily stipend of five gold florins; a more honourable and extensive connection; and the right of contrasting, both in words and actions, his own integrity with the vices of the state. The eloquence of Rienzi was promptly answered by that of Castruccio, which was always prone to envy and censure; he was stimulated by the loss of a brother and the impurity of the assassin, nor was it possible to excuse or exaggerate the public calumnies. The blessings of peace and justice, which civil order has instituted, were banished from Rome; and the beggars, who had endured every personal or pecuniary injury, were most deeply wounded in the dishonour of their wives and daughters; they were equally oppressed by the arrogance of the nobles and the corruption of the magistrates; and the abuse of arms or of laws was the only circumstance that distinguished the lions, from the dogs and serpents, of the capital. These allegorical emblems were variously repeated in the pictures which Rienzi exhibited in the streets and churches; and while the spectators gazed with curious wonder, the poet exclaimed, he could behold the walls of the city, the saire, inflamed their passions, and announced a distant hope of comfort and deliverance. The privileges of Rome, her eternal sovereignty over her princes and provinces, was the theme of his public and private discourse; and a monument of servitude became in his eyes the means of liberty. He disdained every writer or orator; tended the senate, which granted the most ample prerogatives to the emperor Vespasian, had been described on a copper-plate still extant in the choir of the church of St. John Lateran. A numerous assembly of nobles and plebeians was invited to this political lecture, and with their presence contributed to the success of his eloquence. The orator appeared, in a magnificent and mysterious habit, explained the inscription by a version and commentary, and descended with eloquence and zeal on the ancient glory of the senate and people, from whom all legal authority was derived. The supine ignorance of the nobles was incapable of discerning the serious tendency of such representations; they might sometimes chasse with words and blows the plebeian reformer; but he was often suffered in the Colosseum to amuse the company with his threats and predications, despoiled of his cloak, and his胸环 the mask of folly and the character of a buffoon. While they indulged their contempt, the restoration of the good state, his favourite expression, was entertained among the people as a desirable, a possible, and at length as an approaching, event; and while all had the disposition to apply in some way the courage to their promised deliver.

A prophecy, or rather a summons, He assumed the affixed on the church door of St. George, government of Rome as the first public evidence of his design; a nocturnal assembly of a hundred citizens on mount Aventine, the first step to their execution. After an oath of secrecy and aid, he represented to the conspirators the importance and facility of their enterprise; that the nobles, without union or resources, were strong only in the fear of their imaginary strength; that all power, as well as right, was in the hands of the people; that the revenues of the state were to be divided among the nobles of Avignon, (Clement VI.) and the petty tyrants of Florence, and the city of Rome ceded Italy, and incorporated by the less excusable ignorance of the Latin translator, (p. 408) and the French compiler, (p. 325) who have added the passage.

1 Petrarch compares the jealousy of the Romans with the easy temper of the inhabitants of Aetna, "tamen."
2 The fragments of the Lex Regina may be found in the Inscriptions of Caesar, tome ii., p. 312-320, the Lex Regia was the title of a famous work of antiquity, and the Roman law familiar to every antiquary. It was not so to the tribune; he assures us that it was his maxims and maxims themselves that were the learning of Castruccio, and that his understanding was lessened by the passage.

3 Priori (Brevia) taken similar. juvameus, unque, longue, ingenio sumus cus summissim, sed secum boc elodie liberatur lite P. R. apparere tempore sim. . . . . . . Legibus, hic tyrannis contempus. (Cyp. p. 98,) apostolic chamber might relieve the public distress; and that the pope himself would approve their victory over the common enemies of government and freedom. After securing, in a faithful and honest manner, his first declaration, he proclaimed through the city, by sound of trumpet, that on the evening of the following day all persons should assemble without arms before the church of St. Angelo, to provide for the re-establishment of the estate. This act was employed in the celebration of thirty masses of the Holy Ghost; and in the morning, Rienzi, bareheaded, but in complete armour, issued from the church, encompassed by the hundred conspirators. The pope’s vicar, the simple bishop of Orvieto, who had been persuaded to take this step, was on this occasion defrocked, installed on his right hand; and three great standards were borne aloft as the emblems of their design. In the first, the banner of liberty, Rome was seated on two lions, with a palm in one hand, and a glee in the other: St. Paul, with a drawn sword, was defended in the banner of justice; and in the third, St. Peter held the keys of concord and peace. Rienzi was encouraged by the presence and applause of an immense crowd, who understood little, and hoped much; and the procession slowly rolled forwards from the castle to the capitol, without being disturbed by some secret emotion which he laboured to suppress: he ascended without opposition, and with seeming confidence, the citadel of the republic; harangued the people from the balcony; and received the most flattering confirmation of his acts and laws. The nobles, as if desirous of arms and counsels, beheld in silent consternation this strange revolution; and the moment had been prudently chosen, when the most formidable, Stephen Colonna, was absent from the city. On the first rumour, he hurried to his palace, affrighted to desecrate this plebeian tumult, and declared to the messengers of Rienzi, that at his leisure he would cast the madman from the windows of the capital. The great hell instantly rang an alarm, and so rapid was the tide, and so urgent was the danger, that Colonna escaped with precipitation to the suburbs of Palestrina; lamenting his own imprudence, which had not troubled the spark of this mighty conflagration. A general and peremptory order was issued from the castle to the nobles, that they should retire to their estates; they obeyed; and their departure secured the tranquillity of the free and obedient citizens of Rome.

with the title But such voluntary obedience evapo- office of tribune. rates with the first transports of zeal; and Rienzi felt the importance of justifying his usurpation by a regular form and a legal title. At his own choice, the Roman people would have displayed their attachment and authority, by lavishing on his head the names of senator or consul, of king or emperor; he preferred the ancient and modest appellation of tribune; the protection of the commons was the essence of that sacred office; and they were ignorant, that it had never been invested with any share in the laws of the good legislative or executive powers of the state. In this character, and with the consent of the Romans, the tribune enacted the most salutary laws for the restoration and maintenance of the good estate. By the first he fulfilled the wish of honesty and inexperience, that no civil suit should be protracted beyond the term of fifteen days. The second was designed to protect property and justify the pronouncing against a false accuser the same penalty which his evidence would have inflicted: the disorders of the times might compel the legislator to punish every homicide with death, and every injury with equal retaliation. But the execution of justice was hopeless till he had previously abolished the tyranny of the nobles. It was formally provided, that none, except the supreme magistrate, should possess or contest the judgement, or review the decisions, of the state: that no private garrisons should be introduced into the towns or castles of the Roman territory; that none should bear arms, or presume to fortify their houses in the city or country; that the barons should be responsible for the safety of the highways, and the free passage of the citizens to and from the several castles. Malefactors and robbers should be expiated by a fine of a thousand marks of silver. But these regulations would have been impotent and nugatory, had not the licentious nobles been awed by the sword of the civil power. A sudden alarm from the bell of the capitol might indeed have settled a temporary harmony, instrumental on his right hand; and three great standards were borne aloft as the emblems of their design. In the first, the banner of liberty, Rome was seated on two lions, with a palm in one hand, and a glee in the other: St. Paul, with a drawn sword, was defended in the banner of justice; and in the third, St. Peter held the keys of concord and peace. Rienzi was encouraged by the presence and applause of an immense crowd, who understood little, and hoped much; and the procession slowly rolled forwards from the castle to the capitol, without being disturbed by some secret emotion which he laboured to suppress: he ascended without opposition, and with seeming confidence, the citadel of the republic; harangued the people from the balcony; and received the most flattering confirmation of his acts and laws. The nobles, as if desirous of arms and counsels, beheld in silent consternation this strange revolution; and the moment had been prudently chosen, when the most formidable, Stephen Colonna, was absent from the city. On the first rumour, he hurried to his palace, affrighted to desecrate this plebeian tumult, and declared to the messengers of Rienzi, that at his leisure he would cast the madman from the windows of the capital. The great hell instantly rang an alarm, and so rapid was the tide, and so urgent was the danger, that Colonna escaped with precipitation to the suburbs of Palestrina; lamenting his own imprudence, which had not troubled the spark of this mighty conflagration. A general and peremptory order was issued from the castle to the nobles, that they should retire to their estates; they obeyed; and their departure secured the tranquillity of the free and obedient citizens of Rome.

with the title But such voluntary obedience evapo- office of tribune. rates with the first transports of zeal; and Rienzi felt the importance of justifying his usurpation by a regular form and a legal title. At his own choice, the Roman people would have displayed their attachment and authority, by lavishing on his head the names of senator or consul, of king or emperor; he preferred the ancient and modest appellation of tribune; the protection of the commons was the essence of that sacred office; and they were ignorant, that it had never been invested with any share in the laws of the good legislative or executive powers of the state. In this character, and with the consent of the Romans, the tribune enacted the most salutary laws for the restoration and maintenance of the good estate. By the first he fulfilled the wish of honesty and inexperience, that no civil suit should be protracted beyond the term of fifteen days. The second was designed to protect property and justify the pronouncing against a false accuser the same penalty which his evidence would have inflicted: the disorders of the times might compel the legislator to punish every homicide with death, and every injury with equal retaliation. But the execution of justice was hopeless till he had previously abolished the tribune Rienzi. A den of robbers was converted to the discipline of a cam. or convent; patient to hear, swift to redress, inexorable to punish, his tribunal was widespread, and the fame and fortune of the tribunal throne, birth, or dignity, or the immunities of the church, protect the offender or his accomplices. The privileged houses, the private sanctuaries in Rome, on which no office of justice would presume to trespass, were abolished; and he applied the timber and iron of their bases to the fortresses of the capital. The venerable father of the Colonna was exposed in his own palace to the double shame of being desirous, and of being unable, to protect a criminal. A mule, with a jar of oil, had been stolen near Capranica; and the lord of the Ursini family was convicted of abstracting the damnum, and to discharge a fine of four hundred florins for his negligence in guarding the highways.

Nor were the persons of the barons more inviolate than their lands or houses: and, either from accident or design, the same imperial rigour was exercised against the traitors of the adverse faction, whose houses, and his uncles, a recent marriage, and a mortal disease, were disga~dered by the inflexible tribunal, who had chosen his victim. The public officers dragged him from his palace and nuptial bed; his trial was short and satisfactory; the hell of the capital convened the people, stripped them of their great officers, and the hands bound behind his back, he heard the sentence of death; and after a brief confession Ursini was led away to the gallows. After such an example, none who were conscious of guilt could hope for impunity, and the flight of the wicked, the licentious, and the idle, soon purged the city and territory Rome. In this time (says the historian) the woods began to rejoice that they were no longer infested with robbers; the oxen began to plough; the pilgrims visited the sanctuaries; the roads and inns were replenished with traders, and the markets; and a purse of gold might be exposed without danger in the midst of the highway. As soon as the life and property of the subject are secure, the labourers and rewards of industry spontaneously revive: Rome was still the metropolis of the christian world, and her commerce diffused in every country by the strangers who had enjoyed the blessings of his government.

The deliverance of his country inspired in Rienzi with a vast, and perhaps visionary, idea of uniting Italy in a great federative republic, of which Rome should be the ar-
cient and lawful head, and the free cities and princes the members and associates. His pen was not less eloquent than his tongue; and his numerous epistles were delivered to swift and trusty messengers. On foot, with a white wand in their hand, they traversed the forests, towns, and hostile states, the sacred security of ambassadors; and reported, in the style of flattery or truth, that the highways along their passage were lined with kneeling multitudes, who implored Heaven for the success of their undertaking. Could passion have listened to rea-on, could private interest have yielded to the public welfare, the supreme tribunal and confederate union of the Italian republic might have secured the birth, or dignity, or the immunities of the church, protect the offender or his accomplices. The privileged houses, the private sanctuaries in Rome, on which no office of justice would presume to trespass, were abolished; and he applied the timber and iron of their bases to the fortresses of the capital. The venerable father of the Colonna was exposed in his own palace to the double shame of being desirous, and of being unable, to protect a criminal. A mule, with a jar of oil, had been stolen near Capranica; and the lord of the Ursini family was convicted of abstracting the damnum, and to discharge a fine of four hundred florins for his negligence in guarding the highways.

Nor were the persons of the barons more inviolate

than their lands or houses: and, either from accident or design, the same imperial rigour was exercised against the traitors of the adverse faction, whose houses, and his uncles, a recent marriage, and a mortal disease, were disga~dered by the inflexible tribunal, who had chosen his victim. The public officers dragged him from his palace and nuptial bed; his trial was short and satisfactory; the hell of the capital convened the people, stripped them of their great officers, and the hands bound behind his back, he heard the sentence of death; and after a brief confession Ursini was led away to the gallows. After such an example, none who were conscious of guilt could hope for impunity, and the flight of the wicked, the licentious, and the idle, soon purged the city and territory Rome. In this time (says the historian) the woods began to rejoice that they were no longer infested with robbers; the oxen began to plough; the pilgrims visited the sanctuaries; the roads and inns were replenished with traders, and the markets; and a purse of gold might be exposed without danger in the midst of the highway. As soon as the life and property of the subject are secure, the labourers and rewards of industry spontaneously revive: Rome was still the metropolis of the christian world, and her commerce diffused in every country by the strangers who had enjoyed the blessings of his government.

The deliverance of his country inspired in Rienzi with a vast, and perhaps visionary, idea of uniting Italy in a great federative republic, of which Rome should be the ar-
cient and lawful head, and the free cities and princes the members and associates. His pen was not less eloquent than his tongue; and his numerous epistles were delivered to swift and trusty messengers. On foot, with a white wand in their hand, they traversed the forests, towns, and hostile states, the sacred security of ambassadors; and reported, in the style of flattery or truth, that the highways along their passage were lined with kneeling multitudes, who implored Heaven for the success of their undertaking. Could passion have listened to rea-on, could private interest have yielded to the public welfare, the supreme tribunal and confederate union of the Italian republic might have secured the
and that as often as they visited the city on foot, a single rator, or head, attended the exercise of their office. The Gracchi would have frowned or smiled, could they have beheld the sombre ceremonies and epitaphs of their successor, Nicholas, Severe and Merciful; Deliverer of Rome; Defender of Italy; Friend of Mankind, and of Liberty, Peace, and Justice; Truncated? 1 This historical pageant had prepared the revolution; but Rienzi abused it, in luxury and pride, the political means of speaking to the ages, as undeceived; the understanding of the multitude. From nature he had received the gift of an handsome person, 2 till it was swelled and disfigured by intemperance; and his propensity to laughter was corrected in the magistrate by the affectation of gravity and sternness. He was celebrated, in public occasions, in a party-coloured robe of velvet or satin, lined with fur, and embroidered with gold: the rod of justice, which he carried in his hand, was a sceptre of polished steel, crowned with a globe and cross of gold, and enclosing a small fragment of the lance and holy wood. In his civil and religious processes through the city, he rode on a white steed, the symbol of royalty: the great banner of the republic, a sun with a circle of stars, a dove with an olive branch, was displayed over his head; a shower of gold and silver was scattered among the populace; fifty guards with halberds preceded his person; a troop of horse preceded his march; and their tymbals and trumpets were of massy silver.

The ambition of the honours of chivalry 3 betrayed the meanness of his birth, and degraded the importance of his authority. The civil and the religious tribune was not less odious to the nobles, whom he adopted, than to the plebeians, whom he deserted. All that yet remained of treasure, or luxury, or art, was exhausted on that solemn day. Rienzi led the procession from the capital to the Lateran: the solemnity of the way was enriched with decorations and games; the ecclesiastical, civil, and military orders marched under their various banners; the Roman ladies attended his wife; and the ambassadors of Italy might loudly applaud, or secretly deride, the novelty of the pomp. In the evening they had reached the church and palace of Constantine, he thanked and dismissed the numerous assembly, with an invitation to the festival of the ensuing day. From the hands of a venerable knight he received the order of the Holy Ghost; the purification of the bath was a previous ceremony; but in no step of his life did Rienzi exercise such exalted Rind as that by the profane use of the purifying water, in which Constantine (a foolish legend) had been healed of his leprosy by pope Sylvester. 4 With equal presumption the triune watched or reposed within the consecrated precincts of the baptistry; and the failure of his state-heal was interpreted as an omen of his approaching downfall. At the hour of worship, he showed himself to the returning crowds in a majestic attitude, with a robe of purple, his sword, and girt spurs; but the holy rites were interrupted by his levity and insolence. Rising from his throne, and advancing toward the congregation, he proclaimed in a loud voice: We summon to our tribunal pope Clement; and command him to reside in his diocese of Rome: we also summon the seven fold in the name of the Roman people, the ancient and lawful sovereigns of the empire, the two pretenders, Charles of Bohemia and Lewis of Bavaria, who style themselves emperors: we likewise summon all the electors of Germany, to inform us on what pretence they have usurped the inalienable right of the Roman people, the ancient and lawful sovereigns of the empire, the two pretenders, Charles of Bohemia and Lewis of Bavaria, who style themselves emperors: and thrice repeated the extravagant declaration, And this too is mine! The pope's vicar, the bishop of Orvieto, attempted to check this earful of folly; but his feeble and nameless by martial music; and instead of withdrawing from the assembly, betook himself to dine with his brother tribune, at a table which had hitherto been reserved for the supreme pontiff. A banquet, such as the Caesars had given, was prepared for the Romans. The apartments, porches, and courts of the Lateran were spread with innumerable tables for either sex, and every condition; a stream of wine flowed from the nostrils of Constantin's brazen horse; no complaint, except of the scarcity of water, could be heard; and the luxuriance of the multitude was curbed by discipline and fear. A subterraneous passage was opened and consecrated; and the consecration of Rienzi; seven crowns of different leaves or metals were successively placed on his head by the most eminent of the Roman clergy; they represented the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost; and he still profess ed to imitate the example of the ancient tribunes. These extraordinary spectacles might deceive the vulgar, and charm the people; and their own vanity was gratified in the vanity of their leader. But in his private life he soon deviated from the strict rule of frugality and abstinence; and the plebeians, who were awed by the splendour of his towers, were provoked by the luxury of their equal. His wife, his son, his uncle (a bachelor in name and profession,) exposed the contrast of vulgar manners and princely expense: and without acquiring the majesty, Rienzi degenerated into the vices, of a king.

A simple citizen describes with pity or perhaps with pleasure, the humiliation of the nobles of the barons of Rome. Bare-headed, Rome, they were deprived of their nobleness by the power of the prince. 5 Their hands crossed on their breast, they stood with downcast looks in the presence of the tribune; and they trembled, good God, how they trembled! 6 As long as the famous old cardinals were the rule of the country, their conscience forced them to esteem the man, whom pride and interest provoked them to hate; his extravagant conduct soon forfeited their hatred by contempt; and they conceived the hope of subverting a power which was no longer so deeply rooted in the public confidence. The old animosity of the Colonna and Ursini was suspended for a moment by their common disgrace: they associated their wishes, and hoped their designs; an assassin was seized and tortured; he accused the nobles; and as soon as Rienzi discovered the fact, he adopted the suspicions and maxims of a tyrant. On the same day, under various pretences, he invited to the capital his principal enemies, among whom were five members of the Ursini and three of the Colonna name. But instead of a council or a banquet, they found themselves prisoners under

1 I could not express in English the forcible, though barbarous, title of Zelator Italiano, which Rienzi assumed.
2 Era Bella. Quoici (i. c. p. 339) it is remarkable, that the titles of the ancient heroes of the Roman stage are written in the Roman MS., from which Muratori has given the text. In his second reign, when he was a warden, Rienzi (di Chelvoni verticato, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.) is called a great man.
3 Strange as it may seem, this festival was not without a precedent. In the time of Julius Caesar, a Columna and an Ursinus were centum balancing, a centum in triumphate, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.
4 Strange as it may seem, this festival was not without a precedent. In the time of Julius Caesar, a Columna and an Ursinus were centum balancing, a centum in triumphate, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.
5 Strange as it may seem, this festival was not without a precedent. In the time of Julius Caesar, a Columna and an Ursinus were centum balancing, a centum in triumphate, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.
6 Strange as it may seem, this festival was not without a precedent. In the time of Julius Caesar, a Columna and an Ursinus were centum balancing, a centum in triumphate, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.
7 Strange as it may seem, this festival was not without a precedent. In the time of Julius Caesar, a Columna and an Ursinus were centum balancing, a centum in triumphate, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.
8 Strange as it may seem, this festival was not without a precedent. In the time of Julius Caesar, a Columna and an Ursinus were centum balancing, a centum in triumphate, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.
9 Strange as it may seem, this festival was not without a precedent. In the time of Julius Caesar, a Columna and an Ursinus were centum balancing, a centum in triumphate, a modo de uno Abate Ansino, or Ansino, iii. c. 18, p. 52.
the sword of despotism or justice; and the consciousness of innocence or guilt might inspire them with equal apprehensions of danger. At the sound of the great bell the people assembled; they were arraigned for a conspiracy against the tribune's life; and though some excited whisperings during the trial were not, as nor a voice, was raised to rescue the first of the nobi-ty from their impending doom. Their apparent boldness was promptly by despair; they passed in separate chambers a sleepless and painful night; and the venerable hero, Stephen Colonna, striking against the door of the tribune's cell, and covering the eyes of the liver him, by a speedy death, from such ignominious servitude. The great hall of the capitol had been decorated for the bloody scene with red and white hangings; the countenance of the tribune was dark and severe; the swords of the executioners were unsheathed;

and the barons were interrupted in their dying speeches by the sound of trumpets. But in this decisive moment, Rienzi was not less anxious or apprehensive than his captives: he dreaded the splendour of their names, their surviving kinsmen, the inconstancy of the people, the presence of a world, and, after all, his memory of mortal injury, he vainly presumed that, if he could forgive, he might himself be forgiven. His elaborate creation was that of a christian and a suppliant; and, as the humble minister of the commons, he entreated his masters to pardon these noble criminals, for whose recovery the people sympathized with his fidelity and authority. "If you are spared," said the tribune, "by the mercy of the Romans, will you not promise to support the good estate with your lives and fortunes." Astonished by this marvellous clemency, the barons bowed their heads; and while they devoutly repeated the words of forgiveness, a cross was placed on their heads, and a mark of more sincere, assurance of revenge.

A priest, in the name of the people, pronounced their absolute;
they received the communion with the tribune, assisted at the banquet, followed the procession; and, after every spiritual and temporal sign of re-tribulation, were dismissed in safety to their respective homes, with the new honours and titles of generals, consuls, and patricians.1

They oppose Rienzi. During some weeks they were checkenz in arms, ed by the memory of their danger, rather than by any deliverance. Greatly to impose a new St. Urbin, escorted with the Colonna from the city, greeted at Marino the standard of rebellion. The fortifications of the castle were instantly restored; the vassals attended their lord; the outlaws armed against the magistrate; the flocks and herds, the harvests and vines were swept away or destroyed; and the people armed Rienzi as the author of the calamities which his govern-moot had taught them to forget. In the camp, Rienzi appeared to lose advantage than in the rostrum; and he neglected the progress of the rebel barons till their numbers were strong, and their castles impregnable.
From the pages of Livy, he had not imbibed the art, or even the courage, of a general: an army of twenty thousand Romans returned without honour or effect from the attack of Marino; and his vengeance was amused by painting his enemies, their heads downward, and dragging, two thousand feet behind him, the dead, the wounded, and the slain. The city was prepared for their reception: the alarm-bell rung all night; the gates were strictly guarded, or insolently open; and after some hesitation they sounded a retreat. The two first divisions had passed along the walls, but the prospect of a free entrance

1 The original letter, in which Rienzi justifies his treatment of the Colonna, (Hocesinum, apud d. Cercap, p. 222—223.) displays, in genuine spirit, the mixture of the knave and the madman.

Vol. II.—3 L

tempted the headstrong valor of the nobles in the rear; and after a successful skirmish, they were overthrown and massacred without quarter by the crowds of the Roman people. Stephen Colonna, the younger, the noble spirit to whom the triumph was preceded or accompanied in death by his son John, a gallant youth, by his brother Peter, who might regret the ease and honors of the church, by a nephew of legitimate birth, and by two bastards of the Colonna race; and the number of seven, the seven crowns, which the Pope in his execration, Dictator, completed by the agony of the deplorable parent, of the veteran chief, who had survived the hope and fortune of his house. The vision and prophecies of St. Martin and pope Boniface had been used by the tribune to animate his troops;2 he displayed, at least in the pursuit, the spirit of a hero; but he forgot the maxims of the ancient Romans, who abhorred the triumphs of civil war. The conqueror ascended the capitol; deposited his crown and sceptre on the altar: and boasted with some truth, that he had "spread not an ear, nor have I been able to amputate." His base and imitable revenge denied the honours of burial; and the bodies of the Colonna, which he threatened to expose with those of the vilest malefactors, were secretly interr by the holy virgins of their name and family. The people used their influence with their relatives to own fury, and detested the indecent joy of Rienzi, who visited the spot where these illustrious victims had fallen. It was on that fatal spot that he conferred on his son the honour of knighthood; and the ceremony was accomplished by a slight blow from each of the hands of the crowned, and by a ridiculous inhuman ablution from a pool of water, which was yet polluted with patrician blood.3

A short delay would have saved the Fall and death Colonna, the delay of a single month, which elapsed between the triumph and the exile of Rienzi. In the pride of victory, he forfitted what yet remained of his civil virtue, without acquiring the fame of military prowess. A free and vigorous opposition was formed in the city;
and when the tribune proposed in the public council1 the murder of the remaining twenty barons of Perugia, thirty-nine men voted against his measures; repelled the injurious charge of treachery and corruption; and urged him to prove, by their forcible exclusion, that, if the populace adhered to his cause, it was already disclaimed by the most respectatible citizens. The Pope, and the sacred cgurse, never been dazzled by his specious professions; they were justly offended by the insolence of his conduct;
a cardinal legate was sent to Italy, and after some

2 Rienzi, in the above-mentioned letter, ascribes to St. Martin the tribune. Boniface VIII, the enemy of Colonna, himself, and the Roman people. the glory of the day, which Villani likens (C. 12, c.
161.) describes as a regular battle. The disorderly skirmish, the flight of the Romans, and the cowardice of Rienzi, are painted in the single and unvaried narrative of Fortebraccio, or the anonymous historian, (t. ii. c. 31—37.)

3 In describing the death of the Colonna, I speak only of the family of Stephen the elder, who is often confounded by the P. d. Cercap with his son. That family was extinguished, but the house has been perpetuated by collateral branches which have be"narily the representatives of the Ursini.

The belief of his incapacity encouraged their operations: they were invited by their secret adherents;
and the barons attempted, with four thousand foot and sixteen thousand horse, to raze to the ground their city of.Rome. The city was prepared for their reception: the alarm-bell rung all night; the gates were strictly guarded, or insolently open; and after some hesitation they sounded a retreat. The two first divisions had passed along the walls, but the prospect of a free entrance

1 These were the first and only letters in which Rienzi mentions the death of the Colonna, (Socrates, epist. 13, p. 639, 630.) The friend was lost in the patriot. Nulla esto ordine principalius epistola; care victoria jus-ri, care Roma, care Italia.

2 This council and opposition is obscurely mentioned by Pellinrocher, a contemporary writer, who has preserved some corruptions and original facts. Bri. Gall. ii. xxxv. c. 31. p. 790—791.
fruitless treaty, and two personal interviews, he fulmi-nated a bull of excommunication, in which the tribune was degraded from his office, and branded with the guilt of rebellion, sacrilege, and heresy. The surviving barons of Rome were now humbled to a sense of nagrion; their interest and revenge, encouraged them in the service of the church; but as the fate of the Colonna was before their eyes, they abandoned to a private adventurer the peril and glory of the revolution. John Pepin, count of Minorinov6 in the kingship of Naples, who had been expelled, after his crimes, or his riches, to perpetual imprisonment; and Petrarch, by soliciting his release, indirectly contributed to the ruin of his friend. At the head of one hundred and fifty soldiers, the count of Minorino introduced himself into Rome; barricaded the quarter of the Colonna; and found the enterprise as easy as it had seemed impossible. From the first alarm, the bell of the capitol incessantly tolled; but, instead of repairing to the well-known sound, the people were silent and inactive; and the pusillanimous Rienzi, depriving their infringements with sighs and tears, abdicated the government and power of the republic.

Revolutions of Rome.

Without drawing his sword, count
A. D. 1347—1354.

Pepin restored the aristocracy of the church; three senators were chosen, and the legate assuming the first rank, accepted his two colleagues from the rival families of Colonna and Ursini. In the triumph of his head, a priest was proscribed; yet such was the terror of his name, that the barons hesitated three days, before they would trust themselves in the city, and Rienzi was left above a month in the castle of St. Angelo, from whence he was not willingly withdrawn, after his labouring without effect, to revive the afflicion and courage of the Romans. The vision of freedom and empire had vanished: their fallen spirit would have acquiesced in servitude, had it been smoothed by tranquillity and order; and it was scarcely observed, that the new senators, elected by a spirit of independence from his Apostolick head, that four cardinals were appointed to reform, with dictatorial power, the state of the republic. Rome was again agitated by the bloody feuds of the barons, who detested each other, and despised the commons:
their hostile fortresses, both in town and country, ancient and modern, and the peaceful citizens, a flock of sheep, were devoured, says the Florentine historian, by these rapacious wolves. But when their pride and avarice had exhausted the patience of the Romans, a confraternity of the Virgin Mary protected them, and after a few minutes, the bell of the capitol was again tolled, the nobles in arms trod the presence of an unarmed multitude; and of the twenty senators, Colonna escaped from the window of the palace, and Ursini was stoned at the foot of the altar. The dangerous office of tribune was successively occupied by two plebeians, Cerroni and Baron-celli. The mildness of Cerroni was unequal to the times; and after a faint struggle, he retired with a fair reputation or genius, Baronecelli was distinguished by a resolute spirit: he spoke the language of a patriot, and tried in the footsteps of tyrants, his suspension was a sentence of death, and his own death was the reward of his cruelties. Amidst the public misfortunes, the faults of Rienzi were fortozen; and the Romans sighed for the peace and prosperity of the good estate.7

After an exile of seven years, the first Advances of

deliverer was again restored to his country. In the disguise of a monk or a pilgrim, he escaped from the castle of St. Angelo, implored the blessings of the holy religious, and, forsook the insatiable ambition of every bold adventurer, mingled at Rome with the pilgrims of the jubilee, lay concealed among the hermits of the Apennine, and wandered through the cities of Italy, Germany, and Bohemia.
His person was invisible, his name was yet formula-ded; a name was more powerful to produce modern miracles and even magnifies, his personal merit. The emperor Charles the fourth gave audience to a stranger, who frankly revealed himself as the tribune of the republic; and astonished an assembly of ambassadors and princes, by the eloquence of a prophet and the visions of a saint, the downfall of tyranny and the kingdom of the Holy Ghost. Whatever had been his hopes, Rienzi found himself a captive; but he supported a character of independence and dignity, and obeyed, as his own choice, the irresistible summons of the supreme pontiff. The zeal of Petrarch, which had been expressed in theunky conduct, as well by the sufferings and the presence, of his friend; and he boldly complies of the times, in which the saviour of Rome was delivered by her emperor into the hands of her bishop. Rienzi was transported A prisoner at slowly, but in safe custody, from Prague to the seat of Rienzi, it was that of a malefactor; in his prison he was chained by the leg; and four cardinals were named to inquire into the crimes of heresy and rebellion. But his trial and condemnation would have involved some questions, which the pontiff was more reluctant to have decided;

and the celebrated mystery: the temporal supremacy of the popes; a duty of residence; the civil and ecclesiastical privilege of the clergy and people of Rome. The reigning pontiff welcomed the appellation of Clement; the strange visions and magnificent spirit of the captive excited the pity and charity of Petrarch; he respected in him the hero the name and sacred character of a poet.4 Rienzi was indulged with an easy confinement and the use of books; and in the assiduous study of Livy and the Bible, he sought the cause and the consolation of his misfortunes.

The Roman Senate, in their second
A. D. 1354.

The year of Rienzi, senator of Rome, the sixth opened a new prospect of his deliverance and restoration; and the court of Avignon was persuaded, that the successful rebel could alone appease and reform the anarchy of the kingdom. The ordinals of the Roman tribune was sent into Italy, with the title of senator; but the death of Baronecelli appeared to supersede the use of his mission; and the legate, cardinal Albornoz5 a consummate statesman, allowed him with reluctance, and without aid, to undertake the perilous experiment. His first reception was equal to his wishes: the day of his entrance was a public festival; and his eloquence and authority revived the laws of the good estate. But this momentary sunshine was soon clouded by his own vices and those of the people; in the capitol, he might often regret the Thomas Fortiiscesta. (L. lib. c. 1.) I have slightly varied over these second characters, who imitated them.

6 These visions, of which the friends and the enemies of Rienzi seem alike ignorant, are surely magnified by the zeal of Politioro, a

D. N. (1347, No. 15. 17. 21. &c. who found them in the archives of the Vatican.

Maresco Villani describes the origin, character, and death of this count. Petrarch;translated by the P. du Cerceau (p. 196. 220.) from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Obertin Roylandus, (A. D. 1347. No. 15. 17. 21. &c. who found them in the archives of the Vatican.

9 The troubles of Rome, from the departure to the return of Rienzi, are related by Maresco Villani (L. lib. c. 47. l. lib. c. 33. 37. 79.) and

† The briefs and bulls of Clement VI. against Rienzi, are translated by the P. du Cerceau (p. 196. 222.) from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Obertin Roylandus, (A. D. 1347. No. 15. 17. 21. &c. who found them in the archives of the Vatican.

Maresco Villani describes the origin, character, and death of this count: Petrarch;translated by the P. du Cerceau (p. 196. 220.) from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Obertin Roylandus, (A. D. 1347. No. 15. 17. 21. &c. who found them in the archives of the Vatican.

The troubles of Rome, from the departure to the return of Rienzi, are related by Maresco Villani (L. lib. c. 47. l. lib. c. 33. 37. 79.) and

† The briefs and bulls of Clement VI. against Rienzi, are translated by the P. du Cerceau (p. 196. 222.) from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Obertin Roylandus, (A. D. 1347. No. 15. 17. 21. &c. who found them in the archives of the Vatican. 4

Maresco Villani describes the origin, character, and death of this count. Petrarch;translated by the P. du Cerceau (p. 196. 220.) from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Obertin Roylandus, (A. D. 1347. No. 15. 17. 21. &c. who found them in the archives of the Vatican.
prison of Avignon; and after a second administration of four months, Rienz was massacred in a tumult which had been fomented by the Roman barons. In the society of the Germans and Bohemians, he is said to have contracted the habits of intemperance and cruelty; adversity had chilled his enthusiasm, without fortifying his reason or virtue; and that youthful hope of abstracting the people from the pledge of success, was now succeeded by the cold impotence of distrust and despair. The tribune had reigned with absolute dominion, by the choice, and in the hearts, of the Romans: the senator was the servile minister of a foreign court; and while he was suspected of ingratitude and perfidy.

The legate Albornoz, who seemed desirous of his ruin, inflexibly refused all supplies of men and money; a faithful subject could no longer pressume to touch the revenues of the apostolical chamber; and the first idea of a tax was the signal of clamour and sedition. Even his justice was tainted with the guilt or reproach of selfish cruelty: the most virtuous citizen of Rome was sacrificed to his jealousy; and in the execution of a public robber, from whose purse he had been assisted, the magistrate too much forgot, or too much remembered, the obligations of the debtor. His measures were always treacherous, and the influence of the city: the Colonna maintained their hostile station at Palestrina; and his mercenaries soon despised a leader whose ignorance and fear were envious of all subordinate merit. In the death as in the life of Rienzi, his heroism and cowardice were strangely mingled. When the capitol was invested by a furious multitude, when he was hastily deserted by his civil and military servants, the intrepid senator, waving the banner of liberty, presented himself on the balcony, addressed his eloquence to the various passions of his judges and executions. A whole hour, without voice or motion, he stood amidst the multitude half naked and half dead; their rage was hushed into curiosity and wonder: the last feelings of reverence and compassion yet struggled in his favour; and they might have prevailed, if a bold assassin had not plunged a dagger in his breast. He fell senseless with the first stroke; the impotent revenge of his enemies inflicted a thousand wounds; and the senator’s body was abandoned to the dogs, to the Jews, and to the flames; the symbol of all evil. The populace, in all the blessings of this extraordinary misfortune; but in a long period of anarchy and servitude, the name of Rienzi has often been celebrated as the deliverer of his country, and the last of the Roman patriots.1

Petrarcli invites and endeavors to recall the Roman bishop to his ancient residence.

The first and most generous wish of Petrarch was the restoration of a free republic; but after the exile and death of his plebeian hero, he turned his eyes—from the tribune, to the king, of the Romans. The capitol was yet stained with the blood of Rienzi, when Charles the fourth descended from the Alps to obtain the crown of Italian and imperial crowns. In his passage through Milan, he received the visit, and repaid the flattery, of the pock-leavened, accepted a medal of Augustus; and promised, without a smile, to imitate the founder of the Roman monarchy. A false application of the names and titles of ancestors of the Carolingian house, to the disappointments of Petrarch; yet he could not overlook the difference of taste and characters; the immeasurable distance between the first Cæsars and a Bohemian prince, who by the favour of the clergy had been elected the titular head of the German aristocracy. Instead of a poet and a military adventurer, she had been bound, by a secret treaty with the pope, to evacuate the city on the day of his coronation; and his shameless retreat was pursued by the reproaches of the patriot bard.2

After the loss of liberty and empire, He solicits the3 pope to fix their residence at Rome and peculiar diocese. In the fervour of youth, with the authority of age, Petrarch addressed his exhortations to five successive popes, and his eloquence was always inspired by the enthusiasm of sentiment and the freedom of language.3 The son of a citizen of Florence invariably preferred the country of his birth to that of his education; and Italy, in his eyes, was the queen and garden of the world. Amidst her domestic factions, she was doubtless superior to France both in art and science; but her treachery and perfidiousness; and the difference could scarcely support the epitaph of baronets, which he promise-ly bestows on the countries beyond the Alps. Avignon, the mystic Babylon, the sink of vice and corruption, was the object of his compassion, and contempt; for the exorbitant and licentious vices were not the growth of the soil, and that in every residence they would adhere to the power and luxury of the papal court. He confesses, that the successor of St. Peter is the bishop of the universal church; yet it was not on the banks of the Rhone, but of the Tiber, that the apostle had fixed his everlasting throne: and while every city in the christian world was blessed with a bishop, the metropolis alone was desolate and forlorn. Since the removal of the holy see, the sacred buildings of the Lateran and the Vatican, their altars and their saints, were left in a state of poverty and decay; and Rome was often paint-3 ered under the image of a desolate matron, as if the wandering husband could be reclaimed by the homely portrait of the age and infirmities of the weeping spouse.4 But the cloud which hung over the seven hills, would be dispelled by the presence of their lawful sovereign; eternal fame, the prosperity of Rome, and the peace of Italy, would be the recompence of the pope who should dare to embrace this generous resolution. Of the five whom Petrarch exhorted, the three first, John the twenty-second, Benedict the twelfth, and Peter the sixth, judged more by the splendour of the court than by the boldness of the orator; but the memorable change which had been attempted by Urban the fifth, was finally accomplished by Gregory the eleventh.

1 The hopes and the disappointment of Per-trach are agreeably described in his own words by the French biographer, (Memoires, iii. p. 375—413) but the deep, though secret, wound, was the corona of Zamblii the post-lateran, by Charles IV.

2 See in his accoutrements, as well as his destiny, the application of Petrarch and Rienzi to Benedict II, in the year 1374, (Memoires, tom. i. p. 281—285) and in the application of Rienzi to Urban V. in 1356, (Memoires, tom. iii. p. 477—691) his praise, (p. 715—715) and his disappointment, (p. 773—775) compared to those of those who were disappointed of advancement on the respective merits of France and Italy may be found. (Opp. p. 995—995)

3 Sinfonia, and quinque canticolum, solitutum invento.

4 Petri et Benedicti II. delinquentes effigie, veulta accipiunt, de rebus singulis, occidenti, Rome loco.

5 (Carol. i. p. 2. p. 77)

6 He admits this allegory beyond mere illustration of the Empire of Urbani V. in peace are more simple and persuasive. (Semiunii, i. v. p. 511—526, i. 1. p. 514—514.)
execution of their design was opposed by weighty and almost insuperable obstacles. A king of France who has deserved the epithet of wise, was unwilling to release them from a local dependence: the cardinals, for the most part his subjects, were attached to the local government of their climates and to their stately palaces; above all, to the wines of Burgundy.

In their eyes, Italy was foreign or hostile; and they reluctantly embarked at Marseilles, as if they had been sold or ransomed. At the triple bridge of Sweden, a saint and pilgrim, disapproved the return, and foretold the death, of Urban the fifth: the migration of Gregory the eleventh, was encouraged by St. Catherine of Sienna, the sponsor of St. Thomas and of the people of the Flanders, and the popes themselves, the great masters of human credulity, appear to have listened to these visionary females. ¹ Yet those celestial admonitions were supported by some arguments of temporal policy. The residence of Avignon had been the scene of a hundred and thirty thousand robbers, a hero had extorted ransom and absolution from the vicar of Christ and the sacred college; and the maxim of the French warriors, to spare the people and plunder the church, was a new heresy of the most dangerous import. ² While the pope was directly threatened with death, he was attentively invited to Rome. The senate and people acknowledged him as their lawful sovereign, and laid at his feet the keys of the gates, the bridges, and the fortresses; of the quarter at least beyond the Tiber. ³ But this loyal offer was rejected by a demagogue, who desired no longer to suffer the scandal and calumny of his absence; and that his obstinacy would finally provoke them to revive and assert the primitive right of election. The abbot of mount Cassin had been consulted, whether he would accept the triple crown ⁴ from the cardinals and the people of Avignon. I am not aware that venerable ecclesiastical, and my first law is the voice of my country. ⁵

¹ I have not the means of repeating on the legends of St. Bridget, or St. Catherine, the last of which might furnish some amusing stories. Their effect on the mind of Gregory XI. is attested by the last edicta of the dying pope, who addressed the assizes, as chancery ab hominibus, sive viris, sive mulieribus, sive religiosis, sive literis, sive mercatoribus, quos per talia ius secutus, &c. (Bulz. Not. et V. Pap. Avinatescum, tom. i. p. 1223.)

² This perilous expedition is related by Froissart, (Chronique, tom. iv. p. 253.) and in the Life of St. Catherine, (Chroniques Generales de M. des Memoires Historiques, tom. iv. (1697) p. 109—113.) As early as the year 1371 the city of Avignon had been invested and occasioned by garrisons of the boorish, who afterwards passed the Alps. (Memoires sur Papiet, tom. iv. p. 529.)

³ Fleury alleges, from the annals of Odoacer Raymundo, the original treaty which was signed the twentieth day of February 1376, between Gregory XI. and the Romans. (Hist. Eccles. tom. vi. p. 702.)

⁴ The first crown or regnum (Ducange, Gloss. Latin, tom. v. p. 702.) of the apostolic mitre of the pope, is ascribed to the gift of Constantine, or of Clovis. The second was added by Boniface VIII. as the emblem not only of a spiritual, but of a temporal kingdom. It was first presented by a pious king, who was instructed by John XXII. or Benedict XII. (Memoires sur Papiet, tom. iv. p. 528.)

⁵ Baluze (Not. et V. Pap. Avinatescum, tom. i. p. 1194—1195) produces the original volunteering which attests the threats of the Romans ambassadors, and the resignation of the abbot of mount Cassin, qui ulbo se ooffee, respondit, consuevum Romanum esse et illud velis ipsi vel patres, &c. (Bulz. Not. et V. Pap. Avinatescum, tom. i. p. 1269.)

At the departure of the schism, every circumspection was severely, if superstition will interpret an unimpeachable, or, though partially, scrutinized; more especially in the great inquest, which decided the occasion of Castile, and in which Baluze, in his capacity of advocate, gave a complete and agreeable view of the lay library. (p. 1281.)

¹ The first book of the Histoire du Concile de Pise, M. Lestant, has abridged and compared the original narratives of the assembled cardinals of Urban and Clement, of the Italians and Germans, the French and tions and duties of their parishes at Rome; and had he not fatally delayed a new promotion, the French cardinals would have been reduced to a helpless minority in the sacred college. For these reasons, and in hopes of the peace and unity of the church, and the merits of their double choice are yet agitated in the Catholic schools. The vanity rather than the interest of the nation determined the court and clergy of France.

The states of Savoy, Sicily, Cyprus, Aragon, Castile, Navarre, and Scotland, with their example and authority to the obedience of Clement the seventh, and, after his decease, of Benedict the thirteenth. Rome and the principal states of Italy, Germany, Portugal, England,^{6} the Low Countries, and the kingdoms of the North, adhered to the prior election of France. But the separation of France and Spain diverted the stream of lucrative devotion; nor could the loss be compensated by the two jubilees which were crowded into the space of ten years. By the avocations of the schism, by foreign arms, and popular tumults, the civil and ecclesiastical order of society was disturbed, and the Romans had their full share of the mischiefs of which they may be arraigned as the primary authors.

They had vainly flattered themselves with the hope of restoring the seat of the ecclesiastical monarchy, and of relieving their poverty with the revenues of the French factions. Nor was there any reason why the Romans should not have shared in the advantages which the union of France and Spain had promised to bestow on the universal church. The Colonna and Ursini still ex-reised their deadly foes: the banerettes of Rome asserted and abused the privileges of a republic: the vices of Corrario, who had levied military force, chastised their rebellion with the gibbet, the sword, and the dagger; and, in a friendly conference, eleven deputies of the people were perfidiously murdered and cast into the street.

Since the invasion of Robert the Norman, the Romans had pursued their domestic quarrels without regard to the national interest, and to the disorder of the schism, an aspiring neighbour, Ladislaus king of Naples, alternately supported and betrayed the pope and the people: by the former he was declared donandola, or general, of the church, while the latter submitted to his choice the nomination of his successor. But as the disorder of the schism, an aspiring neighbour, Ladislaus king of Naples, alternately supported and betrayed the pope and the people: by the former he was declared donandola, or general, of the church, while the latter submitted to his choice the nomination of his successor. But as the...
The Christian world was at length profoundly moved by their obstinacy and fraud: they were deserted by their cardinals, who embraced each other as friends and colleagues; and their revolt was supported by a numerous assemblage of prelates and unconverted seculars of the French order. The faction, in which the pope was deposed the popes of Rome and Avignon; the concile was unanimous in the choice of Alexander the fifth, and his vacant seat was soon filled by a similar election of John the twenty-third, the most profligate of mankind. But instead of extinguishing the schism, the business of the conclave, instead of coming to an end, was speedily reduced to a third precedent to the chair of St. Peter. Such new claims of the synod and concil were disputed: three kings, of Germany, Hungary, and Naples, adhered to the cause of Gregory the twelfth; and Benedict the thirteenth, himself a Spaniard, was acknowledged by the devotion and patriotism of that powerful nation.

The rash proceedings of Pisa were corrected by the Council of Constance. The emperor Sigismund acted a conspicuous part as the advocate or protector of the catholic church, and in such a character the civil and ecclesiastical might seem to constitute the states-general of Europe. Of the three popes, John the twenty-third was the first victim; he fled and was brought back a prisoner: the most scandalous charges were suppressed; the fear of Christ was not mere murder, rape, and incest, but after subscribing his own condemnation, he expired in prison the imprudence of trusting his person to a free city beyond the Alps. Gregory the twelfth, whose obedience was reduced to the narrow precincts of Rimini, descended with more honour from the throne, and for a time was restored to his imperial dignity. He had pronounced the title and authority of lawful pope. To vanquish the obstinacy of Benedict the thirteenth or his adherents, the emperor in person undertook a journey from Constance to Perugia. The kings of Castile, Aragon, and Navarre, had attained an equal and honourable treaty: with the concurrence of the Spaniards, Benedict was deposed by the council; but the harmless old man was left in a military castle to communicate twice each day the rebel kingdoms which led desolated his cause. After thus eradicating the remaining remaining, the synod entered into new negotiations with slow and cautious steps to elect the sovereign of Rome and the head of the church. On this memorable occasion, the college of twenty-three cardinals was fortified with thirty deputies; six of whom were chosen in each of the five great nations of Christendom, the empire, France, England, the Papal States, and the English: the interference of strangers was softened by their generous preference of an Italian and a Roman of the first rank; and the hereditary, as well as personal, merit of Otho Colonna recommended him to the conclav. Rome accepted with joy and obedience the noblest of her sons; the ecclesiastical state was defended by his powerful family, and the elevation of Martin the fifth is the era of the restoration and establishment of the popes in the Vatican.

The royal prerogative of conferring money, which had been exercised near three hundred years by the senate, was first resumed by Martin the fifth, and his image and superscription introduced the series of the papal medals. Of his two immediate successors, the fourth and the fifth, the last pope expelled by the tumults of the Roman people, and Nicholas the first who was importuned by the presence of a Roman emperor. The conflict of Eugenius, with the French, and the fear of revolt or apprehension of a new excise, imbosed and provoked the Romans to usurp the temporal government of the city. They rose in arms, elected seven governors of the republic, and a constable of the capitol; imprisoned the pope, and concerted a plan of invading the palace; and shot volleys of arrows into his bark as he escaped down the Tiber in the habit of a monk. But he still possessed in the castle of St. Angelo a faithful garrison and a train of artillery: their hatteries incessantly thunders on the city, and a bullet, more destructive than the swords of the French, pierced the bridge, and scattered with a single shot the heroes of the republic. Their constancy was exhausted by a rebellion of five months. Under the tyranny of the Guineline nobles, the wisest patriots regretted the dominion of the church; and the republic was unmanned and effectual. The troops of St. Peter again occupied the capitol; the magistrates departed to their homes; the most guilty were executed or exiled; and thelegate, at the head of two thousand foot and four thousand horse, was saluted as the father of the city.

The councils of Trent and Florence, the fear or resentment of Eugenius, prolonged his absence; he was received by a submissive people; but the pontiff understood from the acclamations of his triumphal entry, that to secure their loyalty and his own repose, he must grant without delay the abolition of the odious excise. If the council of Trent, which in the year 1475, was summoned by the peaceful reign of Nicholas the fifth, in the midst of these laudable occupations, the pope was alarmed at the approach of Frederic the third of Austria. Last coronation tria; though his fears could not be justified of a German emperor by the character or the power of the Austrians. The Emperor Frederic III, who lived at the time, and is considered the last of the German emperors, was admitted to the metropolis, and imposing the most severe measures of justice and good government. He was received with a smiling countenance the faithful advocate and vassal of the church. So tame were the times, so feeble was the Austrian, that the pomp of his coronation was accomplished with order and harmony:

1. I cannot overlook this great national cause, which was vigorously maintained by the English ambassadors against the protests of France. Later it was contended that Christendom was essentially divided into the four great nations and states, of Italy, Germany, France, and Spain, and that the longer tongue (such as English, Deux, and French, and in some cases), were comprehended under one or other of these great divisions. In the present article, the islands, of which they were the head, should be considered as a fifth and coordinate nation, with an equal vote; and every arrangement of truth or fable was intended to exclude the idea of their country. Including England, Scotland, Wales, the four kingdoms of Ireland, and the Grieches, the British islands are divided with equal parts equal, and distributed by four or five languages, English, Welsh, Cornish, Scotch, Irish, and the greater all with such mutual and mutual friendly relations, as to arrive at forty days' journey; and England alone contains 32 counties, and 52,000 paroch churches, held in ancient Gothic cathedrals, c. l. d. e. f. g. h. i. j. k. l. m. n. o. p. q. r. s. t. u. v. w. x. y. z. They contain as much as the number of the British, British, which had been transferred to the English, and by him preserved in 1435 at Avignon. From a Leicp Jcys, these are more correctly published in the Collection of Von der Hett, tom. v. b. I have only seen Lenfant's extract of these acts. (Concilior de Constanct, tom. ii. p. 417, 419, &c.)

2. The histories of the three successive councils, Pisa, Constance, and Trent, are written with a tolerable degree of truth, industry, and elegance, by a pontifical minister, M. Lenfant, who resided from 1569 to 1579 at Constance, and in the midst of the council. He was the first of the French, and as Basil is the worst, so Constance is the best, part of the collection.

3. See the twenty-seventh Desinoration of the antiquities of Murator, and the first instruction of the Science des Medailles of the Petre Languet and the Barde de La Bascia. The Metallic History Martin V, and his successors, was composed by two monks, Monnet and a Francezian, and current in Italian; but I understand, that the first part of these medals is removed from the present collection.

4. Besides the Lives of Eugenius IV, (Illuminale, tom. ii. p. p., r., s., t., u., v., w., x., y., z.), and the critical account of the formation of the Breviary of Armatius, the Church of Constantinople, and the long reigns power and fame of Martin V, the short history of Henry, by the order of Brie, 1539, by the order of Constance, and the present collection, are the best original evidence for the revolt of the Romans against Eugenius IV. Though the emperor who lived at the time, and in the spot, speaks the language of a citizen, equally afraid of priestly and popular tyranny.

5. The coronation of Frederic III is described by Lenfant (Concile de Bases, tom. xx. p. 226, 253.) from Eusévius Sylvis, a spectator and contemporary, whose works were published at Constance by Sir Robert Wingleigh, ambassador from Henry VIII. to the court of Constance, and by him printed in 1537 at London. From Lucidus MS. they are more correctly published in the Collection of Von der Hett, tom. v. b. I have only seen Lenfant's extract of these acts. (Concilior de Constanct, tom. ii. p. 417, 123, &c.) but the superfluous honour was so disgraceful to an independent nation, that his successors have excused themselves from the toilsome pilgrimage to the Vatican, and rent their imperial title on the choice of the electors of Germany.

The conduct and government of the Roman citizen has remarked, with pride and pleasure, that the king of the Romans, after passing with a slight salute the cardinals and prelates who met him at the gate, distinguished the dress and person of the senator of Rome; and in this last farewell, the pageants of the eternal city were the spiritual movements that his heart embraceth. According to the laws of Rome, her first magistrate was required to be a doctor of laws, an alien, of a place at least forty miles from the city; with whose inhabitants he must not be connected in the third canonical degree of blood or alliance. The election was annual; a severe scrutiny was instituted in the conduct of the departing senator; nor could he be recalled to the same office till after the expiration of two years. A liberal salary of three thousand florins was assigned for his expense and reward; and his public appearance represented the majesty of the republic. The future ruler of Italy realized his renown, which was heightened in the summer season of a lighter sight; he bore in his hand an ivory sceptre; the sound of trumpets announced his approach; and his solemn steps were preceded at least by four licitors or attendants, whose red wands were enveloped with bands or streamers of the golden raiment; and which were displayed far behind the chair of state. The senator proclaims his right and duty, to observe and assert the laws, to control the crowd, to protect the poor, and to exercise justice and mercy within the extent of his jurisdiction. In these useful functions he was assisted by three learned strangers; the two collaboratores, and the procurator. The edict for the charge of the court was published by the praepositus. The solemn heads of the magistracy were drawn up in the secret and the common councils of the Romans. The former was composed of the magistrates and their immediate predecessors, with some fiscal and legal officers, and three classes of thirteen, twenty-six, and forty consuls; amounting in all, to one hundred and twenty. In the common council all male citizens had a right to vote; and the value of their privilege was enhanced by the care with which any foreigners were prevented from usurping the title and character of Romans. The tumult of a democracy was checked by wise and jealous precautions: except the magistrates, no person was allowed to propose a question; none were permitted to speak, except from an open pulpit or tribunal; all disorderly suppressions were arrested; the sense of the majority was decided by a secret ballot; and their decrees were proclaimed in the venerable name of the Roman senate, which was the seat of temporal and spiritual power in the period in which this theory of government has been reduced to accurate and constant practice, since the establishment of order has been gradually connected with the decay of liberty. But in the year thousand foot five hundred and eighty, the ancient statutes were collected, methodized in three books, and adapted to present use, under the pontificate, and with the approbation, of Gregory the thirteenth. This civil and criminal code is the modern law of the city; and if the first popular assembly elected a foreign senator, with the three conservators, still resides in the palace of the capitol. The policy of the Caesars has been repeated by the popes; and the bishop of Rome affected to maintain the form of a republic, while he reigned with the absolute powers of a temporal, as well as spiritual prince.

It is an obvious truth, that the times must be suited to extraordinary characters, and that the jeers of Cromwell or Retz might now expire in obscurity. The political enthusiasm of Riccioli had excited him to a throne; the same enthusiasm, in the next century, conducted his imitator to the gallows. The birth of Stephen Porcario was noble, his reputation spotless; his tongue was armed with eloquence, his mind was enlightened with learning; and he aspired, beyond the aim of valuer ambition, to free his country and immor¬talize his name. He now aimed at the dukedom, and the odious to a liberal spirit; every scruple was removed by the recent knowledge of the fable and forgery of Constantine's donation: Petrarch was now the oracle of the Italians; and as often as Porcario revolved the ode which describes the patriot and hero of Rome, he renewed the application of himself and his visions from the prophet. His first trial of the popular feelings was at the funeral of Eugenius the fourth; in an elaborate speech he called the Romans to liberty and arms; and they listened with apparent pleasure, till Porcario was interrupted and answered by a grave advocate, who pleaded against his plans and the emblems of the same. The sceptre was at first saved, but a virtuous and learned senator was guilty of treason; but the benevolence of the new pontiff, who viewed his character with pity and esteem, attempted by an honourable office to convert the patriot into a friend. The inflexible Roman returned from Anagni with an increase of reputation and zeal; and, on the first opportunity, the games of the place Nueva, he tried to inflame the casual dispute of some boys and mechanics into a general rising of the people. Yet the humane Nicholas was still averse to accept the forfeit of his life; and the traitor Porcario was sent from the camp of temptation to Bologna, with a liberal allowance for the respect of the court, and the easy obligation of presenting himself each day before the governor of the city. But Porcario, having learned from the younger Brutus, that his tyranny in office or on the field of honor; his voice, his coun¬ceil, his gestures, bespoken the man who had devoted his life or death to the glorious cause. In a studied oration, he expatiated on the motives and the means of their enterprise: the name and liberties of Rome; the noble and proud of their ecclesiastical tyrants; the power of the state, by means of the vices of the king and his courtiers. A body of a thousand horsemen, and forty hundred soldiers, and four hundred exiles, long exercised in arms or in war; the license of revenge to edge their swords, and a million of ducats to reward

* Statuta abate Urbis Romae Autorum (S. D. N. Gregorii XIII. Papae Magn. a Senatus consulto promulgata, in folio, 1592, in folio. The obsequies, repugnant statutes of antiquity were met and confirmed in form and substance. By the same constitution, appointed to act as the modern Tribunum. Yet I regret the old code, with the rigor of trust freedom and barbarism.

† In my time, (Papal Ilissus, 1580, 1581, 1582, 1583), the senator of Rome was M. Brollo, a noble Scuderi, and a presbyt to the cardinals. The pope's right to appoint the sener and the conservator is implied, rather than affirmed, in the statutes.
their victory. It would be easy, (he said,) on the next day, the festival of the Epiphany, to seize the pope and his cardinals, before the doors, or at the altar, of St. Peter's; to lead them in chains under the walls of St. Anger to a tower, and then as a threat of their instant death a surrender of the castle; to ascend the vacant capitol; to ring the alarm-bell; and to restore in a popular assembly the ancient republic of Rome. While he triumphed, he was already betrayed; the senate refused a guard, and the house, in the overthrow of Pocore cut his way through the crowd; but the unfortunate Stephen was drawn from a chest, lamenting that his enemies had anticipated by three hours the execution of his design. After such manifest and repeated guilt, even the mercy of Nicholas was vain. A senate of his accomplices were hanged without the benefit of the sacraments; and amidst the fears and invective of the papal court, the Romans pitied, and almost applauded, these martyrs of their country. But their applause was mute, their pity ineffectual: their liberty forever extinct; and if they have since risen to a vacancy of the throne or a scarcity of bread, such accidental tumults may be found in the bosom of the most objest servitude.

Last disorders. But the independence of the nobles, of the nobles this which was fomented by discord, rivalry, and the freedom of the states, if it were not lost, must be founded in union. A privilege of rapine and oppression was long maintained by the barons of Rome; their houses were a fortress and a sanctuary; and the ferocious train of banditti and criminals whom they protected from the law, repaid the hospitality with the service of their swords and daggers. The private interest of the pontiffs, or their nephews, sometimes involved them in these domestic funds. Under the reign of Sixtus the fourth, Rome was distracted by the battles and sieges of the rival houses: after the conflagration of the castle, the military Colonists were contented and beheaded; and Savelli, the French captive, friend, was murdered on the spot, for refusing to join in the calculations of the victorious Ursini. But the popes no longer trembled in the Vatican: they had strength to command, if they had resolution to claim, the obedience of their subjects; who observed these partial disorders, admired the easy taxes and wise administration of the ecclesiastical state. The spiritual thunders of the whole Catholic world were raised in the state of Rome. And if the papal see was almost within itself in the air; and the helpless priest is exposed to the brutal violence of a noble or plebeian adversary. But after their return from Avignon, the keys of St. Peter were guarded by the sword of St. Paul. Rome was commanded by an impregnable cordon; the use of cannon is a powerful engine against popular seditions: a regular force of cavalry and infantry was enlisted under the banners of the popes: his ample revenues supplied the resources of war; from the extent of his domain, he could bring down on a rebellious city an army of hostile neighbours and loyal subjects. Since the union of the duchies of Ferrara and Urbino, the ecclesiastical state extends from the Adriatic to the Arno, from the confines of Naples to the bank of the Po; and besides the holy see in the sixteenth century, the greater part of that spacious and fruitful country acknowledged the lawful claims and temporal soverignty of the Roman pontiffs. Their claims were readily deduced from the genuine, or, according to the views of the Italian nation, the ancient, or their respective steps of their final settlement would engage us too far in the transactions of Alexander the sixth, the maternal operations of Julius the second, and the liberal policy of Leo the tenth, a theme which has been adored by the pens of the noblest historians of the nation. But the expedition of Charles the eighth, the popes might successfully wrestle with the adjacent princes and states, whose military force was equal, or inferior, to their own. But as soon as the monarchs of France, Germany, and Spain, contended with gigantic arms for the dominion of Italy, they supplied with all the deficiency of strength; and concealed, in a labyrinth of wars and treaties, their aspiring views, and the imminent hope of chasing the barbarians beyond the Alps. The nice balance of the Vatican was often disturbed by the combinations of these monarchs, who were united under the standard of Charles the fifth: the feeble and fluctuating policy of Clement the seventh exposed his person and dominions to the conqueror; and Rome was abandoned seven months to a harmless army, more cruel and rapacious than the Goths and Vandals. After this severe lesson, the popes contracted their ambition, which was almost satisfied, resumed the character of a common parent, and abstained from all offensive hostilities, except in a hasty quarrel, when the vicar of Christ and the Turkish sultan were at war at the same time against the kingdom of Naples. The French rapine, which drew from the field of battle: Milan, Naples, Sardinia, and the sea-coast of Tuscany, were firmly possessed by the Spanish; and it became their interest to maintain the peace and independence of Italy, which continued almost without disturbance from the middle of the sixteenth to the opening of the eighteenth century. The Vatican was swayed and protected by the religious policy of the catholic king: his prejudice and interest disposed him in every dispute to support the prince against the people; and instead of the encouragement which they obtained from the adjacent states, the friends of liberty, or the enemies of law, were enclosed on all sides within the iron circle of despotism. The long habits of obedience and education subdued the turbulent spirit of the nobles and commons of Rome. The barons forgot the arms and fictions of their ancestors, and insensibly became the servants of luxury and government. Instead of maintaining a crowd of tenants and followers, the produce of their estates was
The Colonna and Ursini vied with each other in the decoration of their palaces and chapels; and their antique splendour was rivalled or surpassed by the sudden opulence of the papal families. In Rome the voice of freedom and discord is no longer heard; and in the streets the few criminals and degenerate lake reflects the image of idleness and servitude.

The ecclesiastical court, a Christian, a philosopher, and a political government, will be equally scandalized by the temporal kingdom of the clergy; and the local majesty of Rome, the remembrance of her consuls and triumphs, the wealth and splendour of the early reigns, will be an aggravation of the shame of her slavery. If we calmly weigh the merits and defects of the ecclesiastical government, it may be praised in its present state, as a mild, decent, and tranquil system, exempt from the dangers of minority, the sallies of youth, the expenses of luxury, and the calamities of war. But it is balanced by a frequent, perhaps a septennial, election of a sovereign, who is seldom a native of the country: the reign of a young statesman of three score in the decline of his life and abilities, without hope to accomplish the education of children to the labours of his transitory reign. The successful candidate is drawn from the church, and even the convent; from mode of education and life the most adverse to reason, humanity, and freedom. In the trammels of servile faith, he has learned to believe because it is absurd, to deny that it is true. If he should dissent from the defects in the government, he ever might deserve the esteem of a rational being; to punish error as a crime, to reward mortification and celibacy as the first of virtues; to place the saints of the calendar above the heroes of Rome and the sages of Athens; and to consider the missal, or the crucifix, as the standard of truth, and the church or the lorum. In the office of munifico, or the rank of cardinal, he may acquire some knowledge of the world, but the primitive stain will adhere to his mind and manners; from study and experience he may suspect the mystery of his profession; but the sacristian artist will imbibe some portion of the hatred which he has conveyed.

Sixtus V.

A.D. 1585—1590.

The Third pontificate of the sixties the fifth burst from the gloom of a Franciscan cleric. In 1585—1590, a reign of five years, he exterminated the outlaws and banditti, abolishing the profane sanctuary of the feudal and military force, restored and emulated the monuments of antiquity, and after a liberal use and large increase of the revenue, left five millions of crowns in the castle of St. Angelo. But his justice was sufficed with cruelty, his activity was prompted by the ambition of conquest; after his decease, the abuses revived; the treasury was dissipated; he entailed on posterity thirty-five new taxes and the vexation of offices; and, like his death, his stature was diminished by an ungrateful or an injured people. "Flamen urbanis populi," the city of Rome, the Senate, the nobility, the prelates, the knights, the confraternities, the college of cardinals, the city of Harpocrates, the slipper, the print of the heel, the mark of the beast, the number of the man, and the number of the beast, the first stands alone in the series of the pontiffs: the maxims and effects of their temporal government may be collected from the positive and comparative view of the arts and philosophy, the agriculture and trade, the wealth and population, of the ecclesiastical state. For myself, it required but a process of identity, to be all mankind, nor am I willing, in these last moments, to offend even the pope and clergy of Rome.

The last in days of Pope Eugenius the fourth, two of his servants, the learned Poggio and a friend, ascended the Capitoline hill: removed themselves among the ruins of columns and temples; and viewed from that commanding spot the wide and various prospect of Europe. View and discussion of Poggio from the Capitoline, A.D. 1430.

CHAP. XXXII.

Prospect of the ruins of Rome in the fifteenth century.

Four causes of decay and destruction.

—Example of Coliseum.

—Renovation of the city.

—Conclusion of the whole work.

The last in days of Pope Eugenius the fourth, two of his servants, the learned Poggio and a friend, ascended the Capitoline hill: removed themselves among the ruins of columns and temples; and viewed from that commanding spot the wide and various prospect of Europe. View and discussion of Poggio from the Capitoline, A.D. 1430.
of desolation. The place and the object gave ample scope for moralizing on the vicissitudes of fortune, on the sudden formation and fall of great works, which buries empires and cities in a common grave; and it was agreed, that in proportion to her former greatness, the fall of Rome was the more awful and deplorable. Her primâval state, such as she might appear in a remote age, when she was not yet circi ter 'great as an elephant,' has been delineated by the fancy of Virgil. This Tarpeian rock was then a savage and solitary thicket: in the time of the poet, it was crowned with the golden roofs of a temple; the temple is overthrown, the gold has been pillaged, the walls of the house is long since changed into the verdure of the earth; and the sacred ground is again disfigured with thorns and brambles. The hill of the capitol, on which we sit, was formerly the head of the Roman empire, the citadel of the east, the terror of kings; illustrated by the footsteps of so many triumphs, enriched with the spoils and tributes of so many nations. This spectacle of the world, how is it fallen! how changed! how defaced! the path of victory is obliterated by vines, and the hedges of the senators are concealed by a dunghill. Cast your eyes on the Palatine hill, and seek among the ruins of the magnificent theatre, the obelisks, the colossal statues, the porticoes of Nero's palace; survey the other hills of the city, the vacant space is interrupted only by mons and gardens. The forum of the Roman people, where they assembled to enact their laws and elect their magistrates, is now enclosed for the cultivation of potherbs, or thrown open for the reception of swine and housetop. The public and private edifices, that were founded for eternity, lie prostrate, naked, and broken, like the limbs of a mighty giant; and the ruin is the more visible, from the stupendous relics that have survived the injuries of time and fortune. His description These relics are minutely described of the ruin by Poggio, one of the first who raised his eyes from the monuments of legendary, to those of classic, superstition. 1 Besides a bridge, an arch, a sepulchre, and the pyramid of Cestius, he could discern, of the age of the republic, a double row of vaults, in the salt-office of the capitol, which were inscribed with the name and munificence of Catullus. 2 Twelve temples were visible to some degree, from the perfect form of the pantheon, to the three arches and columns of the temple of the Muses; the temple of Vespasian erected after the civil wars and the Jewish triumph. Of the number, which he rashly deduces, of seven thermæ, or public baths, none were sufficiently entire to represent the use and distribution of the ruins. Those of Titus and Domitianus Caracalla still retained the titles of the founders, and astonished the curious spectator, who, in observing their solidity and extent, the variety of marbles, the size and multitude of the columns, compared the labour and expense with the use and importance. Of the baths of Constantino, of Alexander, of Domitianus, or rather of Titus, some vestige might yet be found. 3 The triumphal arches of Titus, Severus, and Constantino, were entire, both the structure and the inscriptions; a falling fragment was honored with the name of Titus; two arches, still extant, in the Flaminian way, have been ascribed to the base member of Faustina and Gallienus. 4 After the wonder of the Coliseum, Poggio might have overlooked a small amphitheatre of brick, most probably for the use of the praetorian camp; the theatres of Marcellus and Pompey were completed in great measure by public and private buildings; and in the Circus Agonalis and Maxinum, little more than the situation and the form could be investigated. 5 The columns of Trajan and Antonine were still erect; but the Egyptian obelisks were broken or buried. A people of gods and heroes, the workmanship of art, was reduced to one equestrian figure of gilt brass, and to five marble statues, of which the most conspicuous were the two horses of Phidias and Praxiteles. 7 The two mausoleums or sepulchres of Augustus and Hadrian could not totally be destroyed, for there were only nine miles of earth; and the latter, the castle of St. Angelo, had acquired the name and appearance of a modern fortress. With the addition of some separate and nameless columns, such were the remains of the ancient city: for the marks of a more recent structure might be detected in the walls, which formed a circumference of ten miles, included three hundred and seventy-nine towers, and opened into the country by thirteen gates.

This melancholy picture was drawn by Poggio, a writer who composed a description of Rome. His ignorance may repeat the same objects under strange and fabulous names. Yet this barbarous topographer had eyes and ears, he could observe the visibl ends, he could listen to the traditions of the people, and he distinctly enumerates seven theatres, eleven baths, twelve arches, and eighteen palaces, of which many had disappeared before the time of Poggio. It is apparent, that many stately edifices, that adorned the monuments of ancient history, and that the principles of destruction acted with vigour and increasing energy in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. 2 The same reflection must be applied to the three last ages; and we should vainly seek the sepulchro of Severus, which is celebrated by Petrarch and the antiquarians of the sixteenth century. While the Roman edificers were still entire, the first blows, however weighty and impetuous, were resisted by the solidity of the mass and the harmony of the parts; but the slightest touch would precipitate the fragments of arches and columns, that already nodded to their fall.

After a diligent inquiry, I can discern four causes of the ruin of Rome, which continued to operate in a period of more than a thousand years. 1 The injuries of time and nature. II. The hostile attacks of the barbarians and

---

1 Libri de Mirabilibus Romae, ex Repris Nicolai Cardinale de Arragonia, in Bibliotheca Sacra. I. Casdari, IV. No. 60. This treatise, with some short but pertinent notices, has been published by Monzaun. (Bibl. Italicum, p. 280—281) who alone delivers his account of its author, a Spanish prelate. I am indebted to him for some elegant and accurate notes. I allow him to sympathize in the feelings of a Roman. 2 On the Severan basilicae, etc. 3 Poggio de Fabrica, p. 182. 4 Poggio de Fabrica, p. 4. 5 Poggio de Fabrica, p. 4. 6 Poggio de Fabrica, p. 4. 7 On the Steeples, see the Memoires sur Petrarque, tom. i. p. 192. Donatius, (p. 578) and Nardini, (p. 117. 414)
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

Without excepting the Tiber, the rivers that descend from either side of the Apennine have a short and irregular course: a shallow stream in the summer heats; an impetuous torrent, when it is swelled, in the summer or winter, by the fall of rain, and the melting of snows. While the former is removable by mere effort, the latter, when adverse winds, when the ordinary bed is inadequate to the weight of waters, rise above the banks, and overspread, without limits or control, the plains and cities of the adjacent country. Soon after the triumph of the first Punic war, the Tiber was increased by several new channels, and formed a number of former measure of time and place, destroyed all the buildings that were situate below the hills of Rome. According to the variety of ground, the same mischief was produced by different means; and the edifices were either swept away by the sudden impulsion, or dissolved and undermined by the long continuance, of the flood. Under the reign of Augustus, the same calamity was renewed: the lawless river overturned the palaces and temples on its banks; and, after the labours of the emperor in cleansing and widening the bed that was occupied with rubbish, his successor was exercised by similar dangers and designs. The project of diverting into new channels the Tiber itself, or some of the dependent streams, was long opposed by superstition and local interests; nor did the use compensate the toil and cost of the execution. 107. The execution of the national judge. The Tiber is the most powerful agent of life and death; for the storms and floods, propagated by the industry or negligence of mankind; and every period of the Roman annals is marked by the repetition of similar calamities. A memorable conflagration, the guilt or misfortune of Nero's reign, continued, with unequal fury, either six or nine days, and covered the whole earth with crooked streets, supplied perpetual fuel for the flames; and when they ceased, four only of the seventeen regions were left entire; three were totally destroyed, and seven were deformed by the relays of smoking and burning. The public buildings, the palaces, the temples, the metropoli arose with fresh beauty from her ashes; yet the memory of the old destroyed their irreparable losses, the arts of Greece, the trophies of victory, the monuments of primitive or fabulous antiquity. In the days of distress and anomaly, every wound is mortal, every fire may spread without injury or effect on the naked walls, and mossy arches, that have been despoiled of their ornaments. 2. It is among the common and plebeian habitations, that a mischievous spark is most easily blown to a conflagration; but as soon as they are devoured, the greater edifices which have resisted or escaped, are left as so many islands in a state of solitude and safe

1 a. U. C. 507, repetitae subversio ipsius Rome praevente triumpho Remorum . . . diversa ignum avarumque clades pene absumere urbem. Nam Tiberis insimulis acarum imberbus et ultra ignem procellae vel magni mortuus est⇢ omissa circumcisione in plurima adaequavit patriae salutis in planitioso detexti. Diversa qualitates locorum ad uram converti pericillum qua requiescit ignis isolato tempore, non ad lapides, sed ad terram, quae, postea, in eius orto, edificari coepisset, et ecclesias et turrets, et in statuas ad novae deduxisset. Orosius, Hist. iv. c. ii. p. 244, edit. Havercamp. Yet we may observe, it is the plan and study of the christian apologists, to magnify the calamities of the pagan world.

II. The hostile attacks of the barbarians and christians, have neglected to inquire how far they sympathise with the principle, and how far they possessed the means and the leisure to satiate their enmity. In the preceding chapters of my History, I have described the triumph of barbarism

1 The age of the pyramids is remote and unknown, since Diocletianus (Vol. i. p. 34, p. 72, edit. Monnerot) were reconstructed long, or 1000 years before the hundred and eighty octrapeenth Olympiad. See John Marshaven's contract scale of the Egyptian dynasties would fix them above 2000 years before Christ. (Canon Chronicum, p. 47.)

2 See the speech of Gaius in the Iliad, (C. 145.) This natural event, but melodiously picture is familiar to Homer.

3 The learning and crotchets of M. des Voyages (Histoire Critique des Voyages, Paris, 1773,) vol. ii. pp. 172—177. It dates the fire of Rome from A. D. 64, July 19, and the subsequent perpatria of the Christians. The exact date of the conflagration is lost.

4 Inqui in regione quartoedentor Roma dividitur, quotunque qui dumque intervallum maneat, transgressusque fuit instauratae inaequali uentorum electrici terrae inferius vel superius loci vel arborum. Among the old relics that were irreparably lost, Tacitus enumerates the temple of Vesta, the temple of Jupiter, the temple of Saturn, two of the temples of Vesta, the temple of Venus, and the temple of Venus, portico, and several artful edifices. Tacitus enumerates the temple of Vesta, the temple of Jupiter, the temple of Saturn, two of the temples of Vesta, and the temple of Venus; but is not explicit whether they were all in Rome. He then deplores the age's triumphant vastias and terrificans artium decoras . . . multas que senesce monumentum, quae repaerit. (Auct. Avl. v. 41, 4.) and religion; and I can only resume, in a few words, their real or imaginary connexion with the ruin of Rome. Our they may create, or adopt, a pleasing romance, that the Goths and Vandals rallied from Scandinavia, and did to avenge the flight of Odin; to break the chains, and to chastise the oppressors, of man-kind; that they wish to burn the records of classic literature, and to found their national architecture, on the broken members of the Tuscan and Corinthian orders. But in simple truth, the northern conquerors were neither sufficiently savage, nor sufficiently refined, to entertain such aspiring ideas of destruction and revenge. The shepherds of Scythia and Germany had no idea of founding the armies of empire, which discipline they acquired, and whose weakness they invaded; with the familiar use of the Latin tongue, they had learned to reverence the name and titles of Rome; and, though incapable of emulating, they were more inclined to admire, than to abolish, the arts and studies of a brighter period. In the transient possession of a rich and unresisting capital, the soldiers of Alaric and Genseric were stimulated by the passions of a victorious army; whilst the wanton indulgence of lust or cruelty, portable wealth was the object of their search, and it is likely they could derive the richest pleasure from the nonsensical reflection, that they had battered to the ground the works of the consuls and Caesars. Their monuments were indeed precious; the Goths evacuated Rome on the sixth, the Vandals on the twenty-seventh; and, though it be far more difficult to build than to destroy, their haughty assault would have made a slight impression on the solid piles of antiquity. We may remember, that both Alaric and Genseric affected to spare the buildings of the city; that they subsisted in strength and beauty under the auspicious government of Theodosius; and that the momentary resentment of Totila was disarmed by his own temper and the advice of his friends and enemies. From these innocent barbarians, the reproach may be transferred to the cathedrals of Rome. The statues, altars, and houses of the demons, were an abomination in their eyes; and in the absolute command of the city, they might labour with zeal and perseverance to erase the idolatry of their ancestors. The demolition of the temples in the cast affords to them an example of conduct, and to us an argument of justice. And it is observable, that a portion of guilt may be imputed with justice to the Roman proselytes. Yet their abhorrence was confined to the monuments of heathen superstition; and the civil structures that were dedicated to the business or pleasure of the Romans, they preserved with a zeal that might teach us a lesson of justice. The change of religion was accomplished, not by a popular tumult, but by the decrees of the emperors, of the senate, and of time. Of the christian hierarchy, the bi-shops of Rome were commonly the most prudent and least fanatic; nor can any positive charge be opposed to the meritorious act of saving and converting the majestic structure of the pantheon. 1

III. The use and end of a nation's temples and treasures is compounded of its substance and its form, of the materials and the manufacture. Its price

1 Take this opportunity of declaring, that in the course of twelve years, I have published, in the London Atheneum, articles on Odin from the 9th of April 1840, to Sweden, which I never very seriously believed, (vol. i. p. 94.) The Goths are apparently German: but all beyond Caesar and Tacitus is darkness or fable, in the antiquities of Germany.

2 History of the Decline, &c. vol. i. p. 231.

4 Eudem tempore populi Phocai princeps templorum, Quod appellat

5 Pantheon, in quo fecit ecclesiam Nuncius et Ecclesiam Christianam.

6 Quod ecclesiae principis multa bona obtuli.

7 Oratio in Pontificatus Beneficiorum, &c. (London, 1764.) in Muniensi, Script, Rerum Italicarum, tom. iii. p. 102.) According to the ancient historians, the Pantheon was consecrated by Agrippa to Cybele and Neptune, and was dedicated by Bonifacius IV. on the calends of November, to the Virgin, quae est mater omnium ranctorum, (p. 297, 302.)

8 Ad maiorem gloriam bonae voluntatis, et ut in pace animae suscipiantur, ad diem iubente Domino, etiam in hac temporibus, sic etiam in saeculis posterioribus, in saeculis longius futuris, industriis et opibus, laboribus et consiliis, in omnibus bonis, in omnibus immortaliitate, et in omnibus beatitate, omnino eisdem tempore, eisdem locis, eisdem temporibus, ut in prisco tempore, in priscis locis, in priscis temporibus, in saeculis antecessoriis, in saeculis futuris, in saeculis quae in saeculis futuris, in saeculis quae in saeculis antecessoriis.
were rare in the darker ages; and the Romans, alone and unenvied, might have applied to their public use the remaining structures of antiquity, if in their present form and position they had not been useless in a great measure to the city and its inhabitants.

The walls still described the old circumference, but the city had become the circus of Julius, the basilica of Diocletian, the forum of Trajan, the baths of Caracalla, the palaestra of Titus, the theatre of Marcellus, the temple of Jupiter, and many of the noblest monuments which had inspired the enthusiasm of time were left in a desert, far remote from the habitations of mankind. The palaces of the senators were no longer adapted to the manners or fortunes of their indigent successors; the use of building had been reserved to the public depositories of the tenth century, the games of the theatre, amphitheatre, and circus, had been interrupted; some temples were devoted to a prevailing worship; but the christian churches preferred the holy figure of the cross; and fashion, or reason, had distributed after a peculiar model the cells and offices of the cloister. Under the ecclesiastical reign, the number of those pious foundations was enormously multiplied; and the city was crowded with forty monasteries of men, twenty of women, and sixty chapters and colleges of canons and priests, who aggregated a considerable number of the public depositories of the city.

But if the forms of ancient architecture were disregarded by a people insensible of their use and beauty, the plentiful materials were applied to every call of necessity or superstition; till the fairest columns of the Ionic and Corinthian orders, the richest marbles of the structure were converted into enrichments of the walls of the churches. The new public depositories of the tenth century, the bishop's palace, the palace of the twelfth, and many capital structures, had vanished from his eyes; and an epigram of the same age expresses a just and pious fear, that the continuance of this practice would finally annihilate all the monuments of antiquity. The privilege of providing for the public depositories of the monks, with the demands and deprivations of the Romans. The imagination of Petrarch might create the presence of a mighty people; and I hesitate to believe, that, even in the fourteenth century, they could be reduced to a con-and the rough fortress has been gradually softened to the splendour and elegance of an Italian palace. Even the churches were encompassed with arms and bulwarks, and the military engines on the roof of St. Peter's were the terror of the Vatican and the scandal of the christian world. Whatever is fortified will be attacked; and its attacked will be destroyed. Could the Romans have wrested from the pope's castle of St. Angelo, they had resolved by a public decree to annihilate that monument of servitude. Every building of defence was exposed to a siege; and in every village and town it was laboriously employed. After the death of Nicholas the fourth, Rome, without a sovereign or a senate, was abandoned to the fury of civil war. "The houses," says a cardinal and a poet of the times, "were crushed by the weight and violence of enormous stones; the walls were perforated by the strokes of the battering-ram; the towers were involved in fire and smoke; and the assailants were stimulated by rapine and revenge." The work was consummated by the tyranny of the laws; and the factions of Italy alternately exercised a blind and thoughtless vengeance on their adversaries, and raised a fabulously immense ravine. In comparing the days of foreign, with the age of domestic, hostility, we must pronounce, that the latter have been far more ruinous to the city; and our opinion is confirmed by the evidence of Petrarch.

"Behold," says the laureate, "the relics of Rome, the immunities of her most ancient cities. The greatest crime, by which the barbarian, can boast the merit of this stupendous destruction: it was perpetrated by her own citizens, by the most illustrious of her sons, and your ancestors (he writes to a noble Ambissibl) have done with the buildings of the Punic and Roman a like fatal and not accursed with the sword." The influence of the two last principles of decay must in some degree be multiplied by each other; since the houses and towers, which were subverted by civil war, required a new and perpetual supply from the monuments of antiquity. The Coliseum of the Flavians and Constantine, observation may be applied to the amphitheatre of Titus. Of Titus, which has obtained the name of the Coliseum, either from its magnitude, or from Nero's colossal statue: an edifice, had it been left to time and nature, which might perhaps have claimed an eternal duration. The curious antiquaries, who have computed the numbers and seats, are disposed to believe, that above the upper row of stone steps, the amphitheatre was encircled and elevated with several stages of wooden galleries, which were repeatedly consumed by fire, and restored by the emperors. Whatever was precious, or portable, or profane, the structure, if not composed of the stones of beautiful sculptured marble, then of sculpture, which were cast in brass, or overspread with leaves of silver and gold, because the first prey of conquest or fanaticism, of the avarice of the barbarians or the Christians. In the massy stones of the Coliseum, many holes (these for the bolts) and the two most prominent arches represent the various incidents of its decay. These stones were connected by solid links of brass or iron, nor had the eye of rapine overlooked the value of the base metals; the vacant space was converted into a fair or market; the artisans of the Coliseum are mentioned in an ancient survey; and the chasms were perforated or enlarged to receive the poles that supported the shops or tents of the mechanic trades. Reduced to its naked majesty, the Flavian amphitheatre was contemplated with awe and admiration, by the pilgrims of the north; and the rude imagination of the age, was roused and carried away by the vision, which is recorded in the eighth century, in the fragments of the venerable Bede: "As long as the Coliseum stands, Rome shall stand; when the Coliseum falls, Rome will fall; when Rome falls, the world will fall." In the modern system of war, a great military advantage is gained by the destruction of the city. The site of the Coliseum could not have been chosen for a fortress; but the strength of the walls and arches could resist the engines of assault; a numerous garrison might be lodged in the enclosure; and while one faction occupied the Vatican and the Coliseum; another might be entrenched in the Lateran and the Coliseum.

The abolition at Rome of the ancient Games of Rome, games must be understood with some latitude; and the carnival sports, of the Testacean circus and the Circus Agonalis, were regulated by the laws of custom or custom of the city. The Roman years were divided with dignity and pomp to adjudicate and distribute the prizes, the gold ring, or the patilium, as it was styled, of cloth or silk. A tribute on the Jews supplied the annual expense; and the races, on foot, on horseback, or in chariots, were entitled by a tumb and tournament. The Roman year was divided into a bull-feast for the year one thousand three hundred and one, a bull-feast, thirty-two, after the fashion of the Moors and Spaniards, was cele-bracted in the Coliseum itself; and the living manner are painted in a diary of the times. A convenient order of benches was restored; and a general proclamation, as far as Rimini and Ravenna, invited the nobles to exercise their skill and courage in this perilous adventure. The Roman ladies were marshalled in three squadrons, and seated in three balconies, while they day by day heard the tumults from the tribunal, with scarlet cloth. The fair Jacova di Rovere led the matrons from beyond the Tiber, a pure and native woman, who still represent the features and character of antiquity. The remainder of the city was divided as usual between the Colonna and Ursini: the two factions of the number and honor of the female bands: the charms of Savello Ursini are mentioned with praise; and the Colonna regretted the absence of the youngest of their house, who had spared her uncle in the garden of Nero's tower.

The lots of the champions were drawn by an old and respectable citizen; and they descended to the arena, or pit, to encounter the wild bulls, on foot as it should seem, with a single spear. Amidst the crowd, our annalist has selected the names, colours, and devices, of twenty of the most conspicuous knights. Several of the names are the most illustrious of Rome and the ecclesiastical, the names prefixed by Decennalia, of which Caffarello, Savelli, Capeceio, Conti, Annabaldi, Alteri, Corsi; the colours were adapted to their taste and situation; the devices are expressive of hope or despair, and breathe the spirit of gallantry and arms.

"I am alone, like the youngest of the Hortini," the confidence of an intrepid stranger: "I live discountenanced," a weeping widower: "I burn under the ashes," a discreet lover: "I adore Lavinia or Lucretia," the ambiguous declaration of a modern passion: "My faith is as pure," the motto of a white livery: "Who is stronger than myself?" of a lion's hide; "I desire to be a pleasant meal for a pleasant course," the wish of ferocious courage. The pride or prudence of the Ursini restrained them from the field, which was occupied by three of their hereditary rivals, whose inscriptions denoted the lofty greatness of the Colonna name: "I thought and I am strong," "Strong as I am grown," "If I fall," addressing himself to the spectators, "you fall with me!"—intimating (says the contemporary writer) that while the other families were the subjects of the Vatican, they alone were the supporters of the capitol.

The combats of the amphitheatre were dangerous. Every champion successively met a wild bull; and the victory may be ascribed to the quadrupeds, since no more than eleven were left on the field, with the loss of nine wounded and eighteen killed on the side of their adversaries. Some of the noblest families might mourn, but the pomp of the funerals, in the churches of St. John Lateron and St. Maria Maggiore, afforded a second holiday to the people. Doubtless it was not in such conflicts that the blood of the Romans should be shed; yet, in blamiing their rashness, we are compell ed to applaud their gallantry; and the noble volunteers, consecrated by the prayers of their lives, under the balconies of the fair, excite a more generous sympathy than the thousands of captives and malefactors who were reluctantly dragged to the scene of slaughter.*

Injuries.

This use of the amphitheatre was rare, perhaps a singular festival: the demand for the materials was a daily and continual want, which the citizens could gratify without restraining or remorse. In the fourteenth century, a scandalous act of concord secured to both factions the privi-

eledge of extracting stones from the free and cem etery quarry of the Coliseum; and Poggins laments, that the greater part of these stones had been burnt to lime by the folly of the Romans. To check this abuse, and to prevent the nocturnal crimes that might be performed in the channels of the tiber, the Roughs forth surrounded it with a wall; and, by a charter long extant, granted both the ground and edifice to the monks of an adjacent convent. After his death, the wall was thrown down in a tumult of the people; and had they themselves respected the noblest monument of their fathers, it would have been in their power that it should never be degraded to private property. The inside was damaged; but in the middle of the sixteenth century, an ara of taste and learning, the exterior circumference of one thousand six hundred and twelve feet was still entire and inviolate; a triple elevation was placed in the old survey of the city, with one hundred and eight feet. Of the present ruin, the nephews of Paul the third are the guilty agents; and every traveller who views the Farnese palace may curse the sacrilege and luxury of these usurp princes. A similar approach is applied to the Barbe-riano, and the palace of imperious investigators from every reign, till the Coliseum was converted into a house, the Coliseum was conserved placed under the safeguard of religion in the Coliseum by the most liberal of the pontiffs. Benedect the fourteenth, who consecrated a spot which persecution and fable had stained with the blood of so many christians murdered.

When Petrarach first gratified his eyes with a view of these monuments, whose scattered fragments so far surpass the most eloquent descriptions, he was astonished at the sublime scene which he beheld. "The Colonna," he was humbled rather than elated by the discovery, that, except his friend Rienzi and one of the Colonna, a stranger of the Rhone was more conversant with these antiquities than the noblest natives of the metaphors. The ignorance and credulity of the Romans are elaborately displayed in the old survey of the city, which was composed about the beginning of the sixteenth century; and, without dwelling on the manifest errors of name and place, the legend of the capitol may be in a concise but instructive memoir, the abbe Bartholomy (Me-mores de l'Academie de l'Empire, Tom. X. p. 307) has found this agreement of the facts of the fourteenth century, de Tiberius faciendo in the Colosserum, from an original act in the archives of Rome.

p Colonna .... ob stultitiam Romanorum majoris ex parte ad calum detrahit, et asecurum Petruini particolare gentem, ut non dubitium, for the present age, must be very tenderly applied to the fifteenth century.

q Of the Olivetan monks, Montfaucon (p. 143) informs us that this fact is on the monument of Flaminio Vace. (No. 72.) They were still happy, on some future occasion, to revive and vindicate their claim.

r After measuring the precise amphitheatrum gymna, Montfaucon (p. 152) only adds, that it was entire until under Paul III., seconda charta. Montfaucon (Annali d'Italia, tav. xiv. p. 32) more freely reports the guilt of the Farnese popo, and the aplaination of the Roman people. Against the negligence of the eighteenth century, I have no other evidence than the vulgar saying: "Quod non fecerit barbari, fecerit Barbarian," which was perhaps true in the times of the great emperor, and was, too strong for the present age, must be very tenderly applied to the fifteenth century.

s Yet the statues of Rome (1. vii. p. 322) improve a fine of 500 morons in whosoever shall demolish any ancient edifice, ne ruinis civili dis semper, et quod antiquas defecerunt urbem perpetuo reperu-

s. In his Kerr visit to Rome (A. D. 1537, See Monaca sur Petrarque, whicharrants the destruction of ancient monuments, and especially of those which were built with stones of the Colosserum. Petrarque, (ibidem p. 322.) He was struck with the appearance and extent of the ruins, and deplores the degenerate state of the educating them.

s. This extraordinary bull feast in the Coliseum is described, from tradition, by Poggins, and it is noticed in the most ancient fragments of Roman annals: (Muratori, Script. Rerum Riscalium, tom. xiii. p. 335, 355,) and however fanciful they may appear, they are the only motives of colour in urbs et ruinis mole dentos .... Perserina vero, mitum dicti, nihil immuni: { ... - filler major facta Roman magnoque recitavit quam tibum quod nem coram ab urbe dominum. (Origen, p. 60.) Familiaris, p. 14. Sanini Colonna.)

t He excepts a beautiful picture of the Colosserum, of John Colonna. (H. t. 149, figure.) Qui enim hinc mago ignari rerum Romanum, quam Romanis nolens est? Inventus divinum, ille sanctum, et omnes bonos colunto, et superos molere dentos ... Perserina vero, mitum dicti, nihil immuni: { ... - filler major facta Roman magnoque recitavit quam tibum quod nem coram ab urbe dominum. (Origen, p. 60.) Familiaris, p. 14. Sanini Colonna.)

u After the description of the capitol, he adds, names are found, that are not mere provincial; et habebat quibus nolens ecclesiasticos, et erant a sancto domino, et superos molere dentos ... Perserina vero, mitum dicti, nihil immuni: { ... - filler major facta Roman magnoque recitavit quam tibum quod nem coram ab urbe dominum. (Origen, p. 60.) Familiaris, p. 14. Sanini Colonna.)
THE DECLINE AND FALL

The capital," says the anonymous writer, "is so named as being the head of the world; and emperors, consuls and senators formerly resided for the government of the city and the globe. The strong and lofty walls were covered with glass and gold, and crowned with a roof of the richest and most curious carving. Below the citadel stood a palace, of gold for the greatest part, destined to the residence of a mortal, consul, emperor, and to be esteemed at one-third of the world itself. The statues of all the provinces were arranged in order, each with a small bell suspended from its neck; and such was the contrivance of art or magic, that if the prince of the Orient, a brilliant magnet, were to revolve around that quarter of the heavens, the bell rang, the prophet of the capital reported the prodigy, and the senate was admonished of the impending danger.

A second example of less importance, though of equal absurdity, may be drawn from the two marble horses, led by two naked youths, which have since been transported from the baths of Constantine to the Quirinal hill. The groundless application of the names of Phidias and Praxiteles may perhaps be excused; but these Grecian sculptors should not have been removed above four hundred years from the age of Pericles to that of the Curia. They should have been transfigured into two philosophers or magicians, whose natures was the symbol of truth or knowledge, who revealed to the emperor his most secret actions; and, after refusing all pecuniary recompense, solicited the honour of leaving this eternal monument of themselves. This move to the power of magic, the Romans were insensible to the beauties of art: no more than five statues were visible to the eyes of Poggio; and of the multitude which chance or design had buried under the ruins, the resurrection was fortunately found by no other and most enlightened modern. The Nile, which now adorns the Vatican, had been explored by some labours, in digging a vineyard near the temple, or convent, of the Minerva; but the impatient proprietor, who was tormented by some visits of curiosity, restored the unprofitable marble to its former grave. The discovery of a statue of Pompey, ten feet in length, was the occasion of a law-suit. It had been found under a partition-wall: the equitable judge had pronounced, that the head should be separated from the body to satisfy the claims of the contiguous owners; and the sentence would have been executed, if the rest of the bust had not been discovered and the sanctity of a pope, had not rescued the Roman hero from the hands of his barbarous countrymen.

Restoration and ornaments of the city.

A.D. 1420, &c.

The clouds of barbarism were gradually dispelled; and the peaceful authority of Martin the fifth and his successors restored the ornaments of the city as well as the order of the ecclesiastical state. The improvements of Rome, since the fifteenth century, have not been the work of the papacy; but of the industry of individuals and the inclination of the princes and the clergy are cultivated by the lazy hands of indigent and hopeless vassals; and the scanty harvests are confined or exported for the benefit of a monopoly. A second and more artificial cause of this increase is, the residence of a monarch, the expense of a luxury covered by the tributes of dependent provinces. Those provinces and tributes had been lost in the fall of the empire; and if some streams of the silver of Peru and the gold of Brasil have been attracted by the Vatican; the revenues of the cardinals, the fees of office, the contributions of pilgrims and clients, and the remnant of ecclesiastical taxes, afford a poor and precarious supply, which maintains however the idleness of the court and city. The population of Rome, far below the measure of the great capitals of Europe, does not exceed one hundred thousand inhabitants, and within the spacious enclosure of the walls, the largest portion of the seven hills is overspread with vineyards and ruins. The beauty and splendour of the modern city may be ascribed to the abuses of the government, to the influence of superstition. Each image (the exceptions are rare) has been maintained by the rapid elevation of a new family, enriched by the childish pontiff at the expense of the church and country.

The palaces of these fortunate nephews are the most costly monuments of elegance and servitude; the most perfect and most ornamented gardens, parks, and shrines, have been prostituted in their services; and their villas and gardens are decorated with the most precious works of antiquity, which taste or vanity has prompted them to collect. The ecclesiastical revenues were more decently employed by the popes themselves in the pious of the cardinals, the fees of office, the contributions of pilgrims and clients, and the remnant of ecclesiastical taxes, afford a poor and precarious supply, which maintains however the idleness of the court and city. The population of Rome, far below the measure of the great capitals of Europe, does not exceed one hundred thousand inhabitants, and within the spacious enclosure of the walls, the largest portion of the seven hills is overspread with vineyards and ruins. The beauty and splendour of the modern city may be ascribed to the abuses of the government, to the influence of superstition. Each image (the exceptions are rare) has been maintained by the rapid elevation of a new family, enriched by the childish pontiff at the expense of the church and country.

Restoration and ornaments of the city.

A.D. 1420, &c.

He mentions an example of the Saxons and Swevi, who, after they had been subdued by Arrappa, again rebelled unanimously against the abbots who were in special honors and liberties, and had obtained the title of Duke or Count. Arrappa marched back and reduced the Swevis. (Anonymus, in Monum. pag. 227. 754.)

The same writer affirms, that Virgilius a Romania invisibilis, the grand son of Virgilius, in the eleventh century, is introduced by William of Malmyte: (de Vitas Regum Anglorum, i. ii. p. 59, &c.) and in the time of Filamet. Vaca (Nov. B. 104.) it was the vulgar belief that the strangers the Germans inhabited the domus for the discovery of hidden treasures.

Anonymus, in Monum. pag. 289. Monum. pag. 193. (curiously observes, that if Alexander be represented, these statues cannot be the work of Pidias. (Olympiad lxxxi.) or Praxiteles. (Olympiad civ.) who lived before Tacitus' "; (Pline, Hist. Nat. x. i.)"

A. D. 1420, &c.

William of Malmesbury (1. i. p. 56, 57) relates a marvellous discovery of the statue of Cæsar, who had been slain by Augustus: "the statue of Turnus; the perpetual light in his sepulchre, a Latin epitaph, andIncrease of人口, and Increase of population, has been continued without the possibility of a stop. In his beard, (fecta perit ingenio," &c. If this fable rests on the slightest foundation, we may pity the bodies, as well as the statues, that have been preserved during this time in a barbarous age.

From portico Minervae, status est necumianus, culpa capit in templo, at sed est in templo, (Poggia de Varese, Histor. di Roma, 1415. 1419. I am ignorant whether they have since continued in a progressive state.

The Papal Monuments distributes his own observations into twenty days, he should have styled them weeks, or months, of his visits to the ancient monuments of Rome, as the very first of Blundot, Fil-poix, Manmarys, and Fauss, who is surgeon, and has been in Rome, his own profession, and is now in his seventy third year. (Epist. ad plamadum ab unerbe scourere facie detexit. Ad hoc visendum cum prius deis monum. In a com. magnis concurrentibus, spectativorum antiquorum faschiennum perspicuum, &c. (Poggia de Varese, Histor. di Roma, 1415. 1419.) To his labors; the writings of Onuphrius Paradisii, qui omnes obseruantur, and the recent but imperfect books of Bonna and Nairi. Yet Monum us still affords a more complete plan and description and the footsteps of heroes, the relics, not of superstition, but of empire, are devoutly visited by a new race of pilgrims from the remote, and once savage, countries of the north.

Final conclusion. Of these pilgrims, and of every reader, the attention will be excited by a History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; the greatest, perhaps, and most awful, scene in the history of mankind. The various causes and progressive effects are connected with many of the events most interesting in human annals: the artful policy of the Caesars, who long maintained the name and image of a free republic; the disorder of military despotism; the rise, establishment, and sects of Christianity; the foundation of Constantinople; the division of the monarchy; the invasion and settlements of the barbarians of Germany and Scythia; the institutions of the civil law; the character and religion of Mahomet; the temporal sovereignty of the popes; the restoration and decay of the western empire of Charles-magne; the crusades of the Latins in the east; the conquests of the Saracens and Turks; the ruin of the Greek empire; the state and revolutions of Rome in the middle age. The historian may applaud the importance and variety of his subject; but, while he is conscious of his own imperfections, he must often accuse the deficiency of his materials. It was among the ruins of the capitol that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised near twenty years of my life, and which, however inadequate to my own wishes, I finally deliver to the curiosity and candour of the public.

Lausanne, June 27, 1787.
REPLY TO GIBBON;

OR,

AN APOLOGY FOR CHRISTIANITY:

IN

LETTERS TO EDWARD GIBBON, ESQ.

AUTHOR OF THE HISTORY OF THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

BY R. WATSON, D. D., F. R. S.,

BISHOP OF LANDAFF, AND PROFESSOR OF DIVINITY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.
LETTER I.

Sir:—It would give me much uneasiness to be reputed an enemy to free inquiry in religious matters, or as capable of being animated into any degree of personal malevolence against any one who dares to differ from me in opinion. On the contrary, I look upon the right of private judgment, in every question respecting God and ourselves, as superior to the control of human authority; and have ever regarded free disposition as the best means of illustrating the doctrine and establishing the truth of Christianity. Let the followers of Mahomed, and the zealots of the church of Rome, support their several religious systems by dapping every effort of the human intellect to pry into the foundations of their faith; but never can it become a Christian to be afraid of being asked “a reason of the hope that is in him;” nor a Protestant to be studied of enveloping his religion in mystery and ignorance; or to abandon that moderation by which she permits every individual of sensibile que vidit, et quae sentient decis: [both to think what he will, and to speak what he thinks.]

It is not, sir, without some reluctance, that, under the influence of these opinions, I have prevailed upon myself to address these letters to you; and you will attribute to the same motive my not having sent you these first two papers: or, moreover, an expectation that this task would have been undertaken by some person capable of doing greater justice to the subject, and more worthy of your attention. Perceiving, however, that the two last chapters, the fifteenth in particular, of your very laborious and classical history of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, had made upon many an impression not at all advantageous to Christianity; and that the silence of others, of the clergy especially, began to be looked upon as an acquiescence in, or at least in not contending against, this impression; I have thought it my duty, with the utmost respect and good will towards you, to take the liberty of suggesting to your consideration a few remarks upon some of the passages which have been esteemed (whether you meant that they should be so esteemed or not) as powerfully militating against that revelation, which still is to many, what it formerly was “to the Greeks—foolishness;’” but which we decreed to be true, “to be the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.”

To the inquiry, by what means the Christian faith obtained so remarkable a victory over the established religions of the earth, you rightly answer, by the evidence of the doctrine itself, and the ruling providence of its author. But, afterwards, in assigning to this astonishing event, five secondary causes, derived from the passions of the human heart, and the general circumstances of mankind, you seem to some to have insinuated that Christianity, like other impostures, might have made its way into the world, though its origin had been as human as the means by which you suppose it was spread. It is no wish or intention of mine to fasten the odium of this insinuation upon you; I shall simply endeavour to show that the causes you produce, are either inadequate to the attainment of the end proposed, or that their efficiency, great as you imagine it, was derived from other principles than those you have thought proper to mention.

Your first cause is, “the inflexible, and, if you may use the expression, the intolerant zeal of the Christians, derived, it is true, from the Jewish religion, but purified from the narrow and unspiritual spirit which, instead of inviting, had deterred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses.” Yes, sir, we are agreed that the zeal of the Christians was inflexible; “whether death, or imprisonment, or suffering, or shame, or things present, or things to come,” could bend it into a separation “of the love of God which was in Christ Jesus their Lord.” It was an inflexible obstinacy, in not blaspheming God; they were the most resolute in upbraiding them to persecution; and which even your amiable and philosophical Pliny thought proper, for want of other crimes, to punish with death in the Christians of his province. We are agreed, too, that the zeal of the Christians was inflexible; it denounced “tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that did evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile:” It would not tolerate in Christian monuments the name denominated the image of Caesar, who bowed down at the altars of Paganism, who mixed with the votaries of Venus, or wallowed in the filth of Bactheanian festivals.

But, though we are thus far agreed with respect to the inflexibility and intolerance of Christ’s followers, it is from a principle from which it was derived, we are tuto colo divided in opinion. You deduce it from the Jewish religion; I would refer it to a more adequate and a more obvious source—a full persuasion of the truth of Christianity. What! think you that it was a zeal derived from the unsocial spirit of Judaism, which inspired Peter with courage to upbraid the whole people of the Jews, in the very capital of Judea, with having “delivered up Jesus, with having denied him in the presence of Pilate, with having desired a murderer to be granted them in his stead, with having killed the Prince of Life!” Was it from this principle that the same apostle, in conjunction with John, when summoned, not before the dregs of the people, (whose judgment they might have been supposed capable of misleading, and whose resentment they might have despised,) but before the rulers and the elders, and the scribes, the dread tribunal of the Jewish nation, and commanded by them to teach no more in the name of Jesus, boldly answered, “that they could not but speak the things which they had seen and heard!” They had “seen with their eyes, they had handled with their hands the word of life;” and no human jurisdiction could deter them from being faithful witnesses of what they had seen and heard. Here, then, you may perceive the genuine and undoubted origin of that zeal which you ascribe to what appears to me a very insufficient cause; and which the Jewish rulers were so far from considering as the ordinary effect of their religion, that they were exceedingly at a loss how to account for it. “Now, when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled.” The apostles, heedless of consequences, and regardless of every thing but truth, openly every where professed themselves witnesses of the resurrection of Christ; and with a confidence which could proceed from nothing but conviction, and which pricked the Jews to the heart, bade “the house of Israel know assuredly, that God had made that same Jesus, whom they had crucified, both Lord and Christ.”

I mean not to produce these instances of apostolic zeal as direct proof of the truth of Christianity; for every religion, every zeal, every absurd set of every religion, has had its zealous, who have not scrupled to maintain their principles at the expense of their lives; and we ought no more to infer the truth of Christianity from the mere zeal of its propagators, than the truth of Mahommedanism from that of a Turk. When a man suffers himself to be covered with infamy, pillaged of his property, and dragged at last to the block or the stake, rather than give up his opinion, the proper inference is, not that his opinion is true, but that he believes it to be true; and a question of serious discussion immediately presents itself—upon what foundation has he built his belief? This is often an interesting inquiry, including in it a vast compass of human learning. A Brahmin or a Mandarin, who should observe a missionary attesting the truth of Christianity with his blood, would, notwithstanding, have a right to ask many questions, before it could be expected that he should give an assent to our faith. In the case, indeed, of the apostles, the inquiry would be much less perplexed, since it would briefly resolve itself into this—whether they were credible reporters of facts, which they themselves professed to have seen—and it would be an easy matter to show, that their zeal in attesting what they were the most competent to judge of, could not proceed from any alluring prospect of worldly interest or ambition, or from any other probable motive than a love of truth.

But the credibility of the apostles’ testimony, or their credibility to judge, which is the question which should be examined: the question before us simply relates the principle by which their zeal was excited; and it is a matter of real astonishment to me, to reflect upon the effect of one of the first propagation of Christianity, acquainted with the opposition it everywhere met with from the people of the Jews, and aware of the rapacity which must ever subsist between its tenets and those of Judaism, should ever the doctrine of deriving the zeal of the primitive Christians from the Jewish religion.
WATSON'S REPLY TO GIBBON.

Both Jew and Christian, indeed, believed, in one God, and abominable idolatry; but this detestation of idolatry, had it been accompanied with the belief of the resurrection of Christ, would probably have been just as inexcusable in exciting the zeal of the Christian to undertake the conversion of the Gentile world, as it had for ages been in exciting that of the Jews. But supposing, what I think, we have not proved, and what I am certain cannot be admitted without proof, that a zeal derived from the Jewish religion inspired the first Christians with fortitude to oppose themselves to the institutions of Paganism; what was it that encouraged them in the attempt the conversion of their own countrymen? Amongst the Jews they met with no superstitious observances of idolatrous rites; and therefore, amongst them, could have no opportunity of declaring and confirming their zealous opposition to Paganism, or of fortifying, by frequent protestations, their attachment to the Christian faith.

Here, then, at least, the cause you have assigned for Christian zeal ceases to operate; and we must look for some other principle than a zeal against idolatrous vice, which will never be able to explain the ardour with which the apostles pressed the disciples of Moses to become the disciples of Christ.

Again; does a determined opposition to, and an open abhorrence of, even the minutest particular idolatrous religion, amount to the same thing as a method of conciliating the Jews to the new doctrine of Christianity, in opposition to all the established powers of Paganism, is a circumstance I can by no means comprehend. The Jesuit missionaries, whose human prudence no one will question, were quite of a contrary way of thinking; and brought a deserved censure upon themselves by opposing to the principle of faith of Christ, by indulging to their Pagan converts a frequent use of idolatrous ceremonies. Upon the whole, it appears to me, that the Christians were in no wise indebted to the Jewish religion for their propagation. They propagated the gospel amongst Jews as well as Gentiles: and that such a zeal as you describe, let its principles be what you please, could never have been manifested by any human understanding as a means of promoting the progress of a reformation in religion, much less could it have been thought adequate to the preponderance of the Jews to idolatry, and their frequent detection from the things one thing to God; the law of "stubborn incredulity" cannot be admitted as one of them.

To men, indeed, whose understandings have been enlightened by the Christian revelation, and enlarged by all the means of knowledge and instruction, the pretensions of idolatry from without, and whose reason from without revolted at the idea of worshipping the infinite Author of the universe under any created symbol; to men who are compelled, by the utmost exaction of their reason, to admit, as an irrefutable truth, what are the first principles of all reason, the eternal existence of an uncaused being, and who are conscious that they cannot give a full account of any one phenomenon in nature, from the rotation of the great orbs of the universe, to the development of life, from the union of one's heart in reverence to him as the primary incommunicable cause of it; and who, from seeing him everywhere, have, by a strange fatality, (converting an excess of evidence into a principle of disbelief) at times doubted concerning his existence anywhere, and made the very universe their God: to men such as a stamp, it appears almost an incredible thing, that any human being, which had seen the order of nature interrupted, or the uniformity of its course suspended, though for a moment, should ever entertain a doubt of the existence of a being, which would have been excited in their minds. But whatever effect the visible interposition of the Deity might have in removing the scepticism and confirming the faith of the ancients, does it not seem probable, that by your principle, work with "careless indifference," but with astonishment and terror; nor would you be able to detect the slightest vestige of "stubborn incredulity" in their song of gratitude. No length of time would be able to blot from their minds the memory of such a transaction, or induce a doubt concerning its author; though future hunger and thirst might make them call out for water and bread with a desponding and rebellious impatience.

But it was not at the Red Sea only that the Israelites regained, with something more than a "careless indifference," the amazing miracles which God had wrought; for, when the law was declared to them from Mount Sinai, "all the people saw the thunderings, and the lightning, and the voice of the trumpet, a very mighty peal of thunderings without sound, a light and a very great tempest, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they removed and stood afar off: and they said unto Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die." This again, sir, is the Scripture account of the language of the contemporaries of Moses and Joshua; and I leave it to you to consider whether this is the language of "stubborn incredulity and careless indifference.

We are told, in Scripture, too, that whilst any of the "contemporaries" of Moses and Joshua were alive, the whole people served the Lord; the impression which a sight of the miracles had made was never effaced; nor the obedience, which might have been expected as a natural consequence, refused, till Moses and Joshua, and all their contemporaries, were gathered unto their fathers; till, "another generation after them arose, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the works which he had done for Israel." But the "people served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, who had seen all the great works of the Lord that he did for Israel.

I am not, sir, unacquainted with Scripture, or desirous of sinking the weight of its testimony; but as the words of the history, from which you must have derived your observation, will not support you in imputing "careless incredulity to the contemporaries of Moses and Joshua, as an uniform observation upon the Jewish people, in the uniform incredulity of the Jews, I know not what can have induced you to pass so severe a censure upon them, except that you look upon a lapse into idolatry as a proof of infidelity. In answer to this, I would remark, that with equal soundness of argument we ought to infer, that every one who transgresses a religion, disbelieves it; and that every individual, in any community incurs civil pains and penalties, is a dissenter. The copiers of the Gnostic doctrines are infidels. The sanctions of the Mosaic law were, in your opinion, terminated within the narrow limits of this life; in that particular, then, they must have resembled the sanctions of a city. Whether the Gnostics have imitated the sanctions of every one of them, as well as that of Moses; and I know not what reason we have to expect that the Jews, who were animated by the same hopes of temporal rewards, impelled by the same fears of temporal punishments, with the rest of mankind, should have been so singular in their conduct, as never to have listened to the clamors of passion before the still voice of reason, as never to have preferred a present gratification of sense, in the least celebration of obdurate rites, before the rigid observance of licentious ceremonies.

Before I release you from the trouble of this letter, I cannot help observing, that I could have wished you had furnished your reader with Lumbrich's answers to the Jew Ormio, concerning the perpetual obligation of the law of Moses. You have, indeed, mentioned Lumbrich with respect, in a short note; but, though you have studiously put into the mouths of the Judaising Christians in the apostolic days, and with great strength inserted into your text whatever has been said, to the effect of obliterating the true and original terrestrial and temporal sanctions, yet have you not favoured us with any one of the numerous replies which have been made to these seemingly strong objections. You are perfectly at ease in allowing the Jews, who have been allowed to devolve on the divines, to have abundantly explained the ambiguous language of the Old Testament, and the ambiguous conduct of the apostolic teachers. It requires, sir, no learned industry to explain what is so obvious and so expressive, that he who runs may read it. The language of the Old Testament is this: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, when I took them out of the land of Egypt." This, methinks, is a clear and solemn declaration; there is no ambiguity at all in it; that the covenant with Moses was not to be perpetual, but was, in some future time, to give way to a "new covenant." I will not detain you with an explanation of what Moses himself has said upon this subject; but you may try, if you please, whether you can apply the following declaration, which Moses made to the Jews, to any prophet, or succession of prophets, with the same propriety or truth in Jesus among them: "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto thee: unto him shall ye hearken. If thou think this ambiguous or obscure, it is a hearsay, but a prophecy; and with such uncertain, unavoidable liable to some degree of obscurity, till interpreted by the event.

Nor was the conduct of the apostles more ambiguous than the language of the Old Testament; they did not, indeed, at first comprehend the whole of the nature of the new dispensation; and when they did understand it better, they did not think proper, upon every occasion, to use their Christian liberty; but, with true Christian charity, accommodated themselves in matters of indifference to the prejudices of their weaker brethren. But he who changes his conduct with a change of sentiments, proceeding from an increase of knowledge, is not ambiguous in his conduct; nor should he be accused of insincerity, if he discard, at the same time, objections he himself has mentioned; I take it for granted, upon your authority, that they did; but I am certain, if they did, that the Gnostics of modern times have no reason to be puffed up with their knowledge, their presumption; and that all the men of subtle penetration or refined erudition; they are all miserable copies of their brethren of antiquity; and neither Morgan, nor Tindal, nor Boilingrooke, nor Voltaire, have been able to produce scarce a single new objection. You think that the Fathers have not properly answered the Gnostics. I make no question, sir, you are able to answer them to your own satisfaction, and informed of every thing that has been said by our "inquisitor-divines" upon the subject; and it should have been glad if it had fallen in with your plan to have administered, together with the poison, its antidote. But since that is not the case, lest its malignity should spread contrary to the wishes of men far, I must join the gods to my younger readers, that Le-land, and others, in their replies to the modern divines, have given very full, and, as many learned men apprehend, very satisfactory answers to every one of the objections which you have derived from the Gnostic heresy. I am, &c.

LETTER II.

Sir—"The doctrine of a future life, improved by every additional circumstance which could give weight and efficacy to that important truth," is the second of the causes to which you attribute the quick increase of Christianity. Now, if we impartially consider the circumstances of the persons to whom the doctrine, not simply of a future life, but of a future life accompanied with punishments as well as rewards; not of every limited mortal, but of the immortality of a soul, accompanied with that of the resurrection, was delivered, I cannot be of opinion that, abstracted from the supernatural testimony by which it was enforced, it could have met with that extraordinary reception that it actually did receive.

It was not that kind of future life which they expected; it did not hold out to them the punishments of the infernal region as omnia fabulae. (Old wives' fables.) To the question, Quid si post mortem non erit anima? (What if souls should not exist after death?) they would not answer with Cicero and the philosophers, Beatos esse censeo; (They are happy;) because, there was a great probability that it might be quite otherwise with them. I am not to learn that there are passages to be picked up in the writings of the ancients, which might be produced as proofs of their expecting a future state of punishment for the figments; but this opinion was worn out of credit before the time of our Saviour; the whole disputation in the first book of the Tusculean Questions goes upon the other supposition. Nor was the absurdity of the doctrine of future punishments confined to the writings of the philosophers, or the circles of the learned and polite; for Cicero, to mention no others, makes no secret of it in his public pleadings in the great cause of the Christians before the procurator, sii dixit, non nisi ut praebitalis clerus, mystically referred to his oration for Cluentius. In this oration, you may remember, he makes great mention of a very abandoned fellow who had forfeited his profession of religion, and joined himself to the Church; but Cicero knew not how to save him, and he had sent him to another villainy; yet, even to this profligate, by name Oppianicus, he is persuaded that death was not the occasion of any evil. Hence, I think, we may conclude, that such of the Romans as were not wholly infected with the amalginating notions of Epicurus, but entertained (whether from remote tradition or enlightened argumentation) hopes of a future life, had no manner of expectation of such a life as included in it the severity of punishment denounced in the Christian scheme both against the wicked.

Nor was it that kind of future life which they wished: they would have been glad enough of an Elysium which could have admitted into it men who had spent this life in the perpetration of every vice which can debase and pollute the human heart. To abandon every seducing gratification of sense, to pluck up every latent root of ambition, to subdue every impulse of revenge, to divest themselves of every invertebrate habit in which they were infected, and their propensity to the opposite... suggest, for and against the immortality of the soul; and those uncertain glimmerings of the light of nature would have prepared the mind for the reception of the illustrations of this subject by the Gospel, had not the resurrection been a part of the doctrine therein advanced. But that this corporeal frame, which is hourly mouldering away, and reduced to putrefaction, and after a certain undetermined period from which it was first derived, should ever be "clothed with immortality; that this corruptible should ever put on incorruption," is a truth so far removed from the apprehension of philosophical research, so dissuasive from the common conceptions of mankind, that amongst all ranks and persuasions of men it was esteemed an impossible thing. At Athens, the philosophers had listened with patience to St. Paul, while they conceived him but a "sower of strange gods:" but as soon as they apprehended, that by the event of Christ's death, and the resurrection, they turned from him with contempt. It was principally the insisting upon the same topic which, made Festus think "that much learning had made him mad." And the questions, "How are the dead raised up?" and, "With what body do they come?" seem, by Paul's solicitude to answer them with fullness and precision, to have been not infrequently proposed to him by those who were desirous of becoming Christians.

The doctrine of a future life, then, as promulgated in the Gospel, being neither agreeable to the expectations, nor corresponding with the wishes, nor conformable to the reason of the Gentiles, I can discover no motive (setting aside the true one) for their attaching to it the first place, which commonly induces them to receive it; and, in consequence of their belief to conform their loose morals to the rigid standard of Gospel purity, upon the mere authority of a few contemptible fisher men of Judaea. And even you, yourself, so seen; to have changed your opinion concerning the probability of the expectation of a future life in converting the heathen, when you observe in the following chapter, that "the Pagans multitude, retaining their gratitude for temporal benefits alone, rejected the inestimable present of life and immortality which was offered to mankind by Jesus of Nazareth."

Monteusequin is of opinion that it will ever be impossible for Christianity to establish itself in China and the East, from the circumstance that it prohibits a plurality of wives. How then could it be possible for it to have pervaded the voluptuous capital, and traversed the utmost limits of the empire of Rome, by the feeble efforts of human industry or human knavery?

But the Gentiles, you are of opinion, were converted by their fears; and you reckon the doctrine of Christ's speedy appearance, of the millennium, and of the general conflagration amongst those additional circumstances which gave weight to their belief, and rendered it likely to be received. The examination of the efficiency of these several circumstances in alarming the apprehensions of the Gentiles, what if I should grant your position? Still the main question recurs, from what cause was the effect produced? Not surely from the mere human labours of men who were everywhere spoken against, made a spectacle of, and considered as the filth of the world, and the off-savouring of all things, not surely from the human power of him, who professed himself "rude in speech, in bodily presence contemptible," and a despiser of "the excellency of speech, and the enticing words of man's wisdom." No, such wretched instruments were but ill fitted to inspire the haughty and the learned Romans with any other passions than those of pity or contempt.

Now, sir, if you please, we will consider that universal expectation of the approaching end of the world, which, you think, had such great influence in converting the Pagans to the profession of Christianity. The near approach, you say, of this wonderful event had been predicted by the apostles; "though the revolution of seventeenth centuries has instructed us to press too closely the mysterious language of prophecy and revelation." That this opinion, even in the times of the apostles, had made its way into the Christian church, I readily admit; but that the apostles ever either predicted this event by the spirit in the capacity it fell into the hands of men, does not seem probable to me. As this is a point of some difficulty and importance, you will suffer me to explain it at some length.

It must be owned that there are several passages in the writings of the apostles which, at the first view, seem to warrant the opinion you have adopted. "Now," says St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, "it is high time to awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. For the night is far spent, the day is at hand. Therefore let us give theatts to prayer, that we may be found acceptable to God at that day. And let us not be为例, and be not unwise, but understand what the will of the Lord be, that we may be wise. For the night cometh, when no man can work. Therefore let us not sleep, as others do; but let us watch and be sober. For they that sleep slumber as doth the rest of men; but they that watch keep watch and are sober. Now that same night there came auffling great corruption of the Christian church, which was the result of this revelation of the man of sin, this mystery of iniquity, ly to leave them, that it was not for them to "know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath fixed," Nor is it to be wondered at, that the apostles were left in a state of uncertainty concerning the time in which Christ should appear; since being far more exalted, and more high enly as it be said of Paul, who clearly foresees this corruption above seventeen hundred years ago; and all the troubles of a great portion of them, and the speedy coming of Christ could never have been "predicted" by the apostles. Take it, as translated by Bishop Newton: "But the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times, some shall apostatize from the faith; giving heed to erroneous spirits, and doctrines concerning demons, through the hypocrisy of liars; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats." Here you have an express prophecy; the Spirit spoke to the apostles when they were writing; but at some distant period, some should apostatize from the faith; some, who had been Christians, should, in truth, be so no longer, but should give heed to erroneous spirits, and doctrines concerning demons: but the apostles could not tell you whether you may, perhaps, discover in it the erroneous tenets, and demons or saint worship of the church of Rome. "Through the hypocrisy of liars" you recognise, no doubt, the priesthood, and the martyrologists. "Having their conscience seared with a hot iron," calvaries, indeed, must his conscience be, who traffics in indulgence. "Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats:" this language needs pressing; it discovers, at once, the unhappy votaries of monastic life, and the mortal sin of eating flesh on fast days.
If, notwithstanding what has been said, you should still be of opinion that the apostles expected Christ would come in their time; it will not follow that their error ought in any wise to diminish their authority as preachers of the Gospel.
I am sensible that this position may alarm even some well-wishers to Christianity; and supply its enemies with what they will think an irreparable argument. The apostles, they will say, were inspired with the Spirit of truth; and yet they fell into a gross mistake concerning a matter of great importance; how is this to be reconciled? Perhaps, in the following manner: When the time of our Saviour's ministry was nearly at an end, he thought proper to raise the spirits of his disciples by instituting the terrible events of the destruction of Jerusalem; he said to them about his design of leaving them, by promising that he would send to them the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, the Spirit of truth, who should teach them all things, and lead them in-
to all the truth; and that he would return to them on the third day, and that they were to wait for the Holy Ghost to arrive. And we know farther, that from that time forward they were enabled to speak with tongues, to work miracles, to preach the word with power, and to comprehend the mystery of the new dispensation which had been put into them. But we have no reason from hence to conclude, that they were immediately inspired with the apprehension of whatever might be known; that they became acquainted with all kinds of truth. They were undoubtedly led into such truths as it was necessary for them to know, in order to their converting the world to Christianity; but, in other things, they were probably left to the exercise of their understanding, as other men usually are. But surely they might be proper witnesses of the life and resurrection of Christ, though they were not acquainted with every thing which might have been known; though, in particular, they were ignorant of the precise time when our Lord would come to judge the world. It can be easily supposed that these were appointed to bear witness to others; and to
them about their authority as preachers of the Gospel.
I am sensible that this position may alarm even some well-wishers to Christianity; and supply its enemies with what they will think an irreparable argument. The apostles, they will say, were inspired with the Spirit of truth; and yet they fell into a gross mistake concerning a matter of great importance; how is this to be reconciled? Perhaps, in the following manner: When the time of our Saviour's ministry was nearly at an end, he thought proper to raise the spirits of his disciples by instituting the terrible events of the destruction of Jerusalem; he said to them about his design of leaving them, by promising that he would send to them the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, the Spirit of truth, who should teach them all things, and lead them in-
to all the truth; and that he would return to them on the third day, and that they were to wait for the Holy Ghost to arrive. And we know farther, that from that time forward they were enabled to speak with tongues, to work miracles, to preach the word with power, and to comprehend the mystery of the new dispensation which had been put into them. But we have no reason from hence
to conclude, that they were immediately inspired with the apprehension of whatever might be known; though, in particular, they were ignorant of the precise time when our Lord would come to judge the world. It can be easily supposed that these were appointed to bear witness to others; and to
them about their authority as preachers of the Gospel.
LETTER III.

Sir,—You esteem "the miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church," as the third of the secondary causes of the rapid growth of Christianity. I should be willing to acknowledge the miracles, not merely ascribed to the primitive church, but really performed by the apostles, as the one great primary cause of the conversion of the Gentiles. But waiving this consideration, let us suppose whether the miraculous powers which you ascribe to the primitive church, were in any eminent degree calculated to spread the belief of Christianity amongst a great and enlightened people.

Moreover, "of divine inspirations, conveyed sometimes in the form of a sleeping, sometimes of a waking vision; and were literally bestowed on all ranks of the faithful, on women as on elders, on boys as well as upon bishops." "The design of these visions," you say, "was for the most part either to disclose the future history, or to guide the present administration of the church." You speak of "the expulsion of devils as an ordinary triumph of religion, usually performed in a public manner; and when the patient was relieved by the skill or the power of the exorcist, the vanquished demon was heard to confess that he was one of the fabled gods of antiquity, who had impiously usurped the adoration of mankind;" and you represent even the miracle of the resurrection of the dead as frequently performed on necessary occasions. Cast your eye, sir, upon the church of Rome, and ask yourself, (I put the question to your heart, and beg you will consult that for an answer; ask yourself;) whether her absurd pretensions to that very kind of miraculous power, which has been ascribed to the operations of Christianity, have not converted half her numbers to Protestantism, and the other half to infidelity? Neither the sword of the civil magistrate, nor the possession of the keys of heaven, nor the terrors of her spiritual thunders, have been able to keep within her pale even those who have been bred up in her faith; how then should you think, that the very cause which has almost extinguished Christianity among Christians, should have established it amongst Pagans? For I may justly be misunderstood. I do not take upon me to say, that all the miracles recorded in the history of the primitive church after the apostatical age were forgeries: it is foreign to the present purpose to deliver any opinion upon that subject; but I do beg leave to insist upon this, that such of them as were forgeries must, in that learned age, by their easy detection, have rather impeded than accelerated the progress of Christianity; and it appears very probable to me, that nothing but the recent prevailing evidences of real, unquestioned, apostolical miracles, could have secured the infant church from being destroyed by those who were falsely ascribed to it.

It is not every man who can nicely separate the corruption of a religion itself, from the growth of Christianity. I should be willing to apportion to each of those degrees of credit due to the diversities of evidence, and those who have the ability for the task are usually ready enough to emancipate themselves from Gospel restraints (which thwart their desires) by checking the entertainments of passion, and combat the prejudices of the world and the surnames) by blaming its native simplicity with the superpositions which have been derived from it. No argument is so well suited to the indulgence of the immorality of mankind, as that priests of all ages and religions are the same; we see the pretensions of the Romish priesthood to miraculous powers, and we know them to be false; we are conscious that they, at least, must sacrifice their integrity to their interest or their ambition; and being persuaded that there is a great sameness in the passions of mankind and in their incentives to action; and knowing that the history of past ages is abundantly stored with similar oblines to supernatural authority, we traverse back, in imagina- tion, to the regions of primitive superstition; we see from a superficial view, nothing to discriminate one set of men or one period of time from another, we hastily conclude that all revealed religion is a cheat, and that the miracles attributed to the apostles: every species of miracles which heaven had enabled the first preachers to perform, would be counterfeited, either from misguided zeal or interested cunning: either through the imbecility or the iniquity of mankind; and we might be induced to reasonably conclude that there never was any piety, charity, or chastity in the world, from seeing such plenty of pretenders to these virtues, as that there never were any real miracles performed, from considering the great store of those which have been forged.

But, I know not how it has happened, there are many in the present age (I am far from including you, sir, in the number,) whose prejudices against all miraculous events have arisen from a conclusion, (which appears possible to any human testimony, however great, to establish their credibility.) I beg pardon for styling their reasoning, prejudices. I have no design to give offence by that word. I mean not that they have no reason, but that it appears to be a vicious and insuperable prejudice, opposed to the scepticism of every deist to wilful infidelity, as it is in the desire to refer the faith of every divine to professional bias. They do not have the desire to be convinced by no other testimony, nor more worthy of our attention than the prologues of Pagan story or the lying wonders of Papal artifice. I have no intention, in this place, to enlarge upon the many circumstances by which a candid inquirer after truth might be enabled to distinguish the apocryphal from the orthodox interpolated view of Christ and his apostles and the tricks of ancient or modern superstition. One observation I would suggest to you upon this subject: the miracles recorded in the Old and New Testament are so intimately united with the morality of common events, and the ordinary transactions of life, that you cannot, as in profane history, separate the one from the other. My meaning will be illustrated by an instance: Tacitus and Suetonius have handed down to us an account of many great actions of the emperors; and it is at least probable, that they formed us of his having wrought some miracles; of his having cured a lame man, and restored sight to one that was blind. But what they tell us of these miracles is so unconnected with anything that goes before or after, that we are forced to reject the relation of them without injuring, in any degree, the consistency of the narration of the other circumstances of his life: on the other hand, if you reject the relation or the miracles altogether, you must necessarily reject the account of his whole life, and of several transactions, concerning which we have the undoubted testimony of other writers besides the evangelists. But if this argument should not strike you, perhaps the following observation may tend to remove a little of the prejudice usually conceived against Gospel miracles by men of lively imaginations, on account of the gross forgeries attributed to the first ages of the church.

The phenomena of physics are sometimes happily illustrated by an hypothesis; and the most reconcile truths of mathematical science, not unfrequently, investigated from an absurd position. What if we try the same method of arguing the case of Christ, and his miracles? Let us suppose that this relation was to be promulgated to mankind; and that twelve unlearned and unfriend men, inhabitants of any country most odious and despiable in the eyes of Europe, should, by the power of God, be endowed with the faculty of speaking languages unknown to them, and capable of expressing all human ability; and that, being strongly impressed with a particular truth which they were commissioned to promulgate, they should travel, not only through the barbarous regions of Africa, but through all the learned and politicized states of Europe, preaching everywhere with unremitted sedulity a new religion, working stupendous miracles in attestation of their mission, and communicating to their first converts a variety of arts, and instructing them in great and small gifts: does it appear probable to you that, after the death of these men, and probably after the deaths of most of their immediate successors who had been zealously attached to the faith they had seen so miraculously confirmed, none would ever attempt to impose upon the credulous or the ignorant by a fictitious claim to supernatural powers! Would none of them aspire to the gift of tongues? would none of them mistake phrenzy for illumination, and the delusions of a heated brain for the impulses of the Spirit! would none undertake to cure inanimate disorders, to expel demons, or to raise the dead! As far as I can apprehend, we ought, from such a position, to deduce, by every rule of probable reasoning, the absolute impossibility of the miracles of Christ. Let us suppose the apostles: every species of miracles which heaven had enabled the first preachers to perform, would be counterfeited, either from misguided zeal or interested cunning: either through the imbecility or the iniquity of mankind; and we might be induced to reasonably conclude that there never was any piety, charity, or chastity in the world, from seeing such plenty of pretenders to these virtues, as that there never were any real miracles performed, from considering the great store of those which have been forged.
KNOWLEDGE is rightly divided by Mr. Locke into intuitive, sensitive, and demonstrative. It is clear, that a past miracle cannot be the object of sense nor of intuition, nor consequently of demonstration: we cannot, then, philosophically speaking, use the laws of nature for its light; and this is the conclusion. But, in all the great concerns of life, we are influenced by probability rather than knowledge: and of probability, the same great author establishes two foundations; a conformity to the common experience of mankind, and the testimony of other witnesses. He has it been contended, that by the opposition of these two principles probability is destroyed; or, in other terms, that human testimony can never influence the mind to assent to a proposition repugnant to uniform experience. Whose experience? You will not say, your own; for the experience of an individual reaches but a little way; and, no doubt, you daily assent to a thousand truths in politics, in physics, and in the business of common life, which you have never seen verified by experience. You will not produce the experience of your friends; for that can extend itself but a little way beyond your own. But by uniform experience, I conceive, you are destitute of understanding the experience of all ages and nations since the foundation of the world. I answer, first; how is it that you become acquainted with the experience of all ages and nations? You will reply, from history. Be it so: persuade, then, by far the most ancient records of antiquity; and if you find no mention of miracles in the history of Celsus and Pliny, and in the two most celebrated nations of the world, you may suppose, the learned nations of Egypt, that the heathen, inhabiting the land of Canaan, that the numerous people of the Jews, and the nations which, for ages, surrounded them, have all had great experience of miracles. You cannot otherwise obviate this conclusion, than by questioning the authenticity of that book concerning which Newton, when he was writing his commentary on Daniel, expressed himself to the person to whom I had the anecdote, and which deserves not to be lost; "I find more marks of authenticity in the Bible than in any profane history whatsoever."

However, I mean not to press you with the argument ut reecundam; it is needless to solicit your modesty, when it may be, perhaps, possible, to make an impression upon your judgment: I answer, therefore, in the second place, that the admission of the principle by which you reject miracles will lead us into absurdity. The laws of gravitation are the most obvious of all the laws of nature; every person in every part of the globe must confess the phenomena of gravity; the earth, you know, is not a perfect sphere, and the weight of a given mass varies over different parts of the earth's surface: and you confess, it is impossible to find the first discoverer; and yet to have rejected it would have been to reject the truth. But that a piece of iron should ascend gradually from the earth, and fly at last with an increasing rapidity through the air, and alight in a distant place, is, it would seem, to have the same piece of iron, or to a particular species of iron ore, should remain suspended, in opposition to the action of its gravity, it will be alleged, is consonant to the laws of nature. I grant it; but there was a time when it was contrary, I say not to the laws of nature, but to the uniform experience of all preceding ages and countries: and at that particular point of time, the testimony of an individual, or of a dozen individuals, who should have reported themselves eye-witnesses of such a fact, ought, according to your principle, to have been received with the greatest of confidence; and what are those laws of nature, which, you think, can never be suspended? Are they not different to different men, according to the diversities of their comprehension? and known to you only of many of them (that, for instance, which rules the operations of magnetism or electricity) should have been known to you or to me alone, whilst all the rest of the world were unacquainted with it; the effects of it would have been new, and unheard of in the annals, and considered as the effect of the power of a god, in a moment, in that view, whether the suspension of the known laws of nature be effected; that is, whether a miracle be performed, by the mediation of other laws that are unknown, or by the ministry of a person divinely commissioned; since it is impossible for us to be certain that it is contradictory to the constitution of the universe, that a thing so repugnant to it should have been performed, and their action overruled by others, still more general, than the law's known and known to you; that is, that miracles should be performed before such a being as man, at those times, in those places, and under those circumstances, which God, in his universal providence, had preordained. I am, &c.

LETTER IV.

Str:—I readily acknowledge the utility of your fourth cause, "the virtues of the first Christians," as greatly conducing to the spreading of their religion; but then you seem to quite mar the compliment you pay them, by representing their virtues as proceeding either from their repentance for having been the most abandoned sinners, or from the laudable desire of supporting the reputation of the society in which they were engaged.

That repentance is the first step to virtue, is true enough; but I see no reason for supposing, according to the calendar of history, that the Christian was necessarily a wicked party men who washed away in the waters of baptism the guilt for which the temples of the gods refused to grant them any expiation. The apostles, sir, did not, like Romans, destroy an antiquity in order to give it a new dress; they had not the same sturdy means of securing their adherents from the grasp of civil power; they did not persuade them to abandon the temples of the gods because they could there obtain no expiation for their guilt, but because every degree of guilt was expiated in them with too great facility, and every vice practiced, not only without remorse, but with the most powerful sanction of public approbation.

"After the example," you say, "of their Divine Master, the missionaries of the Gospel addressed themselves to men, and especially to women, oppressed by the consciousness, and very often by the effects, of their vices."—This, sir, I really think, is not a fair representation of the matter; it may catch the applause of the unlearned, embolden many a striping to cast off for ever the sweet blush of modesty, confirm many a dissolute virgin in the practice of his impure habits, and suggest great occasion of unmerited and wanton mockery to the world. But the history of the incursions of the first Christians, whose mission has been traced up against Christianity, even by the worst of its enemies, not a speck of that kind have they been able to fix, either upon the apostles or their Divine Master. Sir, when the Gospel of the first Christians was preached in single houses or obscure villages, not in subterraneous caves and impure brothels, not in labyrinths and in prisons; but in the synagogues and in the temples, in the streets and the market places of the great capitals of the Roman provinces in Jerusalem, in Corinth, and in Amiab; in Athens, in Ephesus, and in Rome. Nor do I any where find, that its missionaries were ordered particularly to address themselves to the shameless women you mention; I do indeed find the direct contrary; for they were ordered to turn away from, to have no fellowship or intercourse with such as were wont "to creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts. And what if a few women, who had either been seduced by their passions, or had fallen victims to the licentious manners of their age, should be found amongst those who most readily to receive a religion that forbid all impurity! I do not apprehend that this circumstance ought to be an instrument to those who sought their reformation. That the majority of the first converts to Christianity were of an inferior condition in life, may readily be allowed; and you yourself have, in another place, given a good reason for it: those who are distinguished by riches, honours, or knowledge, being so very incomparable in number when compared with the bulk of mankind. But though not many mighty, not many noble were called—yet some mighty, and some mo—

Dr. SMITH. Late Master of Trinity College.
ble, some one as great reputation as any of the age in which they lived, were, at least, on a par to the Christian faith. Short indeed are the accounts which have been transmitted to us of the first propagators of Christianity; yet, even in these we meet with the names of many who would have done credit to any cause. I will not pretend to enumerate them all; a few will be sufficient to make you recollect that there were, at least, some converts to Christianity, both from among the Jews and Gentiles, whose lives were not stained with in- exorable vices. In Roman times to some we allude, of the Jews; Joseph of Arimathea, a man of fortune and a counsellor; a nobleman and a centurion of Capernaum; Jairus, Crispus, Sosthenes, rulers of synagogues; Apollo, an eloquent and learned man; Zeos, a Jewish lawyer; the treasurer of the people of Ephesus, Ebion, a companion of the Italian band; Dionysius, a member of the Aegopagus at Athens, and Sergius Paulus, a man of proconsular or prytanean authority, of whom it may be remarked, that if he resigned his high and lucrative office in consequence of his turning Christian, it is a strong presumption in its fa- vor; if he retained it, we may conclude that the profession of Christianity was not so utterly incompatible with the discharge of the offices of civil life as you sometimes represent it.

This catalogue of men of rank, fortune, and knowledge, who embraced Christianity, might, was it necessary, be much enlarged; and probably another conversation with St. Paul would have enabled us to trace it with instances of Peter and king Agrippa himself; not that the writers of the books of the New Testament seem to have been at all solicitous in mentioning the great or the learned men who were converted to the faith. Had that been part of their design, they would, in the last place, have included in them the greatest number of philosophers, or at least the greatest number of those, who in the Roman Republic, are called orators, statesmen, or statesmen-soldiers, who, however men might have pleased, or whose convictions were, or were not, in course of time, admitted to the assemblies of the Pagans, and to their discussion on the subject of what is right and what is wrong. The increase of the church, excited in the minds of the Pagans an abhorrence of whatever respected it. It cannot be unknown to you, sir, that the scrupulous vices of these very early sects brought a general and undistinguished execration; that from proscription, no exception to it was made, and that, whatever shuns to appear as an instance of the increase of the sect, excited in the minds of the Pagans an abhorrence of whatever respected it. It cannot be unknown to you, sir, that several sects, both at home and abroad, were established, who have appeared from this point of view, to detract from the sect from which you have referred the rapid and extensive spread of Christianity. It must be acknowledged that union essentially contributes to the strength of every association, civil, military, and religious; but, unfortunately for your argument, and much to the re- spect of the Christian religion, the sectaries of different sects, from the apostolic age to your own, than union, “I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ,” are expressions of disunion, which we meet with in the earliest period of the church history; and we cannot look in to the writings of any, either friend or foe to Christianity, but we find the one of them lamenting, and the other existing in an immense catalogue of sectaries; and both of them thereby furnishing us with great reason to believe that the divisions with respect to doctrine, worship, and discipline, which have ever subsisted in the church, must have greatly tended to hurt the credit of Christianity, and to alienate the minds of the Gentiles from the reception of such a various and discordant faith.

You are eloquent in describing the austere morality of the primitive Christians, as compared to the possibilities of sensuality and abhorrent from all the innocent pleasures and amuse- ments of life; and you enlarge, with a studied minuteness, upon their censures of luxury, and their sentiments concerning the right understanding of charity; but in this circumstantial enum- ration of their errors, or their faults (which I am under no neces- sity of denying or excusing) you seem to forget the very purpose for which you profess to have introduced the men- tion of them; for the picture you have drawn is so hibious, and so colored so favorably, that the interest of affording to a clau- ser inspection, it must have made every man of pleasure or of sense turn from it with horror or disgust; and so far from contrib- uting to the rapid growth of Christianity by the austerity of their manners, or by their faults, (which I am under no necessity of denying or excusing) you seem to forget the very purpose for which you profess to have introduced the men- tion of them; for the picture you have drawn is so hibious, and so colored so favorably, that the interest of affording to a clau- ser inspection, it must have made every man of pleasure or of sense turn from it with horror or disgust; and so far from contrib- uttering to the rapid growth of Christianity by the austerity of their manners, or by their faults, (which I am under no necessity of denying or excusing) you seem to forget the very purpose for which you profess to have introduced the men- tion of them; for the picture you have drawn is so hibious, and so colored so favorably, that the interest of affording to a clau- ser inspection, it must have made every man of pleasure or of sense turn from it with horror or disgust; and so far from contribto it by another; just as a member who has been expelled any one college in a university, is generally thought unworthy of being admitted by any other: but it is not admitted, that this severity and this union of discipline could ever have induced the Pagans to forsake the gods of their country, and to adopt a faith, by which they were entangled to them selves, their neighbours, and to all the severities of persecution, exercised with unrelenting barbarity, against the Christians.

The account you give of the origin and progress of episcopal jurisdiction, of the observation of the days of rest, or sabbaths, in the churches, and of the ambition of the Roman pontiff, I believe to be in general accurate and true; and I am not in the least surprised at the bitterness which now and then escapes you in treating this subject; for to see the most benign religion thus represented, or the most reasonable opinion, and the most humble one administering to the pride, and the avarice, and the ambition of those who wished to be considered as its guardians, and who avowd themselves its professed, would exact a censure from men more attached probably to church authority than yourself. Not that I think it either a very candal, or a very useful undertaking, to be solely and indiscriminately engaged in portraying the characters of the professors of Christianity in the worst colours: it is not candid, because "the great law of impartiality, which obliges an historian to reveal the imperfections of the uninspired teachers and believers of the Gospel," obliges him also not to conceal, or to pass over with niggard and reluctant reflections those occasional grandeur, or those loas and fame, all their comforts, and all their hopes in this life; may, life itself, rather than violate any one of the precepts of that Gospel which, from the testimony of inspired teachers, they so often exhorted, and which, is not useful, because "to a careless observer," (that is, to the generality of mankind) "their faults may seem to cast a shade on the faith which they professed;" and may really infect the minds of the young and unlearned especially, with prejudices against Christianity, of which, a matter of the utmost importance may (believe me sir, it may, for aught you or any person else can prove to the contrary) entirely depend.

Let us, then, Sir, amuse ourselves and others with the immorality of priests and the ambition of prelates; with the absurd vulgarity of synods and councils; with the ridiculous doctrines which visionary enthusiasts or interested churchmen have sanctified with the name of Christian; but a display of ingenuity or erudition upon such subjects is much misplaced, since it excites, almost in every person, an unavoidable suspicion of the purity of the source itself from which such polluted streams have not only debased, but corrupted the minds of all who are far from wishing that the clergy should be looked up to with a blind reverence, or their imperfections screened by the sanctity of their functions from the animadversion of the world; quite the contrary. Their conduct, I am of opinion, deserves the severest censure. In order to cover the defect of the Gospel more severely censured than that of other men; but great care should be taken not to represent their vice, or their indiscipline, as originating in the principles of their religion. Do not mistake me. I am not here begging quarters for Christianity, or contending that even the principles of our religion should be received with implicit faith; or that every objection to Christianity should be stifled by a representation of the mischief it might do if publicly pronounced: on the contrary, we invite, may, we challenge you to a direct and liberal attack, though oblique glances and ingenious insinuations we are willing to avoid; well knowing that the character of our religion, like that of an honest man, is defended with greater difficulty against the suggestions of ridicule, and the secret malice of pretended friends, than against positive accusations and the avowed malice of open enemies.

In your account of the primitive church, you set forth that the want of discipline and human learning was supplied by the occasional assistance of the prophets, who were called to that function without distinction of age, sex, or natural abilities, being selected by God, in whose presence they stood, by which some of the first Christians were enabled to cooperate with the apostles in the general design of preaching the Gospel; and that this gift, or rather as Mr. Locke thinks, the gift of prophecy, or that of speaking in tongues, which was prompted to speak in their assemblies at the same time, was the occasion of some disorder in the church of Corinth, which required the interpolation of the apostle to compose, is confessed on all hands. But if you mean that the prophets were ever the sole pastors of the faithful, or that no provision was made by the apostles for the good government and edification of the church, except what might be accidentally derived from the occasional assistance of the prophets, you are at a material mistake. In the common writings of Paul and Barnabas having ordained elders in Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch; and of Paul’s commission to Titus, whom he had left in Crete, to ordain elders in every city; you may see, in the generality of these instances, the qualifications of those whom they were to appoint bishops; one of which was, that a bishop should be able, by sound doctrine, to exhort and to convince the gain sayer. Nor is it said, that this sound doctrine was to be communicated to the people of God by preachers who might be called to that office; but a bishop was to be “able to teach,” not what he had learned by prophecy, but what Paul publicly preached, “the things that thou hast heard of the many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also.”

And in every place almost, where prophets are mentioned, they are joined with apostles and teachers, and other ministers of the Gospel, so that there is no reason for your representing them as a distinct order of men, who were, by their occasional assistance, to supply the want of discipline and human learning in the church. It would be taking too large a field to inquire whether the prophets you speak of were endowed with ordinary or extraordinary gifts, whether they were inspired, or whether the divorce of the Spirit, or according to the analogy of faith, whether their gift consisted in the foretelling of future events, or in the interpreting of Scripture to the elucidation, the comfort of the Church. I will content myself with observing, that he will judge very improperly concerning the prophets of the apostolic church who takes his idea of their office or importance from your description of their functions.

In speaking of the community of goods, which, you say, was adopted for a short time in the primitive church, you hold as inconclusive the arguments of Mosheim, who has endeavoured to prove that it was a community quite different from the communism recommended by Pythagoras, and principally in a common use derived from an unbounded liberty, which induced the opulent to share their riches with their indigent brethren. There have been others, as well as Mosheim, who have entertained this opinion; and it is not quite so indefensible as you represent it: but whether it be reasonable or absurd, need not now be examined; it is far more necessary to take notice of an expression which you have not accented, but which is likely to give rise to a very injurious suspicion concerning the integrity of the apostles. In process of time, you observe, “the converts who embraced the new religion were permitted to retain the possession of their property.” This expression, “permitted to retain,” in ordinary cases, implies a liberty of disposing of their property to part with. Now, sir, I have not the shadow of a doubt in affirming that we have no account in Scripture of any such obligation being imposed upon the converts to Christianity, either by Christ himself, or by his apostles, or by any other authority; may, in the very place where this community of goods is treated of, there is an express proof (I know not how your imprudence has happened to overlook it) to the contrary. When Peter was about to inflict an exemplary punishment upon Ananias (not for keeping back a part of the price, as some men are fond of representing it, but) for his lying and hypocrisy, in offering a part of the price of his slave, who was the husband of the dead (unsealed) was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not thine own power?” From this account it is evident that Ananias was under no obligation to part with his property; and after he had parted with it, the price was in his own power. The apostle would have permitted him to retain the whole of it, if he had thought fit, though he would not permit his prevarication to go unpunished.

You have remarked, that “the feasts of love, the aggur, and the happy meats, were called a very good part of public worship.” Let any one should from hence be led to suspect that these feasts of love, this pleasing part of the public worship of the primitive church, resembled the vulgar gathered meetings, without any improvement of time, I will take the liberty to add to your account a short explication of the nature of these agapes. Tartulian, in the 39th chapter of his Apology, has done it in my hands. “The nature of our supper," says he, "is indicated by its name; it is called by a word which, in the Greek language, signifies love: love being the essence of the entertainment, since we look upon that as gain which is expended, with a pious purpose, in the relief and refreshment of all our indigent. The occasion of our entertainment being so hon- orable, and the object of the magnanimity of our conduits, it consists in the discharge of religious duties; it admits no thing vile, nothing immodest. Before we sit down, prayer is made to God. The hungry eat as much as they desire, and every person, according to his abilities, can have his fill.

We see at least as men who have minds impressed with the idea of spending the night in the worship of God; we so converse as men who are conscious that the Lord heareth them." And perhaps you may object to this testimony in favour of the tenor of the proceedings of Christian meetings as liable to a partiality, because it is the testimony of a Christian; and you may, perhaps, be able to pick out, from the writings of this Christian, something that looks like a contradiction of this account: however, I will rest the matter upon this testimony for the present; forbearing to quote any other Christian writer upon the subject, as I shall, in a future letter, produce you a testimony superior to every objection. You speak too of the agape as an essential part of the public worship. This is not according to your usual accuracy: for, had they been essential, the edict of a heathen magistrate would not have been able to put a stop to them: yet Pliny, in his letter to Trajan, expressly says, that the Christians left them off upon his express prohibition; which we know, that in the council of Carthage, in the fourth century, on account of the abuses which attended them, they began to be interdicted, and ceased, almost universally, in the fifth. I have but two observations to make upon what you have advanced concerning the severity of ecclesiastical penalties: the first is, that even you yourself do not deduct its institution from the Scriptures, but from the power which every voluntary society has over its own members, and therefore, however extravagant, or however absurd—however opposite to the attributes of a commiserating God, or the feelings of a fallible man, it may be thought; or upon whatever trivial occasion, such as that you mention, of calumniating a bishop, a preacher, or even a deacon, it may have been inflicted. Christ and his apostles are not answerable for it. The other is, that it was, of all possible expedients, the least fitted to accomplish the end for which you think it was introduced, the propagation of Christianity. The sight of a penitent, humbled by the public confession, emaciated by fasting, clothed in sackcloth, prostrated at the door of the assembly, and imploring for years together the pardon of his offences, and a readmission into the bosom of the church, was the effect of a method of expelling the Pagans from Christian society, than the pious liberality you mention was of alluring them into it. This pious liberality, sir, would have exacted your elegant powers of description, before you could exhibit it in the amiable man- ner you are able to provide from your book of the self-sufficient and loving another; and it has ever been the dis- tinguishing characteristic of Christians, as opposed to every other denomination of men, Jews, Mahometans, or Pagans. In the times of the apostles, and in the first ages of the church, it showed itself in voluntary contributions for the relief of the poor and the persecuted, the infirm and the unfortunate. As soon as the church was permitted to have permanent possessions in land, and acquired the protection of the civil power, it exerted itself in the erection of hospitals of every kind; institutions like these, of charity and humanity, which were forgotten in the laws of Solon and Lycurgus; and for even one village or hamlet a great number of benefactions were bestowed annuities of Pagan Rome. Indeed, sir, you will think so injuriously of this liberality, if you look upon its origin as superstitious, or upon its application as an artifice of the priesthood to seduce the ingent into the bosom of the church, that you will feel surprised at the absurdity of the charge.

You are much surprised, and not a little concerned, that Tacitus and the younger Pliny have spoken so slightly of the Christian system; and that Seneque and the elder Pliny have not mentioned it at all. You think it as much as a lauditory error which histories, which are the site of history, should have struck others as well as yourself; and I might refer you to the conclusion of the second volume of Dr. Lardner's Collection of Ancient, Jewish, and Hebrew Testimonies to the Tenth of the later Jews, when he remarks on the disjointedness of history, and the limitedness of history, inasmuch as they were performed as often as the philosophers deigned to give their attention to them; or that, at the period of time you observed sectaries of upright morals, when they separate themselves from the religion of their country, do not speedily acquire the reputation of men of letters. The historians are apprehensive of depreciating the dignity of their learned labour, and contaminating their splendid narration of illustrious events, by mixing with it a disgusting detail of religious connexions, and objects of instruction and entertainment; it consists, perhaps, in exploring the infinite intricacy of natural appearances, to busy themselves with what they, perhaps hastily, esteem superfluous. Historians and philosophers, as you may be convinced, I believe, who were the contemporaries of Luther and the first reformers; and who have passed over, in negligent or contemptuous silence, their daring and unpopular attempts to shake the stability of St. Peter's chair. Opposition to the old religion of Rome was first perceived before the arrival of the notice of the civil magistrate; and till it does that, it will mostly be thought below the animadversion of distinguished writers. This remark is peculiarly applicable to the case in point. The first Christians, as Christ had foretold, were hated of all men for his name's sake; it was the name itself, not any vices adhering to the name, which Pliny punish- ed; and they were everywhere held in exceeding contempt, till their numbers excited the apprehension of the ruling powers. The philosophers considered them as enthusiasts, and neglected them; the priests opposed them as innovators, and calumniated them; the great overlooked them; the learned despaired them; and the curious alone, who examined into the system of the new sect, and became acquainted with the writings of some half dozen of writers (most of them, however, bear incidental testimony to the truth of several facts respecting Christianity) in not relating circumstantially the origin, the progress, and the pretensions of a new sect, as a sufficient reason for questioning, either the evidence of the principles upon which it was built, or the supernatural power by which it was supported.

The Roman historians, moreover, were not only culpably incurios concerning the Christians, but unparagonably ignorant of what concerned either them or the Jews: I say, unparagonably ignorant, because the means of information were within their reach; the writings of Josephus were everywhere to be had in Greek; and the works of Eusebius, which were published before Tacitus wrote his history; and yet even Tacitus has fallen into great absurdity, and self-contradiction, in his account of the Jews; and though Tertullian's zeal carried him much too far, when he called him Mendaciorum Inquiisti- nus, [the most loquacious of liars.] yet one cannot help regretting the little pains he took to acquire proper information upon that subject. He derives the name of the Jews, by a rather forced interpretation of the words of Genesis, who speaks of the Jews as abhorring all kinds of images in public worship, and yet accuses them of having placed the image of an ass in the holy of holies: and presently after he tells us, that Pome- nius, when he profaned the temple, was at that time an im- pier of Rome, and that he might be noticed in Plu- tarch, and other writers who have spoken of the Jews; and you yourself have referred to an obscure passage in Suetoni- us, as offering a proof how strangely the Jews and Christians of Rome were confounded with each other. Why, then, should we think it remarkable, that a few celebrated writers, who looked upon the Christians as an obscure sect of the Jews, and upon the Jews as a barbarous and detested people, whose history was not worth the perusal, and who were moreover engaged in the relation of the great events which either occasioned or accompanied the ruin of their eternal empire; why should we be surprised that men occupied in such interesting affairs should have but little care to enquire into the manners of a people which they had left us but short and imperfect descriptions of the Chris- tian system?

"But how shall we excuse," you say, "the supine inat- traction of Tacitus and the younger Pliny to the sect of the church, and the neglect of all the things which were presented by the hand of Omnipotence, not to their reason but to their senses?" The laws of nature were perpetually suspended for the benefit of the church; but the sagacity of Tacitus and the sagacity of Rome turned a deaf ear to the awful voice. To their senses it was spoken that they did so; and, pursuing the ordinary occupations of life and study, appear- ed unconscious of any alterations in the moral or physical government of the world." To this objection I answer in the first place, that they were not referred to an event at all; they were performed as often as the philosophers deigned to give their attention to them; or that, at the period of time you allude to, the laws of nature were "perpetually" suspended for the benefit of the church. It may be, that not one of the few heathen writers, whose books have escaped the ravages of time, with which the Christian empire was to be crowded, knew it follow, because Pliny, or Plutarch, or Galen, or Seneca, or Suetonius, or Tacitus, had never seen a miracle, that no miracles were ever performed! They, indeed, were learned and observant men; and it may be a matter of surprise to us, that respectable, continued, and well-apprized men, such as the Christian ones to have been, should never have been mentioned by them, though they had not seen them. Had an Adrian, or a Vespasian been the author of but a thousandth part of the works of the ancients, we should have seen more than one, probably, of these very historians, philosophers as they were, would have adorned his history with the narration of them; for though they turned aside from the awful spectacle of the miracles of a poor despised apostle, yet they beheld, with exulting complacency, and have related, with unsuspecting credulity, the ostentations tricks of a Roman emperor. It was not for want of faith in miraculous events that these sages neglected the Christian miracles, but for want of candour and impartial examination.

I answer, in the second place, that in the Acts of the Apostles we have an account of a great multitude of Pagans of every condition of life, who were so far from being inactive to the evidences which were presented by the hand of Omniscient Providence, that they were excited to a reverent and astonishment wonder; and, forsaking the religion of their ancestors, and all the flattering hopes of worldly profit, reputation, and tranquillity, adhered with astonishing resolution to the religion of God. That, and the nature of the Acts, till the tune in which some of the sages you mention flourished, is a very obscure part of church history; yet we are certain, that many of the pagan, and we have some reason to believe, that not a few of the philosophic world, during that period, did not turn aside from the awful spectacle of miracles, but saw, and believed; and that a few others should be found, who probably had never seen, and therefore would not believe, is surely no very extraordinary circumstance. Why should we not answer to objections such as these with the godliness of St. Jerome; and bid Celsus, and Porphyry, and Julian, and their followers, learn the illustrious characters of the men who founded, built up, and adored the Christian church? Why should we not tell them, with Arnobius, of the orators, the grammarians, the rhetoricians, the lawyers, the physicians, the philosophers, "who appeared conscious of the alterations in the moral and physical government of the world," and from that consciousness, forsook the ordinary occupations of life and study, and attached themselves to the Christian religion? It is rightly translated "martyred."

Theodosian Code must be my excuse for dissenting from such respectable authority; and in it I conjecture you will find good reason for being of my opinion. Nor ought any friend of the public welfare, and any lover of the church, as applying the word magical to the Christian religion; for the miracles wrought by Christ and his apostles principally consisted in alleviating the distresses by curing the obstinate diseases of human kind; and the proper meaning of magic, as understood by the ancients, is a higher and more holy branch of the art of healing. The elder Pliny lost his life in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, about forty-seven years after the death of Christ; some fifteen years before the death of Pliny, the younger; which Pliny, the elder, states, that every person knew them innocent; but from the description which Tacitus gives of the low estimation they were held in that time, (for which, however, he assigns no cause, and therefore the reason why God did not grant the miracle with which the Jews were every where become so obious, an opposition to polytheism,) and of the extreme sufferings they underwent, we cannot be much surprised that their name is not to be found in the works of Pliny or of Senece: so the sect itself must, by Nero's persecution, have been almost destroy ed in Rome; and it would have been uncourly, not to say unsafe, to have adhered to, and to have zealously defended, a religion so unpopular and so dangerous but deserved stream of popular censure from himself. Notwithstanding this, there is a passage in the Natural History of Pliny which, how much soever it may have been overrated, is a very strong discovery of the Christians, and closely intimates he had heard of their miracles. In speaking concerning the origin of magic, he says: there is also another faction of magic, derived from the Jews, Moses, and Jesus; and a part of the religion of the Egyptians does not ill denote the opinion the Romans entertained of the religious associations of the Christians; and a magical faction implies their pretensions, at least, to the miraculous gifts of healing; and its descending from Moses is according to the customs of the Romans, by which they confounded the Christina with the Jews; and its being then subsisting seems to have a strong reference to the rumours Pliny had negligently heard reported of the Christians.

Summarizing each of these answers to your cool and candid consideration, I proceed to take notice of another difficulty in your fifteenth chapter, which some have thought one of the most important in your whole book: the silence of profane historians concerning the pretenatural darkness at the crucifixion of Christ, this silence is not an argument; all men are of opinion, that profane history is not silent upon this subject; I will neither trouble you with the testimony of Plutarch, nor with the appeal of Tertullian to the public records of the early Christians, but I would premise that we have been rendered on every thing you desire, I will endeavour, from a fair and candid examination of the history of this event, to suggest a doubt, at least to your mind, whether this was the greatest phenomenon to which the mortal eye has been witness since the creation of the globe; I have only to express myself; "Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land until the ninth hour;" St. Mark, "And the sun was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour;" St. Luke: "And it was about the sixth hour, and there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour; and the sun was darkened." The three evangelists agree that there was darkness; and they agree in the extent of the darkness: for it is the same expression in the original, which our translators have rendered earth in Luke, and land in the two other accounts; and they agree in the duration of the darkness—it lasted three hours; and Luke adds a particular circumstance,—that the sun was darkened." I do not know whether this event be any where else mentioned in Scripture, so that our inquiry can neither be extensive nor difficult.

In speaking of darkness, darkness consists in the total absence of light, and adums of no degrees: however, in the more common acceptation of the word, there are degrees of darkness as well as of light; and as the evangelists have said nothing, by which the particular degree can be determined, we have as much reason to suppose it was slight, as you have that it was excessive; but if it was slight, though it had extended itself over the surface of the whole globe, the difficulty of its not being recorded by Pliny or Suetonius vanishes at once. Do you not perceive, sir, upon what a slender foundation this mighty objection is grounded, when we have only to put you upon proving that the darkness at the crucifixion was so unusual a nature as to have excited the admiration of all mankind, not to have been witnessed to it? But I do not mean to deal so logically with you; rather give me leave to spare you the trouble of your proof, by proving or showing the probability, at least, of the direct contrary. There is a circumstance mentioned by St. John which seems to indicate that the darkness was not so excessive as is generally supposed; for it is probable that during the continuance of the darkness, Jesus spoke both to his mother, and to his beloved disciple, whom he saw from the cross; they were probably two persons who surrounded it must have kept them at too great a distance for Jesus to have seen them and known them, had the darkness at the crucifixion been excessive, like the pretenatural darkness at the creation; that the sun was "darkened," and the event apparently is expressed, that during the continuance of that darkness, "they saw not one another." The expression of St. Luke, "the sun was darkened," tends rather to confirm than to overthrow this reasoning. I am sensible this expression is generally equivalent to another; the sun was eclipsed: but the Bible is open to us all; and there can be no presumption in endeavouring to investigate the meaning of Scripture for ourselves. Happily for the present argumentation, the very phrase of the sun's being darkened, occurs in so many words, in one other place (and in only one) of the New Testament; and from that place you may possibly see reason to imagine that the darkness might not, perhaps, have been so intense as in this place, in the same metaphorical sense as before stated. You may suppose the Gospel to be convinced that such a scheme is too palpably absurd to have ever entered the head of any sensible and impartial man.

I specify for the credit of human nature, that I could find reason to agree with you in what you have said of the "universal toleration of Polytheism; of the mild indifference of antiquity; of the Roman princes behaving without concern a thousand forms of religion subsisting in peace under their gentle sway." But there are some passages in the Roman history which make me hesitate at least in this point, and almost induce me to believe that the Romans were exceedingly jealous of all foreign religions, whether they were accompanied with idolatry, or not.

It was the Roman custom, indeed, to invite the tutelary gods of the nation, which they intended to subdue, to abandon their charge, and to promise them the same, and even a more annexed. We read of a place in the city of Damascus, where they were graced as much with the exhibition of their captive gods, as with the less humane one of their captive kings. But this custom, though it filled the city with hundreds of gods as they were as gods, was never brought as a proof of Roman toleration; it may indicate the excess of their vanity, the extent of their superstition, or the refinement of their policy; but it can never show that the religion of individuals, when it differed from public wisdom, was either permitted, as a matter of indifference, or tolerated as an inalienable right of human nature.

Upon another occasion, you, sir, have referred to Livy as relating the introduction and suppression of the rites of Bacchus; with a view to infer, that in antiquity, there existed a universal prohibiting of all foreign religions, and abolishing every mode of sacrifice which differed from the Roman mode, was a business frequently entrusted by their ancestors to the care of the proper magistrates, and gave this reason for the proceeding: that nothing could contribute more effectually to the ruin of religion than the sacrificing after an external rite, and not after the manner instituted by their fathers.

But to come nearer to the times of which you are writing. In Dio Cassius you may meet with a great courtier, one of the interior cabinet, and a polished statesman, in a set speech upon the most moments subject, expressing himself to the emperor in a manner agreeable enough to the practice of antiquity, but utterly inconsistent with the most remote idea of religious toleration. The speech alluded to, contains, I confess, nothing more than the advice of an individual; but it ought to be remembered that that individual was Macenas, that the address was given to Augustus, and that the occasion of giving it was no less important than setting the form of the Roman government. He recommends it to Caesar to worship the gods himself according to the established form, and to force all others to do the same, under the threat of being put to death. If Caesar was wise, he should attempt to introduce foreign religions; nav, he bids him, in the same place, have an eye upon the philosophers also; so that free thinking, free speaking at least, upon religious matters, was not quite so safe under the gentleness of the Roman prince as it was under the rigour of Augustus; in short, God, it is under the much more gentle government of our own.

In the Edict of Toleration, published by Galerius after six years unremitting persecution of the Christians, we perceive the most abject attempt on the part of the Romans to have that which had influenced the conduct of the more ancient Romans, an abhorrence of all innovations in religion. You have favoured us with the translation of this edict, in which he says, "we were particularly desirous of reclaiming into the way of reason and nature," ad bonos mentes (a good pretext for this for a polytheistic persecutor), "the deluded Christians, who had renounced the religion and ceremonies instituted by their fathers," this is the precise language of Livy, describing a persecution of a kind unprecedented before "turba erat nec sacrifcium nec precantium deos patrio more." And the very expedient of forcing the Christians to deliver up their religious books, which was practiced in this persecution, is that which produced the fallacies of Tacitus, Herodotus, and Josephus, as a form of oppression of being used by the ancient philosophers. It was a practice the Romans had recourse to as often as they apprehended their reputation was endangered. In the preamble of the letter of toleration, which the emperor Maximin reluctantly wrote to Sabinius about a year after the publication of Gallenius's Edict, there is a plain avowal of a fact which induced Gallenius and Diocletian to commence their persecution; they had seen the temples of the gods forsaken, and were determined by the severity of punishment to reclaim men to their worship.

In short, the specious recommendation by Macreneus, of forcing every person to be of the emperor's religion, and of hastening and punishing every innovator, contained no new doctrine: it was correspondent to the practice of the Roman senate, in the most illustrious times of the republic, and seems to have been in general use from which the Romans have no scruple in executing Christians, whilst they themselves were pagans; and in their treatment of pagans, after they themselves became Christians; and if any one should be willing to derive those laws against heretics (which induced Gallenius and Diocletian to commence their persecution) from the blind adherence of the Christian emperors to the intolerant policy of their pagan predecessors, something, I think, might be produced in support of his conjecture.

But I am sorry to have said so much upon such a subject. In endeavouring to palliate the severity of the Romans towards the Christians, you have remarked, "It was in vain that the oppressed believer asserted the inalienable rights of conscience and private judgment over which no situation might excite the pity, his arguments could never reach the understanding, either of the philosophic, or of the believing part of the pagan world." How is this, sir? are the arguments for liberty of conscience so exceedingly inconclusive that you think them incapable of reaching the understanding, even of philosophers? A captious adversary would embrace with avidity the opportunity this passage affords him, of blotting your character with the odious stain of being a persecutor; a stain which no private censure or public censure, no matter to which genius or ability, can render amiable. I am far from entertaining such an opinion of your principles; but this conclusion seems fairly deducible from what you have said, that the minds of the pagans with whom our nation was for ages connected and mingling, and punishing those who differed from them in religion; that arguments for the inalienable rights of conscience, which would have convinced yourself, and every philosopher in Europe, and staggered the resolution of an inquisitor, were incapable of reaching their understandings, or making any impression on their hearts; and you might, perhaps, have spared yourself some perplexity in the investigation of the motives which induced the Roman emperors to persecute, and the Roman people to hate the Christians, if you had not overlooked the true one, and adopted with too greatfacility the erroneous idea of the extreme tolerance of pagan Rome.

The Christians, you observe, were accused of atheism: and it must be owned that they were not accused in the most extreme sense of that word; for, instead of Hesiod's thirty thousand gods, they could not be brought to acknowledge above one; and even that one they refused, at the hazard of their lives, to blaspheme with the appellation of Jupiter. But is it not strange that the Romans, who were men to a constant intercourse with superior beings, in the working of miracles, should have been a principal cause of converting to their faith those who branded them with the imputation of witchcraft.

They were accused, too, of forming dangerous conspiracies against the state: this accusation, you own, was as unjust as the preceding: but there seems to have been a peculiar hardness in the situation of the Christians, so as to make you very seriously apprehend their dangerous to the state, on account of their consciences, condemned them, as you have observed, for not interfering in its concerns; for their criminal disregard of the business of war and government, and for their entertaining doctrines which were supposed "to prohibit them from assuming the character of soldiers, of magistrates, and of princes": men, such as these, would have made but poor conspirators.

They were accused, lastly, of the most horrid crimes. This accusation, it is confessed, was mere calumny; yet as calumny is generally more extensive in its influence than truth, it is very possible this carelessness might be more powerful in stopping the progress of Christianity than the virtues of the Christians were in promoting it; and, in truth, Origen observes, that the Christians, on account of the crimes which were maliciously laid to their charge, were held in such abhorrence that no one would think of supporting them. Be it so. The emperor Halcyon, while he wished to remark from, that the Jews, in the very beginning of Christianity, were the authors of all those calumnies which Celsus afterwards took such great delight in using against the Christians, and which you have mentioned with such great precision.

It is no improbable supposition, that the clandestine manner in which the persecuting spirit of the Jews and Gentiles obliged the Christians to celebrate their eucharist, together with the expressions of eating the body and drinking the blood of Christ, which were used in its institution, and the custom of inquiring a kiss of charity to each other, and of calling each other by the appellations of brother and sister, were used in an insinuating manner, to instruct the Christians in the art of provoking and persuading their enemies to their enemies to their friends, and to induce careless observers to believe, all the odious things which were said against the Christians.

You have displayed at length, in expressive diction, the accusations of the enemies of Christianity; and you have told us of the impudent defence by which the Christians vindicated the purity of their morals; and you have huddled up in a short note (which many a reader will never see) the testimony of Pliny to their innocence. Permit me to do you, oh! Christians a little justice, by producing in their cause the whole truth.

Between seventy and eighty years after the death of Christ, Pliny had occasion to consult the emperor Trajan concerning the manner in which he should treat the Christians; it seems as if there had been judicial proceedings against them, though Pliny had never happened to attend any of them. He knew, indeed, that men were to be punished for being Christians, or he would not, as a sensible magistrate, have received the accusations of legal, much less of illegal, anonymous informers against them; nor would he, before he wrote to the emperor, have put to death those whom his threats had not induced to repent. Trajan was in a manner instructed by the Christians a little justice, by producing in their cause the whole truth.

Whatever faults, then, the Christians may have been guilty of in after-times, you could not, I think, have found them guilty of more than some few years before the birth of Christ, in the case of those two prophets whom we are assured the Holy Spirit foretold; one of whom was of the number of the Jews, and the other of the Christians, and who were conspired against and put to death. — Pint. Epist. 97: lib. 10.
tives."

Had there been but a shadow of a crime in their assemblies, it must have been detected by the industrious search of the intelligent Pliny; and it is a matter of real surprise that no one of the apostles thought of paying court to the governor by a false testimony, especially as the apostasy seems to have been general; for, since the temples, which had been almost deserted, began again to be frequented; and the victims, for which a little time before scarce a purchaser was to be found, began again every where to be bought up.

This, sir, is a valuable testimony in our favor. It is not that of a declaiming apostle of a deluding priest, or of a deluded martyr of an orthodox bishop, or of any of "the most pious of men," the Christians; but it is that of a Roman magistrate, philosopher, and lawyer, who cannot be supposed to have wanted instruction; and who, if they had done wrong, could not have done it in the company of the Christians, since, in his treatment of them, he had stretched the authority of his office, and violated alike the laws of his country and of humanity.

With this testimony I will conclude my remarks, for I have no disposition to blacken the character you have given of Nero; or to lessen the humanity of the Roman magistrates; or to magnify the number of Christians or of martyrs; or to undertake the defence of a few fanatics, who by their injurious zeal brought ruin upon themselves, and upon their profession. I may not, probably, have convinced you that you are wrong in any thing which you have advanced, or that the authors you have quoted will not support you in the inferences you have drawn from their works; or that Christianity ought to be distinguished from its corruptions: yet I may, perhaps, have had the good fortune to lessen, in the minds of others, some of that dislike to the Christian religion which the persecution of your book, however excited, have touched but upon general topics, for I should have wearied out your patience, to say nothing of my reader's, or my own, had I enlarged upon every thing in which I dissent from you: and a minute examination of your work would, moreover, have led to the appearance of a capacious disposition to descend into illiberal personalities, and might have produced a certain acrimony of sentiment or expression which may be serviceable in supplying the place of argument, or adding a zest to dull composition, but has nothing to do with the investigation of truth. Sorry shall I be if what I have written should give the least interruption to the prosecution of the great work in which you are engaged. The world is now possessed of the opinion of us both upon the subject in question, and it may, perhaps, be proper for us both to leave it in this state. I say not this from any want of acknowledgments of my mistakes, when I am convinced that I am in error, but to express the most unanswerable reluctance which I feel to the greatest corruption of a prudent advocate for truth. The world is not, in good truth, a difficult task to chastise: the fownd petulance of those who mistake personal inveighing for reasoning, and clumsy banter for ingenuity; but it is a dirty business at best, and should never be undertaken by a man on any temper except when the interests of truth may suffer by his neglect. Nothing of this nature, I am sensible, is to be expected from you; and if any thing of the kind has happened to escape myself, I hereby disclaim the intention of saying it, and heartily wish it unsaid.

Will you permit me, sir, through this channel (I may not, perhaps, have another so good an opportunity of doing it) to address a few words, not to yourself, but to a set of men who disturb all company with their profane declamation against Christianity; and who, having picked up in their travels, or in the writings of the Deists, a few flimsy objections, infect, with their ignorant and irreverent ridicule, the ingenuous minds of the rising generation?

Appeal to Infidels.

Gentlemen,—Suppose the mighty work accomplished, the Christian principle everywhere proscribed, and the religion of nature once more became the religion of Christendom; what advantage will you have derived to your country, or to yourselves, from the exchange! I know your anxiety: you will be freed from the hypocrisy of priests, and the tyrannies of superstition; that Lycurgus, and Numa, and Odin, and Mango-Copae, and all the great legislators of ancient and modern story, have been of opinion that the affairs of civil society could not well be conducted without religion; you must of necessity introduce a priesthood, with probably as much hypocrisy; a religion with assuredly more superstition, than that which you now repugnate with such indecent and ill-grounded contempt. Then, for your part, you will not make the world: you will have freed it from its abhorrence of vice, and from every powerful incentive to virtue; you will, with the religion, have brought lack the depraved morality of Paganism; you will have robbed mankind of their firm assurance of another life, and thereby you will have despoiled them of their patience, of their humility, of their charity, of their chastity, of all those mild and silent virtues, which (however despisalbe they may appear to your eyes) are the only ones which can answer the purposes of public life: and you will have never known, which spring from Christianity alone, which do or might constitute our comfort in this life, and without the possession of which, another life, if after all there should happen to be one, must (less a miracle be inserted in the alteration of our disposition) be more vicious and miserable than this.

Perhaps you will contend that the universal light of reason, that the truth and fitness of things are of themselves sufficient disinclination to the introduction of a new system of morals. Shall we never have done with this groundless commendation of natural law? Look into the first chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and you will see the extent of its influence upon the human mind. You will find, in the character of those divine magistrates, authority, and the manners of antiquity, look into the more admired accounts of modern voyagers; and examine its influence over the pages of our own times, over the sensual inhabitants of those desolate lands, over the untutored minds of the remorseless savages of America. "But these men are barbarians." Your law of nature, notwithstanding, extends even to them. "But they have misused their reason": they have then the more need of, and would be the more thankful for, that revelation which you, with an ignorant and fastidious self-sufficiency, deem useless. "But they might of themselves, if they thought fit, become wise and virtuous." I answer with Cicero, "Ut nihil interest utrum nemo valeat, an utrum nemo valeat utrum si nobis sit sapiens, nemo esse possit?" i.e. if they in fact continue in ignorance and vice, the evil is as great as if they had no means of learning a better way.

Those, however, you will think, are extraordinary instances: and that we ought not from these to take our measure of the excellency of the law of nature, but rather from the civilized states of China and Japan, or from the nations which flourished in learning and in arts before Christianity was heard of in the world. But I ask you, who, in any country which you are desirous of substituting in the room of the Gospel, do you not understand those rules of conduct which an individual, abstracted from the community, and derived wholly from the author of creation, would, perhaps, be able to obey; but such a system of precepts as the most enlightened men of the most enlightened ages have recommended to our observance. Where do you find this system? We cannot meet with it in the works of Stobæus, or the Sybillins, or the priest of Charis; nor in those of Plato, or Cicero; nor in those of the Emperor Antonius, or the shag Epicetus; for we are persuaded that the most animated consideration of the περί τοῦ κόσμου, and the οἰκείωσις, of the beauty of virtue; and the fitness of things, are not able to furnish even a Brutus himself with permanent principles of action; much less are they able to purify the polluted recesses of a vitiated heart, to curb the irregularity of appetite, or restrain the impetuosity of passion in conduct: and yet you order us to examine the works of Grotius, or Pullendorf, or Burlamaqui, or Hutchinson, for what you understand by the law of nature, we apprehend that you are in a great error, in taking your notions of natural law, as conferred with the natural state from the present system of it, which have been drawn up by Christian philosophers: since they have all laid their foundations, either tacitly or expressly, upon a principle derived from revelation; a thorough knowledge of the being and attributes of God; and the whole tendency of your writings shows you have not any scraping Christianity, but still continue thirsts, are indebted to revelation (whether you are either aware of, or disposed to acknowledge the debt, or not) for those sublime speculations concerning the Deity which you call the natural. Here the great asseveration of your own unassisted reason. If you would know the real genius of natural law, and how far it can proceed in the investigation or enforcement of moral duties, you must consult the manners and writings of those who have never heard of either the Jewish or the Christian Dispensation, or of those other mankind which God visited neither before nor after the patriarchs before and after the flood. It would be difficult, perhaps, anywhere to find a people entirely destitute of traditional notices concerning the Deity, and of traditional fears or expectations of another life; and the morals of mankind, as well as the manners, as they would have been, had they been left wholly to themselves in these points: however, it is a truth which cannot be denied, how much soever it may be lamented, that though the great part of mankind are destitute of revealed notions of God and his providence, yet they have been always greatly inefficient in the production of good morality, and highly derogatory to his nature, amongst all the people of the earth, except the Jews and Christians; and some may perhaps be desirous of excepting the Mahommedans, who derive all that is good in their Koran from Christianity.

The laws concerning justice, and the reparation of damages; concerning the security of property, and the performance of contracts; concerning, in short, whatever affects the well-being of civil society, have been everywhere understood with sufficient precision; and if you choose to style Justinian's code, a code of natural law, though you will err against propriety of speech, yet you are so far in the right, that natural reason and instinct may have moulded the common, belled human kind to establish, by proper sanctions, the laws therein contained; and you will have, moreover, Carneades, no mean philosopher, on your side; who knew of no law of nature, no reason, of which he could not find use, if you are desirous of proving the common utility, and which was various according to the manners of men in different climates, and changeable with a change of times in the same. And, in truth, in all countries where Paganism has been the established religion, though a philosopher may now and then have stepped beyond the pale try precept of civil jurisprudence in his pursuit of virtue, yet the bulk of mankind have ever been contented with that scanty pittance of morality which enabled them to escape the task of civil punishment, which, for the time at least, a man may be intemperate, iniquitous, impious, a thousand ways a profligate and a villain, and yet elude the cognizance and avoid the punishment of civil laws.

I am sensible you will be ready to say, "what is all this to the purpose! Though the bulk of mankind may never be able to investigate the laws of natural religion, nor disposed to reverence their sanctions when investigated by others, nor solicitous about any other standard of moral rectitude than civil legislation; yet the inconveniences which may attend the extirpation of Christianity can be no proof of its truth." I have not produced them as a proof of its truth; but they are a strong and conclusive proof, if not of its truth, at least of its utility, if you think it would be useless to you, and yourselves for examining whether it may not chance to be true; and it ought to be a reason with every good citizen, and with every man of sound judgment, to keep his opinions to himself, if from any particular circumstances in his studies or in his education he should have the misfortune to think that it is not true. If you can discover to the rising generation a better religion than the Christian, one that will more effectually animate their hopes, and subdue their passions, make them better men or better members of society, we implore you to publish it for their advantage; but till you can do that, we beg of you not to give the reins to their passions, by instilling into their unconscious minds your pernicious prejudices.

Even now, men scruple not, by the way of independence, to fix a cast of infancy upon the noblest; even now, they hesitate not in lifting up a murderous arm against the life of their friend, or against their own, as often as the fever of intemperance stimulates their resentment, or the notions of which false excites their despondency; even now, whilst we are persuaded of a reformation from the dead, and of a judgment to come, we find it difficult enough to resist the solicitations of sense, and to escape unspotted before the sight of God, and the world will become of our virtue, what of the consequent peace and happiness of society, if you persuade us that there are no such things? In two words, you may ruin yourselves by your attempt, and you will certainly ruin your country by your success.

But the consideration of the inutility of your design is not the only one which should induce you to abandon it; the argument a tenu [from 1667] ought to be warmly managed, or it may tend to the silence of our opposition to any system of superstition which has had the good fortune to be sanctioned by public authority; it is, indeed, liable to no objection in the present case: we have no interest to support, nor any advantage to expect by it. It is not contended that Christianity is to be received merely because it is useful, but because it is true. This you deny, and think your objections well grounded: we conceive however that an originating respect for your country, your conscience, or your misapprehension. There are many worthless doctrines, many superstitious observances, which the fraud or folly of man kind have ever where annexed to Christianity, (especially in the times of the church of Rome,) and if you take these sorry appendages to Christianity for Christianity itself, as preached by Christ, and by the apostles; if you confound the Roman with the Christian religion, you quite misappreach its nature, and are in a state similar to that of men mentioned by Plato, in his Treatise of Superstition; who, flying from superstition, leapt over religion, and sunk into downright atheism.

Christianity is not a religion very palatable to a voluptuous age; it will not conform its precepts to the standard of fashion; it will not lessen the deformity of vice by licentious appetitions; but calls keeping, whoredom, intrigue, adultery; and duelling, murder: it will not pander to lust, it will not license the intemperance of mankind; it is a troublesome monitor to a man of pleasure; and your way of contending with this species of superstition, is as follows: you have raised a Roman law, and other statutes, to be a standard for your religion, as a cause of your infidelity, suffer me to produce the sentiments of M. Bayle upon that head; if the description does not suit your character, you will not be offended at it; if you are of the same kind of mind, it is evident that your views in this case are not the same. "This inclines me to believe that libertines, like Des-Barreux, are not greatly persuaded of the truth of what they say. They have made no deep examination; they have learned some few objections, which they are perpetually making a noise with; they speak from a principle of ostentation, and give themselves the lie in the time of danger. Vanity has a greater share in their disputes than conscience; they imagine that the singularity and boldness of the opinions which they maintain, will give them the reputation of men of parts; by degrees, they get a habit of holding impious discourses; and if their vanity be accompanied by a voluptuous life, their presence in that road is the swifter.

The main stress of your objections rests not upon the insufficiency of the external evidence to the truth of Christianity; for few of you, though you may become the future ornaments of the senate, or of the bar, have ever employed an hour in its examination; but upon the difficulty of the doctrines contained in the New Testament; they exceed, you say, your comprehension; and you felicitate yourselves that you are not arrived at the true standard of orthodox faith—credo quia impossibile. [I believe it, because it is impossible.] You dwell upon the superfluities, and the inconceivable absurdities of the nature of the external proofs by which Christianity is established; since, in your opinion, the book itself carries with it its own refutation. A gentleman as acute, probably, as any of you, as far as I can judge, once believed in this; but of any of you, has drawn a quite different conclusion from the perusal of the New Testament; his treatise exhibits not only a distinguished truth of reason over prejudice, of Christianity over deism, but it exhibits, what is infinitely more rare, the character of a man who has had courage and candour enough to acknowledge it*

But what if there should be some incomprehensible doctrines in the Christian religion; some circumstances which in their causes, and consequences, are so absolutely opposed to the human reason; are they to be rejected on that account? You are, or would be thought, men of reading, and knowledge, and enlarged understandings; weigh the matter fairly, and consider whether revealed religion be not, in this respect, just upon the same footing with every other object of your contemplation. Even in mathematics, the science of demonstration itself, though you get over its first principles, and learn to digest the highest points of that great system, you may be subject to a point without a proof, and a surface without thickness, yet you will find yourself at a loss to comprehend the perpetual approximation of lines which can never meet; the doctrine of incomensurableness, or of the eternity of infinity, of the essentially less, or of the infinitely small, or of the finite quantity, but than by each other. In physics, you cannot comprehend the primary

* See the view of the Internal Evidence, by Soame Jenyns.
cause of any thing; not of the light by which you see; nor of the fire by which you are warmed. In physiology, you cannot tell what first gave motion to the heart, nor what continues it, nor why its motion is less voluntary than that of the lungs; nor why you are able to move your arm to the right or left, by a simple effort of the mind. But you know, as animals do, that unless you comprehend the principle by which your body was at first formed, nor by which it is sustained, nor by which it will be reduced to earth. In natural religion you cannot comprehend the creation of the universe; nor easily understand how his presence can be consistent with your freedom, or his immutability with his government of moral agents: nor why he did not make all his creatures equally perfect; nor why he did not create them all at once; nor how the current of knowledge but you will meet with subjects above your comprehension. The fall and the redemption of human kind are not more incomprehensible than the creation and the conservation of the universe; the infinite Author of the works of providence, and of nature, is equally inscrutable; equally past our finding out, in them both. And it is somewhat remarkable, that the deepest inquirers into nature have ever thought with most reverence, and spoken with most awe of those things which, in reviving our religion, may seem least to be understood; they have ever avoided that self-sufficiency of knowledge which springs from ignorance, produces indolence, and ends in idolatry. Admissible to this purpose is the reflection of the greatest mathe- maticians, that no geometrical figure, when being compared with an equipoise of Newton's by an hypothesis of his own, still less despicable than that which he opposes: 'Tous les jours je vois de ces espres forts, qui critique les verites de notre religion, et s'en moquent meme avec l plus impertinente suffisance, je pense, chretiens mortels! combien et combien des choses sur lesquelles vous raisonnez si legereinent, sont elles plus sublimes, et plus cleves, que celles sur lesquelles le grand Newton s'egare si grossiereient!' [When I see these pretended free-thinkers cavilling at the truths of our religion, and seeking at them with the most impertinent self-sufficiency, I think, poor mortals! how many things on which you argue so flippantly are more sublime and elevated than those on which the great Newton so much erred!] Ealey.

Plato mentions a set of men who were very ignorant, and thought themselves supremely wise, and who rejected the arguments for the being of a God, derived from the harmony and order of the universe, as old and trite. There have been men it seems in all ages, who, in affecting singularity, have overlooked truth: an argument, however, is not the worse for being old; and surely it would have been a more just mode of reasoning if you had examined the external evidence for the existence of God, weighed the arguments for the miracles, and from prophecies, before you had rejected the whole account from the difficulties you met with in it. You would laugh at an Indian, who, in peeping into a history of England, with the mention of the Thanes being frozen, or of a shower of hail, or of snow, should throw the book aside as unworthy of his farther notice, from his want of ability to comprehend these phenomena.

In considering the argument from miracles, you will soon be convinced that it is possible for God to work miracles; and you will be convinced that it is as possible for human testimony to establish the truth of miraculous, as of physical or historical events: but before you can be convinced that the miracles in the Old Testament are supported by such testimony as deserves to be credited, you must inquire at what period, and by what persons, the books of the Old and New Testament were composed. If you reject the account without making this examination, you reject it from prejudice, not from reason.

There is, however, a short method of examining this argument, which may, perhaps, make great an impression on your minds as any other. Three men, of distinguished abilities, and called witnesses, attacked Christianity with every objection which their malice could devise; but neither Celsus in the second century, nor Porphyry in the third, nor the emperor Julian himself in the fourth century, ever questioned the reality of the miracles, or the truth of the prophecies. Do not these men (who were more likely to know the truth of the matter than you can be) granted to their adversaries, and we will very readily let you make the most of the magic, to which they were half converted, so that they were forced to attribute them. We can find you men, in our days, who, from the properties of two colourless liquors, will produce you a third, as red as blood; or other effects, ditto citius [quicker than a wind], by a drop resembling wa- ter, will restore the transparency; they will make two fluids coalesce into a solid body; and from the mixture of liquors, colder than ice, will instantly raise you a horrid explosion of fire; they will instantly make you live for a year, and then they will perform, without having been sent with our Saviour to Egypt to learn magic; nay, with a bottle or two of oil they will compose the undulations of a lake; and, by a little art, he will add to your life a generation to the hour; you shall live for an hour or two under water, or a day or two buried in the snow. But in vain will these men, or the greatest magician that Egypt ever saw, say, to a boisterous sea, "Peace, be still!" and to the winds, and the sea, and fire, and earth, "Come forth!" the winds and the sea will not obey; the carcase and the putrid carcase will not hear. You need not suffer yourselves to be deprived of the weight of this argument from its having been observed that the fathers have acknowled- ged the supernatural part of Paganism, since the fathers were in no condition to detect a cheat which was supported by the disposition of the people, and the power of the civil magistrate; and they were, from that inability, forced to attrib- ute to the gods the events which were not susceptible of detection, and contrary to any one purpose to be credited as the work of God.

With respect to prophecy, you may, perhaps, have accus- tomed yourselves to consider it as originating in Asiatic en- thusiasm, or in the disease of the understanding, in the interest of priests, and have given yourselves no more trouble concerning the predictions of sacred, than concerning the oracles of Pagan history. Or, if you have ever cast a glance up- on this subject, the dimensions of esteemed men conquered, the proper interpretation of the Revelation, and other difficult prophecies, may have made you rashly conclude that all pro- phecies were equally uninvulnerable, and more indebted for their accomplishment to a fortunate concurrence of events, and the plain ingenuity of the exposer, than to the inspired foresight of the prophet. In all that the prophets of the Old Testament have delivered concerning the destruction of par- ticular cities, and the desolation of particular kingdoms, you may consider it as the show of omniscient men concerning the future, as those were acquainted with the history of the rise and fall of empires, might certainly have made; and as you would not hold him for a prophet who should now affirm that London or Paris would alight to future ages a spectacle just as melancholy as that which we now contemplate, with a sigh, in the ruins of Agri- gentum or Palmyra, so you cannot persuade yourselves to be- lieve that the denunciations of the prophets against the haughty cities of Tyre or Babylon, for instance, proceeded from the inspiration of men, who, if they had any knowledge of such general kind of reasoning, many are influenced to pay no attention to an argument which, if properly considered, carries with it the strongest conviction.

Spinoza, who had been his atheistic system to pieces, and embraced, without repugnance, the ordinary faith of Christians, if he could have persuaded himself of the resurrection of Lazarus from the dead; and I question not that there are many unbelievers who would relinquish their de- mocratic tenets, and receive the Gospel, if they could persuade themselves that God had ever so far interfered in the moral go- vernment of the world as to illumine the mind of any one man with the knowledge of future events. A miracle strikes the senses of the persons who see it: a prophecy addresses itself to the understandings of those who behold its completion; and it requires, in many cases, some learning, in all more attention, to judge of the correspondence of events with the predictions concerning them. No one can be convinced that what was predicted and the other prophecies foretell of the fate of Babylon, that it should be besieged by the Medes; that it should be taken when her mighty men were drunken, when her springs were dried up; and that it should become a pool of water, and a wilderness, and a waste: people, that have been convinced that all these and other parts of the prophetic de- nunciation have been minutely fulfilled, without spending some time in reading the accounts which profane historians have delivered, in Chaldea, or Syria, or the subtile strategem of im- rus; and which modern travellers have given us of its present situation.

Porphyry was so persuaded of the coincidence between the prophecies of Daniel and the events, that he was forced to affirm the prophecies were written after the things prophesied had happened. Another Porphyry has, in its days, been so astonished at the correspondence between the prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, as related by St. Matthew, and the history of that event, as recorded by Josephus, that even for those who entertain Christianity, he has ventured (contrary to the faith of all ecclesiastical history, the opinion of the learned of all ages, and all the rules of good criticism) to assert that St. Matthew wrote his Gospel after Jerusalem had been taken and destroyed by the Romans. You may, from these reasons, in order to infer the authenticity from prophecy; it has not been able indeed to vanquish the prejudices of either the ancient or the modern Porphyry; but it has been able to compell them both to be guilty of obvious falsehood. They, however, very consistently endeavoured to support them. Some over zealous interpreters of Scripture have found prophecies in simple narrations, extended real predictions beyond the times and circumstances to which they naturally were applied, and perplexed their readers with a thousand quaint allusions and allegorical conceptions; this proceeding has made men of sense pay less regard to prophecy in general.

There are some predictions, however, such as those concerning the present state of the Jewish people, and the corruptions of Christianity, which are now fulfilling in the world; and which, if you will take the trouble to examine them, you will find of such an extraordinary nature that you will not perhaps hesitate to refer them to God as their author; and if you once become persuaded of the truth of any one miracle, or of the consequences of the truth of the Bible, your difficulties (concerning the manner of God's interposition in the moral government of our species, and the nature of the doctrines contained in revelation) into your own inability fully to comprehend the whole scheme of divine providence.

We are told, however, that the strangeness of the narration, and the difficulty of the doctrines contained in the New Testament, are not the only circumstances which induce you to reject it; you have discovered, you think, so many contradictions in the accounts which the evangelists have given of the life of Christ, that you are compelled to consider the whole as an ill-digested and improbable story. You would not be over-conscientious, did not reticence and respect not the difficulties concerning the manner of God's interposition in the moral government of our species, and the nature of the doctrines contained in revelation) into your own inability fully to comprehend the whole scheme of divine providence. You cannot compare the history of the same events, as delivered by any two historians, but you will meet with many circumstances which, though mentioned by one, are either wholly omitted, or differently related by the other; and this observation is peculiarly applicable to biographical writings; to which it is applied in the circumstances of the lives of Vitellius and Vespasian, because Tacitus and Suetonius did not in every thing correspond in their accounts of these emperors. And if the memoirs of the life and discourses of St. Matthew were written by him himself, this same variety of truth, to be delivered to the world by four of his most intimate acquaintances, I do not apprehend that we should discredit the whole account of such an extraordinary man, by reason of some slight inconsistencies and contradictions, which the awkward names of his might chance to discover in the several narrations. Though we should grant you, then, that the evangelists had fallen into some trivial contradictions in what they have related concerning the life of Christ, yet you ought not to draw any inference from our concession than that they had not plotted together, as cheats would have done, in order to give an unexceptionable consistency to their fraud. We are not, however, disposed to make you any such concession; we will rather believe, if we cannot be heard twice, and if you will not touch upon a few of the places which you think are most liable to your censure.

You observe that either Luke, or Mark, or John, have made no reference to Josephus' work in writing their Gospels; and that no account is to be found of this matter in Josephus, who wrote the life of Herod; and therefore the fact recorded by Matthew is not true. The concurrent testimony of many indeed one prophecy, you would reasonably add to its probability; but if nothing is to be received as true, upon the testimony of a single author, we must give up some of the best writers, and disbelieve some of the most interesting facts of ancient history.

Not according to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, there was only an interval of three months, you say, between the baptism and crucifixion of Jesus; from which time, taking away the forty days of the temptation, there will only remain about six weeks for the whole period of his public ministry; which lasted, however, according to St. John, at the least about three years. Your objection proceeds either from the Acts, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, in writing the history of Jesus Christ, mention the several events of his life, as following one another in continued succession, without taking notice of the times in which they happened. But is it a just conclusion, from their silence, to infer that they were entirely circumvented in the transactions between which they seem to have connected? Many instances might be produced, from the most admired biographers of antiquity, in which events are related as immediately following one another, which, if we consider the distant periods; we have an obvious example of this manner of writing in St. Matthew, who connects the preaching of John the Baptist with the return of Joseph from Egypt, though we are certain that the latter event preceded the former by a great many years.

John has said nothing of the institution of the Lord's Supper; the other evangelists have said nothing of the washing of the disciples' feet. What then? are you not ashamed to produce these facts as instances of contradiction? If omissions are contradictions, look into the history of the age of Louis XIV. or into the general history of M. de Voltaire, and you will meet with a great abundance of contradictions.

John, in mentioning the discourses which Jesus had with his mother, and also the discourses which John the Baptist had with Herod, says that she, with Mary Magdalen, stood near the cross. Matthew, on the other hand, says that Mary Magdalen and the other women were there, beholding afar off. This you think a manifest contradiction; and so you think it is not strange that the women who were not near the cross, could be the same with those who stood far from the cross! It is difficult not to transgress the bounds of moderation and good manners, in answering such sophistry. What have you to learn that, though the evangelists speak of the crucifixion as of one event, it was not accomplished in one instant, but lasted several hours! And why the women, who were at a distance from the cross, might not, during its course, be delivered, and might not deliver from time to time, and the other women, might not move from the cross, is more than you can explain to either us or yourselves. And we take from you your only refuge, by denying expressly that the different evangelists, in their invention of the women, speak of the same point of time.

The evangelists, you affirm, have fallen into gross contradictions in their accounts of the appearances by which Jesus manifested himself to his disciples, after his resurrection from the dead, as spoken of in the Gospel of St. Mark. Luke speaks of the discourses with the seven hundred disciples, and John, of two, and John of four. That contradictory propositions cannot be true, is readily granted; and if you will produce the place in which Matthew says that Jesus Christ appeared to his disciples twenty, and Mark says it was to be said that he is contradicted by John in a very material part of his narration; but till you do that, you must excuse me if I cannot grant that the evangelists have contradicted each other in this point; for to common understandings, it is pretty evident that if Christ appeared four times according to John's account, he must have appeared twice according to that of Matthew and Luke, thrice according to that of Mark.

The different evangelists are not only accused of contradicting each other, but Luke is said to have contradicted himself; for in his Gospel he tells us, that Jesus ascended into heaven from Bethany; and in the Acts of the Apostles, of which he is the reputed author, he informs us that he ascended from Mount Olivet. Your objection proceeds either from your ignorance of the one, or your ill-will to Christianity; and upon either supposition deserves our contempt; be pleased, however, to remember for the future, that Bethany was not only the name of a town, but of a district of Mount Olivet, adjoining to one another.

From this specimen of the contradictions ascribed to the historians of the life of Christ, you may judge for yourselves what little reason there is to reject Christianity upon their account; you will perhaps also doubt any other book, upon the mere consequence to you than any other) if you take every thing for a contradiction which the uncandid adversaries of Christianity think proper to call one.

Before I put an end to this address, I cannot help taking notice of an argument by which some philosophers have of late endeavoured to overturn the whole system of revelation; and it is the more necessary to give an answer to their objection, as it is become a common subject of philosophical controversy. We have, however, not yet delivered the whole tenet. The objection tends to invalidate, as is supposed, the authority of Moses, by showing that the earth is much older than it can be proved to be from his account of the creation, and as to many other circumstances. We have already mentioned that six thousand years and more have not yet elapsed since the creation; and these philosophers contend, that they have indubitable proof of the earth's being at the least fourteen thousand years old; and they complain that Moses hangs a dead weight upon them, and is not easy to make an answer for inquiry.

The Canonicus Reparo, who, it seems, is engaged in writing the history of Mount Etna, has discovered a stratum of lava which flowed from that mountain, according to his opinion, in the time of the second Punic war, or about two thousand years ago; this stratum is not yet covered with soil sufficient for the production of either corn or vines; it requires, then, says the Canon, two thousand years at least to convert a stratum of lava into a fertile field. In sinking a pit near Jari, in the neighbourhood of Etna, they have discovered evidential marks of seven distinct lavas, one under the other: the surfaces of which are parallel, and most of them covered with a thick bed of rich earth. Now, the eruption which formed these strata of lavas may be ascribed to a reason, says the Canon, from analogy) flamed from the mountain at least fourteen thousand years ago. It might be briefly answered to this objection, by denying, that there is any reason for supposing that of Moses referred to this opinion concerning the great antiquity of the earth: for though the rise and progress of arts and sciences, and the small multiplication of the human species, render it almost to a demonstration probable that man has not existed longer upon the surface of this earth than according to the Mosaic account, yet let it be observed, that the earth itself was then created out of nothing, when man was placed upon it, is not, according to the sentiments of some philosophers, to be proved from the original text of sacred Scripture: we might, I say, reply with these philosophers to this formidable objection of the Canon, by granting it in its fullest extent; we are under no necessity, however, of adopting their opinion, in order to show the weakness of the Canon's reasoning. For, in the first place, the Canon has not satisfactorily established his main fact, that the lava in question is the identical lava which Diodorus Siculus mentions to have flowed from Etna in the second Carthaginian war; and, in the second place, it may be observed, that the time necessary for converting lava into fertile fields must be very different, according to the different consistencies of the lavas, and their different situations, with respect to elevation or depression; to their being exposed to winds, rains, and to other circumstances; and it may be ascertained in the case of Etna, that the time in which the lavas (which resembles lava) are covered with verdure, is different at different furnaces, according to the nature of the slag and situation of the furnace; and something of this kind is delvable from the account of the Canon himself; since the creation of this furnace was covered with rich, good soil, and have pretty large trees growing in them.

But if all this should be thought not sufficient to remove the objection, I will produce the Canon an analogy in opposition to his analogy, and which is founded on more certain facts. Etna and Vesuvius resemble each other in the causes which produce their eruptions, and the nature of their lavas, and in the time necessary to make them into soil fit for vegetation; or if there be any slight difference in this respect, it is probably not greater than what subsists between different lavas of the same mountain. This being admitted, which no philosopher will deny, the Canon's analogy will prove justly. For is it possible to be the case of different lavas (with interstratified strata of vegetable earth) which have flowed from Mount Vesuvius within the space not of fourteen thousand, but of somewhat less than seventeen hundred years; for then, according to our analogy, a stratum of this sort can be covered with rich soil in about two hundred and fifty years, instead of requiring two thousand for the purpose. The eruption of Vesuvius which destroyed Herculaneum and Pompeii, is rendered still more monstrous by the death of Pliny, recorded by his nephew in his letter to Tacitus. This event happened in the year 79. It is not then quite seventeen hundred years since Herculaneum was destroyed, and yet Pliny's nephew has thus conceived the probability, that "the matter which covers the ancient town of Herculaneum is not the produce of one eruption only; for there are evident marks that the matter of six eruptions has taken place since the year 79." It will not, however, be objected, that the destruction of Herculaneum was not caused by a volcanic eruption, but by a fire; this being the cause of its destruction. These strata are either of lava or burnt matter, with veins of good soil betwixt them." I will not add another word upon this subject, except that the bishop of the diocese was not much out in his advice to Canon Reparo, to take care not to make his mountain older than Moses; though it would have been full as well to have shut his mouth with a reason, as to have stopped it with the dread of an ecclesiastical censure.

You perceive with what ease a little attention will remove a great difficulty; but had we been able to say nothing in explanation of this phenomenon, we should not have acted a very rational part in making our ignorance the foundation of our infidelity, or suffering a minute philosopher to rob us of our religion.

Your objections to revelation may be numerous; you may find fault with the account which Moses has given of the creation and the fall; you may not be able to get water enough from a well, or a mountain, like Mount Saba or Mt. Horeb, for all the different kinds of aerial and terrestrial animals; you may be dissatisfied with the command for sacrificing Isaac, for plundering the Egyptians, and for extirpating the Canaanites: you may be surprised with the state of the world, its ceremonies, its sacrifices, and its multiplicity of priests; you may object to the inscriptions in the Psalms, and think the immoralities of David a fit subject for dramatic ridicule; you may look upon the partial pronouncement of Christianity as an inapplicable objection to its truth, and waywardly reject the goodness of God toward yourselves, because you do not comprehend how you have deserved it more than others; you may know nothing of the entrance of sin and death into the world by one man's transgression; nor be able to comprehend the doctrine of the cross, and of redemption by Jesus Christ: in short, if your mind is so disposed, you may find food for your scepticism in every page of the Bible, as well as in every appearance of nature; and it is not in the power of any person, but yourselves, to clear up your doubts. You must read, and you must think for yourselves; and you must do both with temper, with candour, and with care. Infidelity is a rank weed; it is nurtured by our views, and cannot be plucked up as easily as it may be planted. Your difficulties with respect to revelation may have first arisen from your own reflection on the religious indifference of those whom, from your earliest infancy, you have been accustomed to reverence; and you may be more disposed to enter into the hearer to libertine conversation: and the uniform prejudices of the world may have finished the business, at a very early age, and left you to wander through life, without a principle to direct your conduct, and to die without hope. We are far from wishing you to trust the word of the elergy for the truth of your religion; we beg of you to examine it to the bottom, to try it, to prove it, and not to hold it fast unless you find it good. Till you are disposed to undertake this task, it becomes you to consider with great seriousness and attention, whether it can be for your interest to esteem a few witty sarcasms, or metaphysical subtleties, or ignorant misrepresentations, or unwarranted assertions, as unanswerable arguments against revelation: and a very slight reflection will convince you that it will certainly be for your reputation to employ the flappiness of your rhetoric, and the poignancy of your ridicule, upon any subject rather than upon the subject of religion.

I take the liberty of recommending to you the advice which Mr. Locke gave to a young man who was desirous of becoming acquainted with the doctrines of the Christian religion:"Study the holy Scripture, especially the New Testament: therein are contained the words of eternal life. For God is not willed that any should perish in their youth without any mixture of error for its matter." I am, &c.

Abraham, the father of Isaac and Jacob.

Abraham, the last of the patriarchs.

Abraham, the son of Terah.

Abraham, the grandson of Noah.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Jacob.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.

Abraham, the father of Isaac.
Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 251. He is a son of the house of David, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 244. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.

Amidst, born of, by Sessor king of Persia, 244, 251, 253, 415, 416. He is depicted in the tomb of his father, 244. His character, and passage through Dacia, 244, 251. He is denounced by the Levites, 415. He is a son of the Levites, 244, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251. His reign over the Levites, 244, 251. He is a son of the Levites, 251.
The text contains a combination of fragmented sentences and historical references. It appears to discuss various historical events and figures, possibly related to the history of Rome and its empire, including figures like Constantine, the Barbarians, and the Empire's various leaders. The text seems to be a part of a larger historical narrative, possibly discussing the contrast between the union of the empire and the insurrection of the empire. It mentions the Capitation-tax, Nestorius, the Nestorian problem, the edict of the emperor Theodosius, and various other historical events and figures. The text is dense and contains many references to specific historical periods and events.

The text is a natural representation of a historical document, discussing the complex relationships and events that shaped the history of the Roman Empire. It touches on themes of union, division, barbarian invasions, and religious conflicts during the early Christian era.
Galata, the suburb of, at Constantinople, assign- ed to the Gemara, 339, i.
Gemara, the Bithynian bishop, his mission to Constantinople, administration, and death, 329, i.
Cesarius, by the emperor Beccarius, 246, ii.
Cesarius of Ravenna, his relations with the emperor, 244, i.
Cesarius, one of, his letters, 244, i.
Cesarius, the Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, a Roman emperor, his reign, 337, i.
Cesarius, his reign, 337, i.
Cesarius of Legnica, his letters, 337, i.
Cesarius, the Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius of Legnica, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Bishop of Legnica, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, a Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, a Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, a Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, a Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
Cesarius, another, Roman emperor, his death, 337, i.
GENERAL INDEX.

Greek learning, revival of, in Italy, 438, 439.

Gregor, king of the Scots, captured and killed by the Danes, 173, 174.

Gregory VII, his ambitious schemes, 189, 189.

Grierson, Viscount, the last British viceroy of India, 397, 398.

Grod, his mission to Constantinople, 57, 57.

Grotius, his defence of liberty of speech against the French, 377, 377.

Hamadanites, their warfare against the Persians, 482, 483.

Hampden, executed by the English court, 418, 418.

Hannibal, his message to Carthage, 176, 176.

Hannibal, his escape by sea, 176, 176.

Hannibal, his surrender to the Romans, 176, 176.

Hannibal's retreat, his meeting of the Punic fleet, 371, 371.

Hannibal, character of his Bibliotheca Orient. ii.

Hannibal, his land campaign in Italy, 175, 175.

Hannibal, his extraordinary fortune and misfortunes, 533, 533.

Hannibal, his character of the Roman warrior, 175, 175.

Hannibal's expedition to the south of France, 175, 175.

Hannibal, his character of the Roman warrior, 175, 175.

Harley, his part in the Act of Toleration, 526, 526.

Harley, his part in the Act of Toleration, 526, 526.

Harley's fall from office, 526, 526.

Harley, his part in the Act of Toleration, 526, 526.

Harley, his character of the English statesman, 533, 533.

Harley, his character as a minister, 526, 526.

Harley, his part in the Act of Toleration, 526, 526.

Harley, his character of the English statesman, 533, 533.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.

Hardenberg, his part in the War of the Austrian Succession, 398, 398.
Marpissa, the Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes,

Marsov, a Roman pontiff, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of three popes, 529

By His Grace, Emperor Constantine,
The emperor.

Baroneh, by Theodore, and relieved by count Lepori, 41.

Mina, his mother, and the Roman army defeated by the Franks, 23.

Lucius, prince of the Franks, killed by the Romans, 25.

Macedonia, the son of Bajazet, killed by the Turks, 41.

Macedonia, the supposed son of Bajazet, his story.

Muta, battle of, between the forces of the emperor Heraclius and those of Mani, 21.

Mystin, statical, killed by emperor Constantine, at the siege of Nomina, 23.

Navarre, is besieged by Theodore, and relieved by count Lepori, 41.

Naples, prince of the Franks, kills 25, 31.

Narbonne, the Roman army defeated by the Franks, 23.

Narbonne, the Franks killed by the Romans, 25.

Novi, the emperor Charlemagne, killed by the Franks, 31.

Ocra, in the deserts of Libya, described, 423.

Orthodoxy, the church, origin of, 173.

Ottomans, the empire, is divided into two, 23.

Palma, emperor Constantine, 23.

Palma, the Franks, killed by the Saracens, 23.

Palma, the Franks, the emperor Constantine, 23.
GENERAL INDEX

Palaeologus, Michael emperor of Nice, his brief reign, 107. 207.

Paulinus, bishop of Nola, his death, 275.

Pausanias, work of, 278.

Pavas, a Roman woman, her situation, 233.

Pecedantes, his career, 358.

Pecica, Popes, 106.

Peele, poet, his works, 162.

Peleas, king of Tiryns, 98.

Peleus, father of Achilles, 125.

Peleus, name of, 117.

Penelope, wife of Odysseus, her fate, 126.

Penelope, wife of Tantalus, 127.

Penelope, daughter of Lear, 91.

Penelope, killed by the centaur, 93.

Penelope, wife of the emperor Constantine, 107.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her death, 126.

Penelope, wife of Telemachus, her fate, 126.

Penelope, wife of Thesiger, 93.

Penelope, wife of Tiresias, her death, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her death, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her fate, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her marriage, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her mother, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her name, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her son, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her daughter, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her death, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her fate, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her marriage, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her mother, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her son, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her daughter, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her death, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her fate, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her marriage, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her mother, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her son, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her daughter, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her death, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her fate, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her marriage, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her mother, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her son, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her daughter, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her death, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her fate, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her marriage, 126.

Penelope, wife of Ulysses, her mother, 126.
Rheticus, the study of, congenial to a popular
Ruben, the bath of, fortified by the emperor Val-Rhos, account of the colour of, 233, 234.
The
Richard I. of England, engages in the third cru-Richard II., Lord of England, elects to the house of Lancaster, 30, 31. He replies to the Richard, monk of Concance, his literary cha-Reims, county, his history, 413, 414. Permits Ma-Remigius, bishop of, his death, 222.
Remus, Nephelus, his birth, character, and life, 231, 232.
Resolute, Roman, the construction and great extent of the great Resor, Robert, of Countessie, emperor of Constantinopole, 171.
Reubin, count of Flandres, his character and en-Rheims, account of, 160, 161.
Rheims, the, city of, 160.
Reus, his account of, 234.
Rheumatic, the, of Africa, ancient fabulous account of, 344, 345.
R.
Quadi, the incursions of, punished by the emperor Constantine, 243, 244.
Quinn, historical review of this of, 339, 340.
Quick, emperor of, his ancestry, 420, 421.
Quick, emperor of, his death, 232, 233.
Quintus, Maximus and Condamnus, their history, 62.
Quiet, an account of the emperor Claudius, his military effect, 140, 141.
Quintus, the empress, the death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the empress, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Quintus, the, death of, 139, 140.
Savage, the bishop of Cadiz, and of all Christendom, 460, f. 252.

GENERAL INDEX.

Abacanus, his character of the monk of Capernaun, 532.

Subballing, the heresies, his opinions afterward adopted by the emperor, 270. He continues to write in Latin, 270. He sets out to conquer the Persian empire, 272.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.

Abanuza, his character, 568.

Substitution of national to religious allegiance, 3.
THE END.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Due</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>MAR 2 3, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AUG 2 3, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MAR 5, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JUN 1, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APR 0 5, 1991</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APR 0 6, 1991</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MAY 2 4, 1975</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JUN 1, 1991</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MAR 5, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AUG 2 3, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SEP 1, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JUN 1, 1991</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MAR 5, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AUG 2 3, 1999</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Demco 220-5