GUIZOT'S PREFACE.

[TRANSLATION.]

To reprint a valuable work—to rectify, in an extensive history, omissions and errors the more important, because, lost in an immense number of facts, they are eminently fitted to deceive, both the superficial who believe all they read, and the attentive, who have no opportunity for investigation; such have been the motives which have determined me to publish with added notes, this new edition of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire by Edward Gibbon.

This period of history has been the subject of study and toil to a multitude of writers, of learned men, and even of philosophers. The gradual decline of that most extraordinary power, which had over-run and oppressed the world; the fall of this greatest of empires, built upon the ruins of so many kingdoms, republics, and states, both barbarous and civilized, and forming in its turn by its dismemberment, a multitude of states, republics, and kingdoms; the annihilation of the religion of Greece and Rome; the origin and progress of two new religions, which have occupied between themselves the fairest countries of the earth; the old age of the ancient world, the spectacle of its expiring glory and degenerate morals; the infancy of the modern world, the description of its first advances and of the new impulse given to mind and character; such a subject must necessarily fix the attention and excite the interest of those men who cannot see with indifference, such memorable epochs, or in the beautiful expression of Corneille,

Thus, learning, eloquence, and the spirit of philosophy, have been emulously engaged in bringing to light, and picturing the ruins of this vast edifice whose fall had been preceded, and was to be followed by so much greatness. Messrs. de Tillemont, Lebeau, Ameilhou, Pagi, Eckhel, and a great number of other writers, French and foreign, have examined all its parts, they have searched among the rubbish for facts, details and dates, and by the aid of erudition more or less extensive, and of criticism more or less enlightened, have in some manner collected and arranged anew the scattered materials. Their works are of unquestionable utility, and I have no wish to diminish their merit, but in digging among the ruins they have sometimes buried themselves; either because they have voluntarily limited the subject and the circle of their researches, or because the very nature of their minds confined them within certain bounds. They have, while occupied in search of facts, neglected the general outline of ideas, they have explored and brought to light the ruins without re-erecting the monument. We do not find in their works those general views, which enable us to embrace at a glance a great extent of country—a long series of ages; and which make us distinguish clearly amidst the darkness of the past, the progress of the human species, ever changing its form but not its nature, its habits and not its passions, always arriving at the same results by different means; those great views, in fine, which constitute the philosophy of History, and without which it is only a mass of facts, as inconclusive, as they are disconnected.

Montesquieu, on the other hand, in his "Considerations sur les causes de la grandeur et de la décadence des Romains," glancing on every side with the eye of genius, has brought forward a multitude of thoughts, always profound and almost always new, but sometimes inaccurate, and authorized less by the nature and connection of facts, than by those rapid and ingenious deductions to which a superior mind too easily surrenders itself, because it finds a vivid pleasure in manifesting its power in this species of creation. Happily, by a beautiful provision, the errors of genius are fertile in truths, it may wander for a moment from the path it has opened, but the way is open and others follow with more safety and circumspection. Gibbon, less able, less profound, of a less exalted genius than Montesquieu, made himself master of a subject whose richness and extent the other had pointed out; he followed with care the long array and progressive chain of facts, some of which only Montesquieu had selected and recalled, rather to attach them to his own ideas, than to make the reader acquainted with their progress and mutual influence. The English historian, eminently gifted with that penetration which tracing events to causes, and with that sagacity which separates from causes seemingly true, those which really are so; born in an age when distinguished men carefully scrutinized every part of the social machine, and endeavored to discover its action, utility, effects, and importance, placed by his pursuits and by the reach of his mind on an equality with the master spirits of his age, brought to his researches into the material of history or the facts themselves, the criticism of a judicious and learned man, and to his views of the moral of history, or the relations which connect events and associate their authors with them, that of an able philosopher. He knew that history if confined to an account of facts merely, excites no other interest than that which men feel in the actions of their fellow men, and that to be really useful and true, it ought to look upon the face of society, whose image it retraces under all the different points of view from which it can be considered, by the statesman, the warrior, the magistrate, the financier, and the philosopher; by all those indeed who are capacitated by their situation or their intelligence to understand its different springs of action.

This thought, no less just than great, seems to have had its influence in the composition of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. It is not merely an account of the events which agitated the Roman world from the accession of Augustus to the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, but the author has constantly connected with the history of events an account of the state of finances, of opinions, of morals, of the military system, and of those internal and concealed causes of prosperity or calamity which strengthen society, or secretly threaten its well-being and existence. Gibbon, faithful to the known but neglected law, which compels us always to make facts the basis of general reflections, and to follow step by step their slow but necessary course, has thus composed a work, remarkable for the extent of its views, though not for great elevation of thought, and full of positive and interesting results, notwithstanding the scepticism of its author.

The success of this work, in an age which had produced a Montesquieu, and which at the time of its publication possessed a Hume, a Robertson, and a Voltaire, certainly proves its merit, and the continuance of this success to the present time is a farther confirmation of its worth. In England, France, Germany, and among all the enlightened nations of Europe Gibbon is always cited as authority; and even those who have discovered some inaccuracies in his book, or who disapprove of his sentiments, do not attempt to remove his errors or to combat his opinions, except with a cautious respect due to superior merit. (I have had occasion in the course of my investigations to consult the writings of philosophers who have treated of the finances of the Roman empire, of learned men who have studied its chronology, of theologians versed in ecclesiastical history, of civilians who have studied with care Roman jurisprudence, of orientalists who have devoted themselves to Arabic literature, of modern historians who have examined the subject of the crusades and their influence—and every one of these writers has observed and pointed out in the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire instances of carelessness, of false or at least incomplete views, and sometimes even omissions which they could not but believe voluntary. They have corrected some faults, and have opposed with success some assertions, but more frequently they have employed the researches and thoughts of Gibbon, either to show wherein they differ from him, or to substantiate their own researches and deductions.) I may perhaps be permitted here to mention a certain suspense and uncertainty which I have myself experienced in studying this work. I prefer to incur the hazard of speaking of myself than to omit an observation which may set forth both merits and defects. After the first rapid perusal, which permitted me only to feel interested in a narrative always animated notwithstanding its length, always clear notwithstanding the variety of objects it presents in review before the eye, I entered into a minute examination of the details of which it is composed, and the opinion I then formed was, I confess, singularly severe. I found in certain chapters errors which appeared to me sufficiently important and numerous to warrant the belief that the work in some parts had been written with extreme negligence; in others there appeared a general tinge of partiality and prejudice which gave to the narration of facts that want of truth and justice which the English happily designate by the word misrepresentation. Mutilated quotations, and the involuntary or designed omission of certain passages, rendered me suspicious of the author's integrity. The grossness of this violation of the first law of history was increased to my mind by the prolonged attention with which I scrutinized each phrase, each note and reflection—and in consequence I passed upon the whole work much too rigorous a judgment. After this careful study of the history, I permitted some time to elapse before again reviewing it. Another attentive and continuous perusal of the whole work, of the notes of the author, and of those which I have thought it right to add to them, has showed me how much I have exaggerated the importance of the strictures which Gibbon merited. I have been struck with the same errors, with the same partiality on certain subjects, but I found that I had been far from rightly appreciating the vastness of his research, the variety of his information, the extent of his knowledge, and, more than all, that truly philosophical justice of his mind which judges of the past as it would of the present, without being darkened by those clouds with which time surrounds the dead; and which often prevent us from seeing, that under the toga and in the senate, men were the same that they are still in our modern dress, and in our own councils—and that events transpired eighteen centuries ago in the same manner as they do now. I perceived also that Gibbon, notwithstanding his failings, was truly an able historian, that his history with all its defects would always be a good work, and that his errors might be corrected, and his prejudices opposed, without ceasing to admit that few men have united in a manner so complete and well defined, the qualities essential to an historian.

I have then attempted in my notes only to correct facts which appeared to me false or misrepresented, and to supply those, the omission of which might become a source of error. I am far from believing that this work of correction is complete. I have been very guarded in applying it to the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire in all its extent. It would enlarge too much a work already most voluminous, and add innumerable notes to the many notes of the author; my first and principal design, was to review with care those chapters devoted by Gibbon to the history of the establishment of Christianity, and to re-establish in all their exactness, and place in their true light the facts of which they are composed. It is in those chapters therefore that I have made the most additions, other chapters also, as that which treats of the religion of the ancient Persians, or that in which the author exhibits a view of the state of ancient Germany and of the migrations of the people, have appeared to me to need elucidation and rectifying. Their importance will furnish my excuse. In general my work has not extended much beyond the first five volumes of the new edition. Almost all which concerns Christianity is found in these volumes; in them also is seen the transition from the ancient to the modern world, from the manners and the thoughts of Roman Europe to those of our Europe, an epoch the most interesting and important to make clear in the whole work. Besides, later times have been treated of with great care by many different writers, so that the notes I have added to the last volume are few and concise, too much so perhaps; nevertheless I can affirm that I have rigidly observed the rule to say nothing which did not seem to me necessary, and to say it as briefly as possible. Much has been written for and against Gibbon. From the time his work appeared comments were made upon it as if it had been an ancient manuscript, and they were truly those of critics. Theologians, more than all others, have complained of the manner in which he has treated ecclesiastical history; they have attacked the XV and XVI chapters sometimes with reason, often with bitterness, but almost always with arms inferior to those of their adversary, who certainly possessed more knowledge, more genius, more insight into his subject than his opponents, as far at least as their works have been within the reach of my examination. Dr. Watson, since bishop of Landaff, published "A series of letters, or An apology for Christianity," the moderation and merit of which are acknowledged by Gibbon himself. Priestley wrote "A letter to an incredulous philosopher containing a view of the evidences of revealed religion, with observations upon the first two volumes of Mr. Gibbon." Dr. White in a course of sermons, of which Dr. S. Badeock was, it is said, the real author, and of which Dr. White furnished only the materials, traced a comparative view of the christian and mahommedan religions (1st edition, 1784, 8vo.), in which he often opposed Gibbon, and of which Gibbon himself speaks with esteem, (see memoirs of his life, p. 167, vol. 1st of miscellaneous works and his letters, nos. 82, 83, &c.) These three are the adversaries most worthy of consideration who have attacked our historian. A multitude of other writers joined them, Sir David Dalrymple, Dr. Chelsam, chaplain to the bishop of Worcester, Mr. Davis, member of Balliol college, Oxford, Mr. East Apthorpe, rector of St. Mary le Bone, London, J. Beattie, Mr. J. Melner, Mr.

PREFACE.

Taylor, Mr. Travis, prebendary of Chester, and vicar of Eastham, Dr. Whitaker, an anonymous writer, who took only the name of the Anonymous Gentleman, Mr. H. Kett, &c. &c. arrayed themselves against the new historian. He replied to some of them in a pamphlet entitled "A defence of some passages in the XV and XVI chapters of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." This defence, victorious in some points and weak in others, but excessively bitter, revealed the irritation which these attacks had excited in Gibbon. This irritation, perhaps, indicated, that he did not feel himself entirely irreproachable; nevertheless, he altered none of his opinions in the rest of the work, which proves, at least, his sincerity. Although I have made great effort, I have been able to procure but a small part of these works. Those of Dr. Cheboun, of Mr. Davis, of Mr. Travis, and of the anonymous writer, are the only works that I have been able to obtain. I have received from them some interesting thoughts; and when I have not been able to explain or to defend them by higher authorities, I have mentioned to whom I was indebted for them. Not only in England have comments been made upon Gibbon. F. A. G. Wenck, professor of law at Leipsic, a very estimable literary man, undertook a translation of it into German. The first volume appeared at Leipsic in 1779. He also added notes, full of erudition, no less extensive than accurate. I have derived from them great assistance. Unfortunately, M. Wenck did not continue his undertaking. The remaining volumes have been translated by M. Schreiter, professor at Leipsic, who has added but a few notes, and those very unimportant. M. Wenck announced in his preface, that he should publish particular dissertations on the XV and XVI chapters, the object of which would be to examine the account given by Gibbon of the propagation of Christianity. He has been dead, now, two years. Not having been informed of his death, I wrote to his son, and requested a copy of them. His son wrote in answer, that he had not been able to find them among his father's papers.

There is another German translation of Gibbon, with which I am not acquainted. I have been told that it contains no new notes. Many German theologians, as M. Walterstern, M. Ludewald, &c. have opposed Gibbon, especially in treating of the propagation of Christianity. I am acquainted with the titles of their works only. M. Hugo, professor of law at Gottingen, published, in 1789, a translation of the XLIV chapter, in which Gibbon treats of Roman jurisprudence, with critical notes, of some of which I have borrowed, but these notes establish, in general, few facts, and are not always sufficiently supported with proof.

In French, I have read but one dissertation against Gibbon, inserted in the seventh volume of the Spectateur Francais. It appeared to me very ordinary, and contains rather reasoning than facts.

Such, at least according to my knowledge, are the principal works of which the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire has been the subject. Those which I have examined, have been far from satisfactory to me; and after having derived from them the most that was interesting, I have myself written, upon the various parts which remained to be examined, a critical work of some extent. I believe I ought here to mention the principal sources whence I have derived information and facts. Besides the original authors of which Gibbon availed himself, and to which I have referred as much as was in my power—such as the history of Augustus, Dion Cassius, Ammianus Marcellinus, Eusebius, Lactantius, &c. &c. I have consulted some of the best writers who have treated of the same subjects much more carefully and extensively, inasmuch as they have devoted themselves especially to the study of them. Concerning the history of the primitive church, the writings of the learned Gardner, the Abridgement of Ecclesiastical History by Spittler, the Ecclesiastical History of Flete, the History of the Constitution of the Christian Church by M. Pau, and a Manuscript by the same author upon the History of the Dogmas of Christianity, History of Heresies by C. G. F. Walch, the Introduction to the New Testament of Michaelis, the Commentary upon the New Testament of M. Paulus, the History of Philosophy by M. Tennemann, and particular dissertations, have been my principal resources. For the account of the migrations of the people of the north, the History of the North by Schlezer, the Universal History of Gatterer, the Ancient History of the Teutonic Race by Aeching, Memoriae Populorum ex Historiis Byzantinis curae by M. Stritter, have furnished me information which I should vainly have sought for elsewhere. To the works of these able critics, we owe the most certain and safe knowledge we have upon this part of the history of the world. Finally, I owe to the dissertations which M. Kleuker has added to his German translation of the Zendavesta and of the Memoirs of Anquetil, the means of rectifying many errors which Gibbon has committed in speaking of the religion of the ancient Persians.

I shall be pardoned, I trust, for giving these details. Truth requires that I should mention those works without which I should have been unable to execute my undertaking; and to name those learned men, who have been, as it were, my fellow-laborers, is, without doubt, the best means to gain for myself some belief. Permit me also to acknowledge how much I owe to the counsels of a man no less enlightened on all subjects generally than versed particularly in the researches in which I have been engaged. Without the assistance I have derived from the directions and the library of M. Stapfer, I should have been often embarrassed to discover those works which could furnish me safe information, and doubtless should have been ignorant of most of them. If my work shall be found to possess any merit, I shall only regret that I am unable to point out precisely how considerable a portion of it is due to him.

It remains only to say a word concerning the translation. The revision of it is the work of a person too nearly related to me to permit me to speak of her otherwise than to point out what she has done.¹

Many have, in succession, translated the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Their manner has been different. Generally, the first volumes are translated with much care and nicety; and everywhere we see an effort to turn each period with elegance. The energy, the strength, and conciseness of thought, and vivacity of the original are thus sacrificed to the harmony of the sentence. The translation which has now been selected for revision, though smooth and agreeable, offered but a faint image of the full nervous style of the English writer. The last volumes, especially, bore the impress of extreme haste—of contracted sentences—of passages robbed of those details which constitute their force and character—and sometimes even reflections were here and there suppressed. There were instances also of wrong constructions, caused less by ignorance of the English language than by that inattentive negligence, which imagines a work is done before it is complete and finished. Such were the principal faults which it was necessary to correct. Much care and application have been given in order to remove these faults, to restore invariably the whole text of the author and the text alone, and to give to his style its original and peculiar complexion even in those passages where, in addition to the other peculiarities of his style, a labored conciseness, a suddenness of transition scarcely natural, and a dangerous design to convey to the mind more than is expressed by the words, rendered the task exceedingly difficult. Such a labor has been necessarily long and tedious; its utility it would seem impossible to deny; and now, if the translation of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire has been rendered faithful, if it can be read without trouble and difficulty—if the notes which have been added serve to rectify the erroneous opinions of the author, and to interest his readers to examine before they adopt them—the design of the editor is accomplished. It is all that he desires, and certainly more than he dares to hope.

¹ The revision and correction of the translation of Gibbon's history, into the French language, was the work of the mother of Guizot.
PREFACE

FIRST VOLUME OF THE ORIGINAL EDITION.

It is not my intention to detain the reader by expatiating on the variety, or the importance of the subject, which I have undertaken to treat; since the merit of the choice would serve to render the weakness of the execution still more apparent and still less excusable. But as I have presumed to lay before the public a first volume only 1 of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, it will perhaps be expected that I should explain, in a few words, the nature and limits of my general plan.

The memorable series of revolutions, which, in the course of about thirteen centuries, gradually undermined, and at length destroyed, the solid fabric of Roman greatness, may, with some propriety, be divided into the three following periods:

I. The first of these periods may be traced from the age of Trajan and the Antonines, when the Roman monarchy, having attained its full strength and maturity, began to verge towards its decline; and will extend to the subversion of the western empire, by the barbarians of Germany and Scythia, the rude ancestors of the most polished nations of modern Europe. This extraordinary revolution, which subjected Rome to the power of a Gothic conqueror, was completed by the beginning of the sixth century.

II. The second period of the Decline and Fall of Rome may be supposed to commence with the reign of Justinian, who by his laws, as well as by his victories, restored a transient splendor to the eastern empire. It will comprehend the invasion of Italy by the Lombards; the conquest of the Asiatic and African provinces by the Arabs, who embraced the religion of Mahomet; the revolt of the Roman people against the feeble princes of Constantinople; and the elevation of Charlemagne, who, in the year eight hundred, established the second, or German, empire of the west.

III. The last and longest of these periods includes about six centuries and a half; from the revival of the western empire, till the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and the extinction of a degenerate race of princes, who continued to assume the titles of Caesar and Augustus after their dominions were contracted to the limits of a single city, in which the language, as well as manners, of the ancient Romans had been long since forgotten. The writer who should undertake to relate the events of this period, would find himself obliged to enter into the general history of the crusades, as far as they contributed to the ruin of the Greek empire; and he would scarcely be able to restrain his curiosity from making some inquiry into the state of the city of Rome during the darkness and confusion of the middle ages.

PREFACE.

As I have ventured, perhaps too hastily, to commit to the press a work, which, in every sense of the word, deserves the epithet imperfect, I consider myself as contracting an engagement to finish, most probably in a second volume,¹ the first of these memorable periods; and to deliver to the public the complete History of the Decline and Fall of Rome, from the age of the Antonines to the subversion of the western empire. With regard to the subsequent periods, though I may entertain some hopes, I dare not presume to give any assurances. The execution of the extensive plan which I have described, would connect the ancient and modern history of the world; but it would require many years of health, of leisure, and of perseverance.

Bentinck Street,
February 1, 1776.

P. S. The entire History, which is now published, of the Decline and Fall of the Roman empire in the west, abundantly discharges my engagements with the public. Perhaps their favourable opinion may encourage me to prosecute a work, which however laborious it may seem, is the most agreeable occupation of my leisure hours.

March 1, 1781.

An author easily persuades himself that the public opinion is still favourable to his labours; and I have now embraced the serious resolution of proceeding to the last period of my original design, and of the Roman empire, the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, in the year one thousand four hundred and fifty three. The most patient reader, who computes that three ponderous² volumes have been already employed on the events of four centuries, may, perhaps, be alarmed at the long prospect of nine hundred years. But it is not my intention to expatiate with the same minuteness on the whole series of the Byzantine history. At our entrance into this period, the reign of Justinian, and the conquests of the Mahometans, will deserve and detain our attention, and the last age of Constantinople (the crusades and the Turks) is connected with the revolutions of modern Europe. From the seventh to the eleventh century, the obscure interval will be supplied by a concise narrative of such facts as may still appear either interesting or important.

March 1, 1782.

¹ The author, as it frequently happens, took an inadequate measure of his growing work. The remainder of the first period has filled two volumes in quarto, comprising chaps. XVII. to XXXVIII.

TO THE

FIRST OCTAVO EDITION.

The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is now delivered to the public in a more convenient form. Some alterations and improvements had presented themselves to my mind, but I was unwilling to injure or offend the purchasers of the preceding editions. The accuracy of the corrector of the press has been already tried and approved; and, perhaps I may stand excused, if, amidst the avocations of a busy winter, I have preferred the pleasures of composition and study, to the minute diligence of revising a former publication.

BENTINCK STREET,
April 20, 1783.

Diligence and accuracy are the only merits which an historical writer may ascribe to himself; if any merit indeed can be assumed from the performance of an indispensable duty. I may therefore be allowed to say, that I have carefully examined all the original materials that could illustrate the subject which I had undertaken to treat. Should I ever complete the extensive design which has been sketched out in the Preface, I might perhaps conclude it with a critical account of the authors consulted during the progress of the whole work; and however such an attempt might incur the censure of ostentation, I am persuaded that it would be susceptible of entertainment, as well as information.

At present I shall content myself with a single observation. The biographers, who, under the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine, composed, or rather compiled, the lives of the emperors, from Hadrian to the sons of Carus, are usually mentioned under the names of Ælius Spartanus, Julius Capitolinus, Ælius Lampridius, Vulciatus Gallicanus, Trebellius Pollio, and Flavius Vopiscus. But there is so much perplexity in the titles of the MSS.; and so many disputes have arisen among the critics (see Fabricius, Biblioth. Latin. i. iii. c. 6.) concerning their number, their names, and their respective property; that for the most part I have quoted them without distinction, under the general and well known title of the Augustan History.
I now discharge my promise, and complete my design, of writing the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, both in the west and the east. The whole period extends from the age of Trajan and the Antonines, to the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet the second; and includes a review of the crusades, and the state of Rome during the middle ages. Since the publication of the first\(^1\) volume, twelve years have elapsed; twelve years, according to my wish, "of health, of leisure, and of perseverance." I may now congratulate my deliverance from a long and laborious service, and my satisfaction will be pure and perfect, if the public favour should be extended to the conclusion of my work.

It was my first intention to have collected, under one view, the numerous authors, of every age and language, from whom I have derived the materials of this history; and I am still convinced that the apparent ostentation would be more than compensated by real use. If I have renounced this idea, if I have declined an undertaking which had obtained the approbation of a master-artist,\(^2\) my excuse may be found in the extreme difficulty of assigning a proper measure to such a catalogue. A naked list of names and editions would not be satisfactory either to myself or my readers: the characters of the principal authors of the Roman and Byzantine History have been occasionally connected with the events which they describe; a more copious and critical inquiry might indeed deserve, but it would demand, an elaborate volume, which might swell by degrees into a general library of historical writers. For the present I shall content myself with renewing my serious protestation, that I have always endeavoured to draw from the fountain head; that my curiosity, as well as a sense of duty, has always urged me to study the originals; and that, if they have sometimes eluded my search, I have carefully marked the secondary evidence, on whose faith a passage or a fact were reduced to depend.

I shall soon revisit the banks of the lake of Lausanne, a country which I have known and loved from my early youth. Under a mild government, amidst a beauteous landscape, in a life of leisure and independence, and among a people of easy and elegant manners, I have enjoyed, and may again hope to enjoy, the varied pleasures of retirement and society. But I shall ever glory in the name and character of an Englishman: I am proud of my birth in a free and enlightened country; and the approbation of that country is the best and most honourable reward of my labours. Were I ambitious of any other patron than the public, I would inscribe this work to a statesman, who, in a long, stormy, and at length an unfortunate, administration, had many political opponents, almost without a personal enemy; who has retained, in his fall from power, many faithful and disinterested friends; and who, under the pressure of severe infirmity, enjoys the lively vigour of his mind, and the felicity of his incomparable temper. Lord North will permit me to express the feelings of friendship in the language of truth: but even truth and friendship should be silent, if he still dispensed the favours of the crown.

In a remote solitude, vanity may still whisper in my ear, that my readers, perhaps, may inquire, whether, in the conclusion of the present work, I am now taking an everlasting farewell. They shall hear all that I know myself, all that I could reveal to the most intimate friend. The motives of action or silence are now equally balanced; nor can I pronounce in my most secret thoughts, on which side the scale will preponderate. I cannot dissemble that six ample quartos must have tried, and may have exhausted, the indulgence of the public; that in the repetition of similar attempts, a successful author has much more to lose than he can hope to gain; that I am now descending into the vale of years; and that the most respectable of my countrymen, the men whom I aspire to imitate, have resigned the pen of history about the same period of their lives. Yet I consider that the annals of ancient and modern times may afford many rich and interesting subjects; that I am still possessed of health and leisure; that by the practice of writing, some skill and facility must be acquired; and that, in the ardent pursuit of truth and knowledge, I am not conscious of decay. To an active mind, indolence is more painful than labour; and the first months of my liberty will be occupied and amused in the excursions of curiosity and taste. By such temptations, I have been sometimes seduced from the rigid duty even of a pleasing and voluntary task: but my time will now be my own; and in the use or abuse of independence, I shall no longer fear my own reproaches or those of my friends. I am fairly entitled to a year of jubilee: next summer and the following winter will rapidly pass away; and experience only can determine whether I shall still prefer the freedom and variety of study, to the design and composition of a regular work, which animates, while it confines, the daily application of the author. Caprice and accident may influence my choice; but the dexterity of self-love will contrive to applaud either active industry, or philosophic repose.

Downing Street,
May 1, 1789.

P. S. I shall embrace this opportunity of introducing two verbal remarks, which have not conveniently offered themselves to my notice. 1. As often as I use the definition of beyond the Alps, the Rhine, the Danube, &c. I generally suppose myself at Rome, and afterwards at Constantinople; without observing whether this relative geography may agree with the local, but variable, situation of the reader, or the historian. 2. In proper names of foreign, and especially of oriental origin, it should be always our aim to express in our English version a faithful copy of the original. But this rule, which is founded on a just regard to uniformity and truth, must often be relaxed; and the exceptions will be limited or enlarged by the custom of the language and the taste of the interpreter. Our alphabets may be often defective; a harsh sound, an uncouth spelling, might offend the ear or the eye of our countrymen: and some words, notoriously corrupt, are fixed, and as it were naturalized, in the vulgar tongue. The prophet Mohammed can no longer be stripedit of the famous, though improper appellation of Mahomet: the well-known cities of Aleppo, Damascus, and Cairo, would almost be lost in the strange descriptions of Haleb, Demassk, and Al Cahira; the titles and offices of the Ottoman empire are fashioned by the practice of three hundred years; and we are pleased to blend the three Chinese monosyllables, Confucius, in the respectable name of Confucius, or even to adopt the Portuguese corruption of Mandarin. But I would vary the use of Zoroster and Zerdusht, as I drew my information from Greece or Persia: since our connexion with India, the genuine Timour is restored to the throne of Tamerlane: our most correct writers have retrenched the Al, the superfluous article, from the Koran; and we escape an ambiguous termination, by adopting Mosten instead of Mussulman, in the plural number. In these, and in a thousand examples, the shades of distinction are often minute; and I can feel, where I cannot explain, the motives of my choice.

* * At the end of the History, the reader will find a General Index to the whole Work, which has been drawn up by a person frequently employed in works of this nature.
A NOTICE OF THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF GIBBON.

It is not merely because it gratifies an idle curiosity, that it is interesting to collect all the particulars relating to the character of men distinguished for their works or public actions. These particulars ought to influence the judgment we form either of their conduct or their writings. Celebrated men seldom escape from that restless suspicion, which search-es for their secret sentiments, and makes us attach to whatever we know of them some particular idea, founded upon the opinion we have formed of their motives. It is important that these motives should be appreciated with justice, and if it is impossible to eradicate from the mind of man the disposition to prejudge, which seems to be inherent in his nature, we ought at least to place it upon a solid and reasonable basis. It is no doubt true that in some cases the opinion we have of the author ought not to influence that which we form of his writings—but not so with regard to the historian. He, of all writers, perhaps, owes the most to the public estimation of himself. He makes himself surety for the facts he relates; the value of this surety ought to be known, and it is founded, not only upon the moral character of the historian and the confidence his veracity can inspire, but also upon the habitual turn of his mind, the opinions he is most inclined to adopt, the peculiarities of thought by which he suffers himself to be most easily led away upon whatever constitutes the atmosphere which surrounds and colours to his eye the events he describes.

I will always seek the truth, wrote Gibbon previous to the commencement of his historical labours, although hitherto I have found little except the semblances of truth. It is among these semblances of truth, these truth-seeing, that the historian ought to find, and, as it were, to reproduce the truth itself, in part effaced by the hand of time. It is his province to judge of their value; it is our right to estimate the decision of the judge according to our opinion of his character. If freedom from passion, moderation of desires, and that middle condition of fortune fitted to extinguish ambition by preventing want, suggests the idea of a man the most inclined to that impartiality necessary for historical writing, then no man, in this respect, ever possessed more than Gibbon the qualities of a historian.

He was descended from an ancient, but not greatly distinguished family, and could not, as he says himself in his Memoirs, while relating with some complacency his family alliances and advantages, receive from his ancestry either glory or shame. The most remarkable of his family connections was his near relationship to the Chevalier Acton, celebrated in Europe as the minister of the king of Naples. His grandfather enriched himself by successful commercial enterprises; making, as says his grandson, his opinions subordinate to his interests; clothing in Flanders the troops of King William, when he would have served King James with more willingness, but not, perhaps, adds the historian, with so much profit. Less disposed than his parent to regulate his inclinations according to his situation, the father of our historian dissipated a fortune which he had acquired too easily to know its value. He thus bequeathed to his son the necessity of turning to an important use, that activity of mind, which, in a more advantageous situation, the quietude of his imagination and spirit would perhaps have left unemployed. This activity of mind manifested itself, from his infancy, in those intervals allowed him by the weakness and infirmities with which he was almost constantly afflicted till the age of fifteen. His constitution then became strengthened, and good health was suddenly restored to him. At this age the latitude so unnatural to childhood and youth, by depressing the satties of the imagination, facilitates that close application, which is always less irksome to weakness than to buoyancy; but the ill health of the young Gibbon served as a pretext for the indulgence of his father and the indulgence of an aunt, to whose care he was committed, and they gave themselves little trouble with his education. All his activity therefore turned itself towards a taste for reading; an occupation which favours indolence and the curiosity of mind by exempting from regular and assiduous study. But his excellent memory and the recollection of his early reading, laid the foundation of that great knowledge which at last he laboured to acquire. History was his first passion and became in the end his ruling taste. He already brought to it that spirit of criticism and of scepticism, which has since formed one of the distinctive characteristics of his manner of thought and writing. At the age of fifteen, he determined to undertake an historical work; it was The Age of Sesostris. His design was not, as from his age we would naturally suppose, to paint the wonders of the conqueror's reign, but to fix the probable date of his existence. In the system he had chosen, which fixed the reign of Sesostris about the time of Solomon, one objection only embarrassed him: and the manner in which he obviated it is ingenious, as he himself says, and for a young man of his age, is curious; inasmuch as it shows the spirit which was one day to preside over the historical composition upon which rests his fame. The following is the account of it as related in his Memoirs: "In the translation of the sacred books," says he, "the high priest Manetho gave me one and the same person of Sesostris or Sesostris, and the elder brother of Danaus, who landed in Greece, according to the marbles of Pelus, 1510 years before Christ; but according to my supposition, the high priest is guilty of a voluntary error. Flatterly is the mother of falsehood. Manetho's history of Egypt is dedicated to Ptolemy Philæphtus, who traced his origin, either fabulous or illegitimate, to the Macedonian kings of the race of Hercules. Danaus is one of the ancestors of Hercules; and the elder branch of the family becoming extinct, the Ptolemies, his descendants, found themselves the sole representatives of the royal family, and could claim by right of inheritance the throne which they occupied by right of conquest." A flatterer then could pay his court to the sovereign by representing Danaus, the progenitor of the Ptolemies, as brother to the kings of Egypt; and since the falsehood had once been of service, Gibbon takes it for granted. The Age of Sesostris was discontinued, and some years after thrown into the fire; and Gibbon no more endeavoured to reconcile Jewish, Egyptian, and Greek
A NOTICE OF THE LIFE

Gibbon, relating this event, that I ceased my theological researches and submitted myself implicitly to the dogmas and mysteries adopted both by protestants and catholics. So rapid a transition from one faith to another had evidently shaken his confidence in both. The enthusiastic and confident adoption of opinions at first, and then the rejection of them, doubtless caused in his mind a scepticism upon all kinds of religious belief; and a disposition to doubt arguments which appeared to him fallacious. However that may be, Gibbon seems to have regarded it as one of the most fortunate circumstances of his life, since rousing the attention of his parents, it forced them to exercise their authority more strictly and to subject him to a regular plan of education. M. Pavilliard, a judicious and well-informed man, had not limited his attention to the religious belief of his pupil. He had readily acquired the ascendancy over a character easily guided, and had used it to regulate that active curiosity which only needed to be directed to the true sources of information. But the master, unable to follow his pupil in the path he himself had directed, left him to pursue it alone. The mind of the young Gibbon, formed for order and method, now commenced that regular and constant course of study and reflection which has so often conducted him to the truth, and which would always have prevented him from swerving from it, had not an excessive nicety and a dangerous proneness to prejudice, without the requisite examination and reflection, sometimes led him into error.

A volume of argumentative extracts from his readings was published after his death, the first of which was dated about the time he commenced the plan of study directed by M. Pavilliard. In reading it one cannot but be struck with the sagacity, the justice, and the ingenuity of that calm and thinking mind which never wandered from the path it has chosen. "We ought to read only to assist us to think," says he in the notice which precedes these extracts, and which seem to indicate that he intended them for publication. It is indeed evident that the extracts serve only as the foundation of his own thoughts; but he strictly confines himself to them. He follows the ideas of the author only so far as they give rise to his own; but his own thoughts never divert him from those of the author. He proceeds, step by step, overlapping no interval, and in a firm and sure manner. We do not perceive that the course of his reflections carries him above the subject from whence they arose, producing in his mind that excitement of grand ideas which almost always characterizes the study of strong, fertile and extended minds; but nothing is lost that can furnish him material for thought; nothing escapes him which can elicit anything useful, and all bespeaks the historian who knows how to extract from facts all that their known details can furnish to his natural sagacity, without seeking to supply or re-compose those unknown parts which the imagination alone can portray.

The work of his conversion being achieved, Gibbon found his residence at Lausanne more agreeable than at first from his situation he could have hoped. The moderate remittances from his father did not permit him to indulge in the pleasures and excesses of those of his young countrymen who travel over Europe diffusing their thoughts and customs, only to bring back to their own land the follies and fashions of other countries. But this privation was the means of confirming his taste for study, and of turning his desires towards a more permanent glory than could be derived from the advantages of fortune, and induced him to seek the more simple and useful society of the place in which he lived. Owning to his easy familiarity he was received in society with marked attention, and his love of science introduced him almost to the acquaintance of many learned men, whose esteem gained for him a respect and consideration flattering for his age, and which had ever been one of his greatest pleasures.

Nevertheless, the calmness of his spirit did not shelter him from the agitations of youth. At Lausanne he saw and loved...
Mac'ille, Curchold, since Mad. Necker, then already distinguished for her worth and beauty. His love was such as a young gentleman would feel for a young and virtuous woman, and Gibbon, who afterwards probably experienced no more similar emotions, with a kind of pride congratulates himself in his memoirs, that once in his life he had been capable of feeling so pure and exalted a sentiment. The parents of Maclubelle, Curchold favoured his suit, and she herself, since she was not yet reduced to that state of poverty which she afterwards experienced upon the death of her father, seemed to receive his addresses with pleasure. But the young Gibbon, after a five years' residence at Lausanne, was recalled to England, and he soon saw that he could not hope to induce his father to overlook to this alliance. After painful struggle, he says, I resigned myself to my destiny. He seeks not to display or exaggerate his despair; as a lover, he adds, I sighed; but as a son I obeyed; and this sprightly antithesis proves that at the time he wrote his memoirs, there remained little of the anguish of "this wound, insensitively healed by time, absence and new habits of life."

The habits of a man of fashion in London, less romantic, perhaps, than those of a young student among the mountains of Switzerland, changed the love which he long felt for female society, to a simple amusement. No one could ever rival in his estimation Maclubelle. Curchold; and he experienced with her during his life that sweet intimacy consequent upon an honourable and tender love, which necessity and reason had been able to overcome, without giving any place to reproaches, or bitterness of feeling. He saw her again at Paris in 1765, the wife of Mr. Necker, and enjoying the consideration which was due as well to his character as to his rank. He humorously describes in his letters to Mr. Holroyd, the manner in which she received him. "She has been," says he, "very affectionate towards me, and her husband particularly polite. Could he insult me more cruelly! To invite me every evening to supper, to retire and leave me alone with his wife, is assuredly treating a former lover as of no consequence." Gibbon was not one very much to disquiet a husband by the recollections of himself which might still exist. Capable of pleasing by his intelligence, and of interesting by his gentle and upright character, he was little fitted by vivacity to excite the imagination of a young person. His figure, never agreeable, had now become remarkable for its graces; his features were animated, but without character or nobleness, and his form had always been disproportionate. "M. Pavilliard," says Lord Sheffield in one of his notes to the Memoirs of Gibbon, "has represented to me his surprise when he saw before him Mr. Gibbon, that small thin figure and that large head which, in disputation, employed in favour of popery the best arguments then in use." His feeble health in childhood, or the habits which arose out of it, had given him an awkward timidity, of which he continually speaks in his letters, and increased at the last his excessive corpulence, and even in his youth did not permit him to engage in vivacity to excite the not even for amusement. As to his moral qualities, we shall perhaps be curious to know what he thought of himself at the age of twenty-five. The following are the reflections he makes upon this subject in his diary, commenced in his twenty-sixth year: "According to the observations I have made upon myself," says he, "it appears to me that my character is virtuous, incapable of a base action, and formed for generous deeds, but that it is proud, haughty and disagreeable in society. Wit I have none; my imagination is powerful rather than pleasing, my memory is vast and excellent; the most remarkable qualities of my mind are its compass and penetration, but I fail in quickness and accuracy." We ought to estimate the judgment Gibbon has passed upon his own mind from reading his works. The idea which this judgment supports of his moral character is, that, if in speaking of himself he testifies that he is virtuous, though he might have been deceived as to the extent of virtuous duties, he proved even by this that he felt disposed to fulfil these duties in all the extent he gave them; he was certainly an honest man, and always would have been, because he felt a pleasure in being so. As to the haughtiness and violence of which he accuses himself, whether it be that his solicitude to subdue these inclinations had made him feel them more strongly than others, or because reason had conquered, or the habit of success had calmed him, certain it is, that those who knew him later never perceived them. As to his manner in society, without doubt the agreeableness of Gibbon was neither that condensation which is yielding and unpretending, nor that modesty which forgets itself; but his self-esteem never showed itself in any disagreeable form: anxious to succeed and to please, he wished to fix attention upon himself, and he obtained his desire without difficulty by a style of conversation, animated, intelligent and full of anecdote. If the tone of his voice was peremptory, it betrayed less a desire of ruling others than the confidence he felt in himself; and this confidence was justified both by his resources and his success. Nevertheless, it never misled him, and the fault of his conversation was a sort of precision of language which gave to it an air of study and arrangement. This fault might perhaps have been attributed to the embarrassment of speaking in a strange language, if his friend Lord Sheffield, who defends him from the suspicion of studied arrangement in his conversation, had not at least granted that "before writing a note or a letter he arranged completely in his mind whatever he wished to express." It appears also that he always wrote in this manner. Dr. Gregory, in his Letters upon Literature says, that Gibbon composed while walking his room, and that "he never wrote a sentence without having exactly constructed and arranged it in his mind." Besides, the French language was nearly as familiar to him as the English; his residence at Lausanne, where it was exclusively spoken, had made it for some time his habitual language, and he would not have been suspected of having ever spoken any other, had he not been betrayed by too strong an accent and by certain peculiarities, certain sharp tones, which, disagreeable to ears accustomed from infancy to softer inflections, diminished the pleasure of listening to him. Three years after his return to England he published in French his first work, An Essay upon the Study of Literature, a well written piece, and full of excellent criticism, it was little read by his own countrymen, but in France it was received with admiration; rather, however, by literary men, who saw in it a mind destined to be greater than by men of the world, who are rarely pleased with a work unless the author has much raciness and spirit. It was in the world however that Gibbon desired to succeed. Society always had for him great attractions, as it ever has for those who, free from particular attachments and incapable of deep emotion, are satisfied with that lively interchange of thought and feeling that compensates them for any deficiency of affectionate and unreserved confidence, Gibbon knew that the first requisite for being agreeable in the world is to be a man of the world, and such he desired to be considered. He even appears through this desire sometimes to have inclined to a weak vanity. We see in his notes of his reception by the Duke de Neuvins that, by the fault of Dr. Maty, whose letters of recommendation were badly expressed, the Duke, although he received him with politeness, treated him "more as a literary man than as a man of fashion." In 1733, two years after the publication of his Essay upon the Study of Literature, he again left England to travel, but in a situation very different from that in which he was when he left it ten years before. Preceded by his rising fame, he came to Paris. For a man of Gibbon's character, Paris, as it was then, was the abode of happiness. He spent three months there in the society best suited to his taste, and he regretted that time flew so rapidly. "If I had been rich and independent," says he, "I should have prolonged and perhaps fixed my residence at Paris." But Italy awaited him. It was there, from the midst of plans of various works, which, in turn adopted and rejected, had occupied his mind for a long time, that the idea of that work was to arise, which caused his reputation and occupied a great part of his life. "It was at Rome," says he, "the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the capitol, while the barefooted monks were chanting vespers in the temple of Jupiter, that for the first time I was struck with the idea of writing the history of the decline and fall of this city; but," he adds, "my first plan comprised more particularly the decline of the city than that of the empire, and though from that time my reading and reflections generally turned towards this object, I permitted many years to pass on. I even devoted myself to other occupations before seriously undertaking this laborious work." Indeed, never losing sight of, yet never approaching, this subject, which he looked at, as he says, from a respectful distance, Gibbon formed and even began to execute some plans of historical works; but a few casual pieces of criticism were the only compositions that he finished and published during this interval. With his eye ever fixed upon the end towards which he was one day to direct his efforts, he approached it slowly, and doubtless the idea which was at first presented to him remained strongly impressed upon his mind.

It is difficult, in reading his account of the Roman empire under Augustus and Tiberius, not to feel that it was inspired by the view of Rome itself, of the Eternal City, into which he confesses that he never entered with an emotion which deprived him of sleep for one night. Perhaps also it will not be difficult to find, in this impression, from whence arose the conception of the work, one of the causes of that war which Gibbon seems here to have declared against Christianity, and which appears to be suited neither to his character, which was little disposed to party-spirit, nor to that moderation of thought and sentiment, which led him always to see in every subject, particular as well as general, its advantages aside from its disadvantages. But Gibbon, while writing the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, has seen in Christianity only the institution which established vespers, the barefooted monks and the processions, instead of the magnificent ceremonies of the worship of Jupiter and triumphs of the capitol. At last, after many other attempts successively abandoned, he settled entirely the plan of the history of the Decline of the Empire, and commenced that course of study and reading which would disclose to him a new horizon, and insensibly enlarge to his vision the plan he had at first formed. That embarrassment caused by the death of his father, which happened about this time, the deranged state of his affairs, his duties as member of parliament, which he had just entered, and the distractions of a life in London, prolonged, without interrupting, his studies, and retarded till the year 1776 the publication of the first volume of the work. Its success was wonderful. Two or three editions readily disposed of had established the reputation of the author before criticism had begun to raise her voice. She raised it at last, and all the religious party, very numerous and respectable in England, pronounced against the two last chapters of this volume (the fifteenth and sixteenth of the work) which give the history of the establishment of Christianity. Remonstrances were many and violent. Gibbon had not expected this; and he confesses that he was at first frightened. "If I had thought," says he, in his memoirs, "that the majority of English readers had been so tenderly attached to the name and shadow of Christianity; if I had foreseen that the pious, the timid and proudest would feel, or affect to feel with such exquisite sensibility, I perhaps should have softened the two last chapters, the cause of so much offence, which have raised many adversaries against me, and gained for me but few friends." This surprise seems to show a man so preoccupied with his own thoughts, that he could neither foresee nor perceive those of others. If this preoccupation undeniably proves his sincerity, it at least renders his judgment liable to the suspicion of prejudice and inaccuracy. Wherever prejudice reigns there is no longer perfect integrity. Without precisely wishing to deceive others, we begin by deceiving ourselves. To maintain what we consider truth, we resort to scepticisms, which we scarcely own to ourselves, or which appear trifling, and the passions diminish the importance of any scruple concerning the rectitude of what they have undertaken to accomplish. It is thus, doubtless, that Gibbon was led to see in the history of Christianity only what would subserve opinions he had previously formed, without a scrupulous examination of facts.

The alteration of some passages which he had cited, whether done by design or because he had neglected to read the whole of them, furnished weapons to his opponents by giving them reason to doubt his honesty. The whole ecclesiastical order seemed leagues against him. Those who entered the lists against him obtained favour and preeminence, and he ironically felicitated himself that he had obtained for Mr. Davis a pension from the king, and for Dr. Aphthorpe an archiepiscopal living. We can easily believe that the pleasure of thus rallying his opponents, who had almost always attacked him with more fury than discretion, compensated for the chaplain he at first felt in consequence of their assaults, and also perhaps prevented him from acknowledging the real wrongs he had to reproach himself with. Besides, Hume and Robertson had loaded the new historian with the most flattering testimonies of their esteem. They both seemed to fear that the manner in which these two chapters were written would injure the success of the work; but they spoke of his talents with so much admiration that Gibbon was authorised to say modestly, when congratulating himself upon the receipt of a letter from Hume, "nevertheless, I have never had the presumption to accept a place in the triumvirate of English historians." Hume especially expressed the greatest partiality for the work of Gibbon, whose opinions approached so nearly to his own in some respects, while Gibbon also esteemed the talents of Hume more than those of Robertson. We perhaps ought not to adopt without some restriction the judgment of Hume, who, writing concerning Gibbon, praises the dignity of his style. Dignity does not appear to me to be a characteristic of Gibbon's style; it is generally epigrammatic, and more forcible by its skilful phraseology than by its elevation. I would subscribe more willingly to the opinion of Robertson, who, having rendered justice to the extent of his knowledge, to his research and accuracy, praises the internal and clearness of his narration, the elegance and force of his style, and the singular happiness of some of his expressions, though in some places he found it too laboured, and in others too quaint. This fault was easily explained by his manner of composing, the difficulties he had to avoid, and the models he preferred to adopt. At first the work was very labious; he informs us that he wrote the first chapter three times, the second and third twice, and that he found it very difficult to preserve a medium between the style of a dull chronicle and that of rhetorical declamation. He tells us also, that when he wished to write a history of Switzerland, which he had commenced.

"he perceived that his style, above prose and below poetry, degenerated into verbose and banalistic declamation," which he attributes to the language he had chosen; an opinion the more singular, since, according to his own account, it was from a French work, Provinicial Letters, which he read almost every year, that he acquired the art of "treating a subject with grave and sober irony." He adds in his Essay upon Literature, that the desire of imitating Montesquieu had often led him to become obscure by expressing even common thoughts with a sententious and oracular brevity. Gibbon had then habitually before his eyes Paschel and Montesquieu in order to counteract the natural bombast of a style as yet unfounded. He needed to make vigorous efforts to compress it to the point demanded by these models, and these efforts are very perceptible, especially in the commencement, where the style he had adopted had not as yet become natural by use; but habit relaxes effort, and at the same time renders it less painful. In his memoirs and in the notice which preceded the last volumes of his work, Gibbon congratulates himself for the facility he had acquired. Perhaps it will be found that in the last volumes this facility is sometimes obtained at the expense of perfection. Having become by habit less severe upon faults, which at first he had so carefully guarded against, he is not always free from that kind of declamation, which consists in supplying, by the convenient resource of vague and sonorous epithets, that energy given to thought by precision and conciseness of expression. This precision and conciseness are most remarkable in the first volumes; that in which he frequently resorts to antitheses, the design of which is too readily discovered, but the effect not the less felt; and there is cause perhaps at the last to regret the loss of an elaboration of construction, too little concealed but always happy. At the very commencement of his work, as I have already said, Gibbon became a member of parliament. The nature of his mind, which could not easily express its thoughts in the happiest manner, unfitted him for a public speaker. Sensitive of this defect as well as of his want of grace of manner, he felt a timidity which he was never able to conquer. He assisted in silence during eight sessions. Not being attached to any party by motives of ambition, and not having committed himself by the public expression of any opinion, he could with less difficulty in 1779, after the acceptance of his commission as lord commissioner of commerce, obtained for him by the friendship of Lord Loughborough, then Mr. Wedderburne. Gibbon has been very much censured for accepting this appointment, and the whole of his political career betrays a weakness of character, and a want of fixed opinions; but this perhaps is excusable, since his education had rendered him almost a stranger to any national feeling. After a residence of five years at Lausanne, he had, as he says himself, "ceased to be an Englishman." "At the age when our habits are formed," says he, "my opinions, my habits and my feelings, were cast in a foreign mould; only a feeble, a distant and faint recollection of England remained; my mother tongue was no longer familiar to me. It is true, at the time he left Switzerland, the writing of a letter in English cost him much trouble. Also, in his English letters written towards the close of his life, real gillicites occur, and lest they might not be understood, he himself explains them by the French expression to which they refer.

After his first return to England his father wished to get him elected member of parliament. The young Gibbon, with reason, preferred that the sums which would necessarily be employed in this election should be expended upon his travels, which he knew would be more useful to his talents and reputation. He therefore wrote a letter to his father upon the subject, which is still preserved, and in which he mentions his disinclination for public speaking, and declares "that he even is destitute of the national and party prejudices," necessary to obtain distinction, and perhaps to accomplish anything good in the career he wished to commence. Though after the death of his father he was induced to enter parliament, he confesses several times that he entered without patriotism, and, as he says, without ambition, for throughout he never extended his views beyond the convenient and honest place of lord of trade. We could wish perhaps he had possessed less facility in arriving this sort of moderation, which, in a man of talent, confines his desires to the easy enjoyment of a fortune acquired without labour. But Gibbon expresses this sentiment as freely as he had felt it. He knew only by experience the discomfort connected with the situation he had chosen. In truth, he seems to have felt them vividly, if we may judge from his expressions in his letters upon the disgrace of the state of dependence to which he had been subjected, and his regret at being seen in a situation unmercy of his character. It is true that when he wrote these expressions he had lost his place. It was taken from him in 1782 by a revolution in the administration. He proved that he was sincere in confounding himself for this reverse of fortune, which had restored him to liberty, by renouncing all ambition, and not permitting himself to be amused with the new hopes which a new revolution might excite, and by resolving to leave England, where his moderate fortune did not permit him to support that style of living to which the circumstances of his place under government had accustomed him.

He went to live at Lausanne, the theatre of his first troubles and his first pleasures, of pleasure and of labour. Since visited with even now delight and affection. M. Deyverdon, who had been his friend for thirty years, offered him a residence at his house, which was suited to his resources, and at the same time enabled him to compensate in some measure the mediocrity of his friend's fortune. He there experienced the advantage of a state of society conformed to his quiet tastes, and the desire necessary for the continuation of his work. In 1783 he executed that resolution, for which he has ever since congratulated himself. He completed at Lausanne his great work, the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. "I have promised," says he, in his memoirs, "to mark the moment of conception, I shall now commemorate the hour of my final delivery. It was on the day or rather night of the 27th of July, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve. I wrote the last lines of the last page, in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen I took several turns in an arbour or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on the recovery of my freedom and perhaps the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled, and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that whatsoever might be the future fate of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious." This idea could not long affect a man in whom the sensation of health and a calmness of imagination preserved a feeling of certainty that he should enjoy a long life, and who in his last moments even calculated with complacency the number of years which probably he had to live. Enjoying the result of his labours, he went to England this same year to attend to the printing of the last volumes of his history. His residence there contributed still more to endure him to Switzerland. Under George I. and George II. all taste for literature and talent had become nearly extinct at court. The Duke of Cumberland, whose brother Gibbon one day attended, thus accosted him, "What, Mr. Gibbon, still scrupulous, scrupulous!" At the end of the year he left his country with little regret, to return to Lausanne, where he enjoyed life, and where he was beloved. He was desirously dear to those with whom he had lived, and who had enjoyed the advantages of his character and society, which was easy and condescending, because he was happy. Never carrying his desires beyond reason, he was never dissatisfied either with men or things. He often spoke of his situation with a satisfaction which accords with the moderation of his character. —

Je suis Français, Tourangeau, gentilhomme, Jeanne à notre Terc, Limousin, paysan, says the optimism; Gibbon said the same in his memoirs: "my place in life might have been that of a slave, a savage or a peasant, and I cannot think without pleasure of the goodness of nature, who appointed my birth in a free and civilised country, in an age of science and of philosophy, in a family honourable in station and sufficiently provided with the gifts of fortune." He besides congratulates himself for the mediocrity of this fortune, which had placed him in a situation the most propitious for acquiring by his own labour an honourable reputation; "for," says he, "poverty and contempt would have discouraged me, and the care of a large fortune, more than adequate to my wants, would have abated my activity." He also speaks of his health, which, always good since he had escaped the perils of childhood, had never permitted him to experience the "madness of superfluous health." He had derived for twenty years much happiness from the execution of his work, and now he enjoyed with simplicity the fruits of his labours; and as every thing enhances pleasure in a happy situation, after having, doubtless, patiently endured his situation as lord of trade, when once arrived in Lausanne he could not sufficiently express his delight that he had escaped from this state of servitude.

His memoirs and his letters, which are almost all addressed to Lord Sheffield, are interesting, since they are expressive of benevolence of character, and of feelings, if not tender, at least very affectionate towards those connected with him either by ties of blood or friendship. This affection is expressed with little vivacity, but in a natural and sincere manner. The long and intimate friendship which united him to Lord Sheffield and M. Deyverdun is a proof of the affection which he was capable of feeling and inspiring. We can easily conceive that a man would inspire a strong attachment whose heart, free from passion, brought to the society of his friends all the sensibility it possessed, who was delighted to see them enjoying substantial pleasure and whose honourable and serene soul, if it had not imparted warmth to his spirit, had never at least obscured its brightness. The tranquillity of his soul was, however, disturbed during the last years of his life, by the scenes of the French revolution, against which he sided with so much warmth that none of those whom it had driven from France, and who saw him at Lausanne, could equal him in this respect. He had been for some time at variance with M. Necker, but his knowledge of the character and intentions of this virtuous man, his misfortunes and the feelings of grief he felt in common with Gibbon for the troubles of France, soon renewed their former friendship. THE HISTORY
THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

CHAPTER I.
The Extent and Military Force of the Empire in the Age of the Antonines.

Introduction. In the second century of the Christian era, the empire of Rome comprehended the fairest part of the earth, and the most civilized portion of mankind. The frontiers of that extensive monarchy were guarded by ancient renown and disciplined valour. The gentle, but powerful, influence of laws and manners had gradually cemented the union of the provinces. Their peaceful inhabitants enjoyed and abused the advantages of wealth and luxury. The image of a free constitution was preserved with decent reverence: the Roman senate appeared to possess the sovereign authority, and devolved on the emperors all the executive powers of government.

A.D. 26—160. During a happy period of more than four-score years, the public administration was conducted by the virtues and abilities of Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, and the two Antonines. It is the design of this, and of the two succeeding chapters, to describe the prosperous condition of their empire; and afterwards, from the death of Marcus Antoninus, to deduce the most important circumstances of its Decline and Fall; a revolution which will ever be remembered, and is still felt by the nations of the earth.

Moderation of the principal conquests of the Romans were achieved under the republic; and the emperors, for the most part, were satisfied with preserving those dominions which had been acquired by the policy of the senate, the active emulation of the consuls, and the martial enthusiasm of the people. The seven first centuries were filled with a rapid succession of triumphs; but it was reserved for Augustus, to relinquish the ambitious design of subduing the whole earth, and to introduce the spirit of moderation into the public councils. Inclined to peace by his temper and situation, it was easy for him to discover, that Rome, in her present exalted situation, had much less to hope than to fear from the chance of arms; and that, in the prosecution of remote wars, the undertaking became every day more difficult, the event more doubtful, and the possession more precarious, and less beneficial. The experience of Augustus added weight to these salutary reflections, and effectually convinced him, that, by the prudent vigour of his counsels, it would be easy to secure every conquest, which the safety or the dignity of Rome might require from the most formidable barbarians. Instead of exposing his person and his legions to the arrows of the Parthians, he obtained, by an honourable treaty, the restitution of the standards and prisoners which had been taken in the defeat of Crassus.¹

His generals, in the early part of his reign, attempted the reduction of Ethiopia and Arabia Felix. They marched near a thousand miles to the south of the tropic; but the heat of the climate soon repelled the invaders, and protected the unwarlike natives of those sequestered regions.² The northern countries of Europe scarcely deserved the expense and labour of conquest. The forests and morasses of Germany were filled with a hardy race of barbarians, who despaired life when it was separated from their country; and though, on the first attack, they seemed to yield to the weight of the Roman power, they soon, by a signal act of despair, regained their independence, and reminded Augustus of the vicissitude of fortune.³ On the death of that emperor, his testament was publicly read in the senate. He bequeathed, as a valuable legacy to his successors, the advice of confining the empire within those limits, which nature seemed to have placed as its permanent bulwarks and boundaries; on the west the Atlantic ocean; the Rhine and Danube on the north; the Euphrates on the east; and towards the south the sandy deserts of Arabia and Africa.⁴

Happily for the repose of mankind, the imitated by his moderate system recommended by the successors, the wisdom of Augustus was adopted by the fears and vices of his immediate successors. Engaged in the marble of Ancyra, on which Augustus recorded his own exploits, asserts that he compelled the Parthians to restore the enigms of Crounos. The Latin poets have celebrated with much pomp this peaceful exploit of Augustus.-Iieroc. lib. iv. col. 15, has said. * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *Signa nostro restituit Jovi 35.) and Dion Cassius, (l. livi. p. 722, and l. liv. p. 724.) have left us very curious details concerning these wars. The Romans made themselves masters of Marishia, or Merah, a city of Arabia Felix, well known to the Orientals, (see Abuflada and the Nubian geography, p. 52.) They were arrived within three days' journey of the Spice country, the rich object of their invasion.

It is in this city of Merah that the Arameans say was the residence of King Solomon, who came to see Solomon. A bank, by which the waters collected in the environs were retained, having been carried away, a sudden inundation destroyed the city. Traces of it yet remain. It was on the borders of a country named ADRAMYTIM, where grew a peculiar aromatic drug. We therefore read in the history of the expedition of the Romans, that they were only three days' journey from the country of Spices. (See d'Arville, anc. Geog. col. 2. p. 222—0) ⁴

pursuit of pleasure, or in the exercise of tyranny, the first Caesars seldom showed themselves to forty miles, or to the provinces; nor were they disposed to suffer that those triumphs, which their indolence neglected, should be usurped by the conduct and valour of their lieutenants. The military fame of a subject was considered as an insolent invasion of the imperial prerogative. The naked truth, as it was interest, as every Roman general, to guard the frontiers intrusted to his care, without aspiring to conquests which might have proved no less fatal to himself than to the vanquished barbarians.

Conquest of Brit-

The only accession which the Roman general received, during the first one hundred years of the Christian era, was the province of Britain. In this single instance the successors of Caesar and Augustus were persuaded to follow the example of the former, rather than the precept of the latter. The proximity of its situation to the coast of Gaul seemed to invite its arms; the pleasing, though doubtful, intelligence of a pearl fishery, attracted their avarice; and as Britain was viewed in the light of a distinct and insulated world, the conquest scarcely formed any exception to the general system of continental measures. After a war of about forty years, undertaken by the most stupid, maintained by the most disolute, and terminated by the most timid, of all the emperors, the far greater part of the island submitted to the Roman yoke. The various tribes of Britons possessed valor without conduct, and the love of war without the spirit of union. They took up arms with savage fierceness; they laid them down, or turned them against each other, with wild inconstancy; and while they fought singly, they were successively subdued. Neither the fortitude of Cames-cus, nor the despair of Boadicea, nor the fanaticism of Suetonius Paulinus, could prevent the progress of their conquest, or resist the steady progress of the imperial generals, who maintained the national glory, when the throne was disgraced by the weakest, or the most vicious, of mankind. At the very time when Domitian, confined to his palace, felt the terrors which he inspired; his legions, under the command of the Roman Agricola, defeated the collected force of the Caledonians at the foot of the Grampian hills; and his fleets, venturing to explore an unknown and dangerous navigation, displayed the Roman arms round every part of the island. The conquest of Britain was considered as already achieved, and the design of Agricola to complete and ensure his success by the easy reduction of Ireland, for which, in his opinion, one legion and a few auxiliaries were sufficient. The western isle might be improved into a valuable possession, and the Britons would wear their chains with the less reluctance, if the prospect and example of freedom were on every side removed from before their eyes. But the superior merit of Agricola soon occasioned his removal from the government of Britain; and for ever disappointed this rational, though extensive, scheme of conquest. Before his departure, the produced into two unequal parts by the union of Gaul, or, as they are now called, the Frisii of Scotland. Across the narrow interval of about forty miles, he had drawn a line of military stations, which was afterwards fortified in the reign of Antoninus Pius, by a turf rampart erected on foundations of stone. This wall of Antoninus, at a small distance beyond the modern English border, and described with admiration by Tacitus, must be considered as one of the most magnificent works of ancient architecture, as well in the perfection of its execution as in the advantage derived from it. But its cost, and the expense of subsequent repairs, and the revenue required to support it, were almost equal to the expenses of the Caledonian conquest. The same spirit of national pride and national pride, which had appeared in those of its predecessors was interrupted by scenes of war and conquest; and the legions, after a long interval, beheld a military emperor at their head. The first exploits of Trajan were against the Dacians, the most warlike of men, who dwelt beyond the Danube, and who, during the reign of Tiberius, had broken out in rebellion. The masters of the fairest and most wealthy climates of the globe turned with contempt from gloomy hills, assailed by the winter tempest, from lakes concealed in a blue mist, and from cold and lonely heaths, over which the deer of the forest were chased by a troop of naked barbarians. Such was the state of the Roman frontiers, and such the maxims of imperial policy from the death of Augustus to the accession of Trajan. That virtuous and active prince had received the education of a soldier, and possessed the talents of a general; his forty years of life were devoted to the service of Rome; and his virtues and active spirit were rewarded by the majesty of the state. To the strength and fierceness of barbarians, they added a contempt for life, which was derived from a warm persuasion of the immortality and transmigration of the soul. Decebalus, the Dacian king, approved himself a rival not unworthy of Trajan, by his spirit and conduct. The masters of public fortune, till, by the confession of his enemies, he had exhausted every resource both of valor and policy. This memorable war, with a very short suspension of hostilities, lasted five years; and as the emerand the vestiges of an ancient military road may still be traced from the banks of the Danube to the neighborhood of Edinburgh, a place famous in modern history, and the actual frontier of the Turkish and Russian empires. Trajan was ambitious of fame; and Conquests of Tra-be the vice of the most exalted characters. The praises of Alexander, transmitted by a succession of poets and historians, had kindled a dangerous emulation in the mind of Trajan. Like him the Roman emperor undertook, with a carelessness of the most disastrous consequences, he lamented with a sigh, that his advanced age scarcely left him any hopes of equaling the renown of the son of Philip. 1 Yet the success of Trajan, however transient, was rapid and conspicuous. The degenerate Parthians, broken by intestine discord, fled before his approach. Notwithstanding all the Roman instructions, from the mountains of Armenia to the Persian gulf. He enjoyed the honour of being the first, as he was the last, of the Roman generals, who ever navigated that remote sea. His fleets ravaged the coasts of Arabia; and Trajan vainly flattered himself that he was approaching the shores of the Persian Ocean. Every day the astonished senate received the intelligence of new names and new nations, that acknowledged his sway. They were informed that the kings of Bosphorus, Colchos, Iberia, Albania, Osroene, and even the Parthian monarch himself, had accepted their diadems from the hands of the emperor; that the independent tribes of the Macedon and Carduacan hills had implored his protection; and that the rich countries of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria, were reduced into the state of provinces. 4 But the death of Trajan soon clouded the splendid prospect; and it was justly to be dreaded, that so many distant nations would throw off the unceasing harassment to which they were now more restrained by the powerful hand which had imposed it.

Resigned by his successor Hadrian, the Capitol was founded by one of the descendants of the Roman kings, the god Terminus (who presided over boundaries, and was represented according to the fashion of that age by a large stone) alone, among all the inferior deities, refused to yield his place to Jupiter himself. A favourable inference was drawn from his obstinacy, which was interpreted by the augurs, as a sure presage that the boundaries of the Roman power would never recede. 5 During many ages, the prediction, as it is usual, contributed to its own accomplishment. But though Terminus had resisted the majesty of Jupiter, he submitted to the authority of the emperor Hadrian. 6 The resignation of all the eastern conquests of Trajan was the first measure of his reign. He restored to the Parthians the election of an independent sovereign; withdrew the Roman ambassadors who were refused the honour which they came to soliciting, of being admitted into the rank of subjects. 7

The terror of the Roman arms added weight and dignity to the moderation of the emperors. They preserved peace by a constant preparation for war; and while justice regulated their conduct, they announced to the nations on their confines, that they were as little disposed to endure, as to offer, an injury. The military strength, which it had been sufficient for Hadrian and the elder Antonines to display, was exerted against the Parthians by the Emperor Trajan. The hostilities of the barbarians provoked the resentment of that philosophic monarch, and, in the prosecution of a just defence, Marcus and his generals obtained many signal victories, both on the Euphrates, and on the Danube. 8 The military establishment of the Roman empire, which was assured either its tranquillity or its success, will now become the proper and important object of our attention. In the purer ages of the commonwealth, Military establishment of the Roman empire was a fixed article in their expectation, a property to defend, and some share in enacting those laws, which would make their station, as well as duty, to maintain. But in proportion as the public freedom was lost in extent of conquest, war was gradually increasing.

Discipline. That public virtue which among the ancients was denominated patriotism, is derived from a strong sense of our own interest in the preservation and prosperity of the free government of which we are members. Such a sentiment, which had rendered the legions of the republic almost invincible, could make but a faint impression on the luxury served for by a despotic prince; and it became necessary to supply that defect by other motives, of a different, but not less forcible nature; honour and religion. The peasant, or mechanic, imbued the useful prejudice that he was advanced to the more dignified profession of arms, in which his rank would rank, and his education depend on his own valour; and that, although the prowess of a private soldier must often escape the notice of fame, his own behaviour might sometimes confer glory or disgrace on the company, the legion, or even the army, to whose honour he was associated. On his first entrance into the service, an oath was administered to him, with every circumstance of solemnity. He promised never to desert his standard, to submit his own will to the commands of his leaders, and to sacrifice his life for the safety of the emperor and the empire.

The attachment of the Roman troops to their standards was inspired by the united influence of religion and of honour. The golden eagle, which glittered in the front of the legion, was the object of their fondest devotion; nor was it esteemed less impious, than it was ignominious, to abandon that sacred ensign in the hour of action. These motives, the strength of imagination, were enforced by fears and hopes of a more substantial kind. Regular pay, occasional donations, and a stated recompense, after the appointed time of service, alleviated the hardships of the military life; whilst, on the other hand, it was impossible for cowardice or disobedience to escape the severest punishment. The centurions were authorized to chastise with blows, the generals had a right to punish with death, and it was an inflexible maxim of Roman discipline, that a good soldier should dread his officers far more than the enemy. From such laudable and well-grounded dread of the valour of the imperial troops receive a degree of firmness and decision, which is not to be imputed by the impetuous and irregular passions of barbarians.

And yet so sensible were the Romans of the imperfection of valour without skill and practice, that, in their language, the name of an army was borrowed from the word which signified exercise. Military exercises were the important and unremitted object of their discipline. The recruits and young soldiers were constantly trained both in the morning and in the evening, nor was age or knowledge allowed to excuse the veterans from the daily repetition of manœuvres, and even of the emperors themselves were erected in the winter-quarters of the troops, that their useful labours might not receive any interruption from the most tempestuous weather; and it was carefully observed, that the arms destined to this imitation of war, should be of double the weight which was required in real action.

It is not the purpose of this work to enter into any minute description of the Roman exercises. We shall only remark, that they comprehended whatever could add strength to the body, activity to the limbs, or grace to the motions. The soldiers were diligently instructed to march, to run, to leap, to jump, to hurl, to throw, to handle every species of arms that was used either for offence or for defence, either in direct engagement or in a closer onset: to form a variety of evolutions; and to move to the sound of flutes, in the Pyrrhic or martial dance. In the midst of peace, the Roman troops were continually kept in practice, and it is prettily remarked by an ancient historian who had fought against them, that the effusion of blood was the only circumstance which distinguished a field of battle from a field of exercise. It was the policy of the imperial legion to be respectable in the eminence and improvements. The legions, rais. as they are described by Polybius, in the time of the Punic wars, differed very materially from those which achieved the victories of Caesar, or defended the monarchy of Hadrian and the Antonines. The constitution of the imperial legion may be described in a few words. The heavy-armed infantry, which composed its principal strength, was divided into ten cohorts, and fifty-five companies, under the orders of a correspondent number of tribunes and centurions. The first cohort, which always claimed the post of honour and the custody of the eagle, was formed of eleven hundred body-soldiers, the most approved for valour and fidelity. The remaining nine cohorts consisted each of five hundred and fifty-five; and the whole body of legionary infantry amounted to six thousand one hundred men. Their arms were uniform, and admirably adapted to the nature of their service: an open helmet; a light tasset, a lointed breast; a bracer, or coat of mail; greaves on their legs, and an ample buckler on their left arm. The buckler was of an oblong and concave figure, four feet in length, and two and a half in breadth, framed of a light wood, covered with a bull’s hide, and strongly guarded with plates of brass. Besides a lighter spear, the legionary soldier grasped in his right hand the formidable pilum, a ponderous javelin, whose utmost length was about six feet, and which was terminated by a massy triangular point of steel of eighteen inches. This instrument was indeed much inferior to our modern fire-arms; since it required a double charge, at the distance of only ten or twelve paces. Yet when it was launched by a firm and skilful hand, there was not any cavalry that durst venture within its reach, nor any shield or corselet that could sustain the impetuosity of its weight. As soon as the Roman had dashed his javelin, he would have advanced with a thousand strides to close with the enemy. His sword was a short well-tempered Spanish blade, that carried a double edge, and was alike suited to the purpose of striking or of pushing; but the soldier was always instructed to prefer the latter use of his weapon, as his own body with the enemy. He was likewise adapted to a more dangerous wound on his adversary. The legion was usually drawn up eight deep; and the regular distance of three feet was left between the files as well as ranks. A body of troops habituated to preserve this open order, in a long front and a rapid charge, found themselves prepared to execute every disposition which the circumstances of war, or the skill of their leader, might suggest. The soldier possessed a free space for his arms and motions, and sufficient intervals were allowed, through which seasonable reinforcements might be introduced to the relief of the exhausted and the tactics of the Macedonians were formed on very different principles. The strength of the phalanx depended on sixteen ranks of long pikes, wedged together in the closest array. But it was soon discovered by reflection, as well as by the event, that the strength of the phalanx was unable to confine the activity of the cavalry. The cavalry, without which the force of the legion would have remained imperfect, was divided into ten troops or squadrons; the first, as the companion of the first cohort, consisted of an hundred and thirty-two men; whilst each of the other nine amounted only to sixty-six. The entire es- tablishment formed a regiment, if we may use the modern expression, of seven hundred and twenty-six horse, naturally connected with its respective legion, but occasionally separated to act in the line, and to compose a part of the wings of the army. The cavalry of the emperors was no longer composed, like that of the ancient republic, of the noblest youths of Rome and Italy, who, by performing their military service on horseback, prepared themselves for the duties of senator and consul; and solicited, by deeds of valour, the future suffrages of their countrymen. Since the alteration of manners and government, the most wealthy of the equestrian order were engaged in the administration of justice, and of the revenue; and whenever they embraced the profession, they were immediately associated with a troop of horse, or a cohort of foot. The safety and honour of the empire auxiliaries, were principally entrusted to the legions. But the policy of Rome condescended to adopt every useful instrument of war. Considerable levies were regularly made among the provincials, who had not yet despised the distinction of being enrolled among the dependent princes and communities, dispersed round the frontiers, were permitted, for a while, to hold their freedom and security by the tenure of military service. Even select troops of hostile barbarians were frequently compelled or persuaded to consume their dangerous valour in remembrance of the benefit of the state. All these were included under the general name of auxiliaries; and however they might vary according to the distance of times and circumstances, their numbers were much more seldom inferior to those of the legions themselves. Among the auxiliaries, the bravest and most faithful bands were placed under the command of prefects and centurions, and severely trained in the arts of Roman discipline; but the far greater part retained those arms, to which the nature of their country, or their early habits of life, more particularly adapted them. By this institution, each of the legions had its train of war, and the number of auxiliaries was allotted, contained within itself every species of lighter troops, and of missile weapons; and was capable of encountering every nation, with the advantages of its respective arms and discipline.\(^1\) Nor was

It consisted in ten military engines of the largest, and fifty-five of a smaller size; but all of which, either in an oblique or horizontal manner, discharged stones and darts with irresistible violence.

\[^3\] Encampment. The camp of a Roman legion presented such an appearance of a fortified city. As soon as the space was marked out, the pioneers carefully levelled the ground, and removed every impediment that might interrupt its perfect regularity. Its form was an exact quadrangle; and we may calculate, that a square of about seven hundred yards was sufficient. The arrangement of the temples was considered as an emblem; though a similar number of our own troops would expose to the enemy a front of more than treble that extent. In the midst of the camp, the praetorium, or general's quarters, rose above the others; the cavalry, the infantry, and the auxiliaries, occupied their respective stations; streets were laid out, and avenues, straight, and a vacant space of about two hundred feet was left on all sides, between the tents and the rampart. The rampart itself was usually twelve feet high, armed with a line of strong and intricate palisades; and defended by a ditch of twelve feet in depth, as well as in breadth. This important labour was performed by the pedals of the legionaries themselves; to whom the use of the spade and the pick-axe was no less familiar than that of the sword or pilum. Active value may often be the present of nature; but such patience and diligence can be the fruit only of habit and discipline.\(^3\)

\[^3\] Whenever the trumpet gave the signal of departure, the camp was almost instantly broke up, and the troops fell into their ranks without delay or confusion. Besides their arms, which were loaded with their kitchen furniture, the instruments of fortification, and the provision of many days.\(^4\) Under this weight, which would oppress the delicacy of a modern soldier, they were trained by a regular step to advance, in about six hours, near twenty miles. On the appearance of an enemy, they threw aside their baggage, and by easy and rapid evolutions converted the column of march into an order of battle.\(^5\) The slingers and archers skirmished in the front; the auxiliaries formed the first line, and were seconded or sustained by the strength of the legions; the cavalry covered the flanks, and the military engines were placed in the rear.

\[^5\] See the evolutions admirably well explained by M. Guichard, \emph{Nouveaux Mémôires}, tom. i. p. 411–451. Such were the arts of war, by which the Roman emperors defended their extensive conquests, and preserved a military spirit, at a time when every other virtue was oppressed by luxury and despotism. If, in the consideration of their armies, we pass from their discipline and formation to that of their munitions, we find them with any tolerable accuracy. We may compute, however, that the legion, which was itself a body of six thousand eight hundred and thirty-one Romans, might, with its attendant auxiliaries, amount to about twelve thousand five hundred men. The peace establishment of Hadrian and his successors was about twice of no less than thirty of these formidable brigades; and most probably formed a standing force of three hundred and seventy-five thousand men. Instead of being confined within the walls of fortified cities, which the Romans considered as the refuge of weakness or pusillanimity, the legions were encamped on the banks of the great rivers, and along the frontiers of the barbarians. As their stations, for the most part, remained fixed and permanent, we may venture to describe the distribution of the troops. Three legions were sufficient for Britain. The principal strength of the empire was arrayed in a line of Roman and allied legions, in the following proportions: two in the Lower, and three in the Upper, Germany; one in Rhetia, one in Noricum, four in Pannonia, three in Mesia, and two in Dacia. The defence of the Euphrates was intrusted to eight legions, six of whom were planted in Syria, and two in Cappadocia. With regard to Egypt, Africa, and Spain, as they were far removed from any important scene of war, a single legion maintained the domestic tranquility of each of these great provinces. Even Italy was not left destitute of a military force. Above twenty thousand of these soldiers distinguished by the titles of City Cohorts and Praetorian Guards, watched over the safety of the monarch and the capital. As the authors of almost every revolution that distracted the empire, the Praetorians will, very soon, and very loudly, demand our attention; but in their arms and institutions we cannot find any circumstance which discriminated them from the legions, unless it were a more splendid appearance, and a less rigid discipline.\(^1\)

\[^1\] The navy maintained by the emperors might seem intended to their great¬ness; but it was sufficiently for every useful purpose of government. The ambition of the Romans was confined to the land; nor was that warlike people ever actuated by the enterprising spirit which had prompted the navigators of Tyre, Carthage, and even of Marseilles, to enlarge the bounds of the world, and to explore the most remote coasts of the ocean. To the Romans the ocean remained an object of terror rather than of curiosity; the whole extent of the Mediterranean, after the destruction of Carthage, and the extirpation of the pirates, was included within their great empire. The policy of the emperors was directed only to preserve the peaceful dominion of that sea, and to protect the commerce of their subjects. With these moderate views, Augustus stationed two permanent fleets in the most convenient ports of Italy, the one at Ravenna, on the Adriatic, the other at Cosa, in the bay of Naples. Experience seems at length to have convinced the ancients, that as soon as their galleys exceeded two, or at the most three, ranks of oars, they were suited rather for vain pomp than for real service. Augustus himself, in the victory of Actium, had seen the ineffectivity of his own light frigates (they were called Liburnians) over the Lucianians; and the sea-coasts had been covered by the flourishing colonies of the Greeks. We may remark, that when Augustus divided Italy into eleven regions, the little territory of Dalmatia, which was annexed to that seat of Roman sovereignty, was included under the provinces of Illyria, Noricum, Pannonia, Dalmatia, Dacia, Maesia, Thrace, Macedonia, and Greece.

The province of Illyria, which soon extinguished the name of the Vindelicians, was extended from the summit of the Alps to the banks of the Danube; from its source, as far as its confluence with the Inn. The greatest part of the flat country is subject to the elector of Bavaria; the city of Augusta was founded by the constitution of the German empire; the Grisonian Alps are their principal mountains, and the country of Tyrol is ranked among the numerous provinces of the house of Austria.

Noricum and Pannonia: included between the Inn, the Danube, and the Save; Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, the Lower Hungary, and Sclavonia, was also known to the ancients under the names of Noricum and Pannonia. In their original state of independence, their fierce inhabitants were intimately connected. Under the Roman government they were frequently united, and they now form the part of a single family. They now own the residence of a German prince, who styles himself Emperor of the Romans, and forms the centre, as well as the strength, of the Austrian power. It may not be improper to observe, that if we except Bohemia, Moravia, the northern shores of Austria, and a part of Hungary, between the Save and the Danube, all the other dominions of the House of Austria were comprised within the limits of the Roman empire.

Dalmatia, to which the name of Illyricum more properly belonged, was a long, but narrow strip, between the Adriatic and the Ionian Sea. The best part of the sea-coast, which still retains its ancient appellation, is a province of the Venetian state, and the seat of the little republic of Ragusa. The inland parts have assumed the Scelvonian names of Croatia and Bosnia; the former obeys an Austrian governor, the latter a Turkish pasha; but the whole country is still infested by tribes of barbarians, whose savage independence irregularly marks the doubtful limit of the Christian and mahometan power.

The Danube was divided Masia and Dacia. After the Danube had received the waters of the Save, the Teyca, and the Save, it received, at least among the Greeks, the name of Istros. It formerly divided Masia and Dacia, the latter of which, as we have already seen, was a conquest of Trajan, and the only province beyond the river. If we inquire into the present state of those countries, we shall find that on the left hand of the Danube, Transylvania and Transylvania have been annexed, after many revolutions, to the crown of Hungary; whilst the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia acknowledge the suzerainty of the Ottomans. On the right hand of the Danube, Maesia, which, during the middle ages, was broken into the barbarian kingdoms of Servia and Bulgaria, is again united in Turkish slavery. The appellation of Roumelia, which is, Thrace, Maesia, and Servia, preserves the memory of their ancient state under the Roman empire. In the time of the Antones, the martial regions of Thrace, from the mountains of Hermus and Rhodope, to the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, had assumed the form of a province. Notwithstanding the change of masters, and the revolution, the new city of Rome, founded by Constantine on the banks of the Bosphorus, has ever since remained the capital of a great monarchy. The kingdom of Macedonia, which, under the reign of Alexander, gave laws to Asia, derived more solid advantages from the policy of the two Philipps; and with its dependences of Epirus and Thessaly, extended from the Aegean to the Ionian sea. When we reflect on the fame of Thebes and Argos, of Sparta and Athens, we can scarcely persuade ourselves, that so many immortal republics of ancient Greece were lost in a single province which, from the superior influence of the Achaean league, was usually denominated the province of Achaia.

Such was the state of Europe under the Roman emperors. The provinces of Asia, without excepting the transient conquests of Trajan, were all comprised within the limits of the Turkish power. But, instead of following the arbitrary divisions of despotism and ignorance, it will be safer for us, as well as more agreeable, to observe the indelible characters of nature. The name of Asia Minor is attributed to the country which, from the superior influence of the Achaean league, was usually denominated the province of Achaia.

The name of Asia Minor is attributed to the country which, from the superior influence of the Achaean league, was usually denominated the province of Achaia.
Syria. The former of these was a narrow and rocky coast; the latter was a territory scarcely superior to Wales, either in fertility or extent. Yet Phoenicia and Palestine will forever live in the memory of mankind; since America, as well as Europe, has received letters from the one, and religion from the other. A sale of the fruits of the soil, of wood and water skins, along the doubtful confines of Syria, from the Euphrates to the Red Sea. The wandering life of the Arabs was inseparably connected with their independence; and wherever, on some spots less barren than the rest, they ventured to form any settled habitation, they soon became subjects to a master.

The geographers of antiquity have frequently hesitated to what portion of the globe they should ascribe Egypt. By its situation that celebrated kingdom is included within the immense peninsula of Africa; but it is accessible only on the side of Asia, whose revolutions, in almost every change of history, Egypt has humbly obeyed. A Roman prefect was set on the splendid throne of the Ptolemies; and the iron sceptre of the Manulakes is now in the hands of a Turkish Pasha. The Nile flows down the country, above five hundred miles from the. The emigrations, as the extent of fertility by the measure of its inundations. Cyrene, situated towards the west, and along the sea-coast, was first a Greek colony, after wards a province of Egypt, and is now lost in the desert of Barca.

From Cyrene to the ocean, the coast of Africa extends above fifteen hundred miles; yet so closely is it pressed between the Mediterranean and the Sahara, or sandy desert, that its breadth seldom exceeds fourscore or an hundred miles. The coastal districts was especially the more peculiar and proper province of Africa. Till the arrival of the Phoenicians, that fertile country was inhabited by the Libyans, the most savage of mankind. Under the immediate jurisdiction of Carthage, it became the centre of commerce and empire; but the republic of Carthage is now degenerating into the feeble and disunited states of the Barbary and Tunisia. The military government of Algiers oppresses the wide extent of Numidia, as it was once united under Massinissa and Jugurtha: but in the time of Augustus, the limits of Numidia were contracted; and at least two thirds of the country acquiesced in the name of Mauritania. The genuine Mauritanian, or country of the Moors, which, from the ancient city of Tingi, or Tangier, was distinguished by the appellation of Tingitan, is represented by the modern kingdom of Fez. Salé, on the ocean, so infamous at present for its piratical depredations, was, as the extent of fertility by the measure of its inundations. A city of their foundation may still be discovered near Mequinez, the residence of the barbarian whom we condescend to style the Emperor of Morocco; but it does not appear that his more southern dominions, Morocco itself, and Spanish Morocco, were ever conquered within the Roman province. The western parts of Africa are intersected by the branches of mount Atlas, a name so idly celebrated by the fancy of poets; but which is now diffused over the immense ocean that rolls between the ancient and the new continent.

Having now finished the sketch of the Mediterranean empire, on the Nile, we may observe, that the Nile basin is divided from Spain by a narrow strip of about twelve miles, through which the Atlantic flows into the Mediterranean. The columns of Herodotus, so famous among the ancients, were two mountains which seemed to have been torn asunder by some convulsion of the elements; and at the foot of the European mountain, the fortress of Gibraltar is now seated. The whole extent of the Mediterranean Sea, its coasts, and its islands, were comprised within the Roman dominion. Of the larger islands, the two Baleares, which derive their name of Majorca and Minorca from the respective size of the mountains upon them, the former to Spain, the latter to Britain. It is easier to deplore the fate, than to describe the actual condition of Corsica. Two Italian sovereigns assume a regal title from Sardinia and Sicily. Crete, or Candia, with Cyprus, and most of the smaller islands of Greece and Asia, have been subdued by the Turk and, according to P. Aretinus, being frightened at the sight of a lion, he ordered a cry and suddenly recovered the use of speech. He took possession of the hill Cyra, and built upon it the city Cyrene. This colony soon attained a high degree of splendour. Its history and inscriptions, which are still extant; after it had passed, from Ptolemy the elder to Ptolemy Euergetes and from Ptolemy Euergetes to Ptolemy Lagus, called Sostr, made itself master of Cyrenaica, which belonged to his successors until Ptolemy Aeon gave it by will to the Romans, who, uniting it to Crete, formed of them a new province. A Son of Cyrene was called Apollonius, it is now called Alarcon or Son, which from the name of the city which bore the name of Son was situated during the time of the lower empire. Some rays of Cyrene reappeared the name in the second period; the country being devoted to its origin by the falsity of antiquity is related by recent and modern authors. There is another Heron, book iv. 150, which is the same as the former. Such is the name of Thamus, who is ascribed to Cyrenaica, who was the son of Cyprianus, in the notes of Suidas, and Ptolomæus Berosus, 43; Justin xii. 3, D'Aubine, Grosset, ass. vol. iii, p. 39; 150, which is the same as that of the Greek historian, Diodorus Siculus, 43; 3, D'Aubine, Grosset, ass. vol. iii, p. 39. The letter, moderate height, and genteel discripcion of mount Atlas, (see Shaw's Travels, p. 25) are very unlike a solitary mountain which rises from the sea, and extends its lead into the ocean. The peak of Tonnasc, on the contrary, forms a large and a half above the surface of the sea, and appears to be a true mountain, which might engage the notice of the Greek poets. See Beppo, Historia Natuish arms; whilst the little rock of Malta defies their power, and has emerged, under the government of its military Order, into fame and opulence.

General idea of the Roman empire: whose broken fragments have formed so many powerful kingdoms, might almost induce us to forgive the vanity or ignorance of the ancients. Dazzled with the extensive sway, the irresistible strength, and the real or affected moderation of the emperors, they permitted themselves to despise, and sometimes to forget, the outlying countries which had been left in the enjoyment of a barbarous independence; and they gradually usurped the licence of confounding the Roman monarchy with the globe of the earth. \(^1\) But the temper, as well as knowledge, of a modern people, will perhaps not be sufficient to expunge a certain innate language. He may impress a juster image of the greatness of Rome, by observing that the empire was above two thousand miles in breadth, from the wall of Antoninus and the northern limits of Dacia, to mount Atlas and the tropic of Cancer; that it extended, in length, more than three thousand miles, from the Western ocean to the Euphrates; that it was situated in the finest part of the temperate zone, between the twenty-fourth and fifty-sixth degrees of northern latitude; and that it was supposed to contain above sixteen hundred thousand square miles, for the most part of fertile and well cultivated land.

CHAPTER II

Of the union and internal prosperity of the Roman Empire in the age of the Antonines.

Principles of government. It is not alone by the rapidity, or extent of conquest, that we should estimate the greatness of Rome. The sovereign of the Russian deserts commands a larger portion of the globe. In the seventh summer after his passage of the Hellespont, Alexander erected the Macedonian trophies on the banks of the Hyphasis. \(^2\) Within less than a century, the irresistible Zingis, and the Mogul princes of his race, spread their cruel devastations and transient empire, from the sea of China, to the confines of Egypt and Mescopotamia; and yet the firm edifice was raised and preserved by the wisdom of ages. The obedient provinces of Trajan and the Antonines were united by laws, and adorned by arts. They might occasionally suffer from the partial abuse of delegated authority; but the general principle of government was wise, simple, and beneficent. They enjoyed the religion of their ancestors, whilst in civil honours and advantages they were exalted, by just degrees, to an equality with their conquerors.

Universal spirit of toleration. The policy of the emperors and the senate, as far as it concerned religion, was happily seconded by the reflections of the enlightened philosophers, and by the habits of the superstitious, part of their subjects. The various modes of worship, which prevailed in the Roman world, were all considered by the people, as equally true; by the philosopher as equally speculative; and by the magistrate as equally useful. And thus toleration produced not only mutual indulgence, but even religious concord.

The superstition of the people was not imbedded by any mixture of theological rancour; nor was it confined by the chains of any speculative system. The devout philosopher, though fondly attached to his national rites, admitted with implicit faith the different religions of the earth. \(^3\) Fear, gratitude, and curiosity, a dream or an omen, a singular disorder, or a distant journey, perpetually disposed him to multiply the articles of his belief, and to enlarge the list of his protectors. The thin texture of the genius of the Nile. The visible powers of nature, the planets, and the elements, were the same throughout the universe. The invisible governors of the moral world were inevitably cast in a similar mould of fiction and allegory. Every virtue, and even vice, acquired an immortal and divinized existence; every natural object was the patron, whose attributes, in the most distant ages and countries, were uniformly derived from the character of their peculiar votaries. A republic of gods of such opposite temperaments and interest required, in every system, the moderating hand of a supreme magistrate, who, in the progress of knowledge and flattery, was gradually invested with the sublime perfections of an Eternal Parent, and an Omnipotent Monarch. \(^4\) Such was the mild spirit of antiquity, that the nations were less attentive to the difference, than to the resemblance, of their religious worship. The Greek, the Roman, the Indian, and the Chinese, in the same temple offered the same altars, easily persuaded themselves, that under various names, and with various ceremonies, they adored the same deities. The elegant mythology of Homer gave a beautiful and almost a regular form to the polytheism of the ancient world. \(^5\) The undying names of Greece dedicated their morals from the nature of man, rather than from that of God. They meditated, however, on the Divine nature, as a very curious and important speculation; and in the profound inquiry, they displayed the strength and weakness of the human understanding. \(^6\) Of the four most celebrated schools, the Stoics and the Platonists endeavoured to reconcile the jarring interests of reason and piety. They have left us the most sublime proofs of the existence and perfections of the first cause; but as it was impossible for them to conceive the creation of matter, the workman in the Stoic philosophy was not sufficiently distinguished from the work; whilst, on the contrary, the spiritual God of Plato and his disciples, resembled an idea, rather than a substance. The opinions of the Academics and Epicureans, from no exact part, restored to Athens, and the other seats of learning in the Roman empire, were alike instructed in every school to reject and to despise the religion of the multitude. How, indeed, was it possible, that a philosopher should accept, as divine truths, the idle tales of the poets, and the incoherent traditions of antiquity? Avarice and taste very frequently despoiled the vanquished nations of the ec.

In the provinces, the gods, and the rich ornaments of their temples; but, in the exercise of the religion which they derived from their ancestors, they uniformly experienced, and even protection, from every Roman conqueror. The province of Gaul seems, and indeed only seems, an exception to this universal toleration. Under the specious pretext of abolishing human sacrifices, the emperors Tiberius and Claudius suppressed the dangerous powers of the druids; but the priests themselves, their gods and their altars, subsisted in peaceful obscurity till the final destruction of Paganism.

Rome, the capital of a great monarchy, was incessantly filled with subjects and strangers from every part of the world, who all introduced and enjoyed the favourite superstitions of their country. The ancients, in the service of the gods, were instructed in maintaining the purity of their ancient ceremonies; and the Roman senate, using the common privilege, sometimes interposed, to check this inundation of foreign rites. The Egyptian superstition, of all the most contemptible and abject, was frequently prohibited; the temples of Isis and Serapis at length assumed the place among the Roman gods, that were thus indulged a departure from the old maxims of government. In the purest ages of the commonwealth, Cybele and Cœcilius had been invited by solemn embassies; and it was customary to tempt the protectors of besieged cities, by the promise of more distinguished honours than they possessed in their native country. Rome gradually became the common temple of her subjects; and the freedom of the city was bestowed on all the gods of mankind.

II. The narrow policy of preserving freedom. Of Rome, without any foreign mixture, the pure blood of the ancient citizens, had checked the fortune, and hastrusted the power of Athens and Sparta. The aspiring genius of Rome sacrificed vanity to ambition, and deemed it more prudent, as well as honourable, to adopt virtue and merit for their own overthrow; were found, among slaves or strangers, enemies or protectors of themselves, the useful persuasion, that, either in this or in a future life, the crime of perjury is most assuredly punished by the avenging gods. 1

After the death of Caesar, it was restored at the public expense, (Dion. l. i. vii. 503.) In 492, when Augustus was in Egypt, he revered the majesty of Serapis, (Dion. l. v. 642.) but in the Pompeian of Rome, and a mile round it, he prohibited the worship of the Egyptian gods, (Dion. l. ii. p. 676.) barbarians. During the most flourishing era of the Athenian commonwealth, the number of citizens gradually decreased from about thirty to twenty-one thousand, and the same condition, we may conjecture, was that of the Roman Republic, where the growth of its area and autonomy, from the Samnites to the Romans, enabled it to resist the designs of Catiline, and enabled her to contend with Athens for the palaces of eloquence.

The provinces of the empire (as they have been described in the preceding chapter) were destitute of any public force, or constitutional freedom. In truth, the first care of the Senate was to dissolve those dangerous confederacies, which taught mankind, that, as the Roman arms prevailed by division, they might be resisted by union. Those princes, whose estimation of gratitude or generosity permitted for a while to hold a preference for the Roman yoke, were dismissed from their place as soon as they had performed their appointed task of fashioning to the yoke the vanquished nations. The free states and cities which had embraced the cause of Rome were rewarded with a nominal alliance, and insensibly sunk into real servitude. The public authority was every where exercised by the ministers of the Senate and of the emperors, and that authority was absolute, and without control. But the same salutary maxims of government, which had secured the peace and obedience of Italy, were extended to the most distant conquests. A nation of Romans was gradually formed, which they received the reward of their services in land or in money, usually settled, with their families, in the country where they had honourably spent their youth. Throughout the empire, but more particularly in the western parts, the most fertile districts and the most convenient situations, were reserved for the soldiers, of whom the number, which were of a civil, and others of a military, nature. In their manners and internal policy, the colonies formed a perfect representation of their great parent; and they were soon endeared to the natives by the ties of friendship and alliance, they effectually diffused a reverence for the Roman name, and a desire, which was seldom disappointed, of sharing, in due time, its honours and advantages. The municipal cities insensibly equalled the rank and splendour of the colonies; and in the reign of Hadrian, it was disputed which was the preferable condition, of those societies which had issued from, or which had been re-

Italian. Till the privileges of Romans had been progressively extended to all the inhabitants of the empire, an important distinction was preserved between Italy and the provinces. The former was esteemed the centre of public unity, and the firm basis of Roman constitution. Italy claimed the birth, or at least, the residence, of the emperors and the Senate. The estates of the Italians were exempt from taxes, their persons from the arbitrary jurisdiction of governors. Their municipal corporations, formed after the perfect model of the capital, were intrusted, under the immediate eye of the sovereign, with the execution of the laws. From the foot of the Alps to the extremity of Calabria, all the natives of Italy were born citizens of Rome. Their partial distinctions were obliterated, and they insensibly coalesced into one great nation, united by language, manners, and civil and religious institutions, equal to the weight of a powerful empire. The republic gloried in her generous policy, and was frequently rewarded by the merit and services of her adopted sons. Had she always confined the distinction of Romans to the ancient families within the walls of the city, that immortal name would have been deprived of some of its noblest ornaments. Virgil was a native of Mantua; Horace was inclined to doubt whether he should call himself an Apulian or a Lucanian: it was in Padua that an historian was found worthy to record the majestic series of Roman victories. The patriotic family of the Catons emerged from Tusculum; and the little town of Arpinum claimed the double honour of producing Marius and Cicero, the former of whom deserved, after Romulus and Camillus, to be styled the Third Founder of Rome.

7. Cæsar, de Bello Civ. lib. iii. 9. It may be supposed that they had to have one-third of their own landed property in Italy. See Plin. vi. c. 19. The qualification was reduced by Marcus Aurelius.
8. Since the reign of Trajan, Italy had sunk nearer to the level of the provinces.
Sequel to another. The same as it was called, conferred on the cities to which it had been granted, a more partial favour. The magistrates only, at the expiration of their office, as assumed the quality of Roman citizens; but as those offices were annual, in a few years they circulated round the principal families. Those of the provincials who were permitted to exercise any civil employment; all, in a word, who performed any public service, or displayed any personal talents, were rewarded with a present, whose value was continually diminished by the increasing liberality of the emperors. Yet even, in the age of Tiberius, the use of free men was still sanctioned by laws. This favours were bestowed on the greater number of their subjects, it was still accompanied with very solid advantages. The bulk of the people acquired, with that title, the benefit of the Roman laws, particularly in the interesting articles of marriage, testaments, and inheritances; and the road of fortune was open to those whose pretensions were seconded by favour or merit.
The grandsons of the Gauls, who had besieged Julius Caesar in Alesia, commanded legions, governed provinces, and were admitted into the Senate of Rome.
Their ambition, instead of disturbing the profitability of the State, was intimately connected with its safety and glory.

Division of the Latin and the Greek provinces.

So sensible were the Romans of the Greek provinces, that it was their most serious care to extend, with the progress of their arms, the use of the Latin tongue. The ancient dialects of Italy, the Sabine, the Etruscan, and the Venetian, sunk into oblivion; but in the provinces, the east was less distant than the west to the voice of its victorious predecessors. This obvious difference marked the two portions of the empire with a distinction of colours, which, though it was in some degree concealed during the meridian splendour of prosperity, became gradually more visible, as the shades of night descended upon the Roman world.
The western countries were civilized by the same hands which subdued them. As soon as the barbarians were reconciled to obedience, their minds were opened to any new impres-ion, to knowledge and liberty. The language of Virgil and Cicero, though with some inevitable mixture of corruption, was so universally adopted in Africa, Spain, Gaul, Britain, and Pannonia, that the ftant traces of the Punic or Celtic idoms were preserved only in the mountains, or among the peasnants. The foreign language became familiar to the natives of those countries with the sentiments of Romans; and Italy gave fashions, as well as laws, to her Latin provincials. They solicited with more ardour, and obtained with more facility, the freedom and honours of the state; supported the national dignity in letters and in arms; and, at length, in the person of Trajan, produced an emperor whom the Scipios would not have disowned for their countryman. The situation of the Greeks was very different from that of the barbarians. The former had been long since civilized and corrupted. They had too much taste to relinquish their language, and too much vanity to adopt any foreign institutions. Still preserving the prejudices, after they lost the virtues, of their ancestors, they affected to despise the unpol-mannered manners of the Roman conquerors, whilst they were compelled to respect their superior wisdom and power. Nor was the influence of the Greek language and sentiments confined to the narrow limits of their empire; for, even before the progress of colonies and conquest, had been diffused from the Hadratic to the Euphrates and the Nile. Asia was covered with Greek cities, and the long reign of the Macedonian kings had introduced a silent revolution into Syria and Egypt. In their pompous courts those princes united the elegance of Athens with the luxury of the East, and the example of the court was imitated, at a humble distance, by the higher ranks of their subjects. Such was the general division of the Roman empire into the Latin and Greek languages. To these we may add a third distinction for the body of the natives in Syria, and especially in Egypt. The use of the ancient idoms among them from the commixture of mankind, checked the improvements of those barbarians.1 The slothful efficency of the former exposed them to the contempt, the sulen ferociousness of the latter excited the aversion, of the conquerors.2 Those nations had submitted to the Roman power, but they seldom desired or deserved the freedom of the city; and it was remarked, that more than two hundred and thirty years elapsed after the ruin of the Ptolemies, before an Egyptian was admitted into the senate of Rome.3

It is a just though trite observation, General use of that victorious Rome was herself subject to both languages duced by the arts of Greece. Those immortal writers who still command the admiration of modern Europe, some at the favourite object of study and imitation in Italy and the western provinces. But the elegant amusements of the Romans were not suffered to interfere with the national maxims of the empire; whilst they acknowledged the charms of the Greek, they asserted the dignity of the Latin, tongue, and the excclusive use of the latter was inflexibly maintained in the administration of civil as well as military government.4 The two languages exercised at the same time their separate functions in the empire; the former, as the natural idiom of science; the latter, as the legal dialect of public transactions. Those who united letters with business were equally conversant with both; and it was almost impossible, in any province, to find a Roman subject, of a liberal education, who was not on a stranger to the Greek and the Latin language.

It was by such institutions that the nanations of the empire insensibly melted away into the Roman name and people. But there still remained, in the centre of every province and of every family, a number of men, who, from the condition of their situation, and the weight of the benefits, without sharing the benefits, of society. In the free states of antiquity, the domestic slaves were exposed to the wanton rigour of despo-
ism. The perfect settlement of the Roman empire

Their treatment was preceded by ages of violence and rapine. The slaves consisted, for the most part, of barbarian captives, taken in thousands by the chance of war, purchased at a vile price, and placed under a system of laws, independent of all other authority, to break and to revenge their fetters. Against such internal enemies, whose desperate insurrections had more than once reduced the republic to the brink of destruction, the most severe regulations, and the most cruel treatment, seemed almost justified by the great law of self-preservation. But when the principal nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa, were united under the laws of one sovereign, the source of foreign supplies of slaves being impeded, the less criminal Romans were reduced to the milder but more tedious method of propagation. In their numerous families, and particularly in their country estates, they encouraged the marriage of their slaves. The sentiments of nature, the habits of education, and the possession of a dependent species of property, contributed to alleviate the hardships of servitude. The existence of a slave became an object of greater value, and though his happiness still depended on the temper and circumstances of the master, the humanity of the latter, instead of being restrained by fear, was encouraged by the sentiments of benevolence. The manners were accelerated by the virtue or policy of the emperors; and by the edicts of Hadrian and the Antonines, the protection of the laws was extended to the most abject part of mankind. The jurisdiction of the courts over the slave was no longer confined to their domestic的作用, but extended to all the rights and privileges of the master over the slave, and the protection of the laws became less objectionable to peace and humanity. Enfranchisement, however, was not denied to the Roman slave; and if he had any opportunity of rendering himself either useful or agreeable, he might very naturally expect that the diligence and fidelity of a few years would be rewarded with the inestimable gift of freedom. The slavery of the Middle Ages was so frequently prompted by the meaner suggestions of vanity and avarice, that the laws found it more necessary to restrain than to encourage a profuse and undistinguishing liberality, which might degenerate into a very dangerous abuse. It was a maxim among the ancients, that a slave had no country of his own; and he acquired with his liberty an admission into the political society of which his patron was a member. The consequences of this maxims would have prostituted the privileges of personal freedom to a multitude of promiscuous multitudes. Some exceptions were therefore provided; and the honourable distinction was confined to such slaves only as, for just causes, and with the approbation of the magistrate, should receive a solemn and legal manumission. Even these chosen exceptions were subject to the restraints of servitude, and were rigorously excluded from civil or military honours. Whatever might be the merit or fortune of their sons, they likewise were esteemed unworthy of a seat in the Senate; nor were the trances of a servile origin allowed to be completely obliterated till the third or fourth generation. Without the nature can develop themselves, and habits of education become mild and peaceful, we may not attribute to causes of inclination, or even without energy, effects, which, in order to be explained, must be traced to more powerful principles; and, since small causes may have the effect of an equal, and, perhaps, even exceeding proportion of any great cause, it is not improbable that the prevailing influence of some general spirit in the world, or of the whole class of human actions, may have been a cause of the propagation of this servile condition; for had not knowledge been so early and so generally imparted to the ancients, would their notions of the exercise of power nourish among the great, and the practice of oppression cause springs up among the wretched. It is not the spirit of the Gospel that preaches the freedom of the Christian religion which, more powerful than all the preceding, was destined to destroy the last vestiges of servitude. It is evident that the rule of the Church, which Christianity dictated were mild and benevolent; its precepts guard the dignity of individuals, and exalt the glory of their masters, that they were permitted the dignity of servitude. The children of slaves were the property of the master, who could dispose of them as he wished. Is it in such a situation, and in such a state of dependence that the sentiments of THE DECLINE AND FALL. Chap. II. 26 stroying the distinction of ranks, a distant prospect of freedom and honours was presented, even to those whom pride and prejudice almost disdained to number among the human species.

It was once proposed to discriminate the slaves of a particular rank, but it was justly apprehended that there might be some danger in acquainting them with their own numbers. Without interpreting, in their utmost strictness, the liberal appellations of legions and myriads, we may venture to pronounce, that the proportion of slaves, who were valued as property, was more considerable than is commonly supposed, and that the sum computed only as an expense. The youths of a promising genius were instructed in the arts and sciences, and their price was ascertained by the degree of their skill and talents. Almost every profession, either liberal or mechanical, might be found in the household of an opulent senator. The ministers of pomp and sensuality were multiplied beyond the conception of modern luxury. It was more for the interest of the merchant or manufacturer to purchase than to hire his workmen; and in the country, slaves were employed as the cheapest and most laborious instruments of agriculture. We have reason to believe against the general observation, and to display the multitude of slaves, we might allege a variety of particular instances. It was discovered, on a very melancholy occasion, that four hundred slaves were maintained in a single palace of Rome. The same number of four hundred belonged to the same chief of architecture, governed by the Roman magistrates, how many have escaped the notice of history! how few have resisted the ravages of time and barbarism! and yet even the majestic ruins that are still scattered over Italy and the provinces, would be sufficient to prove, that those countries were once the seat of a polite and powerful empire. Their greatness alone, or the bare mention of their eminence, is a sufficient recommendation; but they are rendered more interesting, by two important circumstances, which connect the agreeable history of these provinces, with the more useful history of human manners. Many of those works were erected at private expense, and almost all were intended for public benefit.

It is natural to suppose that the greatest number, as well as the most considerable, of the Roman edifices, were raised by the emperors, who possessed so unbounded a command both of men and money. Augustus was the first of that line who had accomplished so great an undertaking, and that he had left it of marble. The strict economy of Vespasian was the source of his magnificence. The works of Trajan bear the stamp of his genius. The public monuments with which Hadrian adorned every province of the empire, were executed not only by his orders, but under his immediate inspection. He was himself an artist, and he loved the arts, as they conducted to the glory of the monarchy. They were encouraged by the Antonines, as they contributed to the happiness of the people. But if the emperors were the first, they were not the only, architects of their domestic glory. Those two centuries were extensively imitated by their principal subjects, who were not afraid of declaring to the world that they had spirit to conceive, and wealth to accomplish, the noblest Augustus built in Rome the temple and forum of Mars the Avenger; the temple of Jupiter Tonans in the Capitol; that of Apollo Palaestinum, with public libraries; the portico and statues of Caius and Lucius, the peristyle of the Theater of Miletus; and the theatre of Marcellus. The example of the sovereign was imitated by his ministers and generals; and his friend Agrippa left behind him the immortal monument the Pantheon. undertakings. Scarcely had the proud structure of the Colosseum been dedicated at Rome, before the edifices of similar kind, and the same design of materials, were erected for the use, and at the expense, of the cities of Capua and Verona. The inscription of the stupendous bridge of Alcantara, attests that it was thrown over the Tagus by the contribution of a few Lusitanian communities. When Fliny was instructed with the government of Bithynia and Pontus, provinces by no means the richest or most considerable of the empire, he found the cities within his jurisdiction striving with each other in every useful and ornamental work, that might deserve the curiosity of strangers, or the gratitude of their citizens. It was therefore natural that he should consult in order to direct their taste, and sometimes to moderate their expenditure. The opulent senators of Rome and the provinces esteemed it an honour, and almost an obligation, to adorn the splendour of their age and country; and the influence of fashion very frequently supplied the want of taste or generosity. Among a crowd of these private benefactors, we may select Herodes Atticus, an Athenian citizen, who lived in the age of the Antonines. Whatever might be the motive of his conduct, his magnificence would have been worthy of the greatest kings.

Example.

The family of Herod, at least after Bithynia Atticus, had it been favoured by fortune, was lineally descended from Cimon and Miltiades, Theseus and Cecrops, Theseus and Jupiter. But the posterity of so many gods and heroes was fallen into the most abject state. His grandfather had suffered by the bands of justice, and Julius Atticus, his father, having ended his life in poverty and contempt, had he not discovered an immense treasure, buried under an old house, the last remains of his patrimony. According to the rigour of law, the emperor might have asserted his claim, and the prudent Atticus prevented, by a frank concession, the effluxion of the sovereigns' prerogatives. But the equitable Nerva, who then filled the throne, refused to accept any part of it, and commanded him to use, without scruple, the present of fortune. The cautious Atticus still insisted that the treasure was too considerable for a subject, and that he knew not how to use it. Abuse it, then, replied the monarch, with a good-natured peculiarity; for it is your own.

Many will be of opinion that Atticus literally obeyed the emperor's last instructions, since he expended the greatest part of his fortune, which was much increased by an advantageous marriage, in the service of the public; yet it can bear the analysis of it. Herod the most splendid hunter of the free cities of Asia; and the young magistratate, observing that the town of Troas was indifferently supplied with water, obtained from the munificence of Hadrian, three hundred nautriads of drachms (about a hundred thousand pounds) for the construction of a new aqueduct. But in the execution of the work, the charge amounted to more than double the estimate, and the officers of the revenue began to murmur, till the generous Atticus silenced their complaints, by requesting that he might be permitted to take upon himself the whole additional expense.

His reputation. Asia had been invited by liberal rewards to direct the education of young Herod. Their pupil soon became a celebrated orator, according to the useless rhetoric of that age, which, confining itself to the schools, disdain'd to visit either the forum or the senate. He was honoured with the consulship at Rome; but the greatest part of his life was spent in a little province, surrounded by his adjacent villas; perpetually surrounded by sylvanists, who acknowledged, without reluctance, the superiority of a rich and generous rival. The monuments of his genius have perished; some considerable ruins still preserve the fame of his taste and munificence; modern travellers have measured the remains of the stadium which he constructed at Athens. It was six hundred feet in length, built entirely of white marble, capable of admitting the whole body of the people, and finished in four years, whilst Herod was president of the Athenian games. To the memory of his wife Regilia, he dedicated their deficiency so skilfully, that the walls on the west, except ecliped by a very considerable carvings, was employed in any part of the building. The Odeum, designed by Pericles for musical performances, and the theatrical of new tragedies, had been a trophy of the victory of the arts over barbaric greatness; as the timbers employed in the construction consisted chiefly of the masts of the Persian vessels. Notwithstanding the repairs bestowed on that ancient edifice by a king of Cappadocia, it was again fallen to decay. Herod restored its ancient beauty and magnificence. Nor was the liberality of that illustrious citizen confined to the walls of Athens. The most splendid edifice, which stood on the temple of Neptune in the isthmus, a theatre at Corinth, a stadium at Delphi, a bath at Thermopylia, and an aqueduct at Canusium in Italy, were insufficient to exhaust his treasures. The people of Epirus, Thessaly, Uebea, Bocotia, and Peloponnesus, experienced his favours in the inscriptions of the cities of Greece and Asia gratefully style Herodes Atticus their patron and benefactor.

In the commonwealths of Athens and Rome, the modest simplicity of private houses announced the equal condition of their inhabitants. The greatest of all the public buildings was represented in the majestic edifices designed to the public use; nor was this republic spirit totally extinguished by the introduction of wealth and monarchy. It was in works of national honour and benefit, that the most virtuous of the emperors displayed the magnificence of their age. The golden palace of Nero excited a just indignation, but the vast extent of ground which had been usurped by his selfish luxury, was more nobly filled under the succeeding reigns by the Colosseum, the baths of Titus, the Claudian portico, and the temples dedicated to the golden diadem. To these the genius of Herod the third of the line has added; and the monuments of architecture, the property of the Roman people, were adorned with the most beautiful productions of Greekian painting and sculpture; and in the temple of Peace, a very curious library was open to the curiosity of the learned. At a small distance from thence was situated the forum of Trajan. It was surrounded with a lofty portico, in the form of a quadrangle, into which four triumphal arches opened a noble and spacious entrance: in the centre arose a column of marble, whose height, of one hundred and ten feet, denoted the elevation of the hill that had been cut out for the purpose. The other quarters of the capitals subsisted in its ancient beauty, exhibited an exact representation of the Dacian victories of its founder. The veteran soldier contemplated the story of his own campaigns, and by an easy illusion of national vanity, the peaceful citizen associated himself to the honours of the triumph.

All their strength, both moral and material, was lost with the vanquished of the empire, were embellished by the same liberal spirit of public magnificence, and were filled with amphitheatres, theatres, temples, porticoes, triumph-phal arches, baths, and aqueducts, all variously conductive to the health, the devotion, and the pleasures of the meanest citizen. The last mentioned of those decrees deserve our peculiar attention. The boldness of the enterprise, the solidity of the execution, and the uses to which they were subservient, mark the aque-ducts among the noblest monuments of Roman genius and power. The aqueducts of the capital claim a just pre-emience; but the curious traveller, who, without the assistance of books, walks the streets of Metz, or of Segovia, would very naturally conclude, that those provincial towns had formerly been the residence of some potent monarch. The solitudes of Asia and Africa were once covered with flourishing cities, whose population, and even whose existence, was derived from the artificial supplies of a perennial stream of fresh water.6

We have computed the inhabitants, and contemplated the public works, of the Roman empire. The observation of the number and greatness of its cities will serve to confirm this formation, and to multiply the latter. It may not be unpleasing to collect a few scattered instances relative to that subject, without forgetting, however, that from the vanity of nations and the poverty of language, the vague appellation of city has been indifferently bestowed on Rome and upon Laodicea. It is said to have contained eleven hundred and ninety-seven cities; and for whatsoever era of antiquity the expression might be intended, there is not any reason to believe the country less populous in the age of the Antonines, than in that of Romulus. The petty states of Latium were contained within the metropolis of Rome, by whose populous and magnificent they had been attracted. Those parts of Italy which have so long languished under the lazy tyranny of priests and viceroys, had been afflicted only by the more tolerable calamities of war; and the first symptoms of decay which they experienced, were simply exhibited by the rapid improvements of the Cisal-pine Gaul. The splendour of Verona may be traced in its remains; yet Verona was less celebrated than

Gaul and Spain.7

II. The spirit of improvement had passed the Alps, and was felt even in the woods of Britain, which were gradually improved by the gradual opening of a free space for convenient and elegant habitation. York was the scant of government; London was already enriched by commerce; and Bath was celebrated for the salutary effects of its medicinal waters. Gaul could boast of her twelve hundred cities; and though, in the

II. The view seems doubled. Our number of cities, we lay fer that in his time it had no bounds. Besides, we are not obliged to apply this number to the time of Romulus. It is even probable that Sabinum meant to require the number of Sabini, and thus to give the close of the realm under the empire, seems to be acknowledged by such as have supposed that the ancient name of Italicus was Rome.

Joseph. de Bell. Jud. ii. 18. The number, however, is mentioned, and should be received with a degree of latitude.

This does not appear doubtful. We cannot trust to the northern parts, many of them, without excepting Paris itself, were little more than the rude and imperfect towns of a rising people; the southern provinces imitated the wealth and elegance of Italy. Many were the cities of Gaul, Marseilles, Arles, Nismes, Narbonne, Toulouse, Montpellier, Avignon, Lyons, Langres, and Trier, whose ancient condition might sustain an equal, and perhaps advantageous, comparison with their present state. With regard to Spain, that country flourished as a province, and has declined as a kingdom. Exhausted by the abuse of wealth, and frequently invaded by Carthage, her pride might possibly be confounded, if we required such a list of three hundred and sixty cities, as Pliny has exhibited under the reign of Vespas-ian.8

III. Three hundred African cities had once acknowledged the authority of Carthage,9 nor is it probable that their numbers diminished under the administration of the emperors. Carthage itself rose with new splendour from its ashes; and that capital, as well as Carpa and Corinth, soon recovered all the advantages which can be separated from independent sovereignty. IV. The provinces of the East present the contrast of ancient magnificence and modern barbarism. The ruins of antiquity scattered over uncultivated fields, and ascended, by ignorance, to the power of magic, severely afford a shelter to the oppressed peasant or wandering Arab. Under the reign of the Cæsars, the proper Asia alone contained five hundred populous cities,10 enriched with all the gifts of nature, and adorned with all the refinements of art. Eleven cities of Asia had once disputed the honour of dedicating a temple to Tiberius, and their respective merits were examined by the senate.11 Four of them were immediately rejected as unequal to the barhon; and the remaining were blessed with that adoration which is still displayed in its ruins.12 Laodicea collected a very considerable revenue from its flocks of sheep, celebrated for the fineness of their wool; and had received a little before the contest, a legacy of four hundred thousand pounds by the testament of a generous citizen.13 It was the poverty of Laodicea, which must have been the wealth of those cities, whose claim appeared preferable, and particularly of Pergaenum, of Smyrna, and of Ephesus, who so long disputed with each other the titular primacy of Asia.14
The capitals of Syria and Egypt held a still superior rank in the empire; Antioch and Alexandria looked down with disdain on a crowd of dependent cities,15

9 This can be said only of the Roman province, for the rest of Western Europe was far from the equal of Rome in the flourishing state. A passage from Vitruvius shows how much architecture was still in its infancy in Aquitain in the reign of Vespasian. (Vitruv. lib. vii. c. 1.) Speaking of the miracle architecture of foreign nations, he mentions the Gauls of Aquitaine, who stiil build in a manner more liberal than that of the ancient Romans. Pin. Hist. Natur. iii. 3, iv. c. 23. The list seems authentic and separate; the division of the provinces, and the different condition of the cities, are minutely specified.

12 Tacit. Annal. iv. 55. I have taken some pains in consulting and comparing modern authors with regard to the number of the populous cities of Asia. Seven or eight are totally destroyed—Hyippo, Tralles, Didyma, Abalene, Eum, Ephesus, Ephes, and Miletus. With this list of the remaining three, Pergamus is a straggling village of two or three thousand inhabitants; Marsene, under the name of Gevea, the capital of the French department of Ais, might be added.

Roman roads.

All these cities were connected with each other, and with the capital, by the public highways, which, issuing from the forum of Rome, traversed Italy, pervaded the provinces, and were terminated only by the frontiers of the empire. If we carefully trace the distance from the wall of Antoninus to Rome, and from thence to Jerusalem, it will be found that the great chain of communication, from the north-west to the south-east point of the empire, was drawn out to the length of four thousand and eighty Roman miles. The public roads were accurately divided by mile-stones, and ran in a direct line from one city to another, with very little respect for the obstacles which nature and climate presented to the progress of a orderly procession. The Mountains were perforated, and bold arches thrown over the broadest and most rapid streams. The middle part of the road was raised into a terrace which commanded the adjacent country, consisting of several strata of sand, gravel, and cement, and paved with large stones, or in some places, near the capital, with granite. Such was the solid construction of the Roman highways, whose firmness has not entirely yielded to the effort of centuries. They united the subjects of the most distant provinces by an easy and familiar intercourse; but their primary object had been to facilitate the march of the legions, and to render them as completely subdued, till it had been rendered, in all its parts, pious to the arms and authority of the conqueror. The advantage of receiving the earliest intelligence, and of conveying their orders with the greatest celerity, induced the emperors to establish, throughout their extensive dominions, the regular institution of posts. Houses were every where erected at the distance of only five or six miles; each of them was constantly provided with forty horses, and by the help of these relays, it was easy to travel an hundred miles in a day along the Roman roads. The use of the posts was allowed to those who claimed them by an imperial mandate; but though originally intended for the public service, it was sometimes indulged to the business or convenience of private citizens.

Nevigation.

was the communication of the Roman sea less free, and was the land.

The provinces surrounded and enclosed the Mediterranean; and Italy, in the shape of an immense promontory, advanced into the midst of that great lake. The coasts of Italy are, in general, desti- tute of safe harbours; but human industry had corrected the defects of nature; and the ancient promontory of Ostia, in particular, satuate at the mouth of the Tyber, and formed by the emperor Claudius, was a useful monument of Roman greatness. From this port, which was only sixteen miles from the capital, a favourable breeze frequently carried vessels in seven days to the columns of Hercules, and in nine or ten to Alexandria in Egypt. Whatever evils either reason or destiny had inflicted on the empire, the power of Rome was attended with some beneficial consequences to mankind; and the same freedom of intercourse which extended the vices, diffused likewise the improvements, of social life. In the more remote ages of antiquity, the world was unequally divided. The East was in the immemorial possession of arts and luxury; whilst the West was inhabited by rude and warlike barbarians, who either disdained agriculture, or to whom it was totally unknown. Under the protection of an extended government, the productions of happier climates were gradually introduced into the western countries of Eu- rope; and the natives were encouraged, by an open and profitable commerce, to multiply the former, as well as to improve the latter. It would be almost impossible to enumerate all the articles, either of the animal or the vegetable reis, which were successively imported into Europe, from Asia and Egypt; but it will not be unworthy of the dignity, and much less of the utility of an historical work, slightly to touch on a few of the principal heads. 1 Almost Introduction of all the flowers, the herbs, and the fruits, the confessions of foreign extraction, which, in many cases, is betrayed even in their names: the apple was a native of Italy, and when the Romans had tasted the richer flavour of the apricot, the peach, the pomegranate, the citron, and the orange, they contented themselves with applying to all the productions of Asia, the appellative of foreign acquisition, and, to suit it to each other by the additional epithet of their country. 2 In the time of Homer, the vine grew wild in the island of Sicily, and most probably in the adjacent continent; but it was not improved by the skill, nor did it afford a liquor grateful to the taste, of the savage inhabitants. A thousand years afterwards, Italy could boast, that of the four score most generous and celebrated wines, more than two thirds were produced from her soil. The blessing was soon communicated to thearbon- nes provinces, and the olive was introduced to the north of the Cevennes, that in the time of Strabo, it was thought impossible to ripen the grapes in those parts of Gaul. This difficulty, however, was gradually vanquished; and there is some reason to believe, that the vineyards of Burgundy are as old as the age of the Roman empire. The works of the western world, followed the progress of the olive, peace, of which it was considered as the symbol. Two centuries after the foundation of Rome, both Italy and Africa were strangers to that useful plant; it was na- turalized in those countries; and at length carried into the heart of Spain and Gaul. The timid errors of the ancients, that it required a certain degree of heat, and could only flourish in the neighbourhood of the sea, were insensibly exploded by industry and experience.

4. The cultivation of flax was transported from Egypt to Gaul, and enriched the whole country, however it might impoverish the particular lands on which it was sown.

5. Artificial grass. The use of artificial grasses became familiar to the Romans early, and especially the Lucerne, which derived its name and origin from Media. The assured supply of wholesome and plentiful food for the cattle during winter, multiplied the number of the flocks and herds, which in their turn contributed to the fertility of the soil. To all these improvements may be added, an assiduous attention to mines and fisheries, which, by employing a multitude of laborious hands, serve to increase the pleasures of the rich, and the subsistence of the poor.

General plenty. The elegant treatise of Columella describes the advanced state of the Spanish husbandry, under the reign of Tiberius; and it may be observed, that those famines, which so frequently afflicted the independent republic, were seldom or never experienced by the extensive empire of Rome. The accidental scarcity in any single province, was immediately relieved by the plenty of its more fortunate neighbours.

Arts of luxury. Agriculture is the foundation of numerous foreign trade; and manufactures of their own country, silver, on the side of the Romans, was the principal, if not the only, instrument of commerce. It was a complaint worthy of the gravity of the senate, that in the pursuit of female ornaments, the wealth of the state was irrecoverably given away to foreign and hostile nations. The annual loss is computed by a writer of an inquisitive but censorious temper, at upwards of eight hundred thousand pounds sterling. Such was the style of discontent, brooding over the dark prospect of approaching poverty. And yet, if we compare the proportion between gold and silver, as it stood in the time of Pliny, and as it was fixed in the reign of Constantine, we shall discover within that period a very considerable increase.

But it is no easy task to confine luxury within the limits of an empire. The most remote country, at a time of ancient tribulation, was unsnagged to supply the pomp and delicacy of Rome. The soil of Sceythia afforded some valuable furs. Amber was brought over-land from the shores of the Baltic to the Danube; and the barbarians were astonished at the price which they received in exchange for so useless a commodity. There was considerable demand for Balsylvanian carpets, and other manufactures of the Etruscans, but the most important and unpoplar branch of foreign trade was carried on with Arabia and India. Every year, about the time of the summer solstice, a fleet of a hundred and twenty vessels sailed from Myos Hormos, a port of Egypt on the Red Sea. By the periodical assistance of the monsoons, they traversed the ocean in about forty days. The coast of Malabar, or the island of Caylone, was particularly the market of their naval produce, and it was in those markets that the merchants from the more remote countries of Asia expected their arrival. The return of the fleet of Egypt was fixed to the months of December or January; and as soon as their rich cargo had been transported on the backs of camels, from the Red Sea to the Nile, the merchandise brought from the river as far as Alexandria, was poured, without delay, into the capital of the empire. The objects of oriental traffic were splendid and trifling; silk, a pound of which was esteemed not inferior in value to a pound of gold; precious stones, among which the pearl was the first rank after the diamond; and a variety of aromatics, that were consumed in religious worship and the pomp of funerals. The labour and risk of the voyage was rewarded with almost incredible profit; but the profit was made upon Roman subjects, and a few individuals were enriched at the expense of the public. As the natives of Arabia and India were confined, with the productions and manufactures of their own country, silver, on the side of the Romans, was the principal, if not the only, instrument of commerce. It was a complaint worthy of the gravity of the senate, that in the pursuit of female ornaments, the wealth of the state was irrecoverably given away to foreign and hostile nations. The annual loss is computed by a writer of inquisitive but censorious temper, at upwards of eight hundred thousand pounds sterling. Such was the style of discontent, brooding over the dark prospect of approaching poverty. And yet, if we compare the proportion between gold and silver, as it stood in the time of Pliny, and as it was fixed in the reign of Constantine, we shall discover within that period a very considerable increase.

There is not the least reason to suppose that gold was become more scarce; it is therefore evident that silver was grown more common; that whatever might be the amount of the Indian and Arabian exports, they were far from exhausting the wealth of the Roman world; and that the produce of the mines abundantly supplied the demands of commerce.

Notwithstanding the propensity of mankind to exalt the past, and to deprecate the present, the tranquillity and prosperity of the ancient Romans never was felt by, and honestly confessed, by the provincials as well as Romans. They acknowledged that the true principles of social life, laws, art, general felicity, culture and science, which had been first invented by the wisdom of Athens, were now firmly established by the power of Rome, under whose auspicious influence the heretofore barbarous were united by an equal government and common language. They affirm, that with the improvement of arts, the human species was visibly multiplied. They celebrate the increasing splendour

Gaul, historic sages, ered tions, of Gaul, and Antonines, for the Romans, the arrived a slow and secret poison into the vitals of the empire. The minds of men were gradually reduced to the lowest level, the fire of genius was extinguished, and even the military spirit evaporated. The natives of Europe were brave and robust. Spain, Gaul, Britain, and Ilyricum, supplied the legions with excellent soldiers, and constituted the real strength of the monarchy. Their personal valor remained, but they no longer possessed that public courage which is nourished by the love of independence, the sense of national honour, the presence of danger, and the habit of command. They received laws and governors from the will of their sovereign, and trusted for their defence to a mercenary army. The most aspiring spirits resorted to the court or standard of the emperors; and the deserted provinces, deprived of political strength or union, insensibly sunk into the languid indigence of private life.

Decline of genius. The love of letters, almost inseparable from peace and refinement, was fashionable among the subjects of Hadrian and the Antonines, who were themselves men of learning and curiosity. It was diffused over the whole extent of their empire; the most northern tribes of Britons had acquired a taste for rhetoric; Homer as well as Virgil were transcribed and studied on the banks of the Rhine and Danube; and the most liberal rewards sought out the faintest glimmers of literary merit. The sciences of physics and astronomy were successfully cultivated by the Greeks; the observations of Ptolemy and the writings of Galen are studied by those who have improved their discoveries. In the learned world, the darkness of ignorance was lighted, but if we accept the inimitable Lucian, this age of indolence passed away without having produced a single writer of original genius, or who excelled in the arts of composition. The authority of Plato and Aristotle, of Zeno and Epictetus, still reigned in the schools; and their systems were diffused with blind and servile reverence from generation to disciples to another, precluded every generous attempt to exercise the powers, or enlarge the limits, of the human mind. The beauties of the poets and orators, instead of kindling a fire like their own, inspired only cold and servile imitations: or if any ventured to deviate from those models, they deviated at the same time from good sense and propriety. On the revival of letters, the youthful vigour of the imagination, after a long repose, national emulation, a new religion, new language, and a new world, called forth the genius of Europe. But the provincials of Rome, trained by a uniform, artificial, foreign education were engaged in a very unequal competition with those bold ancients, who, by expressing their genuine feelings in their native tongue, had already occupied every place of honour. The name of poet was almost forgotten; that of orator was usurped by the sophists. A cloud of critics, of compilers, of commentators, darkened the face of learning, and the decline of genius was soon followed by the corruption of taste.

CHAPTER III.

Of the Constitution of the Roman Empire, in the age of the Antonines.

The obvious definition of a monarchy idea of a monarch seems to be that of a state, in which a single person, by whatever name he may be distinguished, is invested with the execution of the laws, the management of the revenues, and the direction of the army. But, unless public liberty is protected by intrepid and vigilant guardians, the authority of so formidable a magistrate will soon degenerate into despotism. The influence of the clergy, in an age of superstition, might have been employed to assert the rights of the monarch; but so intimate is the connexion between the throne and the altar, that the banner of the church has very seldom been seen on the side of the people. A martial nobility and stubborn commons, possessed of arms, tenacious of property, and collected into constitutional assemblies, form the only balance capable of preserving a free constitution against the enterprises of an aspiring prince. Every barrier of the Roman constitution situation of the public had been levelled by the vast ambition of the Dictator; every fence had been extirpated by the cruel hand of the Trajan. After the victory of Actium the fate of the Roman world depended on the will of Octavius, crowned Cæsar, by his uncle's adoption, and afterwards Augustus, by the flattery of the Senate. The conqueror was at the head of forty-four veteran legions,4 conscious of their own strength, and of the weakness of the constitution, habituated, during twenty years civil war, to every act of blood and violence, and passionately devoted to the house of Caesar, from whence alone they had received, and expected, the most lavish rewards and public honors, were long oppressed by the ministers of the republic, sighed for the government of a single person, who would be the master, not the accomplice, of those petty tyrants. The people of Rome, viewing with a secret pleasure, the humiliation of the aristocracy, demanded only blood and public shows; and were supplied with both by the liberal hand of Augustus. The rich and polite Italians, who had almost universally embraced the philosophy of Epicurus, enjoyed the present blessings of case and tranquility, and suffered not the pleasing dream to be interrupted by the memory of their old tumultuous freedom. With its power, the senate had lost its dignity; many of the most noble families were extinct. The republicans of spirit and ability had perished in the field of battle, or in the proscription. The door of the assembly had been designly left open, for a mixed multitude of more than a thousand persons, who, not being contented with their number, placed upon their rank, instead of deriving honour from it.

He reforms the senate. The reformation of the senate was one of the first steps in which Augustus hid aside the tyrant, and professed himself the father of his country. He was elected censor; and, in concert with his faithful friend, the great Cato, expelled a number of the senators, expelled a few members, whose vices or whose obstinacy required a public example, persuaded near two hundred to prevent the shame of an expulsion by a voluntary retreat, raised the qualification of a senator to about ten thousand pounds, created a sufficient number of new senators, and accepted from the censor his honourable title of Prince of the Senate, which had always been bestowed, by the censors, on the citizen the most eminent for his honours and services. But whilst he thus restored the dignity, he destroyed the independence, of the senate. The principles of a free constitution are irrecoverably lost, when the legislative power is nominated by the executive.

Resigns his censorship. Before an assembly thus modelled and warped power, prepared, Augustus pronounced a studied oration, which displayed his patriotism, and disguised his ambition. He lamented, yet excused, his past conduct. He told the senators that he had been restrained by any form of connexions, the vengeance of his father's murderer; the humanity of his own nature had sometimes given way to the stern laws of necessity, and to a forced connexion with two unworthy colleagues: as long as Antony lived, the republic forbade him to abandon her to a degenerate Roman. He expressed the desire of the people, to satisfy his duty and his inclination. He solemnly restored the senate and people to all their ancient rights; and wished only to mingle with the crowd of his fellow-citizens, and to share the blessings which he had obtained for his country.

It would require the pen of Tacitus to resume it unaided. If Tacitus had assisted at this assembly, to describe the various emotions of the senate; those that were suppressed, and those that were affected. It was dangerous to trust the sincerity of Augustus; to seem to distrust it was still more dangerous. The respective advantages of monarchy and a republic have often divided speculative inquirers; the present great event in the state, the corruption of the provinces, and the licence of the soldiers, supplied new arguments to the advocates of monarchy; and these general views of government were again warped by the hopes and fears of each individual. Amidst this confusion of sentiments, the answer of the senate was unanimous and decisive. They refused to accept the resignation of Augustus; they conjured him not to desert the republic, which he had saved. After a decent resistance, the crafty tyrant submitted to the orders of the senate; and consented to receive the government of the provinces, and the general command of the Roman armies, under the well-known names of Proconsul and Imperator. But he would receive them only for ten years. Even before the expiration of that period, he hoped that the wounds of civil discord would be completely healed, and that the republic, restored to its pristine health and vigour, would no longer require the dangerous interposition of so excessive a constitution. The saturation of this comedy, repeated several times during the life of Augustus, was preserved to the last ages of the empire, by the peculiar pomp with which the perpetual monarchs of Rome always solemnized the tenth years of their reign.

Without any violation of the principle of the republic of the constitution, the general of the war. The Roman armies might receive and exercise an authority almost despotic over the soldiers, the enemies, and the subjects of the republic. With regard to the soldiers, the jealousy of freedom had, even from the earliest ages of Rome, given way to the hopes of conquest, and a just sense of military discipline. The dictator, or consul, had a right to command the service of the Roman youth; and to punish an obstinate or cowardly disobedience by the most severe and ignominious penalties, by striking the offender out of the list of citizens, by confiscating his property, and by selling his person into slavery. The most sacred rights of freedom, confirmed by the Porcian and Sempronian laws, were suspended by the military engagement. In his camp the general exercised an absolute power of life and death; his jurisdiction was not con- structural, nor ruled of trial, or rules of law. The execution of the sentence was immediate and without appeal. The choice of the enemies of Rome was regularly decided by the legislative authority. The most important resolutions of peace and war were seriously debated in the senate, and solemnly ratified by the executive; but when the arms of the legions were carried to a great distance from Italy, the generals assumed the liberty of directing them against whatever people, and in whatever manner, they judged most advantageous for the public service. It was from the success, not from the justice, of their enterprises, that they expected the honours of a triumph. In the use of victory, especially after they were no longer controlled by the commissioners of the senate, they exercised the most unbounded despotism. When Pompey commanded in the east, he rewarded his soldiers and allies, dethroned princes, divided kingdoms, founded colonies, and distributed the treasures of Mithridates. On his return to Rome, he obtained by a single act of the senate and people, the universal rati-

The former preserves his military command and guards in Rome itself. In return for this imaginary concession, which rendered him master of the armies of Italy and the principal towns of the Roman kingdom, he was authorized to preserve his military command, supported by a numerous body of guards, even in times of peace, and in the person of his son Tiberius, destined to be the successor to the empire. Augustus was thus confined to those citizens who were engaged in the service by the military oath; but such was the propensity of the Romans to scritude, that the oath was voluntarily taken by the magistrates, the senators, and the equestrian order, till the homage of flattery was imposed and reduced into an annual and solemn protestation of fidelity.

Although Augustus considered a military force as the firmest foundation, he attributed the military, civil, and religious power, wisely rejected it, as a very odious instrument, of government. It was more agreeable to his temper, as well as to his policy, to reign under the venerated names of ancient magistracy, and artfully to collect, in his own person, all the scattered rays of civil jurisdiction. With this view, he permitted the senate to confer upon him, for his life, the powers of the consuls and the tribunals of justice, which were, in the ancient constitution, exercised by the emperor, the Senate, and the people. The administrative power, which the general control of the finances was intrusted to their care; and though they seldom had leisure to administer justice in person, they were considered as the supreme guardians of law, equity, and the public peace. Such was their ordinary jurisdiction; but whenever the senate approved the first magistrate to consult the safety of the commonwealth, he was raised by that degree above the laws, and exercised, in the defence of liberty, a temporary despotism. The character of the tribunes was, in every respect, different from that of the consuls. The appearance of the former was elevated and magnificent; the impudent and insolent, which the consul or the tribune might derive from their respective jurisdiction, was diminished by several important restrictions. Their authority expired with the year in which they were elected; the former office was divided between two, the latter among ten persons; and, as both in their private and public interest, they were averse to each other, their mutual conflicts contributed, for the most part, to strengthen rather than to destroy the balance of the constitution.

But when the consular and praetorian guards were increased, the federal authority of the people was mitigated, the senatorial government was made subservient to the personal power of the emperor. Augustus exercised above six annual consuls, without interruption. He thus most artfully refined that magistracy, as well as the dictatorship, abased himself from Rome, and waited till the total effects of his annual administration were received with the senate to supersede the consuls. Augustus, as well as his successors, affected, however, to conceal the alterations which they had before made; when pro-consuls were attended by six lieutenants, who had the right of the sword and wore also a military dress (palatine), the appointment of these lieutenants was by the emperor, and his most successful lieutenants were satisfied with some marks of distinction, which, under the name of triumphal honours, were invented in their favour.

This distinction is without foundation. The lieutenants of the emperor were not considered as pro-consuls, when they were attended by six lieutenants, who had the right of the sword and were also a military dress (palatine), and who received the awards. The lieutenants sent by the senate, who were styled pro-consule, whether they had or had not been consuls, had twelve lieutenants, they were attended by six lieutenants, and they had the right of the sword. The provinces of Africa and Asia were never given, except to military commanders, in the manner of the gift of the provinces to the emperor of Rome, as Dion, lib. iii. 12—16, and in Strabo (lib. xvii. p. 480,—the Greek text for the Latin translation is imperfect.)—O.

The Roman army was stationed in the provinces by the emperor, Augustus, whose name was inscribed on their shields. The former presided in the military command, and was commander in chief.
tributionary powers were united, when they were vested for life in a single person, when the general of the army was, at the same time, the minister, and that of the Roman people, it was impossible to resist the exercise, nor was it easy to define the limits of his imperial prerogative.

Imperial prerogatives. The policy of Augustus soon added the splendid as well as important dignities of supreme pontifex, and prince of the Roman people, to the management of the religion, and by the latter a legal inspection over the manners and fortunes of the Roman people. If so many indistinct and independent powers did not exactly unite with each other, the complaisance of the senate was prepared to supply every deficiency by the exercise of its advice and control. The emperors, as the first ministers of the republic, were exempted from the obligation and penalty of many inconvenient laws: they were authorized to convocate the senate, to make several motions in the same day, to recommend candidates for the honours of the state, to employ the bounds of the city, to employ the revenue at their discretion, to declare peace and war, to ratify treaties; and by a most comprehensive clause, they were empowered to execute whatsoever they should judge advantageous to the empire, and agreeable to the majesty of things private or public, human or divine.

The magistrates. The five government were committed to the imperial magistrate, the ordinary magistrates of the commonwealth languished in obscurity, without vigour, and almost without business. The names and forms of the ancient administration were preserved by Augustus with the most anxious care. The usual number of consuls, pretors, and tribunes, were annually invested with their respective ensigns of office, and continued to discharge some of their least important functions. Those honours still attracted the vain ambition of the Romans; and the emperors themselves, though they sometimes committed the confidence of the government, frequently aspired to the title of that annual dignity, which they condescended to share with the most illustrious of their fellow-citizens. In the election of these magistrates, the people, during the reign of Augustus, were permitted to expose all the inconveniences of a wild democracy. That artful prince, in place of discovering the symptom of impatience, humbly solicited their suffrages, and the emperors were delivered from their friends, and scrupulously practised all the duties of an ordinary candidate.1 But we may venture to ascribe to his counsels the first measure of the succeeding reign, by which the elections were transferred to the senate.2 The assemblies of the people were for ever abolished, and the emperors were delivered from a dangerous multitude, who, without restoring liberty, might have disturbed, and perhaps endangered, the established government.

By declaring themselves the protectors of the people, Marcius and Caesar divided the empire among their country. But as soon as the senate had been humbled and disarmed, such an assembly, consisting of five or six hundred persons, was found a much more tractable and useful instrument of dominion. It was on the dignity of the senate, that Augustus and his successors founded their new empire; and they affected, on every occasion, to adopt the language and principles of Patricians. In the administration of their own powers, they frequently consulted the great national council, and seemed to refer to its decision the most important concerns of peace and war. Rome, Italy, and the internal provinces of the empire were immediately submitted to the authority of the senate. With regard to civil objects, it was the supreme court of appeal; with regard to criminal matters, a tribunal, constituted for the trial of all offences that were committed by men in any public station, or that affected the peace and majesty of the Roman people.

The exercise of the judicial power became the most frequent and serious occupation of the senate; and the important causes that were pleaded before them, afforded a last refuge to the spirit of ancient eloquence. As a council of state, and as a court of justice, the senate possessed very considerable prerogatives; but in its legislative capacity, in which it was supposed virtually to represent the people, the rights of sovereignty were acknowledged to reside in that assembly. Every power was derived from their authority, every law was ratified by their sanction. Their regular meetings were held on three stated days in every month, the Calends, the Nones, and the Ides. Such debates were conducted with decent freedom; and the emperors themselves, who gloried in the name of senators, sat, voted, and divided with their equals.

To resume, in a few words, the system of the imperial government; as it the imperial system was instituted by Augustus, and retained by those princes who understood their own interest and that of the people, it may be defined an absolute monarchy disguised by the forms of a commonwealth. The masters of the Roman world surrounded their throne with darkness, concealed their irresistible strength, and humbly professed themselves the accountable ministers of the senate, whose supreme decrees they dictated and obeyed.3

1 Quaeque Magistretuum Comitium interessit. Tribus sum candidatis maximi circituarum spectaculisqueque magistratibus, improbandis siipsa Suffragia, ut se m. 3.3. 23.)

2 The tyrants themselves were ambitious of the conship. The virtuous quality of the magistrates was as much esteemed as the change of it. Trajan revived the ancient oath, and swore before the imperial tribunal, that he would observe the laws. (Plin. Panegyr. c. 61.)
The emperors, if we except those tyrants whose capricious folly violated every law of nature and decency, dismissing pomp and ceremony which might otherwise have been ascribed to them, but could add nothing to their real power. In all the offices of life, they affected to confound themselves with their subjects, and maintained with them an equal intercourse of visits and entertainments. Their habits, their palace, their table, were suited to the character of a tyrant. But the rank of the Carolingians, their family, however numerous or splendid, was composed entirely of their domestic slaves and freedmen.

Augustus or Trajan would have blushed at employing the meanest of the Romans in those menial offices, which, in the household and bed-chamber of a limited monarch, are eagerly solicited by the profligate nobility of Britain.

The deification of the emperors is the only instance in which they departed from their accustomed prudence and modesty. The Asiatic Greeks were the first inventors, the successors of Alexander the first objects of this sacerdotal mode of adoration. It was easily transferred from the kings to the governors of Asia; and the Roman magistrates very frequently were adored as provincial deities, with the pomp of altars and temples, of festivals and sacrifices. Augustus intended that posterity should not refuse what the proconsuls had accepted; and the divine honours which both the one and the other received from the provinces, attested rather the despotic than the servile of Rome. But the conquerors soon imitated the vanquished nations in the arts of flattery; and the imperious spirit of the first Caesar too easily consented to assume, during his life-time, a place among the tutelar deities of Rome. The milder temper of his successor declined so dangerous an ambition, which was never afterwards revived, except by the madness of Caligula and Domitian. Augustus performed some of the public ceremonies at the great temples to his honour, on condition that they should associate the worship of Rome with that of the sovereign; he tolerated private superstition, of which he might be the object but he contented himself with being revered by the senate and people in his human character, and wisely left to his successor the care of his public deification. A regular custom was introduced, that on the decease of every emperor who had neither lived nor died like a tyrant, the senate by a solemn decree should place him in the number of the god-like, and their munera were blended with those of his funeral. This legal, and, as it should seem, injudicious, profanation, so abhorrent to our stricter principles, was received with a very faint murmur, by the easy nature of polytheism; but it was received as an institution, not of religion, but of policy. We should disgrace the virtues of the Antonines, neglecting to distinguish the post of Hercules or Jupiter. Even the characters of Caesar or Augustus were far superior to those of the popular deities. But it was the misfortune of the former to live in an enlightened age, and their actions were too faithfully recorded to admit of such a mixture of fable and mysticism.

In the consideration of the imperial Titles of Augustus, we have frequently mentioned the origin of the apotheosis, under his well-known title of Augustus, which was not, however, conferred upon him till the edifice was almost completed. The obscure name of Octavianus, he derived from a mean family, in the little town of Aricia. It was stained with the blood of the prescripition; and he was desirous, preserved for the monarch, whilst the memory of Caesar was revered among the people. The illustrious surname of Caesar he had assumed, as the adopted son of the dictator; but he had too much good sense, either to hope to be confounded, or to wish to be compared, with that extraordinary man. His apotheosis was accompanied with a new appellation: and after a very serious discussion, that of Augustus was chosen, among several others, as being the most expressive of the character of peace and sanctity, which he uniformly affected. Augustus was therefore a personal, Caesar a family, and Augustus a benevolent name, with the prince on whom it was bestowed; and however the latter was diffused by adoption and female alliance, Nero was the last prince who could allege any hereditary claim to the honors of the Julian line. But, at the time of his death, the practice of a century was already established, of ascribing to the emperors the entire imperial dignity, and they have been preserved by a long succession of emperors, Romans, Greeks, Franks, and Germans, from the fall of the republic, to the present time. A distinction was, however, soon introduced. The sacred title of Augustus was always reserved for the monarch, whilst the memory of Caesar was more freely communicated to his relations; and from the reign of Hadrian, at least, was appropriated to the second person in the state, who was considered as the presumpitive heir of the empire.

The Character and Policy of Augustus. The Character and Policy of Augustus, who by his birth or adoption belonged to the family of the Caesars, took the name of Caesar. After the death of Nero, this title was transferred to the new emperor, who was his adoptive son, —the name to which it was applied, according to Tacitus (Hist. lib. 1. c. 15.) and Suetonius (Galba, c. 17), that Galba conferred upon Piso Lucernarius the title of Caesar, and that this was the origin of the use of this word, which two historians say simply that Galba adopted Piso for his successor, and makes no mention of the sacrifice. However, this is apparent from what Augustus Vivian (De Probas 347) says, that Adrian first received the title upon his adoption; but since the adoption was merely a form, this new name remained with him after the death of the new emperor. It had not probably created a new title for a man who was to succeed him, it is more than probable that Augustus Verus was the first who was called Caesar, when adopted by Adrian. 1 [This is incorrect. The successors of Alexander were not the first deified. The cultus of Alexander the Great and his eponymous conquerors had defied and worshipped many of their kings—The Olympian of the Greeks was peopled with divinities with human attributes. Romulus himself had received the honors of apotheosis (Tit. Liv. lib. i. c. 16,) a long time before Alexander and his successors. It is also incorrect to confound the homage rendered by temples and altars to the provinces to Roman governors with the real apotheosis of the emperors. This was a religious worship, for there were neither private nor sacrificial. Augustus was severely suspected for having permitted himself to be worshipped as a god in the provinces. (Tit. Annum. lib. i. c. 10.) He would not have incurred the censure and been reviled by the provincials as being reviled by the Roman governors.]

After the death of Nero, this title was transferred to the new emperor, who was his adoptive son, —the name to which it was applied, according to Tacitus (Hist. lib. 1. c. 15.) and Suetonius (Galba, c. 17), that Galba conferred upon Piso Lucernarius the title of Caesar, and that this was the origin of the use of this word, which two historians say simply that Galba adopted Piso for his successor, and makes no mention of the sacrifice. However, this is apparent from what Augustus Vivian (De Probas 347) says, that Adrian first received the title upon his adoption; but since the adoption was merely a form, this new name remained with him after the death of the new emperor. It had not probably created a new title for a man who was to succeed him, it is more than probable that Augustus Verus was the first who was called Caesar, when adopted by Adrian. vices, were artificial; and according to the various dictates of his interest, he was at first the enemy, and at last the father, of the Roman world. When he framed the artful system of the Imperial authority, his motto was, and the public interest was considered as his guide to deceive the people by an image of civil liberty, and the armies by an image of civil government.

Image of liberty 1. The death of Caesar was ever before for the people his eyes. He had lavished wealth and honours on his adherents; but the most favoured friends of his uncle were in the same position as the slaves and the freedmen. The fidelity of the legions might defend his authority against open rebellion; but their vigilance could not secure his person from the dagger of a determined republican; and the Romans, who revered the memory of Brutus, would applaud the imitation of his virtue. Caligula, who provoked his fate, as much by the ostentation of his power, as by his power itself. The consul or the tribune might have reigned in peace. The title of king had armed the Romans against his life. Augustus was sensible that mankind is governed by names; nor was he deceived in his expectation, that the senate and people would submit to slavery, provided their ancient freedom. A feeble senate and enervated people cheerfully acquiesced in the pleasing illusion, as long as it was supported by the virtue, or even by the prudence, of the successors of Augustus. It was a motive of self-preservation, not a principle of liberty, that restrained the Romans from the practice of allegiance to Augustus and his successors. They attacked the person of the tyrant, without aiming their blow at the authority of the emperor.

II. The insolvency of the armies incident to the aspiration of Augustus with fears of a still more alarming nature. The despair of the citizens could only attempt, what the power of the soldiers was at any time able to execute. How precarious was his own authority over men whom he had taught to violate every social duty! He had heard their seditious clamours; he dreaded their calmer moments of reflection. One revolution had been purchased by immense rewards; but a second revolution might double those rewards. The troops professed the fondest attachment to the house of Caesar; but the attachments of the multitude are capricious and inconstant. Augustus summoned to his aid whatever remained in those fierce minds of Roman prejudices; he enforced the rules of discipline by the law; and, interposing the majesty of the senate between the emperor and the army, boldly claimed their allegiance, as the first magistrate of the republic.

During a period of two hundred years of their obedience, twenty years, from the establishment of this artful system of subversion, the dangers inherent to a military government were, in a great measure, suspended. The soldiery were seldom roused to that fatal sense of their own strength, and of the weakness of the civil authority, which was, before and afterwards, productive of so many dreadful calamities. Caligula and Domitian were assassinated in their palace by their own domestics; the convulsions which agitated Rome on the death of the former, were confined to the walls of the city. But Nero involved the whole empire in his ruin. In the space of eighteen months, four princes perished by the sword; and the Roman world was shaken by the fury of forty thousand standing armies. For a period of only seven years, though the corruption of military licence, the two centuries from Augustus to Commodus passed away unstained with civil blood, and undisturbed by revolutions. The emperor was elected by the authority of the senate, and the consent of the soldiers. The legions respected their emperor, and it requires no wonder that the Roman annals to discover three inconsiderable rebellions, which were all suppressed in a few months, and without even the hazard of a battle.

In elective monarchies, the vacancy of a throne is a moment big with danger, and mischief; but to despotic princes, desirous to spare the legions that interval of suspense, and the temptation of an irregular choice, invested their designed successor with so large a share of present power, as should enable him, after their decease, to assume the remainder, without suffering the empire to perceive the change of masters. Thus Augustus, after all his fairer prospects had been snatched from him by untimely deaths, rested his last hopes on Tiberius, obtained for his adopted son the censorship and tributary powers, and dictated a law, by which the future prince was invested with an authority equal to the whole, and above the provinces and the armies. Thus Vespasian subdued the generous mind of his eldest son. Titus was adored by the eastern legions, which, under his command, had recently achieved the conquest of Judea.

His power was dreaded, and, as his virtues were \[2\] Two centuries after the establishment of monarchy, the emperor Marcus Antonius recommends the character of Brutus as a perfect model of Roman virtue. (Sallust, ii. ii. 121.) It is much to be regretted that we have lost part of Tacitus, which treated of that transaction. We are forced to contract ourselves with the popular romances of Josephus, and the important hints of Dion and Suetonius.

eluded by the intemperance of youth, his designs were suspected. Instead of listening to such unworthy suspicions, the prudent monarch associated Titus to the full powers of the imperial dignity; and the grateful son ever approved himself the humble and faithful minister of so indulgent a father. The race of the Caesars had ceased; the first to embrace every measure of Flavian policy, that might confirm his recent and precarious elevation. The military oath, and the fidelity of the troops, had been consecrated, by the habits of an hundred years, to the name and family of the Caesars; and though that family had been continued only by the fictitious right of adoption, the name and person in the person of Nero, the grandson of Germanicus, and the lincoal successor of Augustus. It was not without reluctance and remorse, that the prætorian guards had been persuaded to abandon the cause of the tyrant. The rapid downfall of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, taught the armies to consider the emperors as the creatures of their will, and the instruments of their licence. The birth of Vespasian was mean; his grand father had been a private soldier, his father a petty officer of the revenue; his own merit had raised him to the empire. But his merit was rather useful than shining, and his virtues were disdained by a strict and even sordid parsimony. Such a prince consulted his true interest by the association of a son, whose more splendid and amiable character might turn the public attention, from the obscure origin to the future glory, of the Flavian house. Under the mild administration of Titus, the Roman world enjoyed a transient felicity, and his beloved memory served to protect, above fifteen years, the vices of his brother Domitian.

A.D. 96. Adoption and beginning of Trajan's reign. While he discovered that his feeble age was unable to stem the torrent of public disorders, which had multiplied under the long tyranny of his predecessor. His mild disposition was respected by the good; but the degenerate Romans required a more vigorous character, whose justice should strike terror into the guilty. Though he had several relations, he fixed his choice on a stranger. He adopted Trajan, then about forty years of age, and who commanded a powerful army in the Lower Germany; and immediately, by a decree of the senate, declared him his collegue and successor. It is sincerely to be lamented, that whilst we are fatigued with the disagreeable actions of Nero's crimes and follies, we are reduced to collect the actions of Trajan from the glimmerings of an abridgment, or the doubtful light of a parry. There remain, however, one pomegranate far removed beyond the suspension of flattery. Above two hundred and fifty years after the death of Trajan, the senate in pouring out the customary acclamations on the accession of a new emperor, wished that he might surpass the felicity of Augustus, and the virtues of Trajan.

A. D. 117. Of Hadrian. Hadrian. We may readily believe, that the father of his country hesitated whether he ought to intrust the various and doubtful character of his kinsman, Hadrian, with sovereign power. In his last moments, the arts of the empress Plotina, either fixed an impression of Otho's and Titus's fictitious adoption; or the truth of which could not be safely disputed, and Hadrian was peaceably acknowledged as his lawful successor. Under his reign, as has been already mentioned, the empire flourished in peace and prosperity. He encouraged the arts, reformed the laws, asserted military discipline, and visited all his provinces in person. His vast and active genius was equally suited to the most enlarged views, and the most minute details of civil administration. The passions of his soul were curiosity and vanity. As they prevailed, and as they were attracted by different objects, Hadrian was, by turns, an excellent prince, a ridiculous sophist, and a jealous tyrant. The general tenor of his conduct deserved praise. His equity and moderation prevailed in the first reverences of his worship, and in the death of four consulate senators, his personal enemies, and men who had been judged worthy of empire; and the tenderness of a painful illness rendered him, at last, peevish and cruel. The senate doubted whether they should pronounce him a god or a tyrant; and the honour bestowed on his memory were granted to the prayers of the pious Antonius.

The caprice of Hadrian influenced his Adoption of the choice of a successor. After revolving older and younger in his mind several men of distinguished Verus. He adopted Elatus Verus, a gay and voluptuous noblemans, recommended by uncommon beauty to the lover of Antonius. But while Hadrian was delighting himself with his own applause, and the acclamations of the soldiers, whose consent had been secured by an immense donation, the new Caesar, wishing to gain a footing in the court, was by his ambition and fruitless schemes, hurrying on an untimely death. He left only one son. Hadrian commended the boy to the gratitude of the Antonines. He was adopted by Pius; and, on the accession of Marcus, was invested with an equal share of sovereign power. Among the many views of this younger Verus, he possessed the one of associating a fellow emperor, by which he could elevate himself to the rank of a colleague, to whom he willingly abandoned the ruder cares of empire. The philosophical emperor dissembled his follies, lamented his early death, and cast a decent veil over his memory.

As soon as Hadrian's passion was Adoption of the offered to the either gratified or disappointed, he re- to two Antonines, solved to deserve the thanks of posterity, by placing the same exalted merit on the Roman. His discerning eye easily discovered a senator about fifty years of age, blameless in all the offices of life; and a youth of about seventeen, whose riper years opened the fairest aspect of a very virtuous; the elder of those was declared the son and successor of Hadrian, on condition, however, that he himself should immediately adopt the younger. The two Antonines (for it is of them that we are now speaking) governed the Roman world forty-two years, with the same inviable spirit of wisdom and virtue. Although Pius had two sons, he preferred the welfare of Rome to the interest of his family, gave his daughter Faustina in marriage to young Marcus, obtained from the Senate the tribonian and consular powers, and with a noble disdain, or rather ignorance, of jealousy, associated him to all the labours of government. Marcus, on the other hand, revered the character of his benefactor, loved him as a parent, obeyed him as his sovereign, and, after he was dead, conducted his own administration by the example and maxims of his predecessor. Their united reigns are possibly the only period of history in which the happiness of a great people was the sole object of government.

Character and Reigns of Antoninus Pius.

Titus Antoninus Pius has been justly ranked with a second Nerva. The same love of religion, justice, and peace, was the distinguishing characteristic of both princes. But the situation of the latter opened a much larger field for the exercise of those virtues. Numa could only prevent a few neighbouring villages from plundering each other; but Antoninus diffused order and tranquillity over the greatest part of the earth. His reign is marked by the rare advantage of furnishing very few materials for history; which is, indeed, little more than the register of the crimes, follies, and misfortunes of mankind. In private life, he was an amiable as well as a good man. The manner of his death, his last words to his wife, his death by vanity or accident. He enjoyed with moderation the conveniences of his fortune, and the innocent pleasures of society; and the benevolence of his soul displayed itself in a cheerful serenity of temper.

Of Marcus

The virtuous and benevolent character of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus was of a severer and more labious kind. It was the well-earned harvest of many a learned conference, of many a patient lecture, and many a midnight humiliation. At the age of twelve years he embraced the rigid system of the Stoics, which taught him to submit his body to his mind, his passions to reason; to consider vice as the only bad, good, vice as the only evil, all things external as things indifferent. His meditations, composed in the tumult of a camp, are still extant; and he even descended to give lessons of philosophy, in a more public manner, than was perhaps consistent with the modesty of a sage, or the dignity of an emperor. But his life was the noblest commentary on the precepts of Zeno. He was severe to himself, indulgent to the imperfections of others, just and beneficent to all mankind. He regretted that Avitus Cassius, who excited a rebellion in Syria, had disappointed him, by a wanton disregard of the pleasure of converting an enemy into a friend; and he justified the sincerity of that sentiment, by moderating the zeal of the senate against the adherents of the traitor. When he detested, as the disgrace and calamity of human nature; but he never was of a just disposition to alarm him to take arms, he readily exposed his person to eight winter campaigns, on the frozen banks of the Danube, the severity of which was at last fatal to the weakness of his constitution. His memory was revered by a grateful posterity, and above a century after his death, his person preserved the image of Marcus Antoninus among those of their household gods.

During the twenty-three years of Pius's reign, Marcus was only two nights absent from the palace, and even those at different Hist. August. p. 125.

He was fond of the theatre, and not insensible to the charms of the fair sex. Marcus Anton. i. 16. Hist. Aug. p. 30. Julian in Cassius. Thuc. ii. 5. He was charged with having been wont of that simplicity which distinguished Pius and even Verus (Hist. August. 6-23). This suspicion, as usual it might serve to account for the superior application bestowed upon philosophy, in preference to the social virtues. Even Marcus Antoninus has been called a hyeron, but the wildest reptile never recovered itself after being shorn of its tail. Marcus Antoninus might possibly be a coward, or Tully a fool. Wit and valor are qualifications more easily ascertained than humility or the love of justice.

Thucitus has characterised, in a few words, the principles of the policy of Antoninus, as follows: "The empire can not be justified by its own peculiar circumstances, but by a just, universal, and eternal law. A prince must never seek his happiness by the destruction, that absolute power, which they had exercised for the benefit of their people. The ideal restrictions of the Senate and the laws might serve to display the virtues, but could never correct the vices, of the emperor. The military force was a blind and irresistible instrument of oppression; and the employments of Roman manners would always supply flattering eager to applaud and ministers prepared to serve, the fear or the avarice, the lust or the cruelty, of their masters.

These gloomy apprehensions had been already justified by the experience of the Tiberius, Caligula, and Neron. The annals of the emperors Nero, and the Antonines, exhibit a strong and various picture of human nature, which we should vainly seek among the mixed and doubtful characters of modern history. In the conduct of these monarchs we may trace the utmost lines of vice and virtue; the most exalted personal duties, and the most deplorable, but often necessitated, degradation of the most elevated species. The golden age of Trajan and the Antonines, had been preceded by an age of iron. It is almost superfluous to enumerate the unworthy successors of Augustus. Their unparalleled vices, and the splendid theatre which they were actuated, had saved them from oblivion. The gentle Tiberius, the cruel and enviable Cagulia, the feeble Claudius, the profligate and cruel Nero, the beastly Vitiellus, and the timid and inhuman Domitian, are condemned to everlasting infamy. During fourscore years (excepting only the short and doubtful respite of Vespasian's reign) Rome remained beneath an unmitting tyranny, which exterminated the ancient families of the republic, and was fatal to almost every virtue, and every talent, that arose in that unhappy period.

Under the reign of these monsters, Persecution the slavery of the Romans was accompanied by two peculiar circumstances, that the one occasioned by their former liberty, the other by their extensive conquests, which rendered their condition more completely wretched than that of the victims of tyranny in any other age or country. From these causes were derived, 1. The exquisite sensibility of the sufferers; and, 2. The impossibility of escaping from the hand of the oppressor.

In a nation of serfs, the experience of every day might almost at once have revealed the ambition of his sword, suspended above him by a single thread, seems not to have disturbed the slumbers, or interrupted the tranquility, of the Persian. The monarch’s crown, he well knew, could level him with the dust; but the stroke of lightning or apocalypse might be equally fatal; and it was the part of a wise man, to forget the inevitable calamities of human life in the enjoyment of the fleeting hour. He was dignified with the appellation of the king’s slave; had, perhaps, been purchased from obscure parents, in a country which he had never known; he was but roused up from his infancy in the severe discipline of the serfs; and, to his honours, were the gift of a master, who might, without injustice, resume what he had bestowed. Russia’s knowledge, if he possessed any, could only serve to confirm his habits by prejudices. His language affected not worthy any form of government; his absolute monarchy. The history of the East informed him, that such had ever been the condition of mankind. 1 The Koran, and the interpreters of that divine book, inculcated to him, that the sultan was the descendant of the prophet, and the viceroy of heaven; that security or their own country had taught them to revere a free, a virtuous, and a victorious commonwealth; to abhor the successful crimes of Cæsar and Augustus; and inwardly to despise those tyrants whom they adored with the most abject flattery. As magistrates and senators, they were admitted into the great council, which had once dictated laws to the earth, whose name still gave a sanction to the acts of the monarch, and whose authority was so often prostituted to the vilest purposes of tyranny. Tiberius, and those emperors who adopted his maxims, attempted to disgrace their murders by the formalities of justice, and perhaps enjoyed a secret pleasure in rendering the senate their accomplice as well as their victim. By this assembly, the last of the Romans were condemned for imaginary crimes and real virtues. Their infamous accusers assumed the language of independent patriots, who, professedly to defend their country, bore the tribunal of his country; and the public service was rewarded by riches and honours. 2 The scruple judges professed to assert the majesty of the commonwealth, violated in the person of its first magistrate; whose eloquence they most applauded when they trembled the most at his inexorable and impending cruelty. 2 The tyrant beheld their baseness with just contempt, and encountered their secret sentiments of desuetude with sincere and avowed hatred for the whole body of the senate.

The division of Europe into a number of independent states, connected empire left them however, with each other, by the general place of refuge. resemblance of religion, language, and manners, is productive of the most beneficial consequences to the liberty of table deserts, hostile tribes of barbarians, by their absolute monarchy. The slave of imperial despotism, whether he was commanded to drag his gilded chain in Rome and the senate, or to wear out a life of exile on the barren rock of Sardinia, or the frozen banks of the Danube, expected his fate in silent despair. 4 It was the more tolerable. On every side he was encompassed with a vast extent of sea and land, which he could never hope to traverse without being discovered, seized, and restored to his irritated master. Beyond the frontiers, his anxious view could discover nothing, except the ocean, inhospitable deserts, hostile tribes of barbarians, and distant and unknown language, or dependent kings, who would gladly purchase the emperor’s protection by the sacrifice of an obnoxious fugitive. 5 “Wherever you are,” said Cicero to the exiled Marcullus, “remember that you are equally within the power of the conqueror.”

CHAPTER IV.

The Cruelty, Follies, and murder of Commodus.—Execution of Pertinax.—His attempts to reform the State.—His assassination by the Praetorian Guards.

The mildness of Marcus, which the indigence of rigid discipline of the Stoics was unable to eradicate, formed, at the same time, the most amiable, and the only defective, part of his character. His excellent understanding was often deceived by the unsuspecting goodness of his heart. Artful men, who study the passions of princes, and conceal their own, approached his person in the disguise of philosophical opinions of Cicero, c. 8. For one accusation, Regulus, the just object of Plato’s sympathy, received from the senate the consular ornaments, and a present of sixty thousand pounds.

2 The very first sentence was formerly a treasonable offence against the Roman people. As tribunes of the people, Augustus and Tiberius applied to them their own persons, and extended it to an infinite latitude. It was Tiberius and not Augustus, who first gave this meaning to the words, crime of majesty, crime of law and majesty.” (See Hist. Aug., Buchi Trogus, 27. sec. 6-17.)

3 After the virtuous and unfortunate widow of Germans had been put to death, the proper person to solicit her suppli- tion, she had not been publicly strangled; nor was the body drawn with a bath to the Gensio, where those of noble despot had been exposed. See Tacit. Annal. vi. 25. Suetonius, in Tiberio, c. 52.

4 Sardinia was a small rocky island in the Agelai Sea, the inhbitants of which had for ages been proverbial for the purity of their language. It was a very small place of Olylus’s exile is well known, by his just but unmeaning lamentations. It was in this place that he only received an order to leave Rome in so many days, and to transport himself to Tomi. Guards and jailers were unnecessary.

5 Under the same name, a Roman knight attempted to fly to the Parthians. He was shot in the streets of Sicily; but in little danger did that appear to be for thus, by the most jealous of tyrants dissuaded to ruin him. Tacit. Annal. vi. 14.

sanctity, and acquired riches and honours by affecting to despise them. 6 His excessive indulgence to his brother, his wife, and his son, exceeded the bounds of private virtue, and became a public injury, by the example and consequences of their vices. 7 To his wife Faustina, the wife of Marcus, had been as much celebrated for her gallantries as for her beauty. The grave simplicity of the philosopher was ill calculated to engage her wanton levity, or to fix that unbounded passion for variety, which often discovered personal merit in the greatest beauties; but the spirit of the moment was, in general, a very sensual deity; and the amours of an empress as they exact on her side the plainest advances, are seldom susceptible of much sentimental delicacy. Marcus was the only man in the empire who seemed ignorant or insensible of the irregularities of Faustina; which, according to the prejudices of every age, reflected some disgrace on the injured husband. He promoted several of her lovers to posts of honour and profit, 8 and during a connexion for thirty years, invariably gave her proofs of the most tender confidence, and of a respect which ended not with her life. In his Meditations, he thanks the gods, who had preserved unimpaired the atmosphere of his soul, and of such a wonderful simplicity of manners. 9 The obsequious senate, at his earnest request, declared her a goddess. She was represented in her temples, with the attributes of Juno, Venus, and Ceres; and it was decreed, that, on the day of their nuptials, the youth of the empire should kiss their vows before the altar of their chaste patrones. 10

To his son Commodus.

The monstrous vices of the son have cast a shade on the purity of the father's virtues. It has been objected to Marcus, that he sacrificed the happiness of millions to a fond partiality for his devoted son; and that he chose a successor in his own family, rather than in the republic. Nothing, however, was neglected by the anxious father, and by the men of virtue and learning, whom he summoned to his assistance, to expand the narrow mind of young Commodus, to correct his growing vices, and to render him worthy of the throne for which he was designed. But the power of instruction is seldom of much efficacy, except in those happy dispositions where it is almost superfluous. The distasteful lesson of a grave philosopher, was, in a moment, obliterated by the whisper of a propagating favourite; and Marcus himself 11 blasted the bright hopes of his son, who, at the age of fourteen or fifteen, to a full participation of the imperial power. He lived but four years afterwards; but he lived long enough to repent a rash measure, which raised the impious youth above the restraint of reason and authority.

Most of the crimes which disturb the internal peace of society, are produced by the restraints which the necessary, but unequal, laws of property have imposed on the appetites of mankind, by confining to a few the possession of those objects that are coveted by many. Of all appetites, by far the most pernicious, the most impious and insatiable nature, since the pride of one man requires the submission of the multitude. In the tumult of civil discord, the laws of so-

They were the first to withdraw from the empire the reign of the victorious Boche (Bohemia). These came and occupied what is now the Bohemian and Moravian. ciety lose their force, and their place is seldom supplied by those of humanity. 12 The ardour of contention, the pride of victory, the despair of success, the memory of past injuries, and the fear of future dangers, all contribute to inflame the mind, and to silence the voice of reason. From motives like these, it is not to be supposed that the history has been stained with civil blood; but these motives will not account for the unprovoked cruelties of Commodus, who had nothing to wish, and every thing to enjoy. The beloved son of Marcus succeeded to his father, amidst the acclamations of the senate and people. When he ascended the throne, the happy youth saw round him neither competitor to remove, nor enemies to punish. In this calm elevation, it was surely natural, that he should prefer the love of mankind to their detraction, the mild glories of his five predecessors, to the ignominious fate of Nero and Domitian.

Yet Commodus was not, as he has been represented, a tiger born with an insatiate thirst of human blood, and capable, from his infancy, of the most inhuman actions. 13 Nature had formed him of a weak, rather than a wicked, disposition. His infancy and early years revealed the slave of his amatory, and sensuality, and of such a wonderful simplicity of manners. 14 The obsequious senate, at his earnest request, declared her a goddess. She was represented in her temples, with the attributes of Juno, Venus, and Ceres; and it was decreed, that, on the day of their nuptials, the youth of the empire should kiss their vows before the altar of their chaste patrones. 15

Nothing, however, was neglected by the anxious father, and by the men of virtue and learning, whom he summoned to his assistance, to expand the narrow mind of young Commodus, to correct his growing vices, and to render him worthy of the throne for which he was designed. But the power of instruction is seldom of much efficacy, except in those happy dispositions where it is almost superfluous. The distasteful lesson of a grave philosopher, was, in a moment, obliterated by the whisper of a propagating favourite; and Marcus himself 16 blasted the bright hopes of his son, who, at the age of fourteen or fifteen, to a full participation of the imperial power. He lived but four years afterwards; but he lived long enough to repent a rash measure, which raised the impious youth above the restraint of reason and authority.

Most of the crimes which disturb the internal peace of society, are produced by the restraints which the necessary, but unequal, laws of property have imposed on the appetites of mankind, by confining to a few the possession of those objects that are coveted by many. Of all appetites, by far the most pernicious, the most impious and insatiable nature, since the pride of one man requires the submission of the multitude. In the tumult of civil discord, the laws of so-

But the situation of Vindobona, or Vienna, where both the Victories place his death, is better adapted to the operations of the war against the Marcomanni and Quadi. —Dion Cassius, I. lib. 1350. 16 The Quadi occupied the country now called Moravia; the Marcomanni dwelt at first upon the banks of the Rhine and the Mayne. They were the first to withdraw from the empire the reign of the victorious Boche (Bohemia). These came and occupied what is now the Bohemian and Moravian. The Marcomanni established their king in Bohemia by the Savannians or the Schlawiens, who actually occupied it. (See D'Avrille, Gene. R., vol. i. p. 131.)—G. 17 H. H. 15. 18 H. H. 16. dom and integrity Commodus still entertained a tolerant esteem. The young prince and his profligate fa-ourites revelled in all the licences of sovereign power; but his hands were yet unstained with blood; and he had even displayed a generosity of sentiment, which might perhaps have ripened into solid virtue. A fatal incident decided his fluctuating character.
In 185, one evening, as the emperor was reme with an assassin, turning to the palace through a dark portico in the amphitheatre, an assassin, who waited his prise, rushed upon him with a drawn sword, loudly exclaiming, "The senate sends you this!" The menace and the assassin were by the guards immediately revealed the authors of the conspiracy. It had been formed, not in the state, but within the walls of the palace. Lucilla, the emperor's sister, and widow of Lucius Verus, impotent of the second rank, and jealous of the reigning empress, had armed the murderers against her brother's life. She had not ventured to communicate the black design to her second husband Claudius Pompeianus, a senator of distinguished merit and unshaken loyalty; but among the crowd of her lovers, (for she imitated the manners of Faustina) she found men of desperate fortunes and wild ambition, who agreed to serve her, and were only deterred, as well as her tender, passions. The conspirators experienced is tur of justice, and the abandoned princess was punished, first with exile, and afterwards with death.
But the words of the assassin sunk deep into the mind of Commodus, and left an indelible impression of fear and hatred against the whole body of the senate. Those whom he had dreaded as important ministers, he now suspected as secret enemies. The Delators, a race of men discouraged, and almost extinguished der their miserable reigns, again became formidable, as soon as they discovered that the emperor was desirous of finding disaffection and treason in the senate. That assembly, whom Marcus had ever considered as the great council of the nation, was composed of the most distinguished of the Romans; and distinction of every kind soon became criminal. The possessors of wealth stimulated the diligence of the informers; rigid virtue implied a tacit censure of the irregularities of Commodus; important services implied a dangerous superiority of merit; and the friendship of the father always ensured the averison of the son. Suspicion was equivalent to preparation to condemnation. The execution of a considerable senator was attended with the death of all who might lament or revenge his fate; and when Commodus had once tasted human blood, he became incapable of pity or remorse.

Of these innocent victims of tyranny, brothers, none died more lamented than the two brothers of the Quintilian family, Maximus and Condianus; whose fraternal love has saved their names of oblivion, and enshrined their memory to posterity.
Their studies and their occupations, their pursuits and their studies, were still the same. In the enjoyment of great estate, they never admitted the idea of a seapate interest; some fragments are now extant of a treatise which they composed in common; and in every anction of life it was observed, that their two bodies were animated by one soul. The Antonines, who valued their virtue, and disdained in each of them in the same year, to the consulsip; and Marcus afterwards intrusted to their joint care the civil administration of Greece, and a great military command, in which they obtained a signal victory over the Germans. The kind ruelty of Commodus united them in death.

The tyrant's rage, after having shed the minister noblest blood of the senate, at length re-Perennis, coiled on the principal instrument of his cruelty.
Whilst Commodus was immersed in blood and luxury, he devolved the detail of the public business on Perenibus; a servile and ambitious minister, who had attained his post by the murder of his predecessor, but who possessed a considerable share of vigour and ability.
By acts of extortion, and the forfeited estates of the nobles sacrificed to his avarice, he had accumulated an immense treasure. The pretorian guards were under his influence, and immediately afterwards he discovered a military genius, was at the head of the Illyrian legions. Perennis aspired to the empire; or what, in the eyes of Commodus, amounted to the same crime, he was capable of aspiring to it, had he not been prevented, surprised, and put to death. The fall of his station, collected these bands of robbers into a the general history of the empire; but it was hastened by an extraordinary circumstance which proved how much the nerves of discipline were already relaxed. The legions of Britain, discontented with the administration of Perennis, formed a deputation of fifteen hundred men, and, routed from their springs to Rome, and lay their complaints before the emperor.
These military petitioners, by their own determined behaviour, by inflaming the divisions of the guards, by exaggerating the strength of the British army, and by alarming the fears of Commodus, excited and obtained the minister's death, as the only redress of their grievances. This presumption of a distant army, and their discovery of the weakness of government, was a sure prosage of the most dreadful convulsions.

The negligence of the public adminis-the preparation for a new disorder, which arose from the smallest beginnings. A spirit of desertion began to prevail among the troops; and the deserters, instead of seeking their safety in flight or concealment, infested the highways.
Maternus, a private soldier, of a daring boldness above his station, collected these bands of robbers into a littly army, set open the prisons, invited the slaves to assert their freedom, and plundered with impunity the rich and defenceless cities of Gaul and Spain.
The governors of the provinces, who had long been the spectators, and perhaps the partners, of his depreda-tious, were enraged, and rushed from their springs to Rome, and were borne up by the threatening com-bands of the guards. Maternus found that he was encompassed, and foresaw that he must be overpowered. A great effort of despair was his last resource. He ordered his followers to disperse, to pass the Alps in small parties and various

Dio gives him the same glorious character as is assigned to him by the historians. His moderation is almost a pledge of his veracity.

* Gibbon gathers Dion for the narration with which he speaks of Perenius, and, nevertheless in his own account, follows Herodian and Lam-piridius. It is not only with moderation, it is with admiration that Gibbon speaks of Perennis. Dion and Herodian, it is true, follow the Cam-non, and give him all his virtues. They have probably, however, not died virtuous and innocent—perhaps he may be suspected of partiality, but what is singular is, that Gibbon after having adopted the view of Herodian and Lampridius respecting this minister of Com-modus, should embrace the very doubtful account Dion gives of the man and his death. What probability is there, then, that men who merely could have traversed Gaul and Italy, and have arrived at Rome where they and the emperor were, could have prevented the Pruteiiion prefect of the guard, should not have been apprised of their approach and design, and have opposed them? Gibbon foresees this difficulty, adds, that they informed the guards of the guards, but Dion says properly that they did not come to Rome, but that the emperor went to meet them—indeed, they were even reported to have come from the provinces, who were superior in numbers, to oppose them.

disguises, and to assemble at Rome, during the licentious tumult of the festival of Cybele. To murder Commodus, and to ascend the vacant throne, was the ambition of no vulgar robber. His measures were secretly concerted, that his concealed troops already filled the streets of Rome. The envy of an accomplice discovered, and ruined this singular enterprise, in the moment when it was ripe for execution.

The minister

Suspicious princes often amplify the suspicions of others. Having gained a vain permission, that those who have no dependence, except on their favour, will have no attachment, except to the person of their benefactor, Cleander, the successor of Perennis, was a Phrygian by birth; of a nation, over whose stubborn but servile temper he only could prevail. He loaded the last years of his native country, and Rome in the capacity of a slave. As a slave he entered the imperial palace, rendered himself useful to his master's passions, and rapidly ascended to the most exalted station which a subject could enjoy. His influence over the mind of Commodus was much greater than that of his predecessor; for Cleander was devoid of any ability or virtue which could inspire the emperor with awe, and for with envy or distrust. Avarice was cruelly, the reigning passion of his soul, and the great principle of his administration. The rank of consul, of patrician, of senator, was exposed to public sale; and it would have been considered as disaffection and distrust, had not the这类 men been loaded with disgraceful and disgraceful honours with the greatest part of his fortune. In the luxurious provincial employments, the minister shared with the governor the spoils of the people. The execution of the laws was venal and arbitrary. A wealthy criminal might obtain, not only the reversal of the sentence by which he was justly condemned; but might likewise inflict whatever punishment he pleased on the accuser, the witnesses, and the judge.

By these means, Cleander, in the space of three years, had accumulated more wealth than had ever yet been possessed by any freedman. Commodus was perfectly satisfied with the magnificent presents which the artful courtier laid at his feet in the most seasonable moments. To secure the public envy, Cleander, under the emperor's name, erected baths, porticoes, and places of exercise, for the use of the people. He loaded the last fruits of his extensive empire, and virtues of the Antonines. The former, with more integrity than prudence, had attempted to disclose, to his brother-in-law, the true character of Cleander. An equivocal sentence pronounced by the latter, when pros- consul of Asia, against a worthless creature of the fa- vouritism, proved fatal to him. After the fall of Peren- nis, the terrors of Commodus had, for a short time, assumed the appearance of a return to virtue. He repaid the most odious of his acts, loaded his memory with the public exaction, and ascribed to the perfidious counsels of that wicked minister, all the errors of his inexperienced youth. But his repentance lasted only thirty days; and, under Cleander's protection, the administration of Perennis was often regretted.

Pestilence and famine contributed to sustain and fill up the measure of the calamities of death of Clean- Rome. The first could only be imputed to the just indignation of the gods; but a monopoly of corn, supported and encouraged by the state, was the sanction, and conducted Commodus with a Pompeian supporter, was considered as the immediate cause of the sec- ond. The popular discontent, after it had long circu- lated in whispers, broke out in the assembled circus. The people quitted their favourite amusements, for the more delicious pleasure of revenge, rushed in crowds towards a palace, in whose walls bore the emperor's name; and, demanding, with angry clamours, the head of the public enemy. Cleander, who commanded the pretorian guards, ordered a body of cavalry to sal- ty forth, and disperse the seditious multitude. The multitude fled with precipitation towards the city; several were slain, and many more were transported to death; but when the cavalry entered the streets, their pursuit was checked by a shower of stones and darts from the roofs and windows of the houses. The foot guards, who had long been jealous of the prerogatives and insolence of the pretorian cavalry, embraced the party of the people. The tumult became a regular and regular source of gain. The pretorian guards, at length, gave way, composed with numbers; and the tide of popular fury returned with re- doubled violence against the gates of the palace, where Commodus lay, dissolved in luxury, and alone uncon- scious of the civil war. It was death to approach his person with the unwelcome news. He would have perished in this supine security, had not two women, his elder sister Favidia, and Marcia, the most favoured of his concubines, ventured to break into his presence. Bathed in tears, and with dishevelled hair, they threw themselves at his feet; and with all the pressing elo- quence of fear, discovered to the affrighted emperor, the crimes of the minister, the rage of the people, and the impending ruin, which, in a few minutes, would burst over his palace and person. Commodus started from his dream of pleasure, and commanded that the head of Cleander should be thrown out to the people. He instantly appeared on the tumult; and the son of Marcus might even yet have regained the affection and confidence of his subjects.

But every sentiment of virtue and his Diocletian plea- manship was extinct in the mind of Com- modus. Whilst he thus abandoned the affairs of empire to his satellites, he valued nothing in sovereign power, except the unbounded licence of indulging his sensual appetites. His hours were spent in a seraglio of three hundred beautiful wom- en, and as many boys, of every rank, and of every province; and, wherever the arts of seduction proved ineffectual, the brutal lever had recourse to violence.

[1] Herodian, i. p. 28. Dion, lix. p. 1215. The latter says, that two thousand persons died every day at Rome, during a considerable length of time.
[3] These three public depositions occasioned a current rumor that Julius Solon was banished to the senate.
[4] It is not clear in what year Commodus died.
[5] The testamentary gifts of Cleander amounted, however, to upwards of five and twenty thousand pounds; ten- mils.
The ancient historians have extantitated on these barbarous scenes of prostitution, which seemed every restraint of nature or modesty; but it would not be easy to translate their too faithful descriptions into the decency of modern language. The intervals of lust were filled up with the basest amusements. The influence of the Sabinian type of a polite age, and the labour of an attentive and skilful instruction had not been able to fuse into his rude and brutish mind the least tincture of learning; and he was the first of the Roman emperors totally devoid of taste for the pleasures of the understanding. Nero himself excelled, or affected to excel, in the elegant arts of music and poetry; nor should we be surprised, had he not been trained the pleasant relaxation of a leisure hour into the serious business and ambition of his life. But Commodus, from his earliest infancy, discovered an aversion to whatever was rational or liberal, and a fond attachment to the amusements of the populace; the sports of the circus, and amphitheatre, the combats of gladiators, and the hunting of wild beasts. The masters in every branch of learning, whom Marcus provided for his son, were heard with inattention and disgust; whilst the Moors and Parthians, who taught him to darts the javelin and sword with the bow, for his dexterity in his application, and soon equalled the most skilful of his instructors, in the steadiness of the eye, and the dexterity of the hand.

Hunting of wild. The servile crowd, whose fortune depended on their master's successes, applauded these ignorant imitations of nature. The barbarous voice of the garrison reminded him that by exploits of the same nature, by the defeat of the Nemean lion, and the slaughter of the wild boar of Erymanthus, the Grecian Heracles had acquired a place among the gods, and an immortal memory among men. They only forgot to observe, that in the employments of society the animals often dispute with man the possession of an unsettled country, a successful war against those savages is one of the most innocent and beneficial labours of heroism. In the civilized state of the Roman empire, the wild beasts had long since retired from the face of nature; those exercices, which till then he had decently confined within the walls of his palace, and to the presence of a few favourites. On the appointed day, the various motives of bloody, fear, and curiosity, attracted to the amphitheatre an innumerable multitude of spectators; and some degree of applause was deserved by the uncommon skill of the imperial performer. Whether he aimed at the head or heart of the animal, the wound of Lucilla, was the only senator who asserted the honour of his rank. As a father, he permitted his sons to consult their safety by attending the amphitheatre. As a Roman, he declared, that his own life was in the Emperor's hands, but that he would never behold the son of Marcus prostituting his person and dignity. Not long after this, Pompasius escaped the resentment of the tyrant, and, as his honour, had the good fortune to preserve his life.

2 The African lions, when pressed by hunger, infested the open villages of the inhabitants; and their stone axes or hammers were mere sticks. The royal beast was reserved for the pleasures of the emperor and the capital; and the unfortunate peasant who killed one of them, though in self-defence committed a mere homicide. Their boasted game law was mitigated by Honorius, and fully repealed by Justinian.

Commodus had now attained the summit of vice and infamy. Amidst the acclamations of a flattering court, he was unable to disguise from himself, that he had despised the Senate and hated the life of virtue and virtue in his empire. His ferocious spirit was irritated by the consciousness of that hatred, by the envy of every kind of merit, by the just apprehension of danger, and by the habit of slaughter, which he contracted in his daily amusements. History has preserved a long list of consular senators sacrificed to his wanton suspicion, which sought out, with peculiar anxiety, those unfortunate persons connected, however remotely, with the family of the Antonines, without sparing even the ministers of his crimes or pleasures. His cruelty proved at last to be fatal to himself. He had shed with impunity the blood of his enemies for the space of thirteen years, and now, as speedily as he was dreaded by his own domestics, Marcia, his favourite concubine, Euclea, his chamberlain, and Lotius his pretorian prefect, alarmed by the fate of their companions and predecessors, resolved to prevent the destruction which every hour hung over their heads, either from the madness of the tyrant, or the sudden indignation of the people. Marcia seized the occasion of presenting a draught of wine to her lover, after he had fatigued himself with hunting some wild beasts. Commodus retired to sleep; but whilst the wine was working on his heart and sinews, the son and drunkenness, a robust youth, by profession a wrestler, entered his chamber, and strangled him without resistance. The body was secretly conveyed out of the palace, before the least suspicion was entertained in the city, or even in the court, of the emperor's death. Such was the fate of the son of Marcus, and so easy was it to destroy a hated tyrant, who, by the artificial powers of government, had oppressed, during thirteen years, so many millions of subjects, each of whom was equal to his master in personal strength and personal ability.

He never saw him in the council, that he might avoid the sight of his father's infirmities; but while his infirmities had suddenly left him, and they returned as suddenly upon him, he was seized with incontinence of action, and was dead in a few moments.

2. The prefects were changed almost hourly or daily; and the members of the Senate, once fatal to his most favoured chamberlains.

[Commodus had already resolved to destroy them the following night, and to have proceeded on a visit to Rome; but when he learned that they had deserted him, he put it off until the following day.]

[The prefects, who had a care for the imperial household, had been for some time planning the death of Commodus, and had seized the opportunity of the emperor's illness to murder him, but Commodus by means of an impostor had been induced to follow a different course.]

[He was a natural son of Abus Pompaia, in Piedmont, and of a timber merchant. The order of his employment (it is marked by Cleophaclus) well deserves to be set down, as expressive of the form of government and manners of the age.

1. He was a centurion, 2. friends and ministers of Marcus; and when, at a late hour of the night, he was awakened with the news, that the chamberlain and the prefect were at his door, he received them with intrepid resignation, and desired they would execute their master's orders. Instead of death, they offered him the throne of the Roman world. During some consultation of their intentions and designs. Convinced at length of the death of Commodus, he accepted the purple with a sincere reluctance, the natural effect of his knowledge both of the duties and of the dangers of the supreme rank.

Lactantius conducted without delay his new emperor to the camp of the pretorians, diffusing at the same time through the city a seasonable report that Commodus died suddenly of an apoplexy; and that the virtuous Pertinax had already succeeded to the throne. The guards were rather surprised than pleased with the suspicious death of a prince, whose indulgence and liberality they alone had experienced; but the emergency of the occasion, the authority of their prefect, the reputation of Pertinax, and the clamours of the people, obliged them to stifle their secret discontent, to accept the donative promised of the new emperor, and to swear allegiance to him.

They were assured that the Senate and mob, as well as the gladiators, had maintained their promises to conduct him to the senate-house, that the military consent might be ratified by the civil authority.

This important night was now far and by the senate, with the dawn of day, and the absence of the commencement of the new year, the senators expected a summons to attend an ignominious ceremony. In spite of all remonstrances, even of those of his creatures, who yet preserved any regard for prudence or decency, Commodus had resolved to pass the night in the gladiators' school, and from presence to take possession of the palace, as a habit and with the attendance of that infamous crew. On a sudden, before the break of day, the senate was called together in the temple of Concord, to meet the guards, and to ratify the election of a new emperor.

For a few minutes they sat in silent suspense, doubtfully of their unexpected deliverance, and suspicious of the cruel artifices of Commodus; but when at length they were assured that the tyrant was no more, they resigned themselves to all the transports of joy and indignation. Pertinax, who modestly represented the meanness of his extraction, and pointed out several consular senators more deserving of the imperial crown, was constrained by their dutiful violence to ascend the throne, and received all the titles of imperial power, confirmed by the most sincere vows of fidelity. The memory of Commodus, the name of tyrant, of gladiator, of public plunderer, of enemy, resonated in every corner of the house. They decreed, in tumultuous votes, that his honours should be be reversed, his titles erased from the public monuments, his statues thrown down, his body dragged with a hook into the stripping-room of the gladiators, to satiate the public fury; and they expressed some indignation against those officious servants who had already presumed to screen his remains from the justice of the senate. But Pertinax could not refuse those last respects to his memory. Marcus Aurelius, his first protector Claudius Pompeianus, who lamented the cruel fate of his brother-in-law, and lamented still more that he had deserved it.

Legal jurisdiction of the senators: the emperor Commodus.

The effusions of impotent rage against the dead emperor, whom the senate had plethora when alarmed by the most plausible servility, betrayed a just but ungenerous spirit of revenge. The legality of these decrees was however supported by the principles of the imperial constitution. To censure, to depose, or to punish with death, the first magistrate of the republic, who had also the character of a citizen, was a doubtless prerogative of the Roman senate; but that feeble assembly was obliged to content itself with inflicting on a fallen tyrant that public justice, from which, during his life and reign, he had been shielded by the strong arm of military despotism.

Virtues of Pertinax. Pertinax found a nobler way of condemning his predecessor's memory; by the contrast of his own virtues with the vices of Commodus. On the day of his accession, he resigned over to his wife and son his whole private fortune; that they might have no pretence to solicit favours at the expense of the state. He refused to flatter the vanity of the former with the title of Augusta; or to corrupt the inexperienced youth of the latter by the rank of Caesar. Accurately distinguishing between the duties of a parent and those of a sovereign, he educated his son with a severity, which, while it gave him no assured prospect of the throne, might in time have rendered him worthy of it. In public, the behaviour of Pertinax was grave and affable. He lived with the virtuous part of the senate, (and, in a private station, he had been acquainted with the true character of each individual,) without either pride or jealousy; considered them as friends and companions, with whom he had shared the dangers of the tyranny, and with whom he wished to enjoy the security of the present time. He very frequently invited them to familiar entertainments, the frugality of which was demonstrated by them; and regretted the luxurious prodigality of Commodus.

He endeavours to heal, as far as it was possible, the wounds inflicted by the hand of tyranny, was the pleasing, but melancholy, task of Pertinax. The innocent victims, who yet survived, were recalled from exile, released from prison, and restored to the full possession of their honours and fortunes. The unbaked bodies of murdered senators (for the cruelty of Commodus endeavoured to extend itself beyond death) were deposited in the sepulchres of their ancestors; their memory was justified; and every consolation was bestowed on their ruined and afflicted families. Among these consolations, none was more grateful to the senators; none was more consolatory to the common enemies of their master, of virtue, and of their country. Yet even in the inquisition of these legal assassins, Pertinax proceeded with a steady temper, which gave every thing to justice, and nothing to passion. Among these consolations, none was more grateful to the senators; none was more consolatory to the common enemies of their master, of virtue, and of their country.
CHAPTER V.

OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

The power of the sword is more sensibly felt in an extensive monarchy, than in a small community. It has been cultivated by the ablest politicians, that no state, without the sword, can maintain the happiness of a hundredth part of its members in arms and idleness. But although this relative proportion may be uniform, the influence of the army over the rest of the society will vary according to the degree of its positive strength. The advantages of military science and discipline cannot be exerted, unless the soldiery are united into one body, and actuated by one soul. With a handful of men, such an union would be ineffectual; with an unwieldy host, it would be impracticable; and the powers of the machine would be alike destroyed by the extreme minuteness, or the excessive weight, of its springs. To illustrate this observation, we need only reflect, that there is no superiority of natural strength, artificial weapons, or acquired skill, which could enable one man to keep in constant subjection one hundred of his fellow creatures: the tyrant of a single town or a small district, would soon discover that an hundred armed followers were a weak defence against ten thousand earnest and sincere cutratures of the injured emperor; who conjured the senate, that the purity of his reign might not be stained by the blood even of a guilty senator.

The pretorian camp was that of the emperor, whose licentiousness The pretorian fury was the first symptom and cause of the decline of the Roman empire, scarcely amounted to the last mentioned number. They derived their institution from Augustus. Their eminence, sensible that laws might colour, but that arms alone could maintain, his usurped dominion, had gradually formed this powerful body of guards, in constant readiness to protect his person, to save the senate, and either to prevent or to crush the first motions of rebellion. He distinguished these favoured troops by a double pay, and superior privileges; but, as their formidable aspect would at once have alarmed and irritated the Roman people, three cohorts only were stationed in the capital; whilst the remainder was dis- posted in the adjacent towns of Italy.

Such formidable servants are always the strongest necessary, but often fatal, to the throne and condition of despots. By thus introducing the pretorian guards as it were into the palace and the senate, the emperors taught them to perceive their own strength, and the weakness of the civil government; to view the virtues of their masters with familiar contempt, and to lay aside that fear which the light, active, and mystery, can preserve, towards an imaginary power. In the luxurious idleness of an opulent city, their pride was nourished by the sense of their irresistible weight; nor was it possible to conceal from them, that the person of the sovereign, the authority of the 1 They were originally nine or ten thousand men, (for Tactius and Dion are not agreed upon the subject,) divided into many cohorts.

2 Vitellius increased the pretorian number, and when he had completed his army, he went to the Praetorian Guards, (his friends, one thinks,) and in Mitre the uniform of the standard soldier, 37, Dion Cassius, I, liv. 27.

3 In the civil war between Vitellius and Vespasian, the pretorian camp was attacked and defended with all the machines used in the siege of Tyre, (Tacit. Hist. iv. 28.)

In the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Chapter V, the author, Edward Gibbon, describes the fall of Rome and the rise of the Byzantine Empire. The passage begins with the Senate, the political center of Rome, and the empire itself, which were all in their hands. Gibbon then explains how the pretorian bands, known for their dangerous and often violent nature, were formed and how they became a significant part of Roman politics. The pretorian bands were used by emperors to maintain control and were often responsible for political assassinations and uprisings. Gibbon's account highlights the turbulent history of Rome, with emperors like Nero and Caligula engaging in power struggles and the pretorian bands playing a crucial role in these conflicts. The passage is a vivid and detailed account of Rome's decline, with a focus on the pretorian band's influence on Roman history.
The public disaffection of the world he found himself without a friend, and, considering him of the approaching ruin, disposed themselves as ashamed of the prince whom their aversion had persuaded them to accept; nor was there a citizen that did not consider his elevation with horror, as the last insult on the Roman name. The nobility, whose conspicuous station, and ample possessions, enabled them to bear a part in the agitation, disdained to partake of the sentiments, and met the affected civility of the emperor with smiles of complacency, and professions of duty. But the people, secure in their numbers and obscurity, gave a free vent to their passions. The streets and public places of Rome resounded with clamours and imprecations. Claudius, who had enjoyed the last person of Julian, rejected his liberality, and conscious of the impotence of their own resentment, they called aloud on the legions of the frontiers to assert the violated majesty of the Roman empire.

The armies of Britain and of Illyricum, lamented the death of Pertinax, in whose company, or under whose command, they had so often fought; and conquered. They received with surprise, with indignation, and perhaps with fear, the news of a change in the government; but the pretorians had disposed of the empire by public auction; and they sternly refused to ratify the ignominious bargain. Their immediate and unanimous revolt was fatal to Julian, but it was fatal at the same time to the public peace; as the generals of the respective armies, Claudius Albinus, Pescennius Niger, and Septimius Severus, were still more anxious to succeed than to revenge, the murdered Pertinax. Their forces were exactly balanced. Each of them was at the head of threelegions; with a numerous train of auxiliaries; and however different in their characters, they were all soldiers, and disdained to be governed but by the ancient and traditional mode.

Claudius Albinus, governor of Britain, surpassed both his competitors in the nobility of his extraction, which he derived from some of the most illustrious names of the old republic. The branch from whence he claimed his descent, was sunk in mean circumstances, and transplanted into a remote province. It is difficult to form a just idea of his true character. Under the philosophic cloak of austerity, he stands accused of concealing most of the virtues which degrade human nature. But his accusers are those venal writers who adore the form, but in truth hate the substance of the Legionary. Virtue, or the appearances of virtue, recommended Albinus to the confidence and good opinion of Marcus; and his preserving with the son the same interest which he had acquired with the father, is a proof at least that he was possessed of a very flexible disposition. The favour of a tyrant does not always suppose a want of merit in the object of it; he may, without intending it, reward a man of worth and ability, or he may find such a man useful to his own service. It does not appear that Albinus served the son of Marcus, either as the minister of his cruelties, or even as the witness of his pleasures. He was employed in a distant honourable command, when he received a confidential letter from the emperor, acquainting him of the emperor's designs on the government, and authorizing him to declare himself the guardian and successor of the throne, by assuming the title and ensigns of Caesar. The governor of Britain wisely declined the dangerous honour, which would have marked him for the jealousy, or involved him in the approaching ruin, of Commodus. He courted power by nobler, or, at least, by more specious arts. On a premature report of the death of the emperor, he assembled his troops; and, in an elegant discourse, deplored the inevitable mischiefs of despotism, described the happiness and glory which their elevation was to confer on the republic, and declared his firm resolution to re-establish the senate and people in their legal authority. This popular harangue was answered by the loud acclamations of the British legions, and received at Rome with a secret murmur of applause. Safe in the possession of this little world, and in the command of an army less distinguished indeed for discipline than for numbers and valour, Albinus braved the menaces of Commodus, maintained towards Pertinax a stately ambiguous reserve, and instantly declared against the usurpation of Julian. The convulsions of the capital added new confusion; no one dared to crew his strength; but as the pretorians engaged in the conflict of patriotism. A regard to decency induced him to decline the lofty titles of Augustus and emperor; and he imitated perhaps the example of Galba, who, on another occasion, had styled himself the Lieutenant of the senate and people.

Personal merit alone had raised Pescennius Niger censuerus Niger, from an obscure birth in Syria, and station, to the government of Syria; a lucrative and important command, which, in times of civil confusion, gave him a near prospect of the throne. Yet his part seems to have been better suited to the second than to the first rank; he was an unsuitable man for the post he might have approved himself an excellent lieutenant, to Severus, who afterwards displayed the greatness of his mind by adopting several useful institutions from a vanquished enemy. In his government, Niger acquired the esteem of the soldiers, and the love of the provincials. His rigid discipline fortified the valour and confirmed the obedience of the former, whilst the voluptuous Syrians were less delighted with the mild firmness of his administration, than with the facility of his manners, and the apparent pleasure with which he attended their frequent and pompous festivals. Yet the consul of the year in which the murder of Pertinax had reached Autiochus, the wishes of Asia invited Niger to assume the imperial purple and revenge his death. The legions of the eastern frontier embraced his cause; the opulent but unarmed provincials from the frontiers of Ethiopia to the Hadriatic, cheerfully submitted to his power; and the kings beyond the Tigris and the Euphrates congratulated his election, and offered him their homage and services. The mind of Niger was not capable of receiving this sudden tide of fortune; he flattered himself that his accession would be undisturbed by competition, and unattended by civil blood. But he had enjoyed the vain pomp of triumph, he neglected to secure the means of victory. Instead of entering into an effectual negociation with the powerful armies of the tia, which occupied the space between the Danube and the Hadriratie, was one of the last and most difficult conquests of the Romans. In the defence of national freedom, two hundred thousand of these barbarians had once appeared in the field, alarmed the disunited provinces, and exercised the vigilance of Tiberius at the head of the collected force of the empire. The Pannonians yielded at length to the arms and institutions of Rome. Their recent subject, however, the neighbourhood, and even the mixture, of the unconquered tribes, and perhaps the climate, adapted, as it has been observed, to the production of great bodies and slow minds, all contributed to preserve some remains of their original ferocity, and under the name and uniform countenance of Roman provincials, the hardy features of the natives were still to a certain extent preserved in their warlike and unforpered attitude. They furnished an inexhaustible supply of recruits to the legions stationed on the banks of the Danube, and which, from a perpetual warfare against the Germans and Sarmatians, were deservedly esteemed the best troops in the service.

The Pannonian army was at this time run commanded by Septimus Severus, a native of Africa, who, in the gradual ascent of private honours, had concealed his daring ambition, which was never diverted from its steady course by the allurements of pleasure, the apprehensions of danger, or the false hopes of safety. On the first mention of the name of Pertinax, he assembled his troops, painted in the most lively colours the crime, the insolence, and the weakness of the pretorian guards, and animated the legions to arms and to revenge. He concluded (and the peroration was thought extremely eloquent) with promising every soldier about four hundred pounds; an honourable donation, double in value to the infamous bribe with which Julian had purchased the empire. 4 The acclamations of the army immediately saluted Severus with the names of the two former consuls of Rome, Pertinax, and emperor. The Pannonian legions saluted him, and he thus attained the lofty station of a consul and an emperor.

April 13. which he was invited, by conscious merit and a long train of dreams and omens, the fruitful offsprings either of his superstition or policy.

The new candidate for empire had improved the popular estimate of his situation. His province extended from the Danube to the Alps, and gave an easy access Marches into Italy; and he remembered the say-

Italy. ing of Augustus, That a Pannonian army might in ten days appear in sight of Rome. 5 By a celerity proportioned to the greatness of the occasion, he might reasonably hope to revenge Pertinax, punish Julian, and receive the homage of the senate and people, as their lawful emperor, before his competitors, separated from Italy by an immense tract of sea and land, were apprised of his success, or even of his election. The few hundred miles which still separated him allowed himself any moments for sleep or food; marching on foot, and in complete armour, at the head of his columns, he insinuated himself into the confidence and affection of his troops, pressed their diligence, revived their spirits, maintained their hope, and determined to share the hardships of the meanest soldier, whilst he kept in view the infinite superiority of his reward.

The wretched Julian had expected, and Advances tothought himself prepared, to dispute the empire with the governor of Syria; but in the invincible and rapid approach of the Pannonian legions, he saw his inevitable ruin. The hasty arrival of every messenger increased his just apprehensions. He was successively informed, that Severus had passed the Alps; that the Italian cities, unwilling or unable to oppose him, had surrendered themselves to him; that the most prudent professions of joy and duty; that the important place of Ravenna had surrendered without resistance, and that the Hadriratie fleet was in the hands of the conqueror. The enemy was now within two hundred and fifty miles of Rome; and every moment diminished the uncertainty of life and empire alluded to Julian.

He attempted, however, to prevent, of his throne at least to protract, his ruin. He implored the fervent prayer of the pretorians, filled the city with unavailing preparations for war, drew lines round the suburbs, and even strengthened the walls of his palace; but the pretorians, were defended without hope of relief, against a victorious invader. Fear and shame prevented the guards from deserting his standard; but they trembled at the name of the Pannonian legions, commanded by an experienced general, and accustomed to vanquish the barbarians on the frozen Danube. They quitted, with a sigh, the pleasures of the baths and theatres, to put on arms, whose use they had almost forgotten, and beneath the weight of which they were oppressed. The practicised elephants, whose uncouth appearance, it was supposed, would strike terror into the army of the unac-tomed mountaineers, were defended without hope of relief, against a victorious invader. from the only danger of secret conspiracy, by the faithful attendance of six hundred chosen men, who never quitted his person or their cuirasses, either by night or day, during the whole march. Advancing with a steady and firm pace, and his ambitious heart in the dells of the Apennines, received into his party the troops and ambassadors sent to retard his progress, and made a short halt at Interamnia, about seventy miles from Rome. His victory was already secured; but the despair of the pretorians might have rendered it bloody; and Severus had the humble ambition of ascending the throne without drawing the sword.26 His emissaries, dispersed in the capital, assured the guards, that provided they would abandon their worthless prince, and the perpetrators of the murder of Pertinax, to the justice of the conqueror, he would no longer consider that melancholy event as the act of the whole body. The faithless pretorians, whose resistance was supported only by sullen obstinacy, gladly complied with the easy conditions, seized the greatest part of the assassins, and signified to the senate, that they no longer defended the cause of Julian. That stubborn band, convoked by the consuls, unanimously acknowledged Severus as lawful emperor, decreed divine honours to Pertinax, and pronounced a sentence of deposition and death against his unfortunate successor.

Julian was conducted into a private apartment of the baths of the palace, and there, having purchased, with an immense treasure, an anxious and precarious reign of only sixty-six days.27 The almost incredible expedition of Severus, who, in so short a space of time, conducted a numerous army from the banks of the Danube to those of the Tyber, proves at once the plenty of provisions produced by agriculture and commerce, the goodness of the roads, the discipline of the legions, and the indolent subdued temper of the provinces.28

Dignity of the pretorian guards

Disgraceful to the pretorians. The first cares of Severus were bestowed on two measures, the one dictated by policy, the other by clemency; the revenge, and the honours, due to the memory of Pertinax. Before the new emperor entered Rome, he issued his commands to the pretorian guards, directing them to await his arrival on a large plain near the city, without arms, but in the habits of ceremony, in which they were employed in private life. His order was obeyed by those haughty troopers, whose command was the effect of their just terror. A chosen part of the Illyrian army encompassed them with levelling spears. Incapable of flight or resistance, they expected their fate in silent consternation. Severus mounted the chair of authority, took up the baton, and piously disarmed them, dismissing them with ignominy from the trust which they had betrayed, dispersing them of their splendid ornaments, and banishing them, on pain of death, to the distance of an hundred miles from the capital. During the transaction, another detachment had been sent to seize their arms, occupy their camp, and prevent the hasty consequences of their despair.29

Funeral and consecration of Pertinax

The funeral and consecration of Pertinax was next solemnized with every circumstance of sad magnificence.30 The senate, with a melancholy pleasure, performed the last rites to that excellent prince, whom they had loved, and still regretted. The concern of his successor was probably less sincere. He esteemed the virtues of Pertinax, but those virtues would for ever have confirmed his ambition, and produced his funeral oration with studied eloquence, inward satisfaction, and well-acted sorrow; and by this pious regard to his memory, convinced the credulous multitude that he alone was worthy to supply his place. Sensible, however, that arms, not ceremonies, must assert his claim to the empire, he left Rome at the end of thirty days, and without suffering himself to be elated by this easy victory, prepared to encounter his more formidable rivals.

The uncommon abilities and fortune of Severus have induced an elegant historian to compare him with the first and Albinus, greatest of the Caesars.31 The parallel is, at least, imperfect. Where shall we find, in the character of Severus, the commanding superiority of soul, the generous clemency, and the various genius, which could reconcile and unite the love of pleasure, the thirst of knowledge, and the fire of ambition? In one instance only, they may be compared, with some degree of propriety; in the celerity of their motions, and their civil victories. In less than four years,32 A.D. 190—197, Severus subdued the richies of the east, and valor of the west. He vanquished two competitors for high command, and secured the armies, provided with weapons and discipline equal to his own. In that age, the art of fortification, and the principles of tactics, were well understood by all the Roman generals; and the constant superiority of Severus was that of an artist, who used the same instruments with more skill and industry than his rivals. I shall not, however, enter into a minute narrative of those military operations; but as the two civil wars against Niger and against Albinus were almost the same in their conduct, event, and consequences, I shall collect into one point of view, the most striking circumstances, tending to develop the character of the conqueror, and the state of the empire.

Falsehood and insincerity, unsuitable Conduct of the as they seem to the dignity of public life in wars. transactions, offend us with a less degrading idea of meanness, than when they are found in the intercourse of private life. In the one instance, they destroy the courage; in the other, only a defect of power: and, as it is impossible for the most able statesmen to subdue millions of followers and enemies by their own personal strength, the world, under the name of policy, seems to have granted them a very liberal indulgence of falsehood.33 By this means, the arts of Severus cannot be justified by the most ample privileges of state reason. He promised only to betray, he flattered only to ruin; and however he might occasionally bind himself by oaths and treaties, his conscience, obsequious to his interest, always released him from the inconvenient obligation.34

If his two competitors, reconciled by towards Niger; their common danger, had advanced upon him without delay, perhaps Severus would have sunk under their united effort. Had they even attacked him, at the same time, with separate views and separate armies, the contest might have been long and doubtful. But they fell, singly and successively, an easy prey to the arts as well as arms of their subtle enemy, lulled into security by the moderation of his

28 From these sixty-six days, we must first deduct sixteen, as Pertinax was murdered on the 25th of March, and Severus most probably arrived on the 1st of April. (see Hist. August. c. xiii. iii. p. 293. Note 7.) We cannot allow less than ten days after his election, to put a numerous army in motion. Forty days remain for this rapid march; and as we may compute about eight hundred miles from Rome to the neighbourhoood of Vienna, allowing two months to make twenty miles every day, without halt or intermission.

30 Though it is not, most assuredly, the intention of Lutatius to exact the character of Clarus, yet his setting him up in the title-page of the Panegyric, where he describes him, at the same time, making love to Cleopatra, sustaining a siege against the power of Egypt, and converting the whole body of the people of that country, can only be the cobest panegyric.

professions, and overwhelmed by the rapidity of his action. He first marched against Niger, whose reputation and power he the most dreaded; but he declined and opposed, supposing the name of his antagonist, and only signified to the senate and people his intention of regulating the eastern provinces. In private he spoke of Niger, his old friend and intended successor, with the most affectionate regard, and highly applauded his generous design of revenging this injury. To publish the vile usurpan of the throne, was the duty of every Roman general. To persevere in arms, and to resist a lawful emperor, acknowledged by the senate, would alone render him criminal. The sons of Niger had fallen into his hands among the children of the provincial governors, detained at Rome as pledges for the loyalty of their parents. As long as the power of Niger inspired terror, or even respect, they were educated with the most tender care, with the children of Severus himself; but they were soon involved in their father's dangers and removed, first by the conspiracy, and afterwards by death, from the eye of public compassion.

Whilst Severus was engaged in his eastern war, he had reason to apprehend that the governor of Britain might pass the sea and the Alps, occupy the vacant seat of empire, and oppose the election with the authority of the senatorial forces of the west. The ambitious conduct of Albinus, in not assuming the imperial title, left room for negotiation. Forgetting, at once, his professions of patriotism, and the jealousy of sovereign power, he accepted the precarious rank of Caesar, as a reward for his high ambition. Till the first contest was decided, Severus treated the man, whom he had doomed to destruction, with every mark of esteem and regard. Even in the letter, in which he announced his victory over Niger, he styles Albinus the brother of his soul and empire, sends him the affectionate salutations of his wife, full of tenderness, and entreats him to preserve the armies and the republic faithful to their common interest. The messengers charged with this letter were instructed to accost the Caesar with respect, to desire a private audience, and to plunge their dagger into his heart. The design was discovered, and the too credulous Albinus, at length, passed over to the continent, and prepared for an unequal contest with his rival, who rushed upon him at the head of a veteran and victorious army.

Event of the.

The military labours of Severus seem to have been subordinate to the importance of his other employments. Two engagements, 1 the one near the Hellespont, the other in the narrow defiles of Cilicia, decided the fate of his Syrian competitor; and the troops of Europe asserted their usual ascendancy over the effeminate natives of Asia. 2 The battle of Lyons, where one hundred and fifty thousand 3 Baebians were engaged, was equally fatal to Albinus. The valour of the British army maintained, indeed, a sharp and doubtful contest with the hardy discipline of the Illyrian legions. The fame and person of Severus appeared, during a few moments, irrecoverably lost, till that warlike prince rallied his fainting troops, and led them on to a decisive victory. 4 The war was finished by that memorable day.

The wars of modern Europe decided by one have been distinguished, not only by the ferocious animosity, but likewise by the obstinate perseverance, of the contending factions. They have generally been justified by some principle, or, at least, coloured by some pretext, of religion, freedom, or liberty. The leaders of these ambitious and depraved passions, were the two eldest brothers of the Neronian dynasty and hereditary influence. The troops fought like men interested in the decision of the quarrel; and as military spirit and party zeal were strongly diffused throughout the whole community, a vanquished chief was immediately supported by new adherents, eager to shed their blood in the same cause. But the Romans, after the fall of the republic, combated only for the choice of masters. Under the standard of a popular candidate for empire, a few enlisted from affection, some from fear, many from interest, none from principle. The legions, from Europe into Asia, it had been allure into civil war by liberal donatives, and still more liberal promises. A defeat, by disabling the chief from the performance of his engagements, dissolved the mercenary allegiance of his followers; and left them to consult their own safety, by a timely desertion of the cause of their former employer, or an appeal to the provinces, under whose name they were oppressed or governed; they were driven by the impulse of the present power, and as soon as that power yielded to a superior force, they hastened to implore the clemency of the conqueror, who, as he had an immense debt of discharge, was obliged to sacrifice the most guilty countries to the avarice of his soldiers.

In the vast extent of the Roman empire, there were few fortified cities capable of protecting a routed army; nor was there any person, or family, or order of men, whose natural interest, unsupported by the powers of the government, was capable of restoring the cause of a sinking party. 5 Yet, in the contest between Niger and

Severus, a single city deserves an honorable exception. As Byzantium was one of the great principalities of ancient Asia, it had been provided with a strong garrison, and a fleet of five hundred vessels was anchored in the harbour. 6 The impetuousity of Severus disappointed this prudent scheme of defence; he left to his generals the siege of Byzantium, forced the less guarded passage of the Hellespont, and hastened to his enemy in Greece, to forward an encounter with his rival. Byzantium, attacked by a numerous and increasing army, and afterwards by the naval power of the empire, sustained a siege of three years, and remained faithful to the name and memory of Niger. The citizens and soldiers (we know not from what cause) were animated with equal fury, several of the principal officers of Niger, who dispaired of, or who disbanded, a pardon, had thrown themselves into this last refuge: the fortifications were esteemed impregnable, and, in the defence of the place, a celebrated engineer displayed all the mechanic arts of the ancients. 7 Byzantium, at length, surrendered to famine. The magistrates and soldiers were put to the sword, the walls demolished, the privileges suppressed, and the destined capital of the east subsisted only as an open village, subject to the insulting jurisdiction of Perinthus. The historian Dion, who had admired the flourishing and lamented the desolate, state of Byzantium, ascended to the summit of the acropolis, and admiring the Roman people of the strongest bulwark against the barbarians of Pontus and Asia. The truth of this observation was but too well justified in the succeeding age, when the Gothic fleets covered the Euxine, and passed through the undefended Bosphorus into the centre of the Mediterranean.

1Whilst Severus was very dangerously ill, it was industriously given out, that he intended to appoint Niger and Albinus his successors. As he could not be sincere in his respect for both, he might as well be so with regard to either. Yet Severus carried his hypocrisy so far, as to profess that intention in the memoir of his own life.

Deaths of Niger and Albinus. Consequences of the civil wars. Both Niger and Albinus were discovered and put to death in their flight from the field of battle. Their fate excited neither surprise nor compassion. They had staked their lives against the chance of empire, and suffered what they would have inflicted; nor did Severus claim the arrogant superiority of suffering his rivals to live in a private station. But his unforgiving temper, stimulated by avarice, indulged a spirit of revenge, where there was no room for apprehension. The most considerable of the provincials, who, without the least proof of guilt, became the surest of the governor under whose authority they were accidentally placed, were punished by death, exile, and especially by the confiscation of their estates. Many cities of the east were stripped of their ancient honours, and obliged to pay to the treasury of Severus, four hundred thousand of the sums contributed by them for the service of Niger.

Antimony of Severus against cruelty of Niger was, in some measure, restrained by the uncertainty of the event, and his pretended reverence for the senate. The head of Albinus was presented with a letter, informing the Romans, that he was resolved to spare none of the adherents of his unfortunate competitors. He was irritated by the just suspicion that he never had possessed the affections of the senate, and he concealed his old malevolence under the recent discovery of some reasonable correspondences. Thirty-five senators, however, accused of having favoured the party of Albinus, he freely pardoned; and, by his subsequent behaviour, endeavoured to convince them, that he had forgotten, as well as forgiven, their supposed offences. But at the same time he condemned forty-two citizens of Tarsus to death. He put to death the empress Eunice; his wives, children, and clients, attended them in death, and the noblest provincials of Spain and Gaul were involved in the same ruin. Such rigid justice, for so he termed it, was, in the opinion of Severus, the only conduct capable of ensuring peace to the state, or stability to the prince; and he conceived slenderness to lament, that, to be mild, it was necessary that he should first be cruel.

1 Perinthus, upon the shores of the Propontis, was finally called Dion, and this ruin can be traced in the present town, not far from the site of this city, now in ruins. See D'Aubigné, Geog. voc. vol. i. p. 291. Byzantium, afterwards Constantinople, caused in its turn, the decline of Herodes. — G.

2 Notwithstanding the authority of Spartianus and some modern Greeks, we may be allowed from Dion and Herodian, that Byzantium, many years after the death of Severus, lay in ruins.

3 The number of inhabitants is estimated by Severus at 75,000; others suppose 20,000. Measured with the public granaries of corn in the province of Asia, which were each of 25,000 modii, or about 5000 quinners per day, I am persuaded that the granaries of ancient Byzantium in no per in the same circumstances were not less plentiful, that policy on the one hand, and admiration on the other, magnified the town beyond its real extent.

4 See Fagan's history of the British Isles.

5 The picture of the history which has been preserved of the destruction of this town is very fragmentary, and the ruin itself is not very easy to reconcile with the account of Dion; besides, also, the latter spoke of it in the fragments of his history which have been preserved, to Herodian. In this manner, he and many others, have generally considered, and there are so many inaccuracies in the history of Severus, that it cannot be probable that this is one of them. — G.

the army, and exhorting one of his generals to begin the necessary reformation from the tribunes themselves; since, as he justly observes, the officer who has forfeited the esteem, will never command the obedience, of his soldiers. Had the emperor pursued the train of reflection, he would have discovered, that the primary cause of this general corruption might be ascribed, not to the weakness of the Roman laws, but to the pernicious indulgence, however, of the commander in chief.

The pretorians, who murdered their own command of the praetorian guards, the chief ministers of the emperor and sold the empire, had regarded the idea, to have discovered, that their chief function was to be the executor of the imperial will, and, increased to four times the ancient number. Formerly these troops had been recruited in Italy; and as the adjacent provinces gradually imbided the softer manner of Rome, the levies were extended to Macedonia, Noricum, and Spain. In the course of these changes, the new levies were less distinguished than the troops of war, it was established by Severus, that from all the legions of the frontiers, the soldiers most distinguished for strength, valour, and fidelity, should be occasionally drafted; and promoted, as a mark of the reward, into the more eligible service of the guards. By this new system, the youth were diverted from the exercise of arms, and the capital was terrified by the strange aspect and manners of a multitude of barbarians. But Severus flattered himself, that the legions would consider these new levies of the praetorian guards, the raw material of the whole military order; and that the present aid of fifty thousand men, superior in arms and appointments to any force that could be brought into the field against them, would for ever crush the hopes of rebellion, and secure the empire to himself and his posterity.

The emperor, from his popular favor, and the formidable troops soon became the first office of the empire. As the government degenerated into military despotism, the praetorian prefect, who in his origin had been a simple captain of the guards, was placed, not only at the head of the army, but of the finances, and even of the law. In every department of administration, he represented the person, and exercised the authority, of the emperor. The first prefect who enjoyed and abused this immense power was Plautianus, the favorite minister of Severus. His reign lasted above ten years, till the murder of his daughter with the oldest son of the emperor, which seemed to assure his fortune, proved the occasion of his ruin. The animosities of the palace, by irritating the ambition and alarming the fear of Plautianus, threatened to produce a revolution, and obliged the emperor, who still loved him, to consent with reluctance to his death. After the fall of Plautianus, an eminent lawyer, the celebrated Papinian, was appointed to execute the matry of office of praetorian prefect.

Till the reign of Severus, the virtue of the senate was even the good sense of the emperors provoked by military despotism, had been distinguished by their zeal or attachment to the republic, but to the passive and favorable regard to the nice frame of civil policy instituted by Augustus. But the youth of Severus had been trained in the implicit obedience of camps, and his riper years spent in the despotism of military command. His haughty and inflexible spirit could not discover, or admit of error. He could not be comprehended. The Grook had been outgrown by any intermediate power, however imaginary, between the emperor and the army. He disdained to profess himself the servant of an assembly that detested his person and trembled at his frown: he issued his commands, in which his request would have proved as effectual; assured the conduct of a soldier and a conqueror, and exercised, without disguise, the whole legislative as well as the executive power.

The victory over the senate was easy. Even the eye and every/the imperial prosecution were directed to the legal. Nor could the Romans possess the arms and treasure of the state; whilst the senate, neither elected by the people, nor guarded by military force, nor animated by public spirit, rested its declining authority on the frail and crumbling basis of ancient opinion. The fine theory of a republic insensibly vanished, and was replaced by a new political and substantial feelings of monarchy. As the freedom and honors of Rome were successively communicated to the provinces, in which the old government had been either unknown, or was remembered with abhorrence, the tradition of republican maxims grew at large; and was entertained. The Grook became the array of the Antonine, and who, with a malicious pleasure, that although the sovereignty of Rome, in compliance with an obsolete prejudice, abstained from the name of king, he possessed the full measure of regal power. In the reign of Severus, the senate was filled with published eloquent slaves from the eastern provinces, who justified personal flattery by speculative principles of servitude. These new advocates of prerogative were heard with pleasure by the court, and with patience by the people, when they incrusted the duty of passive obedience, and descended on the inevitable mischiefs of freedom. The lawyers and the historians concurred in teaching, that the imperial authority was held, not by the delegated commission, but by the irrevocable resignation, of the senate; that the emperors were freed from the restraint of civil laws, could command by his arbitrary will the lives and fortunes of his subjects, and might dispose of the empire as of his private patrimony. The most eminent of the civil lawyers, and particularly Papinian, Paulus, and Ulpian, flourished under the house of Severus; and the Roman jurisprudence having closely united itself with the system of monarchy, was supposed to have attained its full maturity and perfection.

[Not of the army in general, but of the troops in Gaul. Even the letter and its contents seem to prove that Severus had determined to re-establish the discipline of the army. Herodian is the only historian who accuses him of having been the first cause of its remissness.

[The first of the praetorian guards had never been a more captain of the guards. From the moment of the creation of this office under Augustus, it was one of great power. This emperor also commanded that there should always be two Prefects of the Praetorian guard, who should be chosen from the equestrian rank only. Twenty first disbandments of this guard in the reign of Severus, indicated the second by appointing prefects from among the senators. It appears that it was under Commodus that the prefects of the Praetorian guard obtained their immense power over the state, and that this power was confined to the whole empire only, with the exception of Rome and its territory, which was under the command of the prefect of the city. As the power of the praetorians was of the direction of the finances, and of the deduction of imposts, it was not enfranchised to them till after the great emigrations made by the firstconstitutions of the empire. The praetorian guard was not a military, but a civil force; and what it did was not what it was, but what it imposed. The Praefectorum praetorianorum regnum. (c. vi. mentions none.—G.)

The contemporaries of Severus, in the enjoyment of the peace and glory of his reign, forgave the cruelties he had inflicted on their predecessors. Folly, that experienced the fatal effects of his maxims and example, justly considered him as the principal author of the decline of the Roman empire.

The Death of Severus.—Pyrrhia of Caracalla.—Usurpation of Maxentius.—Victory of Licinius.—General State of the Roman Finances.

Greatness and destruction, however steep and dangerous, may entertain an active spirit with the consciousness and exercise of its own powers; but the possession of a throne could never yet afford a lasting satisfaction to an ambitious mind. This melancholy truth was felt and acknowledged by Severus. Fortune and merit had, from an humble station, elevated him to the first place among mankind. "He had been all things," as he said himself, "and all was of little value." Distraught with the care, not of acquiring, but of preserving, an empire, oppressed with age and infirmities, careless of life and safety, he was conscious of all his prospects of life were closed. The desire of perpetuating the greatness of his family, was the only remaining wish of his ambition and paternal tenderness. His wife the empress Julia, was passionately addicted to the vain studies of magic and divination, deeply versed in the interpretation of dreams and omens, and perfectly acquainted with the science of judicial astrology; which, in almost every age except the present, has maintained its dominion over the mind of man. He had lost his first wife, whilst he was governor of the Lionesse Gaul. In the choice of a second, he sought only to connect himself with some favourite of fortune; and as soon as he had discovered that a young lady of Emea, in Syria, had a royal nativity, he solicited, and obtained her hand. Julia Donna (for that was her name) deserved all that the stars could promise her. She possessed, even in an advanced age, the attractions of the fairest, was celebrated for a lively imagination, a firmness of mind, and strength of judgment, seldom bestowed on her sex. Her amiable qualities never made any deep impression on the dark and jealous temper of her husband; but in her son's reign, she administered the principal affairs of the empire, with a precision and judgment, which without the authority, and with a moderation that sometimes corrected his wild extravagances.

Julia applied herself to letters and philosophy with some success, and with the most splendid reputation. She was the patroness of every art, and the friend of every man of genius. The grateful flattery of the learned, has celebrated her virtue; but, if we may credit the tradition of ancient history, chastity was very far from being the most conspicuous virtue of the empress Julia.2

Their two sons. Two sons, Caracalla and Geta, were the fruit of this marriage, and the desert sons.2

The elevation of Caracalla is fixed by the accurate M. de Tillemont to the year 1304, the association of Geta to the year 205.1

1 Basianus was his first name, as it had been of his maternal grandfather. During his reign he assumed the appellation of Antoninus. His death, the public indignation loaded him with the nick names of Tarantus and Caracalla. The first was borrowed from a celebrated physician; the second from a long Gallic soldiers whom he distributed to the people of Rome.

important consequences, would ill deserve our attention; but it is supposed, not without a considerable degree of probability, that the invasion of Severus is connected with the most shining period of the British history or fable. Fingal, whose fame, with that of his heroes and bards, has been revived in our language by a recent publication, is said to have commenced the Caledonians in that memorable juncture, to have eluded the power of Severus, and to have obtained a signal victory on the banks of the Carun, in which the son of the King of the World, Caracalla, fled from his army by the hair of his head, and where his life might still hang over these Highland traditions; nor can it be entirely dispelled by the most ingenious researches of modern criticism; but if we could, with safety, indulge the pleasing supposition, that Fingal lived, and that Ossian sang, the striking contrast of the situation and manners of the contending nations might amuse a philosophic mind. The parallel would be little to the advantage of the more civilized people, if we compared the unrelenting revenge of Severus with the generous clemency of Fingal; the timid and brutal conqueror with the heroic defender, the tender humanity of the young hero with the elegant genius of Ossian; the mercenary chiefs who, from motives of fear or interest, served under the imperial standard, with the free-born warriors who started to arms at the voice of the king of Morven; if, in fact, we contemplated the unuttered Caledonian's, his often warmest wishes for the welfare of his country, and the degenerate Romans, polluted with the mean vices of wealth and slavery.

The Decline and last Illness of Caracalla. of Severus inflamed the wild ambition and black passions of Caracalla's soul. Impatient of all delay, he resolved, once and for all, to remove the power that had attempted, more than once, to shorten the small remainder of his father's days, and endeavoured, but without success, to excite a mutiny among the troops. The old emperor had often censured the misguided loyalty of Marcus, who, by a single act of justice, might have saved the Romans from the tyranny of his worthless son. Placed in the same situation, he experienced how easily the rigour of a judge dissolves away in the tenderness of a parent. He deliberated, he threatened, but he could not punish; and this last and only instance of mercy was more fatal to the empire than a long series of measures of severity. The disgust of his mind irritated, and accession of his two sons, instant of it by his impatience. He 6th February. expired at York, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and in the eighteenth of a glorious and successful reign. In his last moments he recommended concord to his sons, and his sons to the army. The salutary advice never reached the heart, or even the understanding, of the impetuous youths; but the more obedient troops, mindful of their oath of allegiance, and of the authority of their deceased master, resisted the solicitations of Caracalla, and proclaimed both brothers emperors of Rome. The new princes soon left the Caledonians in peace, returned to the capital, celebrated their father's funeral with divine honours, and were cheerfully acknowledged as lawful sovereigns by the people and the provincials. Some pre-eminence of rank seems to have been al-

2 That the Caractacus of Ossian is the Caractacus of the Roman History, is, perhaps, the only point of British antiquity in which Mr. Arber and Mr. Chalmers are in entire concurrence; but of the opinion is not without difficulty. In the Caledonian war, the son of the then reigning emperor, the child of Antinous, who, by the death of his mother, had become alone that of the whole empire, could not seem to be the literal interpretation of the account of Severus. But if Severus had been adopted by the Roman Emperor, or if the account of Antinous had been the subject of a popular report, or even of a wild conjecture, the opinion would not be at all different. It is quite uncertain, throughout the whole passage, whether the Caractacus of Ossian should be identified with the Caractacus of Tacitus. See Dion, l. iv. ch. iv. ch. v. XXXII. of Antoninus. This difficulty is very much increased by the most ancient historians. See Dion, l. iv. ch. vii. ch. viii. ch. IX. of Antoninus. This difficulty is very much increased by the most ancient historians. victory. He artfully listened to his mother's entreaties, and consented to meet his brother in her apartment, on terms of peace and reconciliation. In the midst of their conversation, some centurions, who had contrived to conceal themselves, rushed with drawn swords upon the unfortunate Geta. His distracted mother flung herself upon him in her arms. In the unavailing struggle, she was wounded in the hand, and covered with the blood of her younger son, while she saw the elder animating and assisting the fury of the assassins. As soon as the deed was perpetrated, Caracalla, with hasty steps, and horror in his countenance, ran towards the step, the only refuge, and threw himself on the ground before the statues of the tutelar deities. The soldiers attempted to raise and comfort him. In broken and disorderly words he informed them of his imminent danger and fortunate escape; insinuating that he had prevented the designs of his enemy, and declared his resolution to live and die with his faithful troops. Geta had been the favourite of the soldiers; but complaint was useless, revenge was dangerous, and they still revered the son of Severus. Their discontent died away in idle murmurs, and Caracalla soon convinced the rest of his family of their fate, by distributing in one lavish donative the accumulated treasures of his father's reign. The real sentiments of the soldiers alone were of importance to his power or safety. Their declaration in his favour commanded the dutiful professions of the senate. The obsequious assembly was pleased to address itself to the God, whose divine influence, by distributing fortune, had made Caracalla wish to assuage the first emotions of public indignation, the name of Geta was mentioned with decency, and he received the funeral honours of a Roman emperor. Posteriority, in pity to his misfortune, has cast a veil over his virtues. We consider them as the fruits of his father's ambition, without recollecting that he himself wanted power, rather than inclination, to consummate the same attempts of revenge and murder.

Remove and cruelty of Caracalla. Neither business, nor pleasure, nor flattery could defend Caracalla from the stings of a guilty conscience; and he confessed, in the anguish of a tortured mind, that his disordered fancy often beheld the angry forms of his father and his brother rising into life, to threaten and upbraid him. The consequence of this obloquy should have been to destroy mankind, by the virtues of his reign, that the bloody deed had been the involuntary effect of fatal necessity. But the repentance of Caracalla only prompted him to remove from the world whatever could remind him of his guilt, or recall the memory of his murdered brother. On his return from the senate, to the palace, he found his mother in company of several noble matrons, weeping over the untimely fate of her younger son. The jealous emperor threatened them with instant death; the sentence was executed against Paolina, the last remaining daughter of the emperor Marcus; and even the afflicted Julia was obliged to silence her lamentations, to suppress her sighs, and to receive the assassin with smiles of joy.

Caracalla conciliated, in the temple of Serapis, the sword, with which, as he boasted, he had slain his brother Geta. Dion. l. xxvi. p. 130.

Herodian, i. iv. p. 147. In every Roman camp there was a small chapel near the head-quarters, in which the statues of the tutelary deities were preserved and adored; and we may remark, that the eagles, and other military emblems, were in the first rank of these divine images, as the especial objects of the consecration and adoration of the soldiers. The favourable judgment which history has passed upon Geta, is founded not on the sentiment of pity alone—the testimony of the writers of the age is unanimous on this point—but on the table, and was jealous and suspicious of his brother, but he was humbled by the power and authority of Severus and of Caracalla. more lustre on the memory of Papian, than all his great employments, his numerous writings, and the superior reputation as a lawyer, which he has preserved through every age of the Roman jurisprudence.1

His tyranny extended over the whole empire. It had hitherto been the peculiar felicity of the Romans, and in the worst of times their consolation, that the virtue of the emperors was active, and their vice indolent. Augustus, Trajan, Hadrian, and Marcus, visited their extensive dominions in person, and their presence was marked by acts of wisdom and benevolence. The tyranny of Tiberius, Nero, and Domitian, who resided almost constantly at Rome, or in the adjacent villas, was confined to the senatorial and equestrian orders.2 But Caracalla was the common enemy of mankind. He left the capital [and never returned to it] about a year after the murder of Geta.

The rest of his reign was spent in the several provinces of the empire, particularly those of the East, and every province was by turns the scene of his rapine and cruelty. The songsters, supported by his capricious motions, were obliged to provide daily entertainments at an immense expense, which he abandoned with contempt to his guards; and to erect, in every city, magnificent palaces and theatres, which he either disdained to visit, or ordered to be immediately thrown down. The wealthy were razed to the ground, the palaces, and private houses, the temple of Serapis, he viewed and directed the slaughter of many thousand citizens, as well as strangers, without distinguishing either the number or the crime of the sufferers; since, as he coolly informed the senate, all the Alexandrians, those who had perished, and those who had escaped, were alike guilty.1

Relaxation of discipline never made any lasting impression on the mind of his son, who, although not destitute of imagination and eloquence, was equally devoid of judgment. The most dangerous maxim, worthy of a tyrant, was remembered and abused by Caracalla, "To secure the affections of the army, and to esteem the rest of his subjects as of little moment." But the liberality of the father had been replaced by severity, and his justice to the troops was tempered by firmness and authority. The careless profusion of the son was the policy of one reign, and the inevitable ruin both of the army and of the empire. The vigour of the soldiers, instead of being confirmed by the severe discipline of camps, melted away in the luxuries of cities. The excessive increase of their pay and donatives,3 exhausted the state to enrich the military order, whose modesty in peace, and service in war, are best secured by an honourable poverty. The demourant of Caracalla was thought to have a regard of pride; but his mother had got even the proper dignity of his rank, encouraged their insolent familiarity, and, neglecting the essential duties of a general, affected to imitate the dress and manners of a common soldier.

It was impossible that such a character, and such a name as Murder of Caracalla, could inspire either love or esteem.4 But as long as his vices were not beneficial to the army, he was secure from the danger of rebellion. A secret conspiracy, provoked by his own jealousy and fear to that army. The equestrian praetorian were divided between two masters. The military department was intrusted to Adventus, an experienced rather than an able soldier; and the civil affairs were transacted by Opilius Macrinus, who, by his dexterity in business, had raised himself, with a fair integrity, to the rank of a senator. The empire was varied with the caprice of the emperor, and his life might depend on the slightest suspicion, or the most casual circumstance. Malice or fanaticism had suggested to an African, deeply skilled in the knowledge of futurity, a very dangerous prediction, that Macrinus and his sons might be murdered on the morrow. The report was soon diffused through the provinces; and when the man was sent in chains to Rome, he still asserted, in the presence of the prefect of the city, the faith of his prophecy. That magistrate, who had received the letter, instead of guarding himself of the successors of Caracalla, immediately communicated the examination of the African to the imperial court, which at that time resided in Syria. But, notwithstanding the diligence of the public messengers, a friend of Macrinus found means to apprise him of the approaching danger. The emperor received the letters from Rome; and as he was then engaged in the conduct of a chariot race, he delivered them unopened to the praetorian prefect, directing him to despatch the ordinary affairs, and to report the more important business that might be contained in them. Macrinus read his fate, and resolved to prevent it. He inflamed the discontent of some inferior officers, and employed the hand of Martialis, a desperate soldier, who had been refused the rank of centurion. The de-

5 Dion, i. liv. p. 1256. Herodian, i. iv. p. 156. The former records it as a cruel massacre, the latter as a perfidious one too. It seems probable, that the Alexandrians had irritated the tyrant by their rapine, and prevented their return.

6 After these massacres, Caracalla also deprived the Alexandrians of their rank as officers of public finance—in their place, they were placed in parts by means of a will—he surrounded it with the citizens, who might not more peaceable have intercourse from abroad. They were elected unhappy, Alexander treated by the eunuchs of Borsia—Such was in fact the epistle bestowed upon Caracalla, and sumptuously written to the eunuchs, and said that he was much displeased with this name, and often boasted of it. (Dion, lib. liv. p. 1257. &c.)

7 Dion, i. liv. p. 1254. Mr. Watton, (Hist. of Rome, p. 293.) supposes that this maxim was invented by Caracalla himself, and attributed to his father.

8 Dion, (Hist. liv. p. 1384.) informs us, that the extraordinary gifts of Caracalla to the army amounted annually to twenty millions of drachmas, and that at least three hundred and fifty thousand soldiers were employed. There is another passage in Dion, concerning the military pay, infinitely curious, where it was absolutely certain, that probably the best sense seem to be, that the praetorian guards received twenty hundred and fifty drachmas, (forty pounds) a year. (Dion, i. liv. p. 1387.) Under the reign of Augustus, they were paid at the rate of five hundred and fifty drachmas, or denarii, per day, 750 a year. (Titiae, Annal. i. 17.) Domitian, who increased the soldiers' pay one-fourth, must have raised the praetorians to 800 drachmas. (Generalis de Pecuniis Veneri, 1. iv. c. 2.) These excessive augmentations ruined the empire, for, with the soldiers' pay, their numbers too were increased. We have seen the praetorians above increased from 20,000 to 20,000 men. must be always chosen in the senate, and the sovereign power, no longer exercised by the whole body, was always delegated to one of its members. But Macrinus was not a senator. The sudden elevation of the prætorian prefect betrayed the meanness of their origin; and the equestrian order was still in possession of that distinction and that prerogative by which it was commanded to arbitrate away the lives and fortunes of the senate. A murmur of indignation was heard, that a man whose obscure extraction had never been illustrated by any single service, should dare to invest himself with the purple, instead of bestowing it on some distinguished senator, equal to the pretensions of the imperial station. As soon as the character of Macrinus was surveyed by the sharp eye of discontent, some vices, and many defects, were easily discovered. The choice of his ministers was in many cases justly censured, and the dissatisfied people, with the usual candour, accused at once his indolent inactivity and his excessive severity.

His rash ambition had climbed a height where it was difficult to stand; and his court, impossible to fall without instant destruction. Taunted in the arts of court and the forms of civil life, he trembled at the presence of the fierce and undisciplined multitude, over whom he had assumed the command; his military talents were despised, and his personal courage suspected; a whisper that circulated in the camp, disclosed the fatal secret of the conspiracy against the late emperor. It anticipated the sentence of murder by force of hypocrisies, and heightened contempt by detestation.

To alienate the soldiers, and to provoke inevitable ruin, the character of a reformer was only wanting; and such was the peculiar hardship of his fate, that Macrinus was compelled to exercise that invidious office. The plans of his reign were drawn in a long train of ruin and disorder; and that worthless tyrant had been capable of reflecting on the sure consequences of his own conduct, he would perhaps have enjoyed the dark prospect of the distress and calamities which he bequeathed to his successors.

In the management of this necessary reformation, Macrinus proceeded with a caution which, besides his restored health and vigour to the Roman army, in an easy and almost imperceptible manner. To the soldiers already engaged in the service, he was constrained to leave the dangerous and extravagant pay given by Caracalla; but the new recruits were received on the more moderate though liberal establishment of Severus, and gradually formed to modesty and obedience. One fatal error destroyed all the salutary effect of this judicious plan. The enormous army, assembled in the East by the late emperor, instead of being immediately dispersed by Macrinus through the several provinces, was suffered to remain united in Syria, during the winter that followed his elevation. In the luxurious idleness of their quarters, the troops viewed their strength and numbers, communicated their complaints, and revolted in their minds the advantages of another revolution. The veterans, instead of being flattered by the advantageous distinction, were alarmed by the first steps of the emperor, which they considered as the presage of his future intentions. The recruits, with sullen reluctance, entered on a service, whose labours were increased while its rewards were diminished by a covetous and unvaried sovereign. The murmurs of the army swelled with impunity into seditious clamours; and the partial mutinies betrayed a spirit of discontent unmingled with loyalty. The rebel army hesitated only to the slightest occasion to break out on every side into a general rebellion. To minds thus disposed, the occasion soon presented itself.

Death of the empress Julia. Edict, proclama tions, and revolt.

The empress Julia had experienced all the vicissitudes of fortune. From a humble station she had been raised to greatness, only to taste the superior bit terness of an exalted rank. She was doomed to weep over the death of one of her sons, and over the life of the other. The cruel fate of Caracalla, though her grief might have long lasted to her, and, by overcoming the feelings of a mother, and of an empress. Notwithstanding the respectful civility expressed by the usurper towards the widow of Severus, she descended with a painful struggle into the condition of a subject; from her own position, her own interest, her voluntary desire, from the anxious and humiliating dependence. Julia Mesa, her sister, was ordered to leave the court and Antioch. She retired to Emesa with an immense fortune, the fruit of twenty years favour, accompanied by her two daughters, Soemias and Mamma, each of whom was a widow, and each had an only son. Bassianus, for that was the name of the son of Soemias, was consecrated to the honourable ministry of high priest of the Sun; and this holy vocation, embraced either from prudence or superstition, contributed to raise the Syrian youth to the empire of Rome. A numerous body of troops was stationed at Emesa; and, as the severe discipline of Macrinus had constrained them to pass the winter encamped, they were eager to revenge the cruelty of such unaccustomed hardships. The soldiers, who resorted in crowds to the temple of the Sun, beheld with veneration and admiration the elegant dress and figure of the young pontiff; they recognized, or they thought that they recognized, the features of Caracalla, whose memory they now adored. The artful Mesa saw and cherished their rising partiality for Bassianus, sacrificing her brother's reputation to the fortune of her grandson, she insinuated that Bassianus was the natural son of their sovereign. The sums distributed by her emissaries with a lavish hand, silenced every objection, and the profusion sufficiently proved the affinity, or at least the resemblance, of Bassianus with the great original.

The young Antonius (for he had as May 16, summed and polluted that respectable name) was declared emperor by the troops of Emesa, asserted the youngCaesar's right, and called aloud on the army to follow the standard of a young and liberal prince, who had taken up arms to revenge his father's death and the oppression of the military order. Whilst a conspiracy of women and the dead and death eunuchs was concerted with prudence, of Macrinus, and conducted with rapid vigour, Macrinus, who, by a decisive motion, might have crushed his infant enemy, devoted himself to the opposite extreme, and security, which alike fixed him inactive at Antioch. A spirit of rebellion diffused itself through all the camps and garrisons of Syria, successive detachments murdered their officers, and joined the party of the emperor, who, thirsting for revenge, no longer hesitated to enjoy the compassion of the soldiers, and to animate their drooping courage. Antoninus himself, who, in the rest of his life, never acted like a man, in this important crisis of his fate approved himself a hero, mounted his horse, and declared, with a calm and resolute countenance, in hand among the thickest of the enemy; whilst the eunuch Gannys, whose occupations had been confined to female cares and the soft luxury of Asia, displayed the talents of an able and experienced general. The battle still raged with doubtful violence, and Macrinus might have obtained the victory, had he not betrayed his own cause by a shameful and precipitate flight.

His cowardice served only to protract his life a few days, and to stamp deserved ignominy on his misfortunes. It is scarcely necessary to add, that his son Diadumenianus was involved in the same fate. As soon as the stubborn pretorian could be convinced that they fought for a prince who had basely deserted them, they surrendered to the conqueror; the contending parties of the Roman army, mingling tears of joy and tenderness, united under the banners of the imagined son of Caracalla. From this time Macrinus, whose guilt and prudence, more especially those of the East, were distracted with hopes and fears, agitated with tumult, and stained with a useless effusion of civil blood, since whosoever of the rivals prevailed in the struggle, he excited the envy of his supporters, or he suspected letters in which the young conqueror announced his victory to the obedient senate, were filled with professions of submission. (Dion. I. lviii. p. 1320. The abridgment of Xiphilin, though less particular, is in this place clearer than the original. As soon as this princess heard of the death of Caracalla, she determined to die of hunger. The respect shown by her to Macrinus, in making no change in her title or her court, peremptorily to live, but it seems at first that the mutilated text of Dion, and the imperfect allowance of this, was enabled to descend from the regard that she had conceived for ambitious projects, and endeavoured to raise herself to the throne. She was the more expensive to the world, for example of Sempronius Gracchus and Nicomachus, two Roman provinces hounded upon her own. Macrinus commanded her forthwith to leave the city, without however she observed her former design, and voluntarily perished of hunger. (Ibid. I. lviii. p. 1320.) Gannys, this name from his maternal grandfather, the father of Julia Mesa, his grandmother, and of Julia Domna the wife of Severus. Venerius, his father's cognomen) is perhaps the only historian who has given the key of this genealogy in saying of Caracalla: Hic Bassianus erat mater eunomi ducibus. Caracalla, Elagabalus, and Alexander Severus successively bore this name. [Gannys was not a eunuch, (Dion. 1355.)] of virtue and moderation; the shining examples of Marcus and Augustus he should ever consider as the great rule of his administration; and he affected to dwell with pride on the striking resemblance of his own age and fortunes with those of Augustus, in whom, he said, the merits of conqueror were united by the murder of his father. By adopting the style of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, son of Antoninus and grandson of Severus, he tacitly asserted his hereditary claim to the empire; but, by assuming the tribunitial and proconsular powers before they had been conferred on him by the senate, he offended the delicacy of Roman prejudice. This new and injudicious violation of the constitution was probably dictated either by the ignorance of his Syrian courtiers, or the fierce disdain of his military followers.

A. D. 219.

As the attention of the new emperor was diverted by the每逢ing amusements, he wasted many months in his luxurious progress from Syria to Italy, passed at Nicomedia his first winter after his victory, and deferred till the ensuing summer his triumphal entry into the capital. A faithful picture, however, which preceded his arrival, and was placed by his immediate ordai larger, was conveyed by the Romans the just but unworthy resemblance of his person and manners. He was drawn in his sacerdotal robes of silk and gold, after the loose flowing fashion of the Medes and Phoenicians; his head was clothed with a crown, and the side of his forehead was adorned with gems of an inestimable value. His eyebrows were tinged with black, and his cheeks painted with an artificial red and white. The grave senators confessed with a sigh, that, after having long expected the end of the tyranny of their own country, Rome was at length humbled beneath the effeminate luxury of Oriental despotism.

The sun was worshipped at Emessa, under the name of Elagabalus, and under the form of a black conical stone, which, as it was universally believed, had fallen from heaven on that sacred place. To this protecting deity, Antoninus, not without some reason, ascribed his elevation to the throne. The display of superstitious gratitude was the only serious business of his reign. The triumph of the god of Emessa over all the religions of the earth, was considered a foretaste of the downfall of paganism. The formidable appellation of Elagabalus (for he presumed as pontifex and favourite to adopt that sacred name) was dearer to him than all the titles of imperial greatness. In a solemn procession through the streets of Rome, the way was strewed with gold dust; the black stone, set in precious metals, was placed on a chariot drawn by six milk-white horses richly caparisoned. The pious emperor held the reins, and, supported by his ministers, moved slowly backwards, that he might perpetually enjoy the felicity of the divine presence. In a magnificent temple raised on the Palatine Mount, the sacrifices of the god Elagabalus were celebrated with every circumstance of cost and solemnity. The richest wines, the most extraordinary victuals, and the rarest aromatics, were profusely consumed on his altar.

Around the altar a chorus of Syrian damsels performed their lascivious dances to the sound of barbarian music, whilst the gravest personages of the state and army, clothed in long Phoenician tunics, officiated in the meager functions, with affected zeal, and secret indifference.

To this temple, as to the common centre of religious worship, the imperial fanatic attempted to remove the Ancilia, the Palladium, and all the sacred pledges of the faith of Numa. A crowd of inferior deities attended in various stations the majesty of the god of Emessa; but his court was still imperfect, till a female of distingished rank was admitted to his bed. Pallas had been first chosen for his consort; but as it was dreaded lest her warlike terrors might affright the soft delicacy of a Syrian deity, the Moon, adored by the Africans under the name of Astarte, was deemed a more suitable companion for the Sun. Her images with the rich offerings of her temple as a marriage portion, was transported with solemn pomp from Carthage to Rome, and the day of these mystic nuptials was a general festival in the capital, and throughout the empire.

A rational voluntary adherence with His providence to the temperate and invariable climates of nature, and improves the gratia luxuriations of sense by social intercourse, endowing conceptions, and the soft colouring of taste and the imagination. But Elagabalus, (I speak of the emperor of that name,) corrupted by his youth, his country, and his own fortune, abandoned his sacrifices to overgrown fury, and soon found disgust and satiety in the midst of his enjoyments. The inflammatory powers of art were summoned to his aid; the confused multitude of women, of wines, and of dishes, which preceded his triumphs, to gratify the soul of a voluptuary, was renewed with ungodly fury, and soon found disgust and satiety in the midst of his enjoyments. The DECLINE and FALL

Contempt of decency, which distresses the ancient Roman tyrants.

It may seem probable, the vices and follies of Elagabalus have been adorned times by fancy, and blackened by prejudice; but the scenes displayed before the Roman people, and attest- by grave and contemporary historians, their impres- sessions of infamy surpasses that of any other age or country. The licence of an eastern monarch is se- cluded from the eye of curiosity by the inaccessibility of his station, and the haughty pride of his subjects. The solemnities of honour and gallantry have introduced a refinement of pleasure, a regard for decency, and a respect for the public opin- ion, into the modern courts of Europe; but the corrup- tions of counsel and the imperious nobles of Rome gratified every vice that could be conceived from the most di- vers and monstrous. Secure of impunity, careless of censure, they lived without restraint in the patient and humble society of their slaves and parasites. The em- peror, in his turn, viewing every rank of his subjects with the same contemptuous indifference, asserted without control his sovereign privilege of lust and luxury.

Discourses of the army.

The most worthless of mankind arc, not afraid to condemn in others the same disorders which they allow in themselves; and can readily discover some nice difference of age, character, or station, to give the partial distinctions of the liberal-ious soldiers, who had raised to the throne the dissol- lute son of Caracalla, blushed at their ignominious choice, and turned with disgust from that monster, to contemplate with pleasure the opening virtues of his cousin Alexander the son of Mamæa. The crafty Massa, sensible that her grandson Elagabalus must publicly or privately destroy himself by his own vices, had provided another and surer support of her family. Embracing a favourable moment of fondness and devotion, she had persuaded the young emperor to adopt Alexander, and to invest him with the titles of Caesar, that his own divine occupations might be no longer interrupted by the care of the earth. In the second rank that amiable prince soon acquired the affections of the public, and excited the tyrant's jealousy, who resolved to ter- minate the dangerous competition, either by corrupt- ing the masses, or by taking away the life, of his rival. His arts proved unsuccessful; his vain designs were constantly discovered by his own iniquitous folly, and disapproved by those virtuous and faithful servants whom the prudence of Mamæa had placed about the person of her son. In a solitary sally of pas- sion, Elagabalus resolved to execute by force what he had been unable to compass by fraud, and by a des- potic sentence degraded his cousin from the rank and honours of Caesar. The message was received in the senate with silence, and in the camp with fury. The praetorian guards swore to protect Alexander, and to revenge the dishonoured majesty of the throne. The tears and promises of the trembling Elagabalus, who only begged them to spare his life, and to leave him in the possession of his beloved Hierocles, diverted their just indignation; and they contented themselves with preserving his personal dignity, and watching over the safety of Alexander, and the conduct of the emperor.

Sedition of the guards and murder of Elaga- balus.

It was impossible that such a recon- ciliation should last, or that even the mean soul of Elagabalus could hold an empire on such humiliating terms of de- pendence. He soon attempted, by a dan- gerous experiment, to try the temper of the soldiers. The report of the death of Alexander, and the natural suspicion that he had been murdered, inflamed their passions into fury, and the tempest of the camp could only be appeased by the presence and authority of the popular youth. Provoked at this new instance of theircrofting, and appealed to the public Justice, the emperor ventured to punish some of the leaders of the tumult. His unseasonable severity proved instantly fatal to his minions, his mother, and himself. Elagabalus was massacred by the ignignant praetorians, his mutilated corpse dragged through the streets of the city, and his memory was branded with eternal infamy by the senate; the justice of whose decree has been ratified by pos- terity.

In the room of Elagabalus, his cousin the son of Mamæa, it was chosen by contumly by the praetorian guards. His relation to the family of Severus, his name which he assumed, was the same as that of his predecessor; his virtue and his danger had already endeared him to the Romans, and the eager liberality of the senate conferred upon him, in one day, the various titles and powers of the impe- rial dignity. But as Alexander was a modest and dis- tinguished youth, of only seventeen years of age, the reins of government were in the hands of two women, of his mother Mamæa, and of Massa, his grandmother. After the death of the latter, who survived him a short time to her son, the one remained the sole regent of his son and of the empire.

In every age and country, the wish, power of his or at least the stronger, of the two sexes. mother Mamæa, has usurped the powers of the state, and confined the other to the cares and pleasures of domestic life. In the ancient republic of Rome, they were in all cases the equals of the soldiers. But as the Roman emperors were still considered as the generals and magistrates of the republic, their wives and mothers, although distinguished by the name of Augusta, were never associated to their per- sonal honours; and a female reign would have appeared an impossibility in the state of public magnificence in which the Romans, who married without love, or loved without delicacy and respect. The haughty Agrippina aspired, indeed, to share the honours of the empire, which she had conferred on her son; but her mad ambi- tion, detected by every citizen who felt for the dignity of the empire, and the utmost necessity of having a successor who should preserve the harmony of the empire, and the successions of those families which had been raised by the liberality of her husband, and who had deserved to continue independent of princes, and to continue independent of princes, and to enjoy the highest authority in the state, she procured the appointment of her son as Caesar, and afterwards as Augustus, and thus preserved the dignity of the imperial line.

The war of the death of Elagabalus, and of the accession of Alex- ander, has employed the learning and ingenuity of Paul Tiele- mont, Valeschi, Vogel, and Torse, Bishop of Avesa. The ques- tion is most accurately intrenched, but still adheres to the authority of Dion: the truth of whose calculations is undeniable, and the purity of whose text is justified by the agreement of Appian, Zonares, and Cedrenus. Elagabalus reigned three years, nine months, and four days, from his victory over Maximus, and was killed March 10. But what shall we reply to the meditated and undeniably genuine, which reckons the fifth year of his tribunial power? We shall re- ply, with the learned Valeschi, that the usurpation of Maximus was annullcd, and that the son of Caracalla was his from the fifth. No year, however, has been reserved for the expiration of his own life, or for the completeness of a smaller knot of this question may be easily united, or cut asunder.

This opinion of Valeschi has been successfully opposed by Eck- tel, who has shown the impossibility of reconciling it with the mea- sures of Elagabalus, and has given a most satisfactory explanation of the five tribunals of this emperor. He ascended the throne, and received the tribunial power the 16th of May, in the 971st year of Rome; and the first of January the following year, he commenced a new tribunial, accomplished by the elevation of two other emperors. During the years 972, 973, and 974, he enjoyed the tribu- nial power, and in the 975th year of his accession, he was slain, the 10th of March. (Ecktel, De doctr. num. veter. vol. viii. p. 325, and following. — G.)

Lampridius says that it was given to him by the soldiers, on ac- count of his severity in military discipline. (Lampr. in Alex. Ser. c. 17 and 18.)

2 But August. p. 114. By this unusual mechanical, the senate seems to have succeeded the hopes of pretenders, and prevent the factions of the army.

3 Metella Nubidulus, the eunuch, acknowledged to the Roman people, and the attention, that had kind Nature allowed us to cast without the help of women, should be delivered from a very troublesome companion; and it could recommend marriage as the sacrifice of private pleasure to public duty. Aulus Gellius, i. 6.
of Rome, was disappointed by the artful firmness of Seneca and Burrhur. The good sense, or the indifference, of succeeding princes, restrained them from offending the prejudices of their subjects; and it was reserved for the prodigies of Elagabalus, to raise the acts of the senate, with the name of his mother Soemias, who was placed by the side of the consuls, and subscribed, as a regular member, the decrees of the legislative assembly. Her more prudent sister, Mamia, declined the useless and odious prerogative, and a solemn law was enacted, excluding women for ever from the senate, and devoting to the sacred gods, the head of the wretch by whom this sanction should be violated. The substance, not the pageantry, of power was the object of Mamia's manly ambition. She maintained an absolute and lasting empire over the mind of her son, and in his affection the mother could not brook a rival. Alexander, with her consent, married the daughter of a patrician; but his respect for his father-in-law, and love for the empress, were inconsistent with the tenderness or interest of Mamia. The patrician was executed on the ready accusation of the empress, with her undaunted and infallible dignity.

Notwithstanding this act of jealous cruelty, as well as some instances of avarice, with which Mamia is charged; the general tenor of her administration was equally for the advantage of the senate and of the empire. With the approbation of the senate, she chose sixteen of the wisest and most virtuous senators, as a perpetual council of state, before whom every public business of moment was debated and determined. The celebrated Ulpian, equally distinguished by his knowledge of, and his respect for, the laws of Rome, was at their head; and the prudent firmness of this aristocracy restored order and authority to the government. As soon as they had purified the city from foreign superstition and luxury, the remains of the capricious tyranny of Elagabalus, they applied themselves to remove his worthless creatures from every department of public administration, and to supply their places with men of virtue and ability. Learning, and the love of justice, became the only recommendations for civil offices. Valour, and the love of discipline, the only qualifications for military employments.

Mamia, the character of the young emperor, on whose personal qualities the happiness or misery of the Roman world must ultimately depend. The fortunate soil assisted, and even prevented, the hand of time from the process, which in a short period, has convinced Alexander of the advantages of virtue, the pleasure of knowledge, and the necessity of labour. A natural mildness and moderation of temper preserved him from the assaults of passion, and the allurements of vice. His unalterable regard for his mother, and his esteem for the wise Ulpian, guarded his unexperienced youth from the poison of flattery. The simple journal of his ordinary life, cuprous exhibits a pleasing picture of an accomplished emperor, and with some allowance for the difference of manners, might well deserve the name of 'the Roman.'

First, the first moments of the day were consecrated to private devotion, and his domestic chapel was filled with the images of those heroes, who, by improving or reforming human life, had deserved the grateful reverence of posterity. But, in a few days the desire of mankind the most acceptable worship of the gods, the greatest part of his morning hours was employed in his council, where he discussed public affairs, and determined private causes, with a patience and discretion above his years. The dryness of business was relieved by the charm of literature; and a portion of time was always set apart for his favourite studies of poetry, history, and philosophy. The works of Virgil and Horace, the republics of Plato and Cicero, formed his taste, enlarged his understanding, and gave him the noblest ideas of man and government. The exercises of the body succeeded to those of the mind; and Alexander, who was tall, active, and robust, surpassed most of his equals in the gymnastic arts. Refreshed by the use of the bath and a light dinner, he resumed, with new vigour, the business of the day; and, till the hour of supper, the principal meal of the Romans, he was attended by his secretaries, with whom he read and answered the multitude of letters, memorials, and petitions, that must have been addressed to the master of the greatest part of the world. His table was served with the most frugal simplicity; and whenever he was at liberty to consult his own inclination, the company consisted of the students of learning and virtue, amongst whom Ulpian was constantly invited. Their conversation was familiar and instructive; and the pauses were occasionally enlivened by the recital of some pleasing composition, which supplied the place of the dancers, comedians, and even gladiators, so frequently summoned to the tables of the rich and luxurious Romans. The dress of Alexander was plain and modest, his demeanor courteous and affable: at the proper hours his palace was open to all his subjects, but the voice of a ordinary man was heard, as in the Elysian mysteries, pronouncing the same salutary admonitions: Let none enter those holy walls, unless he is conscious of a pure and innocent mind.

Such an uniform tenor of life, which A. D. 222—235, left not a moment for vice or folly, is a General happier proof of the wisdom and justice of nature, than all her creations. From the death of Elagabalus, it enjoyed an auspicious calm of thirteen years, during which the oppressive taxes invented by Caracalla and his pretended son, flourished in peace and prosperity, under the administration of magistrates, who were convinced by experience, that to deserve the love of the subjects, was their best and only method of obtaining the favour of their sovereign. While some gentle restraint were imposed on the extravagance of the Roman people, the price of provisions, and the interest of money, were reduced by the paternal care of Alexander, whose prudent liberality, without distressing the industrious, supplied the wants and amusements of the populace. The dignity, the freedom, the author, of the senate were restored; and every virtuous senator might approach the person of the emperor, without a fear, and without a blush.

The name of Antoninus, ennobled by the virtues of Pius and Marcus, had attained to so high a connexion, by adoption to the imperial family, as to be next to Constantine.
It became the honourable appellation of the sons of Severus, was bestowed on young Diadumenianus, and at length prostituted to the infamy of the high priest of Æneas. Alexander, though pressed by the struggle, and, perhaps, sincere importunity of the senate, nobly refused the borrowed lustre of a name: whilst in his whole conduct he laboured to restore the glories and felicity of the age of the genuine Anto-nines. He attempts to

In the civil administration of Alexander, order and wisdom were enforced by the power of the people, and the people, sensible of the public felicity, repaid their benefactor with their love and gratitude. There still remained a greater, a more necessary, but a more difficult enterprise: the reformation of the military order, whose interest and temper, confirmed by long ignorance and an acquisition of arts foreign to disciipline, and careless of the blessings of public tranquillity. In the execution of his design, the emperor affected to display his love, and to conceal his fear, of the army. The most rigid economy in every other branch of the administration, supplied a fund of gold and silver, and the ordinary pay, and the extraordinary rewards of the troops. In their marches he relaxed the severe obligation of carrying seventeen days provision on their shoulders. Ample magazines were formed along the public roads, and as soon as they entered the enemies' country, a numerous train of mules and camels waited on their hasty laziness. As Alexander despaired of correcting the luxury of his soldiers, he attempted, at least, to direct it to objects of martial pomp and ornament, fine horses, splendid armour, and shields enriched with silver and gold. He shared with his soldiery in the toils and fatigues he was visited, in person, the sick and wounded, preserved an exact register of their services and his own gratitude, and expressed, on every occasion, the warmest regard for a body of men, whose welfare, as he affected to declare, was so closely connected with that of the state. By the most genteel arts he laboured to inspire the fierce multitudes with a sense of duty, and to restore at least a faint image of that discipline to which the Romans owed their empire over so many other nations, as warlike and more powerful than them-seelves. But his prudence was vain, his courage fatal, and the ambition of a reformation served only to inflame the ill it was meant to cure.

Seizure of the

The praetorian guards were attached praetorian guards to the youth of Alexander. They loved the young emperor as a tender pupil, whom they had been educated in the principles of the empire, on the imperial throne. The amiable prince was sensible of the obligation; but as his gratitude was restrained within the limits of reason and justice, they soon were more dissatisfied with the virtues of Alexander, than they had ever been with the vices of Elagabalus and Caracalla. Their pretext was, that the friend of the laws and of the people; he was consiered as the enemy of the soldiers, and to his pernicious counsels every scheme of reformation was imputed. Some trifling accident blew up their discontent into a furious mutiny; and a civil war raged, during which the affairs of Rome, whilst the influence of that excellent minister was defended by the grateful people. Terrified, at length, by the sight of some houses in flames, and by the threats of a general conflagration, the people yielded with a sigh, and left the virtuous, but unfortunate, Ulpian to his fate. He was pursued into the enemy's country, where he was taken, and massacred: the praetorian master, who vainly strove to cover him with the purple, and to obtain his pardon from the inexorable soldiers. Such was the deplorable weakness of government, that the emperor was unable to revenge his murdered friend with an undistinguish without stooping to the arts of patience and dissimulation. Epaphroditus, the principal leader of the mutiny, was removed from Rome, by the honourable employment of prefect of Egypt; from that high rank he was gently degraded to the government of Crete; and when, at length, his prisoners were restored to him, he sacrificed the life which,
in his absence, Alexander ventured to inflict the tardy, but deserved punishment of his crimes. Under the reign of a just and virtuous prince, the tyranny of the army threatened with instant death his most faithful ministers, who were suspected of an intention to correct their intolerable disorders. The historian Cæsius had commanded the Pannonian legions with the spirit of ancient discipline. Their brethren of Rome, embracing the common cause of military licence, demanded the head of the reformer. Alexander, however, instead of yielding up the head of his friend, or giving him up to the menaces of his office, they would revenge the insult in his blood, the nominal first magistrate of the state retired, by the emperor's advice, from the city, and spent the greatest part of his consulsoply at his villas in Campania.

The lenity of the emperor confirmed the example of the Roman Senate in the legislation, the empire imitated the example of the guards, and defended their prerogative of licentiousness with the same furiously obstinate. The administration of Alexander was an unavailing struggle against the corruption of his age. In Illyricum, in Mauritania, in Armenia, in Mesopotamia, in Germany, fresh mutinies perpetually

4 [Gibbon has here confused two events altogether different, viz: the quarrel of the people with the pretorians, and the murder of Ulpian. Dion first relates the murder of Ulpian, then speaking back, a habit quite familiar to him, says that the life of the time of Ulpian, there had been a war of three days between the pretorians and the praetorians, and that the murder of Ulpian was not the cause of it. Dion says, on the contrary, that it was occasioned by some unimportant event, and thereby inferring that some were inclined for the murder, that the other were against it. The sentence of judgment, by which this pretor of the pretorians had condemned to death his two predecessors, Chrestus and Flavius, whom the soldiers wished to avenge. Zosimus, lib. I c. 2 attributes this sentence of condemnation to Maximus, but the troops could even then have never been from a tyrant and Plassen. Hence, whoso betakes they hated. — G.]

5 Though the author of the life of Alexander (Hist. August. p. 132) speaks of the delusion raised against Ulpian by the soldiers, he conceals the catastrophe, as it might disclose a weakness in the adnunciation of his hero. From the sudden reverse of fortune, the reader is left to judge of the weight and caution of that author.

6 Of the fate of Ulpian's fate and own danger, see the mutilated conclusion of Dion's History, 1. xxx. p. 1571.

[Dion possessed no estates in Campania, and was not rich. He says that his estate was in Istia, a town of Campania. In one place out of Rome, that he returned to Rome at the close of his consulate, and had an opportunity of being restored to the emperor in Campania. He asked, and obtained permission to pass the rest of his life in his native state, (Nicias in Biblioth. p. 35.) there being that he put the last stroke to his history, which he finished with his second consulate. — G.]

broke out; his officers were murdered, his authority was insulted, and his life at last sacrificed to the

Firmness of the flaccid discontents of the army.6 One fact well deserves to be recorded, as it illustrates the manners of the troops, and exhibits a singular instance of their return to a sense of duty and obedience. Whilst the emperor lay at Antioch, in his Persian expedition, the particulars of which we shall hereafter relate, the punishment of some soldiers, who had been discovered in the baths of women, excited a sedition in the legion to which they belonged. Alexander ascended his tribunal, and with a modest firmness represented to the armed multitude the absolute necessity as well as his inflexible resolution of correcting the vices introduced by his impure predecessor, and of maintaining the discipline, which could not be relaxed without the ruin of the Roman name and empire. Their clamours interrupted his mild expostulation. "Reserve your shouts," said the undaunted emperor, "till you take the field against the Persians, the Germans, and the Sarmatians. Be silent in the presence of your sovereign and benefactor, too, to prevent the excesses of the emperors and the rapine of the money of the provinces. Be silent, or I shall no longer style you soldiers, but ciutizen; 7 if those indeed who disdain the laws of Rome deserve to be ranked among the meanest of the people." His menaces inflamed the fury of the legion, and their brandished arms were directed to all the heights of the camp. He assumed the intrepid Alexander, 8 would be more nobly displayed in the field of battle; me you may destroy, you cannot intimidate; and the severe justice of the republic would punish your crime, and revenge my death. 9 The legion still persisted in clamorous sedition, when the emperor pronounced with a loud voice, the decisive sentence, "Citizens! lay down your arms, and depart in peace to your respective habitations." The tempest was instantly appeased; the soldiers, filled with grief and shame, silently confessed the justice of their punishment, and the power of discipline, yielded up their arms and military ensigns, and retired in confusion, not to their camp, but to the several inns of the city. Alexander enjoyed, during thirty days, the edifying spectacle of their repentance; nor did he restore them in the former rank in the army, till he had punished with death these tribunes whose consigniture had occasioned the sedition. The great prince overserved the emperor, whilst living, and avenged him when dead.10 cover the secret causes which on that occasion authorized the boldness of the prince, and commanded the obedience of the troops; and perhaps, if it had been related by a judicious historian, we should find this action, worthy of Caesar himself, reduced nearer to the level of probability and the common standard of the character of Alexander Severus. The abilities of that amiable prince seem to have been inadequate to the difficulties of his situation, the firmness of his conduct inferior to the purity of his intentions. His virtues, as well as the vices of Elagabalus, contracted a tincture of weakness and effeminacy from the soft climate of Syria, of which he was a native; though he clung at his foreign origin, and listened with a vain complacency to the adulations of his soldiers, he received his race from the ancient stock of Roman nobi lity! The pride and avarice of his mother cast a shade on the glories of his reign; and by exacting from his riper years the same dutiful obedience which she had justly claimed from his unexperienced youth, Manon exposed both her son's character and her own. 2 The fatigues of the Persian war irritated the military discontent; the unsuccessful event degraded the reputation of the emperor as a general, and even as a soldier. 3 Every cause prepared, and every circumstance hastened, a revolution, which distracted the Roman empire with a long series of intestine calamities.

The dissolve tyranny of Commodus, Deception on the civil wars occasioned by his death, finances of the and the new maxims of policy introduced by the house of Severus, had all contributed to the dangerous power of the soldiery, and to obliterate the faint image of laws and liberty that was still impressed on the minds of the Romans. This internal change, which undermined the foundations of the empire, we have endeavoured to explain with some degree of order and perspicuity. The personal characteristics of their emperor, the course of their fortunes, can interest us no farther than as they are connected with the general history of the Decline and Fall of the monarchy. Our constant attention to that great object will not suffer us to overlook a most important edict of Antoninus Caracalla, which communicated the freedom of the empire to all portions of the nation, and of the rights and privileges of Roman citizens. His unbounded liberality bowd not, however, from the sentiments of a generous mind; it was the sordid result of avarice, and will naturally be illustrated by some observations on the finances of that state, from the victorious ages of the commonwealth to the reign of Alexander Severus.

The siege of Vei in Tuscany, the first considerable enterprise of the Romans, establishment was protracted to the tenth year, much less by the strength of the place than by the elusiveness of its besiegers. "The unaccounted hardships of so many winter campaigns, at the distance of near twenty miles from home, 6 required more than common encouragements; and the senate wisely prevented the clamours of the people, by the institution of a regular pay for the soldiers, which was levied by a general tribute, assessed according to an equitable proportion on the property of the citizens. During more than two hundred years after the conquest of Veii, the victories of the republic added less to the wealth than to the power of the inhabitants. They had paid their taxes for military service only, and the vast force both by sea and land, which was exerted in the Punic wars, was maintained at the expense of the Romans themselves. That high-spirited people (such is often the generous enthusiasm of men, more curiously sublimated by the most exquisite but voluntary burthens, in just the confidence that they should speedily enjoy the rich harvest of their labours. Their expectations were not disappointed. In the course of a few years, the riches of Syracuse, of Carthage, of Macedonia, and of Asia, were brought in measure and alhution of the tribute on Roman citizens, and the Roman people, the sovereign of so many nations, was forever delivered from the weight of taxes. The increasing revenue of these provinces was found sufficient to pay the ordinary establishment of war and government, and the superfluous mass of gold and silver was deposited in the temple of Saturn, and reserved for any unforeseen emergency of the state.

History has never perhaps suffered a greater or more irreparable injury, than in the loss of the curious register bequeathed by Augustus to the senate, in which that experienced prince so accurately balanced the revenues and expenses of the Roman empire. Deprived of this clear and comprehensive estimate, we are reduced to collect a few imperfect hints from the ancient of which we have accidentally turned aside from the splendid to the more useful parts of history. We are informed that, by the conquests of Pompey, the tributes of Asia were raised from fifty to one hundred and thirty-six, or two hundred and forty million of drachms, or about four million and a half sterling. Under the last and most indolent of the Potenlines, the revenue of Egypt is said to have amounted to twelve thousand five hundred talents; a sum equivalent to more than two millions and a half of our money, but which was afterwards considerably improved by the most exact economy of the Romans, and the increase of the trade of Ethiopia and India. Gaul was enriched by rapine, as Egypt was by commerce, and the tributes of those two great provinces have been considered as nearly equal in value. The ten thousand Euboeote or Phoenician talents, about four millions sterling, which vanquished Carthage was condemned to pay, within the term of fifty years, were a slight acknowledgment of the superiority of Rome, and cannot be held as a proportion with the taxes afterwards raised both on the lands and on the persons of the inhabitants, when the fertile coast of Africa was reduced into a province.

Spain, torrential, singular fatality, was the Peru and Mexico of the old world. The discovery of the rich western continent by the Spaniards, and the oppression of the simple natives, who were compelled to labour in their own mines for the benefit of strangers, form an exact type of the more modern history of America. The Spaniards were acquainted only with the sea-coast of Spain; avarice, as well as ambition, carried the arms of Rome and Cartagena into the heart of the country, and almost every part of the soil was found pregnant with copper, silver, and gold. Mention is made of a mine near Carthagena which yielded every day twenty thousand drachms of silver, or about three hundred thousand pounds a year. Twenty thousand pound weight of gold was annually received from the provinces of Asturias, Galicia, and Lusitania.

We may call it a period of leisure and materials to of the life of Caesar, and to pursue this curious inquiry through the eyes of the many potent states that were annihilated in the Roman empire. Some notion, however, may be formed of the revenue of the provinces where considerable wealth had been deposited by nature, or collected by man, if we observe that annual tribute of twenty million pounds, paid to the choice of solitude and sterility. Augustus once received a petition from the inhabitants of Gyarus, humbly praying that they might be relieved from one-third of their excessive impositions. Their whole tax amounted indeed to no more than twenty million and fifty drachms, or about five pounds; but Gyarus was a little island, and rather a rock, of the Aegean sea, destitute of fresh water and every necessary of life, and inhabited only by a few wretched fishermens.

From the faint glimmerings of such data, of the doubtfulness and uncertainty of all the rest, we should willingly be inclined to believe, 1st. That (with every fair allowance for the difference of times and circumstances) the general income of the Roman provinces could seldom amount to less than fifteen or twenty millions of our money; and, 2dly, That so ample a revenue must have been fairly adequate to all the expenses of the moderate government instituted by Augustus, whose court was the modest family of a private senator, and whose military establishment was calculated for the defence of the frontiers, without aspiring views of conquest, or any serious and permanent scheme of invasion. Notwithstanding the seeming improbability of both these conclusions, the late citizens instinctively of them at least is positively disowned by Augustus by the language and conduct of Augustus. It is not easy to determine whether, on this occasion, he acted as the common father of the Roman world, or as the oppressor of liberty; whether he wished to relieve the provinces, or to impoverish the senate and the equestrian order. But no sooner had he assumed the reins of government, than he frequently intimated the insufficiency of the tributes, and the necessity of throwing an equitable proportion of the public burden on Italy. In the execution of this unpopular design, he advanced, however, by cautious and well-weighted steps. The introduction of customs was followed by the establishment of an excise, and the scheme of taxation was completed by an artful assessment on the real and personal property of the Roman citizen, who had been exempted from any kind of contribution above a century and a half. 2

The customs. 1. In a great empire like that of Rome, a natural balance of money must have gradually established itself. It has been already observed, that as the wealth of the provinces was attracted to the capital, so it was not only with his usual tendency to power; so a considerable part of it was restored to the industrious provinces by the gentle influence of commerce and arts. In the reign of Augustus and his successors, duties were imposed on every kind of merchandise, which through a thousand channels flowed to the great centre of commerce and luxury; and in whosoever manner the law was expressed, it was the Roman purchaser, and not the provincial merchant, who paid the tax. 5

The rate of the customs varied from the eighth to the fortieth part of the value of the commodity; and we have a right to suppose that the value of a commodity was the result of natural policy; that a higher duty was fixed on the articles of luxury than on those of necessity, and that the productions raised or manufactured by the labour of the subjects of the empire, were treated with more indulgence than was shown to the peregrines, or at least the unpopular commerce of Arabia and India. 3 There is still extant a long but imperfect catalogue of eastern commodities, which about the time of Alexander Severus were subject to the payment of duties; cinnamon, myrrh, pepper, ginger, and the whole tribe of aromatics, a great variety of precious stones, among which the diamonds appear to have been held in the highest estimation for their beauty: 2 Parthian and Babylonian leather, cottons, silks, both raw and manufactured, ebony, vory, and enuculus. 1 We may observe that the use and value of those effeminate slaves gradually rose with the decline of the empire and luxury; and in the Roman state, was obliged to declare by a public edict, that 4 It is not astonishing that Augustus should hold this language. The sean also declared under Nero, that the state could not subsist, unless the imports were as much augmented as they were in the time of Augustus. See Bacchus, p. 192, & c. 46.) After the acquisition of the province of the Gauls, the ancient emperors could collect the tributes paid by Italy, the abode made in 609-604, and 605 of of Rome, the state derived a revenue from this great extent of country, only a few of the later emperors, (Ceasar, Commes, &c.) and Ciceron often complains of it, especially in his Letters to Atticus. (Liv. ii. ii. 1-12.)—G.

5 The customs (portaria) had existed from the time of the ancient kings of Rome. Those of Italy were imposed in the year of Rome 604 by the praetor Cecidius Metellus Nepos. Augustus did nothing more than re-establish them, (see the preceding note.—G.)

was the motive of the testator, the treasury claimed, without distinction, the twentieth part of his estate; and in the course of two or three generations, the whole property of the subject must have gradually passed into that of the state.

Regulations of the emperors. In the first and golden years of the reign of Nero, that prince, from a desire of popularity, and perhaps from a blind impulse of benevolence, conceived a wish of abolishing the oppression of the customs and other exactions, and the wisest sense of the public burthen. 1.

It had indeed been possible to realize this dream of fancy, such princes as Trajan and the Antonines were usually bent on exalting the glory of an empire which he had excited in the army. Of the several introductions made by Augustus, the twentieth on inheritances and legacies was the most fruitful, as well as the most comprehensive. As its influence was not confined to Rome or Italy, the produce continually increased to the exorbitant height of the Roman state.

The new citizens thus charged on equal terms, 2 with the payment of new taxes, which had not affected them as subjects, derived an ample compensation from the rank they obtained, the privileges they acquired, and the fair prospect of honours and fortune that was thrown open to their ambition. But the favour which implied a distinction was also lost in the prodigality of Caracalla, and all the provincials, for the purpose of acquiring his gratitude, were compelled to assume the vain title, and the real obligations, of Roman citizens. Nor was the rapacious son of Severus contented with such a measure of taxation, as had appeared sufficient to his moderate predecessors. Instead of a twentieth, he exacted a tenth of all legacies and inheritances; 3 and during his reign (for the ancient proportion was restored after his death) he crushed alike every part of the empire under the weight of his iron sceptre. 4

When all the provincials became liable to the peculiar impositions of Roman citizens, they seemed to acquire a legal exemption from the tributes which they had paid in their former condition of subjects. Such were not the maxims of government adopted by Caracalla and his pretended son. The old as well as the new taxes were, at the same time, levied in the provinces. It was reserved for the virtue of Alexander to relieve them in a great measure from this intolerable grievance, by reducing the tributes to a thirtieth part of the sum exacted at the time of his accession. 5 It is impossible to conjure the motive that engaged him to spare so trilling a remnant of the public evil; but the noxious weed, which had not been totally eradicated, again sprang up with the most luxuriant growth, and in the succeeding age darkened the Roman world with its deadly shade. In the course of this history, we shall be too often summoned to explain this method of taxation, the capitation, and the heavy contributions of corn, wine, oil, and meat, which were exacted from the provinciates for the use of the court, the army, and the capital.

As long as Rome and Italy were reduced to Consequences of despotism; and the centre of government, a hallowed national spirit was preserved by the ancient freedom of Rome, and insensibly imbued by the adopted, citizens. The principal commands of the army were filled by men who had received a liberal education, were well instructed in the advantages and laws, and who were by equal steps engaged in the succession of civil and military honours. 6 To their influence and example we may partly ascribe the modest obedience of the legions during the two first centuries of the imperial history.

But when the last encroachment of the Roman constitution was trampled down by Caracalla, the separation of professions gradually succeeded to the distinction of ranks. The more polished citizens of the internal provinces were alone qualified to act as lawyers and magistrates. Therough trade of arms was aban- doned, and the peasants and herdsmen of the frontier, who knew no country but their camp, no science but that of war, no civil laws, and scarcely those of military discipline. With bloody hands, savage manners, and desperate resolutions, they sometimes girded, but much oftener subverted, the throne of the emperors.

CHAPTER VII.

The election and tyranny of Marzim.—Rebellion in Africa and Italy, under the authority of the senate.—Civil and religious policy.—Fisher of Flavian, and his son, of Marzim and Balthinus, and of the three Gordians.—Usurpation and secular games of Philip.

Of the various forms of government, the apparent which have prevailed in the world, an ridicule hereditary monarchy seems to present the fairest scope for ridicule. Is it possible to relate, without an indignant sneer, that, on the father's decease, the property of a nation, like that of a drove of oxen, descends to his infant son, as yet unknown to mankind and to himself; and that the bravest warriors and the wisest statesmen, relinquishing their natural right to empire, approach the royal cradle with bearded knees and protestations of inviolable fidelity! Satire and declamation may paint these obvious topics in the most dazzling colours, but our more serious thoughts will respect a useful prejudice, that establishes a rule of succession, independent of the passions of mankind; and we shall cheerfully acquiesce in any expedient which derives

In the cool shade of retirement, we tapers of history may easily devise imaginary forms of tory succession; government, in which the sceptre shall be constantly bestowed on the most worthy, by the free and unanimous will of the whole community. Experience overturns these airy fabrics, and teaches us, that in a large society, the elections of a monarch can never devolve to the wisest, or to the most numerous, part of the people. The army is the only order of men sufficiently united to concour in the same sentiments, and powerful enough to impose them on the rest of their fellow-citizens; but the temper of soldiers, habituated at once, to violence and to slavery, renders them very unfit guardians of a legal or even a civil constitution. Justice, humanity, or political wisdom, are qualities they are too little acquainted with in themselves, to appreciate them in others. Valour will acquire their esteem, and liberality will purchase their suffrage; but the first of these merits is often lodged in the most savage breasts; the latter can only exert itself at the expense of the public; and both may be turned against the possessor of the throne, by the ambition of a daring nature.

"The superior prerogative of birth, Want of it in the Roman empire productive of the greatest calamities, and least invincible of all distinctions among mankind. The acknowledged right extinguishes the hopes of faction, and the conscious security disgusts the cruelty of the monarch. To the firm establishment of this idea, we owe the peaceful succession, and mild administration, of European monarchies. To the defect of it, we must attribute the frequent civil wars, through which an Asiatic despot is obliged to cut his way to the throne of his father. This scene of contention is usually limited to the princes of the reigning house, and as soon as the more fortunate competitor has removed his brethren, by the sword and the howstring, he no longer entertains any jealousy of his nearer subjects. But the Roman empire, after the authority of the senate had sunk into contempt, was a vast scene of confusion. The royal, and even noble, families of the provinces, had long since been led in triumph before the bar of the haughty republicans. The ancient families of Rome had successively fallen beneath the tyranny of the Caesars; and whilst those positions were there established, we retained them on the rest of the empire, and disappointed by the repeated failure of their posterity, it was impossible that any idea of hereditary succession should have taken root in the minds of their subjects. The right to the throne, which none could claim from birth, every one assumed from merit. The daring hopes of ambition were set loose from the salutary restraints of law and prejudice; and the meanest of mankind might, without folly, entertain a hope of being raised by valour and fortune to a rank in the army, in which a single crime would enable him to wrest the sceptre of the world from his feeble and unprotected master. Alexander Severus, and the elevation of Maximin, not only taught the young of the empire how to think himself safe upon the throne, and every barbarian peasant of the frontier might aspire to that august, but dangerous station.

Births and fortunes About thirty-two years before that event, the emperor Septimius, returning from an eastern expedition, had, in Thrace, celebrated, with military games, the birthday of his younger son, Geta. The country flocked in crowds to behold their sovereign, and a young barbarian of gigantic stature, earnestly solicited, in his rude dialect, that he might be allowed to contend for the prize of wrestling.

As the pride of discipline would have been disgraced in the overthrow of a Roman soldier by a Thracian peasant, he was matched with the stoutest followers of the camp, sixteen of whom he successively laid on the ground. His victory was rewarded with some trifling gifts, and a permission to enlist in the troops. On the next day the happy barbarian was introduced above a crowd of recruits, dancing and exulting after the fashion of his country. As soon as he perceived that he had attracted the emperor's notice, he instantly ran up to his horse, and followed him on foot, without the least appearance of fatigue, in a long and rapid career.

"Thracian," said Severus with astonishment, "art thou disposed to wrestle after thy race?" "Most willingly, sir," replied the unwaried youth; and almost in a breath, overthrew seven of the strongest soldiers in the army. A gold collar was the prize of his matchless vigour and activity, and he was immediately appointed to serve in the horse-guards, who always attended on the person of the sovereign.

Maximin, for that was his name, his military servitude born on the territories of the Alani, descendence from a mixed race of barbarians. His father was a Goth, and his mother of the nation of the Alani. He displayed, on every occasion, of labour equal to his birth; and his native fierceness was so tempered or disguised by the knowledge of the world. Under the reign of Severus and his son, he obtained the rank of centurion, with the favour and esteem of both those princes, the former of whom was an excellent judge of merit. Gratuitous forbade Maximin to serve under the assassin of Caracalla. He honour taught him to decline the illomened insults of Elagabalus. On the accession of Alexander, he returned to court, and was placed by that prince in a station useful to the service, and honourable to himself. The fourth legion, to which he was appointed captain, under his lawful master, was reckoned the most disciplined of the whole army. With the general applause of the soldiers, who bestowed on their favourite hero the names of Ajax and Hercules, he was successively promoted to the first military command; and had not he still retained too much of his savage origin, the emperor might perhaps, have given his own sister in marriage to the son of Maximin.

Instead of securing his fidelity, these Conspiracy of favours served only to inflame the ambition of the Thracian peasant, who deemed his fortune inadequate to his merit, as long as he was constrained to acknowledge a superiority, though a stranger to him. His wisdom, he was conscious of his own unfitness, and which showed him that the emperor had lost the affection of the army, and taught him to improve their discontent to his own advantage. It is easy for faction and cupidity to shed their poison on the administration of the best of princes, and to undermine their virtues, by artfully confounding them with those vices to which they bear the nearest affinity. The troops listened with pleasure to the emissaries of Maximin. They blushed at their own ignominious patience, which, during thirteen years, had supported the vexatious discipline imposed by an effeminate Syrian, the coward slave of his master. In the meantime, as it was fit time, they cried, to cast away that useless phantom of the civil power, and to elect for their prince and general, a real soldier, educated in camps, exercised in war, who would assert the glory, and distribute among his companions the treasures, of the empire. A great army was at that time assembled on the banks of the Rhine, under the command of the emperor himself, who, almost immediately after his return from the Persian war, had been obliged to march against the barbarians of Germany. The important care of training and reviewing the new levies, was entrusted to Maximin. One day, as he entered the field of exercise, the emperor, on a sudden, left his stand, or a false conspiracy, saluted him emperor, silenced by their loud acclamations his obstinate refusal, and hastened to consummate their rebellion by the murder of A. D. 335.

The circumstances of his death are variously narrated. The writers, who suppose that he died in ignorance of the ingratitude and ambition of Maximin, affirm, that after taking a frugal repast in the sight of the army, he retired to sleep, and that, about the seventh hour of the day, a part of his own guards broke into the imperial tent, and, with many wounds, assassinated their victorious and unsuspecting prince. If we credit another, and indeed a more probable account, Maximin was invested with the purple by a numerous detachment, at the distance of several miles from the head-quarters; and he trusted for success rather to the secret wishes than to the public; for the great length of time, Alexander had sufficient time to awaken a faint sense of loyalty among his troops; but their reluctant professions of fidelity quickly vanished on the appearance of Maximin, who declared himself the friend and advocate of the military order, and was unanimously acknowledged emperor of the Romans by the applauding legions. The Emperor had betrayed, withheld him, and converted into contempt some portion of the just pity which his innocence and misfortunes must inspire. His mother Mannea, whose pride and avarice he fondly accused as the cause of his ruin, perished with her son. He bore it as the first sacrifice to the first tyrant of the soldiers. Others were reserved for the more deliberate cruelty of the usurper; and those who experienced the mildest treatment, were stripped of their employments, and ignominiously driven from the court and army.

Tyrrany of Maximin. The former tyrants, Caligula and Nero, had neither the courage nor the means to destroy their revolvers. Consulting their hands were in the power of the emperor, the luxury of Rome, and the perfidious voice of flattery. The cruelty of Maximin was derived from a different source, the fear of contumacy. Though he depended on the attachment of the soldiers, who loved him for virtue, the same, he was conscious that his mean and barbarian origin, his savage appearance, and his total ignorance of the arts and institutions of civil life, formed a very unfavourable contrast with the amiable manners of the unhappy Alexander. He remembered that in his humble fortune, he had often waited before the door of the haughty nobles of Rome, and had been denied admittance by the insolence of their slaves. He recoiled, too, the friendship of a few who had relieved his poverty, and assisted his rising hopes. But the men who had spurned, and therefore, who had provoked, the Tyrranic, were guilty of the same crime, the knowledge of his original obscurity. For this crime many were put to death; and by the execution of several of his benefactors, Maximin published, in characters of blood, the indelible history of his baseness and ingratitude.

The universal supposition of the tyrant was open to every suspicion against those among his subjects who were the most distinguished by their birth or merit. Whenever he was alarmed with the sound of treason, his cruelty was unbounded and unremitting. A conspiracy against his life was either discovered or invented. Some of the unfortunate sufferers he ordered to be sewed up in the hides of slaughtered animals, others to be exposed to wild beasts, others again to be beaten to death with clubs. During the three years of his reign, he disdained to visit either Rome or Italy. His camp, occasionally removed from the borders of the Danube, was the seat of his stern despotism, which trampled on every principle of law and justice, and was supported by the avowed power of the sword. No man of noble birth, elegant accomplishments, or knowledge of civil business, was suffered near his person. The Roman emperors and the public administration were possessed of an independent revenue, destined to purchase corn for the multitude, and to supply the expenses of the games and entertainments. By a single act of authority, the whole mass of wealth was at once confiscated for the use of the imperial treasury. The temples were robbed of their most valuable offerings of gold and silver, and the statues of gods, heroes, and emperors, were melted down and coined into money. These impious orders could not be executed without tumults and massacres, as in many places the people chose rather to die in the defence of their altars, than to behold in the midst of peace their cities exposed to the rapine and cruelty of war. The soldiers themselves, among whom this sacrilegious plunder was distributed, received it with a blush; and, hardened as they were in acts of violence, they dreaded the just reproaches of their friends and relations. Throughout the Roman world a general cry of indignation was heard, imploring vengeance on

1. Hist. August. p. 135. I have softened some of the most improbable and unwholesome parts of this wretched history. From this ill-recorded narration, it should seem that the prince's huskies, having accidentally entered the tent, and awakened the sleeping monarch, he ordered the accursed soldiers to commit the murder.

3. Caligula, the eldest of the four, was only twenty-five years of age when he ascended the throne; Caracalla was twenty-three, Commodus nineteen, and Numerus more than seventeen.

4. It appears that he was totally ignorant of the Greek language, which, from its universal use in conversation and letters, was an essential part of every liberal education.

5. I have before observed, that Maximin was the son of a farmer who was assassinated by his servant, was named as the principal author of it. Without a witness, without a trial, and without an opportunity of defence, Magnus, with four thousand of his supposed accomplices, were put to death. Italy and the whole empire were infested with innumerable spies and informers. On the slightest accusation, the first of the Roman nobles, who had governed provinces, commanded armies, and been adorned with the consul and triumphal ornaments, were chained on the public carriages, and hurried away to the emperor's presence. Confiscation, exile, or simple death, were esteemed preferable to the unhappy alternative. Some of the unfortunate sufferers he ordered to be sewed up in the hides of slaughtered animals, others to be exposed to wild beasts, others again to be beaten to death with clubs. During the three years of his reign, he disdained to visit either Rome or Italy. His camp, occasionally removed from the borders of the Danube, was the seat of his stern despotism, which trampled on every principle of law and justice, and was supported by the avowed power of the sword. No man of noble birth, elegant accomplishments, or knowledge of civil business, was suffered near his person. The Roman emperors and the public administration were possessed of an independent revenue, destined to purchase corn for the multitude, and to supply the expenses of the games and entertainments. By a single act of authority, the whole mass of wealth was at once confiscated for the use of the imperial treasury. The temples were robbed of their most valuable offerings of gold and silver, and the statues of gods, heroes, and emperors, were melted down and coined into money. These impious orders could not be executed without tumults and massacres, as in many places the people chose rather to die in the defence of their altars, than to behold in the midst of peace their cities exposed to the rapine and cruelty of war. The soldiers themselves, among whom this sacrilegious plunder was distributed, received it with a blush; and, hardened as they were in acts of violence, they dreaded the just reproaches of their friends and relations. Throughout the Roman world a general cry of indignation was heard, imploring vengeance on the knowledge of his original obscurity. For this crime many were put to death; and by the execution of several of his benefactors, Maximin published, in characters of blood, the indelible history of his baseness and ingratitude.

6. The Tyrranic of Maximin. Oppression of the people was confined to the illustrious senators, or even to the bold adventurers, who in the court or army expose themselves to the caprice of fortune, the body of the people viewed their sufferings with indifference, or perhaps with pleasure. But the tyrant's avarice, stimulated by the insatiate desires of the soldiers, at length attacked the public wealth. Every cent of the state was possessed of an independent revenue, destined to purchase corn for the multitude, and to supply the expenses of the games and entertainments. By a single act of authority, the whole mass of wealth was at once confiscated for the use of the imperial treasury. The temples were robbed of their most valuable offerings of gold and silver, and the statues of gods, heroes, and emperors, were melted down and coined into money. These impious orders could not be executed without tumults and massacres, as in many places the people chose rather to die in the defence of their altars, than to behold in the midst of peace their cities exposed to the rapine and cruelty of war. The soldiers themselves, among whom this sacrilegious plunder was distributed, received it with a blush; and, hardened as they were in acts of violence, they dreaded the just reproaches of their friends and relations. Throughout the Roman world a general cry of indignation was heard, imploring vengeance on the knowledge of his original obscurity. For this crime many were put to death; and by the execution of several of his benefactors, Maximin published, in characters of blood, the indelible history of his baseness and ingratitude.

7. The murder of Maximin, by instigating wise counsels with female gratitude, sometimes thought to be the tyrant's way of truth and mercy. See. Ammianus, xiv. c. 2. Before Maximin was murdered, he alludes to the fact which he had more fully related under the reign of Gordian. We may either from the medals, that Tiberius was one of the Tresvex, or from the name of Dirce, that she died before Maximin, (Valerian & ed. cEcce.) that the former.

the election of a barbarian peasant, now produced a contrary effect, and provoked them to assert the injured rights of freedom and humanity. The hatred of Maximin towards the senate was declared and implacable; the tamest submission had not appeased his fury, the milder importunity did not remove his suspicions; and even the care of their safety urged them to share the fortune of an enterprise, of which (if unsuccessful) they were sure to be the first victims. These considerations, and perhaps others of a more private nature, were debated in a previous conference of consuls and the magistrates. As soon as the resolution was decided, they convoked in the temple of Castor the whole body of the senate, according to an ancient form of secrecy, calculated to awaken their attention, and to conceal their decrees. "Conscript fathers, said the consul Syllanus, the two Gordians, both of consular dignity, the one your proconsul, the other your lieutenant, have been declared emperors by the general consent of Africa. Let us return thanks," he boldly continued, "to the youth of Thysdrus; let us return thanks to the faithful people of Carthage, our generous deliverers from a horrid master. Why do you hesitate? May you thus soon be thus timely! Why do you cast those anxious looks on each other? why hesitate? Maximin is a public enemy! may his enmity soon expire with him, and may we long enjoy the prudence and felicity of Gordian the father, the valour and constancy of Gordian the son!* not that the senate thinks they have a better Maximin in the languid spirit of the senate. By an enemy, unanimous decree the elections of the Gordians was ratified, Maximin, his son, and his adherents, were pronounced enemies of their country, and liberal rewards were offered to whoever had the courage and fortune to destroy them.

Assumes the rook. During the emperor's absence, a demand of Rome; the pretence of the prætorian guards remained at Rome, to protect, or rather to command, the capital. The prefect Vitalianus had signalized his fidelity to Maximin, by the alacrity with which he had obeyed, and even prevented, the cruel mandates of the tyrant. His death alone could rescue the authority of the senate and the lives of the senators, from a state of danger and suspense. Before their resolutions had transpired, a questor and some tribunes were commissioned to take his devoted life. They were in the order with success; and with their bloody daggers in their hands, ran through the streets, proclaiming to the people and the soldiers the news of the happy revolution. The enthusiasm of liberty was seconded by the promise of a large donation, in lands and money; the statues of Maximin were torn down; the capital of the empire acknowledged, with transport, the authority of the two Gordians and the senate; and the example of Rome was followed by the rest of Italy, and prepared for a civil war.

*A new spirit had arisen in that assembly, whose long patience had been insulted by wanton despotism and military licence. The senate assumed the reins of government, and, with a calm intrepidity, prepared to vindicate by arms the cause of freedom. Among the consular senators recommended by their merit and services to the favour of the prince, the senate would select one not unequal to the command of an army, and the conduct of a war. To these was the defence of Italy intrusted. Each was appointed to act in his respective department, authorized to enrol and discipline the Italian youth, and instructed to fortify the ports and highways against the impending invasion of Maximin. A number of deputies, chosen from the most illustrious of the senatorian and equestrian orders, were dispatched at the same time to the governors of the several provinces, earnestly conjuring them to fly to the resistance of their country, and to remind the nations of the danger which threatened the Roman senate and people. The general respect with which these deputies were received, and the zeal of Italy and the provinces in favour of the senate, sufficiently proved that the subjects of Maximin were reduced to that unutterable distress, to which an enemy has power to make them more to fear from oppression than from resistance. The consciousness of that melancholy truth, inspires a degree of persevering fury, seldom to be found in those civil wars which are artificially supported for the benefit of a few factions and designing leaders. For while the cause of the Gordians was embraced with such diffusive ardour, the two Gordians themselves were no more, dias. A. D. 237.

Dedast and death. The feeble court of Carthage was alarmed with the rapid approach of Capelanus, governor of Mauritania, who, with a small band of veterans, and a few barbarians, advanced to the rescue of his unwarlike province. The younger Gordian sailed out to meet the enemy at the head of a few guards, and a numerous undisciplined multitude, educated in the peaceful luxury of Carthage. His useless valour served only to procure him an honourable death in the field of battle, the casual severities of Cyprian, who exceeded thirty-six days, put an end to his life on the first news of the defeat. Carthage, destitute of defence, opened her gates to the conqueror, and Africa was exposed to the rapacious cruelty of a slave, obliged to satisfy his unremitting master with a large accession of blood and treasure.

The fate of the Gordians filled Rome withMixt just but unexpected terror. The imus and Balbinus convoked in the temple of Consul and the senate, cord, affected to transact the common business of the day; and seemed to decline, with trembling anxiety, the consideration of their own, and the public, danger. A silent consternation prevailed on the assembly, till a senator, of the name and family of Trajan, awakened his brethren from their fatal lethargy. He represented to them, that the choice of cautious dilatory measures had been pronounced by the power of the senate, and that Maximin, though great by nature, and exasperated by injuries, was advancing toward Italy, at the head of the military force of the empire; and that their only remaining alternative, was either to meet him bravely in the field, or to tamely expect the tortures and ignominious death of a use-ful rebel. "We have lost," continued he, "two excellent princes; but unless we desert ourselves, the hopes of the republic have not perished with the Gordians. Many are the senators, whose virtues have deserved, and whose abilities would sustain, the imperial dignity. Let us elect two emperors, one of whom may conduct the war against the public enemy, whilst his colleague remains at Rome to direct the civil administration. I cheerfully expose myself to the danger and envy of the nomination, and give my vote in favour of Maximus and Balbinus. Ratify my choice, and make the republic more worthy of the empire."

The general apprehension silenced the whispers of jealousy; the merit of the candidates was universally acknowledged; and the house resounded with the sincere acclamations of "Long live and victory to Maximus and Balbinus. You are happy in the judgment of the senate; may the republic be happy under your administration!4

Their characters made emperors justified the most sanguine hopes of the people; and their talents seemed to appropriate to each his peculiar department of peace and war, without leaving room for jealous emulation. Balbinus was an admired orator, a poet of distinguished fame, and a wise magistrate, who had exercised with innocence and applause the civil jurisdiction in almost all the interior provinces of the empire. His birth was noble, his fortune affluent, his manners liberal and affable. In him the love of pleasure was corrected by a sense of dignity, nor had the habits of ease deprived him of a capacity for business. The mind of Maximus was formed in a rougher mould. By his valour and abilities he had raised himself from the meanest origin to the first employments of the state and army. His victories over the Sarmatians and the Germans, the austerity of his life, and the rigid impartiality of his justice, whilst he was prefect of the city, commanded the esteem of a people, whose affections were engaged in favour of the most amiable Balbinus. The two colleagues had both been consuls, (Balbinus had twice enjoyed that honourable office,) both had been named among the twenty lieutenants of the senate; and since the one was sixty and the other twenty-four years old, they had both attained the full maturer age of life and experience.

The,summit at Rome. After the senate had conferred on The younger Gordian, and Balbinus an equal portion of the consular and tribunitian power, the title of fathers of their country, and the joint office of supreme pontiff, they ascended to the capitol, to return thanksgiving to the gods, protectors of Rome.6 The solemn rites of sacrifice were disturbed by a sedition of the people. The licentious multitude neither loved the rigid Maximos, nor did they sufficiently fear the mild and humane Balbinus. They assailed the doors of the temple of Jupiter; with obstinate clamours they asserted their inherent right of consenting to the election of their sovereign; and demanded, with an apparent moderation, that, besides the two emperors chosen by the senate, a third should be added of the family of the Gordians, and be substituted to the princes who had sacrificed their lives for the republic. At the head of the city guards, and the youth of the equestrian order, Maximus and Balbinus attempted to cut their way through the seditious multitude. The multitude, armed with sticks and stones, drove them back for some time. The contest was in the beginning of the month of May, and ended in the month of June. Yet the declaration of these facts is impossible to be had on the authority of a modern Greek, so grossly ignorant of the history of the third century, that he creates several imaginary emperors, and confounds the affairs of the times. In the absence of ancient historians, the evidence of the present day is the only witness of the event, to whom our faith is committed only, and who has established the facts before us, in the following order.

1. Maximus, in the year 990, after having conquered the Germans, re-entered Pannonia, establishes his winter quarters at Sirmonium, and prepares to make war with the people of the north. The year 991, upon the calends of January, his fourth consulate commenced. The Gordians are elected in Africa, probably on the beginning of the month of March. The senate confirms with joy this election, and declares Maximus the sole emperor. Five days after hearing of this revolt, Maximus leaves Sirmonium with his army, to march against Italy. These events happen towards the end of the first of April. Maximus collects the siege of Aquileia, on the 9th of April. Pupienus assembles his army at Ravenna. Maximus and his son are murdered by the soldiers, who are irritated by the pride manifested by Maximus on this occasion. This event takes place in the 10th of May. Pupienus returns to Rome, and rules with Balbinus—they are assassinated by order of the senate, which ascends the throne. (Eckhel De doct. Num. vol. vii. p. 293.—0.)

Whilst in Rome and Africa revolt Maximus prepares successes attended each other with such to attack the enormaxizing rapidity, the mind of Maximus and their enemies was agitated by the most furious passions. He is at his ease, and in one month hearing the news of the rebellion of the Gordians, and of the decree of the senate against him, not with the temper of a man but the rage of a wild beast; which, as it could not discharge itself on the distant senate, threatened the life of his son, of his friends, and of all who ventured to approach his palace. The gratification of the Roman patriotism that the death of the Gordians was quickly followed by the assurance that the senate, laying aside all hopes of pardon or accommodation, had substituted in their room two emperors, with whose merit he could not he unequaled. Revenge was the only consolation left to Maximus, and revenge could only be obtained by arms. The strength of the legions had been assembled by Alexander from all parts of the empire. Three successful campaigns against the Germans and the Sarmatians, had raised their fame, confirmed their discipline, and even increased their numbers, by filling the ranks with the bodies of the vanquished. The life of Maximus had been spent in war, and the candid severity of history cannot refuse him the valour of a soldier, or the abilities of an experienced general. It might naturally be expected, that a prince of such a character should be able of subduing the rebellion to gain stability by delay, would not immediately have marched from the banks of the Danube to those of the Tyber, and that his victorious army, instigated by contempt for the senate, and eager to gather the spoils of Italy, should have burned with impatience to finish the war against the enemy and bury the memory of his father. But this trust to the obscure chronology of that period, it appears that the operations of some foreign war deferred the Italian expedition till the ensuing spring. From the prudent conduct of Maximus, we may learn that the savage features of his character have been exaggerated by the perversity of his enemy. His moderate and temperate methods, submitted to the force of reason, and that the barbarian possessed something of the generous spirit of Sylla, who subdued the enemies of Rome,

3 See the Augustan History, p. 166, from the registers of the senate; the date is confessedly faulty, but the coincidence of the Apollonius Tametris with the year seems correct. 4 He was descended from Cornelius Balbus, a noble Spaniard, and the adopted son of Theophrastus the Greek historian. Balbus obtained the freedom of Rome by the favour of Pompey, and preserved it by the eloquence of Cicero, (see Orat. pro. Corbulo. Balbus.) The friendship of Cesar (for whom he rendered the most important secret services in the civil war) raised him to the consulship and the pontificate. In 87 b. c. he was appointed by the advice of this Balbus triumphed over the Sarmatians. See Dictionnaire de Bayle, ad not Balbus, where he distinguishes the several persons of this name, and the different crimes which they committed concerning them. 5 See the Augustan History, p. 166, where no dependence is to be had on the authority of a modern Greek, so grossly ignorant of the history of the third century, that he creates several imaginary emperors, and confounds the affairs of the times. In the absence of ancient historians, the evidence of the present day is the only witness of the event, to whom our faith is committed only, and who has established the facts before us, in the following order. 6 Herodian, i. vii. p. 256, supposes that the senate was at first consulted in the matter of the appointment. Marches into Ita. When the troops of Maximin, an-

1 Rev. A. D. 236. Feb., vanishing in excellent order, arrived at the foot of the Julian Alps, they were terrified by the silence and desolation that reigned on the frontiers of Italy. The villages and open towns had be abandoned on their approach by the inhabitants, to which the cattle was driven away. The provisions removed, or destroyed, the bridges broke down, nor was any thing left which could afford either shelter or subsistence to an invader. Such had been the wise orders of the generals of the senate; whose design was to prevent the ruin of his army by the impetuosity of the slow operation of famine, and to consume his strength in the sieges of the principal cities of Italy, which they had plentifully stored with men and provisions from the deserted country.

Siege of Aquileia. Aquic received and withstood the first shock of the invasion. The streams that issue from the head of the Hadrutic gulf, swelled by the melting of the winter snows,1 opposed an unexpected obstacle to the arms of Maximin. At length, on a singular bridge, construk-ted with art and difficulty, of large hogs, which was transported by the imperial treasury, up the bank, rooted up the beautiful vineyards in the neighbourhood of Aquileia, demolished the suburbs, and employed the timber of the buildings in the engines and towers, with which on every side he attacked the citadel. The fallen to death among the secession of a long peace, had been hastily repaired on this sudden emergency; but the firmest defence of Aquileia consisted in the constancy of the citizens; all ranks of whom, instead of being dismayed, were animated by the extreme danger, and their knowledge of the tyrant’s unrelenting temper. Their courage was stimulated and directed by Crispinus and Menophilus, two of the twenty senators of the senate, who, with a small body of regular troops, had thrown themselves into the besieged place. The arm of Maximin was repulsed on repeated attacks, his machines destroyed by showers of artificial fire; and the generous enthusiasm of the Aquileians was exalted into a confidence of success, by the opinion, that Belerus, their tutelar deity, combated in person in the defence of his distressed worshipers.3

Conduct of Maximus. The emperor Maximus, who had advanced as far as Ravenna, to secure that important place, and to hasten the military preparations, beheld the event of the war in the more faithful mirror of reason and policy. He was too sensible, the Emperor, that even, with the persevering efforts of a great army; and he dreaded, lest the enemy, tired with the obstinate resistance of Aquileia, shoud on a sudden relinquish the fruitless siege, and march directly towards Rome. The fate of the empire and the cause of freedom must then be committed to the chance of a battle; and what arms could he oppose to the veteran legions of the Rhine and Danube? Some troops newly levied among the generous but enervated young Italy; and a body of German auxiliaries, on whose firmness in the hour of trial, it was dangerous to depend. In the midst of these just alarms, the stroke of domestic conspiracy punished the crimes of Maximin, and delivered Rome and the Senate from the calamities that would surely have attended the victory of an en-frag-ner barbarian.

The people of Aquileia had severely Muder of Maxi-mim, experienced many of the common misfortunes of a siege; their magazines were A. D. 236, April plentifully supplied, and several fountains within the walls assured them of an inexhaustable resource of fresh water. The soldiers of Maximin were, on the contrary, exposed to the inclemency of the autumn, the contagion of disease, and the extremity of famine. The open country was ruined, the rivers filled with the slain, and polluted with blood. A spirit of despair and disaffection began to diffuse itself among the troops; and as they were cut off from all intelligence, they coldly believed that the whole empire had embraced the cause of the senate, and that they were left as devoted victims to perish under the imprangible walls of Aquileia. The fierce temper of the tyrant was exasperated by disappointments, which he imputed to the cowardice of his army; and his wanton and inhuman severity was attributed to the spirited hatred, and a just desire of revenge. A party of pretorian guards, who trembled for their wives and children in the camp of Alba, near Rome, executed the sentence of the senate. Maximin, abandoned by his general, the court, and his people, was cut down by the sword, which he had associated to the honours of the purple, Anulius the prefect, and the principal ministers of his tyranny.a

The sight of their heads, borne on the point of spear, convinced the citizens of Aquileia that the siege was at an end; the gates of the city were thrown open, a liberal market was provided for the hungry troops of Maximin, and the whole army joined in solemn protestations of fidelity to the senate and the people of Rome, and to their lawful emperors Maximus and Balbinus. Such was the desired fate of a brutal savage, destitute, as he has generally been represented, of every sentiment that distinguishes a civilized, or even a human, being. The body was suited to the soul. The stature of Maximin exceded the measure of eight feet, and circumstances almost incrivable are related of his matchless strength and ap-c魅力. Had he lived in a less warlike age, his acclamations and poetry might well have described him as one of those monstrous giants, whose supernatural power was constantly exerted for the destruction of mankind.

It is easier to conceive than to de-joy of the Ro-

suns, and the world on the fall of the tyrant, the news of which is said to have been carried in four days from Aquileia to Rome. The return of Maximus was a triumphal procession, his collegiate and young Gordian went out to meet him, and the three princes made their entry into the capital, attended by the ambassadors of almost all the cities of Italy, saluted with the splendid offerings of gratitude and superstition, and received with the unabridged acclamations of the senate and people, who persuaded themselves that a golden age would succeed his reign of iron.b The conduct of the two emperors corresponded with these expectations. They administered justice in person; and the rigour of the one was tempered by the other’s clemency. The oppres-

of Maximus’s reign has not been defined with much accuracy, ex-

Six taxes with which Maximus had loaded the rights of inheritance and succession, were repealed, or at least moderated. Discipline was revived, and with the advice of the senate many wise laws were enacted by their imperial ministers, who endeavoured to restore a civil constitution on the ruins of military tyranny. "What reward may we expect for delivering Rome from the desolation of the enemy?" asked Maximus, in a moment of freedom and confidence. Ballinus answered it without hesitation, "The love of the senate, of the people, and of all mankind." "Alas!" replied his more penetrating colleague, "Alas! I dread the hatred of the soldiers, and the fatal effects of the conscription of those who should be exempted. His apprehensions were but too well justified by the event.

Solution at Rome

Whilst Maximus was preparing to defend Italy against the common foe, Ballinus, who remained at Rome, had been engaged in scenes of blood and intestine discord. Disturb and jealousy reigned in the senate; and even in the temples where they assembled, every senator carried either open or concealed arms. In the midst of their deliberations, two veterans of the guards, actuated either by curiosity or a sinister motive, audaciously thrust themselves into the house, and advanced by degrees the weakness of the praetorians, as the secret adherents of the tyrant. Those who escaped the first fury of the tumult took refuge in the camp, which they defended with superior advantage against the reiterated attacks of the people, assisted by the numerous bands of gladiators, the property of Maximus, the praetorians, and the soldiers. His ineptitude in taking the bull by the horns, with infinite loss and confusion on both sides. When the pipes were broken that supplied the camp with water, the praetorians were reduced to intolerable distress; but in their turn they made desperate sallies into the city, set fire to a great number of houses, and filled the streets with the blood of the inhabitants. The emperor Ballinus attempted, by ineffectual edicts and precarious truces, to reconcile the factions at Rome. But their animosity, though smothered for a while, burnt with redoubled violence. The soldiers, detesting the senate and the people, despising the weakness of a prince, who wanted either the spirit or the power to command the obedience of his subjects.

Discontent of the praetorian guards

After the tyrant's death, his formidable army had acknowledged, from necessity rather than from choice, the authority of Maximus, who transported himself without delay to the camp before Aquileia. As soon as he had received their oath of fidelity, he addressed them in terms full of mildness and moderation; lamented, rather than arraigned, the wild disorders of the times, and assured the soldiers, that of all their past conduct, the senate would remember only their generous desertion of the tyrant, and their voluntary return to their duty. Maximus enforced his exhortations by a liberal donation, purified the camp by a solemn sacrifice of expiation, and then dismissed the legions to their several provinces, leaving a guard of his personal bodyguards; a precaution, of which the praetorian guards sufficiently declared that they considered themselves as the object, rather than the partners, of the triumph. When the whole body was united in their camp, those who had served under Maximin, and those who had re-maintained at Rome, insensibly communicated to each other their complaints and apprehensions. The emperors chosen by the army had perished with the tyrant, or those elected by the senate were seated on the throne.

The long discord between the civil and military powers was decided by a war, in which the former had obtained a complete victory. The soldiers must now learn a new duty, the submission of the enemy; and whatever clemency was affected by that politic assembly, they dreaded a slow revenge, coloured by the name of discipline, and justified by fair pretences of the public good. But their fate was still in their own hands; and if they had courage to despise the vain terrors of a feeble imposture, it was in a manner to judge, since the world, that those who were masters of the arms, were masters of the authority of the state.

When the senate elected two princes, Massacre of those of it is probable that, besides the declared Maximinus and Balbinus, reason of providing for the various emergencies of peace and war, they were hunted by the secret desire of weakening by division the despotism of the supreme magistrate. Their policy was effectual, but it proved fatal both to their emperors and to themselves. The jealousy of power was soon exasperated by the difference of character. Maximinus despised the greatness of Balbinus, who was profane, and Balbinus disdained by his colleague as an obscure soldier. Their silent discord was understood rather than seen; but the mutual consciousness prevented them from uniting in any vigorous measures of defence against their common enemies of the praetorian camp. The whole city was employed in the Capitoline games, and the emperors were left almost alone in the palace. On a sudden they were alarmed by the approach of a troop of desperate assassins. Ignorant of the fact, and of the situation or designs, for they already occupied very distant apartments, afraid to give or to receive allegiance, they waited the inevitable moments in idle debates and fruitless recriminations. The arrival of the guards put an end to the vain strife. They seized on these emperors of the senate, for such they called them with malicious contempt, stripped them of their garments, and dragged them in insolent triumph through the streets of Rome, with a design of inflicting a slow and cruel death on these unfortunate princes. The fear of a rescue from the faithful Germans of the imperial guards, shortened their torments; and their bodies, mangled with a thousand wounds, were left exposed to the insults or to the pity of the populace.

In the space of a few months, six princes The third Gorhad been cut off by the sword. Gordian, disand of the emperor, who had already received the title of Cæsar, was the only one to escape, and to the soldiers as proper to fill the vacant throne. They carried him to the camp, and unanimously saluted him Augustus and Emperor. His name was dear to the senate and people; his tender age promised a long impunity of military licence; and the submission of Rome and the provincials to the choice of the praetorian guards, saved the republic, at the expense indeed of its freedom and dignity, from the horrors of a new civil war in the heart of the capital.

1 The observation had been made imperiously enough in the acclamations of the senate, and with regard to the soldiers it carried the appearance of a solemn decree.

5 Quinque Curtius (l. z. c. 9,) pays an elegant compliment to the emperor of the day, for having, by his happy accession, extinguished so many firebrands, sheathed so many swords, and put an end to the evils of a disturbed government. At the same time, he mentions every word of the passage, I am of opinion, that it suits better with the elevation of the senator, than with any other period of the Roman History. I in that case, it may serve to decide the age of Quintus Curtius. Those who place him under the first Cæsars, are from the purest and most correct style, but are embarrassed by the acclamations of Qullistinian, in his accurate list of Roman historians; Gordian expired with Mithisheus, who died of a flux, not without very strong suspicions of poison. Philip, his successor in the praefecture, was an A. D. 243., Arab by birth, and consequently, in the Arts of Philip, earlier part of his life, a robber by profession. His rise, from the abjectest of all inferiors, by his crimes and abuses of power, which added to the misfortunes of the empire, seems to prove that he was a bold and able leader. But his boldness prompted him to aspire to the throne, and his abilities were employed to supplant, not to serve, his indolent master. The minds of the soldiers were irritated by an artificial scarcity, created by his toasts; the desertion of the troops, the distress of the army was attributed to the youth and incapacity of the prince. It is not in our power to trace the successive steps of the secret conspiracy and open sedition, which were at length fatal to Gordian. A sepulchral monument was erected to his memory on the spot 4 where he was killed.

4 Murder of Gordian.

The fortunate Philip, raised to the empire by the votes of the soldiers, found a ready obedience from the senate and the provinces.

We will now pursue the career of the prodigious young prince, who, though somewhat fanciful, de- tery republican scription, which a celebrated writer of our own times has traced of the military government of the Roman empire. What in that age was called the Roman aristocracy 5 of Algiers, where the militia, possessed of the sovereignty, creates and deposes a magistrate, who is styled a Dey. Perhaps, indeed, it may be laid down as a general rule, that a military government is, in some respects, more republican than monarchical.

When the army had elected Philip, who was praetorian prefect to the third Gordian, the latter demanded, that he might remain sole emperor; he was unable to obtain it. He requested that the power might be divided equally between himself and the prince, and that he listen to his speech. He consented to be degraded to the rank of Caesar; the favour was refused him. He desired, at least, he might be appointed prefect; his prayer was rejected. Finally, he pleaded for his life. The army, in these several judgments, exercised the supreme magistracy. According to the historian, whose doubtful narrative the president de Montesquieu has adopted, Philip, who, during the whole transgression, had preserved a sullen silence, was inclined to spare the innocent life of his beneficiary; till, recoiling from his innocence might excite a dangerous compassion in the Roman world, he commanded, without regard to his suppliant cries, that he should be seized, stript, and led away to instant death. After a moment’s pause, the inhuman sentence was executed.

240. August, p. 161. From some hints in the two letters, I should suspect that the rumours were not expelled the palace, without some degree of gentle violence, and that the young Gordian, though he had so long associated with his carers, was so urgent in his mimic, since a cause eloquentius dignam pasuum pacemque partem perfertur virtute et strenue jam et contemptibile victoriam imperius.

On his return from the East to Rome, Philip, desirous of obliterating the memory of his crimes, and of captivating the affections of the people, solemnized the secular games with infinite pomp and magnificence. Since their institution or revival by Augustus, they had been celebrated by Claudio, and the emperor renewed the fifth time on the accomplishment of the Secular games, full period of a thousand years from the A.D. 248. April foundation of Rome. Every circumstance of the secular games was skilfully adapted to inspire the superstitious mind with deep and solemn reverence. The long interval between them exceeded the term of human life; and as none of the spectators had already seen them, none could flatter themselves with beholding them a second time. The mystic sacrifices were performed during three nights, on the banks of the Tyber; and the Campus Martius was so brilliantly illuminated with innumerable lamps and torches. Slaves and strangers were excluded from any participation in these national ceremonies. A chorus of twenty-seven youths, and as many virgins, of noble families, and whose parents were both alive, improvised the propitious songs in favour of the present, and with the hope of the rising generation, requesting, in religious hymns, that, according to the faith of their ancient oracles, they would still maintain the virtue, the felicity, and the empire of the Roman people. The magnificence of Philip’s shows and entertainments dazzled the eyes of the multitude. The devotions employed in the rites of superstition, whilst the reflecting few revolted in their anxious minds the past history and the future fate of the empire.

Decline of the Roman Empire.

Since Romulus, with a small band of shepherds and outlaws, fortified himself on the hills near Rome, nearly ten centuries had elapsed. During the four first ages, the Romans, in the laborious school of poverty, had acquired the virtues of war and government: by the vigorous exertion of those virtues, and by the assistance of fortune, they had obtained, in the course of three succeeding centuries, an absolute empire over many countries of Europe, Asia, and Africa. The last three hundred years had been consumed in apparent prosperity and internal decline. The nation of soldiers, magistrates, and legislators, who composed the thirty-five tribes of the Roman people, was dissolved into the common mass of mankind, and confounded with the millions of servile provincials, who had received the name, without adopting the spirit, of Romans. A mercenary army, levied among the subjects and barbarians of the frontier, was the only order of men who preserved and abused their independence. By their tumultuary election, a Syrian, a Goth, or an Arab, was exalted to the throne of Rome, and invested with despotic power over the conquists and over the country of the Scipios.

The limits of the Roman empire still extended from the Western Ocean to the Tigris, and from Mount Atlas to the Rhine and the Danube. To the undis-easing eye of the vulgar, Philip appeared a monarch no less powerful than Hadrian or Augustus had formerly been. The form was still the same, but the motion was no longer originating health and vigour. The capacity of the people was discouraged and exhausted by a long series of oppression. The discipline of the legions, which alone, after the extinction of every other virtue, had propped the greatness of the state, was corrupted by the ambition, or relaxed by the weakness, of the emperors. The strength of the frontiers, which have always consisted in arms rather than in fortifications, was insensibly undermined; and the fairest provinces were left exposed to the rapaciousness or ambition of the barbarians, who soon discovered the decline of the Roman empire.

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the state of Persia after the restoration of the monarchy by Ardashir.

Whenever Tacitus indulges himself the barbarians in those beautiful episodes, in which he of the East and of the North relates some domestic transaction of the Germans or of the Parthians, his principal object is to relieve the attention of the reader from a uniform scene of vice and misery. From the reign of Augustus to the time of Alexander Severus, the enemies of Rome were in her bosom—the tyrants, and the soldiers; and her prosperity had a very distant and feeble interest in the revolutions that might happen beyond the Rhine and the Euphrates. But when the military order had levelled, in wild anarchy, the power of the prince, the laws of the senate, and even the discipline of the camp, the barbarians of the North and of the East, who had long hovered on the frontier, boldly attacked the provinces of a declining monarchy. Their vacuous inroads were changed into formidable irruptions, and, after a long vicissitude of mutual calamities, many tribes of the victorious invaders established themselves in the provinces of the Roman empire. To obtain a clearer knowledge of these great events, we shall endeavour to form a previous idea of the character, forces, and designs of those nations who avenged the cause of Hannibal and Mithridates.

In the more early ages of the world, Revolutions of whilst the forest that covered Europe Asia afforded a retreat to a few wandering savages, the inhabitants of Asia were already collected into populous cities, and reduced under extensive empires, the seat of the arts, of luxury, and of despotism. The Assyrians reigned over the East, till the sceptre of Niucus and Semiramis dropped from the hands of their enervated successors. The Medes and the Babylonians degraded. When these events happened 339 years before Christ, the former may be placed 2044 years before the same era. The Astronomical Observations, found at Babylon by Alexander, went fifty years higher.
The decline and fall

CHAP. VIII.

Aegypt was the mandate of Alexander, the son of Philip, who was intrusted by the Greeks with their glory and revenge, were sufficient to subdue Persia. The princes of the house of Seleucus usurped and lost the dominion of the great throne. About the same time that, by an ignominious treaty, they resigned to the Romans the country on this side Mount Taurus, they were driven by the Parthians, an obscure horde of Sefthyrian origin, from all the provinces of Upper Asia. The formidable power of the Parthians, which sprang from India to the frontiers of Syria, was in its turn subverted by Ardashir, or Artaxerxes; the founder of a new dynasty, which, under the name of Sassanides, governed Persia, till the invasion of the Arabs. This great revolution, whose fatal influence was soon experienced by the Romans, happened in the fourth year of the war against the Parthians, and twenty-six years after the Christian era.

Aegypt had served with great reality restored putation in the armies of Artaban, the last king of the Parthians, and it appears that he was driven into exile and rebellion by royal ingratitude, the consequence of a secret intrigue. His birth was obscure, and the obscurity equally gave room to the aspirations of his enemies, and the flattery of his adherents. If we credit the scandal of the former, Ardashir sprang from the illegitimate children of a Persian soldier.4 This latter represents him as descended from a branch of the ancient kings of Persia, though time and misfortune had gradually reduced his ancestors to the humble station of private citizens. As the lineal heir of the monarchy, he asserted his right to the throne, and challenged the rod of the Seleucid, with Kadarmar, who is often supposed to be the same as Noah. This is the fabulous age, in which we find reigns of seven hundred, and nine hundred years' duration. The combats of the kings with the Greeks or evil spirits, and their keen disputes with the Jews or Fairies, are as ridiculous as the contents of Jupiter, of Venus, of Mars, and of the other Greek divinities. It is evident that the history of the Caneides corresponds to the accounts of Greco heroes, or of our knights errant. It irritates the heroic actions of Rustan, and his contest with Affendar, the eldest son of Giushtaspe. The great Cyrus, during the continuance of the kingdom, would not be the real founder of the dynasty; for he had been found dead among the ruins of his last of these kings, Inkander, appointed the nobles of the country governor of the province. One day he was seized by Artashir-Bakshar, or Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanides, which lasted four hundred and twenty years.5—See a dissertation of Ferret, Memoires de l'Academie des inscrip. et belles lettres, vol. iv. p. 263.—

The great event (such is the carelessness of these authors) was celebrated by the Greeks of Comodun, and by Moses of Chorene, as low as the reign of Philip. Ardashir has so severely corrected his authors, that he has nailed himself king, and was the founder of the dynasty of the Arsacides. The Persian historians have preserved but few of the names of the kings of this dynasty; and the names and titles derived from Ardashir—Bahmar, or Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanides, which lasted four hundred and twenty years.6—See a dissertation of Ferret, Memoires de l'Academie des inscrip. et belles lettres, vol. iv. p. 263.—

secrets, who variously explained the fundamental doctrines of their religion, and were all indiscriminately revered by a crowd of infidels, who rejected the divine mission and miracles of the prophet. To suppress the idolaters, reunite the schismatics, and confute the unbelievers, by the infallible decision of a general council, all the Mohammedans, from the chief of the elders to the humblest of his dominions. These priests, who had so long sighed in contempt and obscurity, obeyed the welcome summons; and on the appointed day appeared, to the number of about eighty thousand. But as the debates of so tumultuous an assembly could not have been regulated, or even influenced by the art of policy, the Persian synod was reduced, by successive operations, to forty thousand, to four thousand, to four hundred, to forty, and at last to seven Magi, the most respected for their learning and piety. One of these, Erdvarih, a young but holy prince, received the hands of his brother three cups of soporiferous wine. He drank them off, and instantly fell into a long and profound sleep. As soon as he waked, he related to the king and to the believing multitude, his journey to heaven, and his intimate conference with the Divine. Every doubt was removed by this supernatural evidence; and the articles of the faith of Zoroaster were fixed with equal authority and precision. A short delineation of that celebrated system will be found useful, not only to display the character of the Persian nation, but to illustrate many of their most important transactions, both in peace and war, with the Roman empire.

Persian Religion: The great and fundamental article of two principles, the system, was the celebrated doctrine of the two principles; a bold and injudicious attempt of the ancients to reconcile the contrary notions of moral and physical evil, with the attributes of a benevolent Creator and Governor of the world. The first and original Being, in whom, or by whom, the universe exists, is denominated in the writings of Zoroaster, Time without bounds; but it must be confessed, that this infinite substance seems rather a metaphysical abstraction of the mind, than a real object endowed with self-consciousness, or possessed of moral perfections. From either the blind, or the intelligent operation of this infinite Time, which bears but too near an affinity with the infinity of the Greeks, the two secondary but independent principles of the universe, without either produced, Ormuzd and Ahriman, each of them possessed of the powers of creation, but each disposed, by his invariable nature, to exercise them with different designs. The principle of evil is eternally absorbed in darkness: the wise benevolence of Ormuzd formed capable of virtue, and abundantly provided his fair habitation with the materials of happiness. By his vigilant providence, the motion of the planets, the order of the seasons, and the temperate mixture of the elements, are preserved. But the malice of Ahriman has long since pierced Ormuzd's egg; or, in other words, has violated the harmony of his works. Since that fatal interruption, the most minute articles of good and evil are intimately intermingled and agitated to had already fallen into disuse during the dynasty of the Sasanides; but it was still written by the learned. The Persi originally from Paro or Persia, was then the reigning dynasty. [See Kleiner's Anhang zu den Zend-avesta, vol. ii. part ii. p. 25 c. &c. — G.]

[The modern Perses, (and in some degree the Saddhus,) exalt Ormuzd into the first and omnipotent cause, while they degrade Ahriman into an inferior but rebellious spirit. Their desire of cleaving the Mahometans may have contributed to refine their theological system.]

According to the Zend-avesta, Ahriman will not be destroyed or plunged forever into darkness: at the resurrection of the dead, he will be entirely destitute of existence. The kingdom of darkness, Ahriman's kingdom, is to be transferred to his kingdom, heaven, and it will be divided into an infernal and divine portion. Ormuzd will elevate the law and ordinances of Ormuzd; will enter into a league of eternal friendship with the people of Ormuzd, and receive of Ormuzd's kingdom of light, as a reward of his virtues and worth, in the society of the dead, in the kingdom of Eternity. (See the abridgment before quoted, rub. 1.)

Kleiner's Anhang, 50 part, p. 83, No. 26: the Iskand, one of the chapters of the Zend-avesta.

According the Saddhu Dun Dehasheh, a more modern work, Ahriman was to be destroyed, but this is contrary both to the rest of the Zend-avesta itself, and to the idea which its author gives us of the kingdom of Eternity; yet he was to acquire a seat in the society of the dead, in the kingdom of Eternity, (See the abridgment before quoted, rub. and 1,)

Mithra was the sun among the Persians, Anquetil has disputed, and triumphantly refuted the opinion of those who confound them together; and it is most a contrary in the Zend-avesta, Mithra is the first of the Genii of the Persians, who were created by Ormuzd. If he who governs all nature—forget this ample reviewer; the Persians, from time immemorial, have taken part in the duties of Mithra. These Genii, who are termed Sarvâns, and are called Jamsârs, but they are never anywhere confounded with the Persians; the Persians are not more humble in their estimation among themselves than the Persians. It is he who gave to the earth the light of the sun. The sun manged Khor (Isdath,) is also an inferior genius, who, with many other Genii, takes part in the duties of Mithra. These Genii, whom the ancients called Jamsârs, and to whom the Persians paid equal worship, are under the supreme domain of Mithra. When a Persian, at the moment of his death, is conducted through the temples of Jamsârs, first by one part of the Persian, Pers. c. 8. Notwithstanding all their distinctions and presentations, which seem sincere enough, their tyrants, the Mohammedans, have constantly stigmatized them as idolatrous worshipers of the fire.
Every mode of religion, to make a moral precept, deep and lasting impression on the human heart, must be accompanied by the practices of devotion, for which we can assign no reason; and must acquire our esteem, by inculcating moral duties analogous to the dictates of our own hearts. The religion of Zoroaster was abundantly provided with the former, and possessed a sufficient portion of the latter. At the age of puberty, the faithful Persian was invested with a mysterious gridle, the badge of the divine protection; and from that moment all the actions of his life, even the most indifferent, or the most necessary, were sanctified by their peculiar prayers, ejaculations, or genuflexions; the omission of which would have been considered a sin, not inferior in guilt to the violation of the moral duties. The moral duties, however, of justice, mercy, liberality, &c. were in their turn required of the disciple of Zoroaster, who wished to escape the persecution of Ahriman, and to live with Ormuzd in a blissful eternity, where the degree of felicity will be exactly proportioned to the degree of virtue and piety.

But there are some remarkable instances in which Zoroaster lays aside the prophet, assumes the legislator, and discovers a liberal concern for private and public happiness, seldom to be found among the groveling or visionary schemes of superstition. Fasting and celibacy, the common means of purchasing the divine favour, he condemns with abhorrence, and his most ardent prayer is for the providence. The saint, in the Magian religion, is obliged to beget children, to plant useful trees, to destroy noxious animals, to convey water to the dry lands of Persia, and to work out his salvation by pursuing all the labours of agriculture. We may quote from the Zendavesta a wise and benedictive maxim, which compensates for many an absurdity. "He who sows the ground with care and diligence, acquires a greater stock of religious merit than he could gain by the repetition of ten thousand prayers." In the spring of every year a festival was celebrated, destined to represent the primitive equality, and the present connexion, of mankind. The stately kings of Persia, exchanging their vain pomp for more genuine greatness, freely mingled with the humblest but most useful of their subjects. On that day the husbandmen were admitted with unusual distinction, to the table of the king and his satraps. The monarch accepted their petitions, inquired into their grievances, and conversed with them on the most equal terms. "From your labours, was he accustomed to say, and to say with truth, if not with sincerity, from your labours, we receive our subsistence, and you derive your tranquillity from our vigilance; since, therefore, we are mutually necessary to each other, let us live together like brothers in concord and love," Such a festival must indeed have degenerated, in a wealthy and despotic empire, into a theatrical representation; but it was at least a comedy well worthy of a royal audience, and which might sometimes imitate a salutary lesson on the mind of a young prince.

\[\text{[Zoroaster was much less exacting regarding the performance of ceremonies than the priests of his religion afterwards were—such has been the course of all religions: their worship, simple in its origin, has become overloaded. The maxim of the Zendavesta, referred to afterwards, proves that Zoroaster did not attach to that which is of so much importance as Gibbon seems to think. This is proved by this maxim, quoted by Gibbon himself;—He who sows grain with care and diligence gains the prosperity of the nation. Moreover, it is not from the Zendavesta that Gibbon derives the maxim; what he advances, but from the Sadder, a much later work.}\] their faith, to the practice of ancient kings, and even to the example of their legislation, who had fallen a victim to a religious war, excited by his own intolerant principles, and about to make the worship of the sun their only settlement, except that of Zoroaster, was severely prohibited. The temples of the Parthians, and the statues of their deified monarchs, were thrown down with ignominy. The sword of Aristotle (such was the name given by the orientals to the polytheism and philosophy of the Greeks) was easily broken; the flames of persecution soon reached the more stubborn Jews and Christians; nor did they spare the heretics of their own nation and religion. The majesty of Ormuck, who was jealous of a rival, was seconded by the despotism of Artaxerxes, who could not suffer a rival and a citizen within his dominions to be safe; and art and science were soon reduced to the incalculable number of eighty thousand. This spirit of persecution reflects dishonour on the religion of Zoroaster; but as it was not productive of any civil commotion, it served to strengthen the new monarchy by uniting all the various inhabitants of Persia in the bands of religious zeal.

"See the Sadder, the smallest part of which consists of moral precepts. Those who are enjoined are innumerable; genuflexions, prayers, &c. were required whenever the devout Persian was outside of the water; or as often as he put on the sacred gridle. Sadder, art. 14, 56, 60.

There still remained the more difficult task of establishing a strong and vigorous administration. The weak indulgence of the Arsacides had resigned to their sons and brothers the principal provinces, and the greatest offices of the kingdom, in the nature of hereditary possessions. The eilaxa, or eighteen most powerful satraps, were permitted to assume the regal title; and the vain pride of the monarch was delighted with a nominal dominion over so many vassal kings. Even tribes of barbarians in their mountains, and the Greek cities of Upper Asia, within their walls, scarcely acknowledged, or seldom obeyed, any superior; and the Parthian empire exhibited, under other names, a lively image of the feudal system which has since prevailed in Europe. But the active victor, at the head of a numerous and disciplined army, visited in person every province of Persia. The defeat of the boldest rebels, and the reduction of the strongest fortifications, diffused by the terror of his arms, the rumour of his approach, and the peaceful reception of his authority. An obstinate resistance was fatal to the chiefs; but their followers were treated with lenity. A cheerful submission was rewarded with honours and riches; but the prudent Artaxerxes, suffering no person except himself to be enthroned; was the only object of the active monarch. He maintained, by the just and necessary exercise of power, the absolute right and dominion over the people and the throne. His extent and population, nearly equal in extent to that of Persia, was on every side, bounded by the sea, or by great rivers; by the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Araxes, the Oxus, and the Indus, by the Caspian sea, and the gulf of Persia. That country was computed to contain, in the last century, five hundred and fifty-four cities, sixty thousand villages, and about two millions of inhabitants. But it must likewise be confessed, that in every age the want of harbours on the sea-coast, and the scarcity of fresh water in the inland provinces, have been very unfavourable to the commerce and agriculture of the Persians; who, in the calculation of their numbers, seem to have indulged one of the common errors of mankind, though most common, articles of national vanity.

As soon as the ambitious mind of Artaxerxes had triumphed over the resistance of the Parthian and the monarchy of his vassals, he began to threaten the Roman empire, the neighbouring states, who, during the long slumber of their predecessors, had insulted Persia with impunity. He obtained some easy victories over the wild Scythians and the effeminate Indians; but the Romans were an enemy, who, by their past injuries and present power, deserved the utmost efforts of his arms. A forty years' tranquillity, the fruit of valor and manoeuvres, crowned the victories of Artaxerxes; during the period that elapsed from the accession of Marcus to the reign of Alexander, the Roman and the Parthian empires were twice engaged in war, and although the whole strength of the Arsacides contended with a part only of the forces of Rome, the event was most commonly in favour of the latter. Marcus, indeed, prompted by his precarious situation and pitiful temper, purchased a price at the expense of some millions of our money but the generals of Marcus, the emperor Severus, and his son, erected many trophies in Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria. Among their exploits, the imperfect relation of which would have unseasonably interrupted the more important series of domestic revolutions, we shall only mention the repeated calamities of the two great cities of Seleucia and Ctesiphon.

Seleucia, on the western bank of the city of Seleucia on the Tigirs, about three leagues to the south of the ancient Babylon, was the capital of the Macedonian conquests in Upper Asia. Many ages after the fall of their empire, Seleucia retained the genuine characters of a Greek colony, arts, military virtue, and the spirit of freedom. The independent republic was governed by a senate and a king, a body of one hundred and sixty persons; of whom the chief consisted of six hundred thousand citizens; the walls were strong, and as long as conscripted prevailed among the several orders of the state, they viewed with contempt the power of the Parthian; but the madness of faction was sometimes provoked to implore the dangerous aid of the common enemy, who was possessed almost at the gates of the colony. The Parthian monarchs, like the Mogul sovereigns of Hindostan, delighted in the pastoral life of their Scythian ancestors.

We can scarcely attribute to the Persian monarchy the sea-coast of Gedrosia or Macran, which extends along the Indian Ocean from Cape Jason (the promontory Capella) to cape Guard. In the twelfth year of Artaxerxes, and probably many ages afterwards, it was thinly inhabited by a savage people of Ichthyophagi, or Fishermen, who knew no arts, who acknowledged no master, and who were divided by inhospitable deserts from the rest of the world. (See Ariánus de la Frereet, p. 247.) In the middle of the century of the death of the last Persian monarch, M. d'Avrillé discovered a territory, which seems it may have been occupied by a people of the same name, and which was called by them Persia, as well as the Grecian heretics.

These colonies were extremely numerous. Selecneus Nicator founded thirty-nine cities, all named from himself or some of his relations. See Arrian in Syria, p. 124. The very name of Selecneus (still in use among the eastern Christians) appears as late as the year 596, of Christ, 1016, on the mosaics of the Greek cities within the Parthian empire, and on the mosaics of the Christian school of the Freretz, p. 257. and the Vulgate of the New Testament, comm. de l'Académie, tom. iii.

The Parthian and confederates, the massacre of three hundred thousand of the inhabitants, tarnished the glory of the Roman triumph.\footnote{Dio, xxi. 19. 1.}

Conquest. Alexander, was solid of capitals exceeded booty, tempted Parthian Persia under sent kings from of some years, attacked of the Euphrates reduction Armenians. The massacre of three hundred thousand of the inhabitants, tarnished the glory of the Roman triumph. Seleucia, already exhausted by the neighbourhood of a too powerful rival, sunk under the fatal blow; but Ctesiphon, in about thirty-three years, had sufficiently recovered its strength to maintain an obstinate siege against the emperor Severus. The city was, however, taken by assault; the king, who defended it in person, exposed with precipitation; an hundred thousand captives, and a rich booty, rewarded the fatigues of the Roman soldiers.\footnote{Dio, xxi. 13. 6.}

Notwithstanding these misfortunes, Ctesiphon succeeded to Babylon and to Seleucia, as one of the great capitals of the East. In summer, the monarch of Persia enjoyed at Ecbatana the cool breezes of the mountains of Media; but the mildness of the climate engaged him to prefer Ctesiphon for his winter residence.

From these successful inroads the Romans derived no real or lasting benefit; nor did they attempt to preserve such distant conquests, separated from the provinces of the empire by a great tract of water.\footnote{Dio, xxi. 19. 1.}

The reduction of the kingdom of Osroene was an acquisition of less splendour indeed, but of far more solid advantage. That little state occupied the northern and most fertile part of Mesopotamia, between the Euphrates and the Tigris. Edessa, its capital, was situated about twenty miles beyond the confines of those rivers; and the inhabitants, since the time of Alexander, were a mixed race of Greeks, Arabs, Syrians, and Armenians.\footnote{Dio, xxi. 12. 3.}

The feeble sovereigns of Osroene, placed on the dangerous verge of two contending empires, were attached from inclination to the Parthian; but the Emperor of Rome acted from them a reluctant homage, which is still attested by their medals. After the conclusion of the Parthian war under Marcus, it was judged prudent to secure some substantial pledges of their doubtful fidelity. It was constructed on several parts of the country, and a Roman garrison was fixed in the strong town of Nisibis. During the troubles that followed the death of Commodus, the princes of Osroene attempted to shake off the yoke; but the stern policy of Severus confirmed their dependence, and the perfidy of Caracalla completed the easy conquest.\footnote{Dio, xvi. 210.}

Abgarus, the last king of Edessa, was sent in chains to Rome, his dominions reduced into a province, and his capital dignified with the rank of colony; and thus the Romans, about ten years before the fall of the Parthian monarchy, obtained a firm and permanent establishment beyond the Euphrates.\footnote{Dio, xvi. 210.}

Prudence as well as glory might have justified a war on the side of the Romans, the province of Osroene had been viewed with the most intense jealousy; the conquest of this province would have afforded the Romans a strong Sand to the Caucæan gulf, a safe haven to the Greek ships, and the means of checking the increasing power of the Parthian monarchies; but in the present state of the country, it would have been at once an improper and a dangerous undertaking.\footnote{Herod. ii. 6. 1.}

This kingdom, from Osroene, who gave a new name to the country, to the last Abgarus, had lasted 553 years. See the learned work of M. BAYER, Historia Osroenitæ et Edesiana.\footnote{Herod. ii. 6. 1.}

Xenophon, in the preface to the Cyropædia, gives a clear and magnificent idea of the extent of the empire of Cyrus. Herodotus (i. 85.) corroborates the above account, and places the bounds of the empire at the Araxes and the Euphrates, between which the great Moors was supposed to exist.\footnote{Herod. ii. 6. 1.}

There were two hundred armed.elephants at the battle of Arbæna, in the reign of Tigranes. In the year 162, an army of the Bactrians, which was vanquished at Logotus, seventeen thousand horse only were completely arrayed.\footnote{Dio, xvi. 210.}

Abgarus had four thousand four hundred elephants, with towers filled with archers on their backs, and of eighteen hundred chariots armed with spears. This formidable host, the like of which is not to be found in eastern history, and has scarcely been imagined in eastern romance, was disconfounded in a great battle, in which the Romans under Severus approved himself an intrepid soldier and a skilful general. The great king fled before his valor.
an immense booty and the conquest of Mesopotamia, were the immediate fruits of this signal victory. Such are the circumstances of this ostentatious and improbable relation, dictated, as it too plainly appears, by the vanity of the monarch, adorned by the unblushing servility of his flatterers, and received without contradiction by the world and by the obsequious senate. From being inclined to believe that the aims of Alexander obtained any memorable advantage over the Persians, we are induced to suspect, that all this blaze of imaginary glory was designed to conceal some real disgrace.

Our suspicions are confirmed by the count of the war, the authority of a contemporary historian, who mentions the victories of Alexander with respect, and his faults with censure. He describes the judicial plan which had been formed for the conduct of the war. Three Roman armies were destined to invade Persia at the same time, and by different roads. But the operations of the campaign, though wisely concerted, were not executed either with ability or success. The first of these armies, as soon as it had entered the marshy plains of Babylon, towards the artificial conflux of the Euphrates and the Tigris, 1 was encompassed by the superior numbers, and annihilated by the arrows, of the enemy. The advance of Chosroes, 2 king of Armenia, 3 and the long tract of mountainous country, in which the Persian cavalry was of little service, opened a secure entrance into the heart of Media, to the second of the Roman armies. These brave troops laid waste the adjacent provinces, and by several successful actions against Artaxerxes, 4 the ancient and bright colour to the emperor's vanity. But the retreat of this victorious army was imprudent, or at least unfortunate. In passing the mountains, great numbers of soldiers perished by the badness of the roads, and the severity of the winter season. It had been resolved, that whilst these two great detachments were penetrated into the opposite extremities of the Persian dominions, the main body, under the command of Alexander himself, should support their attack, by invading the centre of the kingdom. But the inexperienced youth, influenced by his mother's counsels, and perhaps by his own fears, deserted the bravest troops, and the fairest prospect of victory; and after consuming in Mesopotamia an inactive and inglorious summer, he led back to Antioch an army diminished by sickness, and provoked by disappointment. The behaviour of Artaxerxes had been very different from that of Alexander. He displayed with rapidity from the hills of Media to the marshes of Babylon, and to the expanse of the Persian dominions, the main body, under the command of Alexander himself, appeared as if it had united with the ablest conduct the most undaunted resolution. But in several obstinate engagements against the veteran legions of Rome, the Persian monarch had lost the flower of his troops. Even his victories had weakened his power. The favourable opportunities of the absence of Alexander, and of the confusion that followed that emperor's death, presented themselves in vain to his ambition. Instead of expelling the Romans, as he pretended, from the confines of Asia, he found himself unable to arrest from their heads the little province of Mesopotamia.

The reign of Artaxerxes, which from the last defeat of the Parthians lasted not twenty-four years, forms a memorable era in the history of the East, and even in that of Rome. His character seems to have been marked by those bold and commanding features, that generally distinguish the princes who conquer, from those who inherit, an empire. Till the last period of the Persian monarchy, his code of laws was respected as the ground-work of their civil and religious policy. 5 Several of his acts and orations, either public or private, particularly discovers a deep insight into the constitution of government. "The authority of the prince," said Artaxerxes, "must be defended by a military force; that force can only be maintained by taxes; all taxes must, at last, fall upon agriculture; and agriculture can never flourish except under the protection of justice and moderation." 6 Artaxerxes bequeathed his new empire, and his ambitious designs against the Romans, to Sapor, a son not unworthy of his great father; but those designs were too extensive for the power of Persia, and served only to involve both nations in a long series of destructive wars and reciprocal calamities.

The Persians, long since civilized and military power corrupted, were very far from possessing of the Persians, the martial independence, and the intrepid hardness, both of mind and body, which have rendered the northern horde to the extinction of the power of Greece and Rome, as it now does of Europe, never made any considerable progress in the East. Those disciplined evolutions which harmonize and animate a confused multitude, were unknown to the Persians. They were equally unskilled in the art of constructing, besieging, or defending sieges and fortifications. They trusted more to their numbers than to their courage; more to their courage than to their discipline. The infantry was a half-armed spiritless Their cavalry crowd of peasants, levied in haste by the contemptible, allurements of plunder, and as easily dispersed by a show of victory as by a display of force. The monarch and his host were transported into the camp the pride and luxury of the senglio. Their military operations were impeded by a useless train of women, eunuchs, horses, and camels; and in the midst of a successful campaign, the Persian host was often separated or destroyed by an unexpected famine. 9

But the nobles of Persia, in the bosom Their cavalry ex-Their cavalry excellency of luxury and despotism, preserved a strong sense of personal gallantry and national honour. From the age of seven years they were taught to speak truth, to shoot with the bow, and to ride; and it was The nobles of Persia (so natural is the idea of feudal tenures) received from the king's bounty lands and houses, on the condition of their service in war. They were ready on the first summons to mount on horseback with a martial and splendid train of followers, and to join the numerous bodies of guards, who were carefully selected from amongst the most robust slaves, and the bravest adventurers of Asia. These armies, both of light and of heavy cavalry, equally formidable by the impetuosity of their charge, and the rapidity of their

The state of Germany till the invasion of the barbarians, in the time of the emperor Decian.

The government and religion of Persia have deserved some notice, from their connexion with the decline and fall of the Roman empire. We shall occupy ourselves with those of the ancient world, which, with their arms and horses, their flocks and herds, their wives and families, wandered over the immense plains which spread themselves from the Caspian sea to the Vistula, from the confines of Persia to those of Germany. But the warlike Germans, who first resisted, then invaded, and at length overran the Western monarchy of Rome, will occupy a much more important place in this history, and possess a stronger, and, if we may use the expression, a more domestic, claim to our attention and regard. The most civilised of the modern Egyptians and the woods of Germany; and in the rude institutions of those barbarians we may still distinguish the original principles of our present laws and manners. In their primitive state of simplicity and independence, the Germans were surveyed by the discerning eye, and delineated by the sensitive pencil of the ancients, Orosius and Bede, the early historians of the world, who have so much more frequently discussed, that it is now grown familiar to the reader, and difficult to the writer. We shall therefore content ourselves with observing, and indeed with repeating, some of the most important circumstances of the climate, of manners, and of institutions, which rendered the wild barbarians of Germany such formidable enemies to the Roman power.

Extent of Germany. Ancient Germany, excluding its independent limits the province westward of the Rhine, which had submitted to the Roman yoke, extended itself over a third part of Europe; almost the whole of modern Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Livonia, Prussia, and the greater part of Poland.}

CHAPTER IX.

From Herodotus, Xenophon, Herodian, Ammianus, Chardin, &c.
I have extracted such probable accounts of the Persian nobili-tarity as merely common to every age, or particular to that of the Sassenades.

1. The Scyths, even according to the ancients, are not Sarmatians, but Greeks, after having expelled the Gauls into Greece and Barbary, divided the Barbarians into four great classes—the Celts, the Scyths, the Indians, and the Ethiopians—all the inhabitants of Gaul they named Celts—Scythia extended from the Baltic sea, to the sea of Azov. Those nations who are found in the north-west, in the angle between the Celtic region and Scythia, were named Celta-Scythians and the Sarmatians were placed in the southern part of this angle. But those names of Celts, Sceytians, Ceto-Sceytians and Sarmanitans, were invented by the Greeks, says Scholier, in consequence of their profound ignorance of cosmography, and have no foundation in reality. Important as it has been already so frequently, so ably, and so successfully discussed, that it is now grown familiar to the reader, and difficult to the writer. We shall therefore content ourselves with observing, and indeed with repeating, some of the most important circumstances of the climate, of manners, and of institutions, which rendered the wild barbarians of Germany such formidable enemies to the Roman power.

2. Ancient Germany, excluding its independent limits the province westward of the Rhine, which had submitted to the Roman yoke, part of Poland, were peopled by the various tribes of one great nation, whose complexion, manners, and language denoted a common origin, and preserved a striking resemblance. On the west, ancient Germany was divided by the Rhine from the Gallic, and on the south, the Danube, from the Illyro-Hellenic provinces of the empire. A ridge of hills, rising from the Danube, and called the Carpathian mountains, covered Germany on the side of Dacia or Hungary. The eastern frontier was fairly marked by the mutual fears of the Germans and the Saratians, and was often confounded by the mixture of warlike nations near the borders of the former and latter regions. In the remote darkness of the north, the ancients imperfectly described a frozen ocean that lay beyond the Baltic sea, and beyond the peninsula, or islands of Scandinavia.

Climate.

Some ingenious writers have suspected that Europe was much colder formerly than at present. The most ancient descriptions of the climate of Germany tend exceedingly to confirm their theory. The general complaints of intense frost, and eternal winter, are perhaps little to be regarded, since we have no method of reducing to the accurate standard of the thermometer, the feelings of antiquity; particularly of the ancients, in the lesser regions of Greece or Asia. But I shall select two remarkable circumstances of a less equivocal nature.

1. The great rivers which covered the Roman provinces, the Rhine and the Danube, were frequently frozen over, and capable of supporting the most enormous weights of men and horses. This made the severe season for their inroads, transported, without apprehension or danger, their numerous armies, their cavalry, and their heavy wagons, over a vast and solid bridge of ice. Modern ages have not presented an instance of a like phenomenon. 2. The rain-deer, the hare, and the wild boar are proverbial among the ancients, as deriving the best comforts of his dreary life, is of a constitution that supports, and even requires, the most intense cold. He is found on the rock of Spitzberg, within ten degrees of the pole; he seems to delight in the snows of Lapland and Siberia; but at present he cannot subsist, much less multiply, in any country to the south of the Baltic. In the time of Caesar, the hare ascended the mountains; in the north, he was native of the Hercynian forest, which then overshadowed a great part of Germany and Poland. The modern improvements sufficiently explain the causes of the diminution of the cold. These immense woods have been gradually cleared, which intercepted from the earth the rays of the sun. The morasses have been drained, and, in proportion as the soil has been cultivated, the air has become more temperate. Canada, at this day, is an exact picture of ancient Germany. Although situated in the same parallel with the finest provinces of France and England, that country experiences the most rigorous cold. There are very numerous cold springs; the ground is covered with deep and lasting snow, and the great river St. Lawrence is regularly frozen, in a season when the waters of the Seine and the Thames are usually free from ice.

It is difficult to ascertain, and easy to its effects on the exaggerate, the influence of the climate over the ancient Germanic and Scythian bodies of the natives. Many writers have supposed, and most have allowed, though, as it should seem, without any adequate proof, that the rigorous cold of the north was favourable to long life and generative vigour, that the women were more fruitful, and the human species more prolific, and that the women were more refined, than the more easy and temperate climate.

We may assert, with greater confidence, that the keen air of Germany formed the large and muscled limbs of the natives, who were, in general, of a more lofty stature than the people of the south, gave them a kind of strength better adapted to violent exertions, than the more superficial and tender limbs. The ancients are said to have derived the most remarkable and constitutional bravery, which is the result of nerves and spirits. The severity of a winter campaign, that chilled the courage of the Roman troops, was scarcely felt by these hardy children of the north, who, in their turn, were unable to resist the summer heats, and dissolved away in languor and sickness under the beams of an Italian sun.

There is not any where upon the Origin of the Globe a large tract of country which Germans, we have discovered destitute of inhabitants, or whose first population can be fixed with any degree of historical certainty. Many of the modern nations, the descendants of which have persisted till the present day, are, on the contrary, the result of a long series of ages, of conquests and migrations. Many learned writers have doubted the existence of a Tacitus supposed to derive from that of one of their gods, Tutes. It appears most probable that this word signified simply men, people; a collection of savage tribes would have given themselves no other name; thus the Lypadiers call themselves, Dimag, people, the Sacmoes, Thies; the Tugurii, men, &c. As the name was conveyed to the Romans, (Germani) Cesar found it in use in Gaul, and made use of it as a national name.

Many learned writers have endeavoured to establish the existence of Tacitus. (Hist. rom. Ges. 2, have contended that it was not given to the Teutones, till since the time of Cesar; but Adelung has satisfactorily refuted their allegations, and traced the name of the Fasti capitolini, (see Grauter inscription, 399, where the consul M. Verginius Flaccus has celebrated the war against the Gauls, the Insubrini, and the Germans command by Vindomar. (Suetonius, Vit. Cesare, cap. vi, p. 192.)

The modern philosophers of Sweden seem to have regarded the waters of the Baltic gradually in sink a regular proportion, which they have revered, as a subject worthy of investigation and estimation. In the beginning of the present age, the flat country of Scandinavia must have been covered by the sea; at present, many islands, of various forms and dimensions, such[1] is the name given by Mehl, Filby, and Thrastis, of the vast countries round the Baltic. See M. Bertier, Heures d'histoire de Danemark, de Suède, etc. The author of Dallin's History of Sweden, composed in the Swedish language (Ufaas, 1810) has given the names, the Aulhe de Bo, and M. Pelletier, Hist. des Côtes, tom. i. 419.

2. Caesar de Bell. Gallie. 29, 30. The iniquity of the invasions of the Germani was recognized by the ancient historians, although some of them had traveled in it more than sixty days' journey.

3. C. Cluverius (Germani nationes) estimates the size of the Germans, which are called in his edition, the Subaces, or the ancient Teutones, which are sufficiently described by Tacitus. (Hist. rom. Ges. 2, have contended that it was not given to the Teutones, till since the time of Cesar; but Adelung has satisfactorily refuted their allegations, and traced the name of the Fasti capitolini, (see Grauter inscription, 399, where the consul M. Verginius Flaccus has celebrated the war against the Gauls, the Insubrini, and the Germans command by Vindomar. (Suetonius, Vit. Cesare, cap. vi, p. 192.)

4. C. Gesner. 3, 26. Clever, l. v, p. 14. It is observed that the navigable head of the Danube is sucking in every country from the equator to the poles. The fog seems to approach the nearest to our species in the privilege.

5. The Romans have antiquity in the exercise of their excellent discipline were in a great measure preserved in health and vigour, which may be remarked in the men of the only animal which was not allowed, and in every country from the equator to the poles. The fog seems to approach the nearest to our species in the privilege.

6. The Germans in ancient times, and in modern times, in the exercise of their excellent discipline were in a great measure preserved in health and vigour, which may be remarked in the men of the only animal which was not allowed, and in every country from the equator to the poles. The fog seems to approach the nearest to our species in the privilege.

7. The Tacit. German. 19. 45. The author of the Gaug followed the course of the Danube, and discharged itself on Greece and Asia. Tacitus could distinguish the one Insurbini from the others by the name of Tacitus.

8. The Gaug. These were also among the Danubi. From the existence from the gradual union of some wandering savages of the Hencyan woods. To assert those savages to have been the spontaneous production of the earth, is, in the alphabetical world, rash inference; it is condemned by religion, and unwarranted by reason.

Fables and conjectures. Such rational doubt is but ill-suited with the genius of popular vanity.

Among the nations who have adopted the Mosaic history of the world, the ark of Noah has been of the same importance as the Bibles and romances to the siege of Troy. On a narrow basis of acknowledged truth, an immense but rude superstructure of fables has been erected; and the wild Irishman, as well as the wild Tartar, could point out the individual son of Japhet, from whose loins his ancestors were lineally descended. The last century abounded with antiquarians of profound learning and easy faith, who, by the dim light of legends and traditions, of conjectures and etymologies, conducted the great grandchildren of Noah from the tower of Babel to the extremities of the globe. Of these judicious critics, one of the most entertaining was Claud Rudbeck, professor in the university of Upsal. Whatever is celebrated either in history or fable, this zealous patriot ascribes to his country. From Sweden (which formed so considerable a part of ancient Germany) the Greeks themselves, and the most polished nation in the world, the Romans, who so profusely favoured by nature, could not long remain desert after the flood. The learned Rudbeck allows the family of Noah a few years to multiply from eight to about twenty thousand persons. He then disperses them into small colonies to replenish the earth, and to propagate the human species. The Bibles or Scandinavian (with which we are more familiar if I am not mistaken, under the command of Askenaz the son of Gomer, the son of Japhet,) distinguished itself by a more than common diligence in the prosecution of this great work. The northern hive cast its swarms over the greatest part of Europe, Africa, and Asia, and the Latin countries, in the blood circulated from the extremities to the heart.

The Germans. But all this well-organized system of rant of letters: German antiquity is annihilated by a single fact, too well attested to admit of any doubt, and of too decisive a nature to leave room for any plausible conjectures, in the account of Tacitus, were acquainte with the use of letters; and the use of time of Caesar, many other tribes of Gallic origin, who could not long withstand the attacks of the Suevi. The Helvetians, who dwelt at the entrance of the Black forest, between the Nayeonce and the Danube, had been driven thence long before the time of Caesar. We must also mention the Fabelles Tevagists, from Languedoc who had established themselves around the Black Forest. The Boeans, or Boli, who had penetrated this forest, and who have left in the word Boeans, traces of their name, were subjugated in the first century, by the Marcomanni. The Boeans establishing themselves in Noricum, were at last united with the Lombards, and received entertaining names among the Acii, Basarom,

According to Dr. Keating, (History of Ireland, p. 13, 14.) the glorified Boeans was the son of Orcus, the son of Ormus, the son of Runa, the son of Faraun, the son of Fathasun, the son of Magag, the son of Japhet, the son of Noah, founded on the coast of Munster, the 14th day of May, in the year of the world one thousand nine hundred and seventy-eight. Though he succeeded in his great enterprise, the house behaving of his wife rendered his domestic life very unhappy, and provoked him to such a degree, that he killed — his favourite greyhound, in the cellar in which he learned his letters. The run very proper Dux Consorarum, was the first instance of female falsehood and idolatry ever known in Ireland.

Germanii in. 10. Literatur secrete vera pariter ac familiaris ignotum. We may rest contented with this decisive authority, and the obscure descent of the Roman characters. The learned Celsius, a Swede, a Selzar, and a philosopher, was of opinion, that they were nothing more than a portion of a very curious inscription for the case of engraving. See Peloton. Historie des Celtes, l. ii. c. 11. Dictionnare Diplomatique, tom. i. p. 225. We may add, that the oldest Roman inscriptions are supposed to be of the third century, and the most ancient writer who mentions the Roman character, Tacitus. This is not surprising, as the Romans expressed their thoughts in the round. The Romans and Tacitus, were Praefaces pinzart Ruff tabellis. Recherches Philosophiques sur les Americains, tom. iii. p. 239. The author of that very curious work is, if I am not mistaken, a German by birth. The Alexandrain Geographer is often extin with the accuracy of Cuvier.

See Caesar, and the learned Mr. Whinber in his History of Man-cher, vol. 1. Gentilis. 15. When the Germans commenced the Uli of Cologne to cast off the Roman yoke, they were furnished with their earliest freedom to rendezvous, The modern writers, upon the commencement of the Rhine, is a multitude of facts, some of them most curious, and difficult to the belief of the most incredulous reader. The Rhine is a most observable river, with a curved course between arid lines for the case of engraving. See Pelloutier, Historie des Celtes, l. ii. e. 11. Dictionnare Diplomatique, tom. i. p. 225. We may add, that the oldest Roman inscriptions are supposed to be of the third century, and the most ancient writer who mentions the Roman character, Tacitus. This is not surprising, as the Romans expressed their thoughts in the round. The Romans and Tacitus, were plentifully stocked, supplied its inhabitants with food and exercise. Their monstrous herds of cattle, less remarkable indeed for their beauty than for their utility, formed the principal object of their wealth. A small quantity of corn was sufficient for their wants, the fertility and richness of the earth; the presence of orchards or artificial meadows was unknown to the Germans; nor can we expect any improvements in agriculture from a people, whose property every year experienced a general change by a new division of the arable lands, and who, in that strange operation, avoided disputes, by the most disgraceful of their territory to lie waste and without tillage.

and of the use

Gold, silver, and iron, were extremely of metals. ly scarce in Germany. Its barbarous inhabitants wanted both skill and patience to investigate those rich veins of silver, which have so liberally rewarded the attention of the princes of Brunswick and Saxony. Sweden, which now supplies Europe with iron, was equally ignorant of its own riches; and the appearance of the arms of the Germans furnished a sufficient proof how little iron they were able to bestow on what they must have deemed the noblest use of that metal. The various transactions of peace and war had introduced some Roman coins (chiefly silver) among the borders of the Rhine and Danube; but the more distant tribes were absolutely unacquainted with the use of money, carried on their transactions by barter, and prized their rude earthen vessels as of equal value with the silver vases the presents of Rome to their princes and ambassadors.

To a mind capable of reflection, such leading facts convey more instruction, than a tedious detail of subordinate circumstances. The value of money has been settled by general consent to express our wants and our property; as letters were invented to express our ideas; and both these institutions, by giving a more active energy to the powers and passions of human nature, have contributed to multiply the objects they were designed to represent. The use of gold and silver is in a great measure fictitious; but it would be impossible to enumerate the important and various services which agriculture, and all the arts, have received from iron, when tempered and fashioned by the operation of fire, and the dexterous hand of man. Money, in a word, is the most immediate and most delicious wine to any productive instrument, of human industry; and it is very difficult to conceive by what means a people, neither actuated by the one, norSecond, by the other, could emerge from the grossest barbarism.

I here contemplate a savage nation in the most parochial part of the globe, a supine indolence and a carelessness of futurity will be found to constitute their general character. In a civilized state, every faculty of man is expanded and exercised; and the great chain of mutual dependence connects and conscious the several members of society. The numerous portion of it is employed in constant and useful labour. The select few, placed by fortune above that necessity, can, however, fill up their time by the pursuits of interest or glory, by the improvement of their estate or of their understanding, by the duties, the pleasures and the falls of social life. The Germans were not possessed of these varied resources. The care of the house and family, the management of the land and cattle, were delegated to the old and the infirm, to women and slaves. The lazy warrior, destitute of every art that might employ his leisure hours, companied his pets in the entrances of sleep and food. And yet, by a powerful diversity of nature, (according to the remark of a writer who had pierced into its darkest recesses,) the same barbarians are by turns the most indolent and the most restless of mankind. They delight in sloth, they de- test tranquillity. The languid soul, oppressed with its own weight, anxiously required some new and powerful sensations to make up for the loss of its amusements adequate to its fierce temper. The sound that summoned the German to arms was grateful to his ear. It roused him from his uncomfortable lethargy, gave him an active pursuit, and, by strong exercise of the body, and violent emotions of the mind, restored him to the more lively sensations of his existence. In the dull intervals of peace, these barbarians were immoderately addicted to deep gaming and excessive drinking; but both of which, by different means, the one by inflaming their passions, the other by extinguishing their reason, alike relieved them from the pain of their lazy life. They gloried in passing whole days and nights at table; and the blood of friends and relations often stained their numerous and drunken assemblies. Their debts of honour (for in that light they have transmitted to us those of play) they discharged with the most romantic fidelity. The desperate gamester, who would stake his person and liberty on a last throw of the dice, patently submitted to the decision of fortune, and suffered himself to be bound, chastised, and sold into remote slavery, by his weaker but more lucky antagonist.

Strong beer, a liquor extracted with their taste for very little art from wheat or barley, and strong liquors, corrupted (as it is strongly expressed by Tacitus) into a certain semblance of wine, was sufficient for the gross purposes of German debauchery. But those who had tasted the rich wines of Italy, and afterwards of Gaul, sighed for the more delicious species of intoxication. They attempted not however, (as has since been executed with so much success,) to naturalize the vine on the banks of the Rhine and Danube; nor did they endeavour to procure by industry the materials of an advantageous commerce. To solicit by labour what might be ravished by arms, was esteemed unworthy of the German spirit. The intermeceral thirst of strong liquors often urged the barbarians to invade the provinces on which art or nature had bestowed those much envied presents. The Tuscan who betrayed his country to the Celtic nations, attracted them to Italy by the prospect of the rich fruits and the productions of their art; without attempting an assault.

And in the same manner the German auxiliaries, invited into France during the civil wars of the sixteenth century, were allured by the promise of plentiful quariers in the provinces of Champagne and Burgundy. Drunkenness, the most Hibernian, but not the most dangerous of our vices, was sometimes capable, in a less civilized state of mankind, of occasioning a battle, a war, or a revolution.

The climate of ancient Germany has been mild and temperate, by the labour of ten centuries from the time of Charlemagne. The same extent of ground which at present maintains, in ease and plenty, a million of husbandmen and artificers, was unable to supply an hundred thousand lazy warriors with the simple necessities of life. The Germans abandoned their im- proving forests to the purposes of husbandry, employed in pasturage the most considerable part of their territory, bestowed on the small remainder a rude and careless cultivation, and then accused the scantiness and sterility of a country that refused to maintain the multitude of its inhabitants. When the return of famine severely admonished them of the importance of the arts, the national distress was sometimes alleviated by the emigration of a third, perhaps, or a fourth part of their people. The necessities of life and the enjoyment of property are the pledges which bind a civilized people to an improved country. But the Germans, who carried with them what they most valued, their arms, their cattle, and their women, cheerfully abandoned the vast silence of their woods for the unbounded liberty and enjoyment. The innumerable swarms that issued, or seemed to issue, from the great storehouse of nations, were multiplied by the fears of the vanquished, and by the credulity of succeeding ages. And from facts thus exaggerated, an opinion was gradually established, and has been supported by writers of distinguished reputation, that, in the age of Caesar and Tacitus, the inhabitants of the north were far more numerous than they are in our days. A more serious inquiry into the causes of population seems to have convinced modern philosophers of the falsehood, and indeed the impossibility, of the supposition. To this question the minds of Robertson and of Voltaire can oppose the equal names of Robertson and Hume.

I. A warlike nation like the Germans, German freedom, without either cities, letters, arts, or money, found some compensation for this savage state in the enjoyment of liberty. Their poverty secured them to the society of their desires and their possessions are the strongest fetters of despotism. Among the Suiones (says Tacitus) riches are held in honour. They are therefore subject to an absolute monarch, who, instead of intrusting his people with the free use of arms, as is practised in the rest of Germany, commands the whole safe custody not of any citizen, or even a freeman, but of a slave. The neighbours of the Suiones, the Sitiones, are sunk even below servitude; they obey a woman. In the mention of these exceptions, the great historian sufficiently acknowledges the general theory of government. They are only at a loss to conceive by what means riches and despotism could penetrate into a remote corner of the north, and extinguish the generous flame that blazed with such freedom on the frontier of the Roman provinces; or how the ancestors of those Danes and Norwegians, so distinguished for their valor and unconquerable spirit, could thus tamely resign the great charter of German liberty. Some tribes, however, on the coast of the Baltic, acknowledged the authority of kings, though without relinquishing the rights of men; but in the far greater part of Germany, the form of government was a democracy, tempered, indeed, and controlled, not so much by general and positive laws, as by the occasional descendant of birth or valour, of eloquence or superstition.

Civil governments, in their first institutions, are voluntary associations for mutual defence. To obtain the desired end, it is absolutely necessary that each individual should con- sent to the measures, and be willing to submit to the inconvenience of his person, and to the punishment or loss of property which may arise from this submission and action to the judgment of the greater number of his associates. The German tribes were contented with this rule but liberal outline of political society. As soon as a youth, born of free parents, had attained the age of manhood, he was introduced into the government, and was invested with a shield and spear, and adopted as an equal and worthy member of the military commonwealth. The assembly of the warriors of the tribe was convened at stated seasons, or on sudden emergencies. The trial of public offences, the election of magistrates, and the great business of peace and war, were determined by its independent voice. Sometimes, indeed, these important questions were previously considered, and prepared in a more select council of the principal chieftains. The magistrates might deliberate and persuade, the people only could resolve and execute; and the result was by a vote of thirds we can oppose the equal names of Robertson and Hume.

1. Paul Diaramus, c. i.-3. Machiarel. Davila, and the rest of Paul's followers, represent these emigrations too much as regular and concerted measures. 2 Mr. Wm. Frislandians (who dedicated his supplement to Liey to Christian of Sweden) thinks proper to be very angry with the Romans who expressed so very little reverence for unanimous opinions. 6 The Suiones and the Stiones were the ancient inhabitants of Sweden. They are said not to appertain to the race of the Suevi, but to that of the Nw. Sueti, or the Quibrones, whom the Suevi, in very early ages, expelled from their own country into the west, and having conquered the north, mingled themselves finally with the Suevi and with the Goths, who have left traces of their name and of their power in the island of Gotland. 7 [Gothland.] 8 Why we suspect that superstition was the parent of despotism? The descendants of the Suebians (whose range is said to have extended till the year 1060) are said to have reigned in Sweden above a thousand years. There is an allusion to the religion and emigration of the Suebiga in Tacitus. In the year 1122, I find a singular law, prohibiting the use and profession of false gods, except by the kings, and provided that it was enforced by the presence of reviving an old institution? Ant. i. c. 30. 16 The comparative view of the powers more absum of the magistrates, in two remarkable over the property instances, is alone sufficient to repre- sent the whole system of German man.
The disposal of the landed property within their district was absolutely vested in their hands, and these districts, as we have seen, were termed by Tacitus "comitati," or natural divisions. At the same time they were not authorized to punish with death, to imprison, or even to strike, a private citizen. A people thus jealous of their persons, and careless of their possessions, must have been totally destitute of industry and the arts, but animated with a high sense of honour and independence.

Voluntary entertainment. The Germans only respected those entertainments which they imposed on themselves. The most obscure soldier resisted with disdain the authority of the magistrates. "The noblest members of the tribes, according to the rank of their companions of some renowned chief, to whom they devoted their arms and service. A noble emulation prevailed among the companions, to obtain the first place in the esteem of their chief; amongst the chiefs, to acquire the greatest number of valiant companions. To be ever paid by a band of soldiers, they would accept the pride and strength of the chiefs, their ornament in peace, their defence in war. The glory of such distinguished heroes diffused itself beyond the narrow limits of their own tribe. Presents and embassies solicited their friendship, and the fame of their arms was spread to every side to the utmost of their reach. In the hour of danger it was shameful for the chief to be surpassed in valour by his companions; shameful for the companions not to equal the value of their chief. To survive his fall in battle, was indelible infamy. To protect his person, and to adorn his glory with the trophies of their own exploits, were the most sacred of their duties. The chiefs combated for victory, the companions for the chief. The noblest warriors, whenever their native country was sunk in the laziness of peace, maintained their numerous bands of armed men to the last vestige of the sex; a hero's less spirit, and to acquire renown by voluntary dangers. Gifts worthy of soldiers, the warlike steed, the bloody and ever victorious lance, were the rewards which the companions claimed from the liberality of their chief. The rude plenty of his hospitable board dispersed amongst the sound of arms, the various forms of destruction, and the honourable wounds of their sons and husbands. Fainting arums of Germans have, more than once, been driven back upon the enemy, by the generous despair of the women, who dreaded death much less than servitude. If the day was irrecoverably lost, they well knew how to dispose of themselves, and their children, with their own hands, from an insulting victor. Heroines of such a cast may claim our admiration; but they were most assuredly neither lovely, nor very susceptible of love. Whilst they affected to emulate the virtuous examples of men, they must have renounced that attractive softness, in which principally consists the charm and weakness of women. Conscious pride taught the German females to suppress every tender emotion that stood in competition with honour, and the first honour of the sex has ever been that of chastity. The sentiments and conduct of these high-spirited matrons may, at once, be considered as a cause, as an effect, and as a proof of the general character of the nation. Female courage, however it may be raised by fanaticism, or confirmed by habit, can be only a faint and imperfect imitation of the manly duty of distinguishing the age or country in which

The religions system of the Germans was dictated by their wants, their fears, and their ignorance. The adored the great visible objects and agents of nature, the sun and the moon, the fire and the earth; together with those imaginary deities, who were supposed to preside over the most important occupations of human life. They were persuaded, by some ridiculous arts of divination, they could discover the will of the superior beings, and that human sacrifices were the most precious and acceptable offering to their altars. Some appliance has been hastily bestowed on the sublime notion, entertained by the Deity, by which they neither confined within the walls of a temple, nor represented by any human figure; but when we recollect, that the Germans were unskilled in architecture, and totally unacquainted with the art of sculpture, we shall readily assign the triumph of an idea, which arose not so much from a superiority of reason, as from a want of ingenuity. The only temples in Germany were dark and ancient groves, consecrated by the reverence of succeeding generations.

Their secret gloom, the imagined residence of an invisible power, presenting no object of direct worship, impressed the mind with a still deeper sense of religious horror; and the priests, rude and illiterate as they were, had been taught by experience the use of every artifice that could preserve and fortify impressions so well suited to their interest.

12 Tacitus, c. 7. These standards were only the heads of the wild beasts, and felt a momentary glow of martial ardor.

But how faint, how cold is the sensation which a peaceful mind can receive from solitary study! It was in the hour of battle, or in the feast of victory, that the bards celebrated the glory of heroes of ancient days, the ancestors of those warlike chieftains, who listened with delight to the voices of their warriors, impressed by the sound of their martial strains.

The view of arms and of danger heightened the effect of the military song; and the passions which it tended to excite, the desire of fame, and the contempt of death, were the habitual sentiments of a German mind.

Such was the situation, and such were the manners, of the ancient Germans. Their climate, their want of learning, of arts, and of laws, their notions of honour, of gallantry, and of religion, their sense of freedom, the dependency of their characters, were all attributed to form a people of military heroes. And yet we find, that, during more than two hundred and fifty years that elapsed from the defeat of Varus to the most daring and the most unjust enterprises, by the approbation of Heaven, and full assurances of success. The consecrated standards, long revered in the grove of superstition, were placed in the front of each battle, and the soldiers were taught to direct exhortations to the gods of war and of thunder. In the faith of soldiers (and such were the Germans) cowardice is the most unpardonable of sins. A brave man was the worthy favourite of their martial deities; the wretch, who had lost his shield, was alike banished from the sacred precincts and the civil assemblies of his countrymen. Some tribes of the north seem to have embraced the doctrine of transmigration, others imagined a gross paradise of immortal drunkenness.

All agreed, that a life spent in arms, and a glorious death in battle, were the best preparations for a happy future, either in this or in another world.

The immortality so vainly promised by the priests, was, in some degree, conferred by the bards. That singular order of men has most deservedly attracted the notice of all who have attempted to investigate the antiquities of the Celts, the Scandinavians, and the Germans. Their genius and character, as well as the reverence paid to that important office, have been sufficiently illustrated.

But we cannot so easily express, or even conceive, the enthusiasm of arms and glory which they kindled in their breasts. They then, in the heat of the moment, under the influence of the pleasing idea, and the second and deeper sight, the ardor of the brave might be carried even to excess, and the ruler of the universe was by this imagination, which renders fear, to the second sense, which is peace.

barbarians incapable of conceiving or embracing the useful restraints of laws, exposes them naked and unarmored to the blind terrors of superstition.

The German priests, improving this favourable tem-der of their countrymen, had assumed a jurisdiction over their ecclesiastical courts, and even in temporal concerns, which the magistrate could not venture to exercise; and the haughty warrior patiently submitted to the lash of correction, when it was inflicted, not by any human power, but by the immediate order of the god of war. The defects of civil policy were sometimes supplied by the interposition of ecclesiastical authority. The latter was constantly exerted to maintain silence and decency in the popular assemblies; and was sometimes extended to a more enlarged concern for the national welfare. A schooldom was occasionally established by present countries of Mecklenburgh and Pomerania.

The unknown symbol of the Earth, covered with a thick veil, was placed on a carriage drawn by cows; and in this manner the goddess, whose common residence was in the island of Rugen, visited several adjacent tribes of her worshippers. During her progress the sound of war was hushed, quarrels were suspended, arms laid aside, and the restless Germans had an opportunity of enjoying the blessings of peace and harmony. The true of God, so often and so insensibly pul-ing its way into the minds of the seventh century, was an obvious imitation of this ancient custom.

But the influence of religion was far more powerful to influence, than to moderate, the fierce passions of the Germans. Interest and fanaticism often prompted its ministers to WANT OF ARMS.

I. It has been observed, with ingenuity, and not without truth, that the command of iron soon gives a notion the command of gold. But the rude tribes of Germany, alike desistate of both those valuable metals, were reduced slowly to acquire, by their unassisted strength, the possession of the one as well as the other. The face of a German army displayed their poverty of iron. Swords, and the longer kind of lances, they could seldom use. Their shoes (as they called them) were wood, or the worst leather. They were long spears headed with a sharp but narrow iron point, and which, as occasion required, they either darted from a distance, or pushed in close onset. With this spear, and with a shield, their cavalry was contented. A multitude of darts, scattered with incredible force, were an additional resource of the infantry. Their military dress, when they wore any, was nothing more than a loose mantle. A variety of colours was the only ornament of their wooden or osier shields. Few of the chiefs were distinguished by cuirasses, scarce any by helmets. Though the horses of Germany were in esteem of luxury had engaged in the skilful evolutions of the Roman menage, several of the nations obtained renown by their cavalry; but, in general, the principal strength of the Germans consisted in their infantry, which was drawn up in several deep columns, according to the distinction of tribes, and of discipline of fatigue or delay, these half-formed warriors rushed to battle with dissonant shouts and disregarded ranks; and sometimes, by the effort of native valour, prevailed over the constrained and most artificial bravery of the Roman auxiliaries. But as the barbarians poured forth their whole souls on the first onset, they knew not how to rally or to retire. A repulse was a sure defeat; and a defect was most commonly sure destruction. When we recollect the complete armour of the Roman soldiers, their discipline, exercises, evolutions, fortiﬁed capacity of the infantry, it appears a just matter of surprise, how an unassisted valour of the barbarians could dare to encounter in the ﬁeld the strength of the legions, and the various troops of the auxiliaries, which seconded their operations. The contest was too unequal, till the Romans—auxiliaries, from their own national importance, and a spirit of disobedience and sedition had relaxed the discipline, of the Roman armies. The introduction of barbarian auxiliaries into those armies, was a measure attended with very obvious dangers, as it might gradually instruct the Germans in the arts of war and of policy. Although they were admitted in small numbers, and with the strictest precaution, the example of Civilis was proper to convince the Romans, that the danger was not imaginary, and that their precautions were not always sufﬁcient. During the civil wars that followed the death of Nero, that artful and intrepid Batavian, whom his errors condescended to engage with Hannibal and Sertorius, formed a great design of freedom and ambition. Eight Batavian cohorts, renowned in the wars of Britain and Italy, repaired to his standard. He introduced an army of Germans into Gaul, prevailed in the powerful cities of the Danube and Langres to embrace his cause, defeated the legions, destroyed their fortiﬁed camps, and employed against the Romans the military knowledge which he had acquired in their service. He was checked in his insurrection, he yielded to the power of the empire, Civilis secured himself and his country by an honourable treaty. The Batavians still continued to occupy the islands of the Rhine, the allies, not the servants, of the Roman monarchy.

II. The strength of ancient Germany Civil dissensions appears formidable, when we consider of Germany the effects that might have been produced by its united effort. The wide extent of country might very possibly contain a million of warriors, as all who were of age bear arms were of a temper to use them. But the dissensions of its own inhabitants, and the inability of cutting any plan of national greatness, was agitated by various and often hostile intentions. Germany was divided into more than forty independent states; and, even in each state, the union of the several tribes was extremely loose and precarious. The barbarians were easily provoked; they knew not how to forgive an injury, much less an insult; their resentments were bloody and implacable. The casual disputes that so frequently happened in their tumultuous parties of hunting or drinking, were sufﬁcient to inflame the minds of whole nations; the private feud of any considerable chieftain, itself a leader of his followers and allies. To chastise the insolent, or to plunder the defenceless, were alike causes of war. The most formidable states of Germany affected to encompass their territories with a wide frontier of solitude and devastation. The awful distance preserved by their neighbours, attested the terror of their arms. Impartial famines, impartial wants of fortune or of discipline, delay, these half-formed warriors rushed to battle with dissonant shouts and disregarded ranks; and sometimes, by the effort of native valour, prevailed over the constrained and most artiﬁcial bravery of the Roman auxiliaries. But as the barbarians poured forth their whole souls on the ﬁrst onset, they knew not how to rally or to retire. A repulse was a sure defeat; and a defect was most commonly sure destruction. When we recollect the complete armour of the Roman soldiers, their discipline, exercises, evolutions, fortiﬁed capacity of the infantry, it appears a just matter of surprise, how an unassisted valour of the barbarians could dare to encounter in the ﬁeld the strength of the legions, and the various troops of the auxiliaries, which seconded their operations. defeated by the stronger bias of private jealousy and interest. 8

The general conspiracy which terrified the empire in the reign of Marcus Antoninus. 9

Antoninus, comprehended almost all the nations of Germany, and even Sarmatia, from the mouth of the Rhine to that of the Danube. 9 It is impossible for us to determine whether this hastily confederated army was formed by necessity, by reason, or by passion; but we may rest assured, that the barbarians were neither allured by the indolence, nor provoked by the ambition, of the Roman monarch. This dangerous invasion required all the firmness and vigilance of Marcus. He fixed generals of ability in the several stations of attack, and assumed in person the conduct of the war against the most important province on the Upper Danube. After a long and doubtful conflict, the spirit of the barbarians was subdued. The Quadi and the Marcomanni, 10 who had taken the lead in the war, were the most severely punished in its catastrophe. They were commanded to retire five miles, 8 from their own home, on the farther bank of the Danube, and to deliver up the flower of the youth, who were immediately sent into Britain, a remote island, where they might be secured as hostages, and useful as soldiers. 5 On the frequent rebellions of the Quadi and Marcomanni, the irritated emperor resolved to reduce the country into the union of the Roman province. His designs were disappointed by death. This formidable league, however, the only one that appears in the two first centuries of the imperial history, was entirely dissipated, without leaving any traces behind in Germany.

Distracted by the great vicissitudes of the times, the German tribes, who had confined themselves to the general outlines of the manners of Germany, without attempting to describe or to distinguish the various tribes which filled that great country in the time of Caesar, or of Trajan. As the ancient, or as new tribes, successively present themselves in the series of this history, we shall concisely mention their origin, their situation, and their particular character. Modern nations are fixed and permanent societies, connected among themselves by laws and government, bound to their native soil by arts and agriculture. The German tribes were voluntary and fluctuating associations of soldiers, almost of savages. The same territory often changed its inhabitants in the tide of conquest and emigration. The same communities, uniting in a plan of defence or invasion, several tribes united to form the confederacy. The dissolution of an ancient confederacy restored to the independent tribes their peculiar but long-forgotten appellation. A victorious state often communicated its own name to a vanquished people. Sometimes crowds of volunteers flocked from all parts to the standard of a favourite leader: his camp became their country, and some circumstances of the enterprise soon gave a common denomination to the mixed multitude. The distinctions of the ferocious invaders were perpetually varied by themselves, and confounded by the astonished subjects of the Roman empire. 2

Wars, and the administration of public affairs, are the principal subjects of history; but the number of persons interested in these busy scenes, is very different, according to the different conditions of mankind. In great monarchies, millions of obedient subjects pursue their useful occupations in peace, under a government which is supported, not only by the consent, but also by the force, of the people, and the mildness of which is equally necessary to preserve order and to ensure tranquillity.

CHAPTER X.

The emperors Decius, Gallus, Ermilius, Valerian, and Gallienus—The general insurrection of the barbarians. The thirty tyrants.

From the great secular games celebrated by Philip, to the death of the emperor Galerius, there elapsed a space of thirty years. The empire was at length, after the short interval of the great republic, again divided into three parts, each of which was separated by civil dissensions, and united by a common danger. The barbarians, remorseless invaders of the ancient Roman territories, were at length reduced to the condition of subjects. The general interregnum of this period, during which nothing seems to have occurred that is worthy of remark, may be explained by the weakness and vacillation of the Roman emperors. During this calamitous period, every instant of time was marked, every province of the Roman world was afflicted, by barbarous invaders and military tyrants, and the ruined empire appeared to have been divided by the last and fatal moment of its dissolution. The confusion of the times, and the scarcity of authentic memorials, oppose equal difficulties to the historian, who attempts to preserve a clear and unbroken thread of narration. Surrounded with imperfect fragments, always concise, often obscure, and sometimes contradictory, he is reduced to collect, to compare, and to conjecture: and though he ought never to place his conjectures in the rank of facts, yet the knowledge of human nature, and of the sure operation of its fierce and unrestrained passions, might, on some occasions, supply the want of historical materials.

There is not, for instance, any difficulty in the emperor Philip in conceiving, that the successive murders of so many emperors had loosened all the ties of allegiance between the prince and people; that all the emperors of Philip were disposed to imitate the example of their master; and that the captive army, long since habituated to frequent and violent revolutions, might every day raise to the throne the most obscure of their fellow-soldiers. History can only add, that the rebellion against the emperor Philip broke out in the summer of the year two hundred and forty-nine, among the legions of Mysias: and that a subaltern officer, named Marinus, was the object of their seditious choice. 4

Philip was alarmed. He dreaded lest the treason of the Mysian army should prove the first spark of a general conflagration. Distressed with the consciousness of his guilt and of his danger, he communicated the intelligence to the senate. A gloomy silence prevailed, the effect of fear, and perhaps of disaffection: till at length Decius, one of the empire, roveth, of the assembly, assuming a spirit worthy of the emperor, of his noble extraction, ventured to Decius. He discovered more intrepidity than the emperor was to possess. He treated the whole business with contempt, as a hasty and incon siderate null, and Philip's rival as a phantom of royalty, who in a very few days would be destroyed by the same inscrutability that had created him. The speedy completion of the prophecy inspired Philip with a just esteem for so able a counsellor; and Decius appeared to him the only person capable of restoring peace and discipline to an army, whose tumultuous spirit did not immediately subside after the death of Marcellus, who, long resistant to his own nomination, seems to have insinuated the danger of presenting a leader of merit, to the angry and apprehensive minds of the soldiers; and his prediction was again confirmed by the event. The legions of Masca forced their judge to become the executioner of a public offender, and their own alternative of death or the purple. His subsequent conduct, after that decisive measure, was unavoidable. He conducted, or followed, his army to the confines of Italy, whither Philip, collecting all his force to repel the formidable competitor whom he had raised up, advanced to meet him. The imperial troops were superior in number; but the rebels formed an army of veterans, commanded by an able and experienced leader. Philip was either killed in the battle, or put to death a few days afterwards at Verona. His son and associate in the empire was massacred at Rome by the victorious army of Decius. It was impossible they could enjoy more favourable circumstances than the ambition of that age can usually plead, was universally acknowledged by the senate and provinces. It is reported, that, immediately after his reluctant acceptance of the title of Augustus, he had assured Philip by a private message, of his innocence and loyalty, solemnly protesting, that, on his arrival in Italy, he would resign the imperial ornaments, and return to the condition of an obedient subject. His professions might be sincere. But in the situation where fortune had placed him, it was scarcely possible that he could either forgive or be forgiven. The emperor Decius had employed a few months in the works of peace and the administration of justice, when he was summoned to the banks of the Danube by the invasion of the Goths. This is the first considerable occasion in which history mentions that great people, who afterwards broke the Roman power, sacked the capital, reigned in Gaul, Spain, and Italy. So memorable was the part which they acted in the subversion of the Western empire, that the name of Goths is frequently but improperly used as a general appellation to denote a savage people. The Goths, therefore, were only the remnant of the nations that subsisted in the Edda, a system of mythology, compiled in Iceland about the thirteenth century, and studied by the learned of Denmark and Sweden, as the most valuable remains of their ancient traditions.

Notwithstanding the mysterious oblations and sacrificial rites of the Edda, we can easily disentangle two persons confounded under the name of Odin: the god of war, and the great legislator of Scandinavia. The latter, the Mahomet of the north, instituted a religion, and converted the entire population of the inhabitants of Scandinavia.

The Goths from Scythia. In the beginning of the sixth century, and after the conquest of Italy, the Scyths. In possession of present greatness, very naturally indulged themselves in the prospect of past and of future glory. They wished to preserve the memory of their ancestors, and to transmit to posterity their own achievements. The principal minister of the court of Ravenna, the learned Cassiodorus, gratified the inclination of the conquerors in a Gothic history, which consisted of twelve books, now reduced to the imperfect abridgment of Jornandes. These writers, perhaps, as well as the Goths themselves, were over the misfortunes of the nation, celebrated its success, and adorned the triumph with many Asiatic trophies, that more properly belonged to the people of Scythia. On the faith of ancient songs, the uncertain, but the only, the memorials of barbarians, they dedicated to the fortunes of the Goths from the vast island, or peninsula, of Scandinavia. That extreme country of the north was not unknown to the conquerors of Italy: the ties of ancient consanguinity had been strengthened by recent offices of friendship; and a Scandinavian king had cheerfully abdicated his savage greatness, that he might pass the remainder of his days in the peaceful and polished court of Ravenna. Many ancient vestiges, which he was enabled to raise, as a popular vanity, attest the ancient residence of the Goths in the countries beyond the Baltic. From the time of the geographer Ptolemy, the southern part of Sweden seems to have continued in the possession of the less enterprising remnant of the nation, and a large territory between the Elbe and the Baltic is given to them by Zosimus. During the middle ages, (from the ninth to the twelfth century), whilst Christianity was advancing with a slow progress into the north, the Goths and the Swedes composed two distinct and sometimes hostile members of the same monarchy. The latter of these two names has prevailed without extinguishing the former. The Swedes, who might well be satisfied with their own fame in arms, have, in every age, claimed the kindred glory of the Goths. In a moment of discontent against the court of Rome, Charles the Twelfth insinuated, that his victorious troops were not degenerated from their heroic ancestors, who had already subdued the mistress of the world.

Till the end of the eleventh century, Religion of the a celebrated temple subsisted at Upsal, the most considerable town of the Swedes and Goths. It was enriched with the gold which the Scandinavians and acquired in their practical adventures, and sanctioned by the unanimous representations of the three principal deities, the god of war, the goddess of generation, and the god of thunder. In the general festival, that was solemnized every ninth year, nine animals of every species (without excepting the human) were sacrificed, in their Bleeding and drowning, to the three Goths.

The only traces that now subsist of this barbaric superstition are contained in the Edda, a system of mythology, compiled in Iceland about the thirteenth century, and studied by the learned of Denmark and Sweden, as the most valuable remains of their ancient traditions.

On the authority of Abbevius, Jornandes quotes some old Gothic chronicles in verse. [See Sik. Crit. c. 4.]

(The Goths inhabited Scandinavia, but were not originally inhabitants of that country.) The great nation was anciently of the race of the Suevi—it occupied in the time of Tacitus, and a long time before, Mecklenburg, Pomeraia, Southern Prussia, and the north coast of Poland. A large portion of the North Sea, and the great island of Gotland, which is the birthplace of the Goths, was inhabited by their ancestors, to whom we are indebted for much of what we know of their origin; the above mentioned island, and a large country on the east of it, was called Suevia, and is divided between Sweden and Denmark. It was inhabited by the Suevi, and afterwards by the Goths. The Goths, in the thirteenth century, when the migrations of the common enemies of the Suevi and the Vandals had subsided, compelled the invincible valor of Odin, by his persuasive eloquence, and by the fame, which he acquired, of a most skilful magician. The faith that he had propagated, during a long and prosperous life, he confirmed by a voluntary death. Appreciative of the ingenious approach of disease and infirmity, he resolved to expire as became a warrior. In a solemn assembly the Vandals pronounced him dead in nine mortal places, hastening away (as he asserted with his dying voice) to prepare the feast of heroes in the palace of the god of war. The native and proper habitation of the Scythians and of the Scythian race, that was situated on the Baltic, is said to have been established by the wanderings of Odin, the Fianna, and the Cymric. The Vandals, descendents of Odin, held the land, perhaps, with more sincere devotion. Odin, as it was supposed, was the chief of a tribe of barbarians that dwelt on the banks of the lake Mevotis, till the fall of the Huns and the fall of the arms of Pompey marked the north with servitude. That Odin, having with indignant fury to a power which he was unable to resist, conducted his tribe from the fringes of the Assur, all the inhabitants of Scandinavia, with the great design of forming, in a short and inconceivable period, a new freedom, a new religion and a people, which, in some remote age, might be subservient to his immortal renown; when his invincible Gods, armed with martial fanaticism, should issue in numerous swarms from the neighbourhood of the polar circle, to chaste the oppressors of mankind.

If so many successive generations of Natives were capable of preserving a faint tradition of their Scandinavian origin, we must not expect, from such uncouth Barbarians, any distinct account of the time and circumstances of their emigration. To cross the Baltic was an easy and natural attempt. The inhabitants of Sweden were masters of a sufficient number of large vessels, with oars, and the distance is little more than one hundred miles from Carlsecron to the nearest ports of Scania. From its strength, they had embarked on firm and solid ground. At least as early as the Christian era, and as late as the age of the Antonines, the Goths were established towards the mouth of the Vistula, and in that fertile province where the commercial cities of Thorn, Ething, Koningtonberg, and Dantsick, were long afterwards founded. The westward march of the Goths, the numerous tribes of the Vandals were spread along the banks of the Oder, and the sea-coast of Pomerania and Mecklenburg. A striking resemblance of manners, complexion, religion, and language, show that the Vandals and Goths were originally one great people. The latter appear to have been subdivided into Ostrogoths, Visigoths, and Gepidæ. The distinction among the Vandals was more strongly marked by the independent names of Hurni, Burgundians, Lombards, and a variety of other petty tribes. The Vandals, in the course of the age, expanded themselves into powerful monarchies.

In the age of the Antonines, the Goths from Prusia were still seated in Prussia. About the reign of Alexander Severus, the Roman province of Dacia had already experienced their proximity by frequent incursions of their frontiers. The Vandals, traversing the Danube, conducted them into the interior of Maecian, and by the Galaudet. This migration of the Vandals from the Baltic to the Euxine, but the cause that produced it lies concealed among the various motives which actuate the conduct of unsettled barbarians. Either a pestilence, or a famine, a victory, or a defeat, an immediate or remote cause, the eloquence of a daring leader, were sufficient to impel the Gothic arms on the milder climates of the south. Besides the influence of a martial religion, the numbers and spirit of the Goths were equal to the most dangerous adventures. The use of round bucklers and short一把 swords is of ancient occurrence. The enterprises of the Goths had been the commencement of a war of conquest, a war of extermination. The curiosity of the Vandals conducted them farther from their mother country into the territory of the Vandals and the Goths belonged equally to the great division of the Suevi; but the two tribes were very different. Those who have written upon this part of History, appear to me to have neglected to observe that the ancients almost always gave the name of the powerful and conquering people, whatever it was, by which they were conquered. The Vandals and Goths were called Vandals and Goths, because we are told that the Suevi had been conquered by the Vandals, and the Vandals had been conquered by the Goths. Those who lost their liberty, and became of the Gothic family, the Vandals and Goths were considered as having been assimilated to the Gepidæ, etc. in the same manner. A common origin was thus attributed to nations, who had been united only by the conquest of one nation, and this conclusion has caused innumerable errors (see History, G.)

The Avar and Picti, the eastern and western Goths, obtained those denominations from their original seats in Scandinavia. In all their future marches and setlements, they preserved, with their names, the same relative situation. When they first departed from Sweden, the infant colony was contained in three vessels. The third and largest vessel bore the evident sense of an illiberal Edda, and the interpretation of the most skilful critics, Aegid, instead of deciding a real city of the Aegidian name, is the fictitious name of a province. The minds of the Goths and of the Vandals, and of the Ostrogoths and Visigoths; this division took place after their migration into Dacia, in the third century. Those who came from Mecklenburg and Pomerania, were called Visigoths; those who came from the south of Prussia and the north-west of Poland, were named Ostrogoths. A common origin was thus attributed to nations, who had been united only by the conquest of one nation, and this conclusion has caused innumerable errors (see History, G.)

victory. But the prospect of the Roman territories was far more alluring and the fields of Dacia were covered with rich harvests, sown by the hands of an industrious, and exposed to be gathered by those of a warlike, people. It is probable, that the conquests of Trajan, maintained by his successors, less for any real advantage, than for ideal dignity, had contributed to weaken the empire. A state finally settled province of Dacia was neither strong enough to resist, nor rich enough to satiate, the rapaciousness of the barbarians. As long as the remote banks of the Niester were considered as the boundary of the Roman power, the fortifications of the Lower Danube were more carelessly guarded, and the inhabitants of Mesia lived in a security actually false and in an inaccessible distance from any barbarian invaders. The interpolations of the Goths, under the reign of Philip, finally convinced them of their mistake. The king, or leader, of that fierce nation, traversed with contempt, the province of Dacia, and passed both the Niester and the Danube without encountering any opposition capable of retarding his progress. The relaxed discipline of the Roman troops betrayed the most important posts, where they were stationed, and the fear of deserved punishment induced great numbers of them to enlist under the Gothic banner. Many of these various multitude of barbarians appeared, at length, under the walls of Marcianopolis, a city built by Trajan in honour of his sister, and at that time the capital of the second Mesia. The inhabitants consented to ransom their lives and property, by the payment of a large sum of money, and the invaders retreated, but into their deserts, animated rather than satisfied, with the first success of their arms against an opulent but feeble country. Intelligence was soon transmitted to the emperor Decius, that Caunus, king of the Goths, had passed the Danube at a second time, with more considerable forces; that his numerous detachments were scattered everywhere over the province of Mesia, whilst the main body of the army, consisting of seventy thousand Germans and Sarmatians, a force equal to the most during achievements, required the presence of the Roman monarch, and the exertion of his power to prevent it.

On his approach they raised the siege, but with a design only of marching away to a conquest of greater importance, that of Philippopolis, a city of Thrace, founded by the father of Philippus, the Great, the front seat of Phocis, a city of the same name. Decius followed them through a difficult country, and by forced marches; but when he imagined himself at a considerable distance from the rear of the Goths, Caunus turned with rapid fury on his pursuers. The camp of the Romans was surprised and pillaged, and, for the first time, their emperor fell in disorder before a troop of half armed barbarians. After a long resistance, Philippopolis, destitute of succour, was taken by storm. A hundred thousand persons are reported to have been massacred in the battle. The city of Philippopolis, of which many prisoners of consequence became a valuable acquisition to the spoil; and Priscus, a brother of the late emperor

Philip, blushed not to assume the purple under the protection of the barbarous enemies of Rome.\(^a\) The time, however, consumed in that tedious siege, enabled Decius to revive the courage, restore the discipline of the army, and increase the numbers of his troops. He intercepted several property of the army, and engaged other German and Suebi, who were hastening to share the victory of their countrymen,\(^1\) intrusted the passes of the mountains to officers of approved valour and fidelity;\(^2\) repaired and strengthened the fortifications of the Danube, and exerted his utmost vigilance to secure either the progress or the retreat of the Goths. Encouraged by the return of fortune, he anxiously waited for an opportunity to retrieve, by a great and decisive blow, his own glory, and that of the Roman arms.\(^3\)

At the same time when Decius was the object of such eagerness of recovery, the senate and the people of Rome were waiting with the most anxious expectation for the result of the memorable battle of Clastodictyon. The emperor, who was at the height of his glory, and who, as it appeared, was become the universal sovereign of the Roman empire, was to be the avenger of the Roman arms.

Decius revives the spirits of his troops.

A.D. 250. 270, rather acclamations, Valerian, who was October, afterwards emperor, and who then served with distinction in the army of Decius, was declared the most worthy of that exalted honour. As soon as the decessor of the senate was transmitted to the emperor, he assembled a great council in his camp, and speaking before the investiture of the censor elect, he apprized him of the difficulty and importance of his great office.

"Happy Valerian," said the prince to his distinguished subject, "happy in the general approbation of the senate, and popular in the people! You are the counselor of mankind; and judge of our manners. You will select those who deserve to continue members of the senate; you will restore the equestrian order to its ancient splendour; you will improve the revenue, yet moderate the public bursaries. You will distinguish in the army the valorous, and the various officers of the citizens, and accurately review the military strength, the wealth, the virtue, and the resources of Rome. Your decisions shall obtain the force of laws. The army, the palace, the ministers of justice, and the great officers of the empire, are all subject to your tribunal.

None are exempted, excepting only the ordinary consuls, the prefect of the city, the king of the sacrifices, and (as long as she preserves her chastity inviolate) the eldest of the vestal virgins. Even these few, who may not dread the severity, will anxiously solicit the esteem, of the Roman censor."\(^4\)

A magistrate, invested with such exalted powers, would have appeared impracticable, and not so much the minister as the co-heir of the Roman censors. Decius, however, was not so terrified at the idea of the usurpation of such an immense weight of power.\(^5\) The approaching event of war soon put an end to the prosecution of a project so specious but so impracticable; and whilst it preserved Valerian from the danger, saved the emperor Decius from the disappointment, which would, most probably, have occurred in an attempt to execute so interesting a project.

The Goths were now, on every side, invader and death surrounded and pursued by the Roman legions. The flower of their troops had been perished in the long siege of Philippopolis, and the exhausted country could no longer afford subsistence for the remaining multitude of licentious barbarians. Reduced to this extremity, the Goths would gladly have purchased, by the surrender of all their booty and prisoners, the permission of an unobstructed retreat. But the emperor, confident of victory, and resolving, by the chastisement of these invaders, to strike a salutary terror into the nations of the north, refused to listen to any terms of accommodation. The high-spirited barbarians, of whom the honour of the purple, was slain by an arrow, in the sight of his afflicted father; who, summoning all his fortitude, admonished the dismayed troops, that the loss of a single soldier was of little importance to the republic. The conflict was terrible; it was the conflict of despair against grief and rage. The first line of the Goths at length gave way in disorder; the second, advancing to sustain it, shared its fate; and the third only remained entire, prepared to dispute the passage of the morasses, which was imprudently attempted. Decius, at the very moment, amid the clamour of the people, made an appeal to the emperor for a renewal of the combat. He was put to silence by a messenger, who called for the return of the Goths to the Danube, but that emperor would not listen to so disgraceful an accommodation. Decius, accosted by the envoys of the Goths, demanded the submission of his enemy, and hesitated not to use the most odious expressions. ured to encounters in the bogs, their persons tall, their spears long, such as could wound at a distance.\(^\text{1}\) In this mass the Roman army, after an ineffectual struggle, was irrecoverably lost; nor could the body of the emperor ever be found.\(^\text{2}\) Such was his end in the fiftieth year of his age; an accomplished prince, active in war, and affable in peace;\(^\text{3}\) who, together with his son, has deserved to be compared, both in life and death, with the brightest examples of ancient virtue.\(^\text{4}\)

Election of Gal- lus. This fatal blow humbled, for a very little time, the insolence of the legions. They appear to have patiently expected, and submissively obeyed, the decree of the senate which regulated the succession to the throne. From a just regard for the memory of Decius, the imperial title was conferred on Hostilianus, his only surviving son; but an equal rank, with more effec- tual power, was granted to Gallus, whose experience and ability seemed equal to the great trust of guardian to the young prince and the distressed empire.\(^\text{5}\) The first care of the new emperor was to deliver the Illyrian provinces from the intolerable weight of the victorious enemy. He passed, without the knowledge of his generals, from their hands the rich fruits of their invasion, an immense booty, and, what was still more disgraceful, a great number of prisoners of the highest merit and quality.

Retreat of the Goths. He plentifully supplied all camps with every convenience that could assuage their angry spirits, or facilitate their so much wished for departure; and he even promised to pay them annually a large sum of gold, on condition they should never afterwards infest the Roman territories by their incursions.

Gallus parceled out among the pay-opulent kings of the eastern territory, the protection of the victorious commonwealth, were gratified with such liberal presents as could only derive a value from the hand that bestowed them; an ivory chair, a coarse garment of purple, an incumberous piece of plate, or a quantity of copper coin.\(^\text{6}\) After the wealth of nations had centred in Rome, the emperors displayed their greatness, and even their policy, by the regular exercise of a steady and moderate liberality towards the allies of the state. They relieved the poverty of the barbarians, honoured their merit, and reimbursed their fidelity. These voluntary marks of bounty were understood to flow, not from the fears, but merely from the generosity or the gratitude of the Romans; and whilst presents and subsidies were liberally distributed among friends and suppliants, they were strenuously resisted to such as claimed them as a debt.

Popular discomfiture. But this stipulation, of an annual pay- ment, to a victorious enemy, appeared without disguise in the light of an ignominious tribute; the minds of the Romans were not yet accustomed to accept such unequal laws from a tribe of barbarians; and the prince, who by a necessary concession had probably saved his country, became the object of the general contempt and aversion. The death of Hos- tilianus, though it happened in the midst of a raging pestilence, was interpreted as the personal crime of Gallus;\(^\text{7}\) and even the defeat of the late emperor was ascribed by the voice of suspicion to the perfidies of his lieutenants.\(^\text{8}\) In the year 253, in which the empire enjoyed during the first year of his administration,\(^\text{9}\) served rather to inflame than to appease the public discontent; and, as soon as the apprehensions of war were removed, the infancy of the peace was more deeply and more sensibly felt.

But the Romans were irritated to a victory and re- gained higher degree, when they discovered, that the 011i-lus-2 had that they had not even secured their lives.\(^\text{10}\) And, A. D. 253, repose, though at the expense of their honour. The dangerous secret of the wealth and weakness of the empire had been revealed to the world. New swarms of barbarians, encouraged by the success, and not conceiving themselves bound by the obligation, of their brethren, spread devastation through the Illyrian provinces, and terror as far as the gates of Rome. The defence of the monarchy, which seemed abandoned by the pusillanimous emperor, was assumed by the triumvirs, governor of Panonin and Maestia; who rallied and revived the spirit of the troops. The barbarians were unexpectedly attacked, routed, chased, and pursued beyond the Danube. The victorious leader distributed as a donative the money collected for the tribute, and the acclama- tions of the soldiers proclaimed him emperor on the field of battle.\(^\text{11}\) But, careless of the general welfare, indulged himself in the pleasures of Italy, was almost in the same instant informed of the success, of the revolt, and of the rapid approach, of his aspiring lieutenant. He advanced to meet him as far as the plains of Spoleto. When the armies met in front of each other, the soldiers of Gallus compared the ignominious conduct of their sovereign with the glory of his rival. They admired the valour of the triumvirs; they were attracted by his liberality, for he offered a considerable increase of pay to all deserters.

The murder of Gallus, and of his son. Gal- lus abandoned his plans to the end of the war; and the senate gave a legal sanction to the right of conquest. The letters of the triumvirs to that assembly displayed a mixture of moderation and vanity. He assured them, that he should resign to their wisdom the civil administration; and, when he was presenting himself with the quitting of the camp of Sispole, would in a short time assert the glory of Rome, and deliver the empire from all the barbarians both of the north and of the east.\(^\text{12}\) His prudence was flattered by the applause of the senate; and medals are still extant, representing him with the name and attributes of Hercules the Victor, and of Mars the Avenger.

If the new monarch possessed the same abilities, he wanted the time, necessary to fulfil these splendid promises. He was assassinated by four months intervened between his victory and his fall.\(^\text{13}\) He had vanquished Gallus: his power sank under the weight of a competitor more formidable than Gallus. That unfortunate prince had sent Valerian, already distinguished by the honorable title of censor, to bring the legions of Gaul and Germany\(^\text{14}\) to his aid. Valerian executed that commission with zeal and fidelity, and as he arrived too late to save his sovereign, he resolved to revenge his death. The troops of the triumvirs, who still lay encamped in the plains of Spoleto, were awed by the sanctity of his character, but much more by the superior strength of his army; and as they were now become as incapable of personal attachment as they had always been of constitutional principle, they readily imitated their example, and armed their hands in the blood of a prince, who so lately had been the object of their personal choice. The guilt was theirs, but the advantage of it was Valerian's, who obtained the possession of the throne by the means indeed of a civil war, but with a degree of innocence singular in that age of revolutions; since he owed not the gratitude or allegiance to his predecessor, whom he deherned.

Character of Valerian.
Valerian was about sixty years of age, when he was invested with the purple, not by the caprice of the populace, or the clamours of the army, but by the unanimous voice of the Roman world.

In his gradual ascent through the honours of the state, he had deserved the favour of virtuous princes, and had declared himself the enemy of tyrants. His noble birth, his mild and unblemished manners, his learning, prudence, and experience, were revered by the senate and people; and if mankind (according to the observation of an ancient writer) had been led by liberty to choose a master, their choice would most assuredly have fallen on Valerian. Perhaps the merit of this emperor was inadequate to his reputation; perhaps his abilities, or at least his spirit, were affected by the languor and coldness of old age. The consciousness of his decay, and the ignoble habit of the court, share the throne with a younger and more active associate: the emergency of the times demanded a general no less than a prince; and the experience of the Roman censor might have directed him who acted best to the imperial purple, as the reward of military merit. But instead of making a judicious choice, which would have confirmed his reign and endeared his memory, Valerian, consulting only the dictates of affection or vanity, immediately invested with the supreme honours his son Gallienus, a youth whose minute abilities had been hitherto concealed by the obscurity of a private station. The joint government of the father and the son subsisted about seven, and the sole administration of Gallienus continued about eight, years. But the whole period was one uninterrupted series of confusion and calamity. As the Roman empire was at the zenith of its power, and on every side, attacked by the blind fury of foreign invaders, and the wild ambition of domestic usurpers, we shall consult order and perspicuity, by pursuing, not so much the doubtful arrangements of date, as the moral natural distribution of subjects. Origin and confederation of the Franks.
In the history of the Franks, we find no history. Their migrations are mentioned without any particular country. Their most celebrated monarchs are the Visigoths, who were never in possession of a well-defined monarch; the Vandals, who are never mentioned in the history of the Franks; and the Ostrogoths, who were never in possession of a well-defined monarch.

The Geographer of Ravenna, i. 11, by mentioning Maurinica, on the confines of Denmark, as the ancient seat of the Franks, gave birth to an ingenious system of Leibnitz.

nations of Alexander Severus, they were dismayed by the arms of his successor, a barbarian equal in valour and fierceness to themselves. But still hovering on the frontier of the Rhine they yielded to the general disorder that ensued after the death of Decius. They inflicted severe wounds on the rich provinces of Gaul; they were the first who removed the veil that covered the feeble majesty of Italy. A numerous body of the Alemanni penetrated across the Danube, and through the Rhastian Alps, into the plains of Lombardy, advanced as far as Ravenna, and displayed the victorious banners of barbarians almost in sight of Rome. The insult and the danger rekindled in the senate some sparks of their ancient virtue. Both the emperors were engaged in far distant wars, Valerian in the East, and Gallienus in the West. The resources of the Romans were in themselves. In this emergency the senators resolved the are expelled from the defence of the republic, drew out the Rome by the senatorial guards, who had been left to the and people, to garrison the capital, and filled up their numbers, by enlisting into the public service the stoutest, and most willing of the plebeians. The Alemanni, astonished with the sudden appearance of an army more numerous than their own, retired into Germany, laden with spoil; and their retreat was esteemed as a victory by the warlike Romans.

When Gallienus received the intelligence that his capital was delivered by the barbarians, he was much less delighted than alarmed with the courage of the senate, since it might one day prompt them to rescue the public from domestic tyranny, as well as from foreign invasion. His timid ingratitude was published to his subjects, in an edict which prohibited the senators from exercising any military employment, and even from approaching the camps of the legions. But his fears were groundless. The rich and luxurious nobles, sinking into their natural condition, as a favour, this disgraceful exemption from military service; and as long as they were indulged in the enjoyment of their baths, their theatres, and their villas, they cheerfully resigned the more dangerous cares of empire to the rough hands of peasants and soldiers.

A mixed body of Suevi assume the name of Alemann: in quest of food, or plunder, or of glory.

In that part of Upper Saxony beyond the Elbe, which is at present called the marquisate of Lusace, there existed, in ancient times, a sacred wood, the awful seat of the superstition of the Suevi. None were permitted to enter the holy precincts, without confessing, by their servile bonds and suppliant posture, the immediate presence of the sovereign Deity. Patriotism contributed as well as devotion to consecrate the Sonnen- wald, or wood of the Senones. It was universally believed, that the nation had received its first existence on that sacred spot. At stated periods, the numer- ous and warlike army of the Suevi, in the Suevic blood, reorted shatter by their ambassadors; and the memory of their common extraction was perpetuated by barbarie rites and human sacrifices. The wide extended name of Suevi filled the interior countries of Germany, from the banks of the Oder to those of the Danube. They were distinguished from the other Germans by their peculiar mode of dressing their long hair, which they gathered into a rude knot on the crown of the head; and they delighted in an ornament that showed their ranks more lofty and terrible in the eyes of the enemy. Jealous, as the Germans were, of military renown, they all confessed the superior valor of the Suevi; and the tribes of the Usipetes and Tetenari, who, with a vast army, encountered the dictator Caesar, declared that they esteemed it no disgrace to have fled before a people, to whose arms the immortal gods themselves were unequal.

In the reign of the emperor Caracalla, the name of Alemann was given to an innumerable swarm of Suevi appeared on the banks of the Mein, and in the neighbourhood of the Roman provinces, in quest either of food, or plunder, or of glory. The bands of the Suevi gradually became an irre-

5 In the time of Antoninus (the end of the fourth century) Herola or Lurida was in a very ruinous state (Anon. Epit. xxv. 35), which probably was the consequence of the ravages of barbarians, and of the action of the march of an inroad, which continued long after the age of the Emperors. Another invasion of the Alemanni, of a more formidable aspect, but more glorious, event, is mentioned by a writer in the lower part of the 4th century. Three hundred thousand of that warlike people are said to have been vanquished, in a battle near Milan, by Gallienus in person, at the head of only ten thousand Romans. 7 We may, however, with great probability, ascribe this incredible victory, either to the credulity of the historian, or to some other cause, of explaining of the emperor's victories. It was by arms of a very different nature that Gallienus endeavoured to protect Italy from the fury of the Germans. He espoused Pipa, the daughter of a king of the Marcomanni, a Suevic tribe, which was often confounded with the Alemanni in their wars and conquests. To further his alliance, he granted an ample settlement in Pannonia. The native charms of unpollished beauty seem to have fixed the daughter in the affections of the inconstant emperor, and the bands of policy were more firmly cemented by those of love. But the great stream of the Gothic hordes of Rome still refused the name of marriage, to the profuse mixture of a citizen and a barbarian; and has stigmatized the German princess with the opprobrious title of concubine of Gallienus.*

Inroads of the Goths. III. We have already traced the emigration of the Goths from Scandinavia; and it might be inferred that they were driven by the Romans with more than usual firmness and success. The provinces that were the seat of war, recruited the armies of Rome with an inexhaustible supply of hardy soldiers; and more than one of these Illyrian peasants attained the station, and displayed the spirit of the general. To the Goths, as the price of his alliance, he granted an ample settlement in Pannonia. Conquest of the Bosphorus. By the Goths. 8 The Goths, in their new settlement of the Ukraine, soon became masters of the northern coast of the Euxine; to the south of that inland sea were situated the soft and wealthy provinces of Asia Minor, which possessed all the qualities which could attract, and nothing that could resist, a barbarian conqueror.

The banks of the Bosphores are only sixty miles distant from the narrow entrance of the Peninsula of Crim Tartary, known to the ancients under the name of Chersonesus Taurica. 9 On that inhospitable shore, Euprudes, embellishing with exquisite art the tales of antiquity, has placed the scene of one of his most affecting tragedies. 10 The bloody sacrifices of Diana, the arrival of Orestes and Pylades, and the triumph of virtue and religion over savage ferocities, serve to represent an historical truth, that the Tauri, the original inhabitants of that peninsula, were in some degree reclaimed from their brutal manners, by a gradual intercourse with the Grecian colonies, which settled along the maritime coast. The little kingdom of Bosphorus, whose capital was situated on the Straits, through which the Mauois communions itself to the Euxine, was composed of degenerate Greeks, and half-civilized barbarians. It subsisted, as an independent state, from the time of the Peloponnesian war, 11 until it was by the death of the last Monarch of a distant fortress, of his dominions, sunk under the weight of the Roman arms. From the reign of Augustus, 12 the kings of Bosphorus were the humble, but not useless, allies, of the empire. By presents, by arms, and by a slight fortification drawn across the isthmus, they effectually guarded the entrance of the important passage of the strait.

The ships used in the navigation of the Euxine were of a very size and structure. They were small naval force, small, flat-bottomed boats framed of timber only, without the least mixture of iron, and occasionally covered with a fly-boat, to enable the crew of thirty men defending a few of these floating houses, the Goths carelessly trusted themselves to the mercy of an unknown sea, under the conduct of sailors pressed into the service, and whose skill and fidelity were equally suspectible. sight of the country of Colchis, so famous by the expedition of the Argonauts; and they even attempted, though with little success, to plunder the large fleet at the mouth of the river Phasis. Trebizond, celebrated in the retreat of the ten thousand as an ancient colony of Greeks, derived its wealth and splendour from the munificence of the emperor Hadrian, who had constructed an artificial port on a coast left destitute by nature. Wall built around the city, the walls were thick and populous; a double enclosure of walls seemed to defy the fury of the Goths, and the usual garrison had been strengthened by a reinforcement of ten thousand men. But there are not any advantages capable of supplying the absence of discipline and vigilance. The numerous barbarians ranged without opposition through the extreme province of Pontus. The rich spoils of Trebizond filled a great fleet of ships that had been found in the port. The rough youth of the sea-coast were chained to the car; and the Goths, satisfied with the success of their first naval expedition, returned in triumph to your new establishments in the kingdom of Bosphorus.

The second expedition of the Goths was undertaken with greater powers of ships and coasters; but they steered a different course, and, going by the exterior provinces of Pontus, followed the western coast of the Euxine, passed before the wide mouths of the Bosphorus, the Niester, and the Danube, and increasing their fleet by the capture of a great number of fishing vessels, they approached the narrow outlet through which the Euxine sea pours its waters into the Mediterranean, and divides the continents of Europe and Asia. The garrison of Chaledon was encamped near the temple of Jupiter Urus, on a promontory that commanded the entrance of the strait; and so inconsiderable were the dreaded invaders of the barbarians, that this body of troops was placed in a position more secure than the position of those who had learned sufficient policy to reward the traitor, whom they detected. Nice, Prusa, Aperna, Cius, cities, on the entrance of them; till a favourable wind, springing up the next day, carried them in a few hours into the placid sea, or rather lake, of the Propontis. Their landing on the little island of Cyzicus was attended with the ruin of that ancient and noble city. From thence issuing again through the narrow passage of the Hellespont, they pursued their winding navigation amidst the numerous islands scattered over the Archipelago, or the Ægean sea. The assistance of captives and deserters must have been very necessary to pilot their vessels, and to direct their various incursions, as well on the coast of Greece as that of Asia. At length the Gothic fleet anchored in the port of Piraeus.

five miles distant from Athens, which had attempted to make some preparations for a vigorous defence. Cleodamus, one of the engineers employed by the emperor's orders to fortify the maritime cities against the Goths, had betrayed his trust by building the ancient walls, fallen to decay since the time of Sylva. The efforts of his skill were ineffectual, and the barbarians became masters of the native seat of the muses and the arts. But while the conquerors abandoned themselves to the license of plunder and intemperance, their fleet, having laid with a sudden shock in the haven of Piraeus, was unexpectedly attacked by the brave Dexippus, who, flying with the engineer Cleodamus from the sack of Athens, collected a hasty band of volunteers, peasants as well as soldiers, and in some measure avenged the calamities of his country."

But this exploit, whatever lustre it might shed on the declining age of Athens, served rather to irritate than to subdue the undaunted spirit of the northern invaders. A general conflagration blazed out at the same time in every district of Greece: Peloponnesus, Crete, and Sparta, which had formerly waged such memorable wars against each other, were now unable to bring an army into the field, or even to defend their ruined fortifications. The rage of war, both by land and by sea, spread from the eastern point of Surnium to the western confines of Corinth. The Goths had already advanced within sight of Italy, when the approach of such imminent danger awakened the indolent Gallienus from his dream of pleasure. The emperor appeared in arms; and his presence seemed to have checked the ardour, and to have divided the strength, of the two adverse armies. Naustiades, the chief of the barbarians, and retreat, ruled, accepted an honourable capitulation, entered with a large body of his countrymen into the service of Rome, and was invested with the ornaments of the consular dignity, which had never before been profaned by the hands of a barbarian. Great numbers of the Goths, disgusted with the perils and hardships of a tedious voyage, broke into Mesia, with a design of forcing their way over the Danube to their settlements in the Ukraine. The wild attempt would have proved inevitable destruction, if the discord of the Roman generals had not contributed to the purposes of the enemy. The small remainder of this destroying host returned on board their vessels; and measuring back their way through the Hellespont and the Bosphorus, ravaged in their passage the shores of Troy, whose fame, immortalized by Homer, will forever excite the memory of the Goths. As soon as they found themselves in safety within the basin of the Euxine, they landed at Archiaus in Thrace, near the foot of Mount Haemus: and, after all their toils, indulged themselves in the use of those pleasant and salutary hot baths. What remained of the voyage was a short and easy navigation. Such was the various fate of this third and greatest of their naval enterprises. It may seem difficult to conceive, how the original body of fifteen thousand warriors could sustain the losses and divisions of so bold an adventure. But as their numbers were already wasted by the sword, by sea, and land, by the influence of a warm climate, they were perpetually renewed by troops of banditti and deserters, who flopped to the standard of plunder, and by a crowd of fugitive slaves, often of German or Sarmanian extraction, who eagerly seized the glorious opportunity of freedom and revenge. In these expeditions, the Gothic nation claimed a superior share of the spoils, for the generosity of the Goths. The others, sometimes distinguished and sometimes confounded in the imperfect histories of that age; and as the barbarian fleets seemed to issue from the mouth of the Tanais, the vague but familiar appellation of Scythians was frequently bestowed on the mingled mass of the different nations.

In the general calamities of mankind, Ruin of the temple of Diana at Ephesus, after having risen with increasing splendour from seven repeated misfortunes, was finally burnt by the Goths in their third naval invasion. The arts of Greece, and the wealth of Asia, had conspired to erect that sacred and magnificent structure. It was supported by an hundred and twenty-seven marble columns of the Doric order, and it was the gifts of devout monarchs, and each was sixty feet high. The altar was adorned with the masterly sculptures of Praxiteles, who had, perhaps, selected from the favourite legends of the place the birth of the divine children of Latona, the the concealment of Apollo after the slaughter of the Cyclops, and the expelling the armed and profaned Amazons. Yet the length of the temple of Ephesus was only four hundred and twenty-five feet, about two-thirds of the measure of the church of St. Peter's at Rome. In the other dimensions, it was still more inferior to that sublime production of modern art by the artificers of Ephesus, Philippi, and Delphi, the accommodation of the edifice surpassing the size and proportions of the parthenon. The temple of Diana was, however, admired as one of the wonders of the world. Successive empires, the Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman, had revered its sanctity, and enriched its splendour. But the rude savages of the Baltic were destitute of a taste for the elegant arts, and they destroyed their temple as they had burnt the temple of Apollo. Another circumstance is related of Curtius, of the most polite and powerful nations, genius of every kind has displayed itself about the same period; and the age of science has generally beeft the age of military virtue and success.

Conquest of Armenia by the Artaxerxes and his son Sapor, had tried to destroy the Persians, the house of Arsaces. Of the many princes of that ancient race, Chosroes, king of Armenia, had alone preserved both his life and his independence. Invincible in arms during a thirty years war, he was at length assassinated by the emissaries of Sapor king of Persia. Young Tigranes, the future hope of his country, was saved by the fidelity of a servant, and Armenia continued above twenty-seven years a reluctant province of the great monarchy of Persia. IV. The new sovereigns of Persia, menia by the Artaxerxes and his son Sapor, had tried to destroy the Persians, the house of Arsaces. Of the many princes of that ancient race, Chosroes, king of Armenia, had alone preserved both his life and his independence. He defended himself by the natural strength of his country; by the perpetual resort of fugitives and malecontents; by the alliance of the Scythians, who were, above all, by his own courage. Invincible in arms during a thirty years war, he was at length assassinated by the emissaries of Sapor king of Persia. The patriotic satraps of Armenia, who asserted the freedom and dignity of the crown, implored the protection of Rome in favour of Perdikes the lieutenant; the motions of Persia were always followed with a suspicion. The time arrived, the son of Chosroes was an infant, the allies were at a distance, and the Persian monarch advanced towards the frontier at the head of an irresistible force. Young Tigranes, the future hope of his country, was saved by the fidelity of a servant, and Armenia continued above twenty-seven years a reluctant province of the great monarchy of Persia. Elated with this easy conquest, and presuming on the distresses or the degeneracy of the Romans, Sapor obliged the strong garrison of Carhre and Nisibis to surrender, and spread devastation and terror on either side of the Euphrates.

Valerian was now an important frontier, the ruin of a faithful and natural ally, and the rapid success of Sapor's ambition, affected Rome with a deep sense of the insult as well as of the danger. Valerian flattered himself, that the vigilance of his lieutenants would sufficiently provide for the safety of the Rhine and of the Danube; but he resolved, notwithstanding his advanced age, to march in person to the defence of the Euphrates. During his progress through Asia Minor, the naval enterprises of the Goths were suspended, and the afflicted province enjoyed a transient and delusive calm. He passed the Euphrates, encountered the Persian monarch near the walls of Edessa, was vanquished, and taken prisoner by Sapor. The particulars of this great and deplorable event are darkly and imperfectly repre able merchandises. The rich offering was accompanied with an epistle, respectful but not servile, from Odonatus, one of the noblest and most opulent senators of Palmyra.  "Who is this Odonatus?" (said the haughty victor, and he commanded that the presents should be placed in the Euphrates, that they might be alone to his lord! If he entertain a hope of mitigating his punishment, let him fall prostrate before the foot of our throne with his hands bound behind his back. Should he hesitate, swift destruction shall be poured on his head, on his whole race, and on his country, 22 The despairing appeal to which the Palmyrenian was reduced, called into action all the latent powers of his soul. He met Sapor; but he met him in arms. Infusing his own spirit into a little army collected from the villages of Syria, 23 and the tents of the desert, 24 he hovered round the Persian host, harassed their retreat, carved off part of the treasure, and what was dearer than any treasure, several of the women of the great king; who was at last obliged to repass the Euphrates with some marks of haste and confusion. 24 By this exploit, Odonatus laid the foundations of his future fame and fortunes. The monarch impressed by this Sapor, was protected by a Syrian or Arab of Palmyra.

Treatise of Valerian.

The voice of history, which is often little more than the organ of hatred or flattery, reproaches Sapor with a proud abuse of the rights of conquest. We are told that Valerian, in choice between let the imperial purple, was exposed to the multitude, a constant spectacle of fallen greatness; and that whenever the Persian monarch mounted on horseback, he placed his foot on the neck of a Roman emperor. Notwithstanding all the reconstructions of his allies, who repeatedly advised him to remember of his origin, and to dread the returning power of Rome, and to make his illustrious captive the pledge of peace, not the object of insult, Sapor still remained inflexible. When Valerian sunk under the weight of shame and grief, his skin, stuffed with straw, and formed into the likeness of a human figure, was preserved for ages in the most celebrated temple of Persia: a more real monument of triumph, than the fancied trophies of brass and marble so often erected by Roman vanity. 25 The tale is moral and pathetic, but the truth of it may very fairly be called in question. The letters still extant from the princes of Persia, on the subject of Sapor, are mutilated and inept. I "I knew that my father was a mortal," said he; "and since he has acted as becomes a brave man, I am satisfied." While Rome lamented the fate of her sovereign, the savage coldness of his son was met by the service courtiers, as the perfect firmness of a hero and a stoic. 6 It is difficult to paint the light, the various, the inconstant character of Gallienus, which he displayed without constraint, as soon as he became sole possessor of the empire. In every art that he attempted, his lively execution without judgment, and his carelessness, destitute of judgment, he attempted every art, except the important ones of war and government. He was a master of several curious but useless sciences, a ready orator, and elegant poet, a skilful gardener, an excellent cook, and most contemptible prince. When the great eastern emperors, to their own extreme satisfaction and attention, he was engaged in conversation with the philosopher Plotinus, 7 wasting his time in trifling or licentious pleasures, preparing his initiation to the Grecian mysteries, or soliciting a place in the Areopagus of Athens. His profuse magnificence insulted the general public with the solemn ridicule of his triumphs impressed a deeper sense of the public disgrace. 8 The repeated intelligence of invasions, defeats, and rebellions, he received with a careless smile; and singling out, with affected contempt, some particular production of the lost province, he carelessly asked, Whether Rome was not delivered, unless there was a letter from Egypt and Arras cloth from Gaul! There were, however, a few short moments in the life of Gallienus, when, exasperated by some recent injury, he suddenly appeared the intrinsid soldier, and the cruel tyrant; till, sated with blood, or fatigued by resistance, he insensibly sunk into the natural mildness and indolence of his character.

At a time when the reins of government were held with so loose a hand, tyrants, it is not surprising, that a crowd of usurpers should start up in every province of the empire against the government of Gallienus. The son of one emperor, who had been thirty years engaged in the art of war, was to be the object of contempt and ridicule, at the hands of the Anarchic pretenders. The claim to the imperial title. The reign of Gallienus, distracted as it was, produced only nine - their real number: none true pretenders to the throne: Cyriades, whose son was no more than nineteen years of age; Macrianus, Balista, Odonatus, and Zenobia, in the East; in Gaul, the western provinciers; Postumius, Lollianus, Victorinus and his mother Victoria, Marius, and Tetricus. But as the use of irony may be considered unseemly of the gravity of the Roman mint, M. de Villeneuve has deduced from a passage of Theophanes Poilo (Hist. We may content ourselves with investigating some general characters, the affects, the events of their reigns, and the manners of the men, their pretensions, their motives, their fate, and the destructive consequences of their usurpation.*

Character and*. It is sufficiently known, that the merit of the odious appellation of Tyrant was often justly accorded to those who, by the illegal seizure of supreme power, without any reference to the abuse of it. Several of the pretenders who raised the standard of rebellion against the emperor Gallicanus, were shining models of virtue, and almost all possessed a considerable share of vigour and ability. Their merit had recommended them to the favour of Valerian, and gradually promoted them to the most important commands of the empire. The generals, who assumed the title of Augustus, were either respected by their troops for their able conduct and severe discipline, or admired for valour and success in war, or beloved for frankness and generosity. Their conduct was generally a standard of their elevation; and even the armourer Marius, the most contemptible of all the candidates for the purple, was distinguished, however, by intrepid courage, matchless strength, and blunt honesty.* His mean and recent trade cast an air of ridicule on his elevation:

* The place of his reign is somewhat doubtful; but there was a tyrant in Pontus, and we are acquainted with the seat of all the others.

| The causes of their rebellion. Fueful to the father, whom they esteemed. They disdained to serve the luxurious indulgence of their unworthy son. The throne of the Roman world was unsupported by any principle of loyalty; | The apprehensions of Saturninus were their violent justified by the repeated experience of deaths. Of the nineteen tyrants that started up under the reign of Gallicanus, there was not one who enjoyed a life of peace, or a natural death. As soon as they were invested with the bloody purple, they inspired their adherents with the same fears and ambition which had occasioned their own. Endemical discord and civil war, they trembled on the edge of precipices, in which, after a longer or shorter term of anxiety, they were inevitably lost. These precarious monarchs received, however, such honours, as the flattery of their respective armies and provinces could bestow; but their claim, founded on rebellion, could never claim the sanction of law or history. Italy, Rome, and the senate, constantly adhered to the cause of Gallicanus, and he alone was considered as the sovereign of the empire. That prince condescended, indeed, to acknowledge the victorious arms of Odenathus, who deserved the honourable distinction by the respectful conduct which he always maintained towards the son of Valer-

- The male sex of every age must be extricated; pro- provided, that in the execution of the children and old men, you can contrive means to save our reputation. Let every one die who has dropped an expression, who has entertained a thought against me, against us, the son of Valerian, the father and brother of so many princes. ¹ Remember that Ingenius was made emperor; an old sword, kill, hew in pieces. I write to you with my own hand, and would inspire you with my own feelings.² Whilst the public forces of the state were dissipated in private quarrels, the defenceless provinces lay exposed to every invader. The bravest usurpers were compelled, by the extremity of the situation, to conclude ignominious treaties with the common enemy, to purchase with oppressive tributes the neutrality or services of the barbarians, and to introduce hostile and independent nations into the heart of the Roman monarchy.³ The usurpers, and such the tyrants who, under the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus, dismembered the provinces, and reduced the empire to the lowest pitch of disgrace and ruin, from whence it seemed impossible that it should ever emerge. As far as the baseness of materials would permit, we have attempted to trace, with order and perspicuity, the general events of that calamitous period. There still remain some particular facts: I. The disorders of Sicily; II. The tumults of Alexandria; and, III. The rebellion of the Issurians, which may serve to redress the balance on the horizon of history.

Disorders of Sicily.

I. Whenever numerous troops of barbarians, multiplied by success and impunity, publicly defy, instead of subduing, the justice of their country, we may safely infer, that the excessive weakness of the government is felt and abused by the lowest ranks of the community. The situation of Sicily preserved it from the barbarians; nor could the disarmed province have supported an usurper. The sufferings of that once flourishing and still fertile island, were inflicted by barren hands. A licentious crowd of slaves and robbers reigned for a while over the plundered country, and revealed to the memory of the servile wars of more ancient times.⁴ Devastations, of which the husbandman was either the victim or the accomplice, must have ruined the agriculture of Sicily; and as the principal estates were the property of the opulent senators of Rome, who often enclosed within a farm the territory of an old republic, it is not improbable, that this private injury might affect the capital more deeply than all the conquests of the Goths or the Persians.

Tumults of Alexandria.

II. The foundation of Alexandria was a noble design, at once conceived and executed by the son of Philip. The beautiful and regular form of that great city, second only to Rome itself, comprehended a circumference of fifteen miles; ¹ it was peopled by three hundred thousand free citizens, besides at least three million of slaves. ² The lucrative trade of Arabia and India flowed through the port of Alexandria to the capital and provinces of the empire. Idleness was unknown. Some were employed in blowing of glass, others in weaving of linen, others again manufacturing the pa-pyrus. Either sex, and every age, was engaged in the pursuits of industry, nor did even the blind or the lame want occupations suited to their condition. ³ But the people of Alexandria, a various mixture of nations, united the vanity and inconstancy of the Greeks with the superstition and obstinacy of the Egyptians. The most trifling occasion, a transient scarcity of flesh or lentiles, the neglect of an accustomed salutation, a mistake of precedence in the public baths, or even a religious dispute,⁴ were at any time sufficient to kindle a sedition among that vast multitude, whose resentment was furious and implacable. ⁵ After the captivity of Valerian and the insolence of his son had extirpated every scruple ofconstraint or compulsion, they abandoned themselves to the ungoverned rage of their passions, and their unhappy country was the theatre of a civil war, which continued (with a few short and suspicious truces) above twelve years.⁶ All intercourse was cut off between the several quarters of the empire; the highway was not trodden by a foot, every building of strength converted into a citadel; nor did the tumults subside, till a considerable part of Alexandria was irretrievably ruined.° The spacious and magnificent district of Bruchion, with its palaces and museum, the residence of the kings and philosophers of Egypt, is described above a century afterwards, as already reduced to its present state of dreary solitude.⁷

III. The obscure rebellion of Trebel-Rebellion of the Issurians, who assumed the purple in Issuria, a province of Asia, ⁸ taking occasion of the strange and memorable consequences. The pagant of royalty was soon destroyed by an officer of Gallienus; but his followers, despairing of mercy, resolved to shake off their allegiance, not only to the emperor, but to the empire, and suddenly returned to the savage manners, from which they had never perfectly been reclaimed. Their craggy rocks, a branch of the wide extended Taurus, protected their inaccessible retreat. The tillage of some fertile valleys ⁹ supplied them with necessaries, and a habit of rapine with the luxuries of life. In the heart of the Roman monarchy, the Issurians established another nation and another government. Succeeding princes, unable to reduce them to obedience, either by arms or policy, were compelled to acknowledge their weakness, by surrounding the hostile and independent spot with a strong chain of fortifications, which often proved insufficient to restrain the incursions of these domestic foes. The Issurians, gradually extending their territory to the sea-coast, subdued the western and mountainous parts of Cilicia, formerly the nest of those daring pirates, against whom the republic had once been obliged to exert its utmost force, under the conduct of the great Pompey.¹⁰

Our habits of thinking so fondly on the importance of the universe with the fate of man, that this gloomy period of history has been in large measure decorated with the exploits of such infamous characters, earthquakes, uncommon meteors, preternatural darkness, and a crowd of prodigies, fictitious or exaggerated.¹¹ But a long and general famine was a calamity of a more serious kind. It was the inevitable consequence of rapine and oppression, which extirpated the produce of the present, and the hope of future harvests. Famine is almost always followed by epidemic diseases, the effect of scanty and unwholesome food. Other causes must, however, have contributed to the furious plague, which, from the year two hundred and fifty to the year two hundred and sixty-five, raged without interruption in

Disintegration of the human species. We have the knowledge of a very curious circumstance, of some use perhaps in the melancholy calculation of human calamities. An exact register was kept at Alexandria, and it is said, even all the citizens entitled to receive the distribution of corn. It was found, that the ancient number of those comprised between the ages of forty and seventy, had been equal to the whole sum of claimants, from four-teen to fourscore years of age, who remained alive after the reign of Gallienus. Applying this authentic fact to the most correct table of mortality, it is evident, that above half the people of Alexandria had perished; and could we venture to extend the analogy to the other provinces, we might suspect, that war, pestilence, and famine, had consumed, in a few years, the moiety of the human species. b

CHAPTER XI.

Under the deplorable reign of Valerian and Gallienus, the empire was oppressed and almost destroyed by the soldiers, the tyrants, and the barbarians. It was saved by a series of great princes, who deprived their obscure origin from the martial provinces of Illyricum. Within a period of about thirty years, Claudius, Aurelianus, Victor Tacitus, Diocletian, and his colleagues, triumphed over the foreign and domestic enemies of the state, re-established, with the military discipline, the strength of the frontiers, and deserved the glorious title of restorers of the Roman world.

The removal of an effeminate tyrant into the provinces, made way for a succession of heroes, and blessed us. At the indig- nation of the people imputed all their calamities to Gallienus, and the far greater part were, indeed, the consequences of his dissolute manners and careless administration. He was even destitute of a sense of honour, which so frequently supplies a want of public virtue; and as long as he was permitted to enjoy the possession of Italy, a victory of the barbarians, the loss of a province, or the rebellion of a general, seldom disturbed the tranquil course of his pleasures. At length, a fresh conspiracy, and an army, 243. In the Upper Danube, invested with the imperial purple their leader Aureolus; who disregarding a confined and barren reign over the mountains of Rhaetia, passed the Alps, occupied Milan, threatened Rome, and challenged Gallienus to dispute in the field the sovereignty of Italy. The emperor, overcome by the insult, and alarmed by the instant danger, suddenly exerted that latent vigour, which sometimes broke through the indulgence of his temper. Forcing himself to the luxury of the palace, he appeared in arms at the head of his legions, and advanced beyond the Po to Cromnus. Aureolus, his hopes disappointed, renounced his name of Pontirolo a preserves the memory of a bridge over the Adda, which, during the action, must have proved an object of the utmost importance to both armies. The Ilherian usurper, after receiving a fatal blow, and having a large fleet of barbarians retracted into Milan. The siege of that great city was immediately formed; the walls were battered with every engine in use among the ancients; and Aureolus, doubtful of his internal strength, and hopeless of foreign succours, already anticipated the fatal consequences of his unsuccessful resistance.

His last resource was an attempt to seduce the loyalty of the besiegers. He scattered libels through their camp, inviting the troops to desert an unworthy master, who sacrificed the public happiness to his luxury, and the lives of his most valuable subjects to the slightest suspicions. The arts of Aureolus, skillful in the art of sedition, procured him the enmity of his rival. A conspiracy was formed by Heraclianus, the praetorian prefect, by Marcian, a general of rank and reputation, and by Cecrops, who commanded a numerous body of Dalmatian guards. The death of Gallienus was resolved; and notwithstanding their desire of first terminating the siege of Milan, the extreme danger which accompanied every moment's delay obliged them to hasten the execution of their daring purpose. At a late hour of the night, but while the emperor still protracted the pleasures of the table, an alarm was suddenly given, that Aureolus, at the head of all his forces, had made a deep inroad into the suburbs of Milan; Gallienus, who was never deficient in personal bravery, started from his silken couch, and without allowing himself time either to put on his armour, or to assemble his guards, he mounted on horseback, and rode full speed towards the supposed place of the attack. Encompassed by his declared or concealed enemies, he soon, amidst the nocturnal tumult, received a mortal dart from an uncertain hand. Before he expired, a patriotic sentiment rising in the mind of Gallienus, induced him to name a deserving successor, and it was his last request, that the imperial ornaments should be delivered to Claudius, who then commanded a detached army in the neighbourhood of Pavia. The report at least was diligently propagated, and the order cheerfully obeyed by the conspirators, who had already agreed to place Claudius on the throne. On the first news of the emperor's death, the troops expressed some surprise and regret, as the camp was removed, and the other assuaged, by a donation of twenty pieces of gold to each soldier. They then ratified the election, and acknowledged the merit of their new sovereign.

The obscurity which covered the origin of Claudius, though it was after-relativised by some flattering emperors, sufficiently betrays the mean-ness of his birth. We can only discover that he was a native of one of the provinces bordering on the Danube; that his youth was spent in arms, and that his modest valour attracted the favour and confidence of Decius. The senate and people already considered him as an excellent officer, equal to the most important trusts, and censured the inattention of Valerian, who suffered him to remain in the subordinate station of a tribune. But it was not long before that emperor distinguished the merit of Claudius, by declaring him general and chief of the Illrian frontier, with the command of all the troops in Thrace, Mesia, Dacia, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, the appointments of the prefect of Egypt, the establishment of the proconsul of Africa, and the sure prospect of the consulsiphip. By his victory over the Goths, he deserved from the senate the honour of a statute, and excited the jealous apprehensions of Gallienus. It was impossible that a soldier could esteem so dissolve a sovereign, nor is it easy to conceal a just contempt. Some unguarded expressions which drop from Claudioi, were officially transmitted to us the mind of our friend and servitor, Claudius. As you regard his allegiance, use every means to appease his resentment, but conduct your negotiation with secrecy; let it not reach the knowledge of the Daenian troops; they are already provoked, and it might inflame their fury. I myself have sent him some presents: be it your care that he accept them with pleasure. Above all, let him not suspect that I am made acquainted with his impiety. The fear of my anger might urge him to desperate counsels.1

The presents which accompanied this humble epistle, in which the monarch solicited a reconciliation with his distracted subject, consisted of a considerable sum of money, a splendid wardrobe, and a valuable service of silver and gold plate. By such arts Gallienus softened the indignation, and dispelled the fears of his Illyrian general; and during the remainder of that reign, the formidable sword of Claudioi was always drawn in the shade. It was necessary that people, and indolent from despair, could no longer supply a numerous army with the means of luxury, or even of subsistence; that the danger of each individual had increased with the despotism of the military order, since princes by their threats must still guard with the intolerable sacrifice of every gallantly subject. The emperor expatiated on the mischiefs of a lawless caprice which the soldiers could only gratify at the expense of their own blood; as their seditious elections had so frequently been followed by civil wars, which extinguished the flower of the Legion. On the field of battle, or in the cruel abuse of victory. He pointed in the most lively colours the exhausted state of the treasury, the desolation of the provinces, the disgrace of the Roman name, and the insolent triumph of rapacious barbarians. It was against those barbarians, he declared, that he intended to direct the first effort of his arms. Tetricus might reign for a while over the west, and even Zenobia might preserve the dominions of the east.2 These usurpers were his personal adversaries; nor could he think of indulging any private resentment till he had saved an empire, whose imperious property he had been so lately, and so timely prevented, crush both the army and the people.

thousand, and the flower of the Legion. On the banks of the Niassa, one of the great rivers that discharge themselves into that sea, they constructed a fleet of two thousand, or even of six thousand vessels; numbers which, however incredible they may seem, would have been insufficient to transport their pretended army of three hundred and twenty thousand barbarians. Whatever might be the real strength of the Goths, the vigour and success of the expedition were not adequate to the greatness of the preparations. In their passage through the Bos-phorus, the unskilful pilots were overpowered by the violence of the current; and while the multitude of their ships were crowded in a narrow channel, many were dashed against each other, or against the shore.
The barbarians made several descents on the coasts both of Europe and Asia; but the open country was already plundered, and they were repulsed with shame and confusion, and compelled to retreat from the fortified cities which they assaulted. A spirit of discouragement and division arose in the flee, and some of their chiefs sailed away towards the islands of Crete and Cyprus; but the main body, pursuing a more steady course, anchored at length near the foot of Mount Athos, and assailing the town by land from the top of all the Macedonian provinces. Their attacks, in which they displayed a fierce but artless bravery, were soon interrupted by the rapid approach of Claudius, hastening to a scene of action that deserved the presence of a warlike prince at the head of the remaining powers of the empire. The garrison, overwhelmed by numbers and broken up by their camp, relinquished the siege of Thessalonica, left their navy at the foot of Mount Athos, traversed the hills of Macedonia, and pressed forwards to engage the last defence of Italy.

We still possess an original letter from Zonaras to Claudius the senate and people on this memorable occasion.

"Conscript fathers," says the emperor, "know that three hundred and twenty thousand Goths have invaded the Roman territory. If I vanquish them, your gratitude will reward my services. Should I fall, recompense for the sword, but the whole republic is fatigued and exhausted. We shall fight after Varianus, after Ingenius, Regillianus, Lollianus, Posthumus, Celsius, and a thousand others, whom a just contempt for Gallienus provoked into rebellion. We are in want of darts, of spears, and of some pickets. These have been taken away from the emperor, and the vessels that were usurped by Tetricus, and we blush to acknowledge that the archers of the east serve under the banners of Zenobia. Whatever we shall perform, will be sufficiently great." The melancholy firmness of this epistle announces a hero careless of his fate, conscious of his danger, but still deriving a well-grounded hope from the conduct of the times.

His victory over the Goths.

The event surpassed his own expectations and those of the world. By the most signal victories he delivered the empire from this host of barbarians, and was distinguished by posterity under the glorious appellation of the Gothic Claudius. The immediate conquerors of an irregular war do not enable us to describe the order and circumstances of his exploits; but, if we could be indulged in the allusion, we might distribute into three acts this memorable tragedy. I. The decisive battle was fought near Naissus, a city of Dardania. The legions at first gave way, opressed by the superiority of the enemy; but the gods, or the victorious Trajan, who had been moved to assist in the preservation of the place, turned the tide of battle. The victory was immediately proclamed by the activity of Claudius. He revived the courage of his troops, restored their ranks, and pressed the barbarians on every side. Fifty thousand men are reported to have been slain in the battle of Naissus. Several large bodies of barbarians, covering their retreat with a snow of corpse, were pursued and defeated, or gathered from the field of slaughter. II. We may presume that some insurmountable difficulty, the fatigue, perhaps, or the disobedience, of the conquerors, prevented Claudius from completing in one day the destruction of the Goths. The war was diffused over the provinces of Macedonia, Thrace, and Macedonia, and its operations drawn out into a variety of marches, surprises, and tumultuary engagements; as well by sea as by land. When the Romans suffered any loss, it was commonly occasioned by the foray, arrogance or rashness; but the superior talents of the emperor, his perfect knowledge of the country, and his judicious choice of measures as well as officers, assured on most occasions the success of his arms. The immense booty, the fruit of so many victories, was distributed among the rank and file of the service and slaves. A select body of the Gothic youth was received among the imperial troops; the remainder was sold into servitude; and so considerable was the number of female captives, that every soldier obtained to his share two or three women. A circumstance from which we may conclude, that the invaders of the empire were disposed to settle as well as plunder; since even in a naval expedition they were accompanied by their families. III. The loss of their fleet, which was either taken or sunk, had intercepted the retreat of the Goths. A vast circle of Roman posts, distributed with skill, supported with firmness, and gradually narrowing, forced the barbarians into the inmost inaccessible parts of mount Hsmus, where they found a safe refuge, but a very scanty subsistence. During the course of a rigorous winter, in which they were besieged by the emperor's troops, famine and pestilence, desertion and fatigue, seized them, and the retreat or the imprisoned multitude. On the return of spring, A.D. 270, nothing appeared in arms except a hardy and desperate hand, the remnant of that mighty host which had embarked at the mouth of the Niester.

The pestilence which swept away March, Death, and the battalions of Gotudus, who recommended Aurelianus to the Roman people for his successor. After a short but glorious reign of two years, Claudius expired at Sirmium, amidst the tears and acclamations of his subjects. In his last illness, he convened the principal officers of the state and army, and in their presence recommended Aurelianus, one of his generals, as the most deserving of the throne, and the best qualified to execute the great design which he himself had been permitted only to undertake. The virtues of Claudius, his valour, affection, justice, and temperance, his love of fame and of his country, place him in that short list of emperors who added lustre to the Roman name. These virtues, however, were celebrated with peculiar zeal and complacency by the courtly writers of the age of Constantine, who was the great grandson of Crispus, the elder brother of Claudius. The voice of flattery was soon taught to repeat, that the gods, who so hastily had selected Claudius, had again, in the person of Aurelian, rewarded his merit and piety by the perpetual establishment of the empire in his family.

Notwithstanding these oracles, the The attempt and greatness of the Flavian family (a name fall of Quintilius which it had pleased them to assume) was deferred above twenty years; and the elevation of Claudius occasioned the immediate ruin of his brother Quintilius, who possessed not sufficient moderation or courage to descend into the private station to which the patriotism of the late emperor had condemned him. Without delay or reflection, he assumed the purple at Aquileia, where he informed the Senate of his elevation, and though his reign lasted only seventeen days, he had time to obtain the sanction of the senate, and to experience a mutiny of the troops. As soon as he was informed that the great army of the Danube had invested the well-known valour of Aurelian with imperial power, he sunk under the fame and merit of his rival; and ordering his veil to be opened, prudently withdrew himself from the unequal contest.*

the invasions of the savages of the north. A sense of interest attacked the more settled barbarians to the alliance of Rome, and a permanent interest very frequently ripens into sincere and useful friendship. This various colony, which filled the ancient province, and was insensibly blended into one great people, still aunt in the Latin speech and authority of the Gothic tribe, and claimed the fragments of the warlike Scandinavian origin. At the same time the lucky though accidental resemblance of the name of Geta, infused among the cedulous Goths a vain persuasion, that, in a remote age, their own ancestors, already seated in the Lombard dominions, had received the instructions of Zanomix, and checked the victorious arms of Sesostris and Darius.¹

The Alemanni While the vigorous and moderate conqueror of Aurelian restored the Illyrian frontier, the nation of the Alemanni ² violated the condition of peace, which either Galleus had purchased, or Claudius had imposed, and, inflamed by their impatient youth, suddenly flew to arms. Forty thousand horse appeared in the field,³ and the numbers of the infantry doubled those of the cavalry.⁴ The first objects of their aversion were a few cities of the Rhodian frontier; but their hopes soon rising with success, the rapid advances of the Alemanni placed the line of devastation from the Danube to the Po.⁵

A.D. 270. The emperor was almost at the same time informed of the irruption, and of the retreat of the barbarians. Collecting an active body of troops, he marched with silence and celerity along the coast of the Germanic forest; and the Alemanni, laden with the spoils of Italy, arrived at the Danube, without suspecting, that on the opposite bank, and in an advantageous post, a Roman army lay concealed and prepared to intercept their return. Aurelian indulged the first security of the barbarians, and permitted about half their forces to pass the retired honour of the Danube, without further precaution. Their situation and astonishment gave him an easy victory; his skilful conduct improved the advantage. Placing the legions in a semicircular form, he advanced the two horns of the crescent across the Danube, and wheeled them on a sudden towards the centre, inclosed the rear of the German host. The dismayed barbarians, on whatsoever side they cast their eyes, beheld with des- pairs a wasted country, a deep and rapid stream, a victor- ious and implacable enemy.

But with this distressed condition, the Alemanni no longer distrusted the power of peace. Aurelian received their ambassadors at the head of his camp, and with every circumstance of martial pomp that could display the greatness and discipline of Rome. The legions stood to their arms in well ordered ranks and awful silence. The principal commanders, distinguished by the ensigns of their rank, appeared on horseback on either side of the imperial throne. Behind the throne, the consecrated images of the emperor, and his predecessors, the golden eagles, and the various titles of the legions, engraved in letters of gold, were seen in the air on lofty pikes covered with silver. When Aurelian assumed his seat, his majesty grace and majestic figure ² taught the barbarians to revere the person as well as the purple of their conqueror. The ambassadors fell prostrate on the ground in silence. They were commanded to rise, and permitted to speak. By the assistance of interpreters, they extenuated their perfidy, magnified their exploits, explicated on the vicissitudes of war, and the advantages of peace. With an ill-timed confidence, they demanded a large subsidy, as the price of the alliance which they offered to the Romans. The answer of the emperor was stern and imperious. He treated their offer with contempt, and their demand with indignation, reproached the barbarians that they were igno- rants of the art of the war as of the laws of peace, and finally dismissed them with the choice only of submitting to his unconditioned mercy, or awaiting the utmost severity of his resentment.⁶ Aurelian had resigned a distant province to the Goths; but it was dangerous to trust or to pardon these perilous barbarians, whose formidable power kept Italy itself in perpetual alarms. Immediately after this conference, it is said that some unspecified intervention of the emperor's presence in Pannonia, drove the Alemanni to the measure of finishing the destruction of both the Alemanni, or her by her sword, or the success of famine. But an active des- pair had often triumphed over the indolent assurance of success. The barbarians, finding it impossible to traverse the Danube and the Roman camp, broke through the posts in their rear, which were more fuels than breastworks, less carefully guarded; and with incredible diligence, by a different road, returned towards the mountains of Italy.⁷ Aurelian, who considered the war as totally extinguished, received the mortifying intelligence of the escape of the Alemanni, and of the revenge which they already committed in the territory of Milan. They were ordered to follow, with as much expedition as those heavy bodies were capable of exerting, the rapid flight of an enemy, whose infantry and cavalry moved almost with equal swiftness. A few days afterwards the emperor himself marched to the relief of Italy, at the head of a chosen body of auxiliaries, (among whom were the hostages and cavalry of the Vandals,) and of all the praetorian guards who had served in the wars on the Danube.⁸

As the light troops of the Alemanni had spread themselves from the Alps to the Apennines, the Alemanni, whose insignificance of arms, and servile condition, the vigor and abilities of Aurelian and his officers was exercised in the discovery, the attack, and the pursuit of the numerous detachments. Notwithstanding this desultory war, three considerable battles are mentioned, in which the principal force of both armies was obstinately engaged.⁹ The success was various. In the first, fought near Placentia, the Romans received so severe a blow, that, according to the expression of a writer extremely partial to Aurelian, the immediate dissolution of the empire was apprehended.⁰ The crafty barbarians, who had lined up their foals, suddenly attacked the legions in the sight of the emperor, and, it is most probable, after the fatigue and disorder of a long march. The fury of their charge was irresistible; but at length, after a dreadful slaughter, the patient firmness of the emperor rallied his troops, and retouched, in some degree, the honour of his arms. The second battle was fought near Pannon in Umbria; on the spot which, five hundred years before, had been fatal to the brother of Hannibal.¹¹ Thus far the successful

The Roman army had advanced along the Æmilian and Flaminian way, with a design of sacking the defenceless mistress of the world. But Aurelian, who, watchful for the safety of Rome, still hung on their rear, found in this place the decisive moment of giving them a total and irretrievable defeat. The flight of the van, on which their host was exterminated in a third and last battle near Pavia; and Italy was delivered from the inroads of the Alemanni.

Fear has been the original parent of superstition, and has been the cause of every calamity which has befallen trembling mortals to deprecate the wrath of their invisible enemies. Though the best hope of the republic was in the valour and conduct of Aurelian, yet such was the public consternation, when the barbarians were hourly expected at the gates of Rome, that by a decree of the Senate, and without the consultation of the people, Friday, which was considered as having been the day of the battle of Pavia, was prohibited. In the meantime the Shylline books were consulted. Even the emperor himself, from a motive either of religion or of policy, recommended this Sabine festival, chided the tardiness of the senate, and offered to supply whatever expense, whatever animals, whatever captives of any nation, the gods should require. Notwithstanding this liberal offer, it does not appear that any human victims expiated with their blood the sins of the Roman people. The Shylline books enjoined ceremonies of a more harmless nature, processions of priests in white robes attended by a chorus of youths and virgins;hurst, and processions of Jupiter and Juno, and adjacent deities; and sacrifices whose powerful influence disabled the barbarians from passing the mystic ground on which they had been celebrated. However puerile in themselves, these superstitious arts were subversive to the success of the war, and if in the beginning of the first battle of Pavia, the Alemanni fancied they saw an army of speers combattant on the side of Aurelian, he received a real and effectual aid from this imaginary reinforcement.

Fortifications of. But whatever confidence might be placed in ideal ramparts, the experience of the past, and the events of the future, indicated to the Romans the necessity of constructing fortifications of a more solid and more substantial kind. The seven hills of Rome had been surrounded, by the successors of Romulus, with an ancient wall of more than thirteen miles. The vast enclosure may seem disproportionate to the strength and the size of the infant state. But it was necessary, in order to secure an ample extent of pasture and arable land, against the frequent and sudden incursions of the tribes of Latium, the perpetual enemies of the republic. With the progress of Roman greatness, the city and its inhabitants gradually increased, filled up the vast spaces through which the useful field of Mars, and, on every side, followed the public highways in long and beautiful suburbs. The extent of the new walls, erected by Aurelian, and finished in the reign of Probus, was magnified by popular estimation to about fifty miles, but is reduced by accurate measurement to about twenty-one miles. It was a great but melancholy labour, since the defence of the capital betrayed the decline of the monarchy. The Romans of a more prosperous age, who trusted to the arms of the legions the safety of the frontier camps, were very far from entertaining a suspicion, that it would ever become necessary to fortify the seat of empire against the inroads of the barbarians.

The victory of Claudius over the Goths, and the success of Aurelian against the Alamanni, had already restored to the two armies of Rome their ancient superiority over the barbarous nations of the north. To chastise domestic tyrants, and pacify the provinces of the empire, was a task reserved for the second of those warlike emperors. Though he was acknowledged by the senate and people, the frontiers of Italy, Africa, Illyricum, and Thrace, confined the limits of his reign. Gaul, Spain, and Britain, Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, were still preserved by two of the most formidable powers of so numerous a list, had hitherto escaped the dangers of their situation; and to complete the ignominy of Rome, these rival thrones had been usurped by women.

A rapid succession of monarchs had

He was succeeded by a succession of jealous husbands, whose revenge would have appeared more justifiable, had they spared the innocence of his son. After the murder of so many valiant princes, it is somewhat remarkable, that a female for a long time controlled the fierce legions of Gaul, and still more remarkable, that the son of a woman was fair and impertinent. The arts and treasures of Victoria enabled her successively to place Marcus and Tetrius on the throne, and to reign with a manly vigour under the name of those dependent emperors. Money of copper, of silver, and of gold, was coined in her name; and among the spoils of the imperial cities in the province of the Camps; her power ended only with her life; but her life was perhaps shortened by the ingratitude of Tetricus.

station, raised himself to the dominion of the East! She soon became the friend and companion of a hero. In the intervals of war, Odenathus passionately devoted himself to her. He would feed the wild beasts of the desert, lions, panthers, and bears; and the ardour of Zenobia in that dangerous amusement was not inferior to his own. She had incurred her constitution to fatigue, disinclined the use of a covered carriage, generally appeared on horseback in a military habit, and sometimes marched several miles on foot at the head of the troops. The success of Odenathus was in a great measure ascribed to her incomparable prudence and fortitude. Their splendid victory over the great king, whom they twice pursued as far as the gates of Ctesiphon, laid open to them united fame and glory.

After a successful expedition against Armenia, the Palmyrenian prince returned to the city of Emesa in Syria. Invincible in war, he was there cut off by domestic infirmities. His favourite minister, Magonius, says, there was not any mention of the rewards of Autunus. Such indeed, is the policy of civil war: severely to remember injuries, and to forget the most important services. Revenge is profitable, gratitude is expensive.

A.D. 272.

The Cæsars of Zenobia, person and provinces of Trezicus, when he turned his arms against Zenobia, the celebrated queen of Palmyra and the east. Modern Europe had produced several illustrious women who have sustained with glory the weight of empire; nor is our own age destitute of such distinguished characters. But none, except the doubtful achievements of Semiramis, and the fabulous tales of female valour. Zenobia was esteemed the most lovely woman of Asia, by the conqueror from the Macedonian kings of Egypt, inquired into her beauty her chief beauty, and valued. Zenobia was esteemed the most lovely her beauty and as well as the most heroic of her sex. Her was of a dark complexion (for, in speaking of a lady, these terms become important!) The grace of her person and figure, the largeness of her gestures, the amiable countenance and smile, and the most attractive sweetness. Her voice was strong and harmonious. Her manners was strengthened and adorned by study. Her was not ignorant of the Latin tongue, but possessed in equal perfection the Greek, the Syrian, and the Egyptian languages. She had drawn up for her own use an epitome of oriental history, and familiarly compared the beauties of Homer and Plato under the tuition of the sublime Longinus.

This accomplished woman gave her hand to Odenathus, who, from a private

If Zenobia were, as the former conjecture, to be considered as one of the Roman generals, she was sent against Odenathus, the senator and general, who had been the object of the Roman generals, who had been sent against her, to retreat into Europe, with the loss of his army and his reputation. Instead of the little passions which so frequently perplex a female reign, the steady administration of Zenobia was guided by the most judicious maxim of policy. If it was expedient to pardon, she could claim her resentment: if it was necessary to punish, she could impose silence on the voice of pity. Her strict economy was accursed of avarice; yet on every proper occasion she appeared magnificent and liberal. The neighbourhood of Arabia, Armenia, and Persia, breaded her vanity, and solicited her alliance. With the dominions of Odenathus, which extended from the Euphrates to the frontiers of Bithynia, his widow ad

5 According to Zosimus, Odenathus was of an illustrious family in Palmyra, and according to Procopius, he was the son of a money-lender, who lived upon the banks of the Euphrates. (Eck. Doct. Natum. Vet. vol. vi. p. 469. 470.)

The text of Syncellus, if not corrupt, is absolutely erroneous. Odenathus and Zenobia often sent from the spoil of the enemy, presents of gems and toys, which he received with infinite delight.

7 Some very unjust suspicions have been cast on Zenobia, as if she was necessary to her husband's death.
ded the inheritance of her ancestors, the populous and fertile kingdom of Egypt. 4 The emperor Claudius acknowledged her merit, and was content, that, while he pursued the Gothic war, she should assert the dignity of the empire in the east. 5 The conduct, however, of Zenobia was attended with some ambiguity; not only she declared, that she had succeeded her father in erecting an independent and hostile monarchy. She blended with the popular manners of Roman princes the stately pomp of the courts of Asia, and exalted from her subjects the same adoration that was paid to the successors of Cyrus. 6 She bestowed on her three sons a sound education, and often showed them to the troops adorned with the imperial purple. For herself she reserved the diadem, with the splendid but doubtful title of Queen of the East.

The expedition of Aurelian, 7 against an adversary whose sex alone could render her an object of contempt, his presence restored obedience to the province of Bithynia, already shaken by the arms and intrigues of Zenobia. 8 Advancing at the head of his legions, he received the submission of An条, and was admitted into the palace of the conqueror by the help of a perfidious citizen. The generals through fierce tempests of Aurelian abandoned the traitor to the rage of the soldiers: a supertitious reverence induced him to treat with lenity the countrymen of Apollonius the philosopher. 9 Antioch was deserted on his approach, till he showed his salutary threats to the fugitives, and granted a general pardon to all who, from necessity rather than choice, had been engaged in the service of the Palmyrenian queen. The unexpected mildness of such a conduct reconciled the minds of the Syrians, and, as far as the gates of Emesa, the wishes of the people seconded the terror of his arm weights:

The emperor desires that the Palmyrenian reputation, had she indolently permitted the west to approach within an hundred miles of her capital. The fate of the east was decided in two great battles; so similar in almost every circumstance, that we can scarcely distinguish them from each other, except by observing that the first was fought near Antioch, and the second near Emesa. 10 In both, the queen of Palmyra animated the armies by her presence, and devolved the execution of her orders on Zabdas, who had rendered considerable military talents by the conquest of Egypt. The numerous forces of Zenobia consisted for the most part of light archers, and of heavy cavalry clothed in complete steel. The Moorish and Illyrian horse of Aurelian were unable to sustain the ponderous chariots of the enemy. They fled in real or affected disorder, engaged the Palmyrenians in a laborious pursuit, harassed them by a desultory combat, and at length discomfited this impenetrable and unwieldy body of cavalry. The light infantry, in the mean time, when they had exhausted their quivers, remaining without protection against a closer onset, exposed their naked sides to the swords of the legions. Aurelian had chosen these veteran troops, who were usually stationed on the Upper Danube, and whose valor had been severely tried in the Alemannic war. 11 After the defeat of Emesa, Zenobia found it impossible to collect a third army. As far as the frontiers of Egypt, the emperor, with the nion of the enemy, the design of his powerful adversary the conqueror, who detached Probus, the bravest of his generals, to possess himself of the Egyptian provinces. Palmyra was the last resource of the widow of Odenathus. She retired within the walls of her capital, made every preparation for a vigorous resistance: but there the city was circumscribed, though favoured by advantageous situation between the Gulf of Persia and the Mediterranean, was soon frequented by the caravans which conveyed to the nations of Europe a considerable part of the rich commodities of India. Palmyra insensibly lost the power of her old greatness, recalled the incidents of the war, connecting the Roman and the Parthian monarchies by the mutual benefits of commerce, was suffered to observe an humble neutrality, till at length, after the victories of Trajan, the little republic sunk into the bowels of Rome, and flourished no more than one hundred years. Had she been able to maintain herself, she might have taken the place and honours of a colony. It was during that peaceful period, if we may judge from a few remaining inscriptions, that the wealthy Palmyrenians constructed those temples, palaces, and porticoes of Greek architecture, whose ruins, scattered over an extent of several miles, have preserved the cultivation of our travellers. The elevation of Odenathus and Zenobia appeared to reflect new splendour on their country, and Palmyra, for a while, stood forth the rival of Rome; but the competition was fatal, and ages of prosperity were sacrificed to a moment of glory.

4 This appears very doubtful—Claudius during his reign had been styled emperor, by the medals of Alexandria, which are very numerous; if Zenobia, on any pretence in Egypt, it must have been after the commencement of the reign of Aurelian—for the same reason her conquests as far as Galata is improbable. Perhaps Zenobia had governed the province of Arabia, and been declared to reign before the death of the last prince, subjected it entirely to her own power.

5 See in Hist. August. p. 192. Aurelian's testimony to her merit; and for the conquest of Egypt, Zosimus, i. p. 39, 40.

6 Timolius, Herennianus, and Valbusius. It is supposed that the two former were already dead before the war. On the last, Aurelian's equal, with the province of Arabia, which the title of king and several of his medals are still attest. See Tellinen, tom. iii. p. 1190.

7 Zosimus, i. p. 44. 8 Vopiscus (in Hist. August. p. 217) gives us an authentic letter, and a doubtful vision of Aurelian. Apollonius of Tyana was born about this same time as Jesus Christ. His life (that of the former) is related in so fabulous a manner by his disciples, that we are at a loss to determine what was a fable, an age, an impostor, or a fanatic.

9 Zosimus, i. p. 46. 10 At a place called Imna. Eutropius, Sextus, Rufus, and Jerome, mention only this last battle.

11 Zosimus, i. p. 44—48. His account of the two battles is clear and circumstantial.

12 Thus the hundred and thirty seven miles from Seleucia, and two hundred and three from the nearest point of Syria, agree according to the reckoning of Pliny, who, in a few words, (Hist. Natur. v. 21. 28,) gives an excellent description of Palmyra.

13 Some English travellers from Aleppo discovered the ruins of Palmyra as late as the last century. Our curiosity has since been gratified in a more splendid manner by Moorewood and Dawkes. For the history of Palmyra, we may consult the masterly dissertation of Dr. Bailey in the Philosophical Transactions: Lowthorp's Abridgment, vol. iii. p. 518.
vourable to all my undertakings."

Doubling, however, of the protection of the gods, and of the event of the story, Aurelian judged it prudent to offer terms of an advantageous capitulation; to the queen, a splendid retreat; to the citizens, their ancient privileges. His proposals were obstinately rejected, and the refusal was accompanied with insult.

The firmness of Zenobia was supported by the hopes, that in a very short time famine would compel the Roman army to repass the desert; and by the reasonable expectation that the kings of the East, and particularly the Persian monarch, would arm in the defence of their most natural ally. But fortune and the perseverance of Aurelian, who had been confirmed in his purpose by a dream, which happened about this time, distracted the councils of Persia, and the inconsiderable successes which attempted to relieve Palmyra, were easily intercepted either by the arms or the liberality of the emperor. From every part of Syria, a regular succession of convoys safely arrived in the camp, which was increased by the return of Probus with his victorious troops from the conquest of Egypt. It was then that Zenobia resolved to fly. She mounted the fleetest of her dromedaries, and had already reached the banks of the Euphrates, about sixty miles from Palmyra, when she was overtaken by the pursuit of Aurelian’s light troops, before a dangerous and captive to the feet of the emperor. Her capital soon afterwards surrendered, and was treated with unexpected lenity. The arms, horses, and camels, with an immense treasure of gold, silver, silk, and precious stones, were all delivered to the conqueror, who, leaving only a garrison of six hundred archers, returned to Emesa, and employed some time in the distribution of rewards and punishments at the end of so memorable a war, which restored to the obedience of Rome those provinces that had renounced their allegiance since the captivity of Valerian.

Behaviour of Zenobia. While the Syrian queen was brought into the presence of Aurelian, she sternly asked her, How she had presumed to rise in arms against the emperors of Rome! The answer of Zenobia was a prudent mixture of respect and firmness. "Because I disdained to consider as Roman emperors an Arioch or a Gaugamela, I raised the generous despair of Cleopatra, which she had proposed as her model, and ignominiously purchased life by the sacrifice of her fame and her friends. It was to their counsels, which governed the weakness of her sex, that she imputed the guilt of her obstinate resistance; it was on the contrary, that she directed the vengeance of the cruel Aurelian. The fame of Longinus, who was included among the numerous and perhaps innocent victims of her fear, will survive that of the queen who betrayed, or the tyrant who condemned, him. Genius and learning were incapable of moving a fierce unlettered soldier, but they had served to elevate and harmonize the soul of Longinus. Without uttering a complaint, he calmly followed the executioner, pitting his unhappy mistress, and comforting his afflicted friends."

Returning from the conquest of the rebelled East, Aurelian had already crossed the frontiers of Palmyra, when he was provoked by the intelligence that the Palmyrenians had massacred the governor and garrison which he had left among them, and again created the standard of revolt. Without a moment’s deliberation, he once more turned his face towards Syria. Antioc was confirmed by his prosperity, and a large part of Palmyra felt the irresistible weight of his resentment. We have a letter of Aurelian himself, in which he acknowledges, that old men, women, children, and peasants, had been involved in that dreadful execution, which should have been confined to armed revolters: this principal cause directed to the re-establishment of a temple of the sun, he discovers some pity for the remnant of the Palmyrenians, to whom he grants the permission of rebuilding and inhabiting their city. But it is easier to destroy than to restore. The seat of commerce, of arts, and of Zenobia, gradually sunk into an obscure town, a trifling fortress, and at length a miserable village. The present citizens of Palmyra, consisting of thirty or forty families, have erected their mud-cottages within the spacious court of a magnificent temple.

Another and a last labour still awaited an Aurelian; he resolved to throw together the fragments of his former conquer, and to form an army, which, as he vainly boasted, he was capable of maintaining from the sole profits of his paper trade. Such troops were a feeble defence against the approach of Aurelian; and it seems almost unnecessary to relate, that Firmus was routed, taken, tortured, and put to death. Aurelian might naturally congratulate the state, the people, and himself, that in little more than three years he had restored universal peace and order to the Roman world.

Since the foundation of Rome, no A.D. 374, general had more nobly deserved a triumph than Aurelian; nor was a triumph ever celebrated with superior pride and magnificence. The pomp was opened by twenty elephants, four royal tigers, and above two hundred of the most curious animals from every climate of the north, the east, and the south. They were followed by sixteen hundred gladiators, devoted to the cruel amusement of the amphitheatre. The wealth of Asia, the arms and ensigns of so many conquered nations, and the magnificent plate and wardrobe of the Syrian queen, were disposed in exact symmetry or artificial disorder. The ambassadors of the remotest parts of the earth, of Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, Bactria, India, and China, all remarkable by their rich or singular dresses, displayed the fame and power of the Roman emperor, who exposed likewise to the public view the presents that he had received, and particularly a great number of crowns of gold, the offerings of grateful cities. The victories of Aurelian were attested by the long train of captives who reluctantly attended his triumph, Goths, Vandals, Sarmatians, Allemanni, Franks, Goths, Scyths, Egyptians, and people distinguished by its peculiar inscription, and the title of Amazons was bestowed on ten militant heroines of the Gothic nation who had been taken in arms. But every eye, disregarding the crowd of captives, was fixed on the emperor Tetricus, and the queen of the east. The former, as well as his son, whom he had created Augustus, was dressed in Gallic trowsers, a saffron turie, and robe of purple. The beauteous figure of Zenobia was concealed by fetters of gold; a slave supported the gold chain which encircled her neck, and she almost fainted under the intolerable weight. She preceded on foot the magnificent chariot in which she once hoped to enter the gates of Rome. It was followed by two other chariots, still more sumptuous, of Odenathus and of the Persian monarch. The triumphal car of Aurelian (it had formerly been used by a Gothic king) was drawn, on this memorable occasion, either by four stags or by four elephants. The most illustrious of the senate, the people, and the army, closed the solemn procession. Unfeigned joy, wonder, and gratitude, swelled the acclamations of the multitude; but the satisfaction of the senate was clouded by the appearance of Tetricus and the unfortunate rivals, Aurelian might indulge his pride, he behaved towards them with a lofty condescension which was seldom exercised by the ancient conquerors. Princes who, without success, had defended their throne or freedom, were frequently strangled in prison, as soon as the triumphal pomp ascended the capitol. These usurpers, whom their defeat had convicted of the crime of treachery, were deputed to spend their lives in idleness and honourable repose. The emperor presented Zenobia with an elegant villa at Tibur, or Tivoli, about twenty miles from the capital; the Syrian queen insensibly sunk into a Roman matron, her daughters married into noble families, and her race drove or yet extinct in the fifth century. Tetricus and his son were reinstated in their rank and fortunes. They erected on the Calivan hill a magnificent palace, and as soon as it was finished, invited Aurelian to supper. On his entrance, he was agreeably surprised with a picture which illustrated their singular history. There were delineated offering to the emperor a civic crown and the sceptre of Gaul, and again receiving at his hands the ornaments of the senatorial dignity. The father was afterwards invested with the government of Lucania, and Aurelian, who soon admitted the abdicated monarch to his friendship and conversation, familiarly asked him, Whether it were not more desirable to administer to a province of Italy, than to reign beyond the Alps? The son long continued a respectable member of the senate; nor was there any of the Roman nobility more esteemed by Aurelian, as well as by his successors.

So great was the pomp and magnificence of Aurelian's triumph, that although it and devotion, opened with the dawn of the day, the slow majesty of the procession ascended not the capitol before the ninth hour; and it was already dark when the emperor returned to the palace. The festival was protrayed by theatrical representations, the games of the circus, the hunting of wild beasts, combats of gladiators, and naval engagements. Liberal donations were distributed to the army and people, and several institutions, agreeable or beneficial to the city, contributed to perpetuate the glory of Aurelian. A considerable number of the prisoners, whose presence increased to the gods of Rome; the capitol, and every other temple, glittered with the offerings of his ostentatious piety; and the temple of the sun alone received above fifteen thousand pounds of gold. This last was a magnificent structure, erected by the emperor on the site of the Quirinal hill, and dedicated soon after his triumph, to that deity whom Aurelian adored as the parent of his life and fortunes. His mother had been an inferior priestess in a chapel of the sun; a peculiar devotion to the god of light, was a sentiment which the fortunate peasant imbibed in his infancy; and every mitrarium or victory in the triumph of his reign, fortified superstition by gratitude.

The arms of Aurelian had vanquished; he suppressed aed the foreign and domestic foes of the sedition at Rome. republic. We are assured, that, by his salutary rigour, crimes and factions, mischievous arts and pernicious schemes, the last remnant of an ancient and oppressive government, were eradicated throughout the Roman world. But if we attentively reflect how much swifter is the progress of corruption than its cure, and if we remember that the years abandoned to public disorders exceeded the months allotted to the massacre of Suetonius, we must confess that a few short intervals of peace were insufficient for the arduous work of reformation. Even his attempt to restore the integrity of the coin, was opposed by a formidable insurrection. The emperor's vexation breaks out in the words of a latter writer, "Says he, the gods have decreed that my life should be a perpetual warfare. A sedition within the walls has just now given birth to a very serious civil war. The workmen of the mint, at the instigation of Felicius, a slave to whom I had intrusted an employment in the finances, have risen in rebellion. They are at length suppressed; but seven thousand of my soldiers have been slain in the contest, of those troops whose ordinary station is in Dacia, and the camps along the Danube." Other writers, who confirm the same fact, add likewise, that it happened soon after Aurelian's triumph; that the decisive engagement was fought on the Calivan hill; that the workmen of the mint had adulterated the coin; and that the emperor restored the public credit, by delivering out good money in exchange for the bad, which the people was accustomed to bring into the treasury.

We might content ourselves with relating this extraordinary transaction, but we cannot dissemble how much in its present form it appears to us inconsistent and incredible. The des- base ment of the coin is indeed well suited to the ad-

administration of Gallienus; nor is it unlikely that the instruments of the corruption might draw the inflexible justice of Aurelian. But the guilt, as well as the profit, must have been confined to a few; nor is it easy to conceive by what arts they could arm a people whom they had injured, against a monarch whom they had betrayed. We might naturally expect, that such miscreants should have shared the public detestation, with the other victims of his policy and oppression; and that the reformation of the coin should have been an action equally popular with the destruction of those obsolete accounts, which by the emperor's order were burnt in the forum of Trajan. In an age when the principles of commerce were so imperfectly understood, the most desirable end might perhaps be effected by harsh and injudicious means; but a temporary grievance of such a nature can scarcely excite and support a serious civil war. The repetition of intolerable taxes, imposed either on the land or on the necessities of life, may at last provoke those who will not, or who cannot, relinquish their country. But the case is far otherwise in every operation which, by whatsoever expedients, restores the just value of money. The transient evil is soon obliterated by the permanent benefit, the loss is divided among multitudes; and if a few wealthy individuals experience a separate diminution of treasure, with their riches, they at the same time lose the distraction and importance which they derived from the possession of them. However Aurelian might choose to disguise the real cause of the insurrection, his reformation of the coin could only furnish a faint pretence to a party already powerful and discontented. Rome, though deprived of freedom, was distracted by faction. The people, towards whom the emperor, himself a plebeian, always expressed a peculiar fondness, lived in perpetual dissension with the senate, the equestrian order, and the praetorian guards. Nothing less than the firmness, though secret conscription of those orders, of the authority of the first, the wealth of the second, and the arms of the third, could have displayed a strength capable of contending in battle with the veteran legions of the Danube, which, under the conduct of a martial sovereign, had achieved the conquest of the west and of the east.

Crises of Au.

Whatever was the cause or the object of this rebellion, imputed with so little probability to the workmen of the mint, Aurelian used his victory with unremitting rigour. He was naturally of a severe disposition; a peasant and a soldier, his nerves yielded not easily to the impressions of the laws. His love of justice and the propriety of the laws, a blind and furious passion; and whenever he despised his own or the public safety endangered, he disregarded the rules of evidence, and the proportion of punishments. The unprowed rebellion with which the Romans rewarded his services, exasperated his hungry spirit. The noblest families of the capital were involved in the guilt or suspicion of this dark conspiracy. A hasty spirit of revenge urged the bloody prosecution, and it proved fatal to one of the nephews of the emperor. The executioners (if we may use the expression of a contemporary poet) were far more crowded, and the unhappy senate lamented the death or absence of its most illustrious members. Nor was the pride of Aurelian less offensive to that assembly than his cruelty. Ignorant of the impatience of the restraints of civil institutions, he disdained to hold his power by any other title than that of the sword, and governed by right of conquest an empire which he had saved and subdued.

It was observed by one of the most illustrious members of the senate, that the emperor Aurelian was naturally suited to the command of an army, than to the government of an empire. Of character in which nature and experience had enabled him to excel, he again took the field a few months after his triumph. It was expected that he was more especially fitted for the exigencies of foreign war, and the Persian monarch, exulting in the shame of Valerian, still braved with impunity the offended majesty of Rome. At the head of an army, less formidable by its numbers than by its discipline and valour, the emperor advanced as far as the straits which divide Europe from Asia. He there experienced, that the most absolute power is a weak defence against the effects of despair. He had threatened one of his secretaries who was accused of extortion; and it was known that he seldom threatened in vain. The last hope which remained for the criminal, was to involve some of the principal officers of the army in his danger, or to make his flight a counterfeiting his master's hand, he showed them, in a long and bloody list, their own names devoted to death. Without suspecting or examining the fraud, they resolved to secure their own lives by the murder of the emperor. On his march, between Byzantium and Heraclæa, Aurelian was suddenly attacked by the conspirators, whose stations gave them a right to surround his person, and, after a short resistance, fell by the hands of Mucapor, a general whom he had always loved and trusted. He died regretted by the army, January, detested by the senate, but universally acknowledged as a warlike and fortunate prince, the useful though severe reformer of a degenerate state.

CHAPTER XII.

Conduct of the army and Senate after the death of Aurelian—Reigns of Tacitus, Probus, Carus, and his sons.

Such was the unhappy condition of the Roman emperors, that, whatever contest between the army and the senate for the government of the country, he who felt the strongest passion for the choice of an emperor, on occasion of his death or absence, was best fitted to be followed and esteemed, an emperor was chosen at last, and almost every reign was closed by the same disgusting repetition of treason and murder. The death of Aurelian, however, is remarkable by its extraordinary consequences. The legions admired, lamented, and revered, their victorious chief. The artifice of his pernicious secretary was discovered and punished. The deluded conspirators attended the funeral of their injured sovereign, with sincere or well-feigned contrition, and submitted to the unanimous resolution of the military order, which was signified by the following epistle: "The brave and fortunate armies to the senate and people of Rome—The crime of one man, and the error of many, have deprived us of the late emperor Aurelian. May it please you, venerable lords and fathers! to place him in the number of the gods, and to appoint a successor whom your judgment shall declare worthy of the imperial purple! None of those: whose guilt or misfortune have contributed to our loss, shall ever reign over us." The Roman senators heard without surprise, that another emperor had been assassinated in his camp; they secretly rejoiced in the fall of Aurelian; but the modest and dutiful address of the legions, when it was communicated in full assembly by the consul, diffused the most pleasing astonishment. Such honours as fear and perhaps necessity could extort, they liberally poured forth on the memory of their deceased sovereign. Such acknowledgments as gratitude could inspire, they returned to the faithful and wise of the republic, who entertained not just a sense of the legal authority of the senate in the choice of an emperor. Yet, notwithstanding this flattering appeal, the most prudent of the assembly declined exposing their safety and dignity to the caprice of an armed multitude. The strength of the legions was, indeed, a pledge of their sincerity, since those who may command are seldom reduced to the necessity of dissembling; but could it naturally be expected, that a hasty repentance would correct the invertebates habits of fourscore years? Should the soldiers relapse into their accustomed seditions, their insulance might, perhaps, extinguish the majesty of the senate, and prove fatal to the object of its choice. Motives like these dictated a decree, by which the election of a new emperor was referred to the suffrage of the military order.

A.D. 273. Feb. 3. The contention that ensured is one of peculiar interest. It recalls to mind the most improbable, regium of eight events in the history of mankind. The months, as if satiated with the exercise of power, again conjured the senate to invest one of its own body with the Imperial purple. The senate still persisted in its refusal; the army in its request. The reconcilement was preserved for a moment. A majority persisted at least three times, and whilst the obstinate modesty of either party was resolved to receive a master from the hands of the other, eight months insensibly elapsed: an amazing period of tranquil anarchy, during which the Roman world remained without a sovereign, without an usurper, and without a sedition. The generals and magistrates appointed by Aurelian continued to execute their ordinary functions; and it is observed, that a proconsul of Asia was the only considerable person removed from his office, in the whole course of the interregnum. An event somewhat similar, but much less authentic, is supposed to have happened after the death of Romulus, who, in his life and character, bore some affinity with Aurelian. The throne was vacant during twelve or fourteen months, till the election of a Sabine philosopher, and the public peace was guarded in the same manner, till the accession of the orders of the state. But, in the time of Numa and Romulus, the arms of the people were controlled by the authority of the patricians; and the balance of freedom was easily preserved in a small and virtuous community. The decline of the Roman state, far different from its infancy, was attended with every circumstance that could banish from an interregnum the prospect of obedience and harmony; an immense and tumultuous capital, a wide extent of empire, the servile equality of despots, an army of four hundred thousand mercenaries, and the experience of frequent revolutions. Yet, notwithstanding all these temptations, the discipline and memory of Aurelian still restrained the seditious temper of the troops, as well as the fatal ambition of their leaders. The flower of the legions maintained their stations on the banks of the Bosphorus, and the people of the capital in the Senate-house and Forum. The prospect of Rome and of the provinces. A generous though transient enthusiasm seemed to animate the military order; and we may hope that a few real patriots cultivated the returning friendship of the army and the senate, as the only expedient capable of restoring the repulsed ancient beauty and vigour.

On the twenty-fifth of September, A.D. 273. Sept., near eight months after the murder of Aurelian, the consul convoked an assembly of the senate, and reported the doubtful and dangerous situation of the empire. He slightly insinuated, that the precarious loyalty of the soldiers depended on the chance of every hour, and of every accident; but he represented, with the most convincing eloquence, the various dangers that might attend any further delay in the choice of an emperor. Intelligence, he said, was already received, that the Germans had passed the Rhine, and occupied some of the strongest and most opulent cities of Gaul. The ambition of the Persian king kept the east in perpetual alarms; Egypt, Africa, and Illyricum, were exposed to foreign and domestic arms, and the levity of Syria would prefer even a female sceleton to the somberness of the Roman senators. The consul, in the addressing himself to Tacitus, the first of the senators, required his opinion on the important subject of a proper candidate for the vacant throne. If we can prefer personal merit to ac-character of celibacy, we shall esteem the birth of Tacitus more truly noble than that of kings. He claimed his descent from the philosophic historian, whose writings will instruct the last generations of mankind. The senator Tacitus was then seventy-five years of age. The long period of his innocent life was attended with health and honour. He had twice been invested with the consular dignity, and enjoyed with elegance and sobriety his ample patrimony of between two and three millions sterling. The experience of so many princes, whom he had esteeemed or endured, from the vain follies of Elagabalus to the useful rigour of A.D. 273. Feb. 3. The ultimate source of his reputation were the duties, the dangers, and the temptations, of their sublime station. From the assiduous study of his immortal ancestor, he derived the knowledge of the Roman constitution, and of human nature. The voice of the people had already named Tacitus as the citizen whose fidelity could alone ensure the stability of empire, and his very name reached his ears, and induced him to seek the retirement of one of his villas in Campania. He had passed two months in the delightful privacy of Baiae, when he reluctantly obeyed the summons of the consul to resume his honourable place in the senate, and to assist the republic with his counsels on this important occasion.

Tacitus, in his Hist. August., p. 227, calls him, "primum sentenced with the consent afterwards Privus Petronius, at the same time, to suppose, that the monarchs of Rome, disdaining this humble title, resided in the most ancient of the senators." The only objection to this genealogy is, that the historian was named Cornelius, the emperor Claudius. But under the lower empire, names were extremely various and uncertain.

Zonaras, l. xii. p. 637. The Alexandrian Chronicle, by an obvious mistake, transfers that age to Aurelian.

1 A.D. 273. Feb. 3. He was ordinary consul. But he must have been Suffectus many years before, and most probably under Valerian.

2 His military achievements, Tacitus, in Hist. August., p. 229. This account is the only old statement that coincides, in the number of battles, with the most celebrated, that of his life, equivalent to eight hundred and forty thousand Roman pounds of silver, each of the value of three pounds sterling. But in the age of Tacitus, the coinage of the Roman Empire was changed, and a greater value was given to the denarius.

3 After his accession, he gave orders that ten copies of the historian should be signed, together with the present one, upon the same day. Vol. i. p. 171. Dionys. Halicarn. i. i. 5. 12. Liv. iv. 17. Diona. Halicarn. i. i. 5. 13. Ptolemaicus in Numis. p. 60. The first of these writers relates the story like an orator, the second like a historian, and the third like a poet. But of those three, probably without some mixture of table.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

He arose to speak, when, from every quarter, the honored name of Augustus and emperor. "Tactius Augustus, the gods preserve thee, we choose thee for our sovereign; to thy care we intrust the republic and the world. Accept the empire from the authority of the senate. It is due to thy rank, to thy conduct, and to their behalf, that we should have the final say. Tactius attempted to decline the dangerous honour, and to express his wonder, that they should elect his age and infirmities to succeed the martial vigour of Aurelian. Are these limbs, couchant fathers, fitted to sustain the weight of armour, the fatigue of circumspection, or the care of climates, and the hardships of a military life, would soon oppress a feeble constitution, which subsists only by the most tender management. My exhausted strength scarcely enables me to discharge the duty of a senator; how insufficient would it prove to the arduous labours of war and government! Can you hope, that the legions will respect a weak old man, whose days have been spent in the shade of peace and retirement! Can you desire that I should ever find reason to regret the favourable opinion of the senate?" and accepts the

The reluctance of Tactius, and it must be mortal. We likewise, have here been inspired by the affectionate obsequy of the senate. Five hundred voices repeated at once, in eloquent confusion, that the greatest of the Roman princes, Numa, Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines, had ascended the throne in a very advanced season of life; that the mind, not the body, a sovereign, not a soldier, was the object of their choice; and that they expected from him no more than to guide by his wisdom the valour of the legions. These pressing though tumultuous instances were seconded by a more regular oration of Metitus Falcotus, the next on the consular bench to Tactius himself. He reminded the assembly of the evils to which Rome had endured from the vices of headstrong and capricious youth, congratulated them on the election of a virtuous and experienced senator, and, with a manly, though perhaps a selfish, freedom, exhorted Tactius to remember the reasons of his elevation, and to seek a successor, not in his own family, but in the republic. The speech of Falcotus was enforced by a general acclamation. The emperor elect submitted to the authority of his country, and received the voluntary homage of his equals. The judgment of the senate was confirmed by the consent of the Roman people, and of the provincial and senatorial authority.

The administration of Tactius was not unworthy of his life and principles. A grateful servant of the senate, he considered that national council as the author, and himself as the subject, of the laws. He studiously preserved the wounds which imperial pride, civil discord, and military violence, had inflicted on the constitution, and to restore, at least, the image of the ancient republic, as it had been preserved by the policy of Augustus, and the virtues of Trajan and the Antonines. It may not be use less to recapitulate some of the most important pro cesses, and view with duteous reverence the election of Tactius.

To invest one of their body, under the title of emperor, with the general command of the armies, and the government of the frontier provinces. 2. To determine the list, or, as it was then styled, the college of consuls. They were twelve in number, who, in successive pairs, each during the space of two months, filled the year, and represented the dignity of that ancient office. The authority of the senate, in the nomination of the consuls, was exercised with such independent freedom, that no regard was paid to an irregular request of the emperor in favour of his brother Florinianus. "The senate," exclaimed Tactius, with the honest transport of a patriot, "understand the character of a prince whom we must consider as our own." 3. To elect consuls and presidents of the provinces, and to confer on all the magistrates their civil jurisdiction. 4. To receive appeals through the intermediate office of the prefect of the city from all the tribunals of the empire. 5. To give force and validity by their decrees, and improve the privacy of consular edicts. 6. To these several branches of authority we may add some inspection over the finances, since, even in the stern reign of Aurelian, it was in their power to divert a part of the revenue from the public service.

Circular epistles were sent, without their joy and delay, to all the principal cities of the empire, Treves, Milan, Aquileia, Thessalonica, Corinth, Athens, Antioch, Alexandria, and Carthage, to claim their obedience, and to inform them of the happy revolution which had restored the Roman senate to its ancient dignity. Two of these epistles are still existing. Two volumes contain the proceedings of the private correspondence of the senators on this occasion. They discover the most excessive joy, and the most unbounded hopes. "Cast away your indolence," it is thus that one of the senators addresses his friend, "emerge from your retirements of Baise and Patience. Give yourselves to the city, to the senate. Rome flourishes, the whole republic flourishes. Thanks to the Roman army, to an army truly Roman; at length we have recovered our just authority, the end of all our desires. We hear appeals, we appoint procureurs, we create emperors; perhaps too we may remain hereafter as a word is sufficient. How lofty our expectations were, however, soon disappointed; nor, indeed, was it possible that the armies and the provinces should long obey the luxurious and unworl y nobles of Rome. On the slightest touch, the unsupported fabric of their pride and power fell to the ground. The expiring senate displayed a sudden lustre, blazed for a moment, and was extinguished for ever. All that had yet passed at Rome was A.D. 276 no more than a theatrical representation. Tactius is no unless it was ratified by the more sub, by the army, the most salutary powers of the legislatures. Leaving the senators to enjoy their freedom and ambition, Tactius proceeded to the Thracian camp, and was there, by the prefect, prefeted, presented to the assembled troops, as the prince whom they themselves had demanded, and whom the senate had bestowed. As soon as the prefect was silent, the emperor addressed himself to the soldiers with eloquence and propriety. He gratified their avarice by a liberal distribution of treasure, under the names of pay and dozantive. He engaged their esteem by a spirited declaration, that although his age might disable him from the performance of military exploits, his counsels should never be unworthy of a Roman general, the successor of the brave Aurelian.

Whilst the deceased emperor was the Alani invade making preparations for a second expe- Atin, and are resi in the East, he had negociated pased by Tactius, with the Alani, a Sibyrian people, who pitched their tents in the neighbourhood of the lake Mecotis. These barbarians, allured by presents and subsidies, had promised to invade Persia with a numerous body of light cavalry. They were faithful to their engagements; but when they arrived on the Roman frontier, Aurelian was already dead, the design of the Persian war was at least suspended. The empire was immediately invested by the legions, and the throne vacated by Tactius.

10 Tactius addressed the praetorians by the appellation of sanctissimis sociis, and the people by that of severa securitatis.

...power," as says Probus, in a private letter, "to lay down a title so full of envy and of danger. I must continue to personate the character which the soldiers have imposed upon me.30 They are in a state of revolt. A.D. 236. Its.31 When this respectful epistle was read by the consul, the senators were unable to disguise their satisfaction, that Probus should condescend thus humbly to solicit a sceptre which he already possessed. They celebrated with the warmest gratitude his virtue, his exploits, and above all his moderation. A decree immediately passed, without a dissenting voice, to ratify the election of the eastern armies, and to confer on their chief all the several branches of the imperial dignity: the names of Caesar and Augustus, the title of father of his country, the right of holding the purple of his brother, like a private inheritance, and the management of affairs. Amongst the public emoluments which distinguished his reign, were the personal valor and conduct of the emperor, inasmuch that the writer of his life expresses some amazement how, in so short a time, a single man could be present in so many distant wars. The remaining actions he intrusted to the care of his lieutenants, the judicious choice of which forms no inconsiderable part of his glory. Carus, Diocletian, Maximinian, Constantius, Galerius, Aeculepiodotus, Anaballianus, and a crowd of other chiefs, who afterwards ascended or supported the throne, were trained to arms in the severe school of Aurelian and Probus.32

But the most important service which Probus rendered to the republic, was the headlong Gaul deliverance of Gaul, and the recovery of the Seventy flourishing cities oppressed by the barbarians of Germany, who, since the death of Aurelian, had ravaged that great province with impudence and fury. Amongst the many tribes and numerock of invaders, we may distinguish, with some degree of clearness, three great armies, or rather nations, successively vanquished by the valor of Probus. He drove back the Franks into their morasses; a decisive circumstance from whence we may infer, that the confederacy known by the name of the Franks, already possessed, the flat maritime country, intersected and almost overflown by the stagnating waters of the Rhine, and that several tribes of the Frisians and Bavonius had ascended to their alliance. He vanquished the Burgundians, a considerable people of the Vandali race. They had wandered in quest of booty from the banks of the Oder to those of the Seine.33 They esteemed themselves sufficiently fortunate to purchase, by the restitution of all their booty, the permission of an undisturbed retreat. They attempted to elude that article of the treaty. Their punishment was immediate and terrible. Amongst all the formidable were the Lygians, a distant people who reigned over a wide domain on the frontiers of Poland and Silesia.34 In the Lygian nation, the Arii held the first rank by their numbers and fierceness. The Arii (It is thus that they are described by the energy of Tacitus) sturdy and vigorous by nature, they endured with the innate terrors of their barbarism. Their shields are black, their bodies are painted black. They choose for the combat the darkest hour of the night. Their host advances, covered as it were with a funeral veil. They invaded the principal city, Isauria, was destroyed by the consul Servilius and received the surname of Isauricus.—(D’Anville. Gene. Anc. vol. ii. p. 86.—G)

But his dutiful address to the senate displayed the sentiments, or at least the language of a man of his order, conscript fathers! to succeed the emperor Aurelian, you acted in a manner suitable to your justice and wisdom. For you are the legal sovereigns of the world, and the power which you derive from your ancestors, will descend to your posterity. Happy would it have been, if Florus had not usurped the purple of his brother, like a private inheritance, had expected what your majesty might determine, either in his favour, or in that of any other person. The prudent soldiers have punished his rashness. To me they have offered the title of Augustus. But I shall not endure my countrymen to impose on me, and I must—shade; nor do they often find an enemy capable of sustaining so strange and infernal an aspect. Of all our senses, the eyes are the first vanquished in battle. Yet the arms and discipline of the Romans easily disposed of the Gauls, who, at the approach of the enemy, were defeated in a general engagement, and Semno, the most renowned of their chiefs, fell alive into the hands of Probus. That prudent emperor, unwilling to reduce a brave people to despair, granted them an honourable capitulation, and permitted them to return in safety to their own country. But the losses which they suffered in the march, the battle, and the retreat, broke the power of the nation: nor is the Lygian name ever repeated in the history either of Germany or of the empire. The deliverance of Gaul is reported to have cost the lives of four hundred thousand of the invaders; a work of labour to the Romans, and of expense to the emperor, who gave a piece of gold for the head of every barbarian. But as the fame of warriors is built on the destruction of human kind, we may naturally suspect, that the sanguinary account was multiplied by the avarice of the soldiers, and accepted without any very severe examination by the liberal vanity of Probus.

Since the expedition of Maximin, the Roman generals had confined their ambition to a defensive war against the nations of Germany, of which they actually possessed the frontiers of the empire. The more Probus punished his Gallic victories, passed the Rhine, and displayed his invincible eagles on the banks of the Elbe and the Necker. He was fully convinced that nothing could reconcile the minds of the barbarians to peace, unless they experienced the results of the calamities of war. Germany, exhausted by the ill success of the last emigration, was astonished by his presence. Nine of the most considerable princes repaired to his camp, and fell prostrate at his feet. Such a treaty was humbly received by the Germans, as it pleased the conqueror to dictate. He exacted a strict aedile of the effects and captives which they had carried away from the provinces; and obliged their own magistrates to punish the more obstinate robbers who presumed to detain any part of the spoil. A considerable tribute of corn, cattle, and horses, the only wealth of barbarian cities, was reserved for the use of the general. The emperor Probus established on the limits of their territory. He even entertained some thoughts of compelling the Germans to relinquish the exercise of arms, and to trust their differences to the justice, their safety to the power, and the protection of their common constant residence of an imperial governor, supported by a numerous army, was indispensible requisite. Probus therefore judged it more expedient to defer the execution of so great a design; which was indeed rather of speeces than solid utility. Had Germany been reduced into the state of a province, the Romans, with immense labour and expense, would have acquired only a more extensive boundary to defend against the fiercer and more active barbarians of Scythia. He builds a wall. Instead of reducing the warlike natives from a condition of the enemy to that of subjects of the Danube. Probus contented himself with the humble expedient of raising a bulwark against their inroads. The country, which now forms the circle of Swabia, had been left desert in the age of Augustus by the emigration of its ancient inhabitants. The felicity of the new arrangement was obvious to the adjacent provinces of Gaul. Crowds of adventurers, of a roving temper and of desperate fortunes, occupied the doubtful possession, and acknowledged, by the payment of tithes, the majesty of the empire. To protect these new subjects, a line of frontier garrisons was gradually extended from the Rhine to the Danube. The emperors began to be practised, these garrisons were connected and covered by a strong entrenchment of trees and palisades. In the place of so rude a bulwark, the emperor Probus constructed a stone wall of a considerable height, and strengthened it by towers at convenient distances. From the neighbourhood of Newstadt and Ratibosn on the Danube, it stretched across hills, valleys, rivers, and morasses, as far as the Wimpens on the Necker, and at length terminated on the banks of the Rhine, after a winding course of near two hundred miles. A considerable barrier, uniting the two mighty streams that protected in their course, seemed to fill up the vacant space through which the barbarians, and particularly the Alemanni, could penetrate with the greatest facility into the heart of the empire. But the experience of the world, from China to Britain, has exposed the vain attempt of fortifying any extensive tract of country. An active enemy can select and vary his points of attack, must, in the end, discover some feeble spot, or some unguarded moment. The strength, as well as the attention, of the defenders is divided; and such are the blind effects of error and carelessness, the finest troops, that a line broken in a single place, already threatened the security. The face of the wall which Probus erected, may confirm the general observation. Within a few years after his death, it was overthrown by the Alemanni. Its scattered ruins, universally ascribed to the power of the Demon, never served to excite the wonder of the Swabian peasant.

Among the useful conditions of peace introduction and imposed by Probus on the tranquillised settlement of the nations of Germany, was the obligation barbarians of supplying the Roman army with sixteen thousand captives. The emperor Probus, however, determined to press the exaction of the tribute, and to double the number of captives. The emperor Probus dispersed them through all the provinces, and distributed this dangerous reinforcement in small bands, of fifty or sixty each, among the national troops; judiciously observing, that the aid which the republic derived from the barbarians, should be felt but not seen. The cruel and cowardly nature of the feeble elegance of Italy and the internal provinces could no longer support the weight of arms. The hardy frontier of the Rhine and Danube still produced minds and bodies equal to the labours of the camp; but a retreat in part of its wall, had gradually diminished their numbers. The infrequency of marriage, and the ruin of agriculture, affected the principles of population, and not only destroyed the strength of the present, but intercepted the hope of future generations. The wisdom of Probus embraced a great and beneficial plan of replenishing the exhausted frontiers, by new colonies of captive or fugitive barbarians, on whom he bestowed lands, cattle, instruments of husbandry, and every encouragement that might engage them to educate a race of soldiers for the service of the republic. The emperor Probus commanded some of the ablest commanders, and he transported a considerable body of Vandals. The impossibility of an escape reconciled them to their sit-

His account of the wall is chiefly borrowed (as he says himself) from Tacitus (De rebus Scythicis, lib. II. c. 2). The structure of the wall is very extensive and curious. Tacitus, lib. II. c. 2. See Recherches sur les Chinois et les Egyptiens, tom. ii. p. 81—The eastern frontier of the empire is well described by Tacitus; and the northern frontier, as much the more important, was the subject of a special treaty. Here, it is not improbable that a stone wall, as we have already observed, had been built by the Romans, to connect the province of Pannonia with the Alemanni. Vopiscus, lib. ii. c. 15. nation, and in the subsequent troubles of that island, they approved themselves the most faithful servants of the state. Great numbers of Franks and Gepidæ were settled on the banks of the Danube and Rhine. A hundred thousand Bastarnæ, expelled from their own country, cheerfully accepted an establishment in Thrace and Gaul, and even turned their backs on their native subjects. But the expectations of Probus were too often disappointed. The impotence and idleness of the barbarians could ill brook the slow labours of agriculture. Their unconquerable love of freedom, rising against despotism, provoked them into hasty rebellions, all of which the emperor met with similar success. These artificial supplies, however repeated by succeeding emperors, restore the important limit of Gaul and Ilyricum to its ancient and native vigour.

Daring enterprise. Of all the barbarians who abandoned of their own accord their new settlements, and disturbed the public tranquillity, a very small number returned to their own country. For a short season they might wander in arms through the empire; but in the end they were surely destroyed by the power of a warlike emperor. The successful rashness of a party of Franks was attended, however, with such memorable consequences, that it is proper to detail the story. They had been established by Probus on the sea-coast of Pontus, with a view of strengthening the frontier against the inroads of the Alani. A fleet stationed in one of the harbours of the Euxine, fell into the hands of the Franks; and they resolved, through unknown seas of the ocean, to march out of the Phasis to that of the Rhine. They easily escaped through the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, and cruising along the Mediterranean, indulged their appetite for revenge and plunder, by frequent descents on the unsuspecting shores of Asia, Greece, and Africa. The insidious tranquillity of the Franks was the more easily perceived by the recent revolts of Athens and Carthage had seemingly been sunk, was sacked by a handful of barbarians, who massacred the greatest part of the trembling inhabitants. From the island of Sicily, the Franks proceeded to the columns of Hercules, trusted themselves to the ocean, coasted round Spain and Gaul, and steering their triumphant course through the British channel, at length finished their surprising voyage, by landing in safety on the Batavian or Frisian shores. The example of their success, instructing their countrymen to conceive the advantages, and to despise the dangers, of the sea, pointed out to these enterprising spirits a new road to wealth and glory.

Revolt of Saturninus in the east. Notwithstanding the vigilance and activity of Probus, it was almost impossible that he could at once retain in obedience every part of his wide extended dominions. The barbarians, who broke their chains, had seized the favourable opportunity of a domestic war. When the emperor marched to the relief of Gaul, he devolved the command of the east on Saturninus. That general, a man of merit and experience, was driven into rebellion by the absence of his sovereign, the levity of the Alexandrian people, the pressing instances of his friends, and his own fears; but from the moment of his elevation, he never entertained a hope of empire, or even of life. "Alas!" he said, "the republic has lost a useful servant, and the rashness of an hour has destroyed the successes of many months. You know of what kind this empire is. He, "the misery of sovereign power; a sword is perpetually suspended over our head. We dread our very guards, we distrust our companions. The choice of an orator as of a repose is no longer in our disposition; nor is there any age, or character, or conduct, that can protect us from the censure of envy. In thus exalting me to the throne, you have doomed me to a life of curses, and to an untimely fate. The only consolation which remains is, the assurance that I shall not fall alone." But as the former part of his prediction was verified by the victory, so the latter was disappointed by the clemency, of Probus. That amiable prince attempted even to uncialize himself from the fury of the soldiers. He had more than once solicited the usurper himself, to place A.D. 283. some confidence in the mercy of a sovereign who so highly esteemed his character, that he had punished, as a malicious informer, the first who was guilty of his errors of mind.1 Saturninus might, perhaps, have embraced the generous offer, had he not been restrained by the obstinate distrust of his adherents. Their guilt was deeper, and their hopes more sanguine, than those of their experienced leader.

The revolt of Saturninus was scarcely extinguished in the east, before new troubles were excited in the west, by the Proculus in Gaul, rebellion of Bonosus and Proculus in Gaul. The most distinguished merit of those two officers, was their respective prowess, of the one in the combats of the Franks, of the other in the sea. 1 The vigour of them were destitute of courage and capacity, and both sustained, with honour, the August character which the fear of punishment had engaged them to assume, till they sunk at length beneath the superior genius of Probus. He used the victory with his accustomed moderation, and spared the fortunes as well as the lives of their innocent families.

The arms of Probus had now superseded all the foreign and domestic enemies. Triumph of the mists of the state. His mild but steady emperor Probus administration confirmed the re-establishment of the public tranquillity which was then left in the province of a hostile barbarian, a tyrant, or even a robber, to revive the memory of past disorders. It was time that the emperor should revisit Rome, and celebrate his own glory and the general happiness. The triumph due to the valour of Probus was conducted with a magnificence suitable to his fortune, and the people who had so lately admired the trophies of Aurelian, gazed with equal pleasure on those of his heroic successor.1 We cannot, on this occasion, forget the despicable conduct of four score gladiators, reserved with near six hundred others, for the inhuman sports of the amphitheatre. Disdaining to shed their blood for the amusement of the populace, they killed their keepers, broke from the place of their confinement, and filled the streets of Rome with blood and confusion. After an obstinate resistance, they were overpowered and cut in pieces by the regular forces; but they obtained at least an honourable death and the satisfaction of a just revenge.2

The military discipline which reigned in the camps of Probus, was less cruel than that of Aurelian, but it was equally rigid and exact. The latter had punished the irregularities of the soldiers with unrelenting severity, the former prevented them by employing the legions in constant and useful labours. When Probus commanded in Egypt, he executed many considerate works for the splendour and benefit of that rich country.

of the Nile, so important to Rome itself, was improved; and temples, bridges, porticoes, and palaces, were constructed by the hands of the soldiers, who acted by turns as architects, as engineers, and as husband- men.1 It was reported of Hannibal, that, in order to preserve his troops from the dangerous temptations of idleness, he obliged them to perform large plant- tions of olive trees along the coast of Africa.2 From a similar principle, Probus exercised his legions in covering, with rich vineyards, the hills of Gaul and Pannonia, and two considerable spots are described, which were entirely dog and planted by military la- bourers. One of these, known by the name of Mount Almo, was situated near Sirmium, the country where Probus was born, for which he ever retained a partial affection, and whose gratitude he endeavoured to secure, by converting into tillage a large and un- healthy tract of marshy ground. An army thus em- ployed, constituted perhaps the most useful, as well as the bravest, portion of Roman subjects.

His death.

But in the prosecution of a favourite scheme, the best of men, satisfied with the extent of their intentions, are subject to forget the bounds of moderation; nor did Probus himself sufficiently consider the patience and discretion of his fierce legionaries.3 The dangers of the military pro- fession seem only to be compensated by a life of plea- sure and idleness; but if the duties of the soldier are incessantly aggravated by the labours of the peasant, he will soon become impatient. Under the intolerable burden, they shake it off with indignation. The imprudence of Probus is said to have inflamed the discontent of his troops. More attentive to the interests of mankind than to those of the army, he expressed the vain hope, that, by the establishment of universal peace, he should soon abolish the necessity of standing armies and mercenary force.4 The ungoverned expression proved fatal to him. In one of the hottest days of summer, as he severely urged the unworthy labour of draining the marshes of Sirmium, the soldiers, im- patient of fatigue, on a sudden threw down their tools, grasped their arms, and broke out into a furious mutiny. The emperor, conscious of his danger, took refu- ge in a lofty tower, constructed for the purpose of surveying the progress of the work.5 The tower was A.D. 242. instantly forced, and a thousand swords were plunged at once into the bosom of the unfortunate Probus. The rage of the troops sub- sided as soon as it had been gratified. They then lamented their fatal rashness, forgot the severity of the emperor whom they had massacred, and hastened to perpetuate, by an honourable monument, the me- morial of his virtues and victories.

When the legions had indulged their election and character of Carus.

When the legions had indulged their grief and repentance for the death of Probus, their unanimous consent declared Carus, his pretorian prefect, the most deserving of the imperial throne. Every circumstance that relates to this prince appears of a mixed and doubtful nature. He gloried in the title of Roman citizen; and affected to compare the purity of his blood, with the foreign and even barbarous origin of the preceding emperors; yet the most inquisitive of his contemporaries, very far mained on the field of battle, and the number of captives amounted to twenty thousand. The old emperor, animated with the same flames and prospect of victory, pursued his march, in the midst of winter, through the countries of Thrace and Asia Minor, and at length, with his younger son Numerian, arrived on the confines of the Persians to meet the victorious Carus. The summit of a lofty mountain, he pointed out to his troops the opulence and luxury of the enemy whom they were about to invade.

A.D. 283.

The successor of Artaxerxes, Varanes, or Dahrahan, though he had subdued the kingdom of Armenia, was alarmed at the approach of the Romans, and endeavoured to retard their progress by a negotiation of peace. His ambassadors entered the camp about sunset, at the time when the troops were satisfying their hunger with a frugal repast. The Persians expressed their desire of being introduced to the presence of the Roman emperor. They were at length conducted to a soldier, who was seated on the grass. A piece of stale bacon and a few hard pease composed his supper. A coarse woollen garment of purple was the only covering that protected him from the fatal boundaries of the wind. The emperor conducted with the same disregard of courtly elegance. Carus, taking off a cap which he wore to conceal his baldness, assured the ambassadors, that, unless their master acknowledged the superiority of Rome, he would speedily render Persia as naked of trees, as his own head was destitute of hair. Notwithstanding some traces of art and preparation, we may discover in this scene the manners of Carus, and the severe simplicity which the martial princes, who succeeded Gallienus, had already restored in the Roman camps. The ministers of the great king trembled and retired. His victory and elevation so thickened his effect. He ravaged Mesopotamia, cut off its food, and, in pieces whatever opposed his passage, made himself master of the great cities of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, (which seemed to have surrendered without resistance,) and carried his victorious arms beyond the Tigris. He had seized the favourable moment for an invasion. The Persian councils were distracted by domestic factions, and the greater part of their forces were detained on the frontiers of India. Rome and the east received with transport the news of such important advantages. Flattery and hope painted, in the most blooming language of Asia, the conquest of Arabia, the subjection of Egypt, and a total deliverance from the inroads of the Scythian nations. But the third child of Carus was destined to extinguish the favourable prospects, and the hopes of the nation.

A.D. 283.

The reign of Carus was destined to expire in the Dec. 29, or mean of predictions. They were severely uttered before they were contradicted by his death; an event attended with such ambiguous circumstances, that it may be related in a letter from his own secretary to the prefect of the city. "Carus," says he, "our dearest emperor, was confined by sickness to his bed, when a furious tempest arose in the camp. The darkness which overspread the sky was more terrible than it would have been; it filled us with fear; and the incessant flashes of lightning seemed to prove that we knew the knowledge of all that passed in the general confusion. Immediately after the most violent claps of thunder, we heard a sudden cry, that the emperor was dead; and it soon appeared, that his chamberlain at a rage of grief, had set fire to the royal palace, a circumstance which gave rise to the report that Carus was killed by lightning. But, as far as we have been able to investigate the truth, his death was the natural effect of his disorder." 2

The vacancy of the throne was not produce disturbance. The by his two sons, who were named Carus and Numerian.

Carus was unanimously acknowledged as Roman emperors. The public expected that the successor of Carus would pursue his father's footsteps, and, without allowing the Persians to recover from their consternation, would advance sword in hand to the palaces of Susa and Ecbatana; 3 but the legions, however strong in numbers and discipline, were dismayed by the most abject superstition. Notwithstanding all the arts that were practised to disguise the manner of the late emperor's death, it was found impossible to remove the opinion of the multitude, and the power of opinion is irresistible. Places or persons struck with lightning were considered by the ancients with pious horror, as singularly devoted to the wrath of heaven. 4 An oracle was remembered, which marked the river Tigris as the boundary of the Roman empire. It was cowardly and terrified with the fate of Carus and with their own danger, called aloud on young Numerian to obey the will of the gods, and to lead them away from this inauspicious scene of war. The feeble emperor was unable to subdue their obstinate prejudice, and the Persians wondered at the unexpected retreat of a victorious army. 5

The intelligence of the mysterious fate of the late emperor was soon carried to the cities of Carus, from the frontiers of Persia to Rome; and the senate, as well as the provinces, congratulated the accession of the sons of Carus. These fortunate youths were strangers, however, to that consciousness of peculiar superiority, either of birth or of merit, which can alone render the possession of a throne easy, and as it was natural. Born and educated in a private station, the election of their father raised them at once to the rank of princes; and his death, which happened about sixteen months afterwards, left them the unexpected legacy of a vast empire. To sustain with temper this rapid elevation, an uncommon share of virtue and prudence was requisite; and Carus, the elder of the brothers, was more than commonly deficient in those qualities. In the lively character of the Gallic war, in the wrongs of the Senate, of Carinus, of the unfortunate youths, with whom he dealt, he most of himself, and was not disposed to flatter the emperor's vanity, nor was he less disposed to fill the emperor's heart with pride. He banished or put to death, the friends and counsellors whom his father had placed about him, to guide his inexperienced youth; and he persecuted with the meancst reverence his school-fellows and companions, who had not sufficiently respected the august majesty of the emperor. With the senators, Carus affected a lofty and regal demeanour, frequently declaring, that he designed to distribute their estates among the populace of Rome. From the drags of that populace, he selected his favourites, and even his ministers. The treasures, and whatever was left in the imperial table, was filled with singers, dancers, prostitutes, and all the various retinue of vice and folly. One of his door-keepers 1 intrusted with the government of the city. In the room of the praetorian prefect, whom he put to death, Carinus substituted one of the ministers of his late pleasure, and the place, though filled with oracles, or even a more infamous, title to favour, was invested with the consulsip. A confidential secretary, who had acquired uncommon skill in the art of forgery, delivered the indolent emperor, with his own consent, from the intruding of his name.

When the emperor Carus undertook the Persian war, he was induced, by motives of affection as well as policy, to secure the fortunes of his family, by leaving in the hands of his eldest son the armies and provinces of the west. The intelligence which he so readily received of the conduct of Carinus, filled him with the utmost shame and regret: nor had he conceded his resolution of satisfying the republic by a severe act of justice, and of adopting, in the place of an unworthy son, the brave and virtuous Constantius, who at that time was governor of Dalmatia. 2 But the elevation of Constantius was public, and of a grandeur such as even the father's death had released Carinus from the control of fear or decency, he displayed to the Romans the extravagances of Elagabalus, aggravated by the cruelty of Domitian. 3

1 Cassellius. 2 This word, so humble in its origin, has by a singular fortune risen into the title of the first great office of state in the monarchies of Europe. See Cassanobon and Salmisius, ad Hist. Aug. xii. 38. 3 It was a cause of grief to Carus, that his son Numerian was still too young to assume the government of the western provinces, and that he would have to entrust him rather to his brother Carinus. (Vopisc. in Cass.) — G. The title of Cassanobon, which he wears, and the number of his victories, I do not recollect, nor does the statue, which was preserved at Augustus once exhibited thirty six. Dion Cassius, l. iv. p. 781. — Cassius, in Hist. Aug. p. 164, 165. We are not acquainted with the animals which he calls archeleontes, others argoleontes: both corrections are very necessary. — See Priscus, Porph. viii. 8. 4 Vopiscus in Hist. Aug. p. 254. He calls him Carus, but the surname of the emperor is not often confounded with his name. 5 See Calpurnius, Epod. vii. 42. We may observe, that the spectacles of Praetorius, the first, and that the part of the circus was seconded by the historian. 6 See Vopiscus in Hist. Aug. p. 253. He calls him Carus, but the surname of the emperor is not often confounded with his name. 7 The philosopher Montaigne (Doris, l. vii. 6.) gives a very just and lively view of Roman magnificence in these spectacles.

The only merit of the administration of Carinus that history could record, or poetry celebrate, was the uncommon splendour with which, in his own and his brother's name, he exhibited the Roman games of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre. More than twenty years afterwards, when the wild Maze of Diocletian represented to the future emperor the fame and popularity of his magnificent predecessor, he acknowledged, that the reign of Carinus had indeed been a reign of pleasure. 2 But this vain prodigality, which the prudence of Diocletian might justly despise, was enjoyed with surprise and transports by the Roman people. The old idol of the citizens, recollecting the spectacles of former days, the triumphant pomp of Probus or Aurelian, and the secular games of the emperor Philip, acknowledged that they were all surpassed by the superior magnificence of Carinus. 3

3 Spectacles of Rome. The spectacles of Carinus may therefore be best illustrated by the observation of some particulars, which history has condescended to relate concerning those of his predecessors. If we confine ourselves solely to the hunting of wild beasts, however we may censure the vanity of the design or the cruelty of the execution, we are obliged to confess, that neither before nor since the time of the Romans, so much art and expense have ever been lavished for the amusement of the people. 1 By the order of Probus, a great quantity of large trees, torn up by the roots, were transplanted into the midst of the circus. The spacious and shady forest was immediately filled with a thousand ostriches, a thousand stags, a thousand falcons, a thousand deer, and a thousand wild boars; and all this variety of game was abandoned to the riotous impetuousness of the multitude. The tragedy of the succeeding day was spent in marvellous, and disserted with statistical number of lionesses, two hundred leopards, and three hundred bears. 7 The collection prepared by the young er Gordian for his triumph, and which his successor exhibited in the secular games, was less remarkable by the number than by the singularity of the animals. Twenty years afterwards, this display was again repeated, and the audience, the multitudes of spectators, the rare variety of the game, the astonishing strength with which nature has endowed the greater quadrupeds was admired in the rhinoceroses, the hippopotamus of the Nile, 4 and a majestick troop of thirty-two elephants. 8 While the populace gazed with stupid curiosity at the pile of thousand, the naturalists might observe the figure and properties of so many different species, transported from every part of the ancient world into the amphitheatre of Rome. But this accidental benefit, which science might derive from folly, is surely insufficient to justify such a wanton abuse of the public property, and the brutal multiplication of the savage of the torrid zone. The most ancient historians have praised, and the moderns are beheld with amazement, the wonder, and art, and expense with which the inhabitants of Madagascar.
his destined place without trouble or confusion. Nothing was omitted which, in any manner, could be subservient to the convenience and pleasure of the spectators. They were protected from the sun and rain by an ample canopy, occasionally drawn over their heads. The air was continually refreshed by the playing of fountains, and profusely impregnated by the grateful influence of the fragrant blossoms of the flowers that adorned the arena, or stage, was strewed with the finest sand, and successively assumed the most different forms. At one moment it seemed to rise out of the earth, like the garden of the Hesperides, and was afterwards broken into the rocks and caverns of Thrace. The subterranean channels were devoted or to the supply of water; and what had just before appeared a level plain, might be suddenly converted into a wide lake, covered with armed vessels, and replenished with the monsters of the deep. In the decoration of these scenes, the Roman emperors displayed their wealth and liberality; and we read on various occasions, that the whole furniture of the amphitheatre consisted either of silver, or of gold, or of amber. The poet who describes the games of Carinus, in the character of a shepherd, attracted to the capital by the fame of their magnificence, affirms, that the nets designed as a defence against the wild beasts, were of gold wire; that the porpoises were well gilded, and that the belt or circlet which divided the several ranks of spectators from each other, was studded with a precious Mosaic of beautiful stones.

A.D. 294. In the midst of this glittering pageant, the emperor Carinus, secure of his fortune, enjoyed the acclamations of the people, the flattery of his courtiers, and the homage of those, who, for want of a more essential merit, were reduced to celebrate the divine graces of his person. In the same hour, but at the distance of nine hundred miles from Rome, his brother expired; and a sudden revolution was produced in the hands of a stranger the sceptre of the house of Carus.

Return of Numen

The sons of Carus never saw each other after their father's death. The army from Persia, rangements which their new situation required, were probably deferred till the return of the younger brother to Rome, where a triumph was decreed to the young emperors, for the glorious success of the Persian war. It is uncertain whether they intended to divide between them the administration, or the provinces, of the empire, but it is very unlikely that their union would have proved of any long duration, considering this announcement to the people by the opposition of characters. In the most corrupt of times, Carinus was unworthy to live: Numerian deserved to reign in a happier period. His amiable manners and gentle virtues secured him, as soon as they became known, the regard and affections of the public. He possessed the elegant accomplishments of a poet and orator, which dignify as well as adorn the humblest and the most exalted station. His eloquence, however it was applauded by the senate, was formed not so much on the model of Cicero, as on that of the modern declaimers; but in an age very far from being desirous of orators, he was esteemed, for the pride of the曦s, the most celebrated of his contemporaries, and still remained the friend of his rivals; a circumstance which evinces either the goodness of his disposition, or the rarity of his genius. But the talents of Numerian were rather of the contemplative than of the active kind. When his father's elevation reluctantly forced him from the shade of retirement, neither his temper nor his pursuits had qualified him for the command of armies, and his constitution was destroyed by the Persian war; and he had contracted, from the heat of the climate, such a weakness in his eyes, as obliged him, in the course of a long retreat, to confine himself to the solitude and darkness of a tent or litter. The administration of all affairs, civil as well as military, therefore devolved on his brother, a man of such prudence, who to the power of his important office, added the honour of being father-in-law to Numerian. The imperial pavilion was strictly guarded by his most trusty adherents; and during many days, Aper delivered to the army the supposed mandates of their invisible sovereign.

It was not till eight months after the death of Numerian, that Carus, the Roman army, returning by slow marches from the banks of the Tigris, arrived on those of the Thracian Bosphorus. The legions halted at Chalecedon in Asia, while the eastern prisoners were transferred over to Hesirea, on the European side of the Propontis. But a report circulated through the camp, at first in secret whispers, and at length in loud clamours, of the emperor's death, and of the presumption of his ambitious minister, who still exercised the sovereign power in the name of a prince who was no more. The imprudence of the soldiers could not long support a state of suspense. With rude curiosity they broke into the imperial tent, and discovered only the corpse of Numerian. The gradual decline of his health might have induced them to believe that his death was natural; but the concealment of his death was interpreted as an evidence of guilt, and the measures which Aper had taken to secure his election, became the immediate occasion of his ruin. Yet, even in the transport of their rage and grief, the troops observed a regular proceeding, which proves how firmly discipline had been re-established by the martial successors of Gallienus. A general assembly of the army was appointed to be held at Chalecedon, whither Aper was transported in chains, as a prisoner and criminal. A vacant tribunal was erected in the midst of the camp, and the generals and tribunes formed a great military council. They soon A.D. 294. This election of the choice had fallen on Diocletian, com-mandant of the domestics or body-guards, who was the person who the most capable of revenging the fate of the late emperor. The future fortunes of the candidate depended on the chance or conduct of the present hour. Conscious that the station which he had filled, exposed him to some suspicions, Diocletian ascended the tribunal, and raising his eyes towards the sun, made a solemn profession of his own innocence, in the presence of that all-seeing deity. Then, assuming the tone of a sovereign and a judge, he declared that he should be obliged to hold the multi-ple, that their vote was a sacred and a sacred resolution, the result of the action of the tribunal. "This man," said he, "is the murderer of Numerian;" and, without giving him time to enter on a dangerous justification, drew Calpurnius Scipio, Eclog. viii. 64, 73. These lines are curious, and the whole poem has been of infinite use to Maffei. Calpurnius, as well as Martial, 'see his first book,' was a poet; but when they de- scribed a subject of architecture, they were not content with the general idea, but evinced a preference for the grandeur of the poet, and to those of the Romans. his sword, and buried it in the breast of the unfortunate prefect. A charge supported by such decisive proof, was admitted without contradiction, and the legions, with repeated ejaculations, acknowledged the justice and authority of the new emperor, Diocletian.2

Defeat and death. Before we enter upon the memorable reign of Carinus, we shall be proper to punish and dismiss the unworthy brother of Numri serus. Carinus possessed arms and treasures sufficient to support his legal title to the empire. But his personal virtues founded every advantage of birth and situation. The most faithful servants of the father despised the incapacity, and dreaded the cruel arrogance, of the son. The hearts of the people were engaged in favour of his rival, and even the senate was inclined to proclaim a nephew to a tyrant. The arts of Diocletian inflamed the general discontent; and the winter was employed in secret intrigues, and open preparations for a civil war. In the May, the forces of the east and of the west encountered each other in the plains of Margus, a small city of Mysia, in the neighbourhood of the Danube.3 The troops, so lately returned from the Persian war, had acquired their glory at the expense of health and numbers, nor were they in a condition to contend with the unexhausted strength of the legions of Europe. Their ranks were broken, and, for a moment, viewed with despair. The purple ceased to reign. But the advantage which Carinus had obtained by the valor of his soldiers, he quickly lost by the infidelity of his officers. A tribune, whose wife he had seduced, seized the opportunity of revenge, and by a single blow extinguished civil discord in the blood of the adulterer.4

CHAPTER XIII.

The reign of Diocletian and his three associates, Maximian, Galerius, and Constantius. — General re-establishment of order and tranquillity. — The Persian war, victory, and triumph. — The new form of administration. — Abdication and retirement of Diocletian and Maximian.

As the reign of Diocletian was more illustrious than that of any of his predecessors, so was his birth more abject and obscure. The strong claims of merit and of violence had frequently superseded the idea of purity of blood; but a distinct line of separation was hitherto preserved between the free and the servile part of mankind. The parents of Diocletian had been slaves in the house of Anulinus, a Roman senator; nor was he himself distinguished by any other name, than that derived from a small town in Dalmatia, from which his mother deduced her origin.5 It is, however, probable, that his father obtained the freedom of the family, and that he soon acquired an office of scribe, which was commonly exercised by persons of his condition.6 Favourable oracles, or rather the consciousness of superior merit, prompted his aspiring son to pursue the profession of arms and the hopes of fortune; and it would be extremely curious to observe the gradation of arts and accidents which enabled him in the end to fulfill those oracles, and to display that merit to the world. Diocletian was successively promoted to the government of Dalmatia, the province of the old Illyrians, and the important command of the guards of the palace. He distinguished his abilities in the Persian war; and, after the death of Numerian, the slave, by the confession and judgment of his rivals, was declared the most worthy of the imperial throne. The advantages of situation, the energy of his adversary, the zeal, and the fierceness of his colleague Maximian, has affected to cast suspicions on the personal courage of the emperor Diocletian.7 It would not be easy to persuade us of the cowardice of a soldier of fortune, who acquired and preserved the esteem of the legions, as well as the favour of so many warlike princes. Yet even calumny is sagacious enough to discover and to attack the most vulnerable part. The valor of Diocletian was never found inadequate to his duty, or to the occasion; but he appears not to have possessed the dashing and generous spirit of a hero, who dare danger and fame, disdains artifice, and boldly challenges the allegiance of his equals. His abilities were useful rather than splendid; a vigorous mind, improved by the experience and study of mankind; dexterity and application in business; a judicious mixture of liberality and severity: these virtues, in fact, found dissolution under the disguise of military frankness; steadiness to pursue his ends; flexibility to vary his means; and, above all, the great art of submitting his own passions, as well as those of others, to the interest of his ambition, and of colouring his ambition with the most splendid pretences of justice and public utility. Like Augustus, Diocletian may be considered as the founder of a new empire. Like the adopted son of Caesar, he was distinguished as a statesman rather than as a warrior; nor did either of those principles employ force, whenever their purpose could be effected by policy.

The victory of Diocletian was the more remarkable for its singular mildness. A victory, people accustomed to applaud the clemency of the conqueror, if the usual punishments of death, exile, and confiscation, were inflected, was a proof of temper and equity, beheld, with the most pleasing astonishment, a civil war, the flames of which were extinguished in the field of battle. Diocletian received into his confidence Aristobulus, the principal minister of the house of Carus, respected the lives, the honors, and the fortunes of the former emperors, and continued in their respective stations the greater number of the servants of Carinus.4 It is not improbable that motives of prudence might assist the humanity of the able Dahmatian; of these servants, many had purchased his favour by secret treachery; in others, he esteemed their grateful fidelity to an unfortunate master. The discerning judgment of Aurelian, of Probus, and of Carus, had filled the several departments of the state and army with officers of approved merit, whose removal would have injured the public service; Diocletian, therefore, confirmed these em- sor. Such a conduct, however, displayed to the Roman world the fairest prospect of the new reign, and the emperor affected to confirm this favourable prepossession, by declaring, that, among all the virtues of his predecessors, he was the most ambitious of imitat- ing the humane philosophy of Marcus Antoninus.8

I. p. 293); and the original name of the fortunate slave, was probably Dacius; he first lengthened it to the Greekian harmony of Dacius; and at length to the Roman ma- ners of Dacianus. He likewise assumed the patronimic name of Viridius.

6. Lauretius (or whoever was the author of the little treatise De Mortibus Ercutiorum) accuses Diocletian of indignity in two places, c. 7. 8. In chap. 9, he says of him, "erat in omni tumultu metios et infidelis." (see有更好的訳)

7. In this enumerm, Aurelius Victor seems to convey a just, though indirect, censure of the cruelty of Constantius, and of the Fruit, that Aristobulus remained perfect of the city, and that he ended with Diocletian, the consuls which he had commenced with Carinus.

The first considerable action of his reign seemed to evince his sincerity as well as his moderation. After the example of Marcus, he gave himself a college of Caesars, and Marcus had discharged a debt of private gratitude, at the expense, indeed, of the happiness of the state. By associating a friend and a fellow-soldier to the labours of government, Diocletian, in a time of public danger, provided for the defence both of the east and of the west. Maximian was born a peasant, and in the territory of the Sabines. Ignorant of letters, careless of laws, the rusticity of his appearance and manners still betrayed in the most elevated fortune the meanness of his extraction. War was the only art which he professed. In a long course of service, he had distinguished himself on every front of the empire; and though his military talents were formed to obey rather than to command, though, perhaps, he never attained the skill of a consummate general, he was capable, by his valour, constancy, and experience, of executing the most arduous undertakings. Nor were the vices of the Greatian period more venal to his conduct. In his attacks, he showed the fury of a lion; in his retreat, the fearlessness of a bear. But with all the severity of his stern colleague, and enjoyed the comparison of a golden and an iron age, which was universally applied to their opposite maxims of government. Notwithstanding the difference of their characters, the two Caesars, though tamed, on the throne, that friendship which they had contracted in a private station. The haughty turbulent spirit of Maximian, so fatal afterwards to himself and to the public peace, was accustomed to respect the genius of Diocletian, and confessed the ascendant of reason over brutal violence. From a motive either of pride or superstition, the two emperors assumed the titles, the one of Jovius, the other of Herculeus. Whilst the motion of the world (such was the language of their vocal orators) was maintained by the all-seeing wisdom of Jupiter, the invincible arm of Hercules purged the earth from ignorance and vice.

But even the omnipotence of Jovius and Herculeus was insufficient to sustain the weight of the public administration. The prudence of Diocletian discovered, that the empire, assailed on every side by the barbarians, required on every side the presence of a great army, and of an emperor. With this view, he resolved once more to divide his unwieldy power, and with the inferior title of Caesars, to confer on two generals of approved merit an equal share of the sovereign authority. Galerius, surmounting Armentarius, from his original profession of a simple soldier, enrolled himself in the territory of the Sabines. The next person in his government had acquired the denomination of Chlorus, and were the two persons invested with the second honours of the imperial purple. In describing the country, extraction, and manners of Herculeus, we have already delineated those of Galerius, who was often, and perhaps, not improperly, styled the younger Maximian. Though in many instances both of virtue and ability, he has appeared to have possessed a manifest superiority over the elder. The birth of Constantius was less obscure than that of his colleagues. Eutropius, his father, was one of the most considerable nobles of the province of Gaul, the territory of the Sabines. Although the youth of Constantius had been spent in arms, he was endowed with a mild and amiable disposition, and the popular voice had long since acknowledged him worthy of the rank which he at last attained. To strengthen the bonds of political, by those of domestic, union, each of the emperors assumed the character of a father to one of the Caesars, Diocletian to Galerius, and Maximian to Constantius; and each, obliging them to repudiate their former wives, bestowed his daughter in marriage on his adopted son. These four princes distributed among themselves the general extent of the Roman empire. The defence of Gaul, Spain, Britain, and the province of Dacia, was intrusted to Constantius; Gaul was stationed on the banks of the Rhine; the Danube, as the safeguard of the Illyrian provinces. Italy and Africa were considered as the department of Maximian; and for his peculiar portion, Diocletian reserved Thrace, Egypt, and the rich countries of Asia. Every one was sovereign within his own jurisdiction; but their united authority extended over the whole monarchly, and each of them was prepared to assist his colleagues with his counsels of presence. The Caesars, in their exalted rank, received the majesty of emperors, and the three younger princes irrevocably acknowledged, by their gratitude and obedience, the common parent of their fortunes. The suspicious jealousy of power found not any place among them; and the singular happiness of their union has been traced. A concert of motives, pure and just, was regulated and maintained by the skilful hand of the first artist.

This important measure was not carried into execution till about six years after the association of Maximian, and that interval of time had not been without some illustrations of its operation. But we have preferred, for the sake of perspicuity, first to describe the more perfect form of Diocletian's government, and afterwards to relate the actions of his reign, following rather the natural order of the events, than the dates of a very doubtful chronology.

The first exploit of Maximian, though it is mentioned in a few words by our State of theфанописи, it is only in the modern Greeks that Tllamnoud can discover his appellation of Chlorus. Any remarkable degree of patience seems inconsistent with the conduct of Maximian. He, however, appears to have been incapable of a deception, or of error, and he was perhaps too severe to the unhappy provincials, whom he might easily infer that Maximian was more desirous of being considered a soldier, than as a man of letters: and it is in this manner that we can often account for a custom or an action.

Fulmin, the grandson of Constantius, boasts that his family was derived from the warlike Maximian. Musopogeon, p. 315. The Dardania, p. 320. Maximians dwell on the other side of the Black Sea.

The general name of Bagaudae (in the signification of rebels) continued till the fifth century in Gaul. Some critics derive it from eral insurrection; very similar to those, which in the fourteenth century successively afflicted both France and England.\(^a\) It should seem, that very many of those institutions, referred by an easy solution to the feudal system, are derived from the Céltic barbarians. When Caesar subdued the Gauls, that great nation was reduced to the condition of men; the clergy, the nobility, and the common people. The first governed by superstition, the second by arms, but the third and last was not of any weight or account in their public councils. It was very natural for these pious men, oppressed by these apprehensive of injuries, to invite the protection of some powerful chief, who acquired over their persons and property the most absolute right as, among the Greeks and Romans, a master exercised over his slaves.\(^b\) The greatest part of the nation was gradually reduced into a state of servitude; compelled to perpetual labour on the estates of the Gallic nobles, and confined to the soil, either by the real weight of fetters, or by the no less cruel and forcible restraints of the laws. During the long series of troubles which afflicted Gaul, from the reign of Gallicius to that of Diocletian, the condition of these peasants was peculiarly miserable; and they experienced at once the complicated tyranny of their masters, of the barbarians, of the soldiers, and of the officers of the revenue.\(^c\)

Their rebellion. Their patience was at last provoked. Gaul into despair. On every side they rose in multitudes, and sought to escape with resistless and irresistible fury. The ploughman became a foot-soldier, the shepherd mounted on horseback, the deserted villages and open towns were abandoned to the flames, and the ravages of the peasants equalled those of the fiercest barbarians.\(^d\) They asserted the natural rights of men, but they asserted those rights with the most savage cruelty. The Gallic nobles, justly dreading their revenge, either took refuge in the fortified cities, or fled from the wild scene of anarchy. The peasants reigned without control; and two of their most daring leaders had the folly and rashness to surn the imperial crowns.\(^e\) Their power soon expired at the approach of the legions. The strength of union and discipline obtained an easy victory over a licentious and divided multitude.\(^f\) To severe retaliation was inflicted on the peasants whose villages had been in part destroyed and their inhabitants dispersed. They were not supposed to believe their former leaders.\(^g\) Illyrians and Amandus, were christians, or to insinuate, that the rebellion, as it happened in the time of Luther, was occasioned by the abuse of those benevolent principles of Christianity, which inculcate the natural freedom of mankind.

A.D. 306. Maximian had no sooner recovered Gaul from the hands of the peasants, than he lost Brita in by the usurpation of Carausius. Ever since the rash but successful enterprise of the Franks under the reign of Probus, their daring countrymen had constructed squadrons of light belligerines, in which they incessantly ravaged the provinces adjacent to the ocean.\(^h\) To repel these desultory insurrections, it was found necessary to create a naval power; and the judicious measure was prosecuted with prudence and vigour. Gessoricum, or Boulogne, in the straits of the British channel, was chosen as the base for the new fleet; and the command of it was intrusted to Carausius, a Menapian of the meanest origin,\(^i\) but who had long signalized his skill as a pilot, and his valour as a soldier. The integrity of the new admiral corresponded not with his abilities. When the German pirates sailed from their own shores erected at their own expense, as they did, the natives of the island, that their work was without the consent of the people which they had acquired. The wealth of Carausius was, on this occasion, very justly considered as an evidence of his guilt; and Maximian had already given orders for his death. But the crafty Menapian foresaw and prevented the severity of the emperor. By his liberality he had attached to his fortunes the fleet which he commanded, and secured the barbarians in his interest. From the port of Boulogne he sailed over to Britain, persuaded the legion, and the auxiliaries which manned that island, to embrace his party; and boldly assuming, with the imperial purple, the title of Augustus, defied the justice and the arms of his injured sovereign.\(^j\)

By seizing the fleet of Boulogne, Carausius deprived his master of the means of pursuit and revenge. And then, when a vast expense of time and labour, a new armament was launched into the water, the Emperor was informed of the defection of the subject towns, which were easily bailed and defeated by the veteran sailors of the usurper. This disappointed effort was soon productive of a treaty of peace. Diocletian and his colleague, who justly dreaded the enterprising spirit of Carausius, resigned to him the sovereignty of Britain, and reluctantly admitted their pernicious example was reserved for the imperial honours. 3

But the adoption of the two Caesars restored new vigour to the Roman arms; and while the Rhine was guarded by the presence of Maximian, his brave associate Constantius assumed the conduct of the British war. His first enterprise was against the important place of Boulogne. A suspenseful move, raised across the entrance of the harbour, intercepted all hopes of relief.

A.D. 292.

The town surrendered after an obstinate defence; and a considerable part of the naval strength of Carausius fell into the hands of the besiegers. During the three years which Constantius continued the pursuit of this cautionary work of Britain, he secured the coast of Gaul, invaded the country of the Franks, and deprived the usurper of the assistance of those powerful allies.

A.D. 294.

Before the preparations were finished, death struck Constantius received the intelligence of the tyrant's death, and it was considered as a sure presage of the approaching victory. The servants of Carausius imitated the example of treason, which he had given. He was murdered by his first minister Allectus, and the assassin succeeded to his power and to his danger. But he possessed not equal abilities, energy, or devotion to the cause, was not able to secure the obedience of his subjects, or to govern with such vigilance, with anxiety to terror, the opposite shores of the continent, already filled with arms, with troops, and with vessels; for Constantius had very prudently divided his forces, that he might likewise divide the attention and resistance of the enemy. The attack was at length made by the principal squadron, which, under the command of the prefect Asclepiodatus, an officer of distinguished merit, had been assembled in the mouth of the Seine. So imperfect in those times was the art of navigation, that oarsmen had to bear the charge of the ship, and were required to set sail with a side-wind, and on a stormy day. The weather proved favourable to their enterprise. Under the cover of a thick fog, they escaped the fleet of Allectus, which had been stationed off the Isle of Wight to receive them, landed in safety on some part of the western coast, and convinced the Britons, that a superiority of naval strength will not always protect their country from a foreign invasion. Asclepiodatus had no sooner disembarked the imperial troops, than he set fire to his ships; and, as the expedition proved fortunate, his conduct was universally admired. The usurper had possession of his residence near London, to expect the formidable attack of Constantius, who commanded in person the fleet of Boulogne; but the descent of a new enemy required his immediate presence in the west. He performed this long march in so precipitate a manner, that he encountered the whole force of the prefect with a small body of harassed and disheartened troops. The engagement was soon terminated by the total defeat and death of Allectus; a single battle, as it has often happened, decided the fate of this great island; and when Constantius landed on the shores of Kent, he found them covered with obe- dience and acquiescence. His acquisitions were unanimous; and the virtues of the conqueror may induce us to believe, that they sincerely rejoiced in a revolution, which, after a separation of ten years, restored Britain to the body of the Roman empire.

Britain had now but domestic enemies to dread; the名义 of the emperor was respected, the public tranquility was safe; the soldiers and the adherents of the emperors preserved their fidelity, and the troops their discipline, the incursions of the naked savages of Scotland or Ireland could never materially affect the safety of the province. The peace of the continent, and the defence of the principal rivers which bounded the empire, were objects of far greater difficulty and importance. The policy of Diocletian, which inspired the councils of his associates, provided for the public tranquility, by encouraging a spirit of dissension among the barbarians, and by strengthening the fortifications of the Roman limit. In the east he fixed a line of camps from Egypt to the Persian dominions; for every province, he instituted an adequate number of stationary troops, commanded by their respective officers, and supplied with every kind of arms, from the new arsenals which he had formed at Antioch, Eunusa, and Damascus. 4 Nor was the preoccupation of the emperor less watchful against the well-known valour of the barbarians of Europe. From the mouth of the Rhine to that of the Danube, the ancient camps, towns, and citadels, were diligently re-established, and, in the most exposed places, new ones were skillfully constructed; the strictest vigilance was introduced among the garrisons of the frontier, and every precaution was taken to fortify the long chain of fortifications firm and impenetrable. 5

A barrier so respectable was seldom violated, and the barbarians often turned against each other their disappointed rage. The Goths, the Vandals, the Huns, the Gepidae, the Burgundians, the Alains, the Huns, the Ostrogoths, the Franks, and their numbers, and the variety of destructive hostilities, and whosoever, or who, their vengeance, they vanquished the enemies of Rome. The subjects of Diocletian enjoyed the bloody spectacle, and congratulated each other, that the mischiefs of civil war were now experienced only by the barbarians. 6

Notwithstanding the policy of Diocletian, it was impossible to maintain an equal and undisturbed tranquillity during a reign of twenty years, and along the frontier of many hundred miles. Sometimes the barbarians suspended their domestic animosities, and the relaxed vigilance of the garrisons sometimes gave a passage to their strength or dexterity. Whenever the provinces were invaded, Diocletian conducted himself with that calm dignity which he always affected or possessed; reserved his presence for such occasions as were worthy of his inter- ter, never exposed his person or reputation to any unnecessary danger, counted his success by every means that prudent counsel could suggest, and displayed, with ostentation, the consequences of his victory. In wars of a more difficult nature, and more doubtful event, he employed the rough valour of Maximian; and that faithful soldier was content to ascribe his own victories to the wise counsels and auspicious influences of his benefactor. But after the adoption of the two Caesars, the emperors themselves, reduced by the long labors of an active life, devolved on their adopted sons the defence of the Danube and of the Rhine. The vigilant Galerius was never reduced to the necessity of vanquishing an army of barbarians on the Roman territory. The brave and active Constantius delivered Gaul from a very furious attack of the Alemanni; and its victory, the acquisition of Maximinian in the western parts of Africa; but it appears by the event, that the progress of his arms was rapid and decisive, that he vanquished the fiercest barbarians of Mauritania, and that he removed them from the mountains, whose inaccessible strength had inspired them with a lasting confidence and habituated them to a life of rapine and violence. Diocletian, on his side, opened the campaign in Egypt by the siege of Alexandria, Conduct of Dio- cut off the aqueducts which conveyed the waters of the Nile into every quarter of that influence of Egypt. From the Sarmatians and the Alemanni, the expedition of Julian was impeded by the sallies of the besieged multitude, he pushed his reiterated attacks with caution and vigour. After a siege of eight months, Alexandria, wasted by the sword and by fire, implored the clemency of the conqueror; but it experienced the full extent of his severity. The enemy thousands of the citizen perished in a prosaic slaughter, and there were few obnoxious persons in Egypt who escaped a sentence either of death, or at least of exile. The fate of Busiris and of Coptos was still more melancholy than that of Alex- indra; and these populous cities, which were distinguished by its antiquity, the latter engulfed by the passage of the Indian trade, were utterly destroyed by the arms and by the severe order of Diocletian. The character of the Egyptian nation, insensible to kindness, but extremely susceptible of fear, could alone justify this excessive rigour. The seditions of Alexandria and other cities, which were very considerable, their disposition was warlike, their weapons rude and inoffensive. Yet in the public disorders these barbarians, whom antiquity, shocked with the deformity of their figure, had almost excluded from the human species, presumed to rank themselves among the enemies of Rome. Such had been the unworthy allies of the Egyptians; and while the attention of the state was engaged in more serious wars, their vexatious inroads might again harass the repose of the province. With a view of opposing to the Barbarians, whom they had published in the wood, the Nobatae, or people of Nubia, to remove from their ancient habitations in the deserts of Libya, and resigned to them an extensive but unprotected territory above Syene and the cataracts of the Nile, with the stipulation, that they should ever respect and guard the frontier of the empire. The treaty long subsisted; and till the establishment of Christianity introduced stricter notions of religious worship, it was annually ratified by a solemn sacrifice in the isle of Elephantine, in which the Romans, as well as the barbarians, adored the same visible or invisible powers of the universe.

At the same time that Diocletian chastised the past crimes of the Egyptians, he provided for their future spire them with confidence to rebel against the empire. But if Dioctetian had been convinced of the reality of that valuable art, far from extinguishing the memory, he would have converted the operation of it to the bencfit of the public revenue. It is much more likely, that his good sense discovered to him the futility of these pretended, and that he was desirous of preserving the reason and fortunes of his subjects from the mischievous pursuit. It may be remarked, that

Novelty and pro These ancient books, so liberally ascribed of that art, ed to Pythagoras, to Solomon, or to Hermes, were the pious frauds of more recent adpts. In these monuments had appeared the abuse of chemistry. In that immense register, where Pliny has deposited the discoveries, the arts, and the errors of mankind, there is not the least mention of the transmutation of metals; and the persecution of Dio-cletian is the first authentic event in the history of alchemy, that could discredit that vain science over the globe. Congenial to the avarice of the human heart, it was studied in China as in Europe, with equal eagerness, and with equal success. The darkness of the middle ages assured a favourable reception to every tale of wonder, and the revival of learning gave new vigour to those congested more specious arts of deception. Philosophy, with the air of experience, has at length banished the study of alchemy; and the present age, however desirous of riches, is content to seek them by the humbler means of commerce and industry.

The Persian war was immediately followed by the Persian war. It was reserved for the reign of Dioctetian to vanquish that powerful nation, and to extort a confession from the successors of Artaxerxes, of the superior majesty of the Roman empire.

Tiridates of Armenia, who had observed under the reign of Valerian, that Armenia was subdued by the perfidy and the arms of the Persians, and that, after the assassination of Chosroes, his son Tiridates, the infant heir of the monarchy, was saved by the fidelity of his friends, and educated under the protection of the emperor. Tiridates derived from his exile such advantages as he could never have obtained on the throne of Armenia; the early knowledge of adversity, of mankind, and of the Roman discipline. He signalized his youth by deeds of valour, and displayed a matchless dexterity, as well as strength, in every martial exercise, and even in the humane contests of the Olympic games. Those qualities were more nobly exerted in the defence of his benefactor Liciunus. That officer, in the sedition which occasioned the death of Probus, was exposed to the most imminent danger, and the enraged soldiers were forcing their way into his tent, when they were checked by the single arm of the Armenian prince. The gratitude of Tiridates contributed still more to his elevation. For, on every station the friend and companion of Galerius, and the merit of Galerius, long before he was raised to the dignity of Caesar, had been known and esteemed by Dioctetian. In the third year of that emperor's reign, Tiridates was invested with the kingdom of Armenia. The duration of the sovereignty of the Persian was not less than thirty years.

When Tiridates appeared the most powerful prince in the world, he was received with this restoration to an unaffected transport of joy and loyalty, by the throne of Armenia.

During twenty-six years, the country had experienced the real and imaginary hardships of a foreign yoke. The Persian monarchs adorned their new conquest with magnificent buildings; but these regiments had been the work of the people, and were abhorred as badges of State of the conquest. The apprehension of a revolt had inspired the most rigorous precautions; oppression had been aggravated by insult, and the consciousness of the public hatred had been productive of every misfortune which it still more cruelly exposed. We have already remarked the intolertor spirit of the Ma-gian religion. The statues of the deified kings of Armenia, and the sacred images of the sun and moon, were broke in pieces by the zeal of the conqueror; and the perpetual fire of Ormuze was kindled and preserved upon an altar which acknowledged the name of Bagavan. It was natural, that a people brought by so many injuries should rise in arms with zeal in the cause of their independence, their religion, and their hereditary sovereignty. The torrent bore down every obstacle, and the Persian garrisons retreated before its fury. The nobility of Armenia flew to the standard of Tiridates, all alleging their past merit, offering their future service, and soliciting from the new king those honours and rewards from which they had been excluded with disdain under the foreign government.

The command of the army was bestowed on Artavasdes, whose father had saved the infancy of Tiridates, and whose family had been mas-sacrificed for that generous action. The brother of Artavasdes obtained the government of a province. One of the first military dignities was conferred on the

The mouth of a large mouth was a common defect among the Armenians.

As the desert of Sogdiana. Having incurred the displeasure of his master, Mango, with his followers, retired to the banks of the Oxus, and implored the protection of Sapor. The emperor of China could not the less have desired to maintain the rights of sovereignty. The Persian monarch pleaded the laws of hospitality, and with some difficulty avoided a war, by the promise that he would banish Mango to the uttermost parts of the west; a punishment, as he described it, not less dreadful than death itself. Armenia was considered as an exiled and a large district, assigned to the Scevthian hordes, on which they might feed their flocks and herds, and remove their encampment from one place to another, according to the different seasons of the year. They were employed to repel the invasions of the Thibetan leaders, after weighing the obligations and injuries which he had received from the Persian monarch, resolved to abandon his party. The Armenian prince, who was well acquainted with the merit as well as power of Mango, treated him with distinguished respect; and, by admitting him into his confidence, acquired a brave and faithful servant, who contributed very effectually to his restoration. The Persians revered the enthralling power of Tiridates. He not only expelled the enemies of his family and country, and returned to the court of the emperors, but in the succession of his reign he carried his arms, or at least his incursions, into the heart of Assyria. The historian, who has preserved the name of Tiridates from oblivion, celebrates, with a degree of national enthusiasm, his personal prowess; and, in the spirit of eastern republicanism, describes him as the granary and the elephants that fell beneath his invincible arm. It is from other information that we discover the distinct state of the Persian monarchy, to which the king of Armenia was indebted for some of his advantages. The throne was divided by the ambition of the Sung and Harz; and Hormuz, after exerting without success the strength of his own party, had recourse to the dangerous assistance of the barbarians who inhabited the banks of the Caspian sea. The civil war was, however, soon terminated, either by a victory, or by a reconciliation; and the former was universally acknowledged. The king of Persia, directed his whole force against the foreign enemy. The contest then became too unequal; nor was the valour of the hero able to withstand the power of the monarch. Tiridates, a second time expelled from the throne of Armenia, once more took refuge in Sogdiana, and established his authority over the revolted province; and loudly complaining of the protection afforded by the Romans to rebels and fugitives, aspired to the conquest of the east.

Neither prudence nor honour could permit the emperors to forsake the cause of the Armenian king, and it was resolved to exert the force of the empire in the Persian war. Diocletian, with the calm dignity which he constantly assumed, fixed his own station in the city of Antioch, from whence he prepared and directed the military operations. The conduct of the legions was intrusted to the Marcellinus, or some other soldier of proven courage, who, for that important purpose, was removed from the banks of the Danube to those of the Euphrates. The armies soon encountered each other in the defeat of Galeplains of Mesopotamia, and two battles were fought with various and doubtful success; but the third determined the eternal decisive battle; and the Roman army received a total overthrow, which is attributed to the rashness of Galerius, who, with an inconsiderable body of troops, attacked the innumerable host of the Persians. But the consideration of the country that was the scene of action, has suggested another reason for his defeat. The same gendarme on which Galerius was vanquished, had been rendered memorable by the death of Crassus, and the slaughter of ten legions. It was a plain of more than sixty miles, which extended from the hills of Carthage to the Euphrates; a smooth and barren surface of sandy desert, without a hillock, without a tree, and without a spring of fresh water. The steady infantry of the Romans, fainting with heat and thirst, could neither hope for victory if they preserved their ranks, nor break their ranks without exposing themselves to the most terrible disaster. The Persians were not only wonderfully encompassed by the superior numbers, harassed by the rapid evolutions, and destroyed by the arrows of the barbarian cavalry. The king of Armenia had signalized his valour in the battle, and acquired personal glory by the public misfortune. He was pursued far as the Euphrates, and his head was wounded, and it appeared impossible for him to escape the victorious enemy. In this extremity Tiridates embraced the only refuge which he saw before him; he dismounted and plunged into the stream. His armour was heavy, the river very deep, and at those parts at least half a mile in breadth. The water was so strong and turbulent that he reached in safety the opposite bank. With regard to the Roman general, we are ignorant of the circumstances of his escape; but when he returned to Antioch, Diocletian received him, not his exception by the title of the emperor, but as a friend and colleague, with the indignation of an offended sovereignty. The most industrious of men, clothed in his purple, but humbled by the sense of his fault and misfortune, was obliged to follow the emperor's chariot above a mile on foot, and to exhibit before the whole court, the spectacle of a captive emperor, reduced to subjection.

As soon as Diocletian had indulged his private resentment, and asserted the majesty of supreme power, he yielded to the submissive entreaties of the Caesars, and permitted him to receive his own honour, as well as that of the Roman arms. In the room of the unhappy warlike powers of Asia, which had most probably served in the first expedition, a second army was drawn from the veterans and new levies of the Illyrian frontier, and a considerable body of Gothic auxiliaries were taken into the imperial pay. At the head of a chosen army of twenty-five thousand men, Galerius again passed the Euphrates.

tes; but, instead of exposing his legions in the open plains of Mesopotamia, he advanced through the mountains of Armenia, where he found the inhabitants devoted to his cause, and the country as favourable to the operations of infantry, as it was inconvenient for the movements of the cavalry. Adversity had confirmed the spirit of the Armenians, elated by success, were become so negligent and remiss, that in the moment when they least expected it, they were surprised by the active conduct of Galerius, who, attended only by two horsemen, had with his own eyes secretly examined the state and position of the enemy. A surprise, especially in the night-time, was for the most part fatal to a Persian army. "Their horses were tied, and generally shackled, to prevent their running away; and if an alarm happened, a Persian had his housing to fix, his horse to bridle, and his croupelet to put on, before he could mount." On this occasion, the impetuous attack of the barbarymen spread disorder and dismay over the camp of the barbarians. A slight resistance was followed by a dreadful carnage, and, in the general confusion, the wounded monarch (for Narses commanded his armies in person) fled towards the deserts of Media. His sumptuous tents, and those of his satraps, afforded all that was required to furnish him with the means of retreat; it is mentioned, which proves the rustie but martial ignorance of the legions in the elegant superfluities of life. A bag of shining leather, filled with pearls, fell into the hands of a private soldier; he carefully preserved the bag, but he threw away its contents, judging that whatever was of use could not possibly be of value. The principal loss of his royal captive, Narses was of a much more affecting nature. Several of his wives, his sisters, and children, who had attended the army, were made captives in the defeat. But though the character of Galerius had in general very high respectability with that of Alexander, he imitated, after his victory, the amiable behaviour of the Macedonian towards the family of Darius. The wives and children of Narses were protected from violence and rapine, conveyed to a place of safety, and treated with every mark of respect and tenderness, that was due from a generous enemy to their age, their sex, and their royal dignity.

Negotiation for peace. While the city anxiously expected the decision of this great contest, the emperor Diocletian, having assembled in Syria a strong army of observation, displayed from a distance the resolution of the Romans, and made himself master of any future emergency of the war. On the intelligence of the victory, he descended to advance towards the frontier, with a view of moderating, by his presence and counsels, the pride of Galerius. The interview of the Roman princes at Nisibis, was accompanied with every expression of respect on one side, and of esteem on the other. It was in that city that they soon afterwards gave audience to the ambassador of the great king. The power, or at least the spirit, of Narses, had been broken by his last defeat; and he considered an immediate peace as the only means that could stop the progress of the arms. He immediately dispatched to the Roman emperor, a servant who possessed his favour and confidence, with a commission to negotiate a treaty, or rather to receive whatever conditions the conqueror should impose. Abarpharab opened the conference with an address of perpetual gratitude and submission, for the generous treatment of his family, and by soliciting the liberty of those illustrious captives. He celebrated the valour of Galerius, without degrading the reputation of Narses, and thought it no dishonour to address the monarchs at the head of their armies, over a monarch who had surpaied in glory all the princes of his race. Notwithstanding the justice of the Persian cause, he was empowered to submit the present differences to the decision of the emperors themselves; convinced as he was, that, in the midst of prosperity, they would not be unmindful of the vicissitudes of fortune. Abarpharab concluded his discourse in the style of western allegory, by observing that the Roman and Persian monarchies were the two eyes of the world, which would remain imperfect and mutilated if either of them should be put out.

"It well becomes the Persians," retorted Galerius, with a transport of fury, which seemed to convulse his whole frame, "it well becomes the Persians to expiate on the vicissitudes of fortune, and calmly to read us lectures on the virtues of moderation. Let them remember their own moderation towards the unhappy Valerian. They vanquished him by fraud, they treated him with indulgence, but it betrayed him till the last moment of his life in shameless captivity, and after his death they exposed his body to perpetual ignominy." Softening, however, his tone, Galerius intimated to the ambassador, that it had never been the practice of the Romans to trample on the captives of their enemies; in this occasion, they should consult their own dignity rather than the Persian merit. He dismissed Abarpharab with a hope, that Narses would soon be informed on what conditions he might obtain, from the clemency of the emperors, a lasting peace, and the restoration of his wife and children. In this conference we may discover the fierce passions of Galerius, as well as his deference to the superior wisdom and authority of Diocletian. The ambition of the former grasped at the conquest of the east, and had proposed to reduce Persia into the state of a province. The moderation of the latter, who adhered to Diocletian, the moderate policy of Augustus and the Antonines, embraced the favourable opportunity of terminating a successful war by an honourable and advantageous peace.

In pursuance of their promise, the emperors soon afterwards appointed Sico- rius Probus, one of their secretaries, to acquaint the Persian court with their final resolution. As the minister of peace, he was received with every mark of politeness and friendship; but under the pretence of allowing him the necessary repose after so long a journey, the audience of Probus was deferred from day to day; and he attended the slow motions of the king, till at length he was admitted to his presence, near the river Asprudus in Media. The secret motive of Narses in this delay, had been to collect such a military force as might enable him, though sincerely desirous of peace to conclude with the emperor, to assert his own dignity. Three persons only assisted at this important conference, the minister Abarpharab, the prefect of the guards, and an officer who had commanded on the Armenian frontier. The first condition proposed by the ambassador was not at present to be very intelligible nature; that the city of Nisibis might be established for the place of mutual exchange, or, as we should formerly have termed it, for the staple of trade, between the two empires. There is no difficulty in conceiving the intention of the Roman princes to impose prove their revenue by some restraints upon commerce; but as Nisibis was situated within their own dominions, and as they were masters both of the imports and exports, it should seem, that such restraints were the objects of an internal law, rather than of a foreign treaty. To render such modes effectual, some stipulations were entered into, on the side of the king of Persia, which appeared so very repugnant either to his interest or to his dignity, that Narses could not be persuaded to subscribe them. As this was the only article to which he refused his consent, it may not be consistent with his government to say that the emperor neither suffered the trade to flow in its natural channels, nor contented themselves with such restrictions, as it depended on their own authority to establish.

As soon as this difficulty was removed, the merchants of Rome, and of other nations, returned to the Aboras, or, as it is called by Xenophon, the Araxes, was fixed as the boundary between the two monarchies. That river, which rose near the Tigris, was increased a few miles below Nisibis, by the left or eastern stream of the Mygdonius, passed under the walls of Singara, and fell into the Euphrates at Circesium, a frontier town, which, by the care of Diocletian, was very strongly fortified. Mesopotamia, the object of so much regret to the emperor and the Persians, by this treaty, renounced all pretensions to that great province. II. They relinquished to the Romans five provinces beyond the Tigris. Their empire, formed by the union of the large and mountainous territory of Carduene, the ancient seat of the Carduicans, was thus confirmed and further extended to the heart of the despotic monarchies of Asia. The ten thousand Greeks traversed their country, after a painful march, or rather engagement, of seven days; and it is confessed by their leader, in his incompareable relation of the retreat, that they suffered more from the arrows of the Carduicans, than from the rivers, mountains, and provinces, were carried before the imperial car. The images of the captive wives, the sisters, and the children of the great king, afforded a new and grateful spectacle to the vanity of the people, who, without regard to the fact that they were to have required of the monarch to withdraw the seat of government to Rome only to Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, in extent or populousness.} cessors of Augustus exercised the power of dictating whatever laws their wisdom or caprice might suggest; by these laws they unified the Roman provinces. The model of ancient freedom was preserved in its deliberations and decrees; and wise princes, who respected the prejudices of the Roman people, were in some measure obliged to assume the language and behaviour suitable to the general and first magistrates. In the eleven provinces, the procurators, who resided in the provinces, they displayed the dignity of monarchs; and when they fixed their residence at a distance from the capital, they for ever laid aside the dissimulation which Augustus had recommended to his successors. In the exercise of the legislative and executive powers, there was an evident connexion with their ministers, instead of consulting the great council of the nation. The name of the senate was mentioned with honour till the last period of the empire; the vanity of its members was still furthered by honorary distinctions; but the assembly which had so long been the source, and so long the instrument, of power, was respectfully suffered to sink into oblivion. The senate of Rome, losing all connexion with the imperial court and the actual constitution, was left a venerable but useless monument of antiquity on the Capitoline hill.

6. The proconsuls and praetors, and the first magistrates in general, were placed in the senatorial order, the franchise, laid aside the sight of the senate and of their ancient capital, they easily forgot the origin and nature of their legal power. The civil offices of consul, of proconsul, of censors, and of tribune, by the union of which it had been formed, betrayed to the people its republican character. What was done from the moment a passion was laid aside; and if they still distinguished their high station by the appellation of emperor, or imperator, that word was understood in a new and more dignified sense, and no longer denoted the general of the Roman armies, but the imperial dignity, the sovereign of the Roman world. The distinction of emperors at first being a military nature, was associated with another of a more servile kind. The epithet of Divi, or lord, in its primitive signification, was expressive, not of the authority of a prince over his subjects, or of a commander over his soldiers, but of the despotic power of a master over his domestic slaves. Viewing it in that odious light, it had been rejected with abhorrence by the first Caesars. Their resistance insensibly became more feeble, and the name less odious: till at length the style of our lord and emperor was not only bestowed by a benefactor, but was regularly admitted into the laws and public documents. Such imitations of the sentiment were sufficient to elevate and satisfy the most excessive vanity; and if the successors of Diocletian still defined the title of king, it seems to have been the effect not so much of their moderation as of their delicacy. Whenever the Latin tongue was in use, (and it was the language of government throughout the empire,) the imperial title, as it was peculiar to themselves, conveyed a more respectable idea than the name of king, which they must have shared with a hundred barbarian chieftains; or which, at the best, they could derive only from Romulus or from Tarsus. But the sentiments of the east were very different from those of the west. From the earliest period of history, the sovereigns of Asia had been celebrated in the Greek language by the title of basileus, or king; and since it was considered as the first distinction among men, it was soon employed by the servile provincials of the east, in their humble addresses to the Roman throne. Even the attributes, or at least the tithias, of the Divinitas, were usurped by Diocletian and Maximian, who transmitted them to a succession of Christian emperors. Such extravagant compliments, however, soon lose their impiety by losing their meaning; and when the ear is once accustomed to the sound, they are heard with indifference, as vague, though excessive, professions of respect.

From the time of Augustus to that of Diocletian, the Roman princes conversed, names the ducum, in a familiar manner among their Roman citizens, and introduced the same applause to senators and magistrates. Their principal distinction was the imperial or military robe of purple; whilst the senatorial garment was marked by a broad, and the equestrian by a narrow, band or stripe of the same honourable colour. The title, or rather the policy, of Diocletian, engaged that artful prince to introduce the strictly magnificence of the court of Persia. He ventured to assume the diadem, an ornament detested by the Romans as the odious ensign of royalty, and the use of which had been considered as the most disgraceful of the madness of Cæsars; it was no more than a supplementary, or at least a second, attribute to the emperor’s head. The sumptuous robes of Diocletian and his successors were of silk and gold; and it is remarked with indignation, that even their shoes were studded with the most precious gems. The access to their sacred person was every day rendered more difficult, but in the end the memorable epoch in The ann. xii. said:—The avenue of the palace was strictly guarded by the various schools, as they began to be called, of domestic officers. The interior apartments were intrusted to the jealous vigilance of the empress; the increase of whose numbers and influence was the most infallible symptom of the feebleness of the prince. No subject was at length admitted to the imperial presence, he was obliged, whatever might be his rank, to fall prostrate on the ground, and to adore, according to the eastern fashion, the divinity of his lord and master. The same person, who, in the course of private as well as public life, had formed a just estimate both of himself and of mankind: nor is it easy to conceive, that in substituting the manners of Persia to those of Rome, he was seriously actuated by so mean a principle as that of vanity. He flattened himself, that his people might subordinate the imagination of the multitude; that the monarch would be less exposed to the rude licence of 6 See Vendale de Conscellsatione, p. 334, &c. It was customary for the emperors to mention (in the preamble of their laws) the sacred majesty, divine oracles, &c. According to Tittmann, Gregory of Nazianzus complains most bitterly of the profanation, especially when it was practiced by an Athenian emperor.

7 In the time of the republic, says Heerwegh, when the consuls, the praetors, and even the magistrates, appeared in public to attend the duties of their office, their dignity was announced both by the magnificence of their dress and by the immunities which belonged to the person of the legislator. But this dignity was attributed to the person, and not to the man. The consul attended in the Comitia by the whole senate, the praetors, the equites, the ephors, the archons, and the apontars, and the heralds, upon entering his own mansion, was served only by his freedmen and slaves. The first emperors went no further: Tiburtus for his own personal attendance had but a moderate number of slaves, and some freedmen. (Tellmann, Ann. iv. 7.) But as the forms of republicanism, after one another, vanished, the insignia of the empire added more and more to surround the person of the emperor, and to subdue the imagination of the multitude; that the monarch would be less exposed to the rude licence of lettered men.
The people and the soldiers, as his person was secluded from the public view; and that habits of submission would insensibly be productive of sentiments of veneration towards the individual. But in this respect, as in others, the state maintained by Diocletian, and that of Constantine, was unlike the conception of an absolute monarchy. It was true that the Roman nobility affected by Augustus, the state maintained by the other emperors, even in its most arbitrary representation; but it must be confessed, that of the two comedies, the former was of a much more liberal and unmanly character than the latter. It was the aim of the one to disguise, and the object of the other to display, the unbounded power which the emperors possessed over the Roman world.

Ostentation was the first principle of administration, two new systems of administration were introduced by Diocletian, Augustus, and two Caesars. The second division. He divided the empire, the provinces, and every branch of the civil as well as military administration. He multiplied the number of courts and provincial administration, and rendered its operations less rapid but more secure. Whatever advantages and whatever defects might attend these innovations, they must be ascribed to a very great degree to the first inventor; but as the new frame of policy was gradually improved and completed by his successors, it will be more satisfactory to delay the consideration of it till the season of its full maturity and perfection.1 Reserving, therefore, for the reign of Constantine a more exact picture of the new empire, we shall content ourselves with describing the principal and decisive outline, as it was traced by Constantine and his successors. In the exercise of the supreme power; and as he was convinced that the abilities of a single man were inadequate to the public defence, he considered the joint administration of four princes not as a temporary expedient, but as a fundamental law of the constitution. It was his intention, that the two elder princes should be distinguished by the use of the title of Augusti; that, as affection or esteem might direct their choice, they should regularly call to their assistance two subordinate colleagues; and that the Caesars, rising in their turn to the first rank, should supply an uninterrupted succession of emperors. The empire was divided into four parts. The east and Italy were the most honourable, the Danube and the Rhine the most laborious, stations. The former claimed the presence of the Augusti, the latter were intrusted to the administration of the Caesars. The strength of the empire was hereby multiplied, for the four partners of sovereignty, and the despair of successively vanquishing four formidable rivals, might intimidate the ambition of an aspiring general. In their civil government, the emperors were supposed to exercise the undivided power of the monarch, and the authority by which they were invested was received in all the provinces, as promulgated by their mutual councils and authority. Notwithstanding these precautions, the political union of the Roman world was gradually dissolved, and a principle of division was introduced which in the course of a few years, occasioned the perpetual separation of the eastern and western empires.

The system of Diocletian was accompanied with another very material disadvantage, which cannot even at present be totally overlooked; a more expensive establishment, and consequently an increase of taxes, and the oppression of the people. Instead of a modest family of slaves and freedmen, such as had contented the simple greatness of Augustus and Trajan, three or four magnificent courts were established in the various parts of the empire, and as many Romish Kings contended with each other and with the Persian monarch for the superiority of pomp and luxury. The number of ministers, of magistrates, of officers, and of servants, who filled the different departments of the state, was multiplied beyond the example of former times; and (if we may borrow the warm expression of a contemporary) "when the proportion of those who received exceeded the proportion of those who were endowed with power, the provinces were depressed by the weight of tributaries acting with the period of the extinction of the empire, it would be easy to deduce an uninterrupted series of clamours and complaints. According to his religion and situation, each writer chooses either Diocletian, or Constantine, or Valens, or Theodosius, for the object of his invectives; but in both, they uniformly agree in censuring the reign after the extinction of the empire, and particularly the land-tax and capitatio, as the intolerable and increasing grievance of their own times. From such a concurrence, an impartial historian, who is obliged to extract truth from satire, as well as from panegyric, will be inclined to approve the opinion of those whom they accuse, and to ascribe their exactions much less to their personal vices, than to the uniform system of their administration. The emperor Diocletian was indeed the author of that system; but during his reign, the growing evil was confined within the bounds of modesty, whenever that did not yield to the reproach of establishing pernicious precedents, rather than of exercising actual oppression.2 It may be added, that his revenues were managed with prudent economy; and that after all the current expenses were discharged, there still remained in the imperial treasury a considerable fund, covered by the judicious liberality or for any emergency of the state.

It was in the twenty-first year of his reign that Diocletian executed his memorable resuscitatio imperii; an action more naturally to have been expected from the elder of the two Antonines, than from a prince who had never practised the lessons of philosophy either in the attainment or in the use of supreme power. Diocletian acquired the glory of giving to the world the first example of a resignation,3 which has not been very frequently imitated by succeeding monarchs. The parallel of Charles the fifth. Charles the fifth, however, will naturally offer itself to our mind, not only since the eloquence of a modern historian has rendered that name so familiar to an English reader, but from the very striking resemblance between the characters of the two emperors, whose political abilities were superior to their military genius, and whose sanguine virtues were much less the effect of nature than of art. The abdication of Charles appears to have been hastened by the vicissitudes of fortune; and the disappointment of his favourite schemes urged him to relinquish a power which he had obtained by the most virtuous means. It is true that the reign of Diocletian had flowed with a tide of uninterrupted success; nor was it till after he had vanquished all his enemies, and accomplished all his designs, that he seems to have entertained any serious thoughts of resigning the empire. Neither Charles nor Diocletian were arrived at a very advanced period of life; since the one was only fifty-five, and the other no more than fifty-nine, years of age; but the active life of those princes, their wars and journeys, the cares of royalty, and their application to business, had already impaired their constitution, and brought on the infirmities of a premature old age.4 Notwithstanding the severity of a very cold and rainy winter, Diocletian left Italy soon after the ceremony of his triumph, and began his progress towards the east, round

1 The innovations introduced by Diocletian, are chiefly deduced, 1st, from some very strong passages in Lactantius; and, 2dly, from the new and various offices, which, in the Theodosian code, appear exactly exhibited in the beginning of the reign of Constantine.

2 Lactantius, de mort. m. c. xxiv.; Inde Rex magnus est: vase nune illorum temporum modesta tolerabilia, in perennem processit. Aureli, Victor, who has treated the subject of Diocletian, has good reason to observe, that the emperor, in giving up the empire, did not absolve his companions from the obligations of the imperial dignity, as was intended by him. 3 Schol. consuistam, post consuistam Romanum imperium, qui ex tanto res velle aflatum ad private rata statum civilissimum remercet. 4 The particulars of the journey and illness are taken from Lactantius, (c. 17,) who may sometimes be admitted as an evidence of public facts, though very seldom of private anecdotes. the circuit of the Illyrian provinces. From the inclemency of the weather, and the fatigue of the journey, he suffered a relapse of his illness, though he used easy matches, and was generally carried in a close litter, his disorder, before he arrived at Nicomedia, about the end of summer, was become very serious and alarming. During the whole winter he was confined to his palace: his danger inspired a general and unaffected consternation; but the people could only judge of the various alterations of his health from the joy or consternation which they discovered in the countenance and behaviour of his attendants. The rumour of his death was for some time universally believed, and it was supposed to be caused with a view to prevent the troubles that might have happened during the absence of the Caesar Galerius. At length, however, on the first of March, Diocletian once more appeared in public, but so pale and emaciated, that he could scarcely have been recognised by those to whom he was most intimate. His prudence was to put an end to the painful struggle, which he had sustained during more than a year, between the care of his health and that of his dignity.

The former required indulgence and relaxation, the latter compelled him to direct, from the bed of sickness, the business of the government. A great camp was brought off to pass the remainder of his days in honourable repose, to place his glory beyond the reach of fortune, and to relinquish the theatre of the world to his younger and more active associates.

The ceremony of his abdication was performed in a sumptuous manner, but without much expense; the three months from Nicomedia.

The emperor ascended a lofty throne, and in a speech, full of reason and dignity, declared his intention, both unto the people and to the soldiers who were assembled on this extraordinary occasion. As soon as he had drew from the gazing multitude; and traversing the city in a covered chariot, proceeded,ler without delay, to the favourite retirement which he had chosen in his native country of Dalmatia. On the Compliance of the same day, which was the first of May,

Maximian, as it had been previously concerted, made his resignation of the imperial dignity at Milan. Even in the splendour of the Roman triumph, Diocletian had meditated his design, of abdi-cating the government. As he wished to secure the obedience of the most powerful of his associates, he exacted from each a general assurance that he would submit his actions to the authority of his benefactor, or a particular promise that he would descend from the throne, whenever he should receive the advice and the example. This engagement, though it was confirmed by the solemnity of the ceremony, and by the beauty of the altar of the Capitoline Jupiter, which had been covered with a fleecy restraint on the fierce temper of Maximian, whose passion was the love of power, and who neither desired present tranquility nor future reputation. But he yielded, however reluctantly, to the ascendant which his wiser colleague had acquired over him, and retired, immediately after his abdication, to a villa in Lucania, where it was almost impossible that such an impotent spirit could find any lasting tranquility.

The so-called abdication of Diocletian, who, from servile origin, had raised himself to the throne, and passed the nine last years of his life in a private condition. Reason had dictated, and content seems to have accompanied, his retreat, in which he enjoyed for a long time the respect of those princes who had resigned the possession of the world. It is seldom that minds, long exercised in human affairs, have formed any habits of conversing with themselves, and in the loss of power they principally re-greg the want of occupation. The amusements of letters and of devotion, which afford so many resources in solitude, were incapable of fixing the attention of Diocletian; but he had at least assembled a court, which devoted by a taste for the most innocent as well as natural pleasures, and his leisure hours were sufficiently employed in building, planting, and gardening. His answer to Maximian is deservedly celebrated. He was solicited by that resi, his philosophy, less old, of that of the government, and the imperial purple.

He rejected the temptation with a smile of pity, calmly observing, that if he could show Maximian the cabbages which he had planted with his own hands at Salona, he should no longer urge to relinquish the enjoyment of happiness for the pursuit of power. In his conversations with his friends, he frequently acknowledged, that of all arts, the most difficult was the art of regaining: and he expressed himself on that favourite topic with a degree of warmth which could be the result only of experience was that "is it the interest of four or five ministers to combine together to deceive their sovereign! Secluded from mankind by his exalted dignity, the truth is concealed from his knowledge; he can see only with their eyes, he hears nothing but their rhetorical discourses. He confided his private affairs above the enemies, and the most important offices upon vice and weakness, and disgraces the most virtuous and deserving among his subjects.

By such infamous arts," added Diocletian, "the best and wisest princes are sold to the venal corruption of their courtiers." A just estimate of greatness, and the assurance of immortal fame, improved our relations for the pleasures of retirement; but the Roman emperor had filled too important a character in the world, to enjoy without alloy the comforts and security of a private condition. It was impossible that he could remain ignorant of the troubles which afflicted the empire after his abdication. It was impossible that he could be indifferent to their consequences. Fear, sorrow, and discontent, sometimes pursued him into the solitude of Salona. His tenderness, or at least his pride, was deeply wounded by the misfortunes of his friends. If he was indignant with Maximian, he were embittered by some affronts, which Lici-nius and Constantine might have spared the father of so many emperors, and the first author of their own fortune. A report, though of a very and death, that

At our time, an doubtful nature, has reached our times, A.D. 303, of Salona, a principal city of his native province of Dalmatia, was near two hundred Roman miles (according to the measurement of the public highways) from Aquileia and the conflines of Italy, and about two hundred and seventy from Sirmium, the usual residence of the emperors whenever they visited the Illyrian frontier. A miserable village still preserves the name of Salona; but

so late as the sixteenth century, the remains of a theatre, and a confused prospect of broken arches and marble columns, continued to attest the ancient splendour. About six or seven miles from the city, Diocletian constructed a magnificent palace, and we may infer, from the greatness of the work, how long he had meditated his design of abdicating the empire. The choice of a spot, which united all that could contribute to the magnificence of the palace, was fixed on the spot which was not restricted by the partiality of a native. "The soil was dry and fertile, the air is pure and wholesome, and though extremely hot during the summer months, this country seldom feels those sultry and noxious winds, to which the coasts of Istria and some parts of Italy are exposed. The town of Ston, which is less than four miles from this spot, is said to have been inhabited by Diocletian, and his palace is still used as a seat of government. Towards the west lies the fertile shore that stretches along the Adriatic, in which a number of small islands are scattered in such a manner, as to give this part of the coast the appearance of a great lake. On the north side lies the bay, which led to the ancient city of Solin; and the country beyond it, appearing in sight, forms a proper contrast to that more extensive prospect of water, which the Adriatic presents both to the south and to the east. Towards the north, the view is terminated by high and irregular mountains, situated at a proper distance, and, in many places, covered with various woods and forests."

Of Diocletian's palace. Though Constantine, from a very obdurate prejudice, affects to mention the palace of Diocletian with contempt, yet one of their successors, who could only see it in a neglected and mutilated state, celebrates its magnificence in terms of the highest admiration. It covered an extent of ground consisting of between nine and ten English acres. The form was quadrangular, flanked with sixteen towers. Two of the sides were near six hundred, and the other two near seven hundred, feet in length. The whole was constructed of a beautiful marble, and the existence of the quarries of Trau, or Tragutum, and very little inferior to marble itself. Four streets, intersecting each other at right angles, divided the several parts of this great edifice, and the approach to the principal apartment was from a very stately entrance, which is still defended by a great gateway. The palace was terminated by a peristyleum of granite columns, on one side of which we discover the square temple of Asclepius, on the other the octagon temple of Jupiter. The latter of those deities Diocletian revered as the patron of his fortunes, the former as the protector of his subjects. After the death of Diocletian, the precepts of Vitruvius, the several parts of the building, the baths, bed-chamber, the atriurn, the basilica, and the Cyzicene, Cistamian, and Egyptian halls have been described with some degree of precision, or at least of probability. Their forms were various, their proportions just; but they were all attended with two imperfections, very reprobate to our modern notions of taste and convenience. These stately rooms had neither windows nor chimneys. They were lighted from the top, (for the building seems to have consisted of no more than one story,) and they received their heat by the help of pipes that were conveyed along the walls. The range of principlapal apartments was protected towards the south-west by a portico five hundred and seventeen feet long. Such magnitude has formed a very noble and delightful walk, when the beauties of painting and sculpture were added to those of the prospect. Had this magnificent edifice remained in a solitary country, it would have been exposed to the ravages of time; but it might, perhaps, have escaped the Svieb, if Diocletian had been satisfied with that of Spalatro, which is afterwards, the provincial town of Spalatro, have grown out of its ruins. The Golden Gate now opens into the market-place. St. John the Baptist has usurped the honours of Asclepius; and the temple of Jupiter, under the protection of the Virgin, is to itself. This is the case for this account of Diocletian's palace we are principally indebted to an ingenious artist of our own time and country, whom a very liberal curiosity carried into the heart of Dalmatia. But there is room to suspect, that the elegance of his designs and engraving has somewhat flatted the objects which it was their purpose to represent. We are informed Decline of the by a more recent and very judicious trav- norseller, that the awful ruins of Spalatro are not less expressive of the decline of the arts than of the greatness of the Roman empire in the time of Diocletian. If such was indeed the state of architecture, was not nature left to the advantage of art? And had experienced a still more sensible decay. The practice of architecture is directed by a few general and even mechanical rules. But sculpture, and, above all, painting, propose to themselves the imitation not only of the forms of nature, but of the characters and passions of the human soul. In those sublime arts, the dexterity of the hand is of little avail, unless it is animated by fancy, and guided by the most correct taste and observation.

It is almost unnecessary to remark, that the civil distractions of the empire, the loss of the licence of the soldiers, the turmoils of the barbarians, and the progress of despotism, had proved very unfavourable to genius, and even to learning. The succession of Illyrian princes restored the empire, without restoring the sciences. Their military education was not calculated to inspire them with the love of letters; and even the mind of Diocletian, however active and copious in business, was totally uniformed by study or speculation. The professions of law and physic are of such common use and certain profit, that they will always secure a sufficient number of practitioners, endowed with a reasonable degree of science, and the price of all the arts, excepting the polite, is determined by the market of the ages; yet, the present state of learning is such, that the students in those two faculties appeal to any celebrated masters who have flourished within that period. The voice of poetry was silent. History was reduced to dry and confused abridgments, alike destitute of amusement and instruction. A haggard and neglected elegance was still received in the paid service of the emperors, who encouraged not any arts except those which contributed to the gratification of their pride, or the defence of their power. The declading edge of learning and of the new Platonic mankind is marked, however, by the 114th.
rise and rapid progress of the new Platonists. The school of Alexandria silenced those of Athens; and the next generation, which followed, were the scholars of the more fashionable teachers, who recommended their system by the novelty of their method, and the austerity of their manners. Several of these masters, Ammonius, Plotinus, Amelius, and Porphyry,1 were men of profound thought and intense application; but by mixing with the most celebrated philosophers of the time, and even with the arts of Diocletian,2 instead of imitating their eastern pride and magnificence, Constantius preserved the modesty of a Roman prince. He declared, with unaffected sincerity, that his most valued treasure was his character, and that, whenever the dignity of the throne, or the danger of the state, required any extraordinary supply, he could depend with confidence on their gratitude and liberality.3 The provincials of Gaul, Spain, and Britain, sensible of his worth, and of their own happiness, restored with all the declivity of the health of the emperor Constantius, and the tender age of his numerous family, the issue of his second marriage with the daughter of Maximian.

The stern temper of Galerius was cast in a very different mould; and while his emperors were conscious of the effect of the sudden condescension to solicit their affections. His fame in arms and above all, the success of the Persian war, had elated his haughty mind, which was naturally impotent of a superior, or even of an equal. If it were possible to rely on the partial testimony of an invidious writer, we might ascribe the ambition of Diocletian to the menaces of Galerius, and relate the particulars of a private conversation between the two princes, in which the former discovered as much pusillanimity as the latter displayed ingratitude and arrogance.4 But the obscure anecdotes are sufficiently refuted by an impartial view of the conduct of Diocletian. Whatever might otherwise have been his intentions, if he had apprehended any danger from the violence of Galerius, his good sense would have instructed him to prevent the ignominious contest; and as he had held the sceptre with glory, he would have resigned it without disgrace.

After the elevation of Constantius and The two Caesars, Galerius to the rank of Augusti, two new Caesars were required to supply their place, and to complete the system of the imperial government. The empire was well contented with withdrawing himself from the world; he considered Galerius, who had married his daughter, as the firmest support of his family and of the empire; and he consented, without reluctance, that his successor should assume the merit as well as the envy of the important nomination. It was fixed without consulting the interest or inclination of the princes of the west. Each of them had a son who was arrived at the age of manhood, and who might have been deemed the most natural candidates for the vacant honor. But the impotent resentment of Maximian was no longer to be disregarded; and the moderate Constantius, though he might desire to see Diocletian, was not apprehensive of the calamities, of civil war. The two persons whom Galerius promoted to the rank of Caesar, were much better suited to serve the views of his ambition; and their principal recommendation seems to have consisted in the want of merit or personal consequence. The first of these was Diocletian, whom he afterwards called, Maximian, whose mother was the sister of Galerius. The unexperienced youth still betrayed by his manners and language his rustic education, when, to his own astonishment, as well as that of the world, he was invested by Galerius with the purple, exalted to the rank of Caesar, invested with the sestertius command of Egypt and Syria. At the same time, Severus, a faithful servant, addicted to pleasure, but not incapable of business, was sent to Milan, to receive, from the reluctant hands of Maximian, the Cæsarian ornaments, and the possession of Italy and Africa. According to the forms of the constitution, Severus acknowledged the supremacy of the western emperor; but he was absolutely devoted to the commands of his benefactor Galerius, who, reserving to himself the intermediate countries from the confines of Italy to those of Syria, firmly established his power over that portion of the empire by whom, by representing the full evidence, that the approaching death of Constantius would leave him sole master of the Roman world, we are assured that he had arranged in his mind a long succession of future princes, and that he meditated his own retreat from public life, after he should have accomplished a glorious and triumphant career.

1. Porphyry died about the time of Diocletian's abdication. The life of this master, which has come down to us, is the most complete idea of the genius of the sect, and the manners of its professors. Two very curious pieces are inserted in Ptolemaeus, Bibliotheca Græca, tom. iv. p. 87-142.

But within less than eighteen months, Ambition of Galeriusiping down by two revolutions, the ambitious schemes of Galerius. The hope of uniting the western provinces to his empire were disappointed by the elevation of Vitalian in Italy and Africa were lost by the successful revolt of Maxentius.

I. The fame of Constantine has rendered posterity attentive to the most minute circumstances of his life and actions. The place of his birth, as well as the conditions of his mother Helena, have been the subject not only of disputation, but of dispute. Notwithstanding the recent tradition, which assigns for her father a British king, we are obliged to confess, that Helena was the daughter of an innkeeper; but, at the same time, we may defend the legality of her marriage, as much as we respect her as the wife of Constantius. The first Constantius was most probably born at Naissus, in Dacia; and it

But the impression of the journey was reluctantly granted, and whatever Galerius may have taken to intercept a return, the consequences of which he, with so much reason, apprehended, they were effectually disappointed by the incredible diligence of Constantine. Leaving the palace of Nicomedica in the night, he travelled post through Bithynia, Thrace, Daucia, Panonia, Italy, and Gaul, and amidst the joyful acclamations of the people, reached the port of Boulogne, in the very moment when his father was preparing to embark for Britain.

The British expedition, and an easy conquest over the barbarians of Caledonia, were the last exploits of the reign of Constantine the Great. Diocletian died the imperial palace of York, fifteen months after he had received the title of Augustus, and almost fourteen years and a half after he had been promoted to the rank of Cæsar. His death was immediately succeeded by the elevation of Constantine. The ideas of inheritance and succession are so very

It is not surprising, that in a family and province distinguished only by the profession of arms, the youth of the more ambitious might be disposed to improve his mind by the acquisition of knowledge. He was about eighteen years of age when his father was promoted to the rank of Cæsar; but that fortunate event was attended with his mother’s divorce; and the splendor of an imperial alliance rekindled the sanguinary spirit of the whole house. In the event of Constantius’ death and marriage, instead of following Constantius to the west, he remained in the service of Diocletian, signaled his valor in the wars of Egypt and Persia, and gradually rose to the honourable station of a tribune of the first order. The figure of Constantine was tall and majestic; his looks dexterous in all his exercises, his mind firm, and his affable deportment. In his conduct, the active spirit of truth was tempered by habitual prudence; and while his mind was engrossed by ambition, he appeared cold and insensible to the allusions of pleasure. The favour of the people and soldiers, who had named him as a worthy candidate for the rank of Cæsar, served only to exasperate the jealousy of Galerius; and though prudence might restrain him from exercising any open violence, an absolute monarch is seldom at a loss how to execute a sure and secret revenge. Every hour increased the danger of Constantine, and the anxiety of his father, who, by repeatedly expressing his desire of embracing his son. For some time the policy of Galerius supplied him with delays and excuses, but it was impossible long to refuse so natural a request of his associate, without maintaining his refusal by arms. The permission of the journey was reluctantly granted, and whatever Galerius may have taken to intercept a return, the consequences of which he, with so much reason, apprehended, they were effectually disappointed by the incredible diligence of Constantine. Leaving the palace of Nicomedica in the night, he travelled post through Bithynia, Thrace, Daucia, Panonia, Italy, and Gaul, and amidst the joyful acclamations of the people, reached the port of Boulogne, in the very moment when his father was preparing to embark for Britain.

The British expedition, and an easy conquest over the barbarians of Caledonia, were the last exploits of the reign of Constantine the Great. Diocletian died the imperial palace of York, fifteen months after he had received the title of Augustus, and almost fourteen years and a half after he had been promoted to the rank of Cæsar. His death was immediately succeeded by the elevation of Constantine. The ideas of inheritance and succession are so very familiar, that the generality of mankind consider them as founded, not only in reason, but in nature itself. Ordered by his father Constantius, he left Britain, and the national troops were reinforced by a numerous body of Alæmanni, who obeyed the orders of Croesus, one of their hereditary chieftains. The opinion of their own importance, and the assurance that Britain, Gaul, and Spain would acquiesce in their nomination, actuated them primarily to the legions by the adherents of Constantine. The soldiers were asked, whether they could hesitate a moment between the honour of placing at their head the worthy son of their beloved emperor, and the ignominy of tamely expecting the arrival of some obscure stranger, on whom might please the sovereign of Asia to bestow the armies and provinces of the west! It was insinuated to them, that gratitude and liberality held a distinguished place among the virtues of Constantine; nor did that artful prince show himself to the troops, till he had Williamson to submit himself with the principles of Augustus and emperor. The throne was the object of his desires; and had he been less actuated by ambition, it was his own only means of safety. He was well acquainted with the character and sentiments of Galerius, and sufficiently apprised, that if he wished to live he must yield. The deponent and even obstinate resistance which he chose to adopt, was conceived to justify his usurpation; nor did he yield to the acclamations of the army, till he had provided the proper materials for the letter, which he immediately despatched to the emperor of the east. Constantine, in his feelings wounded beyond measure, with his father's death, modestly asserted his natural claim to the succession, and respectfully lamented, that the affectionate violence of his troops had not permitted him to solicit the imperial purple in the regular and constitutional manner. The first emotions of Galerius were those of surprise, disappointment, and rage; and as he could seldom restrain his passions, he loudly threatened, that he would commit to the flames both the letter and the messenger. But his resentment insensibly subsided; and when he recollected the danger of the change of war, he weighed the character and extent of his adversary, he consented to embrace the honourable accommodation which the prudence of Constantine had left open to him. Without either condescending or ratifying the choice of the British army, Galerius accepted the son of his deceased colleague, as the sovereign of the provinces beyond the Alps; but he gave him only the title of Caesar, and the fourth rank among the Roman princes, whilst he conferred the vacant place of Augustus on his favourite Severus. The apparent harmony of the empire was still preserved, till Constantine, who already possessed the substance, expected, without impatience, an opportunity of obtaining the honours, of supreme power.

The choice of Constantine, by his dying father, which is warranted by reason, and instanced by Eumenius, seems to be confirmed by the most unexceptionable authority, the concursus evidence of Cassiodorus Senecinaeus, of Pagi, of Cassius, of Tacitus, of Constantius, of Theodorus, of Constantius, of Eune- mius (viii. 8.), of Eusebius (cit. supra), and of Jilo (Oration 8.), with the addition, and that of Justin (Hist. Rom. i. c. 27.); of Julian (Oration 8.), and of the other evidences of Tacitus, of Constantius, of Eutropius, of Anastasia the Cæsar Raisanius, and Eutropius the cont. Nepos (iii. 7.), of the three brothers Donatus, Julianus Constantius, and Ambianthus, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

The children of Constantine by his first wife were six in number, three of whom gave rise to a meaner extraction of the son of Helena. But Constantius was in the thirty-second year of his age, in the full vigour both of mind and body, at the time when the eldest of his brethren could not possibly be more than thirteen years old. His claim of superior merit had been allowed and ratified by the dying emperor. In his last moments, Constantius bequeathed to his eldest son the care of the safety as well as greatness of the family; conjuring him to be himself not to enter upon the business of a father with regard to the children of Theodoria. Their liberal education, advantageous marriages, the secure dignity of their lives, and the first honours of the state with which they were invested, attest the fraternal affection of Constantius. In their dispositions and grateful disposition, they submitted without reluctance to the superiority of his genius and fortune.

The ambitious spirit of Galerius, the discontents of the Roman provinces, before the unexpected loss of Donatus, Italy wounded his pride as well as power in a still more sensible part. The long absence of the emperors had filled Rome with discontent and indignation; and the people gradually discovered, that the preference given to Nicomedia and Milan, was not to be attributed to the taste of Hipponianus, but to the permanent form of government which he had instituted. It was in vain that, a few months after his abdication, his successors dedicated, under his name, those magnificent baths, whose ruins still supply the ground as well as the materials for so many churches and commodious edifices; and the absence of those armaments and luxuries which had been the imperious objects of Galerius, and very strict and rigorous inquisition into the property of his subjects, for the purpose of a general taxation, both on their lands and on their persons. A very minute survey appears to have been taken of their real estates; and whenever there was the slightest suspicion of concealment, torture was very freely employed to obtain a sincere declaration of their personal wealth.

The privileges which had exalted Italy above the rank of the provinces, were no longer regarded: and the officers of the revenue already began to number the Roman province among the subject states. The emperor, who had been so long satiated with the enjoyment of absolute authority, was impatient that the laws of the empire should be the measures of his pleasure and fortune. Even when the spirit of freedom had been utterly extinguished, the tamest subjects have sometimes ventured to resist an unprecedented invasion of their property; but on this occasion the injury was aggravated by the insult, and the sense of private interest was quickened by that of national honour. The conquest of Macedonia, as we have already observed, had delivered the Roman people from the weight of personal taxes. Though they had experienced every form of despotism, they had now enjoyed that exemption near five hundred years; nor could they patiently brook the insolence of an Illyrian peasant, who, from his distant residence in Asia, presumed to number Rome among the tributary cities of his empire. The rising fury of the people was encouraged by the authority, or at least the conivance, of the senate; and the fickle remains of the pretorian guards, who had reason to apprehend their own dissolution, embraced so honourable a pretence, and declared their readiness to join the service of the oppressed country. It was the wish, and it soon became the hope, of every citizen, that after expelling from Italy their foreign tyrants, they should elect a prince who, by the place of his residence, and by his maxims of government, might once more deserve the title of Roman emperor. Towards this end, as well as for the reputation of Maximus, determined in his favour the popular enthusiasm.

Maxentius was the son of the emperor Maximian, and he had married the daughter of Galerius. His birth and alliance seemed to offer him the fairest promise of succeeding to the empire; but his vices and incapacity procured him the same exclusion from the dignity of Caesar, which Constantine had desired by a dangerous superiority of merit. The policy of Galerius preferred such associates, as would never undertake to dispute the rights of their benefactor. An obscure stranger was therefore raised to the throne of Italy, and the son of the late emperor of the west was left to enjoy the luxury of a private fortune in a villa a few miles distant from the capital. The gloomy passions of his son were concealed, and his romping girls excited but slight envy on the news of Constantine’s success; but the hopes of Maxentius revived with the public discontent, and he was easily persuaded to unite his personal injury and pretensions with the cause of the Roman people. Two pretorian tribunes and a comissary of provisions undertook the management of the conspiracy; and as every order of men was actuated by the same spirit, the immediate event was neither doubtful nor difficult. The prefect of the city, and a few magistrates, who maintained their fidelity to Severus, were massacred by the guards; and Maxentius, invested with the imperial ornaments, was acknowledged by the applauding senate and people as the protector of the Roman freedom and dignity. It is uncertain whether Maxentius was previously acquainted with the conspiracy; but as soon as the hopes of Messalline standard of revolution was erected at Philippi, having professed a resolution from his retirement where the authority of Diocletian had condemned him to pass a life of melancholy solitude, and concealed his returning ambition under the disguise of paternal tenderness. At the request of his son and of the senate, he condescended to re-assume the purple. His假装 dignity, his experience, and his fame in arms, added strength as well as reputation to the party of Maxentius.7

Defeat and death According to the advice, or rather the orders, of his colleague, the emperor Severus immediately hastened to Rome, in the full confidence, that, by his unexpected celebrity, he should easily suppress the tumult of an unruly populace, commanded by a licentious youth. But he found on his arrival the gates of the city shut against him, the walls filled with men and arms, an experienced general at the head of the rebels, and his own troops without spirit or cohesion. A large body of Moors deserted to the enemy, allured by the promise of a large donation; and, if it be true that they had been levied by Maxentius in his African war, preferring the natural feelings of gratitude to the artificial ties of allegiance. Anulius, the pretorian prefect, declared fidelity to Maxentius in favour of the emperor, who was the most considerable part of the troops, accustomed to obey his commands. Rome, according to the expression of an orator, recalled her armies; and the unfortunate Severus, destitute of friends and of counsel, retired, or rather fled, with precipitation to Ravenna. There he met with the service of the prefert Prefet of Ravenna. The fortifications of Ravenna were able to resist the attempts, and the morasses that surrounded the town were sufficient to prevent the approach, of the Italian army. The sea, which Severus commanded with a powerful fleet, secured him an inextinguishable supply of provisions from his African provinces. The legions, which, on the return of spring, would advance under the assistance from Illyricum and the east, Maximin, who conducted the siege in person, was soon convinced that he might waste his time and his army in the fruitless enterprise, and that he had nothing to hope either from force or famine. With an art more suitable to the character of Diocletian than to his own, he directed his attack, not so much against the walls of Ravenna, as against the mind of Severus. The treachery which he had experienced, disposed that unhappy prince to distrust the most sincere of his friends and adherents. The emissaries of Maximin easily persuaded him of the eventuality that a conspiracy was formed to betray the town, and prevailed upon his fears not to expose himself to the discretion of an irritated conqueror, but to accept the faith of an honourable capitulation. He was at first received with humanity, and treated with respect. Maximin conducted the capitulation and granted all the assurances that he had secured his life by the resignation of the purple. But Severus could only obtain an easy death and an imperial funeral. When the sentence was signified to him, the man who, three months before, had ordered the execution of his son, was prepared to go to his destruction. But he had been constructed for the family of Gallienus.8

Though the characters of Constantine and Maxentius had very little affinity with each other, their situation and interest were the same; and prudence seemed to require that they should unite their forces against the common enemy. Notwithstanding the superiority of his age and dignity, the indefatigable Maximin passed the Alps, and resorted to Italy, where he had anticipated that the war would be conducted. He arrived at Carnuntum with great solemnity, and was received by the army with all the martial addresses of the ancients, that of opening his veins; and as soon as he expired, his body was carried to the sepulchre which had been constructed for the family of Gallienus.9

The importance of the occasion called Galerius invaded the presence and abilities of Galerius. At the head of a powerful army collected from the two empires, the east and the west, he entered Italy, and prepared to revenge the death of Severus, and to chastise the rebellious Romans; or, as he expressed his intentions, in the furious language of a barbarian, to extirpate the senate, and to destroy the people by the sword. But the skill of Maximin had conceived a prudent system... of defence. The invader found every place hostile, fortified, and inaccessible; and though he forced his way as far as Narni, within sixty miles of Rome, his dominion in Italy was confined to the narrow limits of his camp. Sensible of the increasing difficulties of his enterprise, the naught Galerius made the first advances towards a reconciliation, and despatched two of his most considerable officers to tempt the Roman princes by the offer of a conference, and the declaring to have no further quarrel with the emperor. The offers of Galerius were rejected with firmness, his per-fidious friendship refused with contempt, and it was not long before he discovered, that, unless he provided for his safety by a timely retreat, he had some reason to apprehend the fate of Severus. The wealth, which the Romans defended against his rapacious tyranny, they freely contributed for his destruction. The name of Maximian, the popular arts of his son, the secret distribution of large sums, and the promise of still more liberal rewards, checked the ardour, and corrupted the fidelity, of the Illyrian legions; and when Galerius at length gave the signal of the retreat, it was with some difficulty that he could prevail on his veterans not to desert a banner which had so often failed them in victory and honor. A contemporary writer assigns two other causes for the failure of the expedition; but they are both of such a nature, that a cautious historian will scarcely venture to adopt them. We are told that Galerius, who had formed a very imperfect notion of the greatness of Rome by the cities of the east, with which he was acquainted, had found his forces inadequate to the siege of that immense capital. But the extent of a city serves only to render it more accessible to the enemy; Rome had long since been accustomed to submit on the approach of a conqueror, nor could the temporary enthusiasm of the legions have long contended against the discipline and valour of the legions. We are likewise informed, that the legions themselves were struck with horror and remorse, and that those pious sons of the republic refused to violate the sanctity of their venerable parent. But when we remember, that with such a prosperous ease, in the more ancient civil wars, the zeal of party, and the habits of military obedience, had converted the native citizens of Rome into her most implacable enemies, we shall be inclined to distrust this extreme delicacy of strangers and barbarians, who had never beheld Italy till they entered it in a hostile manner. Had they not been restrained by motives of a more interest nature, they would probably have answered Galerius in the words of Caesar's veterans: "If our general wishes to lead us to the banks of the Tiber, we are prepared to trace out his wall. Whosoever walls he has determined to level with the ground, our hands are ready to work the engines; nor shall we hesitate, should the name of the devoted city be Rome itself." These are indeed the expressions of a poet; but of a poet who has been distinguished, and even eulogised, for his strict adherence to the truth of his-

ory.3

His retreat. The legions of Galerius exhibit a very melancholy proof of their disposition, by the ravages which they committed in their retreat. They murdered, they ravaged, they plundered, they drove away the flocks and herds of the Italians; they burnt the villages through which they passed, and they evaded to destroy the country which it had not been in their power to subdue. During the whole of the retreat, they never exercised the narrow limits of their camp. Sensible of the increasing difficulties of his enterprise, the naught Galerius made the first advances towards a reconciliation, and despatched two of his most considerable officers to tempt the Ro-vice. But it was impossible that minds like those of Maximian and his son could long possess in harmony an undivided power. Maxentius considered himself as the legal sovereign of Italy, elected by the Roman senate and people; nor would he endure the control of the father, who arrogantly declared, that by his name and authority, he had placed himself with the sanction of the throne. The cause was solemnly pleaded before the pretorian guards, and those troops, who dreaded the severity of the old emperor, exposed the party of Maxentius. The life and freedom of Maximian were however respected, and he retired from Italy into Illyricum, affecting to famine it was invested, and secretly contriving new mischiefs. But Galerius, who was well acquainted with his character, soon obliged him to leave his dominions, and the last refuge of the disappointed Maximian was the court of his son-in-law Constantine. He was received with respect by that artful prince, and with the appearance of filial tenderness by the empress Fausta. That he might remove every suspicion, he resigned the imperial purple a second time, professing himself at length convinced of the vanity of greatness and ambition. Had he persevered in this resolution, he might have ended his life with honor, and his power extinguished; but he, however, with comfort and reputation. But the near prospect of a throne brought back to his remembrance the state from whence he was fallen, and he resolved, by a desperate effort, either to reign or to perish. An incursion of the Franks had summoned Constantine with a part of his army, to the banks of the Rhine; the remainder of the troops were stationed in the southern provinces of Gaul, which lay exposed to the enterprises of the Italian emperor, and a considerable treasure was deposited in the city of Arles. Maximian either craftily invented, or hastily crediting, a vain report of the death of Constantine. Without hesitating he descended the throne, seized the treasure, and scattering it with his accustomed profusion among the soldiers, endeavoured to awake in their minds the memory of his ancient dignity and exploits. Before he could establish his authority, or finish the negociation which he appears to have entered into with his son Maxentius, the celerity of Constantine defeated all his hopes. On the first news of his perjury and ingratitude, that prince returned by rapid marches from the Rhine to the Saone, embarked on the last-mentioned river at Chatons, and at Lyons trusted himself to the rapidity of the Rhone, arrived at the gates of Arles, where Galerius came to meet him, and counselled him to drive Maximian to resist, and which scarcely permitted him to take refuge in the neighbouring city of Marseilles. The narrow neck of land which joined that place to the continent was fortified against the besiegers, whilst the sea was open, either for the escape of Maximian, or for the succours of Maxentius, if the latter should choose to disguise his invasion of Gaul, under the honourable pretence of defending a distressed, or as he might allege, an injured father. Apprehensive of the fatal consequences of delay, Constantine gave orders for an immediate assault; but the scaling-ladders were forestalled by a wise counsellor, and the besiegers of Massel- lies might have sustained as long a siege as it formerly did against the arms of Cesar, if the garrison, conscious either of their fault or of their danger, had not purchased their pardon by delivering up the city and person of Maximian. A secret but irrevocable sentence of death was pronounced against the usurper, he obtained only the same favour which he had indulged to Severus, and it was published to the world, that, oppressed by the remorse of his repeated crimes, he struggled and expired, and dumb and speechless, with his: father in the throne. The cause was solemnly pleaded before the pretorian guards, and those troops, who dreaded the severity of the old emperor, exposed the party of Maxentius. The life and freedom of Maximian were however respected, and he retired from Italy into Illyricum, affecting to famine it was invested, and secretly contriving new mischiefs. Death of Galerius

A.D. 311. May.

The last years of Galerius were less shameful and unfortunate; and though he had filled with more glory the subordinate station of Cæsar than the superior rank of Augustus, he preserved, till the moment of his death, the first place among the princes of the Roman empire. He had reached the height of his power, and, years, and wisely relinquishing his views of universal empire, he devoted the remainder of his life to the enjoyment of pleasure, and to the execution of some works of public utility, among which we may distinguish the discharging into the Danube the superfluous waters of the Rhine by a new channel, and the laying open the immense forests that encompassed an operation very suitable to a monarch, since it gave an extensive country to the agriculture of his Pannonian subjects. His death was occasioned by a very painful and lingering disorder. His body, swelled by an intermitten course of life to an unwieldy corpulence, was covered with warts; and the arrows of the vanquishers, those insects who have given their name to a most loathsome disease, but as Galerius had offered a very zealous and powerful party among his subjects, his sufferings, instead of exciting their compassion, have been celebrated as the visible effects of divine justice. He had no sooner expired in his palace of Nicomedia, than the two emperors who were indebted for their table dukedom purple to his favour, began to collect their shared between forces, with the intention either of dis- Maximian and Licinius. Galerius.

The chair of the emperor was divided; but those authors relate them, and give credit to them. Aurelius Victor says, speaking of Maximian: Cunque specie officiis, dolos compositos, Constantianum generum tandem aperese, jure absque, sed ignoto, parum interempto, umbris de Constantine, qui ante se sunt, et qui futuros, bede Fausta protesserat est (Maximi) dolo composito, sed vix que, quia a filo est eleemosyna, at Constantianum genero juncturer, modest tamen Constantianum reperta occasione interfecte, poenas detestatim exultat. (Italiens vol. i. book. x. p. 661.) (Anon. gen. 27.)

But that lake was situated on the Upper Ems, not far from the mouth of Nornen, where the river Rhia (a name which the wife of Galerius gave to the drained country) and unalterably thus borne from the Rhine to the Danube. (Securus in p. 4.9.) I should therefore suspect that Victor has confounded the lake Petus with the Voltaire marshes; or, as they are now called, lake Sevan. It is situated in the lazurian mountain, and its extent is not less than 12 Hungarian miles (about 70 English) in length, and twice as much in breadth. See Severus in Ch. 13. (Italiens C. P. 25.) and (Aurelius Victor, l. viii. c. 16.) describe the symptoms and progress of his disorder with singular accuracy and great perspicuity. An agreesent.

If any like the late Dr. Jolin, Remarks on Ecclesiastical His- torv, v. 28. would be ready to deliberate on the depths of the persecutors, I would recommend to their persual an admirable passage of Grotius, (Hist. i. vii. p. 322.) concerning the last Illustri of Philip II. of Spain.
cian Bosphorus formed their mutual boundary, and the banks of those narrow seas, which flowed in the midst of the Roman world, were covered with soldiers, with arms, and with fortifications. The deaths of Maximian and of Galerius reduced the number of emperors to four. The sense of their true interest soon connected Licinius and Constantius. The choice between Licinius and Maxentius, and their unhappy subjects, expected, with terror, the bloody consequences of their inevitable dissensions, which were no longer restrained by the fear or the respect which they had entertained for Galerius.

The many crimes and misfortunes, occasioned by the passions of the Roman princes, there is some pleasure in discovering a single action which may be ascribed to their virtue. In the sixth year of his reign, Constantine visited the city of Autun, and generously bestowed the arrears of tribute, reducing at the same time the proportion of their assessment from twenty-five to eighteen thousand heads, subject to the real and personal capitation. Yet even this indulgence affords the most unquestionable proof of the public mercy. This tax was so extremely oppressive, either in the mode of effecting it, or whilst the revenue was increased by extortion, it was diminished by despair: a considerable part of the territory of Autun was left uncultivated; and great numbers of the provincials rather chose to live as exiles and outlaws, than to support the weight of civil society. It is clear that the beautiful senator was reduced, by a partial act of liberality, one among the many evils which he had caused by his general maxims of administration. But even those maxims were less the effect of choice than of necessity. And if we except the death of Maximian, the reign of Constantine in Gaul, and the former part of the reign of Constantine in the provinces of Africa.

Maxentius. From the whole course of his reign, Constantine might view with request the conduct of Maxentius with abhorrence, and that of the Roman cities with contempt; for we have no reason to presume that he would have taken up arms to punish the one, or to relieve the other. But the tyrant of Italy rashly ventured to provoke a formidable enemy, whose ambition had been hitherto restrained by considerations of prudence, rather than by principles of justice. After the death of Maximian, his titles, according to the
The enterprise was as full of danger and ill success now as it had been before. Constantine had made the most formidable preparations; his armies were augmented by the accession of the Illyrians, who were led by their prince Zosimus, and by the inhabitants of the whole monarchy of the west, who had already prepared a very considerable force to invade the Gallic provinces on the side of Rhaetia; and though he could not expect any assistance from Lnicinus, he was flattered with the hope that the legion of Illyricum, allured by his promises, would desert the standard of that prince, and unanimously declare themselves his soldiers and subjects. Constantine no longer hesitated. He had deliberated with caution, he acted with vigour. He gave a private audience to the ambassadors, who, in the name of the senate and people, conjured him to desist from that mad purpose; and he hesitated not in regard to the timid remonstrances of his council, he resolved to prevent the enemy, and to carry the war into the heart of Italy.

Preparations. The enterprise was as full of danger and as of glory; and the unsuccessful event of two former invasions was sufficient to inspire the most serious apprehensions. The veteran troops who revered the name of Maximian, had embraced in both those wars the party of his son, and were now restrained by a sense of honour, as well as of interest, from entertaining an idea of a second descent. Maxentius, who considered the first defence of his throne, had increased them to their ancient establishment; and they composed, including the rest of the Italians who were enlisted into his service, a formidable body of fourscore thousand men. Forty thousand Moors and Carthaginians had been raised since the reduction of Africa. Even Sicily furnished its proportion of troops; and the armies of Maxentius amounted to one hundred and seventy thousand foot, and eighteen thousand horse. The wealth of Italy supplied the expenses of the war; and the adjacent provinces were exhausted, to form immense magazines of corn and every other kind of provision.

The whole force of Constantine consisted of ninety thousand foot and eight thousand horse; and as the defence of the Rhine required an extraordinary attention during the absence of the emperor, it was not in his power to employ above half his troops in the Italian expedition, unless he sacrificed the public safety to his private quarrel. At the head of about forty thousand soldiers, he marched to encounter an enemy whose numbers were at least four times superior to his own. But the armies of Rome, placed at a secure distance from danger, were enervated by indulgence and luxury. Habitud to the baths and theatres of Rome, they took the field with reluctance, and were chiefly composed of veterans who had almost forgiven, or of new levies who had never acquired, the use of arms, and the practice of war. The hardy legions of Gaul had long defended the territories of the empire against the barbarians of the north; and in the performance of that laborious service, their valour was exercised, and their discipline confirmed. There appeared the same difference between the leaders as between the armies. Caprice or flattery had tempted Maxentius with the hopes of conquest; but these aspiring hopes soon gave way to the habits of plea- sure for a soldier and a prince. The intrepid mind of Constantine had been trained from his earliest youth to war, to action, and to military command.

When Hannibal marched from Gaul Constantine passed into Italy, he was obliged, first to discover the Alps, and then to open, a way over mountains and through savage nations, that had never yielded a passage to a regular army. The Alps were then guarded by nature, they are now fortified by art. Citadels constructed with no less skill than labour and expense, command every avenue into the plain, and on that side the问卷 Italian princes inaccessible to the enemies of the king of Sardinia. But in the immediate period, the generals, who have attempted the passage, have seldom experienced any difficulty or resistance. In the age of Constantine, the peasants of the mountains were civilized and obedient subjects; the country was plentifully stocked with provisions, and the stupendous highways, which the Romans had carried over the Alps, opened several communications between Gaul and Italy. Constantine preferred the road of the Cottian Alps, or, as it is now called, of mount Cenis, and led his troops with such active diligence, that he descended into the plain of Piedmont before the court of Maxentius had received any certain intelligence of his departure from the banks of the Rhine. The city of Susa, however, is situated at the foot of mount Cenis, was surrounded with walls, and provided with a garrison sufficiently numerous to check the progress of an invader; but the impatience of Constantine's troops disdained the tedious forms of a siege. The same day that they appeared before Susa, they applied fire to the gates, and ladders to the walls; and mounting to the assault amidst a shower of stones and arrows, they entered the place sword in hand, and cut in pieces the greatest part of the garrison. The city was abandoned; and the troops of Constantine, and the remains of Susa preserved from total destruction. About forty miles from thence, a more severe contest awaited him. A Battle of Turin, numerous army of Italians was assembled under the lieutenants of Maxentius, in the plains of Turin. Its principal strength consisted in a species of heavy cavalry, which the Romans, since the decline of their discipline, had borrowed from the nations of the east. The horses, as well as the men, were clothed in complete armour, the joints of which were artfully adapted to the motions of their bodies. The aspect of this cavalry was formidable, their weight almost irresistible; and as, on this occasion, their generals had drawn them up in a compact column or wedge, with a sharp point, and with spreading flanks, they flattened themselves that they should easily break and

The three principal passages of the Alps between Gaul and Italy, were mount Cenis, mount Galva, and mount Genovez. Tradition, and a resemblance of names, (alpes flavum) has assigned the first of these for the march of Hannibal. (Panegyr. de Consta. 1. iv. p. 6.) The Alps, mount Cenis, and Mount Galva, have led him mount Genovez. But notwithstanding the authority of an express passage, and of express reconnaissance, these mountain passages are not at present known, nor any one attempting a crossing, that manner by M. Grosley. trample down the army of Constantine. They might, perhaps, have concluded their design; but not their ever-vexed adversary embraced the same method of defence, which in similar circumstances had been practised by Aurelian. The skilful evolutions of Constantine divided and baffled this massy column of cavalry. The troops of Maxentius fled in confusion towards the gates of the city. The genera of the vanquished, and, with them, very few escaped the sword of the victorious pursuers. By this important service, Turin deserved to experience the clemency and even favour of the conqueror. He made his entry into the imperial palace of Milan, and almost all the cities of Italy between the Alps and the Po were either taken or put only to fire and the pillage of the party, but embraced with zeal the party, of Constantine. 8

Siege and battle. From Milan to Rome, the Banian of Verona, and Flaminian highways offered an easy march of about four hundred miles; but though Constantine was impatient to encounter the tyrant, he prudently directed his operations against another army of Italians, who, by their strength and position, might either oppose his progress, or in case of a misfortune, might intercept his retreat. Rufius Pompeianus, a general distinguished by his valour and ability, had under his command the city of Verona, and all the territories of the province of Venetia. As soon as he was informed that Constantine was advancing towards him, he detached a large body of cavalry, which was defeated in an engagement near Brescia, and pursued by the Gallic legions as far as the gates of Verona. The rapid progress of the emperor, the difficulties of the siege of Verona, immediately presented themselves to the sagacious mind of Constantine. 1 The city was accessible only by a narrow peninsula towards the west, as the other three sides were surrounded by the Adige, a rapid river which embarrassed the city of Verona. The besiegers derived an inexhaustible supply of men and provisions. It was not without great difficulty, and after several fruitless attempts, that Constantine found means to pass the river at some distance above the city, and in a place where the torrent was less violent. He then encompassed Verona with strong lines, pressed his attacks with prudent vigour, and repelled a desperate sally of Pompeianus. That intrepid general, when he had used every means of defence that the strength of the place or that of the garrison could afford, softly escaped from Verona, anxious not for his own safety but for the public safety. With indefatigable diligence he soon collected an army sufficient either to meet Constantine in the field, or to attack him if he obstinately remained within his lines. The emperor, attentive to the motions, and informed of the approach, of so formidable an enemy, left a part of his legions to continue the operations of the siege, whilst, at the head of those troops on whose valour and fidelity he more particularly depended, he advanced in person to engage the general of Maxentius. The army of Gaul was drawn up in two lines, according to the usual practice of war; but their experienced leader perceived that the numbers of the Italians far exceeded his own, suddenly changed his position, and, reducing the second, extended the front of his first line to a just proportion with that of the enemy. Such evolutions, which only veteran troops can execute without confusion in a moment of danger, commonly prove decisive; but as this engagement began towards the close of the day, and was contested with great obstinacy during the whole night, there was less room for the conduct of the generals than for the courage of the soldiers. The return of light displayed the victory of Constantine, and a field of carnage covered with many thousands of the vanquished Italians. Their general, Pompeianus, was found among the slain; Verona immediately surrendered at discretion, and the garrison was made prisoners of war. 9 When the officers of the victorious army congratulated their master on this signal advantage, he addressed them, with some respectful complaints, of such a nature, however, as the jealous monarchs will listen to without displeasure. They represented to Constantine, that, not contented with performing all the duties of a commander, he had exposed his own person with an example of a martial spirit and of the highest fortitude; and they conjured him for the future to pay more regard to the preservation of a life, in which the safety of Rome and of the empire was involved. 9 5 Histoire des Romains ou essai sur l'Empire. The vanquished prince because of course the enemy of Rome.

The celerity of Constantine's march has been compared to the rapid conquest of Italy by the first of the Caesars; nor is the flattering parallel repugnant to the truth of history. By no more than a single day's march the whole army encircled the city of Verona and the final decision of the war. Constantine had always apprehended that the tyrant would consult the dictates of fear, and perhaps of prudence; and that, instead of risking his last hopes in a general engagement, he would retreat and take refuge within the walls of Rome. His ample magazines secured him against the danger of famine; and as the situation of Constantine admitted not of delay, he might have been reduced to the sad necessity of destroying with fire and sword the imperial city, the noblest reward of his victory, and the last chance of falling with the race of Roman emperors. His actual conduct of the war and the spirit of his letters show him to be a contemporaneous writer. He is a most distinguished adherent of Maxentius must have expected to share his fate, as they had shared his prosperity and its crimes; but when the Roman people loudly demanded a greater number of victors, the conqueror resisted, with firmness and humanity, those servile clamours, which were dictated by avarice as well as by resentment. Informers were punished and discouraged; the innocent, who had suffered under the late tyranny, were recalled from exile, and restored to their estates. A general act of oblivion quieted the minds, and settled the property of the people, both in Italy and in Africa. The first order of the conqueror, on his returning to Rome with his presence, he recapitulated his own services and exploits in a modest oration, asserted that illustrious order of his sincere regard, and promised to re-establish its ancient dignity and privileges. The grateful senate repaid these unmeaning professions by a large annual grant of public revenue to the conqueror, with power to bestow; and without presuming to ratify the authority of Constantine, they passed a decree to assign him the first rank among the three Augusti, who governed the Roman world. Games and festivals were instituted to preserve the fame of his victory, and several edicts, raised at the expense of Maxentius, were dedicated to the honour of his successful rival. The triumphal arch of Constantine still remains a melancholy proof of the decline of the arts, and a singular testimony of the meanest vanity. As it was not possible to find in the capital of the empire a sculptor who was capable of adorning that public monument, the arch of Trajan, without any respect either for his memory or for the rules of propriety, was stripped of its most elegant figures. The difference of persons and orders, of actions and characters, was totally disregarded. The Parthian captives who were near the triumphal arch received their arms beyond the Euphrates; and curious antiquarians can still discover the head of Trajan on the trophies of Constantine. The new ornaments which it was necessary to introduce between the vacancies of ancient sculpture, are executed in the rudest and most unskilful manner that the art has produced.

The final abolition of the pretorian and conduct of guards was a measure of prudence as well as of revenge. Those haughty troops, whose numbers and privileges had been restored, and even augmented, by Maxentius, were for ever suppressed by Constantine. Their fortified camp was destroyed, and the few pretorians who had escaped the fury of the sword, were dispersed among the legions, and banished to the frontiers of the empire, where they

1 See Panegy. Vet. ix. x. 17. The former of these orators undertakes the task of collecting from Africa and the islands. And yet, if there is any truth in the story recorded by Eusebius, (in Vit. Constantii, l. c. 60.) the imperial garrison is mentioned only to show that Constantine entered the city of Rome, "in the midst of the battle between the two armies," and "with his own hands" seized the conqueror.

3 A very idle rumor soon prevails, that Maxentius, who had not the least apprehension of being attacked, had a very artful scheme to destroy the army of the pretorian, but that the wooden beams were too loosely joined together to support any of the necessary parts of the building. A similar conduct of Constantine, unfortunately broke down under the weight of the flying houses. M. de Tilleul, Hist. des Emper. carm. tom. iv. part. i. p. 57.

4 Excepta laurae. Panegy. Vet. x. 17. The speeches of Zosimus and Suidas ought to prevail over the silence of Laurens, Nazarius, and the anonymous but contemporary orator, who composed the third Panegyric.

5 Suidas, I. B. B., 70. 79, and the two Panegyres, the former of which was pronounced a few months afterwards, afford the clearest notion of this great battle. Laurens, Eusebius, and even the Epitomes supply several useful hints.

6 Zosimus, the enemy of Constantine, allows (l. B. p. 87) that only a few of the friends of Maxentius were put to death; but we may infer the expression of Nazarius, (Panegy. Vet. x. 6.) Omnipotens Deus qui balibat cum arma passes. The former, says the other orator (Panegy. Vet. ix. 20. 55.) contents himself with observing, that Constantine, when he entered Rome, did not imitate the savage manner of his predecessor.

7 See the two Panegyres, and the laws of this and the ensuing year, in the Augustana. Panegy. Vet. ix. 20. Laurens de M. P. d. 41. Maximus, who was confessedly the eldest Caesars, claimed, with some show of reason, the first rank among the Augustans.

might be serviceable without again becoming dangerous. By suppressing the troops which were usually stationed in Rome, Constantine gave the fatal blow to the dignity of the senate and people, and the discipline, capital but wise exceptions. His eminence, his protection, the insults or neglect of its distant master. We may observe, that in this last effort to preserve their expiring freedom, the Romans, from the apprehension of a tribute, had raised Maxentius to the throne. He exacted that tribute from the senate under the free gift, and with the protection of Constantine. He vanquished the tyrant, and converted the free gift into a perpetual tax. The senators, according to the declaration which was required of their property, were divided into several classes. The most opulent paid annually eight pounds of gold, the next class paid four, the last two, and those whose poverty might have claimed an exemption, were assessed however at seven pieces of gold. Besides the regular members of the senate, their sons, their descendants, and even their relations, enjoyed the same privileges as the holders the heavy burthens of the senatorial order; nor will it longer excite our surprise, that Constantine should be attentive to increase the number of persons who were included under so useful a description. After the defeat of Maxentius, the victorious emperor passed no more than two months in Rome, where he visited两次 during the remainder of his life, to celebrate the solemn festivals of the tenth and of the twentieth years of his reign. Constantine was almost perpetually in motion to exercise the legions, or to inspect the state of the provinces. Tyes, Milan, Aquileia, Stratum, Nicomedia, and other places, were the actual residence, of his residence, for he founded a new Rome on the confines of Europe and Asia.

His alliance with Licinius. A.D. 313. March.

Before Constantine marched into Italy, he had secured the friendship, or at least the neutrality, of Licinius, the Illyrian emperor. He had promised his sister Constantia in marriage to that prince: but the celebration of the nuptials was deferred till after the conclusion of the war, and the interview of the two conquerors at Milan, which was appointed for that purpose, appeared to cement the union of their families and interests. In the midst of these festivities, they were suddenly obliged to take leave of each other. An inroad of the Franks summoned Constantine to the Rhine, and the hostile approach of the sovereign of Asia demanded the immediate presence of the emperor. Maxentius had been the second of Constantine's liberators, was now discouraged by his fate, he resolved to try the fortune of a civil war. He moved out of Syria, towards the frontiers of Bithynia, in the depth of winter. The season was severe and tempestuous; great numbers of men as well as horses perished in the snow; and as the roads were broken by incessant rains, he was obliged to leave behind him a considerable part of the heavy baggage, which was unable to follow the rapidity of his forces.

1 Provinciae legiones as subsidia factionum apromptis quam aedificiis Roma, nabulata penisit: singul armis alipra unum illum inimicitia, Aurelius Victor. Zosimus (I. ii. p. 95) mentions this fact as an historian, but it is very piously celebrated in the ninth Passyrie.

Concerning the imperial tax, see Zosimus, l. ii. p. 151, the second title of the sixth book of the Thucydides Codex, and Commentaries, and Memoriales of the Acropolis of the Inscriptions. tom. xvii. p. 206.

3 From the Thucydides Codex, we may now begin to trace the monarchies of the world, and the dates of the battles of the day by which their place and time have been frequently altered by the carelessness of transcribers.

4 Zosimus (I. ii. p. 95) observes, that he heard the war the sister of Constantine had been betrothed to Licinius. According to the younger Victor, Dicetian was invited to the nuptials; but having ventured to plied his axe and infirmities, he received a letter filed with reproaches for his supposed partiality to the cause of Maximinus and Maximin.

5 Zosimus mentions the defeat and death of Maximin as ordinary events; but Laetanius exultates on them, (de M. P. c. 45 & 50, as exciting him to the memorable interposition of heaven. Licinius at that time was one of the protectors of the church.

of a real mother. After the death of Galerius, her ample possessions provoked the aversion, and her personal attractions excited the desires, of his successor Maximin. He had a wife still alive, but divorce was permitted by the Roman law, and the fierce passions of the tyrant demanded an immediate gratification. The answer of Valeria was such as became the daughter of a prince, and must forbid her to be thought mean; but she dressed at a time when the ashes of her husband and his benefactor were still warm; and while the sorrows of her mind were still expressed by her mourning garments. She ventured to declare, that she could place very little confidence in the professions of a man, whose cruel inconstancy was capable of repudiating a faithful and affectionate wife. On this impulse, the love of Maximin was converted into fury, and as witnesses and judges were always at his disposal, it was easy for him to cover his fury with an appearance of legal proceedings, and to assault the repulsed and miserable woman. Her estates were confiscated, her emoluments and domesticus devoted to the most inhuman tortures, and several innocent and respectable matrons, who were honoured with her friendship, suffered death, on a false accusation of adultery. The emperor himself, together with her mother Pliska, was condemned to exile; and as they were ignominiously hurried from place to place before they were confined to a sequestered village in the deserts of Syria, they exposed their shame and distress to the provinces of the east, which, during thirty years, had respected their august dignity. Dio- clian, who afterwards took the most signal efforts to alleviate the misfortunes of his daughter, has recorded that he expected for the imperial purple, which he had conferred upon Maximin, he entreated that Valeria might be permitted to share his retirement of Salona, and to close the eyes of her afflicted father. He entreated, but as he could no longer threaten, his prayers were received with coldness and disdain; and the pride of Maximin was gratified, in treating Diocletian as a suppliant, and his daughter as a criminal. The death of Maximin seemed to assure the empress of a favourable alteration to their fortune. The public disorder relaxed the vigilance of their guard, and they easily found means to escape from the place of their exile, and to repair, though with some precaution, and in disguise, to the court of Licinius. His behaviour, in the first days of his reign, and in the honourable reception which he gave to young Candidinus, inspired Valeria with a secret satisfaction, both on her own account, and on that of her adopted son. But these grateful prospects were soon succeeded by horror and astonishment; and the bloody executions which stained the palace of Nicomedia, sufficiently convinced her, that the throne of Maximin was filled by a tyrant more inhuman than himself. Valeria consoled her sad and hasty flight by all con- companied by her mother Pliska, they wandered above fifteen months through the provinces, concealed in

The sensual appetites of Maximin were gratified at the expense of his children; and he who forced away wives and virgins, examined their naked charms with anxious curiosity, lest any part of them should escape his insatiable curiosity. Cypreas and disdain were considered as treason, and the obstinate fair one was condemned to be drowned. A custom was gradually introduced, by which every person should marry a wife without the permission of the emperor, and then issue in omnia nuptias nugatorio postscript. Licinius, immediately after his election, to exalt the name of a new Bacchus, showed his adoration of the deus M. P. c. 51. He relates the misfortunes of the innocent wife and daughter of Diocletian with the measure of their sufferings. See his history, c. 51. The curious reader, who consults the Valesian Fragment, p. 713, will perhaps excuse me of giving a bold and licentious paraphrase; but if he considers it with attention, he will acknowledge that my interpretation is probable and consistent. But if the situation of Maon, or, as it is now called, Labyth, in Carniola, (D’Anville Geographie Ancienne, tom. i. p. 187.) may suggest a conjecture, as well as the island of the Jutun Alp, that important territory becomes a natural object of dispute between the sovereigns of Italy and of Illyricum. But the situation of this island (which was preserved in the obscure ruins of Svevia,) was situated about fifty miles from Citium, the capital of Illyricum, and about one hundred from Taurinum, or Bul-Battle of Châlons. Inconceivable forces which in this important contest two most powerful motions, when brought into the field, it may be inferred, that the one was suddenly provoked, and that the other was unexpectedly surprised. The emperor of the west had only twenty thousand, and the sovereigns of the east no more than fifty and thirty thousand, men. The inferiority of numbers was, however, counter-pointed by the advantage of the ground. Constantine had taken post in a defile about half a mile in breadth, between a steep hill and a deep morass, and in that situation he steadily expected and repulsed the first attack of the enemy. He pursued his success, and advanced in the plain. The veteran army of Illyricum, rallied under the standard of a leader who had been trained to arms in the school of Probus and Diocletian. The missile weapons on both sides were soon exhausted; the two armies, with equal valor, rushed to a closer engagement of swords and spears, and the doubtful contest had already lasted from the dawn of the day to a late hour of the evening, when the right wing, which Constantine led in person, made a vigorous and decisive charge. The judicious retreat of Licinius saved the remainder of his troops from a total defeat; but when he computed his loss, while still determined to maintain the advantage of the ground, he thought it unsafe to pass the night in the presence of an active and vigorous enemy. Abandoning his camp and magazines, he marched away with secrecy and dilligence at the head of the greatest part of his cavalry, and was soon renewed by another army of a powerful kind. His diligence preserved his wife, his son, and his treasures, which he had deposited at Sirmium. Licinius passed through that city, and breaking down the bridge on the Sava hastened to collect a new army in Dacia and Thrace. In his flight he bestowed the precious title of Caesar on Valens, his general of the Illyrian Forces.

The plain of Mardia in Thrace was the theatre of a second battle no less obstinate and bloody than the former. The troops on both sides displayed the same valour and discipline; and the victory was once more decided by the superior abilities of Constantine, who directed a body of five thousand men to gain an advantageous height, from whence, during the heat of the action, they attacked the rear of the enemy, and made a very considerable slaughter. The troops of Licinius, however, presented in the face of the enemy a formidable appearance, and their approach of night put an end to the combat, and secured their retreat towards the mountains of Macedonia.

The loss of two battles, and of his bravest veterans, reduced the fierce spirit of Licinius to sue for peace. His ambassador Mistrinius was admitted to the imperial presence with great circumspection; yet he was put on the common topics of moderation and humanity, which are so familiar to the eloquence of the vanquished; represented, in the most insinuating language, that the event of the war was still doubtful, whilst its inevitable calamities were alike pernicious to both the contending parties; and declared, that he was authorized to propose a lasting and honourable peace in the name of the two emperors his masters. Constantine received the mention of Valens with indignation and contempt.

It was not for such a purpose," he sternly replied, "that we have advanced from the shores of the western ocean in an uninterrupted course of combats and victories, that, after rejecting an ungrateful kinsman, we should accept for our colleague a contemptible slave. The abdication of Valens is the first article of the treaty."

It was necessary to accept this humiliating condition, and the unhappy Valens, after a reign of a few days, was deprived of the purple and of his life. As soon as this obstacle was removed, the tranquility of the Roman world was easily restored. The successive defeats of Licinius had ruined his forces, but they had dissolved his counsels. Their extremity, and the efforts of des-pair are sometimes formidable; and the good sense of Constantine preferred a great and certain advantage to a third trial of the chance of arms. He (Treaty of peace, December 318) consented to leave his rival, or, as he his friends, and his brother, in the possession of Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt; but the provinces of Pannonia, Dalmutian, Dacia, Macedonia, and Greece, were yielded to the western empire, and the dominions of Constantine now extended from the confines of Cædigna to the extremity of Pelopon-nesus. The provinces of Probus and Diocletian had been added by the transfer of the provinces of Thrace.

The reconciliation of Constantine and Licinius, though it was intimidated by imitations of Constantine's resentment and jealousy, by the remonstrance of the Senate, and the bribe of the Senate, and the bribe of seven hundred and thirty thousand solidi, A.D. 315—233. was not long maintained. The emperor of the east comprehended furtur-er]<enumeration> of future dangers, maintained, however, above eight years, the tranquility of the Roman world. As a very regular series of the imperial laws commen-ses about this period, it would not be difficult to transcribe the civil regulations which employed the leisure of Constantine. But the most important of his institutions are intimately connected with the new system of policy and religion, which was not perfectly established till the last and peaceful years of his reign. There are many of his laws, which, as far as they concern the rights and property of individuals, and the practice of the bar, are more properly referred to the private than to the public jurisprudence of the empire; and he published many edicts of so local and temporary a nature, that they would ill deserve the notice of a general history. Two laws, however, may be selected from those which have stood the one for the singular importance for its singularity; the former for its remarkable benevocation, the latter for its excessive severity. 1. The horrid practice, so familiar to the ancients, of exposing or murdering their new-born infants, was become every day more frequent in the provinces, and especially in Italy. It was first of discussion, and was principally occasioned by the intolerable burden of taxes, and by the vexations as well as cruel prosecutions of the officers of the revenue against their insolvent debtors. The less opulent or less industrious part of mankind, instead of rejoicing in an increase of family, deemed it an act of paternal tenderness to release their children from the impending miseries of a life which they themselves were unable to support. The humanity of Constantine, moved, perhaps, by some recent and extraordinary instances of despair, engaged him to address an edict to all the cities of Italy, and afterwards of Africa, directing immediate and sufficient provision to be made for the subsistence of those who should produce before the magistrates the children whom their own poverty would not allow them to educate. But the promise was too liberal, and the provision too vague, to effect any general or permanent benefit. The law, though it may merit some praise, served rather to divide the people than to unite them. It is true that it remains an authentic monument to contradict and confound those valorous orators, who were too well satisfied with their own situation to discover either vice or misery under the government of a generous sovereign. 2. The laws of Constantine against rapes were dictated by a similar spirit to his edict against the weak sex. In the year 289, he had added his consent, by a promise, to every new law admitted into the barbarous code of Justinian. If the descriptions of that crime was applied not only to the brutal violence which compelled, but even to the gentle seduction which might persuade, an unmarried woman, under the age of twenty-five, to leave the house of her parents, 1 the successful ravisher was punished with death; and as if simple death was inadequate to the enormity of his guilt, he was either burnt alive, or torn in pieces by wild beasts in the amphitheatre. The virgin's declaration, that she had been carried away with her own consent, instead of saving her lover, exposed her to the same penalty. The discretion of the parents was intrusted to the parents of the guilty or unfortunate maid; and if the sentiments of nature prevailed on them to dissemble the injury, and to repair by a subsequent marriage the honour of their family, they were themselves punished by exile and confiscation. The slaves, whose master was exposed to the consequences of having been accessory to the rape or seduction, were burnt alive, or put to death by the ingenuous torture of pouring down their throats a quantity of melted lead. As the crime was of a public kind, the accusation was permitted even to strangers. The commencement of the suit was supposed to demand no delay; and the consequences of the sentence were extended to the innocent offspring of such an irregular union. But whenever the offense inspires lesser horror than the punishment, the rigour of penal law is obliged to give way to the common feelings of mankind. The most odious parts of this edict was softened or repeated in various forms. The crimes of the public interest were very frequently alleviated, by partial acts of mercy, the stern temper of his general institutions. Such, indeed, was the singular humour of that emperor, who showed himself as indulgent, and even remiss, in the execution of his laws, as he was severe, and even cruel, in the enacting them. It is scarcely possible to observe a more decisive symptom of weakness, either in the character of the prince, or in the constitution of the government. 3

The civil administration was some time interrupted by the military defence of the empire. 4 The emperor, though the most amiable character, who had received with the title of Caesar the command of the Rhine, distinguished his conduct, as well as valour, in several victories over the Franks and Alamanni; and taught the barbarians of that frontier to dread the eldest son of Constantine, and the grand-son of Constantius. 5 The emperor himself had assumed the more difficult and important province of the Danube. The Goths, who in the time of Claudius and Aurelian had felt the weight of the Roman arms, respected the power of the empire, even in the midst of its intestine divisions. But the strength of that warlike nation was so increased by the union of the two tribes that a single generation was sufficient to cause it to become the terror of the empire. A new generation had arisen, who no longer remembered the misfortunes of ancient days: the Sar- matians of the lake Medois followed the Gothic standard either as subjects or as allies, and their united force was poured upon the countries of Illyricum Cam- ponia, Marcus, and Benonjia appear to have been the scenes of several memorable sieges and battles; 6 and though Constantine encountered a very obstinate resistance, he prevailed at length in the contest, and the Goths were compelled to purchase an ignominious re- treat, by restoring the booty and prisoners which they had carried off, and by paying the indemnity prescribed by the indignation of the emperor. He resolved to class- tise as well as to repulse the insolent barbarians who had dared to invade the territories of Rome. At the head of his legions he passed the Danube, after re- pairing the bridge which had been constructed by Trajan, penetrated into the strongest recesses of Dacia, and when he had inflicted a severe revenge, con- secended to give peace to the suppliant Goths, on con- dition that, as often as they were required, they should supply his armies with a body of forty thousand sol- diers. 7 Exploits like these were no doubt honourable to Constantius, and gained for him the praise of his time; but it may surely be questioned, whether they can justify the ex- aggerated assertion of Eusebius, that all Scythia, as far as the extremity of the north, divided as it was into so many names and nations of the most various and savage manners, had been added by his victorious arms to the Roman empire. 8

1 His son very expressly assigns the true reason of the repeal, "Ne sub specie strictrae judicii aliquem in ulteriora criminis dilatio neretur." Cod. Theod. tom. iii. p. 183.
2 Eusebius (Hist. eccl. i. 31.) chooses to affirm, that in the reign of this emperor, the sword of justice hung idle in the hands of the magistrates. Eusebius himself (l. i. c. 29, 34.) and the Theod. Cod. x. 6, 3, have expressed himself more explicitly, without the necessity of coming to the want either of atrocious criminals or of penal laws.

6 It is related (Cod. Theod. tom. ii. c. 27. c. 2.) that the emperor always ministered to the interests of his province. He was the first who introduced the cry of "Ne enrico alicui in ulteriora criminis dilatio neretur." Cod. Theod. tom. iii. p. 183.
7 See Zuassin, l. ii. p. 93, 94, though the narrative of that hist- orian is neither accurate nor complete. The emperor was not suffi- ciently educated, and his maxims were not sufficiently expressed, to be understood by his subjects. (See Huguelet, Essai historique sur les finances romaines, p. 35.)
8 In the Caesars of Julian, (p. 229, Commentaire de Spanheim, p. 252.) Constantine boasts, that he had recovered the province (Dacia) which Trajan had subdued. But it is insinuated by Solinus, that they were like the gardens of Adonis, which fade and wither almost the moment they appear.
9 Jornsander, in the edict of Theodosian, says that it is not certain whether we may entirely depend on his authority. Such an alliance has a very recent origin, and is entirely suited to the times of the beginning of the fourth century.
10 Eusebius in Vit. Constant. i. c. 8. This passage, however,
In this exalted state of glory it was impossible that Constantine should any longer endure a partner in the empire. Confiding in the superlative rapid military success he had obtained, without any previous injury, to exert them for the destruction of Licinius, whose advanced age and unpopular vices seemed to offer a very easy conquest. But the old emperor, awakened by the approaching danger, determined to transfer the command of his army to his son, as well as to the ablest generals of his enemies. Calling forth that spirit and those abilities by which he had deserved the friendship of Galerius and the imperial purple, he prepared himself for the contest, collected the forces of the east, and soon filled the plains of Hadrianople with his troops, and the straits of the Hellespont with his fleet. The army consisted of one hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; and as the cavalry was driven, for the most part, from Phrygia and Cappadocia, we may conceive a more favourable opinion of the beauty of the horses, than of the courage and dexterity of the riders. The fleet consisted of three hundred and fifty galleys of three ranks of oars. An hundred and thirty of these were furnished by Egypt, and the adjacent coast of Africa. An hundred and ten sailed from the ports of Phœnicia and the island of Cyprus; and the maritime provinces of Thrace, Bithynia, and Caria, were likewise obliged to provide an hundred and ten galleys. The troops of Constantine were ordered to rendezvous at Thessalonica; they amounted to above an hundred and twenty thousand horse and foot. Their emperor was satisfied with their martial appearance, and his army contained many soldiers, though fewer men, than that of his eastern competitor. The legions of Constantine were levied in the warlike provinces of Europe; action had confirmed their discipline, victory had elevated their hopes, and there were among them a great number of veteran troops, after fifteen glorious campaigns under the same leader, prepared themselves to deserve an honourable dismissal by a last effort of their valor. But the naval preparations of Constantine were in every respect much inferior to those of Licinius. The maritime cities of Greece sent their respective quotas of men and vessels to the celebrated harbour of Piræus, and their united forces consisted of no more than two hundred small vessels: a very feeble armament, if it is compared with those formidable fleets which were equipped and maintained by the republic of Athens during the Peloponnesian war. Since Italy and the provinces of Gaul and Britain were traversed, or at least frightened by the troops of Licinius, those naval establishments of Misenum and Ravenna had been gradually neglected; and as the shipping and mariners of the empire were supported by commerce rather than by war, it was natural that they should the most abound in the industrious provinces of Egypt and Asia. It is only surprising that the eastern emperor, who possessed so great a superiority at sea, should have neglected the opportunity of carrying an offensive war into the centre of his rival's dominions.

Battle of Hadrianople. Instead of ENTERING SUCH AN ACTIVE resolution, which might have changed the whole face of the war, the prudent Licinius expected the approach of his rival in a camp near Hadrianople, which he had fortified with an anxious care that betrayed his apprehension of the event. Constantine directed his march from Thessalonica towards that part of Thrace, till he found he could not dispute the banks of the broad and rapid stream of the Hebrus, and discovered the numerous army of Licinius, which filled the steep ascent of the hill, from the river to the city of Hadrianople. Many days were spent in doubtful and distant skirmishes; but at length the obstacles of the passage and the attack were removed. In this place we might relate a wonderful exploit of Constantine, which, though it can scarcely be paralleled in poetry or romance, is celebrated, not by a venal orator devoted to his fortune, but by an historian, the partial enemy of his name. We are assured that the valiant emperor threw himself into the river Hebrus, accompanied only by twelve horsemen, and that by the effort or terror of his invincible arm, he broke, slaughtered, and put to flight a host of an hundred and fifty thousand men. The credulity of Zosimus prevailed over his passion for Truth, that among the events of the memorable battle of Hadrianople, he seems to have selected and embellished, not the most important, but the most marvellous. The valour and danger of Constantine are attested by a slight wound which he received in the thigh, but it may be discovered in many fragments preserved by Marcianus and Cassianus, that the victory was obtained no less by the conduct of the general than by the courage of the hero; that a body of five thousand archers marched round to occupy a thick wood in the rear of the enemy, whose attention was diverted by the destruction of a bridge, and that Licinius, perplexed by so many surprizing events, was reluctantly drawn from his advantageous post to combat on equal ground in the plain. The contest was no longer equal. His confused multitude of new levies was easily vanquished by the disciplined, well-regular army of Constantine, and the provisions which the latter had remained to the mountians, surrendered themselves next day to the discretion of the conqueror, and his rival, who equal strength to the field, confined himself within the walls of Byzantium.

The siege of Byzantium, which was immediately undertaken by Constantine, was attended with great labour and uncertainty. In the late civil wars, the fortifications of the capital were so much neglected that it was no wonder that it was so easily taken. Of the 1514.) The naval commanders of Constantine were summoned to his camp, and received his positive orders to force the passage of the Hellespont, as the fleet of Licinius, instead of seeking and destroying their feeble enemy, continued inactive in those narrow straits where its superiority of numbers was of little use or advantage. Crispus, the emperor's eldest son, was intrusted with the execution of this daring enterprise, which he performed with so much courage and success, that he deserved the esteem, and most probably excited the jealousy, of his father. The engagement lasted two days, and in the evening of the first, the contending fleets, after a considerable and unusual loss, retired into their respective harbours of Europe and Asia. The second day about noon a strong south wind sprang up, which carried the vessels of Crispus with difficulty out of the strait.

against the enemy, and as the casual advantage was improved by his skilful intrepidity, he soon obtained a complete victory. An hundred and thirty vessels were destroyed, their crews were killed, and Amandus, the admiral of the Asiatic fleet, escaped with the utmost difficulty to the shores of Chalcedon. As soon as the Hellespont was open, a plentiful conveyance of provisions flowed into the camp of Constantine, who had already advanced the operations of the siege. He constructed artificial mounds, of earth of an equal height with the ramparts of Byzantium. The lofty towers which were erected on that foundation, galled the besieged with large stones and darts from the military engines, and the battering rams had shaken the walls in several places. If Licinius persisted much longer in that hazardous enterprise he was involved in the ruin, of the place. Before he was surrounded he prudently removed his person and treasures to Chalcedon in Asia; and as he was always desirous of associating companions to the hopes and dangers of his fortune, he now bestowed the title of Caesar on Martinianus, who exercised one of the most important offices of the empire.

The battle of Chrysolus. Such were still the resources, and such the abilities, of Licinius, that, after so many successive defeats, he collected in Bithynia a new army of fifty or sixty thousand men, while the activity of the emperor was employed in marching against Byzantium. The vigilant emperor did not however neglect the last struggles of his antagonist. A considerable part of his victorious army was transported over the Bosphorus in small vessels, and the decisive engagement was fought soon after their landing on the heights of Chrysopolis, or, as it is now called, of Scutari. The troops of Licinius, though they were lately raised, ill armed, and worse disciplined, made head against their conquerors with fruitless but desperate valor, till a total defeat, and the slaughter of five and twenty thousand men irretrievably determined the fate of the day. The emperor retired to his camp, rather with the view of gaining some time for negotiation, than with the hope of any effectual defence. Constantia, his wife and the sister of Constantine, interceded with her brother in favour of her husband, and obtained from his policy rather than from his compassion, a solemn promise, confirmed by an oath, that after the sacrifice of Martinianus, and the resignation of the purple, Licinius himself should be permitted to pass the remainder of his life in peace and affluence. The behaviour of Constantia, and her relation to the lingering particulars of that suspension of hostilities, which recalled the name of a virtuous matron, who was the sister of Augustus, and the wife of Antony. But the temper of mankind was altered, and it was no longer esteemed infamous for a Roman to survive his honour and independence. Licinius solicited and accepted the pardon of his offences, bade himself and his purple at the feet of his lord and master, was raised from the ground with insulting pity, was admitted the same day to the imperial banquet, and soon afterwards was sent away to Thessalonica, which had been chosen for the place of his confinement. His confinement was soon terminated by death, and it is doubtful whether a tumult of the soldiers, or a decree of the senate, was suggested as a motive for his execution. According to the rules of tyranny, he was accused of forming a conspiracy, and of holding a treasonable correspondence with the barbarians; but as he was never convicted, either by his own conduct, or by any legal evidence, we may perhaps be allowed, from his weakness, to presume his innocence. The memory of his crimes, branded with infamy, his statues were thrown down, and, by a hasty edict, of such mischievous tendency that it was almost immediately corrected, all his laws, and all the judicial proceedings of his reign, were at once abolished. By this victory of Constantine, the Roman world was again united under the authority of one emperor, thirty-seven years after A.D. 324, Diocletian had divided his power and provinces with his associate Maxianus.

The successive steps of the elevation of Constantine, from his first assuming the purple at York, to the re-establishment of the empire under his name, have been related with some minuteness and precision, not only as the events are in themselves both interesting and important, but still more, as they contributed to the decline of the empire by the expense of blood and treasure, and by the perpetual increase, as well of the taxes, as of the military establishment. The foundation of Constantinople, and the establishment of the Christian religion, were the immediate and memorable consequences of this revolution.

CHAPTER XV.

The progress of the christian religion, and the sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition, of the primitive christians.

A candid but rational inquiry into the importance of progress and establishment of Christian the inquiry, may be considered as a very essential part of the history of the Roman empire. While that great body was invaded by open violence, or undermined by slow decay, a pure and humble religion gently insinuated itself into the minds of men; and as models and historians, in the nations of Europe, the most distinguished portion of human kind in arts and learning as well as in arms. By the industry and zeal of the Europeans, it has been widely diffused to the most distant shores of Asia and Africa; and by the means of their colonies has been firmly established from Canada to Chili, in a world unknown to the ancients.

But this inquiry, however useful of its difficulties, is attended with two peculiar difficulties. The scanty and suspicious materials of ecclesiastical history seldom enable us to dispel the dark cloud that hangs over the first age of the church. The great law of impartiality too often obliges us to receive the imperfections of the uninspired teachers and believers of the gospel; and, to a careless observer, their faults may seem to cast a shade on the faith which they professed. But the scandal of the pious christian, and the faltering triumph of the infidel, should cease as soon as they recollect not only by whom, but likewise to whom, the divine revelation was given. The theologiyan may indulge the pleasing task of describing religion as she descended from heaven, arrayed in her native purity. A more melancholy duty is imposed on the historian. He must discover the Five causes of the growth of Christianity and the triumph of the Christian religion: faith obtained so remarkable a victory over the established religions of the earth. To this inquiry, an obvious but satisfactory answer may be returned; that it was owing to the convincing evidence of the doctrine itself, and to the mingling provi dence on the part of the Author. But, seldom read, it is true, from the Jewish religion, but purified from the narrow and unseel spirit, which, instead of inviting, had terred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses.

II. The doctrine of a future life, improved by every circumstance which could give weight or efficacy to that important truth. III. The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church. IV. The pure and austere morals of the christians. V. The union and discipline of the christian republic, which gradually formed an independent and increasing state in the midst of the Roman empire.

We have already described the re Creta. Zeal of ligious harmony of the ancient world, the Jews, and the facility with which the most different and even hostile nations embraced, or at least respected, each other's superstitions.* A single people refused to join in the common intercourse of mankind. The Jews, who, under the Assyrian and Persian monarchies, had languished for many ages the most despised portion of their slaves,35 emerged from the most deplorable situations; and as they multiplied to a surprising degree in the east, and afterwards in the west, they soon excited the curiosity and wonder of other nations.46 The sullen obstinacy with which they maintained their peculiar rites and unseasonable manners, seemed to mark them out as a distinct species of human beings. And, who faintly disguised, their implacable hatred to the rest of human-kind,47 Neither the violence of Anti ochus, nor the arts of Herod, nor the example of the circumjacent nations, could ever persuade the Jews to associate with the institutions of Moses the elegant mythology of the Greeks,48 According to their faith, in the days of universal toleration, the Romans protected a super stition which they despised.49 The polity Augustus condescended to give orders, that sacrifices should be offered for his prosperity in the temple of Jerusalem;50 while his provinces in the land of Abraham, which should have paid the same homage to the sacred capitol, would have been an object of abhorrence to himself and to his brethren. But the modulation of the conquerors was insufficient to appease the jealous prejudices of their subjects, who, were alarmed by the sight of a foreign paganism, which necessarily introduced themselves in a Roman,

* This facility did not always prevent that intolerance which so often inheres in the spirit of religion whenever it is clothed with power. To separate ecclesiastic from civil authority appears to be the only means of preserving at once religion and toleration, but this idea is very modern. Passion blending itself with opinion, often rendered the passions prejudice or persecution, to a degree, that it is true, from the Jewish religion, but purified from the narrow and unseel spirit, which, instead of inviting, had terred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses.

1. The Persians—Cambyses, the conqueror of Egypt, condemned the magistrates of Memphis to death, because they had rendered divine honours to Apollo; he came to the conclusion, that the people might be dragged through the streets, struck him with his dagger, commanded the priests to be beheaded, and ordered the towns of Egypt, who should be celebrating the feast of Apollo, should be put to the sword, and he burnt all the statues of their gods.
Not content with this intolerable reign, Cambyses ordered his satraps to burn the temple where Jupiter delivered his oracles. (See Herod. ii, c. iii, p. 282; Plutarch, vii, 2, 21, 24, 25, 29.) Xenes, during his invasion into Greece, acted on the same principle. (See Strabo, liv, xiv, p. 941.)

3. The Egyptians.—They believed themselves polluted when ever they drank from the same cup, or drank at the same table with a man of a belief different from their own. "Whoever had disguised himself as one who had killed a sacred animal, was punished with death, but if any one had killed, even unintentionally, a cat or an ass, he could not be convicted of the crime, as it was considered disgraceful and cruelty treated, often without waiting trial judgment had been pronounced upon him. In a town when their king, Ptolemy, was not yet as the declared friend of the Roman people, and when he paid his court with all possible care to strangers coming from Italy, a Roman having killed a cat, the people rushed at his house, and nettled the entrees of the nobles, whom the king turned them to, nor the terror of the Roman name, were sufficiently powerful to save this man from punishment, although he had undone himself, (Plutarch, vii, 283.)

4. The Jews, in their 15th sator, describes a bloody battle which took place between the inhabitants of Omyi and Tentyra, on account of religion. A little family quarrel, says Herodotus, was sufficient to carry on warfare, and to destroy the inhabitants, the remaining only five men of the population yet alive, with life.

book, the virtues of Peloponnesus, and their severity against aliens, the Ephesians pursuing Herodotus as an incomparable worm, or the Greeks armed against each other by religious zeal, in the war of the Amphictyonic. Neither do we speak of the frightful vience. The mad attempt of Caligula to place his own statue in the temple of Jerusalem, was defeated by the unanimous resolution of a people who dreaded death much less than such an idolatrous profanation. Their attachment to the law of Moses was equal to their detestation of foreign religions. The current of zeal and devotion, as it was contracted into a narrow channel, ran with strong, undivided strength, and sometimes with the fury, of a torrent.

Its gradual increase appeared so odious or so ridiculous to the ancient world, assumes a more awful character, since providence has designed to reveal to us the mystery hidden beneath the veil, by the development and even scrupulous attachment to the Mosaic religion, so conspicuous among the Jews who lived under the second temple, becomes still more surprising, if it is compared with the stubborn incredulity of their forefathers. When the law was given in thunder from mount Sinai; when the tidings of the ocean and the rivers were suspended for the convenience of the Israelites; and when temporal rewards and punishments were the immediate consequences of their piety or disobedience, they perpetually relapsed into rebellion against the visible majesty of their Divine King, and continued in the sanctuary of Jehovah, and imitated every fantastic ceremony that was practised in the tents of the Arabs, or in the cities of Phœnicia.

As the protection of Heaven was deservedly withdrawn from the ungrateful race, their faith acquired a proportionate degree of vigour and purity. The contemporaries of Moses and Joshua had beheld with careless indifference the most amazing miracles. Under the pressure of every calamity, the belief of those miracles has preserved the Jews of a later period from the universal contagion of idolatry; and in contradiction to every known principle of the human mind, that singular people, whose Prophet had died, but whose religion was not yet assent to the traditions of their remote ancestors, than to the evidence of their own senses.

Their religion was admirably fitted for defence, but it was never designed for conquest, and it seems probable that the number of proselytes was never much superior to that of apostates. The divine promises were originally made, and the distinguishing rite of circumcision was enjoined, to a single family. When the posterity of Abraham had multiplied like the sands of the sea, the Deity, from whose mouth these promises were originally pronounced, declared himself the proper and as it were the national God of Israel; and with the most jealous care separated his favourite people from the rest of mankind. The conquest of the land of Canaan was accompanied with so many wonderful and with so many bloody circumstances, that the victorious Jews were left in a state of irreconcilable hostility with all their neighbours. They had been commanded to extirpate some of the most idolatrous tribes, and the execution of the Divine will had seldom been retarded by the weakness of humanity. But the other nations they were forbidden to contract any alliances or alliances, and the prohibition of receiving them into the congregation, which in some cases was perpetual, almost always extended to the third, to the seventh, or even to the tenth generation. The obligation of preaching to the Gentiles the faith of Moses, had never been inculcated as a precept of the law, nor were the Jews inclined to impose it on themselves as a voluntary duty.

In the admission of new citizens, that unsocial people was actuated by the selfish vanity of the Greeks, rather than by the generous policy of Rome. The descendants of Abraham were flattered by the opinion, that they alone were the heirs of the covenant, and they were apprehensive of diminishing the prejudice, by dispensing with the humility of the strangers of the earth. A larger acquaintance with mankind, extended their knowledge without correcting their prejudices; and whenever the God of Israel acquired any new votaries, he was much more indebted to the inconstant humour of polytheism than to the active zeal of his own missionaries. The religion of Moses seems to be instituted for a particular country as well as for a single nation; and if a strict obedience had been paid to the order, that every male, three times in the year, should present himself before the Lord Jehovah, it would have been impossible that the Jews could ever have contracted with the narrow limits of the promised land. That obstacle was indeed removed by the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem; but the most considerable part of the Jewish religion was involved in its destruction; and the pagans, who had long wondered at the strange report of an empty sanctuary, were at a loss to discover what could be the object, or what could be the instruments, of a worship which was destitute of temples and of altars, of priests and of sacrifices. Yet even in their fallen state, the Jews, still asserting their lofty and exclusive privileges, shunned, instead of courting, the society of strangers. They still insisted with the same arrogant partisanship as to which it was in their power to practise. Their peculiar distinctions of days, of meats, and a variety of trivial though burdensome observances, were so many objects of disgust and aversion for the other nations, to whose habits and prejudices they were diametrically opposite. The violent and even dangerous rite of circumcision was alone capable of repelling a willing proselyte from the door of the synagogue.

Under these circumstances, Christianity, more liberal in its offer itself to the world, armed with the strength of the Mosaic law, and delivered from the weight of its own traditions and of that necessary condition of religion, and the unity of God, was as carefully in calculated in the new as in the ancient system; and whatever was now revealed to mankind concerning the nature and designs of the Supreme Being, was fitted to increase their reverence for that mysterious doctrine. The divine authority of Moses and the prophets was admitted, and even established, as the firmest basis of Christianity. From the beginning of the world, an uninterrupted series of predictions had announced and prepared the long expected coming of the Messiah, who, in compliance with the gross apprehensions of the Jews, had been represented in the remotest parts of the character of a king and conqueror, than under that of a prophet, a martyr, and the Son of God. By his expiatory sacrifice, the imperfect sacrifices of the temple were at once consummated and abolished. The cermonial law, which consisted only of types and figures, was succeeded by a pure and spiritual worship, equally adapted to the state of man and to every condition of mankind; and to the initiation of blood, was substituted a more harmless initiation of water. The promise of divine favour, instead of being partially confided to the posterity of Abraham, was universally proposed to the freeman and the slave, to the Greek and to the barbarian, to the Jew and to the Gentile. Every privilege that could raise the proselyte from earth to heaven, that could exalt his devotion, secure his happiness, or even gratify that secret pride, which, under the semblance of devotion, insinuates itself into the human heart, was still reserved for the members of the Christian church, but at the same time all manumission was permitted, and even solicited, to accept the glorious distinction, which was not only proffered as a favour, but imposed as an obligation. It became the most sacred duty of a new convert to diffuse among his friends and relations the inestimable blessing which he had received, and to warn them against a refusal which would be severely punished as a criminal disobedience to the will of a beneficent but all-powerful Deity.

Obstinate and reason of the believing Jews. The enfranchisement of the church from the bonds of the synagogue, was a work however of some time and of some difficulty. The Jewish converts to Jesus in the character of the Messiah foretold by their ancient oracles, respected him as a prophetic teacher of virtue and religion; but they obstinately adhered to the ceremonies of their ancestors, and were desirous of instructing, in their own name, the Gentiles, who continually augmented the number of believers. These Judaizing Christians seemed to have argued with some degree of plausibility from the divine origin of the Mosaic law, and from the immutable perfections of its great Author. They affirmed, that if the Being, who is the same in every age, had designed eternally sacred rites which had served to distinguish his chosen people, the repeal of them would have been no less clear and solemn than their first promulgation: that, instead of those frequent declarations, which either suppose or assert the perpetuity of the Mosaic religion, it is the plain and evident doctrine of the sacred law itself, that the dispensation of God to his people, is the philosophy and wisdom of the Gentiles. The Jewish religion was understood to be a scheme intended to last only till the coming of the Messiah, who should instruct mankind in a more perfect mode of faith and of worship; that the Messiah himself, and his disciples who conversed with him on earth, instead of authorizing by their example the most immutable observances of the Mosaic law, which would have been published to the world the abolition of those useless and obsolete ceremonies, without suffering Christianity to remain during so many years obscurly confounded among the sects of the Jewish church. Arguments like these appear to have been used in the defence of the expiring cause of the Mosaic law; but the industry of our learned divines has abundantly explained the ambiguous language of the Old Testament, and the ambiguous conduct of the apostolic teachers. It was proper gradually to unfold the system of the gospel, and to pronounce, with the utmost cautious and tenderness, a sentence of condemnation so repugnant to the inclination and prejudices of the believing Jews.

The history of the church of Jerusalem. The first fifteen bishops of Jerusalem were all circumcised Jews; and the congregation over which they presided, united the law of Moses with the doctrine of Christ.1 It was natural that the primitive church should thus be composed, since they had not lived more than forty days after the death of Christ, and was governed almost as many years under the immediate inspection of his apostle, should be received as the standard of orthodoxy.2 The distant churches very frequently appealed to the authority of their venerable parent, and the belief of the church which had been delivered to them, to correct their own errors; and to settle the points which stood in the way of their admission to the communion of the whole church. But when numerous and opulent societies were established in the great cities of the empire, in Antioch, Alexandria, Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome, the reverence which Jerusalem had inspired to the whole Christian colonies sensibly diminished. The Jewish converts, or, as they were afterwards called, the Nazarenes, had laid the foundations of the church, soon found themselves overwhelmed by the increasing multitudes, that from all the various religions of polytheism enlisted under the banner of Christ: and the Gentiles, who, with the approbation of their peculiar apostle, had received in the same alliance of faith, were often admitted by their own practice, to a connexion with their impious countrymen, whose misfortunes were attributed by the pagans to the contempt, and more justly ascribed by the christians to the wrath, of the Supreme Deity. The Nazarenes retired from the ruins of Jerusalem to the little town of Pella beyond the Jordan, where that ancient church languished and perished above sixty years in solitude and obscurity.3 They still enjoyed the comfort of making frequent and devout visits to the Holy City, and the hope of being one day restored to those seats which both nature and religion taught them to love as much as to reverence. But at length refused to their more scrupulous brethren the same toleration which at first they had humbly solicited for their own practice. The ruin of the temple, of the city, and of the public religion of the Jews, was severely felt by the Nazarenes; as in their manners, they were more attached to the city, than were the adherents of Hadrian, the desperate fanaticism of the Jews filled up the measure of their calamities; and the Romans, exasperated by their repeated rebellions, exercised the rights of victory with unusual rigour. The emperor founded, under the name of Alia Ceptipola, a new city on mount Zion, to which he gave the privileges of a colony; and denouncing the severest penalties against any of the Jewish people who should dare to approach its precincts, he fixed a vigilant garrison of a Roman cohort to execute the execution of his orders. The Nazarenes had only one means of surviving, by flying from the danger; the force of truth was on this occasion assisted by the influence of temporal advantages. They elected Marcus for their bishop, a prelate of the race of the Gentiles, and most probably a native either of Italy or of some of the Latin provinces.4 At his persuasion, the most considerable part of the congregation renounced the Mosaic law, in the practice of which they had persevered above a century. By this sacrifice of their habits and prejudices, they purchased a free admission into the colony of Hadrian, and more firmly cemented their union with the catholic church.5

5 Euseb. Hist. Ecclesiast. i. iii. c. 5. Mosheim (p. 327, &c.) has drawn out a very distinct representation of the circumstances and motives of this revolution.
The Ebionites. When the name and honours of the church of Jerusalem had been restored to mount Zion; the crimes of heresy and imposture were imputed to the obdurate remnant of the Nazarenes, which refused to accompany their Latin bishop. They still preserved their former habitation of Pella, spread themselves into the villages adjacent to Damascus, and formed an inconsiderable church in the city of Beroea, or, as it is now called, of Aleppo, in Syria. This name was derived from the contemptuous epithet of Ebianites. 1 In a few years after the return of the church of Jerusalem, it became a matter of doubt and controversy, whether they, or rather cyprians, who were called Mesianites, were worthy of the Messiah, but who still continued to observe the law of Moses, could possibly hope for salvation. 2 The humane temper of Justin Martyr inclined him to answer this question in the affirmative; and though he expressed himself with the most guarded distinction, he ventured to determine in favour of such an imperfect Christian, if he be content to practise the Mosaic ceremonies, without pretending to assert their general use or necessity. 3 But when Justin was pressed to declare the sentiment of the church, he confessed that there were very many among the orthodox christians, who not only denounced such as observed the Mosaic ceremonies as dead to the hope of salvation; but who declined any intercourse with them in the common offices of friendship, hospitality, and social life. 4 The more rigorous opinion prevailed, as it was natural to expect, over the milder; and an eternal bar of separation was fixed between the disciples of Moses and those of Christ. The unfortunate Ebianites, rejected from one religion as apostates, and from the other as heretics, found themselves compelled to assume a more decided character; and though some traces of that obsolete sect may be discovered as late as the fourth century, they insensibly melted away either into the church or the synagogue. 5

While the orthodox church preserved a just medium between excessive veneration and ridicule, and the law of Moses, the various heretics deviated into equal but opposite extremes of error and extravagance. From the acknowledged truth of the Jewish religion, the Ebionites had concluded that it could never be abolished. From its supposed imperfections the Gnostics have hastily inferred that it never existed in the time of the Deity. These were some objections against the authority of Moses and the prophets, which too readily present themselves to the sceptical mind; though they can only be derived from our ignorance of remote antiquity, and from our incapacity to form an adequate judgment of the divine economy. These objections were unfounded, and just as much so, though in vain science of the Gnostics. 6 As those heretics were, for the most part, averse to the pleasures of sense, they morosely arranged the polygamy of the patriarchs, the gallantries of David, and the sergiole of Solomon. The conquest of the land of Canaan, and the extinction of the suspecting natives, they were at a loss how to reconcile with the common notions of humanity and justice. But when they recollected the sanguinary list of murders, of executions, and of massacres, which stain almost every page of the Jewish annals, they acknowledged that the barbarians of Palestine had executed these horrid crimes against the Almighty, as they had ever shown to their friends or countrymen. 7 Passing from the sectaries of the law to the law itself, they asserted that it was impossible that a religion which consisted only of bloody sacrifices and trifling ceremonies, and whose rewards as well as punishments were all of a carnal and temporal nature, should inspire the love of virtue or restrain the impiety of passion. The Mosaic account of the creation and fall of man was treated with profane derision by the Gnostics, who would not listen with patience to the reproof of the Deity after six days' labour; to the rib of Adam, the garden of Eden, the trees of life and of knowledge, the speaking serpent, the forbidden fruit, and the condemnation pronounced against human kind for the venial offence of their first progenitors. 8 The God of Israel was impiously represented by the Gnostics, as a being liable to passion and to error, capricious in his favour, implacable in his resentment, malicious and jealous in his judgments, as well as partial, and his partial providence to a single people, and to this transitory life. In such a character they could discover none of the features of the wise and omnipotent Father of the universe. 9 They allowed that the religion of the Jews was somewhat less criminal than the idolatry of the Gentiles; but it was not to the credit of Justin, that the Christ whom they adored as the first and brightest emanation of the Deity, appeared upon earth to rescue mankind from their various errors, and to reveal a new system of truth and perfection. The most learned of the fathers, by a very singular concession, have impartially admitted the sophistry of the Gnostic theology. Acknowledging that the literal sense is repugnant; but as we are assured (Socrates, i. 19. Sozomen, ii. 21. Lucian, the Satirist, v. 13.) that there is no objection so effectual against the authority of Holy Scripture as the doctrine of the divinity of Moses, which has been the foundation of the systems of the Ebionites, and the pretexts of the Gnostics in the most ancient and contemptuous ages of the Christian church, it is reasonable to believe, that they respected the sabbath, and distinguished the forbidden meats. They were seated on both sides of the Red Sea. Circumcision had been practised by the most ancient Ebionites, from motives of health and cleanliness, which seem to be explained in the Researches Philosophiques sur les Americains, tom. ii. p. 117.

Episte. 2. — Bazarolle, Histoire du Manicheisme, l. i. c. 3, has stated their objections, particularly those of Faustinus, the adversary of Augustin, and ascribed their most obscure mysteries to the age between the second and third centuries. The most ancient and contemptuous authors of the Ebionites have asserted, that the doctrine of the resurrection of Jesus was presented to them through the medium of Justin Martyr with the Jews of Antioch. The conference between them was held at Ephesus, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, and about twenty years after the return of the church of Jerusalem. The prolix and accurate account of Tilletian, Memores Ecclesiastique, tom. ii. p. 518, and of Dr. Burnet, Apologetica Christiana, v. 4, c. 7, has discussed the first chapters of Genesis with too much wit and freedom.

wont to every principle of faith as well as reason, they deemed themselves secure and invulnerable behind the ample veil of allegory, which they carefully spread over every tender part of the Mosaic dispensation.

It has been remarked with more ingenuity than truth, that the virgin purity of the church was never violated by schism or heresy; the controversies were of about one hundred years after the death of Christ.

We may observe with much more propriety, that, during that period, the disciples of the Messiah were indulged in a freer latitude both of faith and practice, than has ever been allowed in succeeding ages. As their faith, the result of the divine inspiration, was perfectly pure, and the spiritual authority of the prevailing party was exercised with increasing severity, many of its most respectable adherents, who were called upon to renounce, were provoked to assert, their private opinions, to pursue the consequences of their mistaken principles, and, in rebellion against the unity of the church. The Gnostics were distinguished as the most polite, the most learned, and the most wealthy of the christian name, and that general appellation, which expressed a superiority of knowledge, was rather assimilated to or ironically bestowed by the envy of their adversaries. They were almost without exception of the race of the Gentiles, and their principal founders seem to have been natives of Syria or Egypt, where the warmth of the climate disposed both the mind and the body to indulgence in speculations. They were blended with the faith of Christ many sublime but obscure tenets, which they derived from oriental philosophy, and even from the religion of Zoroaster, confessing the eternity of matter, the existence of two principles, and the mysterious hierarchy of the invisible world, as they launched themselves into that vast abyss, they delivered themselves to the guidance of a disordered imagination; and as the paths of error are various and infinite, the Gnostics were imperceptibly divided into more than fifty particular sects, of whom the most celebrated appear to have been the Basilidians, the Valentinians, the Meionianites, and, in a still later period, the Manicheans. Each of these sects could boast of its bishops and congregations, of its doctors and martyrs, and, instead of the four gospels adopted by the church, the heretics produced a multitude of books, which they called the books of Christ and of his disciples, was adapted to their respective tenets. The success of the Gnostics was

Chap. XV.

The Decline and Fall

The demons commenced a war that might subsist between the orthodox, the Ebionites, and the Gnostics, concerning the gods of antiquity, the divinity or the obligation of the Mosaic law, they were all equally animated by the same exclusive zeal, and by the same abhorrence for idolatry which had driven the ancient Greeks into that peculiar and distressing production of the human mind, the sects, which had been degraded from the rank of angels, and cast down into the infernal pit, were still permitted to roam upon earth, to torment the bodies, and to seduce the minds, of sinful men. The demons soon discovered and abused the natural propensity of the human heart towards devotion, and, unfeelingly withdrawing the adoration of mankind from their Creator, they usurped the place and honours of the Supreme Deity. By the success of their malicious contrivances, they at once gratified their own vanity and revenge, and obtained the only comfort of which they were yet susceptible, the hope of involving the human species in the participation of their guilt and misery. It was confessed, or at least it was imagined, that they had distributed among themselves the most important characters of polytheism, one demon assuming the titles and attributes of Jupiter, another of Germanus, a third of Venus, and a fourth perhaps of Apollo; and that, by the advantage of their long experience and aerial nature, they were enabled to execute with sufficient skill and dexterity, the parts which they had undertaken. They lurked in the temples, substituted for actual sacrifices, invented, pronounced oracles, and were frequently allowed to perform miracles.

The Christians, who, by the interposition of angel spirits, could so readily explain every preternatural appearance, were disposed and even devoted, especially at a moment when, perhaps, he had not the Gospels in his hands, being then in prison? (See Pearson's Vindict, Ignatius, etc.) c, c. 9, p. 50. In vol. ii. Patr. Apostol. ed. Coteler et alii, 172.)—Indeed, the phrases of Mark, of Philo, of Josephus, and of the other antient writers, are multiplied the number of sects which opposed the unity of the church.

1. Epist. i. c. 15. 2. Somm. i. c. 32. See in Bayle, in the article of Martian, a curious detail of a dispute on that subject. I should seem that some of the Gnostics (the Basilidians) declined, and even of martyrdom. The preserves of martyrdom were signalized and abhorrent. See Mosheim, p. 359.

2. The very remarkable passage of Origen (Ficcin, ad Lorenz.)

That indefatigable writer, who had consumed his life in the study of the scriptures, relics for their authenticity on the inspired authority of Moses, if the most respectable writers could receive with the present gospels, many parts of which (particularly in the resurrection of our Saviour) he disdained, and as it was always deigned, polished against their favourite tenets. It is therefore somewhat singular that Ignatius (Epist. ad Phryg. Patri. Apostol. thuc. ii. p. 31.) should choose to employ a vague and doubtful tradition, instead of quoting the certain testimony of the evangelists.

The same writer, however, happily explained this singularitv. 'The first Christians remembered many of the words of Jesus Christ, which were not contained in our Gospel books, and were even written. Therefore could not saint Ignatius who had lived with the apostles or their disciples, repeat in other words, that which St. Luke sions to admit the most extravagant fictions of the pagan mythology. But the belief of the christian was accustomed to view the gods of the pagans, with respect to the national worship he considered as a direct homage yielded to the demon, and as an act of rebellion against the majesty of God.

In consequence of this opinion, it was the first and desperate duty of a christian to renounce the worship of the pagan deities. The religion of the nations was not merely a speculative doctrine professed in the schools or preached in the temples. The innumerable deities and rites of polytheism were closely interwoven with every circumstance of business or pleasure, of public or of private life; and it seemed impossible that a man could live without, at the same time, renouncing the commerce of mankind, and all the offices and amusements of society. The important transactions of peace and war were prepared or concluded by solemn sacrifices, in which the magistrate, the senator, and the soldier, were obliged to preside or to participate. The public spectacles were an essential part of the cheerful devotion of the pagans, and the gods were supposed to accept, as the most grateful offering, the games that the prince and people celebrated in honour of their peculiar festivals.

The christian, who with piety renounced the homage of these deities, found himself encompassed with infernal snares in every convivial entertainment, as often as his friends, invoking the hospitable deities, poured out libations to each other's happiness. When the bride, struggling with well-adapted reluctance, was forced in hymnical pomp over the threshold of her new habitation, or when the sad procession of the dead slowly moved towards the funeral pile; the christian, on these interesting occasions, was compelled to desert the persons who were the dearest to him, rather than contract the guilt inherent to those infamous ceremonies.

Every art and every trade that was in the least concerned in the framing or adorning of idols was polluted by the stain of idolatry; a severe sentence, since it devoted to eternal misery the far greater part of the community, which is employed in the exercise of liberal or mechanick professions. If we cast our eyes over the numerous representations of the gods that adorn the temples, we shall see that the immediate representations of the gods, and the holy instruments of their worship, the elegant forms and agreeable fictions consecrated by the imagination of the Greeks, were introduced as the richest ornaments of the houses, the dress, and the furniture of the pagans. Even the arts of music and painting, of eloquence and poetry, flowed from the same impure origin. In the style of the fathers, Apollo and the Muses, Bacchus and Minerva, Mercury and Virgil were the most eminent of his benefactors; and the beautiful mythology which pervades and animates the compositions of their genius, is destined to celebrate the glory of the demons. Even the common language of Greece and Rome abounded with familiar but impious allusions; he who violated the precepts of piety, and often of virtue, Some of the most sacred festivals in the Roman ritual were destined to salute the new calends of January with vows of public and private felicity, to indulge the pious remembrance of the dead and living, to ascertain the inviolable bounds of property, to hail, on the return of spring, the genial powers of fecundity, to perpetuate the two memorable eras of Rome, the foundation of the city, and that of the republic, and to restore, during the human licence of the Saturnalia, the primitive equality of mankind. Some idea may be conceived of the abhorrence of the free worship of the Christians towards such ceremonies, by the scrupulous delicacy which they display in an impalpable alarming occasion. On days of festivity, it was the custom of the ancients to adorn their doors with lamps and with branches of laurel, and to crown their heads with a garland of flowers. This innocent and elegant practice might perhaps have been tolerated for the sake of our religion; but it most unfairly happened that the doors were under the protection of the household gods, that the laurel was sacred to the lover of Daphne, and that garlands of flowers, though frequently worn as a symbol either of joy or mourning, had been dedicated in their first origin to the service of superstition. The trembling christians, who were persuaded in this instance to comply with the fashion of their country, and the commands of the magistrate, laboured under the most gloomy apprehensions, from the reproaches of their own conscience, the censures of the church, and the denunciations of divine vengeance.

Such was the anxious diligence which was required to guard the chastity of the gospel from the infectious breath of idolatry. The superstitious observances of public or private rites were carelessly practised, from education and habit, by the followers of the established religion. But as

1 Tertullian has written a most severe treatise against idolatry, to caution brethren against the horrid danger of introducing that cult. *De Corrapt. oirum, et quantai. satanae, * De Corona Marii, c. 10. 2 Tertullianus, De Spectaculis. This severe reformer shows no mercy against the worship of Mithras, the God of the Zoroastrians. The dress of the actors particularly offends him. By the rise of the bull's bushy, they insensibly add a cubit to their stature, c. 51. 3 The ancient practical of concealing the entertainment with libations, may be found in every classic. Suetonius and Saccius, in their last moments, made a noble application of this custom. Postquam stagnat calidis aquis intimus, repertorium propius servorum, addita voces, ut ore laminae facile quondam Laurusere, ut magna aperiatur, in manum gestatur. (Armen. de coronii militis. Tertullian, c. 166. 1. 43.) It is thought by the ancients that the simplicity of the actors was the paratus sut. For instance, the Tertullianists profess that they were engaged in the errors of the Montanists. *Sev. Euseb. de Aetol. Tertull., p. 53. Labranth. *Rumin. vol. ii part ii. p. 592. 5 Tertullianus, De Spectaculis, c. 17. 6 Tertullian has written an exprimt the name two emperors, Sevems and Cavaletta; he speaks only of two emperors and of a long peace which the church has enjoyed. It is certain that Tertullian became a Montanist about the year 200; his work, De Corona militis, appears to have been written as early as may be, about the year 192 before the apostle was written after the author became a Montanist. *See Mondon, Decret. often as they occurred, they afforded the christians an opportunity of declaring and confirming their zealous opposition. by these frequent protestations their attachment to the faith was continually fortified, and in proportion as they combated with the more arduous and success in the holy war, which they had undertaken against the empire of the demons.

\8. We shall here describe the subject with all the delicacy which can be employed in treating of the most abstruse and spiritual of all the sciences, which pertain to the universe. A doctrine thus established beyond the senses and the experience of mankind, might serve to amuse the leisure of a speculative mind: or, in the silence of solitude, it might sometimes impart a ray of comfort to despising virtue; but the first impression which had been received in the schools, was soon obliterated by the commerce and business of active life. We are sufficiently acquainted with the eminent persons who flourished in the age of Cicero, and of the first Caesars, with their names and quality, to be assured that their conduct in this way was regulated by any serious conviction of the rewards or punishments of a future state. At the bar and in the senate of Rome the ablest orators were not apprehensive of giving offence to their hearers, by exposing that doctrine as an idle and extravagant opinion, which was rejected with contempt by every man of a liberal education and understanding.

it is darkly insinuated by the prophets, and during the long period which elapsed between the Egyptian and the Babylonian scriptures, the hopes as well as fears of the Jews were left at the mercy of the narrow compass of the present life. After Cyrus had permitted the exiled nation to return into the promised land, and after Ezra had restored the ancient records of their religion, two celebrated sects, the Sadducees and the Pharisees, insensibly rose at Jerusalem. The former, selected from the more opulent and distinguished ranks of society, were strictly attached to the literal sense of the Mosaic law, and they piously rejected the immortality of the soul, as an opinion that received no countenance from the divine book, which they revered as the only rule of their faith. To the Sadducees the religious comforts of this world were of no consideration, and they accepted, under the name of traditions, several speculative tenets from the philosophy or religion of the eastern nations. The doctrines of fate or predestination, of angels and spirits, and of a future state of rewards and punishments, were in the number of these new articles of belief; and as the Pharisees, by the austerity of their manners, had drawn into their party the body of the Jewish people, the immortality of the soul became the prevailing sentiment of the synagogue, under the reign of the Asmonaean princes and pontiffs. The temper of the Jews was incapable of being changed, but their modes of belief and sentiment might as well as might the satisfaction of a polytheist; and as soon as they admitted the idea of a future state, they embraced it with the zeal which has always formed the characteristic of the nation. Their zeal, however, added nothing to its evidence, or even probability; and as the definitions of immortality, which had been dictated by nature, approved by reason, and received by superstition, should obtain the sanction of divine truth from the authority and example of Christ.

When the promise of eternal happiness was no longer propounded to mankind on condition of adopting the faith, and of observing the precepts of the gospel, it is no wonder that so advantageous an offer should have been accepted by great numbers of every religion, of every rank, and of every province in the Roman empire. The ancient Chris-

This page contains a continuation of the discussion on the immortality of the soul, followed by a section about the promise of eternal happiness being no longer conditional. The text then shifts to discuss the reception of Christianity by various groups and the promise of eternal happiness being a universal offer. The page concludes with a reference to the ancient Christians recognizing the greatness of the Messiah, and his role in bringing salvation to all nations.

4 This expectation was contemporaneous by the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Matthew, and by the first epistle of St. Paul to the Thessalonians. The term immortality has been defined as diocheia by the Roman text, and in this sense by the Vulgate, and of necessity by the Latin translators of the gospels. The word in the Greek text signifies the same thing as in the Latin version. [Note some modern theologians explain it without seeing it in either an allegory or an impious view.] They say that Jesus Christ after having commenced the work of redemption, and after the commencement of his second coming, and of the signs which were to precede it, but that those deeds which he said this event was near, were deceived concerning the meaning of two words—an error which still exists in our versions of the Gospel, according to Matthew chap. 24. v. 23, and 31. In the 29th verse we read, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days, the sun shall be darkened, &c. The Greek word, αναμισθήσεται, signifies here suddenly, at once, and not immediately, so that it designates only the sudden appearance of the signs which Jesus foretold, and not the duration of the interval which would separate them from the days of tribulation of whom he just spoke. The 34th verse is, "Verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled." This is the succession or fulness of my disciples; he speaks of a class of men, and not of one generation. The true meaning of this, according to the horrid, is, "Verily I say unto you, the race of men (which you commence) shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." That is, the succession of centuries should not cease before his coming. (See the Commentary of M. Paulus upon the New Testament. Edition of 1822, vol. ii. p. 432-433.)

5 See Burnet's Sacred Theory, part ii. c. 5. This tradition may be traced as before the commencement of the Christian era, and is found in the first century, and who seems to have been half a Jew.

6 The primitive Church of Antioch computed almost 1000 men in the creation of the new world and in the birth of Christ. Africans, Lycians, and the Greek church, have reduced that number to 6000 and 60000, and Europe, and the world, and which was universally admitted during the primitive parts of the church; and of the Hebrew text has determined the modern, as well as the former, to prefer a period of about 6000 years; though, in the study of papyri, they have often laid themselves straitened by those narrow limits. imagism. A fealty consisting only of pure and spiritual pleasure would have appeared too refined for its inhabitants, who were still supposed to possess their human nature and senses. A garden of Eden, with the conditions of a perfect life, was no longer suited to the advanced state of society which prevailed under the Roman empire. A city was therefore erected of gold and precious stones, and a supernatural plenty of corn and wine was bestowed on the adjacent territory; in the free enjoyment of which spiritual bliss, the pious and benignant people was never to be restrained by any jealous laws of exclusive property.\footnote{7} The assurance of such a mil-lenium was carefully inculcated by a succession of fathers from Justin Martyr\footnote{8} and Irenaeus, who conversed with the immediate disciples of the apostle, down to Constancius, who was preceptor to the son of Constantine.\footnote{9} Though it might not be universally received, it appears to have been the reigning sentiment of the orthodox believers; and it seems so well adapted to the desires and apprehensions of mankind, that it must have contributed in a very considerable degree to the progress of the christian faith. But when the edifice of the church was almost completed, the temporary support was laid aside. The doctrine of Christ's reign upon earth was at first treated as a profound allegory, was considered by degrees as a doubtful and useless system; and was at length rejected as the legsurd invention of heresy and fanaticism. A mysterious prophecy, which still forms a part of the sacred book, but which was thought to favour the exploded sentiment, has very narrowly escaped the proscription of the church.

Contribution of Tertullian.\footnote{10} Whilst the happiness and glory of a Roman and of the temporal reign were promised to the world, the disciples of Christ, the most dreadful calamities were denounced against an unbelieving world. The edification of the new Jerusalem was to advance in steps with the destruction of the mystic Babylon; and as long as the emperors who reigned before Constantine persisted in the profession of idolatry, the epitaph of Babylon was applied to the city and to the empire of Rome.\footnote{11} A regular series was prepared of all the moral and physical evils which could afflict a flourishing nation; intestine discord, and the invasion of the fiercest barbarians from the unknown regions of the north; pestilence and famine, comets and eclipses, earthquakes and inundations.\footnote{12} All these were only so many premonitory and alarming signs of the great catastrophe of Rome, when the country of the Scipios and Caesars should be consumed by a flame from heaven, and the city of the seven hills, with her palaces, her temples, and her tribunal, be buried in a vast lake of fire and brimstone. It might, however, afford some consolation to Roman vanity, that the period of their empire would be that of the world itself; which, as it had once perished by the element of water, was destined to experience a second destruction from the element of fire.

In the opinion of a general conflagration, the faith of the christian was very happily coincided with the tradition of the east, and the philosophy of the Stoics, and the analogical of nature; and even the country, which, from religious motives, had been chosen for the origin and principal seat of the propagation of the christian faith, was best adapted for that purpose by natural and physical causes; by its deep caverns, beds of sulphur, and numerous volcanoes, of which those of Aetna, of Venusius, and of Lipari, exhibit a very imperfect representation. The calmest and most intrepid seer might not refuse to acknowledge, that the destruction of the present system of the world by fire, was in itself extremely probable.

The christian, who founded his belief much less on the fallacious arguments of reason than on the authority of tradition and the interpretation of scripture, expected it with terror and confidence.
Yet it was only a dream,

The pagans demistened with a singular delusion, as to regard or their ignorance or disbelief of the divinity truth, seems to offend the reason and the humanity of the the present age.\footnote{16} But the primitive church, whose faith was of a much firmer consistence, delivered over, without hesitation, to eternal torture, the far greater part of the inhabitants of the earth. The faith might perhaps be indulged in favour of Socrates, or some other sages of antiquity, who had consulted the light of reason before that of the gospel had arisen.\footnote{15} But it was unaniiously affirmed, that those who, since the birth or the death of Christ, had obstinately persisted in the worship of the demons, neither desired nor could expect a pardon from the irritated justice of the Deity. These rigid sentiments, which had been unknown to the ancient world, appeared to have infused a spirit of bitterness into a system of love and harmony, which, in the reign of blood and truth, had frequently torn asunder by the difference of religious faith; and the christians, who in this world found themselves oppressed by the power of the pagans, were sometimes reduced by relentment and spiritual pride to delight in the prospect of their triumph.\footnote{9}

But the humanity of the reader will persuade him to read the rest of this infinite description, which the zealous African purges in a long variety of affected and unfeeling witticisms.

Were often convicted by their father the primitive Christians of a temper so more suitable to the meekness and charity of their profession, that he who felt no sincere compassion for the danger of their friends and countrymen, and who exerted the most benevolent zeal to save them from the impending destruction. The careless polytheist, assailed by new and unexpected terrors, against which neither his priests nor his philosophers could afford him any certain protection, was very frequently tormented and reduced to extremities of mental torture.

His fears might assist the progress of his faith and reason; and if he could once persuade himself to suspect that the christian religion might possibly be true, it became an easy task to convince him that it was the safest and most prudent party that he could join. III.

The supernatural gifts, which even in this life were ascribed to the Christians above the rest of mankind, must have contributed to their own con- fort, and very frequently to the conviction of infidels. Besides the occasional prodigies, which might sometimes be effected by the immediate interposition of the Deity when he suspended the laws of nature for the service of religion, the Christian church, from the time of the apostles and their first disciples, has claimed an uninterrupted succession of miracles, and most extraordinary visions, and of prophecies, the power of expelling diseases, of healing the sick, and of raising the dead. The knowledge of foreign languages was frequently communicated to the contemporaries of Irenaeus, though Irenaeus himself was left to struggle with the difficulties of a barbarous dialect, whilst he preached the gospel to the natives of Gaul.
The divine inspiration, whether it was conveyed in the form of a wakening or of a sleeping vision, is described as a favour very liberally bestowed on all ranks of the faithful, on women as on elders, on boys as well as upon men. Sometimes the several severities were so entirely prepared by a course of prayer, of fasting, and of vigils, to receive the extraordinary impulsion, they were transported out of their senses, and delivered in ecstasy what was inspired, being mere organs of the Holy Spirit, just as a pipe or flute is of him who blows into it.

We may add, that the design of these visions was, for the most part, either to disclose the future history, or to guide the present administration, of the church. The expulsion of the demons from the bodies of those unhallowed persons who were induced by the present is of a nature more suited to the patient was relieved by the power or skill of the exorcist, and the vanquished demon was heard to confess, that he was one of the fabled gods of antiquity, who had impiously usurped the adoration of mankind. But the miraculous cure of diseases of the most inveterate or even preternatural kind, can no longer occasion any surprise, when we recollect, that in the days of Irenaeus, about the end of the second century, the resurrection of the dead was very far from being esteemed an uncommon event; that the miracle was frequently performed on necessary occasions, by great fasting and the joint supplication of the church of the place, and that the person who received restoration to life lived afterwards among them many years. At such a period, when faith could boast of so many wonderful victories over death, it seems difficult to account for the scepticism of those philosophers, who still rejected and derided the doctrine of the resurrection.

A noble Galatian has resisted on this important question the whole controversy, and promised Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, that if he could be gratified with the sight of a single person who had been actually raised from the dead, he would immediately embrace the christian religion. It is somewhat remarkable, that the first protest of the first eastern church, however anxious for the conversion of his friend, thought proper to decline this fair and reasonable challenge.

The miracles of the primitive church Their truth con- after obtaining the sanction of ages, trolled. Our perplexity in not call upon him to interpose his pre- defining the mi- nute judgment in this nice and important controversy; but he ought not to dissemble the difficulty of adopting such a theory as may reconcile the interest of religion with that of reason, of making a proper application of that theory, and of defining with precision the limits of that happy period exempt from error and from deceit, to which we might be disposed to extend the gift of supernatural powers. From the first of the fathers to the last of the popes, a succession of bishops, of saints, of martyrs, and of miracles is continued without intermission, and the progress of superstition was so gradual and almost imperceptible, that we know not in what particular link we should break the chain of tradition. Every age bears testimony to the wonderful events by which it was distinguished, and its testimony appears no less weighty and no less certain than that of the preceding ages; and still we are insensibly led on to accuse our own inconsistency, if, in the eighth or in the tenth century we deny to the venerable Bede, or to the holy Bernard, the same degree of confidence which, in the second century, we had so liberally granted to Justin or to Irenæus. In the name of many miracles appreciated by their apparent use and propriety, every age had unbelievers to convince, heretics to confute, and idolatrous nations to convert; and sufficient motives might always be produced to justify the interposition of heaven. And yet, since every friend to revulsion is persuaded of the reality, and every reasonable man is convinced of the cessation, of miraculous powers, it is evident that there must have been some period in which they were either suddenly or gradually withdrawn from the Christian church. Whatever cecal benefit to the cause of truth, and to the safety of the apostles, the conversion of the Roman empire, or the extinction of the Arián heresy, the insensibility of the Christians who lived at that time will equally afford a just matter of surprise. They still supported their pretensions after they had lost their power. Credulity to this end was the vice of faith; it permitted to assume the language of inspiration, and the effects of accident or contrivance were ascribed to supernatural causes. The recent experience of genuine miracles should have instructed the Christian world in the ways of Providence, and habitualled their eye (if we may use the expression) to the style of the divine artist. Should the most skilful painter of modern Italy presume to decorate his feeble imitations with the name of Raphael or of Correggio, the insolent fraud would be soon discovered, and indignantly resisted.

Use of the primitive miracles of the miracles of the primitive church since the time of the apostles, this unresisting softness of temper, so conspicuous among the believers of the second and third centuries, proved of some accidental benefit to the cause of truth and religion. In modern times, a latent and even involuntary scepticism adheres to the most pious dispositions. Their admission of supernatural truths is much less an active consent than a cold and passive acquiescence. Accustomed long since to observe and to respect the invariable dispositions of heaven, our recent situation is not sufficiently prepared to sustain the visible action of the Deity. But, in the first ages of Christianity, the situation of mankind was extremely different. The most curious, or the most credulous, among the pagans, were often persuaded to enter into a society, which asserted an actual claim to miraculous powers. The primitive Christians perpetually trod on mystic ground, and their minds were exercised by the habits of believing the most extraordinary events. They, or they fancied, that on every side they were incessantly and by daily example involved by visible witnesses, instructed by prophecy, and surprisingly delivered from danger, sickness, and from death itself, by the supplications of the church. The real or imaginary prodigies, of which they so frequently conceived themselves to be the objects, the instruments, or the spectators, very happily dispensed them to adopt with the same ease, but with far greater justice, the authentic wonders of the evangelic history; and thus miracles that exceeded not the measure of their own experience, inspired them with the most lively assurance of mysteries which were acknowledged to surpass the limits of their understanding. It is their deep impression on the heart of the purest genius, which the world can celebrate under the name of faith; a state of mind described as the surest pledge of the Divine favour and of future felicity, and recommended as the first or perhaps the only merit of a christian. According to the most rigid sectarians, the miracles may be equally practised by infidels, are destitute of any value or efficacy in the work of our justification.

But the primitive Christian demonstrated his faith by his virtues, and it was very justly supposed that the divine Virtues of the persuasion, which enlightened or sub-duced the understanding, must, at the same time, purify the heart, and direct the actions, of the believer. The first apologists of Christianity who justify the innocence of their brethren, and the writers of a latter period who celebrate the sanctity of their ancestors, did not display in the death of the apostles, the reformation of manners which was introduced into the world by the preaching of the gospel. As it is my intention to remark only such human causes as were permitted to second the influence of revelation, I shall slightly mention two motives which might naturally render the life of the Christian more sacred, and more austere than those of their pagan contemporaries, or their degenerate successors; repentance for their past sins, and the laudable desire of supporting the reputation of the society in which they were engaged.

It is a very ancient reproach, said of their predecessors, by the ignorance or the malice of their contemporaries, or their degenerate successors; repentance for their past sins, and the laudable desire of supporting the reputation of the society in which they were engaged. The friends of Christianity may acknowledge, without a blush, that many of the most eminent saints had before their baptism the most abominable vices. The first period in which the world had followed, though in an imperfect manner, the dictates of benevolence and propriety, derive such a calm satisfaction from the opinion of their own rectitude, as rendered them much less susceptible of the sudden emotions of shame, of grief, and of terror, which have given birth to so many wonderful conversions. After the example of their divine Master, the missionaries of the gospel disdained not the society of men, and especially of women, oppressed by the consciousness, and very often by the effects, of their vices. As they emerged from sin and superstition to the glorious hope of immortality, they resolved to devote themselves to a life, not only of virtue but of penitence. The desire of perfection became the ruling passion of their soul; and it is well known, that while reason embraces a cold mediocrity, our passions, our virtues, or our vices, as it were, with the space which lies between the most opposite extremes.

When the new converts had been rolled in the number of the faithful, and their reputation were admitted to the sacraments of the church, they found themselves restrained from relapsing into their old vices. Their situation was not at all natural, but of a very innocent and respectable nature. Any particular society that has departed from the great body of the nation, or the religion to which it belonged, immediately becomes the object of universal as well as particular regard. In proportion as the smallness of its numbers, the character of the society may be affected by the virtue and vices of the persons who compose it; and every member is engaged to watch with the utmost vigilance over his own behaviour, and over that of his brethren, since, as the subject is a part of the common disgrace, he may hope to enjoy a share of the common reputation. When the Christians of Bithynia were brought before the tribunal of the younger Pliny, they assured the proconsul, that, far from being engaged in any unlawful conspiracy, they were bound by a solemn obligation to abstain from the commission of those crimes which disturb the private or public peace of society, from theft, robbery, adultery, perjury, and fraud. Near a century afterwards, Tertullian, with an honest pride, could boast, that very few Christians had suffered by the hand of the executioner, except on account of their religion. Their serious and virtuous life, adverse to the gay luxury of the age, inured them to chastity, temperance, economy, and all the sober and domestic virtues. As the greater number were of some trade or profession, it was incumbent on them, by the strictest integrity and the fairest dealing, and by the most vigilant and the most decided aversion to all the products of the vice which the profane are too apt to conceive against the appearances of sanctity. The contempt of the world exercised them in the habits of humility, meekness, and patience. The more they were persecuted, the more closely they adhered to each other. Their mutual charity and unsparing confidence has been remarked by all writers, and was often abused by perfidious friends.

Morbidity of the fathers. It is a very honourable circumstance, for the morals of the primitive Christians, that even their faults, or rather errors, were derived from an excess of virtue. The bishops and doctors of that age, in their treatises, and the public authoritv might influence, the professions, the principles, and even the practice, of their contemporaries, had studied the scriptures with less skill than devotion, and they often received, in the most literal sense, those rigid precepts and those severe apatosts to which the prudence of succeeding commentators has applied a looser and more figurative mode of interpretation. Ambitious to exalt the perfection of the gospel above the wisdom of philosophy, the zealous fathers have carried the duties of self-mortification, of purity and of patience, to a height which it is scarcely possible to attain, and much less to preserve, in our present state of weakness and corruption. A doctrine so extraordinary and so sublime must inevitably command the veneration of the people; but it was ill calculated to obtain the suffrage of those worldly philosophers, who, in the conduct of this transitory life, consult only the feelings of nature and the interest of society.

Principles of human nature. There are two very natural propensities of human nature, which we may distinguish in the most virtuous and liberal dispositions, the love of pleasure and the desire of knowledge. The former is improved by action and learning, improved by the charms of social intercourse, and corrected by a just regard to economy, to health, and to reputation, it is productive of the greatest part of the happiness of private life. The love of action is a principle of a much stronger and more durable nature. It often leads to anger, to ambition, and to revenge; but when it is guided by the sense of propriety and benevolence, it becomes the parent of every virtue. The character of those who, with equal abilities, a family, a state, or an empire, may be indebted for their safety and prosperity to the undaunted courage of a single man. To the love of pleasure we may therefore ascribe most of the agreeable, to the love of action we may attribute most of the useful and respectable, qualifications. The character in which both the one and the other should be united and harmonized, would seem to constitute the most perfect idea of human nature. The insensible and inactive disposition, which should be supposed alike destitute of both, would be rejected, by the community, as utterly incapable of procuring any happiness to the individual, or any public benefit to the world. But it was not in this world that the primitive Christians were desirous of making themselves either agreeable or useful.

The acquisition of knowledge, the exercise of our reason or fancy, and the cheerful flow of unguarded conversation, may employ the leisure of a liberal mind. Such amusements, however, were rejected with abhorrence, or admitted with the utmost caution, by the severity of the fathers, who despised all knowledge that was not useful to salvation, and who considered all levity of discourse as a criminal abuse of the gift of speech. In our present state of existence, the body is so inseparrably connected with the soul, that it seems to be our interest to taste, with innocence and moderation, the enjoyments of which that faithful companion has supplied to mankind. The reason of our devout predecessors: vainly aspiring to imitate the perfection of angels, they disdained, or affected to disdain, every earthly and corporeal delight. Some of our senses indeed are necessary for our preservation, others for our subsistence, and others to gratify our curiosity; but it was impossible to reject the use of them. The first sensation of pleasure was marked as the first moment of their abuse. The unfeeling candidate for heaven was instructed, not only to resist the grosser allurements of the taste or smell, but even to shut his ears against the profane harmony of sounds, and to view with indifference the most finished productions of human art. Gay apparel, magnificent houses, and elegant furniture, were supposed to unite the double guilt of pride and of sensuality: a simple and mortified appearance was more suitable to the christian who was desirous of avoiding the suspicion of the world. A garment of white hair, garments of any colour except white, instruments of music, vases of gold or silver, downy pillows, (as Jacob reposed his head on a stone,) white bread, foreign wines, public salutations, the use of warm baths, and the practice of shaving the beard, which, according to the expression of Tertullian, is a lie against our own faces, and an impious attempt to improve the word and to correct the manners of the Christians. Cæsar, which was introduced among the rich and the polite, the observation of these singular laws was left, as it would be at present, to the few who were ambitious of superior sanctity. But it is always easy, as well as agreeable, for the inferior ranks of mankind to claim a merit from the imitation of those great and brave spirits, whose example has told beyond their reach. The virtue of the primitive Christians, like that of the first Romans, was very frequently guarded by poverty and ignorance.

5 See a very judicious treatise of Barbeau on la Morale des Peres Vol. I. 2.
The chaste severity of the fathers, in their concerning marriage, which was related to the commerce of the riage and death of two sexes, flowed from the same principle; ple; their abhorrence of every enjoyment which might gratify the sensual, and degrade the spiritual, nature of man. It was their favourite opinion, that if Adam had preserved his obedience to the Crea, he would have lived for ever in the state of unsullied purity, and that some harmless mode of vegetation might have peopled paradise with a race of innocent and immortal beings. The use of marriage was permitted only to his fallen posterity, as a necessary expedient to continue the human species, and as a restraint he would have imposed on the natural licentiousness of desire. The hesitation of the orthodox casuists on this interesting subject, betrays the perplexity of men, unwilling to approve an institution, which they were compelled to tolerate. The enumeration of the very whimsical laws, which they most circumstance-iously imposed on the marriage-bed, would force a smile from the young, and a blush from the fair. It was their unanimous sentiment, that a first marriage was adequate to all the purposes of nature and of society. The sensual connexion was refined into a resemblance of the marriage of Christ and his church, and a pronouncement to be indissoluble either by divorce or by death. The practice of second nuptials was branded with the name of a legal adultery; and the persons who were guilty of so scandalous an offence against christian purity, were soon excluded from the honours, and driven from the circle of the church. But even this doctrine was impugned as a crime, and marriage was tolerated as a defect, it was consistent with the same principles to consider a state of celibacy as the nearest approach to the divine perfection. It was with the utmost difficulty that ancient Rome could support the institution of six vestals; but the primitive church was filled with a great number of persons of either sex, who had developed themselves to the profession of perpetual chastity. A few of these, among whom we may reckon the learned Origen, judged it the most prudent to dis-note the temptation. Nature was innocent and some were invincible against the assaults of the flesh. Dis-aining an ignominious flight, the virgins of the warm climate of Africa encountered the enemy in the closest engagement; they permitted priests and deacons to stick their swords into their bodies, and gloried amidst the flames in their unsullied purity. But even this was sometimes vil-dicated her rights, and this new species of martyrdom served only to introduce a new scandal into the church. Among the christian ascetics, however, (a name which they soon acquired from their painful exercise,) many of the most zealous among them, were probably more successful. The loss of sensual pleasure was supplied and compensated by spiritual pride. Even the multitude of pagans were inclined to estimate the merit of the sacrifice by its apparent difficulty; and it was in the praise of these chaste spouses of Christ that the fathers have poured forth the troubled stream of their

The christians were not less averse to their aversion to the business than to the pleasures of the business of the world. The defence of our persons and our property, the wars and government, were under the direction of the patron doctrine which enjoined an unlimited forgiveness of past injuries, and commanded them to invite the repetition of fresh insults. Their simplicity was offended by the use of oaths, by the pomp of magificacy, and by the active contention of public life, which was thought to be unworthy of christians. It was unlawful on any occasion to shed the blood of our fellow-creatures, either by the sword of justice, or by that of war; even though their criminal or hostile attempts should threaten the peace and safety of the whole community. It was acknowledged, that, under a less perfect law, the powers of the Jewish constitution had been exercised, with the approbation of heaven, by inspired prophets and by anointed kings. The christians felt and confessed, that such institutions might be necessary for the present system of the world, and that they had no desire to abstrain from the exguinary occupations; but it was impossible that the christians, without renouncing a more sacred duty, could assume the character of soldiers, of magistrates, or of princes. This indolent or even criminal disre-tained to the duties of their profession, was so contemptuous of the pagans, who very frequently asked, What must be the fate of the empire, attacked on every side by the barbarians, if all mankind should adopt the pusillanimous sentiments of the new sect? To this insolting question the christian apologists returned obscure and ambiguous answers, as they were

1 Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclesiastique, tom. i. p. 155,) gives a particular account of the dialogue of the ten virgins, as it was composed by Orosius, deedit Romanis. The practice is certainly very old. The prayer of Josephus for example is not to be less tolerated than the pagan governors. But while they inculcated the maxims of passive obedience, they refused to take any active part in the civil administration or the military defence of the empire. Some indulgence might perhaps be allowed to those persons who, before their conduction, were in the army. It was probably least strict in the case of the auxiliaries, who were exempt from as he can judge from the mutilated representation of Origen, (l. v. p. 22,) his adversary, Celsus, had urged his objection to this great objection.

1 [There is nothing in the refusals of the early christians to take part in the public service which ought to aberate us. They assert the natural consequence of the contradiction which existed between their principles, the laws, and action of the pagan world. As christians they could not enter the service of the king; they must bow himself, always assembled in a temple or in some consecrated place where they were in danger before taking their meal, and burst incense upon the altar.

As christians they were implored just at feasts and banquets, which were always terminated by laticiae, &c. In fine, since the divini-tures and the innumerable rites of polytheism were closely connected

Their sentiments concern-unwilling to reveal the secret cause of their security; the expectation that, before the conversion of mankind was accomplished, war, government, the Roman empire, and the world itself, would be no more. It may be observed, that, in this instance likewise, the situation of the first Christians coincided very happily with their religious scruples, and that their aversion to an active interference of the state in religious matters was the cause of the abandonment of the state, than to exclude them from the honours, of the state and army.

The Fifth Cause. The Christians active in the government of the state, and in the direction of the church.

V. But the human character, however it may be exalted or depressed by a temporary enthusiasm, will return by degrees to its natural level, and will resume those passions that seem the most adapted to its present condition. The primitive Christians were dead to the business and pleasures of the world; but their love of action, which could never be entirely extinguished, soon revived, and found a new occupation in the government of the church. A separate society, which attacked the established religion of the empire, was obliged to adopt some form of internal policy, and to appoint a sufficient number of ministers, intrusted not only with the spiritual functions, but even with the temporal direction, of the church. The power and jurisdicton, therefore, respecting its honour, its aggrandizement, were productive, even in the most pious minds, of a spirit of patriotism, such as the first of the Romans had felt for the republic, and sometimes, of a similar indifference, in the use of whatever means might probably conduct to so desirable an end. The ambition of raising themselves or their friends to the honours and offices of the church, was disguised by the laudable intention of devoting to the public benefit, the power and consideration, which, for that purpose only, it became their duty to solicit. In the exercise of their functions, they were frequently called upon to bear the name, and to maintain the sanction, of the ancient faction, to oppose the designs of pernicious brethren, to stigmatize their characters with desired infamy, and to expel them from the bosom of a society, whose peace and happiness they had attempted to disturb. The ecclesiastical governors of the Christians were taught to unite the wisdom of the serpent with the innocency of the dove; but as the former was refined, so the latter was insensibly corrupted, by the habits of government. In the church as well as in the world, the persons who were placed in any public station rendered themselves considerable by their eloquence and finesse, and the ability of their dexterity in business; and while they concealed from others, and perhaps from themselves the secret motives of their conduct, they too frequently relapsed into all the turbulent passions of active life, which were tainted with an additional degree of bitterness and obstinacy from the infusion of spiritual zeal.

Its primitive free character. The government of the church has always been the subject, as well as the prize, of religious contention. The hostile disputants of Rome, of Paris, and of Oxford, and of Geneva, have alike struggled to reduce the primitive and apostolic manners of the church to the form of the civil society. The few who have pursued this inquiry with more candour and impartiality, are of opinion,* that the apostles declined the office of legislation, and rather chose to endure some partial scandals and divisions, than to withevil the details of public or private life, the Christians could not participate in these different interests or passions, according to their principles, guilty of impurity. It was therefore less an effect of their doctrine, than a consequence of the situation, that they absolved themselves from public business. Wherever their situation prevented them from activity, they manifested as much activity as the pagans. Pro-ince, they were not without some interest, e. g. in the efforts made for the reunion after the schism in England, has strenuously maintained the divinity of bishops. But the Ca- lvinistic presbyteries were impassioned of a superior; and the Roman pontiff was exalted as equal.

* For the prophets of the primitive church, see Mosheim, Discourses at Basle, Ercild, p. 122, 125. (See the epistles of St. Paul, and of Clemens, to the Corinthians.

[The first established ministers in the church, were ecclesiastics, perhaps even of the Apostles,]—e. g. verses 1-7 they were entrusted with the distribution of alms; of course even engaged in this employment. After deacons came elders or priests [Diepo] appointed to preserve order and decorum in the community, and to act in every where in its name. Bishops were appointed to watch over the spiritual instruction of believers. The apostles themselves ordained many bishops. Tertullian, in his Apology, book i. c. 15, 21. In the East, among the Christians of Syria, and many fathers of the second and third centuries, establish this beyond a doubt. That equality of rank which prevailed among these different orders of ministers, did not prevent the same distinct even at the first. Eventually they became much more so. to have been introduced before the end of the first century, 1 were so numerous, and so important for the future good of the church, as well as for the present peace of christianity, that it was adopted without delay by all the societies which were already scattered over the empire, had acquired in a very early period the sanction of antiquity, 2 and is still revered by the most powerful churches, by the adherence of the western primitives, even as a divine establishment. 3 It is needless to observe, that the pious and humble presbyters, who were first dignified with the episcopal title, could not possess, and would probably have rejected, the power and pomp which now exercised the tira of the Roman provinces. Episcopacy as an denomination may define, in a few words, the narrow limits of their original jurisdiction, which was chiefly of a spiritual, though in some instances of a temporal nature. 4 It consisted in the administration of the sacraments and discipline of the church, the superintendency of religious ceremonies, which imperceptibly increased in number and variety, the consecration of ecclesiastical ministers, to whom the bishop assigned their respective functions, the management of the public fund, and the determination of all such differences as the faithful feared to bring under the tribunal of an idolatrous judge. These powers, during a short period, were exercised according to the advice of the presbyteral college, and with the consent and approbation of the assembly of Christians. The primitive bishops were considered only as the first of their order, as stewards of their church, and as a free person of the church. 5

Furthermore, such was the mild and equal constitutions by which the Christians were governed more than an hundred years after the death of the Apostles. Every society formed within itself a separate and independent republic; and although the most distant of these little states maintained a mutual as well as friendly intercourse of letters and deputation, the Christian world was not yet connected by any supreme authority or legislative assembly. As the numbers of the faithful were gradually multiplied, they discovered the advantages that might result from the union of their interest and their power. Towards the end of the second century, the churches of Greece and Asia adopted the useful institutions of provincial synods, and they may justly be supposed to have borrowed the model of a representative council from the celebrated examples of their own country, the Amphictyons, the Achaeian league, or the assemblies of the Ionian cities. It was soon established as a custom and as a law, that the bishops of the independent churches should meet in the capital of the province at the stated periods of spring and autumn. Their decisions were not always uniform, but they were esteemed by the most ancient and distinguished presbyters, and moderated by the presence of a listening multitude. 6 Their decrees, which were styled canons, regulated every important controversy of faith and discipline; and it was natural to believe that a liberal effusion of the Holy Spirit would be poured upon them, and directed by an oracle of the people. They were not imposed, but recommended by the voice of the people. The institution of synods was so well suited to private ambition, and to public interest, that in the space of a few years it was received throughout the whole empire. A regular correspondence was established between the provincial councils, which mutually communicated and approved their respective proceedings; and the catholic church soon assumed the form, and acquired the strength, of a great federative republic. 7 As the legislative authority of the province was partly exercised by the bishops, the number of councils was increased by the use of councils, the bishops obtained by their alliance a much larger share of executive and arbitrary power; and as soon as they were connected by a sense of their common interest, they were enabled to attack, with united vigour, the original rights of the civil Power.

Provincial Synods. 8

Thus the union and power of the church was represented by a national office, of which every bishop enjoyed an equal and undivided portion. 9 Princes and magistrates, it was often repeated, might boast an earthly claim to a transitory dominion: it was the episcopal authority alone which was derived from the Deity, and extended itself over this and over another world. The bishops were the vicereges of Christ, the successors of the apostles, and the mystic substitutes of the high priest of the Mosaic law. Their exclusive privilege of conferring the sacerdotal character, invaded the freedom both of clergy and of laymen; and the independence of the administration of the church, they still consulted the judgment of the presbyters, or the inclination of the people, they most carefully inculated the merit of such a voluntary condescension. The bishops acknowledged the supremacy of the churches which administered the assembled in the government of their peculiar diocese, each of them from his flock the same implicit obedience as if that favourite metaphor had been literally just, and as if the shepherd had been of a more exalted nature than that of his sheep. This obedience, however, was not imposed without some efforts on one side, and some resistance on the other. The democratical part of the constitution was, in many places, very warmly supported by the zealous or interested opposition of the inferior clergy. But their patriotism received the ignominious

1 See the Introduction to the Apocalypse. Bishops, under the name of angels, were already instituted in the seven cities of Asia. And yet the epistle of Clement (which is probably of as ancient a date) does not lead us to discover any traces of episcopacy either at Corinth or Rome.

2 Nulla ecclesia sine episcopo, has been a fact as well as a maxim since the time of Tertullian and Trenrique.

3 After we have passed the difficulties of the first century, we find the episcopal government universally established, till it was interrupted by the revolutionary crimes of the Sibyls and German reformers. See Mosheim in the first and second centuries. Ignatius ad Smyrnos, c. 3. &c. is of foxtail of the episcopal dignity. Le Clerc, in his Intro. to the new Testament, vol. ii. 265. very clearly shows his bias in favour of Mosheim, with a more critical judgment, (p. 161) excepts the purity even of the smaller episcopacy.

4 None of the ancient synods consults Tertullian, Exhort. ad Cas- titat, c. 7. As the human heart is still the same, several of the observations on this sense of Chrysostom. (Essays, vol. ii. p. 76. quarto edit.) may be applied even to real inspiration.

5 Shortly or not the first means which independent churches took to improve a closer union. Bishops were formed at first by the annexing of many small churches in the country, with a church of a city. Peter and Paul consecrated their subdeacons or deacons or even a smaller church, gave rise to the metropolitan or archiepiscopal see. Bishopric was formed at the beginning of the second century; before this period the Christians had not established a sufficient number of churches in the country to render such an as- sembly necessary to the wants of the church. It was not till we discover the first traces of the metropolitan constitution. From this period, we may compute the existence of six hundred years. The first two centuries, we have not the first synods. History gives us cer- tain information of synods held towards the close of the second cen- tury, or about the time of Constantine; but we have no authentic account of the differences which existed between the Latin churches, and the churches of Asia, respecting the time of the celebration of the Pas- tory, or (Easter). But these synods were not subjected to any regu- lar form, or to any stated time of meeting. This regularity was es- tablished by the provincial synods, which were formed by the union of the bishops of a district who were subject to a metropolitan. — eous epithets of faction and schism; and the episcopal cause was indebt ed for its rapid progress to the labours of many active prelates, who, like Cyprian of Carthage, and Pope Ambrose, the most illustrious statesman with the Christian virtues which seem adapted to the character of a saint and martyr.

The same causes which at first had the metropolitan destroyed the equality of the presby- clergymen, introduced among the bishops a pre-eminence of rank, and from hence a superiority of jurisdiction. As often as in the spring and autumn they met in provincial synod, the difference of personal merit and reputation was very sensibly felt among the members of the assembly, and the multitude was gov erned by the wisdom and eloquence of the few. But the latter, while they hurried on with other regular and less invincible distinction; the office of perpetual presidents in the councils of each province, was conferred on the bishops of the principal city, and these aspirin prelates, who soon acquired the lofty titles of metropolitans and primates, secretly prepared themselves to usurp over their episcopal brethren the same authority which the bishops had so lately assumed above the college of presbyters. Nor was it long before an emulation of pre-eminence and power prevailed among the metropolitans themselves, each of them affecting to display, in the most pompous tones, his pretensions to the very title of the city over which he presided; the numbers and opulence of the christians, who were subject to their pastoral care; the saints and martyrs who had arisen among them, and the purity with which they prescribed the truth of the faith, as it had been transmitted through a series of orthodox bishops from the apostle or the apostolic disciple, to whom the foundation of their church was ascribed. From every cause either of a civil or of an ecclesiastical nature, it was easy to foresee that Rome must enjoy the respect, and would soon claim the obedience, of the provinces. Ambition of the sort seemed to be the natural birth of a just Roman pontiff, a proportion to the capital of the empire, and the Roman church was the greatest, the most numerous, and, in regard to the west, the most ancient of all the christian establishments, many of which had received their religion from the pious labours of the man of God, who in the midst of the utmost boast of Antioch, of Ephesus, or of Corinth, the banks of the Tyber were supposed to have been honoured with the preaching and martyrdom of the two most eminent among the apostles; and the bishops of Rome very prudently claimed the inheritance of the very title of the apostle Peter, which was attributed to the person or to the office of St. Peter.”

The bishops of Italy and of the provinces were disposed to allow them a primary of order and association (such was their very accurate expression) in the christian aristocracy. But the power of a monarch was repre-

6 The journey of St. Peter in Rome is mentioned by most of the ancients, (see Eusebius, ii. 55) maintained by all the catholics, allowed by some protestants, (see Pearson and Dodwell de Success. Eccles. Romana) and has been vigorously attacked by Symænus, (Miscellanea Sacra. iii. 3.) According to Father Hardouin, the monks of the thirteenth century, who composed the Anecd. represented St. Peter’s most of the papal power to the person of St. Peter. His authority was derived from the privilege of a secret association, to the number of the clergy, the latter from the devout apprehensions of the faithful.

1. The community of goods, which had so agreeably amused the imagination of Plato, and which subsisted in some degree among the austere sect of the Esseniasts, was bestowed on the apostles by the power of the supremacy of the church. The fervour of the first proselytes prompted them to sell those worldly possessions, which they despised, to lay the price of them at the feet of the apostles, and to content themselves with receiving an equal share out of the general distribution. The progress of the christian religion relaxed and gradually abolished this generous institution, which, in hands less pure than those of the apostles, would too soon have been corrupted and abused by the returning selfishness of human nature; and the converts who embraced the new religion were permitted to retain the possession of their patrimony, to receive legacies and inheritances, and to increase their separate property by all the lawful means of trade and industry. Instead of an abso-

2 See the apocryphal epistle from Firmilianus, bishop of Cezarea, to Stephen, bishop of Antioch, (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. ii. 25.) and the many other writings of Cyprian. Mosheim, p. 329—378. He is regarded as a man of very ungrammatical and barbarous language in Greek, Latin, Italian, &c. and totally unintelligible in our Teutonic languages.

This allusion is exact in the Syriac Chaldæan, and it was in that language which Jesus Christ made it. (Gospel, according to Matthew, chap. ii. 14.) Cyprian, however, has radically misunderstood the words, and has attributed the sense of foundation to virtue. (Eusebius. Lib. ii.)

lute sacrifice, a moderate proportion was accepted by the ministers of the gospel; and in their weekly or monthly assemblies, every believer, according to the exegyony of their profession, and the measure of his wealth and piety, presented his voluntary offering for the use of the common fund. Nothing, however inconsiderable, was refused: but it was diligently inculcated, that in the article of tithes, the Mosaic law was still of divine obligation; and that since the Jews, under a less part, in discipline, had not been required to pay a tenth part of all that they possessed, it would become the disciples of Christ to distinguish themselves by a superior degree of liberality; and to acquire some merit by resigning a superfluous treasure, which must so soon be annihilated with the world itself. It is almost unnecessary to observe, that the revenue of each particular church, which was of so uncertain and fluctuating a nature, must have varied with the poverty or the opulence of the faithful, as they were dispersed in obscure villages, or collected in the great cities of the empire. In the time of the emperor Decius, it was the opinion of the magistrates, that the christians of Rome were possessed of very considerable wealth; that vessels of gold and silver were used in their religious worship, and that many among their proselytes had sold their houses and lands to increase the public riches of the sect; at the expense, indeed, of their unfortunate children, who found themselves beggars, because their parents had been saints. We should listen with distrust to the suspicions of strangers and enemies: on this occasion, however, they receive a very serious and probable colour from the two following circumstances, the only ones that have reached our knowledge, which define any precise sums, or convey any distinct idea. Almost at the same period, the bishop of Carthage, from a society less opulent than that of Rome, collected an hundred thousand sesterces, or a thousand gold and fifty thousand silver, on a sudden call of charity to redeem the brethren of Numidia, who had been carried away captives by the barbarians of the desert. About an hundred years before the reign of Decius, the Roman church had received, in a single donation, the sum of two hundred thousand sesterces from a stranger of Pontus, who proposed to fix his residence in the capital. These oblations, for the most part, were made in money; nor was the society of christians either desirous or capable of acquiring, to any considerable degree, the encumbrance of property. It has been observed, that several laws, which were enacted with the same design as our statutes of mortmain, that no real estates should be given or bequeathed to any corporate body, without either a special privilege or a particular dispensation from the emperor or from the senate: who were seldom disposed to grant them in favour of a sect, at first the object of their contempt, and at last of their fears and jealousy. A transaction however is related under the reign of Alexander Severus, which discourses that the restraint was sometimes eluded or suspended, and that the christians were permitted to claim and to possess lands within the limits of Rome itself. The progress of Christianity, and the civil confusion of the empire, contributed to relax the severity of the laws, and before the close of the third century many considerable estates were bestowed on the opulent churches of Rome, Milan, Carthage, Antioch, Alexandria, and other great cities of the empire. The bishop was the natural steward of the church: the public stock was in his trust to his care without account or control; the presbyters were confined to their spiritual functions, and the more dependent order of deacons was solely employed in the management and distribution of the ecclesiastical revenue. If we may give credit to the vehement declamations of Cyprian, there were too many among his African brethren, who, in the execution of their charge, violated every precept, not only of charity, but of every act of charity. Some of these unfaithful stewards the riches of the church were lavished in sensual pleasures, by others they were perverted to the purposes of private gain, of fraudulent purchases, and of rapacious usury. But as long as the contributions of the christian people were free and unconstrained, the abuse of their confidence could not be very frequent, and the general use to which their liberality was applied, reflected honour on the religious society. A decent portion was reserved for the maintenance of the bishop and his clergy; a sufficient sum was allotted for the expenses of the public religious services, of their vestments; those are, they were called, constituted a very pleasing part. The whole remainder was the sacred property of the poor. According to the discretion of the bishop, it was distributed to support widows and orphans, the lame, the sick, and the aged of the community; to comfort strangers and pilgrims, and to alleviate the misfortunes of prisoners and captives, more especially when their sufferings had been occasioned by their firm attachment to the cause of religion. A generous intercourse of charity united the most distant provinces of the empire; and it was generally provvident and pious, that the provinces were chiefly assisted by the alms of their more opulent brethren. Such an institution, which paid less regard to the merit than to the distress of the object, very materially contributed to the progress of Christianity. The poor were not ascetized by a sense of humanity, while they derided the doctrines, acknowledged the benevolence, of the new sect. The prospect of immediate relief and of future protection allured into its hospitable bosom many of those unhappy persons whom the neglect of the world would have abandoned to the miseries of want, of sickness, and of old age. There is some reason to believe, that great numbers of infants, who, according to the inhuman practice of the times, had been exposed by their parents, were frequently rescued from death, baptized, educated, and 7 The subsequent conduct of the deacon Laurence only proves how great was the wealth of this sect; a wealth undeniably very considerable; but Fra Palla (c. 3.) appears to exaggerate, when he supposes, that the successors of Commodus were unable to purchase the christians by their own avowal, or that of their praiseworthy prefects.

Excommun. 11. It is the undoubted right of every nation, society to exclude from its communion and benefits such among its members as reject or violate those regulations which have been established by general consent. In the exercise of this power, the church, whether from choice or necessity, by direct sentence against scandalous sinners, and particularly those who were guilty of murder, of fraud, or of incontinence; against the authors, or the followers, of any heretical opinions which had been condemned by the judgment of the episcopal order; and against those unhappy persons who, whether they had or had not concurred in that condemnation, had polluted themselves after their baptism by any act of idolatrous worship. The consequences of excommunication were of a temporal as well as a spiritual nature. The christian against whom it was pronounced, was deprived of any part in the obligations of the faithfull. The ties both of religious and of private friendship were dissolved: he found himself a profane object of abhorrence to the persons whom he had the most esteemed, or by whom he had been the most tenderly beloved; and as far as an expulsion from a respectable society could impress on his character a mark of infamy, it was equally a just punishment inflicted by the general sense of mankind. The situation of these unfortunate exiles was in itself very painful and melancholy; but, as it usually happens, their apprehensions far exceeded their sufferings. The benefits of the christian communion were those of eternal life, nor could they erase from their minds the awful opinion, that to those ecclesiastical governors by whom they were condemned, the Deity had committed the keys of hell and of paradise. The heretics, indeed, who might be supported by the consciousness of their intentions, and by the flattering hope that they alone had discovered the true path, were not necessitated to cleave the world, or to separate assemblies, those comforts, temporal as well as spiritual, which they no longer derived from the great society of christians. But almost all those who had reluctantly yielded to the power of vice or idolatry, were sensible of their fallen condition, and anxiously desirous of being restored to the benefits of the christian communion.

With regard to the treatment of these penitents, two opposite opinions, the one of justice, the other of mercy, divided the primitive church. The more rigid and inelastic casuists refused them for ever, and without exception, the christian communion, in which they had disgraced or deserted, and leaving them to the remorse of a guilty conscience, indulged them only with a faint ray of hope, that the contrition of their life and death might possibly be accepted by the Supreme Being. A milder sentiment was embraced in practice as well as in theory, by the purest and most respectable of the christian churches. The gates of reconciliation and of heaven were seldom shut against the returning penitent; but a severe and solemn form of discipline was instituted, which, while it served to expiate his crime, might powerfully deter the spectators from the same indiscipline. As a public confession, accompanied by putting on sackcloth, the penitent lay prostrate at the door of the assembly, imploring with tears the pardon of his offences, and soliciting the prayers of the faithful. If the fault was of a very heinous nature, whole years of penance were esteemed an inadequate satisfaction to the divine justice; and it was always by slow and painful gradations that the sinner, the heretic, or the apostate, was re-admitted into the bosom of the church. A sentence of perpetual excommunication was, however, reserved for some crimes of an extraordinary magnitude, and particularly for the inexcusable recidivism of those persons who had already experienced and abused the clemency of their ecclesiastical superiors. According to the circumstances or the number of the guilty, the exercise of the christian discipline was varied by the discretion of the bishops. The councils of Ancyra and Bilberis were held about the same time, the one in Galatia, the other in Spain; and the bishops of the latter, perhaps in revenge of that union so extant, seem to breathe a very different spirit. The Galatian, who after his baptism had repeatedly sacrificed to idols, might obtain his pardon by a penance of seven years; and if he had seduced others to imitate his example, only three years more were added to the term of his exile. But the unhappy Spaniard, who had committed the same offence, was deprived of the hope of reconciliation, even in the article of death; and his idolatry was placed at the head of a list of seventeen other crimes, against which a sentence no less terrible was pronounced. Among these we may distinguish the crime of attempting the excommunication of a bishop, a presbyter, or even a deacon.

The well-tempered mixture of liberty and rigour, the judicious dispensation of rewards and punishments, according to the maxims of policy as well as justice, constituted the dossus strength of the church. The bishops, whose paternal care extended itself to the government of both worlds, were sensible of the importance of these prerogatives, and covering their ambition with the fair pretence of the love of order, they were jealous of any rival in the exercise of a discipline which did not consist, like that of Ancyra, in which had enlisted themselves under the banner of the cross, and whose numbers every day became more considerable. From the imperious declarations of Cyprian, we should naturally conclude, that the doctrines of excommunication and penance formed the most essential part of religion; and that it was much less dangerous for the disciples of Christ to neglect the observance of the moral duties, than to despise the censures and authority of their bishops. Sometimes we might imagine that we were listening to the voice of Moses, when he commanded the earth to open, and swallow the iniquitous people of rebellion, which had refused obedience to the priesthood of Aaron; and we should sometimes suppose that we heard a Roman consil asserting the majesty of the republic, and declaring his inflexible resolution to enforce the rigour of the laws. If such irregularities are suffered with impunity, (it is thus that the bishop of Carthage chides the lenity of his colleague,) if such irregularities are suffered, there is an end of episcopal vigour; an end of the sublime and divine power of governing the church, an end of christianity itself." Cyprian had renounced those temporal honours, which it is plainly impossible he could have maintained by the acquisition of such absolute command over the sciences and understanding of a congregation, however obscure or despised by the world, is more truly grateful.

Recapitulation. In the course of this important, though perhaps tedious, inquiry, I have attempted to display the secondary causes which so efficaciously assisted the truth of the Christian religion. If in various ages we have observed many splendid, sacred or profane, official ornaments, any accidental circumstances, or any mixture of error and passion, it cannot appear surprising that mankind should be the most sensibly affected by such motives as were suited to their imperfect nature. But the aid of those interests, excepting the zeal, the immediate expectation of another world, the claim of miracles, the practice of rigid virtue, and the constitution of the primitive church, that Christianity spread itself with so much success in the Roman empire.

To the first of these the Christians were indebted for their invincible valour, which dedicated to vanquish with the enemy whom they were resolved to vanquish. The three succeeding causes supplied their valour with the most formable arms. The last of these causes united their courage, directed their arms, and gave their efforts that irresistible weight, which even small numbers of well-armed and resolute individuals have so often possessed over an undisguised multitude, ignorant of the subject, and careless of the event of the war. In the various religions of polytheism, some wandering fanatics of their own country, Egypt and Syria, who addressed themselves to the curious superstitions of the populace, were perhaps the order of priests that derived their whole support and credit from their sacerdotal profession, and were very deeply affected by a personal concern for the safety or prosperity of their tutelar deities. The ministers of polytheism, both in Rome and in the provinces, were, for the most part, men of a noble birth, and of an affluent fortune, who received as an honourable distinction the care of a celebrated temple, or of a public sacrifice, exhibited, very frequently at their own expense, the sacred games, and with cold indifference performed the annual rites, according to the laws and fashion of their country. As they were engaged in the ordinary occupations of life, their zeal and devotion were seldom animated by a sense of interest, or by the habits of an ecclesiastical character. Confined to their respective temples and cities, they remained without any connexion of discipline or government; and whilst they acknowledged the supreme jurisdiction of the senate, of the college of pontiffs, and of the emperor, those civil magistrates contented themselves with the easy task of maintaining, in peace and security, the peace of religion, worsted in mankind, who have already seen how various, how loose, and how uncertain were the religious sentiments of polytheists. They were abandoned, almost without control, to the natural workings of a superstitious fancy. The accidental circumstances of their life and situation determined the object as well as the degree of their devotion; and as long as their adoration was successfully prostituted to a thousand deities, it was scarcely possible that their hearts could be susceptible of a very sincere or lively passion for any of them.

When Christianity appeared in the pagan world, even these faint and imperfect religious feelings had lost much of their influence. The evidence of the pagan world, however strong, and the arguments of those interested in the new religion, were insufficient to produce a favourable impression. It had already obtained an easy

m improvement over the folly of paganism; and when Tertullian or Lactantius employ their labours in exposing its falsehood and extravagance, they are obliged to transcribe the eloquence of Cicero or the wit of Lucian. The contagion of these sceptical writings had been diffused far beyond the number of their readers. The fashion of incredulity was communicated from the philosopher to the philosopher, and from the noble to the plebeian, and from the master to the menial slave who waited at his table, and who eagerly listened to the freedom of his conversation. On public occasions the philosophic sort of mankind affected to look for truth and evidence in the miraculous discoveries of their country; but their secret contempt penetrated through the thin and awkward disguise, and even the people, when they discovered that their deities were rejected and derided by those whose rank or understanding they were accustomed to reverence, were filled with doubts and apprehensions concerning the truth of those doctrines, to which they had yielded the most implicit belief. The decline of ancient prejudice exposed a very numerous portion of human kind to the danger of a painful and comfortless situation. A state of scepticism and suspense may amuse a few inquisitive individuals, and even force the minds of the philosophical superficial to turn to the multitude, that if they are forcibly awakened, they still regret the loss of their pleasing vision. Their love of the marvellous and supernatural, their curiosity with regard to future events, and their strong propensity for the visible and the popular, were the principal causes which favoured the establishment of polytheism. So urgent on the vulgar is the necessity of believing, that the fall of any system of philosophy will most probably be succeeded by the introduction of some other mode of superstition. Some deities of a more recent and fashionable cast might soon have occupied the deserted temples of Jupiter and Apollo, if, in the decisive moment, the wisdom of Providence had not interposed a genuine revelation, fitted to inspire the most rational esteem and conviction, whilst, at the same time, it was adorned with all that could attract the curiosity, the wonder, and the veneration of the people. In their actual disposition, as many were almost disengaged from their artificial prejudices, but equally susceptible and desirous of a devout attachment; an object much less reserved, and therefore more easily taken possession of, had it been introduced by force into their minds, without the objection or opposition of the sacred authority. The true object of the Christian was not to impose this profession on the Roman empire, but to affect it with a respect and cordiality, to which Christianity was not unfitted; but to support it with a strength and security, which the vainest flattery could not seduce it to abandon. It has been observed, with truth as well as propriety, that the conquests of peace and union of the Roman empire.

n "This immensity was not so great as Gibbon seems to believe. A great portion of these givers were converted at once, and were baptized in two days. (Acts of Apost. chap. v. 39-40.) They formed the first Christian church." [Gibbon, History of the Decline and Fall, chap. xv. p. 78.]"}

The means by which the apostles were disposed to believe what the fathers almost unanimously assert, that St. Matthew composed a Hebrew MS. as near the Gospel, as the Greek was the Latin, is unknown, however, dangerous to reject their testimony. [Gibbon, History of the Decline and Fall, chap. xv. p. 78.] There are strong reasons to confirm this testimony. [Ibid.]

o Pope, who was contemporary with the apostle John, says positively that Matthew wrote the discourses of Jesus Christ in Hebrew, and that each be applied to the less numerous party. To these domestic testimonies we may add the confession, the complaints, and the apprehensions of the gentiles themselves. From the writings of Lucian, a philosopher who had studied mankind, and who describes the manners of the gentiles, we learn, that, under the reign of Commodus, his native country of Pontus was filled with Epicureans and Christians.1 Within fourscore years after the death of Christ,2 the humane Pliny laments the magnitude of the evil which he vainly attempted to eradicate. In his resolutions to put an end to a disease of the country. There is the strongest reason to believe, that before the reign of Diocletian and Constantine, the faith of Christ had been preached in every province, of the frontiers the colonies are very extensive, a district whole real or imaginary acquisitions which lay beyond the frontiers of the Roman empire.

The rich provinces that extend from the Euphrates to the Ionian sea, were the principal theatre on which the apostle of the Gentiles displayed his zeal and piety. The seed of the gospel, which he had scattered in a fertile soil, were diligently cultivated by his disciples; and it would seem that, during the two first centuries, the most considerable body of Christians was contained within those limits. Among the societies which were instituted by the first missionaries, Antioch is more illustrious than those of Damascus, of Beroa and Aleppo, and of Antioch. The prophetic introduction of the Apocalypse has described and immortalized the seven churches of Asia; Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira,3 Sardes, Laodicea, and Philadelphia; and their colonies were soon diffused over that populous country. In a very early period, the islands of Cyprus and Crete, the provinces of Thrace and Macedonia, gave a favourable reception to the new religion; and christian republics were soon founded in the cities of Corinth, of Sparta, and of Athens.4 The antiquity of the Church in Asia profited for us an allowed a sufficient space of time for their increase and multiplication, and even the swarms of Gnostics and heretics serve to display the flourishing condition of the orthodox church, since the appellation of heretics has always one interpreted it as he could. This Hebrew was the Syro-chaldaic dialect, then in use at Jerusalem; Ogiien, St. Ireneus, Eusebius, St. Jerome, and St. Epiphanius, confirm this account. Jesus Christ himself preached in Syro-chaldaic. This is proved by many words which he used, and which the evangelists have carefully translated. St. Paul, when narrating the Jews, made use of the same language. (Acts of the Apostles, chap. 20, v. 2.—chap. 17, v. 4.—chap. 26, v. 14.) The opinions of some critics are of little avail against incontrovertible testimony, besides, their principal objection is, that St. Matthew quotes from the Greek version, whereas, according to them, verses are the septuagint; but they are not correct, for of the ten quotations which are founded upon the septuagint, are seven are quoted from the Hebrew text, and the other three do not differ from it; besides, these last are not literal citations. St. Jerome says positively concerning an account of this passage, which he had in the library at Cæsarea, that the citations were made in Hebrew. (in Cœstal). More numerous are the answers others Michaelis, especially, has made against this question. The Greek version appears to have been made in the time of St. Mark, to whom St. Jerome and St. Augustine affirm, perhaps even by one of them. —6)

The Alighinni (Epiphanius de Hieros, 61.) disputed the genuineness of the Apocalypse, because the church of Thyatira was not yet established. He quotes the words of a little more, explaining himself from the difficulty by ingeniously supposing, that St. John wrote in the spirit of the ancients, and then he pointed out the churches of Asia and Greek. memories. The austere life of the Essenes, their facts and communications, the community of goods, the love of ordination, their zeal for martyrdom, and the warmth though not the purity of their faith, already offered a very lively image of the primitive discipline. 1 It was in the school of Alexandria that the christian theology appears to have assumed a regular and scientific form; and this rapidly most advanced, the most modest hermits and unsuccessful proselytizers of Jews and of Greeks, sufficiently important to attract the notice of that inquisitive prince. 2 But the progress of Christianity was for a long time confined within the limits of a single city, which was itself a foreign colony, and till the close of the second century, the Christian sect was restricted to a small band of Jews and to a smaller band of Egyptians, conscripted into the churches by the apostles of Jesus Christ and his disciples. The first three bishops were consecrated by the hands of Demetrius, and the number was increased to twenty by his successor Heracles. 3 The body of the natives, a people distinguished by a sullen indestructibility of temper, 4 entertained the new doctrine with coldness and reluctance; and even in the time of Origen, it was rare to meet with an Egyptian who had surmounted his early prejudices in favour of the sacred animals of his country. 5 As soon, indeed, as Christianity ascended the throne, the zeal of those landlords was kindled by the prevailing impulsion; the cities were filled with bishops, and the deserts of Thebais swarmed with hermits.

In Rome.

A perpetual stream of strangers and provincials flowed into the capacious bosom of Rome. Whatever was strange or odious, whether their sects or suspected their hopes, the obscurity of that immense capital, to elude the vigilance of the law. In such a variety of confusions of nations, every teacher, either of truth or of falsehood, every founder, whether of a virtuous or criminal association, might easily multiply his disciples or accomplices. The city of Rome, at the beginning of the persecution of Nero, were represented by Tertullian as already amounting to a very great multitude, and the language of that great historian is almost similar to the style employed by Livy, when he relates the introduction and the suppression of the riots of Eneas. After the burst of the first wave of terror, the the confusion of the senate, it was likewise apprehended that a very great multitude, as it were another people, had been initiated into those abhorred mysteries. A more careful inquiry soon demonstrated, that the offenders did not exceed several thousands; a number indeed astonishingly great when considered as the object of public justice. 6 It is with the same candid allowance that we should interpret the vague expressions of Tertullian, and in a former instance of Pliny, when they exaggerate the crowds of deluded fanatics who had forsaken the established worship of the gods. The church of Rome was undoubtedly the first and most populous of the empire; and we are possessed of an authentic record which attests the state of religion in that city about the middle of the third century, and after a peace of thirty-eight years. The clergy, at that time, consisted of a bishop, forty-six presbyters, seven deacons, and many sub-deacons, forty-two acolytes, and fifty readers, exorcists, and porters. The number of widows, of the infirm, and of the poor, who were maintained by the oblations of the faithful, amounted to fifteen hundred. 7 From reason, as well as from the analogy of Antioch, we may venture to estimate the Christians of Rome at about fifty thousand. The populousness of that great capital cannot perhaps be exactly ascertained; but the most moderate computations, even when restricted to the cities flushed among them the language, the sentiments, and the manners of Rome. In this more important circumstance, Africa, as well as Gaul, was gradually fashioned to the imitation of the capital. Yet notwithstanding the many favourable occasions which might invite the Roman missionaries to visit the Latin provinces, it was late before they passed either the sea or the Alps; nor can we discover in those great countries any assured traces, either of faith or of persecution that ascend higher than the reign of the Antonines. The slow progress of the gospel in the cold climate of Gaul, was doubtless due to the severe climate that prevented the splendour and importance of their religious societies, which during the course of the third century were animated by the zeal of Tertullian, directed by the abilities of Cyprian, and adored by the eloquence of Laetantius. But if, on the contrary, we turn our eyes towards the countries of the south, we find that in the time of Marcus Antoninus, the see of Lyons and of Vienne; and even as late as the reign of Decius, we are assured, that in a few cities only, Arles, Narbonne, Toulouse, Limoges, Clermont, Tours, and Paris, some scattered churches were supported by the devotion of a small number of christians. 8 Silence is indeed very consistent with devotion, but as it is seldom compatible with zeal, we may perceive and lament the languid state of christianity in those provinces which had exchanged the Celtic for the Latin tongue, since they did not multiply with the speed of the three first centuries, give birth to a single ecclesiastical writer. From Gaul, which claimed a just pre-eminence of learning and authority over all the countries on this side of the Alps, the light of the gospel was morefainently reflected on the remote provinces of Spain and Britain; and if we may credit the vehement assertions of Tertullian, they had already received the first rays of the faith, when he addressed his apology to the magistrates of the emperor Severus. 9 But the obscure

1. Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, l. 2, c. 20—23, has examined with the most critical accuracy, the curious tradition of Philo, which describes the Therapeutae. By proving that it was composed as early as the time of Augustus, Basnage has demonstrated, in spite of Eusebius, that the origin of the sect is not that of the present, but of the Therapeutes were neither christian nor monks. It still remains probable that they changed their name, preserved their manner of life, adopted some new articles of faith, and gradually became the fathers of the Egyptian Anachoretes.

(Vol. ii. p. 131.) They were both written about A.D. 160, by those members of the Jewish rabbinical college (see Selden's Vindicia; i. 360, note), who were the inhabitants of that time. and imperfect origin of the western churches of Europe has been so negligently recorded, that if we were to recall the solemn charge of the Emperor Theodosius, to supply the silence of antiquity by those legends which arive or superstition long afterwards dictated to the monks in the lazy gloom of their convents.8 Of these holy romances, that of the apostle St. James can alone, by its single extravagance, deserve to be mentioned. From any of them, we can learn but little of the facts of entanglement, he was transformed into a valorous knight, who charged at the head of the Spanish chivalry in their battles against the Moors. The greatest historians have celebrated his exploits; the miraculous shrine of Compostella displayed his power; and the sword of a man of war. The emperor, says Eusebius, was sufficient to remove every objection of profane criticism.

Beyond the limits of the Roman empire was not confined to the Roman empire; and according to the primitive fathers, who interpret facts by prophecy, the new religion, within a century after the death of its divine author, had already visited every part of the Globe. "There exists not," says Justin Martyr, "a people, whether Greek or barbarian, or any other race of men, by whatsoever appellation or manners they may be distinguished, who has not been visited by their grace. It was either they dwelt under tents, or wander about in covered wagons, among whom prayers are not offered up in the name of a crucified Jesus to the Father and Creator of all things." But this splendid exaggeration, which even at present it would be extremely difficult to reconcile with the real state of mankind, can be considered only as the rash sally of a devout but careless writer, the measure of whose belief was regulated by that of his wishes. But neither the belief nor the wishes of the fathers, can alter the truth of history. It will still remain an undeniable fact, that the barbarians of Scythia and Germany, who afterwards converted the Roman nation, did not penetrate into the darkness of paganism; and that even the conversion of Iberia, of Armenia, or of Ethiopia, was not attempted with any degree of success till the sceptre was in the hands of an orthodox emperor.9 Before that time, the various accidents of war and commerce might indeed diffuse an imperfect knowledge of the Gospel among the barbarians of Caledonia, and among the borderers of the Rhine, the Danube, and the Euphrates.10 Beyond the last-mentioned river, Edessa was distinguished by a firm and early adherence to the faith.11 From Edessa the principles of Christianity penetrated into Syria; and the various cities which obeyed the successors of Antarexas; but they do not appear to have made any deep impression on the minds of the Persians, whose religious system, by the labours of a well-disciplined order of priests, had been constructed with much more art and solidity than the uncertain mythology of Greece and Rome.12 From these and other considerations, it is evident, that the progress of Christianity, in the first ages, may perhaps seem probable, that the number of its proselytes has been excessively magnified by fear on the one side, and by devotion on the other. According to the improbable testimony of Tertullian,13 the proportion of the faithful was very inconsiderable, when compared with the multitude of an unbelieving world; but, as we are left without any distinct information, it is impossible to determine, and it is difficult even to conjecture, the real numbers of the primitive Christians. The most favourable calculation, however, that can be deduced from the evidence of Antioch and of Rome, will not permit us to imagine that more than a twentieth part of the subjects of the empire had enlisted themselves under the banner of the cross before the important conversion of Constantine. But their habits of faith, of zeal, and of union, seemed to multiply their numbers; and the same causes which contributed to their future increase, served to render their actual strength more apparent and more formidable.

Such is the constitution of civil society. Whether the first thing, that whilst a few persons are distinct, the others are not absolutely unknown, and ignorance, the body of the people is condemned to obscurity, ignorance, and poverty. The Christian religion, which addressed itself to the whole human race, must consequently collect a far greater number of proselytes from the lower than from the superiors ranks of life. This innocent and natural circumstance has been improved into a very audacious imputation, which seems to be less strenuously denied by the apologists, than it is urged by the adversaries, of the faith; that the new sect of Christians was almost entirely composed of the dregs of the populace, of peasants and mechanics, of hose and women, of beggars and slaves, the last of whom might sometimes introduce the missionaries into the rich and noble families to which they belonged. These obscure teachers (such was the charge of malice and infidelity) are as little known in public as they are loquacious and dialectical in private. Whilst they cautiously avoid the dangerous encounter of philosophers, they mingle with the rude and illiterate crowd, and insinuate themselves into those minds, whom their age, their sex, or their education, has the best disposed to receive the impression of superstitious terrors.

This union of faults, though not some exceptions, were devoid of a faint resemblance, betray, in some degree, its character. It is disguised by its dark colouring and distorted features, the pencil of an enemy. As the humble faith of Christ diffused itself through the world, it was embraced by several persons who derived some consequence from the advantages of nature or fortune. Aristides, who presented an eloquent apology to the emperor Hadrian, was an Athenian philosopher. Justin Martyr had sought divine knowledge in the schools of Zeno, of Aristode, of Pythagoras, and of Plato, before he fortunately was accused by the old man, or rather the ancient god, and turned into the priest of the Jewish prophets. Clement of Alexandria had acquired much various reading in the Greek, and the Latin, language. Julius Africanus and Origen possessed a very considerable share of the 12 According to Tertullian, the christian faith had penetrated into parts of Britain inaccessible to the Roman arms. About a century before the time of Pliny, is calculated the period of the first settlement of Britain, and the extreme old age, with one of the foreign missionaries, and the dispute is still undecided by the Earle Language. 14 The legend of Abgarus, fabulous as it is, affords a decisive proof, that many years before Eusebius wrote his history, the greatest part of Persia had been reduced to the knowledge of Christianity. His rivals, the citizens of Ctesiphon, adhered, on the contrary, to the cause of paganism, as late as the first century.

learning of their times; and although the style of Cyprian is very different from that of Laetanius, we might almost discover that both those writers had been acolytes of Cicero. It was at this period that Christian philosophy was at length introduced among the christians, but it was not always productive of the most salutary affects; knowledge was as often the parent of heresy as of devotion, and the description which was designed for the followers of Arteno, may, with equal propriety be applied to the various sects which resisted the successors of the apostles. "They press to alter the holy scriptures, to abandon the ancient rule of faith, and to form their opinions according to the subtile precepts of logie. The science of the church is neglected for the study of geometry, and the reason is prostituted to the various sects as well as measuring the earth. Euclid is perpetually in their hands. Aristotle and Theophrastus are the objects of their admiration; and they express an uncommon reverence for the works of Galen. Their errors are derived from the abuse of the arts and sciences of the infidel, and they corrupt the simplicity of the gospel by the refinements of human reason." with regard to rank and fortune, the advantages of birth and fortune were always separated from the profession of Christianity. Sulpicius Severus was an ex-officer of the imperial guard of Play, and he soon discovered, that a great number of persons of every order of men in Bithynia had deserted the religion of their ancestors. His unsuppressed testimony may, in this instance, obtain more credit than the bold challenge of Tertullian, who addressed himself to the reason, no less to the humanity of the prosconsul of Africa, by assuring him, that if he persists in his cruel intentions, he must destinate Cartilage; and that he will find among the guilty many persons of his own rank, senators and matrons of noblest extraction, and the friends of his most illustrious title. It appears, however, that about forty years afterwards the emperor Valerian was persuaded of the truth of this assertion, since in one of his rescripts he evidently supposes, that senators, Roman knights, and ladies of quality, were engaged in the christian sect. The church still continued to increase its outward splendor as it lost its internal purity; and in the reign of Diocletian, the palace, the courts of justice, and even the army, concealed a multitude of christians, who endeavored to reconcile the interests of the present with those of the Mosaic.

And yet these exceptions are either too few in number, or too recent in time, to entirely remove the imputation of ignorance and obscurity which has been so arrogantly cast on the first proselytes of Christianity. Instead of employing in our defense the fictions of later ages, it will be more prudent to convert the occasion of scandal into a subject of edification. Our serious thoughts will suggest to us, that the apostles themselves were chosen by providence among the fishermen of Galilee, and that the lower we depress the temporal condition of the first christians, the more reason we shall find to admire their merit and success. It is impossible that we can supercede the stupendous fact, that the kingdom of heaven was promised to the poor in spirit, and that the minds afflicted by calamity and the contempt of mankind, cheerfully listen to the divine promise of future happiness; while, on the contrary, the fortunate are satisfied with the possession of this world, and the wiser in doubt about the next. This is the reason why we do not dispute their vain superiority of reason and knowledge.

We stand in need of such reflections to confer upon us the loss of some illustrious men of childish characters, which in our eyes the first and regenerate may have been thought fit to overlook or reject the perfection of the Christian system. Their language or their silence equally discover their contempt for the growing sect, which in their time had diffused itself over the Roman empire. Those among whom we confesse to mention the names of Justin Martyr, of Origen, of Euripides, of Cyprian, of Severus, of Cyprian, of Severus, of Dionysius, of the Moralia of Seneca, of the elder and the younger Pliny, of Tacitus, of Plutarch, of Galen, of the slave Epictetus, and of the emperor Marcus Antoninus, adm or the age in which they flourished, and exalt the dignity of human nature. They filled with glory their respective stations, either in active or contemplative life; their excellent understandings were improved by study; philosophy had purified their minds from the prejudices of the popular superstition; and their days were spent in the pursuit of truth and the practice of virtue. Yet all these sages were too much disposed to rise above the mass of men, to overlook or reject the perfection of the Christian system. Their language or their silence equally discover their contempt for the growing sect, which in their time had diffused itself over the Roman empire.

It is at least doubtful whether any of their neglect of this sect, if continued, would have prevented the sect itself, which the primitive christians repeatedly published in behalf of themselves and of their religion, but it is much to be lamented that such a cause was not defended by able advocates. They expose with superfluous wit and eloquence the extravagance of polytheism. They must confound by distracting the innocence and sufferings of their injured brethren. But when they would demonstrate the divine origin of Christianity, they insist much more strongly on the predictions which announced, then on the miracles which were confirmed, the appearance of Christ. Their favourite argument might serve to edify a christian or to convert a Jew, since both the one and the other acknowledge the authority of these prophecies, and both are obliged, with devout reverence, to search for their sense and their accomplishment. But this mode of persuasion loses much of its weight and influence, when it is addressed to those who neither understand nor respect the Mosaic dispensation and the prophetic style. In the unskilful hands of Justin and of the succeeding apologists, the sublime meaning of the Hebrew oracles evaporates in distant synonyms, affected conceits, and cold allegories; and even their authenticity was rendered suspicious to an unlightened Gentile, by the mixture of pious forgeries, which, under the names of Orpheus, Hermes, and the Sibyls, were avowed on both as of capital value with the theological inspiration of the Church. The adoption of fraud and sophistry in the defence of revelation, too often reminisces us of the invidious conduct of those poets, who load their invaluable heroes with a useless weight of cumbersome and brittle armour.

How shall we explain the supine intention of the pagan and philosophic world, to those evidences which were presented by the hand of Omnipotence, not to their reason, but to their senses? During the age of Christ, of his apoestes, and of their first disciples, the doctrine which they professed was innumerable prodigies.
The lame walked, the blind saw, the sick were healed, the dead were raised, demons were expelled, and the laws of nature were frequently suspended for the benefit of the church. But the sages of Greece and Rome turned aside from the awful spectacle, and pursuing the ordinary occupations of life, left unobserved the secret of any of these miraculous phenomena. The Christian Sibyl had with the rays of jealousy and the sun appeared pale and without splendour. This season of obscurity, which cannot surely be compared with the preternatural darkness of the Passion, had been already celebrated by most of the poets and historians of that memorable age.

CHAPTER XVI.

The conduct of the Roman government towards the christians, from the reign of Nero to that of Constantine.

If we seriously consider the purity of Christianity per-the Christian religion, the sanctity of its seers by the moral precepts, and the innocent as well Roman emperors, as austere lives of the greater number of those who were quieted among the people of those who first ages embraced the faith of the gospel, we should naturally suppose, that so benevolent a doctor would have been refreshed with due reverence, even by the unbelieving world; that the learned and the polite, however they might deride the miracles, would have esteemed the virtues of the new sect;
and that the magistrates, instead of persecuting, would have protected an order of men who yielded the most powerful arguments to the active cares of war and government.
If, on the other hand, we recollect the universal toleration of polytheism, as it was invariably maintained by the faith of the people, the incredulity of philosophers, and the policy of the Roman senate and emperors, we must conclude that these Christians had committed, what new provocation could exasperate the mild indifference of antiquity, and what new motives could urge the Roman princes, who beheld without concern a thousand forms of religion subsisting in peace under their gentle sway, to inflict a severe punishment on any of their partisans, who had chosen for themselves a singular but an inoffensive mode of faith and worship.

The religious policy of the ancient world seems to have assumed a more stern and intolerant character, to oppose the progress of Christianity. About fourscore years after the death of Christ, his innocent disciples were punished with death by the sentence of a process of the most amiable and philosophic character, and according to the laws of an emperor distinguished by the wisdom and justice of his general administration. The apologists who were repeatedly addressed to the successors of Trajan are filled with the most pathetic complaints, that the Christians who obeyed the dictates, and solicited the liberty, of conscience, were alone, among all the subjects of the Roman empire, excepted from the common benefits of their auspicious government. The deaths of a few eminent martyrs have been recorded with care; and from the time that Christianity was invested with the supreme government of the church have been no less diligently employed in displaying the cruelty, than in imitating the conduct, of their pagan adversaries.
To enumerate (if it be possible) the names of the defenders of the faith, would be a task of interest from an undigested mass of fiction and error, and to relate, in a clear and rational manner, the causes, the extent, the duration, and the most important circumstances, of the persecutions to which the first christians were exposed, is the design of the present chapter.

Inquiry into their motives. The sectaries of a persecuted religion, depressed by fear, amused with resentment, and perhaps heated with enthusiasm, are seldom in a proper temper of mind calmly to investigate, or cautiously to appreciate, the motives of their enemies, which often escape the impartial and discerning eye of those who are placed at a secure distance from the flames of persecution. A reason has been assigned for the conduct of the emperors towards the primitive christians, which may appear the more specious and probable, as it is drawn from the acknowledged genius of the times. The prince of the world was already beginning his religious concord of the world was principally supported by the implicit assent and reverence which the nations of antiquity expressed for their respective traditions and ceremonies. It might therefore be expected, that they would unite with indignation against any sect of people which should separate itself from the communion of mankind, and claiming the exclusive possession of divine knowledge, should disdain every form of worship, except its own, as impious and idolatrous. The rights of toleration were held by mutual indulgence: they were justly forfeited by a refusal of this boon. An appeal was made to every circumstance that could exasperate the minds of the conquerors, and authorize religious persecution by the most specious arguments of political justice and the public safety. From the reign of Nero to that of Antoninus Pius, the Jews discovered a fierce impatience of the dominion of Rome, which repeatedly broke out in the most furious massacres and insurrections. Humanity is shocked at the recital of the horrid cruelties which they committed in the cities of Egypt, of Cyrene, and of Cyr., where they dwelt in treacherous friendship with the unsuspecting natives, and were tempted to applaud the severe retaliation which was exercised by the arms of the legions against a race of fanatics, whose dire and cruel superstition seemed to render them the implacable enemies not only of the Roman government, but of mankind. The Jews was supported by the opinion, that it was unlawful for them to pay taxes to an idolatrous master; and by the flattering promise which they derived from their ancient perfidy, that conquering mankind would be destined to break their fetters, and to invest the favours of heaven with the empire of the earth. It was by announcing himself as their long-expected deliverer, and by calling on all the descendants of Abraham to assemble, under the sign of largesse, the chosen people. The Jews, who had for two years the power of the emperor Hadrian.

Notwithstanding these repeated pro-Toleration of the vocations, the resentment of the Roman emperors towards the sects whose singleness of heart were their uninterrupted continuance beyond the period of war and danger. By the general indulgence of polytheism, and by the mild temper of Antoninus Pius, the Jews were restored to their ancient privileges, and once more obtained the permission of circumscribing their children, with the easy restraint, that they should never confer on any foreign proselyte that distinguishing mark of the Hebrew race. 5 The numerous remains of that people, though they were still excluded from the precincts of Jerusalem, were permitted to form and to maintain considerable establishments both in Italy and in the provinces, to enjoy the payment of annual municipal honours, and to obtain at the same time an exemption from the burdensome and expensive offices of society. The moderation or the contempt of the Romans gave a legal sanction to the form of ecclesiastical polity which was instituted on the confiscated sect. The patriarch, who had fixed his residence at Tiberias, was empowered to appoint his subordinate ministers and apostles, to exercise a domestic jurisdiction, and to receive from his dispersed brethren an annual contribution. 6 New synagogues were frequently erected at the expense of the emperor, the sabbaths, the fasts, and the festivals, which were either commanded by the Mosaic law, or enjoined by the traditions of the Rabbis, were celebrated in the most solemn and public manner. 7 Such gentle treatment insensibly assuaged the stern temper of the Jews. Awakened from their dream of prophecy and conquest, they assumed the behaviour of peaceable and industrious subjects. Their irreconcilable hatred of mankind, instead of flaming out in acts of blood and violence, evaporated in less dangerous gratifications. They embraced every opportunity of overreachting the idolaters in trade, and they denounced a war of imprecations against the haughty kingdom of Edom. 8 Since the Jews, who rejected with a horribleness the deities adored by their neighbours and by their fellow-subjects, were loved, however, by the free exercise of their religion, the disciples of Christ to those severities from which the posterity of Abraham was exempt. The difference between them is simple and obvious; but, according to the sentiments of antiquity, it was of the highest importance. The Jews were a nation; the christians were a sect; and if it was natural for every community to respect the sacred institutions of their neighbours, it was incumbent on them to persevere in those of their own. 9

1 [The history of the first ages of Christianity is found only in the Acts of the Apostles, and if we would speak of the persecutions which the first christians suffered, we must have recourse to the account given by Luke. These persecutions at that time, rather than now, are considered as unimportant, and to a small extent of country, interested only the persecuted, and by them only were remembered. Gibbon in tracing the persecutions no further back than to the time of Nero, has entirely omitted them, and except in this period, the history of the things which is given by St. Luke. The only means of justifying this omission was to question the authenticity of the Acts of the Apostles; for, if they are authentic, they must necessarily be considered as antitype of their circumstances, and a few words whose authority is more firmly established than that of the Acts of the Apostles. (See Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel's History, part ii.) It is then without sufficient motives that Gibbon has preserved such an entire silence, respecting the accounts given by St. Luke, and this omission is not, perhaps, inconsiderable. -G. 2 (1) In Cyrene they massacred 200,000 Greeks; in Cyrene 400,000; in Egypt a very great multitude. Many of these unhappy victims were then in the city, who, according to a precedent established by David and which had been granted the sanction of his example. The victorious Jews devoured the flesh, licked up the blood, and twisted the entrails like a girdle round the city. (2) See Cassius, I. iv. 4 (3) Many commentators, among others Reinsius in his notes upon Dio Cassius, I. iv. 4. 1-15. 15. (4) Many references to Andromache in his letters upon Dio Cassius, I. iv. 4. 1-15. 15. According to this historian, the hatred of the Jews against the Jews was so much increased by this historian to exasperate the enmity which the Jews committed against the Jews. (Dion Cass. loc. cit. xvi. 1146, 1-12. 16.) (5) See for the general customs of the Jews, as we may learn from Dion (loc. cit. xvi. 1146, 1-12) that in Hadrian's war 200,000 Jews were cut off by the sword, besides an infinite number which perished by famine, by disease, and by fire. 6 For the sect of the Zealots, see Barrangé, Histoire des Juifs, t. iv. c. 17, for the characters of the Messiah, according to the Rabbis, l. v. c. 12, c. 13, for the actions of Baruch, l. v. c. 12. 7 It is to Modestinus, a Roman lawyer, (i. vi. regular,) that we are indebted for this correct knowledge of the state of the sect in the time of Antoninus Pius, who is treated by Cassius ad Hist. August. p. 27. 8 See Séguin, Histoire des Juifs, t. ii. c. 2, 3. The office of a patriarch was supposed by Theodosius the younger. 9 We need only mention the Parrim, or deliverance of the Jews from the rage of human, which, till the reign of Theodosius, was celebrated with insolent triumph and riotous intemperance. Bar- rangé, Histoire des Juifs, t. ii. c. 2. 10 According to the false Josephus, Teosaph, the grandson of Diao, conducted into Italy the army of Abuses, king of Carthage. Another谣言, which I am informed are propagated by many Christians of Spain, to prove the existence of a parcel of cowards, with the dominions of Romula. For these, or for other reasons of equal weight, the name of Edom was applied by the Jews to the Roman empire.
ancestors. The voice of oracles, the precepts of philosophers, and the authority of the laws, unanimously enforced the migration. By the pretended claims of superior sanctity, the Jews might provoke the polytheists to consider them as an odious and impure race. By disclaiming the intercourse of other nations, they might deserve their contempt. The laws of Moses might be for the most part frivolous: they had been revised during many ages by a large society, his followers were justified by the example of mankind; and it was universally acknowledged, that they had a right to practise what it would have been criminal in them to neglect. But this principle, which protected the Jews, whose synagogue, it may be said, afforded any favor to their primitive church. By embracing the faith of the gospel, the christians incurred the supposed guilt of an unnatural and unpardonable offence. They dissolved the sacred ties of custom and education, violated the religious institutions of their country, and presumptuously despised whatever their fathers had believed as true, or had revered as sacred. Nor was this apostasy (if we may use the expression) merely of a partial or local kind; since the pious deserter who withdrew himself from the temples of Egypt or Syria, would equally disdain to seek an asylum in those of Athens or Carthage. The practice of their superstitions of his family, his city, and his province. The whole body of christians unanimously refused to hold any communion with the gods of Rome, of the empire, and of mankind. It was in vain that the oppressed believer asserted the inalienable rights of conscience and private judgment. Though his situation might excite the pity, his arguments could never reach the understanding, either of the philosophic or of the believing part of the pagan world. To their apprehensions, it was no less a matter of surprise, that any individuals should entertain scruples against complying with the laws of a nation, of which they had conceived a sudden abhorrence to the manners, the dress, or the language, of their native country.

Christianity ac- cused of atheism, and mistook by the people and philosophers. Malice and prejudice concerned in representing the christians as a society of atheists, who, by the most daring attack on the religious constitution of the empire, had merited the severest animadversion of the civil magistrate. They had separated themselves (they could not bear to be subject to an institution which was received in any part of the globe by the various temper of polytheism; but it was not altogether so evident what deity, or what form of worship, they had substituted to the gods and temples of antiquity. The pure and sublime idea which they entertained of the Supreme Being escaped the gross conception of the pagan multitude, who were at a loss to discover a spiritual and solitary God, that was neither represented under any corporeal figure or visible symbol, nor was adored with the accustomed pomp of libations and festivals, of altars and sacrifices. The sacrifice of God was the first property of the Christian. Being escaped the gross conceptions of men, they were induced by reason or by vanity to reserve for themselves and their chosen disciples the privilege of this philosophical devotion. They were far from admitting the prejudices of mankind as the standard of truth, but they considered them as flowing from the original disposition of human nature; and they supposed that any particular mode of faith and worship which presumed to disclaim the assistance of the senses, would, in proportion as it receded from superstition, find itself incapable of restraining the vagaries and the fond imaginations of the new sects. The author of a celebrated dialogue, which has been attributed to Lucian, whilst he affects to treat the mysterious subject of the Trinity in a style of ridicule and contempt, betrays his own ignorance of the weakness of human reason, and of the inscrutable nature of the divine perfections.1

It might appear less surprising, that the founder of christianity should not only be revered by his disciples as a sage and a prophet, but that he should be adored as a God. The polytheists were disposed to adopt every article of faith, which seemed to offer any resemblance, however distant or imperfect, with the popular or popular myths and the legends of Hercules, and of Asclepius, had, in some measure, prepared their imagination for the appearance of the Son of God under a human form.2 But they were astonished that the christians should abandon the temples of those ancient heroes, who, in the infancy of the world, had invented arts, institutions, laws, and vanquished the tyrants or monsters who infested the earth; in order to choose for the exclusive object of their religious worship, an obscure teacher, who, in a recent age, and among a barbarous people, had fallen a sacrifice either to the malice of his own countrymen, or to the jealousy of the Roman government. The Pagans multitude, reserving their gratitude for temporal benefits alone, rejected the inestimable present of life and immortality, which was offered to mankind by Jesus of Nazareth. His mild constancy in the midst of cruel and voluntary sufferings, his universal benevolence, and the sublime simplicity of his actions and character, were insufficient, in the opinion of those carnal men, to compensate for the want of fame, of empire, and of success; and whilst they refused to acknowledge his stupendous triumph over the powers of darkness and of the grave, they misrepresented, or are turned to the Suprême Being. Being escaped the gross conceptions of the pagan multitude, who were at a loss to discover a spiritual and solitary God, that was neither represented under any corporeal figure or visible symbol, nor was adored with the accustomed pomp of libations and festivals, of altars and sacrifices. The sacrifice of God was the first property of the Christian. Being escaped the gross conceptions of men, they were induced by reason or by vanity to reserve for themselves and their chosen disciples the privilege of this philosophical devotion. They were

1 From the arguments of Cicero, as they are represented and related by Origine, (l. v. p. 247—259) we may clearly discover the distinction that was made between the Jewish people and the Christian sect. See Origine, l. v. p. 248—250. We cannot give an inexact description of the popular sentiments, with regard to the devotedness of the Hebrews. See Origine, l. v. p. 250—252.
2 Nor was there any part of the Christian doctrine which is related by Origine, (l. v. p. 250—252,) to have raised a storm of invidious invective in the Jews, who had once a temple, a temple, after the destruction of Jerusalem. Origen, l. v. p. 248—250. But the readers of the sacred books of the New Testament, will consider the Jewish as the most respectable of all the sects.
jects; and that the privileges of private corporations, though formed for the most harmless or beneficial purposes, were bestowed with a very sparing hand. The religious assemblies of the Christians, who had assumed to themselves from the public the privileges and approbation of a much less innocent nature, they were illegal in their principle, and in their consequences might become dangerous; nor were the emperors conscious that they violated the laws of justice, for when the peace of society, they prohibited those secret and sometimes nocturnal meetings. The pious conduct of the Christians made their conduct, or perhaps their designs, appear in a much more serious and criminal light; and the Roman princes, who might perhaps have suffered themselves to be disarmed by a ready submission, deeming their honour concerned in the execution of their commands, sometimes attempted, by rigorous punishments, to subdue this independent spirit, which boldly acknowledged an authority superior to that of the magistrate. The extent and duration of this spiritual conspiracy seemed to render it every day more deserving of his animadversion. We have already seen that the active and pious princes of the ancient Christians had insensibly diffused them through every province and almost every city of the empire. The new converts seemed to renounce their family and country, that they might connect themselves in an indissoluble chain with the august community of the faithful society, which every where assumed a different character from the rest of mankind. Their gloomy and austere aspect, their abhorrence of the common business and pleasures of life, and their frequent predictions of impending calamities, inspired the pagans with the apprehension of some danger, which would arise from the new sect, the more alarming as it was the more obscure. "Whatever," says Pliny, "may be the principle of their conduct, their inflexible obstinacy appeared deserving of punishment." Their manners and customs, the judgments of Christ and his apostles, the officers of religion were at first dictated by fear and necessity; but they were continued from choice. By imitating the awful severity which reigned in the Eleusinian mysteries, the Christians had flattered themselves that they should render their sacred institutions more respectable by the calm of pagans. It is a common theme of the pagans, as it often happens to the operations of subtle policy, deceived their wishes and their expectations. It was concluded, that they only concealed what they would have blushed to disclose. Their mistaken design occulted the grand design. It was impossible for suspicious credulity to believe, the horrind tales which described the Christians as the most wicked of human kind, who practised in their dark recesses every abomination that a depraved fancy could suggest, and who solicited the favour of their unknown God by the sacrifice of every moral virtue. There were many who pretended to confess or to relate the ceremonies of this abhorred society. It was asserted, "that a new-born infant, entirely covered over with flour, was presented, like some mystic symbol of initiation, to the knife of the prostrate, who unknowingly inflicted a mortal wound on the innocent victim of his error; that as soon as the cruel deed was perpetrated, the sectaries drank up the blood, greedily tore asunder the quivering members, and pledged themselves to eternal secrecy, by a mutual consciousness of guilt. It was as confidently affirmed, that the grandeur of the nobility, appointed to support a licentious entertainment, in which intemperance served as a provocative to brutal lust; till, at the appointed moment, the lights were suddenly extinguished, shame was banished, nature was forgotten; and, as accident might direct, the darkness of the night was polluted by the lascivious embraces of sisters and brothers, of sons and of mothers." The perusal of the ancient apologetic writings was sufficient to remove even the slightest suspicion from the mind of a candid adversary. The Christians, with the intrepidity of innocence, appeal from the voice of the unlearned to the equity of the magistrates. They acknowledge, that if any proof can be produced of the crimes which calumny has imputed to them, they are worthy of the most severe punishment. They provoke the punishment, and they challenge the proof. At the same time they aimed at a large, with a zeal that propriety, that the charge is not less devoid of probability, than it is destitute of evidence; they ask, whether any one can seriously believe that the pure and holy precepts of the gospel, which so frequently restrain the use of the most unlawful crimes, and which are represented as more atrocious and abominable crimes: that a large society should resolve to disannihilate itself in the eyes of its own members; and that a great number of persons of either sex, and every age and character, insensible to the fear of death or infamy, should consent to violate those principles which the natural conscience has implanted most deeply in their minds. Nothing, it should seem, could weaken the force or destroy the effect of so unanswerable a justification, unless it were the injudicious conduct of the apologists themselves, who betrayed the common cause of religion, to gratify their devout hatred. They had not discerned a difference between the sometimes faintly insinuated, and sometimes boldly asserted, that the same bloody sacrifices, and the same inestimable festivals, which were so falsely ascribed to the orthodox believers, were in reality celebrated by the Manichæans, by the Corporations, and even by several sects of pagans, of whom the charge standing they might deviate into the paths of heresy, were still actuated by the sentiments of men, and still governed by the precepts of Christianity. Accusations of a similar kind were retorted upon the church, and the sect of Christians were eagerly desired by the public to sever their connexion, and it was confessed on all sides, that the most scandalous licentiousness of manners prevailed among great numbers of those who affected the name of Christians. A pagan magistrate, who possessed neither leisure nor abilities to discern the almost imperceptible line which divides the orthodox faith from heretical depravity, might easily have imagined that their mutual animosity had extinguished the discovery of their common guilt. It was fortunate for the repose of the

The emperor Trajan refused to incorporate a company of 150 firefighters, for the use of the city of Nocera. He disliked all associations. See Plin. Epist. x. 58, 59.

The provincial Pliny had published a general edict against unchristian sects, with the avowed presence of the senate of Agrippa: but it was impossible for them to execute the public edict. See Plin. Epist. x. 97.

As the prophets of the antichrist, approaching confiscation, were provoked those pagans whom they did not convert, they were mentioned with caution and reserve, not as enemies, but as Menaceas were exposed for disclosing too freely the dangerous secret. See Mommsen, p. 52.

Deo enim adhibita, quodnamque est ad quodfateretur, sicut (seu praeiecta in Pomer.) perspicuum verum et indicibilia obstinatis non deprehendatur.

or at least for the reputation, of the first christians, that the magistrates sometimes proceeded with more temper and moderation than is usually consistent with religious zeal, and that they reported, as the impartial result of their judicial inquiry, that the sectaries, who had been detected in the established worship, appeared to them sincere in their professions of future ages, would have serve that honourable office, if she condescended to plead the cause of tyrants, or to justify the maxims of persecution. It must, however, be acknowledged, that the conduct of the emperors who appeared the least favourable to the primitive church, is by no means so criminal as that of modern sone reigns, who have employed the arm of violence and terror against the religious opinions of any part of their subjects. From their reflections, or even from their own feelings, a Charles V. or a Louis XIV. might have acquired a just knowledge of the rights of conscience, of the obligation of faith, and of the inocence of error. But the princes and magistrates of ancient Rome were strangers to those principles which inspired and authorized the inflexible obstinacy of the christians in the cause of truth, nor could they themselves discover in their own breasts any motive which would enable them to act in a contrary manner. If the people and society, it is true, were a natural, submission to the sacred institutions of their country. The same reason which contributes to alleviate the guilt, must have tended to abate the rigour of their persecutions. As they were actuated, not by the furious zeal of bigots, but by the temperate policy of legislators, they must have been more relaxed, and humanity must frequently have suspended, the execution of those laws, which they enacted against the humble and obscure followers of Christ.
From the general view of their character and motives we might naturally conclude: I. That a considerable time elapsed before they considered the new sectaries as an object deserving of the attention of government.
II. That in the conviction of any of their subjects who were accused of so very singular a crime, they proceeded with caution and reluctance. III. That the law was more moderate in the use of punishments; and IV. That the affair of the Church enjoyed a new interval of peace and tranquillity. Notwithstanding the careless indulgence which the most copious and the most minute of the pagan writers have written to the affairs of the christians, it may still be in our power to confirm it by other evidence extant, the by the evidence of authentic facts.

They neglected I. By the wise dispensation of Prothe christians on vidence, a mysterious veil was cast over a sect of Jews; the infancy of the church, which, till the faith of the christians was matured, and their numbers were multiplied, served to protect them not only from the malice but even from the knowledge of the pagan world. The slow and gradual abolition of the Mosaic ceremonies afforded a safe and innocent disguise to the more early proselytes of the gospel. As they were far the greater part of the race of Abraham, the general tenor of legislation by the priests often has a remission, offered up their devotions in the temple of Jerusalem till its final destruction, and received both the law and the prophets as the genuine inspirations of the duty. The gentle converts, who by a spiritual adoption had been associated to the hope of Israel, was gradually submitted under the superintendence of Jews, and as the polytheist paid less regard to articles of faith than to the external worship, the new sect, which carefully concealed, or faintly anounced, its future greatness and ambition, was permitted to shelter itself under the general toleration which was granted to an ancient and celebrated people in the Roman empire. It was gradually accosted by Jews themselves, animated with an anti-christian zeal and a more jealous faith, perceived the gradual separation of their Nazarene brethren from the doctrine of the synagogue; and they would gladly have extinguished the dangerous heresy in the blood of its adherents.
But the Apostle of the Gentiles had already dissipated their malice; and though they might sometimes exert the licentious privilege of sedition, they no longer possessed the administration of criminal justice; nor do they find it easy to infuse into the calm breast of a Roman magistrate the rancour of their own zeal and prejudices. The provincial governors declared themselves ready to listen to any accusation that might affect the public safety; but as soon as they were informed, that it was a question not of facts but of words, a dispute relating only to the interpretation of the Jewish laws and prophecies, they deemed it unworthy of the majesty of Rome seriously to discuss the obscure differences which might arise among a barbarous and superstitious people. The innocence of the first christians was protected by ignorance and contempt; and the tribunal of the pagan magistrate often proved their most assured refuge against the fury of the synagogue. They were of the same age, the same race, the same language; they possessed the same traditions of a too credulous antiquity, we might relate the distant peregrinations, the wonderful achievements, and the various deaths of the twelve apostles;
but a more accurate inquiry will induce us to doubt, whether any of those persons who had been witnesses of the miracles of Christ were still living in the limits of Palestine, to seal with their blood the truth of their testimony. From the ordinary term of human life, it may very naturally be presumed that most of them were deceased before the discontent of the Jews broke out into that furious war, which was teriminated only by the ruin of Jerusalem. During a long period, from the death of Christ to that memorable rebellion, we cannot discover any traces of Roman intolerance, unless they are to be found in the sudden, the transient, but the cruel persecution, which was excercised by Shaul, and against the last, thirty-five years after the former, and only two years before the latter, of those great events. The character of the philosophic historian, to whom we are principally indebted for the knowledge of this singular transaction, would alone be sufficient to recommand to every detector of evidence extant, the by the evidence of authentic facts.

In the tenth year of the reign of Nerva.

The fire of Rome,
the capital of the empire was afflicted by a fire which raged beyond the Nero.

[This assertion appears to me too positive, inasmuch as Gibbon finds no proof whatever of it, although the opposite opinion has strong proof in its favour. The travels of Saint Paul, in Pamphylia, in Pisidia, in Macedonia, and to Rome, his death, the journeys of St. Peter, &c. have been examined with great care by Dr. Beaux, in his very elaborate work, entitled The life of the first century, the first volume, part ii. See also Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel history, part 1, chap. xvi. &c.]

In the time of Tertullian and Clemens of Alexandria, the glory of martyrdom was confounded with that of princes.

honour of Pity, with much reason, and some declamation.

which was composed by the priest himself) there are many lines which relate to the christians; nor has the diligence of which Rome was divided, four only subsisted entire, three were levelled with the ground, and the remaining seven, which had experienced the fury of the flames, displayed a melancholy prospect of ruin and desolation. The vigilance of government appears not to have neglected any of the precautions which might have secured the safety of so dear a treasure.

The most generous policy, however, could not prevent the disappearance of the streets and the construction of private houses; and as it usually happens, in an age of prosperity, the confabulation of Rome, in the course of a few years, produced a new city, more regular and more beautiful in arrangement, than the ancient one, which had before occupied their situation.

The imperial gardens were thrown open to the distressed multitude, temporary buildings were erected for their accommodation, and a plentiful supply of corn and provisions was distributed at a very moderate price. The most generous policy, however, could not prevent the disappearance of the streets and the construction of private houses; and as it usually happens, in an age of prosperity, the confabulation of Rome, in the course of a few years, produced a new city, more regular and more beautiful in arrangement, than the ancient one, which had before occupied their situation.

The gardens of Nero, however, destined for the pleasure of his friends, which was accompanied with a horse-race, and honoured with the presence of the emperor, who mingled with the populace in the dress and attitude of a charioteer. The guilt of the Christians deserved indeed the most exemplary punishment, but the public sentiment was never so far removed from its opinion that those unhappy wrecks were sacrificed, not so much to the public welfare, as to the cruelty of a jealous tyrant. Those who survey with a curious eye the revolutions of mankind, may observe, that the gardens and circus of Nero on the Vatican, which were polluted with the blood of the first martyrs, have been rendered still more famous, by the triumph and by the abuse of the persecuted religion. On the same spot, a temple, which far surpasses the ancient glories of the capitol, has since been erected by the Christian pontiffs, who, deriving their claim of universal dominion from the builders of Galilee, have succeeded to the throne of the Caesars, given laws to the barbarian conquerors of Rome, and extended their spiritual jurisdiction from the coast of the Baltic to the shores of the Pacific ocean.

It would be impossible to estimate the value of this account of Nero and Christianity. It is the only authentic history of the persecution of the Christians, and the integrity of this celebrated passage of Tacitus. The Christians, by some former, is confirmed by the diligent and accurate Suetonius, who mentions the punishment which Nero inflicted on the Christians, a sect of men who had embraced a new and criminal proposition. The latter may be proved by the consent of the most ancient manuscripts; by the inimitable character of the style of Tacitus; by his reputation, which guarded his text from the interpolations of pious fraud; and by the purport of his narration, which accursed the first Christians of a name which they were seized to the discoveries of so many miracles, and that they possessed any miraculous or even magical powers above the rest of mankind. Notwithstanding it is probable that Tacitus was born some years after the fire of Rome, he could derive only from reading and conversation the knowledge of an event which happened during his infancy. Before Nero took himself to the public, he calmly waited till his genius had attained its full maturity, and he was more than forty years of age, when a grateful regard for the memory of the virtuous Agrippa, exalted him to the most early of those historical compositions which will delight and instruct the most distant posterity. After making a trial of his strength in the life of Agrippa and the description of Germany, he conceived, Tacit. Anot., v. 44.

Sueton, in Nerone, c. 16. The epitaph of Caligula, which some sagacious commentators have translated magical, is considered by the more rational Moehrens and synonymous to the existent of Tacitus. The passage concerning Jesus Christ, which was inserted into the text of Josephus, between the time of Origen and that of Eusebius, may furnish an example of no vulgar forgery. The second and fourth books of this work are dedicated to the history of the chimerical, miracles, and resurrection of Jesus, are distinctly related. Josephus acknowledges that he was the Messiah, and beseeches us to suppose that any doubt can still remain concerning this celebrated passage, the reader may examine the pointed objections of Le Fevre, (Hervorm, Joseph, p. 197—232) and the masterly reply of the Bibliotheca Ancienci et Moderna, (vol. iii. p. 348.) Tacitus, in his work on the bishop of Gloucester. (Divine Legation, vol. iii. p. 26.) But it will be seen that he does not unite very happily with the rest of the sentence, James Gravemius has preferred the reading of conjunctly, which is authorized by the valuable Ms. of Florence. and at length executed, a more arduous work; the history of Rome, in thirty books, from the fall of Nero to the accession of Nerva. The administration of Nerva, of which Tacitus had occupied himself, as well as that of the four immediate successors of Augustus. To collect, to dispose, and to adorn a series of fourscore years, in an immortal work, every sentence of which is pregnant with the deepest observations and the most lively images, was an undertaking sufficient to exercise the faculties of the most ancient and the greatest part of his life. In the last years of the reign of Trajan, whilst the victorious monarch extended the power of Rome beyond its ancient limits, the historian was describing, in the second and fourth books of his annals, the tyranny of Tiberius; and the emperor Hadrian must have succeeded to the throne, before Tacitus, in the regular prosecution of his work, could relate the rise of the capital and the cruelty of Nero towards the unfortunate Christians. At the distance of sixty years, it was the duty of the annalist to adopt the narra- tives of contemporaries; but it was natural for him to conclude with a short account of his description of the origin, the progress, and the character of the sect, not so much according to the knowledge or prejudices of the age of Nero, as according to those of the time of Hadrian. 3. Tacitus very frequently trusts to the curiosity or reflection of his readers to supply those intermediate circumstances and ideas, which in his exten- siveness of dates, he has not thought proper to sup- press. We may therefore presume to imagine some probable cause which could direct the cruelty of Nero against the Christians of Rome, whose obscurity, as well as innocence, should have shielded them from his indignation, and even from his notice. 4. The Jews, who were numerous in the capital, and oppressed in their own country, were a much fitter object for the suspicions of the emperor and of the people: nor did it seem likely that a vanquished nation, who already discovered their abhorrence of the Roman joke, might have ventured to come to terms of gratifying their implacable revenge. But the Jews were very powerful advocates in the palace, and even in the heart of the tyrant; his wife and mistress, the beautiful Poppea, and a favourite player of the race of Abraham, who had already employed their intercession in the affairs of his family. It is supposed to have been necessary to offer some other victims, and it might easily be suggested that, although the genuine followers of Moses were innocent of the fire of Rome, there had arisen among them a new and pernicious sect of Galilans, which was capable of the most horrid crimes. Under the appellation of Galilans, two distinctions of men were confounded, the most opposite to each other in their manners and principles: the disciples who had espoused the faith of Jesus of Na- zareth, and the zealots who had followed the standard of Judas the Gaulotine. 1 The former were the friends, the latter the enemies, of human kind; and the only resemblance between them consisted in the same in- flexible constancy, which, in the defence of their principles, was often directed against the interests of mankind. The followers of Judas, who impelled their country- men into rebellion, were soon buried under the ruins of Jerusalem; whilst those of Jesus, known by the more celebrated name of Christians, diffused themselves over the Roman empire. How natural was it for Tacitus, in the history of Hadrian, to relate, as a main fact in the history of the Christians, that they suffered the guilt and the sufferings which, he might, with far greater truth and justice, have attributed to a sect whose odious memory was almost extinguished! 4 Whatever opinion may be entertained of this con- jecture, (for it is no more than a conjecture,) it is evi- dent, that the events relating to the Galilans and the persecution were confined to the walls of Rome; 5 that the religious tenets of the Galilans, or Christians, were never made a subject of punishment, or even of in- quiry; and that, as the idea of their sufferings was, for a long time, connected with the idea of cruelty and in- justice, the moderation of succeeding princes inclined them to spare a sect, oppressed by a tyrant, whose rage had been usually directed against virtue and innocence.

It is somewhat remarkable, that the Oppression of the flames of war consumed almost at the same time the temple of Jerusalem and the heart of Rome. The capitol of Rome, 3 and the temple of the same name, 4 were ancient monuments of the same age. It is a part of the history of Rome, that the temple of Nerva alone was the theatre of their revolt, their efforts, their opinions, their wars, and their chaste- ment. (Rassamge, Hist. of the Jews, vol. i. p. 691.) Besides the name Christians had been given a long time before at Rome, to the disciples of Jesus. And Tacitus names it too positively, and gives the etymology of the word too clearly to leave room for suspicion that there was any mistake on his part.—6

1 This assertion is far from being evident. Supeclitus Severus speaks of the edict published by Nero against the Christians, posterior to the burning of Rome. Post erum, datis utique religio vetera- hater palatium editis proposita christianorum esse non fortebat (hook it, chap. 27.)

2 We see Wodwell, Panчат. Part. I. xiii. The Spanish Inquisition in Gruter, p. 257. No. 9, is a manifest and acknowledged forgery, permitted by that noted impostor, Cervantes, in Apollo, to suffer the pride and prejudices of the Spaniards. See Ferrers, Histoire de l'Espagne, p. 452. Seville.

3 The capitol was burnt during the civil war between Vitellius and Vespasian, the 18th of December, A.D. 69. On the tenth of this month, thereby the hands of the Jews themselves, rather than by those of the Romans.

4 The new temple of Jupiter, which was dedicated to Vespasian by the hands of the Galilans, was afterwards built on the site of the temple of Nerva, and the temple of Jupiter, portraits by that noted impostor, Cervantes, in Apollo, to suffer the pride and prejudices of the Spaniards. See Ferrers, Histoire de l'Espagne, p. 452. Seville.

5 The temple of Nerva, of which mention is made in the inscription, and which was erected in the name of Vespasian and Titus, had been dedicated to Jupiter, Jupiter, c. 5. Plutarch in Topica, l. p. 250 Ed. Bryan. The ancient temple was 12,000 talents (above the million and a half.) It was dedicated to Vespasian and Titus, who reigned forty years, with 569 of his most devoted followers. When the latter reign had ended a breach, they turned their swords against their wives. clining party among the christians still adhered to the law of Moses, their efforts to disseminate their Jewish origin were detected by the decisive test of circumcision. The Roman emperor Trajan, therefore, betakes himself to a second inquisition into the difference of their religious tenets. Among the christians, who were brought before the tribunal of the emperor, or, as it seems more probable, before that of the procurator of Judea, two persons are said to have appeared, distinguished by their extraction, which was said to be among the greatest monarchs. These were the surnames of St. Jude the apostle, who himself was the brother of Jesus Christ. Their natural pretensions to the throne of David might perhaps attract the respect of the people, and excite the jealousy of the Emperor; but they were neither obscure nor capable of disturbing the peace of the Roman empire. They frankly confessed their royal origin, and their near relation to the Messiah; but they disclaimed any temporary views, and confessed that his kingdom, which they devoutly expected, was purely of a spiritual and angelic nature. When they were examined concerning their fortune and occupation, they showed their hands hardened with daily labour, and declared that they derived their whole subsistence from the cultivation of a field of about ten acres; from which he extent a field of about twenty-four English acres, and of the value of nine thousand drachmas, or three hundred pounds sterling. The grandsons of St. Jude were dismissed with compassion and contempt.

But although the obscurity of the Messianic period,

The answer of Trajan, to which the Trajan and his christians of the succeeding age have frequently appealed, discovers as much of a design for justice and humanity as could restrain, he reconciled with his mistaken notions of religious policy. Instead of displaying the implacable zeal of

b This appellation was at first understood in the most obvious sense; and it was supposed, that the brethren of Jesus were the legal issue of Joseph and of Mary. A devout respect for the virginity of the mother of God, suggested to the Gentiles, and afterwards to the orthodox Greeks, the expedient of bestowing a second wife on Joseph. The Latin (from the time of Jerome) improved on this idea, by a very inexact notion of the simplicity and justice of the Jewish laws: a notion which is found in and by various other examples, that the names of Flavia Sabina, the elder was soon convicted of treasonable intentions, and the younger, who bore the name of Flavia Clemens, was indebted for his safety to his want of courage and ability. The emperor, for a long time, distinguished so harmless a kinsman by his favour and protection, bestowed on him his own niece Domitilla, adopted the children of that marriage to the hope of the succession, and invested their father with the honours of the consulsip. But he had scarcely finished the term of his annual magistracy, when the Senate was so alarmed and was at the utmost extreme. Domitilla was banished to a desolate island on the coast of Campania; and sentence either of death or of confiscation was pronounced against a great number of persons who were involved in the same accusation. The guilt imputed to their charge was that of atheism and Jewish manners; a singular association of ideas, which cannot with any propriety be applied except to the christians, as they were obscurely and improperly designated by the surnames of their founder and of his brethren. This suspicion was given by the writers of that period. On the strength of so probable an interpretation, and too eagerly admitting the suspicions of a tyrant as an evidence of their honourable crime, the church has placed both Clemens and Domitilla among its first martyrs, and has branded with the name of the second persecution. But this persecution (if it deserves that epithet) was of no long duration. A few months after the death of Clemens, and the banishment of Domitilla, Stephan, a freedman belonging to the latter, who had enjoyed his favour, but who had not so far embraced the faith of his mistress, assassinated the emperor in his palace. The memory of Domitian was condemned by the senate; his acts were rescinded; his exiles recalled; and under the gentle administration of Nerva, while the innocent were restored to their rank and places, even the most guilty either obtained pardon or escaped punishment.

an inquisitor, anxious to discover the most minute particles of heresy, and exulting in the number of his victims, the emperor expresses much more solicitude to protect the security of the innocent, than to prevent the punishment of the guilty. The Senate make no attempt on the security of any general plan; but he lays down two salutary rules, which often afforded relief and support to the distressed Christians. Though he directs the magistrates to punish such persons as are legally convicted, he prohibits them, with a very humane inconsistency, from punishing any persons on suspicion of being criminals. Nor was the magistrate allowed to proceed on every kind of information. Anonymous charges the emperor rejects, as too repugnant to the equity of his government; and he strictly requires, for the conviction of those to whom the guilt ofChristianity is imputed, that the minds of the accusers and the victims of the Christians should be respected. It was not among a licentious and exasperated populace, that the forms of legal proceedings could be observed; it was not in an amphitheatre, stained with the blood of wild beasts and gladiators, that the voice of compassion could be heard. The impatient clamours of the multitude denounced the Christians as the enemies of gods and men, doomed them to the severest tortures, and venturing to accuse by name some of the most distinguished of the new sectaries, required with irresistible vehemence that they should be instantly apprehended and cast to the lions. The provincial magistrates and the judges who presided in the public spectacles were usually inclined to gratify the inclinations, and to appease the rage of the people, by the sacrifice of a few obnoxious victims. But the wisdom of the emperors protected the church from the danger of these tumultuous clamours and irregular accusations. They accused their enemies, which was treated with the most vigilant jealousy from the eye of the profane. If they succeeded in their prosecution, they were exposed to the resentment of a considerable and active party, to the censure of the more liberal portion of mankind, and to the ignominy which, in every age, has been the punishment of an informer. If, on the contrary, they failed in their proofs, they incurred the severe and perhaps capital penalty, which, according to a law published by the emperor Hadrian, was inflicted on those who falsely attributed to their fellow-citizens the crime of Christianity. The violence of personal or superstitious animosity might sometimes prevail over the most natural apprehensions of disgrace and danger; but it cannot surely be imagined, that accusations of such unprofitable appearances were either lightly or frequently undertaken by the pagan subjects of the Roman empire.

Popular clamours. The expedition which was employed to elude the prudence of the laws, afforded a sufficient proof how effectually they disappointed the miscellaneous designs of private malice or superstitions zeal. In a large and tumultuous assembly the restraints of law are naturally less felt than in the situation of individuals. The two extremes of society, the magnates and the democrats, are deprived of the greatest part of their influence. The pious christian, as he was desirous to obtain, or to escape, the glory of martyrdom, expected, either with impatience or with terror, the stated returns of the public games and festivals. On those occasions, the procession of the victors, the triumphs, the trophies, were usually collected in the circus or the theatre, where every circumstance of the place, as well as of the ceremony, contributed to kindle their dazlement, and to extinguish their humanity. Whilst the numerous spectators, crowned with garlands, perfumed with incense, paraded with the blood of victims, and surrounded with the altars and statues of their tutelar deities, resigned themselves to the enjoyment of pleasures, which they considered as an essential part of their religious worship; they recollected, that the christians alone abhorred the gods of mankind, and by their absence and melancholy on these solemn festivals, seemed to insult or to lament the public felicity. If the empire had been afflicted by any recent calamity, by a plague, a famine, or an unsuccessful war; if the Tyber had, or the Nile had not risen beyond its banks; if the earth had shaken, or if the tempestuous order of the seasons had been interrupted, the superstitious pagans were convinced, that the crimes and the impurity of the christians, who were spared by the excessive lenity of the government, were the result of the cruelty of fixing any general plan; but he lays down two salutary rules, which often afforded relief and support to the distressed Christians. Though he directs the magistrates to punish such persons as are legally convicted, he prohibits them, with a very humane inconsistency, from punishing any persons on suspicion of being criminals. where were prepared to despire death, were sometimes condemned to a more severe trial, and called upon to determine whether they set a higher value on their religion or on their chastity. The youths to whose licensious disorder they were abandoned, received a solemn exhortation from the judge, to exert their moral and most strenuous efforts to maintain the honour of Venus against the impious virgin who refused to burn incur on her altars. Their violence, however, was commonly disappointed, and the seasonable interposition of the magistrates prevented the execution of their threats against the virgins. The powerful inter-souses of Christ from the dishonour even of an involuntary defeat. We should not indeed neglect to remark, that the more ancient as well as authentic memorials of the church, are seldom polluted with these extravagant and indecent fictions.

Humanity of the Roman magistrates.

The total disregard to truth and probability in the representation of these primitive martyrology was occasioned by a very natural mistake. The ecclesiastical writers of the fourth and fifth centuries ascribed to the magistrates of Rome the same degree of implacable and unrelenting justice, that we find in the histories of the heroes or the idolaters of their own times. It is not improbable that some of those persons who were raised to the dignities of the empire, might have imbibed the prejudices of the populace, and that the cruel disposition of others might occasionally be stimulated by motives of aversion or personal resentment.

But it is certain, and we may appeal to the grateful confessions of the first christians, that the greatest part of those magistrates who exercised in the provinces the authority of the emperor, or of the senate, during the persecution, were far from exercising their power, or from being in the least related to the excesses of punishment. It is known that everywhere, where the church persecuted the Christians, the justice was the same as that which could be found in the other nations. The judges were men of learning and of reputation, and were not themselves susceptible of the new superstition.

Contenting themselves, for the most part, with the milder chastisements of imprisonment and exile, or slavery in the mines, they left the victims of their justice some reason to hope, that a prosperous event, the accession, the marriage, or the Example of Cy-

gipsy bishop of Carthage.

During the same period of persecution, the zealous, the eloquent, the ambitious Cyprian governed the church, not only of Carthage, but even of Africa. He pos-seased every quality which could engage the revence of the faithful, or provoke the suspicions and resentments of his enemies. As well as his station seemed to mark out that holy prelate as the most distinguished object of envy and danger. The experience, however, of the life of Cyprian, is sufficient to prove, that our fancy exaggerated the pernicious situation of a christian bishop; and that the dread so naturally connected with this office was less imminent than those which temporal ambition is always prepared to encounter in the pursuit of honours. Four Roman emperors, with their families, their favourites, and their adherents, perished by the sword in the space of ten years, during which the bishop of Carthage guided by his authority and eloquence the councils of the African church. It was only in the third year of his administration, that he had reason, during a few months, to apprehend the severe edicts of Decius, the vigour of the magistrate, and the clamours of the multitude, who loudly demanded, in the presence of the imminent danger and should be thrown to the lions. Prudence suggested the necessity of a temporary retreat, and the voice of prudence was obeyed.
He withdrew himself into one obscure solitude, from whence he could maintain a constant correspondence with the clergy of Africa. Carthage was again conquering itself till the tempest was past, he preserved his life, without relinquishing either his power or his reputation. His extreme caution did not however escape the censure of the more rigid christians who lamented, or the reproaches of his personal enemies who insulted, and were allowed to participate in the persistaneous and criminal desertion of the most sacred duty.
The propriety of reserving himself for the future exigencies of the church, the example of several holy bishops, and the divine admonitions which, as he declares himself, he frequently received in visions and revelations, were the reasons alleged in his justification.
But his best advice may be found in the cheerful resolution, with which, about eight years afterwards, he suffered death in the cause of religion. The authentic history of his martyrdom has been recorded with unusual candour and impartiality. A short abstract therefore of those most important events which strike the clearest information of the spirit, and of the forms of the Roman persecutions.

A.D. 257.

When Valerian was consul for the his banishment, third, and Gallienus for the fourth time; Paterinus, proconsul of Africa, summoned Cy-rian to appear in his private council-chamber. His makes particular mention of the principal martyrs only, and that he remains in general, that the type of the pagans against the christians gave to Alexandria the apperance of a city taken by assault. Finally we remark that Orosius wrote before the persecution of the Emperor Decius (c. 6.)

$ The letters of Cyprian exhibit a very curious and original picture of the times. See in the letters, ch. i. 18, 19, 20, 21; i. 21, 22, 23, 50, and ii. 2, 4; the letter by Tlemunt, Monnens Ecclesiastiques, toms. iv, part i. pp. 76-150.

2 On the other hand, it has not exaggerated the perilous situation of a christian bishop, since Gibson himself says, "the mines of Numidia contained (at the same time) nine bishops, with a proportionate number of martyrs and of the faithful of their diocese. Finally he refers to St.
Caesarius, op. cit. 76-79."

3 The bishops have not been the objects of the enmity of Rome to the bishop of Carthage (Cyprian, Epist. v. 2.), Pontius labours with the precaution and diligence to justify his master against the perni-siveness of the insinuations. See in the letters, ch. i. 17, 18, 19, 20, e. 50. and Memones de Tlemunt, toms. iv, part ii. pp. 65-90.

5 We have an original life of Cyprian by the Jesuit Pontius, the companion of his exile, and the spectator of his death; and we like-whenever possible, present the life of the bishop in a candid point of view. The facts of his life are two relations consistent with each other, and with probability; and with other accounts remarkable, they are both annulled by any miraculous circumstances.

6 There were, and the emperor which he had just received, that those who had abandoned the cyriotic religion should immediately return to the practice of the ceremonies of their ancestors.
Cyprian replied without hesitation, that he was a christian and a bishop, devoted to the worship of the true and only God, as confirmed by Deitritus, the supreme bishop of the Greeks, and dedicated to the public usefulness of the two emperors, his lawful sovereigns. With modest confidence he pleaded the privilege of a citizen, in refusing to give any answer to so many invidious and indeed illegal questions which the proconsul had proposed. A sentence of banishment was pronounced against Cyprian's disobedience; and he was conducted without delay to Curabis, a free and maritime city of Cyprotas-nia, in a pleasant situation, a fertile territory, and at the distance of about forty miles from Carthage. The exiled bishop enjoyed the conveniences of life and the considerations of virtue. His reputation was diffused over Africa and Italy; an account of his behaviour was published for the edification of the christian world; and his solitude was frequently interrupted by the letters, the visits, and the congratulations of the faithful. On the arrival of a new proconsul in the province, the bishop escaped from Curabis at some time to wear a still more favourable aspect.
He was recalled from banishment; and though not yet permitted to return to Carthage, his own gardens in the neighbourhood of the capital were assigned for the place of his residence.

7 After length of time, about one year, 8 Cyprian was first apprehended, Galerius Maximus, proconsul of Africa, received the imperial warrant for the execution of the christian teachers.
The bishop of Carthage was sensible that he should be single out for one of the first victims; and the frailty of his nature overawed him, as he retired from flight, the danger and the honour of martyrdom; but soon recovering that fortitude which his character required, he returned to his gardens, and patiently expected the ministers of death. Two officers of rank, who were intrusted with that commission, placed Cy-rian between them in a chariot; and as the proconsul was not then at leisure, they conducted him, not to a prison, but to a private house in Carthage; which belonged to one of them. An elegant supper was provided for the entertainment of the bishop, and his christian friends were permitted for the last time to enjoy his society in the midst of all the splendour of the multitude of the faithful, anxious and alarmed at the approaching fate of their spiritual father. In the mor-

8 It should seem that these were circular orders, sent at the same time to all the governors. Dyonysius (ap. Euseb. l. vii. c. 11) relates the history of the war banishment from Alexandria almost in the same manner. But as he escaped and survived the persecution, we must account him either more or less fortunate than Cyprian.

aqueduct near Carthage, or Curabis, at present altered into Curthas; and Dr. Shaw reads an inscription, which styles it City Colonia 12 When Cyprian, a twelve-year-old, was sent into exile, he was charg that he should not write the death of the next day, after having it necessary to explain that word, as signifying a year. Pontius, c. 12.

13 This was the reason why the bishop was not permitted to return to Carriage to excite himself for a time. It was threatened that he should be taken to Ulisc, and he was required to remain at Carthage, that he might prevent martyrdom. However, the saint was not to be serve to confirm and instruct those whom he had guided during his chiefs life. It is through the intermediary of his companions and letters of his letters: "Cum perlatum ad nos intres frater carissimn, fumens num persuasit illum, quod interea transierat. Sii interea perveniam causae consensu exquisit conversus episcopo in civitate ad Philius, letter to Cyprian, a Hier.

14 The verses prepossess present confessionis caritatis. (Ep. 61, p. 262.)

15 Pontius (c. 15.) acknowledges that Cyprian, with whom he ing he appeared before the tribunal of the proconsul, who, after informing himself of the name and situation of Cyprian, commanded him to offer sacrifice, and pressed him to reflect on the consequences of his disobedience. The refusal of Cyprian was firm and decisive; and the magistrate, when he had taken the opinion, promptly pronounced the Christian who had denied his faith an impostor, and ordered that sentence of death. It was conceived in the following words: "That Thascius Cyprianus should be immediately beheaded, as the enemy of the gods of Rome, and as the chief and ringleader of a criminal association, which he had seduced into the impious resistance against the laws of the most holy emperors, Valerian and Gallicius." The manner of his execution was the mildest and least painful that could be inflicted on a person convicted of any capital offence; nor was the use of torture admitted to obtain from the bishop of Carthage either the recantation of his principles, or the discovery of his accomplices.

As soon as the sentence was proclaimed, a general cry of " We will die with him," arose at once among the listening multitude of Christians who waited before the palace gates. The generosity of their zeal, the indulgence of their sufferings, neither serviceable to Cyprian nor dangerous to themselves. He was led away under a guard of tribunes and centurions, without resistance and without insult, to the place of his execution, a spacious and level plain near which many, already filled with great numbers of spectators. His faithful followers and brethren were permitted to accompany his holy bishop. They assisted him in laying aside his upper garment, spread linch on the ground to catch the precious relics of his blood, and received his orders to bestow five and twenty pieces of gold on the executioner. The martyr then covered his face with his hands, and at one blow his head was separated from his body. His corpse remained during some hours exposed to the curiosity of the gentiles: but in the night it was removed, and transported in a triumphal procession, and with a splendid illumination, to the burial-place of the Christians. The funeral of Cyprian was publicly celebrated without receiving any interruption from the Roman magistrates; and those among the faithful, who had performed the last offices to his person and his remains, were exempt from the interdict of inquiry or of punishment. It is remarkable, that in so great a multitude of bishops in the province of Africa, Cyprian was the first who was esteemed worthy to obtain the crown of martyrdom."

It was in the character of Cyprian, either as a martyr, or to live an apostolic life, but on that choice depended the alternative of honour or infamy. We could suppose that the bishop of Carthage had employed the profession of the Christian faith only as the instrument of his aversion or ambition, it was still incumbent on him to support the character which he had assumed; and, if he possessed the smallest degree of manly fortitude, rather to expose himself to the most cruel tortures, than by a single act to exchange the reputation of a whole life, for the abhorrence of his christian brethren, and the contempt of the gentile world. The sincere conviction of the truth of those doctrines which he professed, the crown of martyrdom must have appeared to him as an object of desire rather than of terror. It is not easy to extract any distinct ideas from the vague though eloquent description of the admirable conduct of Cyprian in his imprisonment. The immortal glory and happiness which they confidently promised to those who were so fortunate as to shed their blood in the cause of religion. They inculcated with becoming diligence, that the fire of martyrdom supplied every defect and expiated every sin; that the souls of the most pious females courted to pass through a slow and painful purification, the triumphant sufferers entered into the immediate fruition of eternal bliss, where, in the society of the patriarchs, the apostles, and the prophets, they reigned with Christ, and acted as his assessors in the universal administration of the world. But the demonstration of respect, when compared with the ardent gratitude and devotion which the primitive church expressed towards the victorious champions of the faith. The annual commemoration of their virtues and sufferings was observed as a sacred ceremony, and the fifth letter of Cyprian was addressed to his brethren, who had publicly confessed their religious principles, those who (as it very frequently happened) had been dismissioned from the tribunal or the prisons of the pagan magistrates, obtained such honours as were justly due to their imperfect martyrdom, and their general resolution. The most pious females courted the permission of inquiring kisses on the fetters which they had worn, and on the wounds which they had received. Their persons were esteemed holy, their decisions were admitted with deference, and they were too oftentimes invested by their spiritual pride in the most magnificent manners, the pre-eminance which their zeal and incorruption had acquired. Distinctions like these, whilst they display the exalted merit, betray the inconsiderable number of those who suffered, and of those who died, for the profession of Christianity.

The number of Cyprian's followers had been much augmented by the example of the first age will more readily censures than admire, but can more easily admire than imitate, the fervour of the first christians, who, according to the lively expression of Sulpicius Severson, desired martyrdom with more eagerness than his own contemporaries solicited a bishop. The epistles which Ignatius composed as he was carried in chains through the city, show the sentiments the most repugnant to the ordinary feelings of human nature, yet earnestly beseeches the Romans, that when he should be exposed in the amphitheatre, they would not, by their kind but unseasonable intercession, deprive him of the crown of glory; and he declares his resolution to provoke, whatever torment shall be employed as the instruments of his death. Some stories are related of the courage of martyrs, who actually performed what Ignatius had intended; who exasperated the fury of the lions, pressed the executioner to hasten his office, cheerfully leaped into the fires which were kindled to consume them, and discovered a sensation of joy and pleasure in the midst of the most exquisite tortures. Several examples have been preserved of a zeal implacable of those restraint which the emperors had provided for the security of the church. The christians sometimes supplied by their voluntary losses of life, the persons who were to settle the public service of paganism, and rushing in crowds round the tribunal of the magistrates, called upon them to pronounce and to inflict the sentence of the law. The behaviour of the christians was too remarkable to escape the notice of the ancient philosophers; but it is too astonishing, unless the less than admiration than astonishment. Incapable of conceiving the motives which sometimes transported the fortitude beyond the bounds of prudence or reason, they treated such an eagerness to die as the strange result of obstinate despair, of stupid insensibility, or of superstition. In the epistle to the Philippians, he exclaimed the proconsul to the christians of Asia: "Unhappy men! if you are thus weary of your lives, is it so difficult for you to find ropes and precipices?" He was extremely cautious (as it is observed by a learned and pious historian) of punishing men who had found no accusers but themselves, the imperial laws not having made any provision for so unexpected a case: condemning therefore a few, as a warning to their brethren, he dismissed the multitude with indignation and contempt. Notwithstanding this real or affected disdain, the intrepid constancy of the faithful was profounder, and in those minds where nature or grace had disposed for the easy reception of religious truth. On these melancholy occasions, there were many among the gentiles who pitied, who adored, and who were converted. The generous enthusiasm was communicated from the sufferer to the spectators; and the blood of martyrs, according to a well-known observation, became the seed of the church.

Gradual relaxation. But although devotion had raised, and eloquence continued to inflame, this fever of the mind, it insensibly gave way to the more natural hopes and fears of the human heart, to the love of life, the apprehension of pain, and the horror of dissolution. The more prudent rulers of the church found themselves obliged to restrain the indiscriminate ardour of their followers, and to curst a constancy which too often abandoned them in the hour of trial. As the lives of the faithful became less mortified and austere, they were even, day by day, less employed in the service of Christ, instead of distinguishing themselves by voluntary deeds of heroism, frequently deserted their post, and felt in confusion before the enemy whom it was their duty to resist. There were three methods, however, of completing the heathen system. There were those who abstained from all the public offices of the church, and tended with an equal degree of guilt: the first indeed was generally allowed to be innocent; the second was of a doubtful, or at least of a venial, nature; but the third implied a direct and criminal apostasy from the christian faith.

1. A modern inquisitor would have Three methods with surprise, that whenever an information of martyred nation was given to a Roman magistrate, tyrannum, of any person within his jurisdiction who had embraced the sect of the christians, the charge was communicated to the party accused, and that a convenient time was allowed to settle his affairs, and to prepare an answer to the crime which was imputed to him. If the entertained any doubt of his own constancy, such a delay afforded him an opportunity of preserving his life and honour by flight, of withdrawing himself into some obscure retreat or some distant province, and to have his less than the advantage of peace and security. A measure so consonant to reason was soon authorized by the advice and example of the most holy prelates; and seems to have been conduced by few, except by the Montanists, who deviated into heresy by their the strict and obstinate adherence to the rigor of ancient discipline. III. The provincial governors, whose zeal was less prevalent than their avarice, had countenanced the practice of selling certificates, (or libels as they were called,) which attested, that the persons therein mentioned had complied with the laws, and sacrificed to the Roman deities. By producing these false declarations, the epistle of Cyprian and unchristian martyrs were enabled to silence the malice of an inquirer, and to reconcile in some measure the safety with their religion. A slight penance 1 atomized 2

The eleventh chapter of the iv. book of the Hist. Ecclesiast. of Eusebius, treats principally of the martyrdom of St. Polycarp, and mentions other instances of the instance to the respect paid to death. It is that of a Pergaman named Quintus, who, frightened at the sight of the ferocious beasts and the tortures, renounced his faith. This example is quoted against the heathen in the sixteenth chapter of Eusebius furnishes much stronger proof of their courage, than of their timidity.

5 In the second apology of Justin, there is a particular and very curious instance of this legal delay. The name indulgence was granted to accused christians in the persecution of Decius: and Cy- prian (de Lapis) expressly mentions the "Dies negansius presti- tutus."

The examples which the historian has taken from Justin Martyr, and from St. Cyprian, are particular instances, and prove nothing as to the method which was generally pursued towards the accused. On the contrary, it is evident according to the same Apology of St. Justin, that the accusation was founded by any temporal motives. Demosthenes, himself a christain, being present at the unjust sentence given by the judge Urbicus against a christain, demanded of him why he had persisted in a man who was neither an adulterer nor a thief, nor guilty of any other crime than that of confessing himself to be a christian. Urbicus answered only these words, "You also—you seem to be a christian." "Yes, doubtless," replied Lucius. "The judge commands me to put you to death; but if your 1time was not sentenced to be whipped. Justin Martyr, Apol. sec. p. 90. ed. Bened. 1712.) Here then are three examples where no delay occurred—when the penalties were created—where the punishment of the orthodox was intolerable, and the Christians were regarded as the cause. The words of St. Cyprian are also very particular, and say simply that a day was fixed upon which the christians were to observe their _sabbath_; and that those who did not observe, were not condemned. [G]

G Tertullian considers flight from persecution as an imperfect, but very criminal, apostasy, as an impious attempt to elude the will of God, &c. &c. He has written a treatise on this subject (see vol. 238—341.) Edit, et si fuit, quod ratione et virtute ad finalem etiam eluculentissimam est, quod de commodo christiani, que est magnissimo et maxime innocenti, declamation. It is, however, somewhat remote and unlikely, that a man of this order should write a book dedicated to the most incoherent declamation. It is, however, somewhat remote and unlikely, that a man of this order should write a book dedicated to the for this profane dissimulation. 1 III. In every persecution there were great numbers of unholy Christians, who publicly disowned or denounced the faith which they had professed; and who confirmed the sincerity of their abjuration, by the legal acts of burning incense or of offering sacrifices. Some of these apostates had yielded on the first moment or after exhortation of the magistrate, whilst the persuasion of others could be subdued by the length and repetition of tortures. The afflicted countenances of some betrayed their inward remorse, while others advanced with confidence and alacrity to the altars of the gods. But the disgrace and infamy which attended them was not less than the present danger. As soon as the severity of the persecution was abated, the doors of the churches were assailed by the returning multitude of penitents, who detected their idolatrous submission, and who solicited with equal ardour, but with various success, their readmission into the society of Christians. 2

Alternatives of severity and toleration, established for the conviction and punishment of the Christians, the fate of those secessors, in an extensive and arbitrary government, must still, in a great measure, have depended on their own circumstances. In extremities, of whatever sort, the temper of their supreme as well as subordinate rulers. Zeal might sometimes provoke, and prudence might sometimes avert or assuage, the superstitious fury of the pagans. A variety of motives might dispose the emperors more or less rigorously to enforce or relax the execution of the laws; and of these motives the most forcible was their regard not only for the public edicts, but for the secret intentions of the emperor. A glance from whose eye was sufficient to kindle or to extinguish the flames of persecution. As often as they perceived themselves endangered by the different parts of the empire, the primitive Christians lamented and perhaps magnified their own sufferings; but the celebrated number of ten persecutions has been determined by the ecclesiastical writers of the fifth century, who possessed a more distinct view of the prosperous or dreary fortunes of the church, from the age of Nero to that of Diocletian. The ingenious parallels of the ten plagues of Egypt, and of the ten horns of the Apocalypse, first suggested this calculation to their minds; and in their at times fallacious, at other times true, but truth obstructed, they were careful to select those reigns which were indeed the most hostile to the christian cause. But these transient persecutions served only to revive the zeal, and to restore the discipline, of the faithful; and the moments of extraordinary rigour were compensated by much longer intervals of peace and security. The indolence of some princes, and the indulgence of others, permitted the Christians to enjoy, though not perhaps a legal, yet an actual and public, toleration of their religion.

The apology of Tertullian contains many very singular, but at the same time very suspicious instances of public clementy. It was published by Tiberius, and by Marcus Antoninus, and designed not only to protect the innocence of the Christians, but even to proclaim those stupendous miracles which had attested the truth of their doctrine. The first of these examples is attended with some difficulties, which seem not to have been perceived by the compilers of the edict; they required to believe, that Pontius Pilate informed the emperor of the just sentence of death which he had pronounced against an innocent; and, as it appeared, a divine person; and that, without acquiring the merit, he exposed himself to the danger, of martyrdom; that Tiberius, who avowed his contempt for all religions, immediately conceived the design of placing the Jewish Messiah among the gods of Rome: that his servile ventured to disobey the commands of his master; that Tiberius, instead of resenting their refusal, not only continued to accede to the wishes of the Christians, but enforced them. But the severity of the laws, many years before such laws were enacted, or before the church had assumed any distinct name or existence: and lastly, that the memory of this extraordinary transaction was preserved in the most public and authentic records, which escaped the annihilation of the edicts. These records were only visible to the eyes of an African Christian, who composed his Apology one hundred and sixty years after the death of Tiberius. The edict of Marcus Antoninus is supposed to have been the effect of his devotion and gratitude, for the miraculous deliverance which he had obtained in the Marcomannic war. The distress of the legions, the seasonable tempest of rain and hail, of thunder and of lightning, and the dismay and defeat of the barbarians, have been celebrated by the eloquence of several pagan writers. If there were any Christians in that army, it was natural that they should ascribe some merit to the fervent prayers which, in the moment of danger, they had offered up for their own and the public safety. But we are still assured by monuments of brass and marble, by the imperial medals, and by the Antonine column, that neither the emperor nor the legions had any signal obligation, since they unanimously attribute their deliverance to the providence of Jupiter, and to the interposition of Mercury. During the whole course of his reign, Marcus despaired the Christians as a philosopher, and punished them as a sovereign.

By a privity of the Christians in the reigns of Commodus and Severus, the empire, to which the church had been subjected under the government of a virtuous prince, immediately ceased on the accession of a tyrant, and as none except themselves had experienced the injustice of Marcus, they alone were protected by the lenity of Commodus. The celebrated Marcia, the most favoured of his concubines, and who at length contrived the murder of her imperial lover, entertained a singular affection for the oppressed church; and though it was impossible that she could reconcile herself to the presence of the priests of the gospel, she might hope to atone for the frivalities of her sex and profession, by declaring herself the patroness of the Christians. Under the gracious protection of Marcia, they passed in safety the thirteen years of a

The successive improvements which the story has acquired, and which it presents, it passed from the hands of Cyprian, Cyprian, African, Gregory of Tours, and the authors of the several editions of the edict of Pilate, are very fairly stated by Dom. A similar edict was issued at Rome, whose piety and learning was spread over the east. Origen obeying to this an invitation, and though he could not expect to succeed in the conversion of an artful and ambitious woman, she listened with pleasure to his eloquent exhortations, and honourably dismissed him as a benefactor. The tenors of Mammea were adopted by her son Alexander, and the philosophic devotion of that emperor was marked by a singular but injudicious regard for the Christian religion. Of the successors of Severus.

The laws which Severus had enacted, soon expired with the authority of that emperor; and the christians, after this accidental tempest, enjoyed a calm of thirty-eight years. Till this period they had usually held their assemblies in private houses and sequestered places. They were now permitted to erect and consecrate convenient edifices for the purposes of religious worship; to purchase lands, even at Rome itself, for the use of the community; and to conduct the elections of their ecclesiastical ministers in so public, but at the same time in so exemplary, a manner, as to deserve the respect and attention of the gentiles. This long reign of the church was accompanied with dignity. The reigns of those princes who derived their extraction from the Asiatic provinces, proved the most favourable to the christians; the eminent persons of the sect, instead of being reduced to implore the protection of a slave or confidant, were admitted into the palaces in the honourable characters of priests and philosophers; and their mysterious doctrines, which were already diffused among the people, insensibly attracted the curiosity of their sovereign. When the emperor Mammea passed through Antioch, she expressed a desire to know the conversion of that certain empress whose piety and learning was spread over the east. Origen obeying to this an invitation, and though he could not expect to succeed in the conversion of an artful and ambitious woman, she listened with pleasure to his eloquent exhortations, and honourably dismissed him as a benefactor. The tenors of Mammea were adopted by her son Alexander, and the philosophic devotion of that emperor was marked by a singular but injudicious regard for the Christian religion. 3 It is with some mistake that this massacre has been called a persecution, for it lasted during the whole reign of Maximin; as we see in Eusebius, (lib. vi. chap. 29. Hist. Eccl. c. 54.) Rubiaus expressly confirms it: Titus annis a Maximo persecutione commota in quibusdam in persecutione facta est utriusque. (lib. vii. c. 15.)

4 Dioscor. i. vi. c. 29. It may be presumed, that the success of the christians had exaggerated the importance of the pagans. — Dion Cassius, who composed his history under the former reign, had most probably intended for the use of his master those councils of persecution, which he ascribes to a better age, and to the favorite of Augustus. — His opusculum de oratione Dom. Dion, I may refer to my own unbiased opinion, (p. 24, note i.) and to the Abc de la Bibliotheque (Memoires de l’Academie, tom. xxvi. p. 260, tom. xxvii. p. 429.)

[If this was so, then Cassius would have known the christians; and even these were the object of his particular attention, since our author supposed that it was his wish that his master should profit by his consilium de persecutione. Now shall we reconcile this necessary consequence with what Gibbon has said of the ignorance of Dion Cassius respecting even the name of christians? (vol. 3. p. 173. n. 1.) The supposition made in this note is based upon no proof, and it is probable that Dion Cassius has often designated the christians merely by the term Jews. See Dion Cassius de bello civili, chap. 14. lib. liviti, chap. 1. — G.)

5 Origen, i. vi. c. 19. mentions Origen as the object of Maximin’s persecution; and in the same chapter, a Capuchin, no writer of that age, gives a just and conditioned idea of this persecution (apud Cypriani, Rom. 38.)

6 The invitation of these princes who were publicly supposed to be christians as well as of the praefectus militum, are quoted by Suidas, Alexander, (in Zeno, l. vi. c. 10.) evidently alludes to Philip and his family; and for the contemporary evidence, that such a report had prevailed; but the Egyptian Cyprian, who lived at the same time, and under the same court of Rome, expresses himself with a becoming diffidence concerning the truth of the fact. The epistles of Origen, which were... founded for a fable which was afterwards invented, that he had been purified by confession and penance from the guilt contracted in his inconstant predecessor. 5

the change of masters, a new system of government, so oppressive to the christians, that their former condition, ever since the time of Domitian, was represented as a state of perfect freedom and security, if compared with the rigorous treatment which they experienced under the short reign of Decius. 6

The virtues of that prince will scarcely allow us to suspect that he was actuated by a mean resentment against the favourites of his predecessor; and it is more reasonable to believe, in the spirit of his general design to restore the purity of Roman manners, he was desirous of delivering the empire from what he condemned as a recent and criminal superstition. The bishops of the most considerable cities were removed by exile or death; the vigilance of the magistrates prevented the clergy of Rome during six months from proceeding to a new election; and it was the opinion of the christians, that the emperor would more patiently endure a competitor for the purple, than a bishop in the capital. 8 Were it possible to suppose that the penetration of Decius had discovered the true state of the human heart, or that he could foresee the temporal dominion which might insensibly arise from the chains of spiritual authority, we might be less surprised, that he should consider the successors of St. Peter as the most formidable rivals to those of Augustus.

The administration of Valerian was distinguished by a levity and inconstancy, ill suited to the gravity of the Roman empire. In the first part of his reign, he surpassed in eminency those princes who had been suspected of an attachment to the christian faith. In the second half, listening to the institutions of a minister addicted to the superstitions of Egypt, he adopted the maxims, and imitated the severity, of his predecessor Decius. 3

The accession of Gallicius, which increased the calamities of the empire, succeeded peace to the church; and the christians obtained the free exercise of their religion, by an edict addressed to the bishops, and conceived in such terms as seemed to acknowledge their office and public character. 4 The ancient laws, without being formally repealed, were suffered to sink into oblivion; and (excepting the instances in which the emperor Aurelian) 5 the disciples of Christ passed about forty years in a state of prosperity, far more honorable to their virtue than the most severe trials of persecution.

Their language is in general so similar, that we are at a loss to determine which of them, if Aurelian had carried his intentions before he was assassinated,— Most of his contemporaries (Diodore, Deestrius, Cyprian, &c.) have seized the occasion of gaining a few extraordinary martyrs.

Dr. Lardner has stated with his usual impartiality, all which has been said in favor of and against the persecution of Aurelian, and finallly saying, 'After having examined with the care of Eusebius, and of those who have written on the subject, I must say I believe very judiciously, decided that Aurelian did not confine himself to the intention of persecuting the christians, but that that persecution was rest. It was of short duration, because the emperor concluded his career in the usual way, by being either drowned or burnt in the sea. The story of Paul of Samosata, who filled the metropolis see of Antioch, and whose death, while the barbarous proceedings of Decius in Nuthius and Zenobia, may serve to illustrate the condition and character of the times. The wealth of that prelate was a sufficient evidence of his guilt, since it was neither derived from the inheritance of his fathers, nor acquired by the arts of honest industry. But Paul was considered as the great representative of the deistic profession. 1 His ecclesiastical jurisdiction was vernal and rapacious; he extorted frequent contributions from the most opulent of the faithful, and converted to his own use a considerable part of the public revenue. By his pride and luxury, the christian religion was rendered odious in the eyes of the gentiles. His council chamber and his throne, the splendor with which he appeared in public, the suppliant crowd who solicited his attention, the multitude of letters and petitions to which he dictated his answers, and the perpetual hurry of persecution, remained an effort of courage might perhaps make more suitable to the state of a civil magistrate, 2 than to the humility of a primitive bishop. When he harangued his people from the pulpit, Paul affected the figurative style and the theatrical gestures of an Asiatic sophist, while the cathedral resounded with the cymbals and the trum- pet, accompanied by the praise of his divine eloquence. Against those who resisted his power, or refused to flatter his vanity, the prelate of Antioch was arrogant, rigid, and inexorable; but he relaxed the discipline, and lavished the treasures of the church on his dependent clergy; who were considered as the tools, which were necessary to make their masters illustrious. For Paul indulged himself very freely in the pleasures of the table, and he had received into the episcopal palace two young and beautiful women, as the constant companions of his leisure moments.

Notwithstanding these scandalous vices, if Paul of Samosata had preserved the purity of the orthodox faith, his reign over the capital of Syria would have ended only with his life; and had a reasonable setting off of the worship of the one true God, as the source of every sensual appetite. For Paul indulged himself very freely in the pleasures of the table, and he had received into the episcopal palace two young and beautiful women, as the constant companions of his leisure moments.

He is degraded from the see of Antioch, A.D. 320.

3. If we are desirous of extenuating the vices of Paul, we must respect the circumstances, which are in several cases attractive, and, indeed, de-licious calamities in civilized epistles addressed to all the churches of the empire. (Ap. Euseb., l. vii. c. 36.)

1 [Has his history in his letters and private practice of Paul of Samosata, had great influence in preparing the condemnation which the bishops pronounced against him. The letter which the Synod addressed to the bishops of Rome and of Alexandria was designed, says Eusebius, to inform them of Paul's change of faith, and of the disgraceful conduct of his supporters, in such a way as his money, and his whole conduct. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. 20.] fused, treaties were concluded and violated, and at length Paul of Samosata was degraded from his episcopal character, by the sentence of seventy or eighty bishops. One of the most important orations of Eusebius, and who, without consulting the rights of the clergy or people, appointed a successor by their own authority. The manifest irregularity of this proceeding increased the numbers of the discontented faction; and as Paul, who was no stranger to the arts of courts, had submitted himself to the favour of Zenobia, he maintained above four years the possession of the episcopal house and office. The victory of Aurelian changed the face of the east, and the two contending parties who applied to each other the epithets of schism and heresy, were either commanded or permitted to plead their cause before the face of the conqueror. This public and very singular trial affords a convincing proof, that the existence, the property, the privileges, and the internal policy, of the Christians, were acknowledged, if not by the laws, at least by the magistrates of the empire. As a pagan and as a soldier, it could scarcely be expected that Aurelian should enter into the discussion, whether the sentiments of Paul or those of his adversaries were most agreeable to the true standard of the orthodox faith. His determination, however, executed by Auto acknowledge the truth of those miracles which were claimed by their adversaries; and while they were contented with ascribing them to the arts of magie, and to the power of demons, they mutually concurred in restoring and establishing the reign of superstition. Philosophy, but most dangerous enemy, was now converted to help treat the decay of the pagge, the gardens of Epicurus, and even the portico of the stoes, were almost deserted, as so many different schools of scepticism or implyty: and many among the Romans were desirous that the writings of Cicero should be condemned and suppressed by the authority of the State. Conceiving of the great advantage which could be had from this, Lactantius judged it prudent to connect themselves with the priests, whom they perhaps despised, against the Christians, whom they had reason to fear. These fashionable philosophers prosecuted the design of extracting allegorical wisdom from the fictions of the old and converting them to ill purposes; and especially, for the use of their chosen disciples; recommended the worship of the ancient gods as the emblems or ministers of the Supreme Deity, and composed against the faith of the gospel many elaborate treatises, which have since been committed to the flames by the prudence of primitive Christians.

Maximian and Galerius punish the humanity of Constantine

Although the policy of Diocletian and Galerius had inclined them to preserve inviolate the maxims of toleration, it was soon discovered that their two associates, Maximian and Galerius, entertained the mortal hatred of the name and religion of the Christians. The minds of those princes had never been enlightened by science; education had never softened their temper. They owed their greatness to their swords, and in their most elevated fortunes they cherished their superstitious prejudices of soldiers and of peasants. In the several administrations of the provinces they obeyed the laws which their benefactor had established; but they frequently found occasions of exercising within their camp and palaces a secret persecution, for which the impudent local faction of the Christians sometimes offered the most specious pretences. A sentence of death was executed upon Maximilianus, an African youth, who had been produced by his own father before the magistrates as a sufficient and legal recruit, but who obstinately per performed at the shrine of Pyrrothos, and the falsities relased of Apollonius of Tyana, were frequently opposed to the miracles of Chrles with Dr. Lardner's refutation of the miraculous tales, vol. iii. p. 523, 332), that when Polliusestus composed the life of Apollonius, he had no such intentions.

Julius (p. 501, ed. Spanheim) expresses a pious joy, that the providence of the gods had extinguished the impious sects, and for the most part destroyed the books of the Pyrrothos and Eudemus, which had been very numerous, since Eumates himself composed no less that 700 volumes. See Dionysius Laertius, l. ii. c. 25.

Lactantius (Divin. Institution, l. i. c. 2, 3) gives a very clear and spirited account of two of these philosophic adversaries of the faith, the one called Eudemus, of whom there are conserved of thirty books, and was composed in Sicily about the year 726.

[G] (The conjecture related at length presents the young as in a way sisted in declaring, that his conscience would not permit him to embrace the profession of a soldier. It could scarcely be expected that any government should suffer the action of Marcellus the centurion to pass with impunity. On the day of a public festival, that officer threw away his belt, and declaring himself a Christian, exclaimed with a loud voice, that he would obey none but Jesus Christ the eternal King, and that he denounced for ever the use of carnal weapons, and the service of an idolatrous master. The soldiers, as soon as they recovered from their astonishment, secured the person of the centurion, and delivered him to the city of Tingi, by the president of that part of Mauritania; and as he was convicted by his own confession, he was condemned and beheaded for the crime of desertion. Examples of such a nature savour much less of religious persecution than of martial or even private law; but they served to model the dispositions of the emperors, to justify the severity of Galerius, who dismissed a great number of christian officers from their employments; and to authorize the opinion, that a sect of enthusiasts, which avowed principles so repugnant to the public safety, must either remain useless, or would soon become dangerous, supported the empire. After the success of the Persian war Galerius prevailed the hopes and the reputation of Diocletian to Galerius, he passed a winter with the general policy of Diocletian in the palace of Nicomedia; and the fate of Christianity became the object of their serious contemplation. The experienced emperor was still inclined to pursue measures of lenity; and though he readily consented to exclude the christians from holding any employments in the household of the army, he urged in the strongest terms the danger as well as the impropriety of retaining them. The emperors, however, were obvious fanatics. Galerius at length extorted from him the permission of summoning a council, composed of a few persons the most distinguished in the civil and military departments of the state. The important question was agitated in their presence, and those ambitious counsellors easily discerned, that it was incumbent on them to second, by their eloquence, the important violence of the Caesar. It may be presumed, that they insisted on every topic which might differen light. Maximilianus was the son of Victor, a christian soldier of Sirmium. His father did not prevent, but according to the custom of having all the qualities required by law for the profession of arms. The men of soldiers were obliged to serve at the age of twenty one, and Maximilianus, who appears to have been of the number of the reserved, refused to serve, on account of pagan ceremonies, in which he could not naturally partake. He was consequently dismissed from the profession of a soldier. The magistrate wished the father to persuade him to repudiate the error of his youth and to embrace the most excellent faith. He says, 'I know what he ought to do.' (Halicarnassus, 11. xvi. 3, ed. at 11.

The evidence of the most insignificant persons, the most obscure soldiers, and the least Christian, that he is forced to sacrifice to gods and to emperors, I renounce the vine and the cup, the bread and the chalice. He is the only instance of a veritable and explicit testimony to return home thanking heaven it had given him such a son."

See the Acts Sinica, p. 559. The account of his martyrdom, and that of Marcellus, bear every mark of truth and authenticity.

Marcellus was in the same situation as Maximilianus. Upon the days of public feasts the bystanders sacrificed to the gods. Marcellus refused to do so, saying, 'If such is the lot of the soldier, he is forced to sacrifice to gods and to emperors, I renounce the vine and the cup, the bread and the chalice. Arcaeuus another, in his place to serve.' (Act. san. of Eutymius, ed. 11. xx.) It is evident that the necessity of sacrificing to false gods alone, drove Maximilianus from the military service. He is the only instance of a veritable and explicit testimony to return home thanking heaven it had given him such a son."

The Vlct. Galerii (or whoever was the author of this little treatise) was at that time an inhabitant of Nicomedia; but it seems dubious whether he could have consisted of thirty eighty books, and was composed in Sicily about the year 726.

The conjecture related at length presents the young as in a way interest the pride, the piety, or the fears, of their sovereign in the destruction of Christianity. Perhaps they represented, that, though the destruction of the empire was left imperfect, as long as an independent people was permitted to subsist and multiply in the heart of the provinces. The Christians, (it might speciously be alleged), renouncing the gods and the institutions of Rome, had constituted a distinct republic, that yet be suppressed before it had acquired any military force; but which was already governed by its own laws and magistrates, was possessed of a public treasure, and was intimately connected in all its parts, by the frequent assemblies of the bishops, to whose deities numerous and popular sacrifices, dedicated the fruitful earth. Arguments like these may seem to have determined the reluctant mind of Diocletian to embrace a new system of persecution; but though we may suspect, it is not in our power to relate, the secret intrigues of the palace, the private views and ressentments, the grandeur of women or cumulums, and all those trilling but decisive causes which so often influence the fate of empires, and the councils of the wisest monarchs. His edict was scarcely exhibited to the public view, in the most conspicuous place of Nicomedia, before it was torn down by the hands of a christian, who, expressed, at the same time, his horror of the edict, and his contempt as well as abhorrence for such impious and tyrannical governors. His offence, according to the mildest laws, amounted to treason, and deserved death. And if it be true that he was a person of rank and education, those circumstances could serve only to aggravate his guilt. He was burnt, or rather roasted, by a slow fire; and his executioners, zealous to revenge the personal insult which had been offered to the emperors, exhausted every refinement of cruelty, without being able to subdue his patience, or to alter the steady and insulting smile which in his dying agonies he still preserved in his countenance. The Christians, though they confessed that his conduct had not been strictly conformable to the laws of prudence, admired the divine ferocity of his zeal; and the excessive commendations which they lavished on the memory of his hero and martyr, contributed to fix deep impression of terror and hatred in the mind of Diocletian.

The Christians, though they confessed that his conduct had not been strictly conformable to the laws of prudence, admired the divine ferocity of his zeal; and the excessive commendations which they lavished on the memory of his hero and martyr, contributed to fix deep impression of terror and hatred in the mind of Diocletian.
His fears were soon alarmed by the view of a danger from which he very narrowly escaped. Within fifteen days the palace of Nicomedia, and even the bedchamber of Diocletian, were twice in flames; and though both times they were extinguished without any material damage, the singularity of the event was justly considered as an evident proof that it had not been the effect of chance or negligence. The suspicion naturally fell upon the Christians; and it was suggested, with some degree of probability, that those desperate fanatics, provoked by their present sufferings, and the evidence of impending calamities, might have entered into a conspiracy with their faithful brethren, the eunuchs of the palace, against the lives of two emperors, whom they detested as the irreconcilable enemies of the church of God. Jealousy and resentment prevailed in every breast, and especially in that of Diocletian. A great number of persons, distinguished either by the offices which they had filled, or by the favour which they had enjoyed, were thrown into prison. Every mode of torture was put in practice, and the court, as well as city, was polluted with many bloody executions. But it was found impossible to extort any discovery of this mysterious transaction, it seems incumbent on us either to presume the innocence, or to admire the resolution, of the sufferers. A few days afterwards Galerius hastily withdrew himself from Nicomedia, declaring, that if he delayed his departure fifty years hence he would have shared the fate of the Christians. The one ascribes it to lightning, and the divine wrath; the other affirms, that it was kindled by the malice of Galerius himself.

Execution of the Edict. As the edict against the Christians was the first edict designed for a general law of the whole empire, and as Diocletian was by no means a bigot, though they might not wait for the consent, were assured of the concurrence, of the western princes, it would appear more consonant to our ideas of policy, that the governors of all the provinces should have received secret instructions in the same manner; but on one condition, that on the day, this declaration of war within their respective departments. It was at least to be expected, that the convenience of the public highways and established posts would have enabled the emperors to transmit their orders with the utmost dispatch from the palace of Nicomedia to the extremities of the Roman world; and that they would not have suffered fifty days to elapse, before the edict was published in Syria, and near four months before it was signified to the cities of Africa. This delay may perhaps be imputed to the cautious temper of Diocletian, who had yielded a reluctant consent to the measures of persecution, and who was desirous of trying the experiment under his own immediate eye, before he gave way to the disorders and discontent which it must inevitably occasion in the distant provinces. At first, indeed, the magistrates were restrained from the effusion of blood; but the use of every other severity was permitted, and even recommended, to their zeal; nor could the Christians, though they cheerfully resigned the ornaments of their churches, resolve to interrupt their religious assemblies, or to deliver their sacred treasures to the ravage of the sword. Felix, an African bishop, appears to have embarrassed the subordinate ministers of the government. The curator of his city sent him in chains to the proconsul. The proconsul transmitted him to the pretorian prefect of Italy; and Felix, who disdained even to give the least token of submission to the man of whose generation and age he had been the pupil, and whose authority the Christians had long venerated, in Lucania, a place on which the birth of Horace has conferred fame. This precedent, and perhaps some imperial rescript, which was issued in consequence of it, appeared to authorize the governors of provinces, in punishing with death the refusal of the Christians to deliver up their sacred books. There were undoubtedly many persons who embraced this opportunity of obtaining the crown of martyrdom; but there were likewise too many who purchased an ignominious life, by discovering and betraying the holy scripture into the hands of the persecutors. A great number of bishops and presbyters, acquired by this criminal compliance, the opprobrious epitaph of Traditors; and their offence was productive of much present scandal, and of much future discord, in the African church.

The copies, as well as the versions. Demolition of the scriptorium. As a sanctum sanctorum it remains in the empire, that the most severe inquisition could no longer be attended with any fatal consequences; and even the sacrifice of those volumes, which, in every congregation, were preserved for public use, required the consent of some treacherous and unworthy ecclesiastics. Some small box was constructed in the church, to which the books of the sacred oracles were immersed by the authority of the government, and by the labour of the pagans. In some provinces, however, the magistrates contented themselves with shutting up the places of religious worship. In others, they more literally complied with the terms of the edict; and after taking away the doors, the benches, and the pulpit, which they burnt, as it were in a funeral pile, they completely demolished the remainder of the edifice. It is perhaps to this melancholy occasion, that we should apply a very remarkable story, which is relevant to the subject, and may almost seem an improbability, that it serves rather to excite than to satisfy our curiosity. In a small town in Phrygia, of whose name as well as situation we are left ignorant, it should seem that the magistrates and the body of the people had embraced the christian faith; and as some religious building might be apprehended to be exempted from the edict of the governor of the province was supported by a numerous detachment of legionaries. On their approach the citizens threw themselves into the church, with the resolution either of defending by arms that sacred edifice, or of perishing in its ruins. They indignantly rejected the notice and permission which was given to them to retire, till the soldiers, provoked by their obstinate refusal, set fire to the building on all sides, and consumed, by this extraordinary kind of martyrdom, a great number of Phrygians, with their wives and children.

3 See Lactantius, Ephrem, and Constantine, ad Caedum Sacerdi, where the same subject is treated.

[Since the history of these times affords no example of any attempt on the part of the Christians against the persecutors, we have no reason except probability for attributing to them the burning of the public buildings. Lactantius, and the Constantine to the contrary, remain silent about it. The little evidence of the epistle of Junius, which has been cited in the previous pages, tends rather to prove that in the destruction of churches. They made a special inventory of the plate, &c. which they found in them. That of the church of Rome was very precious, on account of the fine goldsmiths of the city, besides a large quantity of brass utensils, and wearing apparel.]

Subsequent edicts. Some slight disturbances, though they were suppressed almost as soon as exacted, in Syria and the frontiers of Armenia, afforded the enemies of the church a very plausible occasion to instigate hideous outrages, by the intrigues of the bishops, who had already forgotten their ostentatious professions of passive and unlimited obedience.¹ The resentment, or the, fears, of Diocletian, at length transported him beyond the bounds of moderation, which he had hitherto preserved. He declared, in a series of cruel edicts, his intention of abolishing the christian name. By the first of these edicts, the governors of the provinces were directed to apprehend all persons of the ecclesi-asical order; and the prisons, destined for the vilest criminals, were soon filled with a multitude of bishops, prelates, doctors, readers, and exorcists. By a second edict, the magistrates were commanded to employ every method of severity which might reclaim them from their odious superstition, and oblige them to return to the established worship of the gods. This rigorous order was extended, by a subsequent edict, to the inhabitants of cities, and a third edict, to private persons, provided with the means of a violent and general persecution.⁵ Instead of those salutary restraints, which had required the direct and solemn testimony of an accuser, it became the duty as well as the interest of the imperial officers, to discover, to pursue, and to torment, the most obnoxious among the adherents of the new faith. However, great numbers all who should presume to save a proscribed sectary from the just indignation of the gods, and of the em-perors. Yet, notwithstanding the severity of this law, the virtuous courage of many of the pagans, in concealing their friends or relations, affords an honourable proof of the great influence with which the common minds the sentiments of nature and humanity.⁴ General idea of Diocletian had no sooner published his the persecution edicts against the christians, than, as it he had been desirous of committing to other hands the work of persecution, he divested himself of the empirical purple. The character and situation of his colleagues and successors sometimes urged them to enforce, and sometimes inclined them to suspend, the execution of these rigorous laws; nor can we acquire a just and distinct idea of this important period of ecclesiology till we have considered the present state of christianity, in the different parts of the empire, during the space of ten years, which elapsed between the first edicts of Diocletian, and the final peace of the church.

that the relentless temper of those independent barbarians may have conquered his misfortune.

(He had already departed from it in his former edict. It does not appear whether this edict or fear had any part in instigating these new persecutions; perhaps superstition, or a seeming respect for his ministers, was the cause of it. The oracle of Apollo, when consulted by Diocletian returned no answer, and said that just men prevented it from speaking. Constantin, who assisted at the ceremony, informed the emperors, that he was convinced these

The revolt of Maxentius immediately restored peace to the churches of Italy and Africa; and the same tyrant who oppressed every other class of his subjects, showed himself just, humane, and even partial, towards the afflicted christians. 2 He depended on their gratitude and affection, and very naturally presumed, that the injuries which they had suffered from his predecessors, the effects of which were apprehended from his most invertebrate enemy, would secure the fidelity of a party already considerable by their numbers and opulence. 3 Even the conduct of Maxentius towards the bishops of Rome and Carthage, may be considered as a proof, since it is probable that the most orthodox princes would adopt the same measures with regard to their established clergy. Marcellus, the former of those prelates, had thrown the capital into confusion, by the severe penalty which he imposed on a great number of christians, who, during the late persecution, had renounced the faith, or dispersed their religion. The rage of faction broke out in frequent and violent seditions; the blood of the faithful was shed by each other's hands, and the exile of Marcellus, whose prudence seems to have been less cruel, and who, far from being exclusively minded, sure capable of restoring peace to the distressed church of Rome. 4 The behaviour of Mensurius, bishop of Carthage, appears to have been still more reprehensible. A deacon of that city had published a libel against the emperor. The offender took refuge in the episcopal palace; and though it was early to advance any claims of ecclesiastical immunities, the bishop refused to deliver him up to the officers of justice. For this treasonable resistance, Mensurius was summoned to court, and instead of receiving a legal sentence of death, or banishment, he was permitted, after much equivocation, to return to his diocese. Such was the happy condition of the christian subjects of Maxentius, that whenever they were desirous of procuring for their own use any bodies of martyrs, they tians who had denounced the religion and ceremonies instituted by their fathers; and presumptuously despoising the practice of antiquity, had invented extravagant laws and opinions according to the dictates of their fancy, and had collected a various society from the different provinces of our empire. The edicts which were pronounced or published during the time of Galerius, having exposed many of the Christians to danger and distress, many having suffered death, and many more, who still persist in their impious folly, being left desitute of any public exercise of religion, we are disposed to extend to those unhappy men, the effects of our former edicts: six months, however, is the period of time fixed by the precept, their situation, perhaps, may be admitted as a pledge of his sincerity.

When Galerius subscribed this edict of toleration, he was well assured that Licinius would readily comply with the inclinations of the people in that province; and were it the will of the senate and people of Asia, the favor of the christians would obtain the approbation of Constantine. But the emperor would not venture to insert in the preamble the name of Maximin, whose consent was of the greatest importance, and who succeeded a few days afterwards to the provinces of Asia. The empire, in the meantime, reposed on the merit of his former reign. Maximin affected to adopt the prudent counsels of his predecessor; and though he never condescended to secure the tranquillity of the church by a public edict, Sabinus, his pretorian prefect, addressed a circular letter to all the governors and magistrates of the provinces, exhorting on the imperial character, acknowledging the invincible obstinacy of the christians, and directing the officers of justice to cease their ineffectual prosecutions, and to connive at the secret assemblies of those enthusiasts. In consequence of these orders, great numbers of christians were released from dungeons, or delivered from the mines. The confessors, singing hymns of triumph, returned into their own countries; and those who had yielded to the violence of the tempest, solicited with tears of repentance their re-admission into the bosom of the church. But this treacherous calm was of short duration; nor could the christians of the last place any confidence in the character of their sovereign. Cruelty and superstition were the ruling passions of the soul of Maximin. The former suggested the means, the latter pointed out the objects, of persecution. The emperor was devoted to the worship of the gods, and the impiety of the hour. The people of Babylon, among his favorites, were especially averse to the destruction of the temples, which had been transformed into churches, and into houses of worship dedicated to the deities of the Christians. The buildings were repaired and beautified by the order of Maximin; and the officiating priests of the various deities were subjected to the authority of a superior pontiff destined to oppose the bishop, and to promote the cause of paganism. These pontiffs acknowledged, in their turn, the supreme jurisdiction of the metropolitan of Constantinople, who acted as the immediate viceroy of the emperor himself. A white robe was the ensign of their dignity; and these new pontiffs were carefully selected from the most noble and opulent families. By the influence of the magistrates, and of the sacerdotal order, a great number of ardent and devout christians, who possessed the exercise of their religion, were ordered to leave the cities of Niceomedia, Antioch, and Tyre, which artfully represented the well-known intentions of the court as the general sense of the people; solicited the emperor to consult the laws of justice rather than the dictates of his clemency; expressed their abhorrence of the Christians, and humbly prayed that those impious sectaries might at least be excluded from the limits of their respective territories. The answer of Maximin to the address which he obtained from the citizens of Tyre is still extant. He praises their zeal and devotion in terms of the highest satisfaction, descants on the liberality of the populace, and(by the readiness with which he consents to their banishment, that he considered himself as receiving, rather than as conferring, an obligation. The priests as well as the magistrates were empowered to enforce the execution of his edicts, which were engraved on tablets of brass, and erected in the most conspicuous parts of the cities, in order to avoid the effusion of blood, the most cruel and ignominious punishments were inflicted on the refractory christians.

The Asiatic christians had every end of the perishing to dread from the severity of a successor to a pontiff who had imposed his measures of violence with such deliberate policy. But a few months had scarcely elapsed, before the edicts published by the two western emperors obliged Maximin to suspend the prosecution of his designs; the civil war which he so rashly undertook against Licinius employed all his attention; and the defeat and death of Maximin soon delivered the church from the last and most implacable of her enemies.

In this general view of the persecutions, it is easy to conceive that the history of Eusebius, from the declarations of Lacontius, and from the most ancient acts, to collect a long series of horrid and disgusting pictures, and to fill many pages with racks and scourges, with iron hooks and red-hot beds, and with all the variety of tortures which fire and steel, savage beasts and more savage executioners, could inflict on the human body. These melancholy scenes might be enlivened by a crowd of visions and miracles destined either to delay the death, to celebrate the triumph, or to console the devout and emaciated saints who suffered for the name of Christ.

1 See Eusebius, l. viii. c. 14. 1. c. 2-8. Lacontius de M. p. c. 56. These writers agree in the representations of the acts of Maximin; but yet the former relates the destruction of several churches, which were expressly aimed at, occasional devotions, the murder of the bishops, and confessions of the martyrs.

2 Eusebius (l. viii. c. 17.) has given us a Greek version, and Lacontius (de M. p. c. 84.) the Latin original, of this memorable edict. This order of toleration was immediately executed wherever the authors whatever they have just affirmed of the remorse and repentance of Galerius.

3 Euseb. l. iv. c. 6. It inserted the epitaph of the perfect.
But I cannot determine what I ought to transcribe, till I am satisfied how much I ought to believe. The gravest of the ecclesiastical historians, Eusebius himself, indirectly confesses, that he has related whatever might redound to the glory, and that he has suppressed all the distinct narratives, and the discussions of private persons. Such an acknowledgment will naturally excite a suspicion that a writer who has so openly violated one of the fundamental laws of history, has not paid a very strict regard to the observance of the other; and the suspicion will derive additional credit from the character of the man, and from the almost incredible frequency, and more practised in the arts of courts, than that of almost any of his contemporaries. On some particular occasions, when the magistrates were exasperated by some personal motives of interest or resentment, when the zeal of the martyrs urged them to forget the rules of prudence, and perhaps of decency, to overturn the altars, to pour out imprecations against the emperors, or to strike the judge as he sat on his tribunal, it may be presumed, that every mode of torture which cruelty could invent or constancy could endure, was exhausted against them; and two circumstances, however, have been universally mentioned, which insinuate that the general treatment of the christians, who had been apprehended by the power of justice, was less intolerable than it is usually imagined to have been. 1. The confessors who were convicted of the minor crimes, were permitted, in the humanity or the negligence of their keepers, to build chapels, and freely to profess their religion in the midst of those dreary habitations. 2. The bishops were obliged to check and to censure the forward zeal of the christians, who voluntarily threw themselves into the hands of the magistrates. Some of these persons oppressed by poverty and debts, either by suicide, or by being bribed into the profession of the devil, may perhaps be suspected of some degree of guilt. Others were allure by the hope that a short confinement would expiate the sins of a whole life; and others again were actuated by the less honourable motive of deriving a plentiful subsistence, and perhaps a considerable profit, from the alarms which this religious conviction inspired to the Luxury of the rich and powerful. After the church had triumphed over all her enemies, the interest as well as vanity of the captives prompted them to magnify the merit of their respective sufferings. A convenient distance of time or place gave an ample scope to the progress of fiction; without condemning which might be alluded to the holy martyrs, whose wounds had been instantly healed, whose strength had been renewed, and whose lost members had miraculously been restored, were extremely convenient for the purpose of removing every difficulty from the way of the incredulous, and at the same time of spreading extravagant legends, as they conducted to the honour of the church, were applauded by the credulous multitude, countenanced by the power of the clergy, and attested by the suspicious evidence of ecclesiastical history.

The vague descriptions of exile and imprisonment, of pain and torture, are so easily exaggerated or softened by the pencil of an artful orator, that we are naturally induced to inquire into a fact of a more distinct and stubborn kind; the number of persons who suffered death in consequence of the edict of Julian, the persecutions of Diocletian, the elevation, and his successors. The recent legends record whole armies and cities, which were at once swept away by the undistinguishing rage of persecution. The more ancient writers content themselves with pouring out a liberal effusion of loose and tragi-cal inferences, without considering how considerable a number of these number of those persons who were permitted to seal with their blood their belief of the gospel. From the history of Eusebius, it may however be collected, that only nine bishops were punished with death; and we are enabled by his particular enumeration of the martyrs of Palestine, to say, that two christians were entitled to that honourable ap enced by violence the empire which she had acquired by fraud: a system of peace and benevolence was soon disgraced by proscriptions, wars, massacres, and the institution of the holy office. And as the reformers were animated by the love of civil as well as of religious freedom, the catholic princes connected their own interest with that of the clergy, and enforced by fire and sword the necessity of their spirit. The empire of the Netherlands alone, more than one hundred thousand of the subjects of Charles the Fifth are said to have suffered by the hand of the executioner; and this extraordinary number is attested by Grotius, a man of genius and learning, who preserved his moderation amidst the fury of contending sects, and who composed the annals of his own age and country, at a time when the invention of printing had facilitated the means of intelligence, and increased the danger of detection. If we are obliged to submit our belief to the authority of Grotius, it must be allowed, that the number of protestants, who were executed in a single province and a single reign, far exceeded that of the primitive martyrs in the space of three centuries, and of the Roman empire. But if the improbability of the fact itself should prevail over the weight of evidence; if Grotius should be convicted of exaggerating the merit and sufferings of the reformers: we shall be naturally led to inquire what confidence can be placed in the doubtful and imperfect monuments of ancient credulity; what degree of credit can be assigned to a courtly bishop, and a passionate declaimer, who, under the protection of Constantine, enjoyed the exclusive privilege of recording the persecutions inflicted on the christians by the vanquished rivals or disregarded predecessors of their gracious sovereign.

CHAPTER XVII.

Foundation of Constantinople.—Political system of Con-tinence, and his successors.—Military discipline.—
The palace.—The finances.

The unfortunate Licinius was the last rival who opposed the greatness, and the last captor who adorned the triumph of Constantine. After a tranquil and prosperous reign, the conqueror bequeathed to his family the inheritance of the Roman empire; a new capital, a new policy, and a new religion; and the innovations which he established have been embraced and felt by all the succeeding generations. The age of the great Constantine and his successors was filled with important events; but the historian must be oppressed by their number and variety, unless he di-gently separates from each other the scenes which are connected only by the order of time. He will describe the political institutions that gave strength and stability to the empire, before he proceeds to relate the wars and revolutions which hastened its decay. He will adopt the division unknown to the ancients of civil and ecclesiastical affairs: the victory of the christians, and their intestine discord, will supply copious and distinct material for the historian's pencil.

After the defeat and abdication of Li-cinius, his victorious rival proceeded to lay the foundations of a city destined to A. D. 324.

in reign future times, the mistress of the east, and to survive the empire and religion of Constantine. The motives, whether of policy or policy which first induced Diocletian to withdraw himself from the ancient seat of government, had acquired additional weight by the example of his successors, and the habits of forty years. Rome was insensibly confound-

13 Ebanis de Marty. Palest. c. 13. He closes his narrative by assuring us, that these were the martyrdoms inflicted in Palestine, in the wake of the persecution. The 6th chapter of his eighth book, which relates to the province of Thesalia in Egypt, may seem to contradict our moderate computation; but it will only lead us to the conclusion, that the management of the historical business by the synods of the period, bears a scene of the most exquisite cruelty the most remote and sequestered counties of the Roman empire, to which returns, be it observed, to one hundred persons had frequently suffered martyrdoms in the same year. But when he proceeds to mention his own journey into Egypt, he omits a great有许多 martyrs who suffered under the edificators of the eucharistical rite. Instead of a large but definite number, he speaks of many christians; (Conc. Ephes. 463.) and he states two ambiguous numbers (τρισήκοντα και ἡμισήκοντα), which may signify either what he had seen or what he had heard: either the execution, or the execution of the punishment. [The reader will take the translation of the original, will see that if the word υπάρχαν has here been taken for the expression of the existence of the passions, there can be no necessity that they must become absolute. —G.] Having thus provided a secure evasion, he proceeds to give us the impression which he received from his travels, rationally conceiving that their piety would induce them to prefer the most favourable sense. There was, perhaps, some mistake in the remark of Theodoretus, that all, who at Constantinople, had been conversant with the Egyptians, delighted in an obscure and intricate style. (See Chapter VIII. note c.) 14 Why Palestine was divided into three, the prefecture of the East contained forty-eight provinces. As the nearest disgracers of the empire were abolished, the boundaries of the provinces corresponding to a general proportion of their extent and opu-

ed with the dependent kingdoms which had once acknowledged her supremacy; and the country of the Cæsars was viewed with cold indifference by a mortal prince, born in the neighbourhood of the Danu-obe, educated in the courts and armies of Asia, and inspired by the genius of Britain. The Italians, who had received Constantine as their deliverer, submissively obeyed the edicts which he sometimes condescended to address to the senate and people of Rome; but they were seldom honoured with the presence of their new sovereign. During the first years of his age, Constantine devoted himself to the various exigencies of peace and war, moved with slow dignity, or with active diligence, along the frontiers of his extensive dominions; and was always prepared to take the field either against a foreign or a domestic enemy. But as he gradually reached the summit of prosperity and the decline of life, he began to meditate the design of fixing in a more permanent station the strength as well as majesty of the throne. In the choice of an advantageous situation, he preferred the confines of Europe and Asia; to curb, with a powerful arm, the barbarians who dwelt between the Danu-robe and the Rhine, to watch with a vigilant eye the conduct of the Persian monarch, who indignantly supported the yoke of an ignominious treaty. With these views, Diocletian had selected and embellished the residence of Nicaeoda; but the memory of Dio-cesis, which was afterwards abhorred by the protector of the church; and Constantine's ambition was to found on the spot a city which might perpetuate the glory of his own name. During the late operations of the war against Licinius, he had sufficient opportunity to contemplate both as a soldier and as a statesman, the incommodetious position of Byzantium; and to observe how strongly it was guarded by nature against an hostile attack, whilst it was accessible on every side to the benefits of commercial intercourse. Many ages before Constantine, one of the most judicious historians of antiquity had described the advantages of a situation, from whence a feeble colony of Greeks derived the command of the sea, and the honours of a flourishing and independent republic.

If we survey Byzantium in the contemporary state, we find that with no slight advantage, the city has preserved, if we are to believe writers of the fifth century, the figure of the imperial city may be represented under that of an unequal triangle. The obtuse point, which advances towards the east and the shores of Asia, meets and repels the waves of the Thracian Bosphorus. The northern side of the city is bordered by the barbary; and the southern is washed by the Propontis, or sea of Marmara. The basis of the triangle is opposed to the west, and terminates the continent of Europe. But the admirable form and division of the circumjacent land and water cannot, without a more ample explanation, be clearly or sufficiently understood.

The Bosphorus, the waters of the Euxine flow with a rapid and incessant course towards the Mediterranean, received the appellation of Byzantium, a name which we may assume to be derived from the history, than in the fables, of antiquity. A crowd of temporary or votive tars profusely scattered along its steep and woody banks, attested the unskilfulness, the terrors, and the devotion of the Grecian navigators, who, after the example of the Argonauts, explored the dangers of the inhospitable Euxine. On these banks tradition long preserved the memory of the palace of Phineus, impregnated by the story of the famous and revolting reign of Amycus, who defied the son of Leu to the combat of the cestus. The straits of the Bosphorus are terminated by the Cyanean rocks, which, according to the description of the poets, had once floated on the face of the waters; and were destined by the gods for the watchful eye of profane curiosity. From the Cyanean rocks to the point and harbour of Byzantium, the winding length of the Bosphorus extends about sixteen miles, and its most ordinary breadth may be computed at about one mile and a half. The harbour of Constantinople, which may be considered an arm of the Bosphorus, obtained in a very remote period, the denomination of the Golden Horn. The curve which it wears, the turn of a river, or as it should seem, with more propriety, to that of an ox.\(^7\) The epithet of golden was expressive of the riches which every wind wafted from the most distant countries into the secure and capacious port of Constantinople. The river Lykos, formed by the confluent of two streams, pours into the harbour a perpetual supply of fresh water, which serves to cleanse the bottom, and to invite the periodical shoals of fish to seek their retreat in that convenient recess. As the vicissitudes of tides are scarcely felt in those seas, the constant depth of the harbour allows goods to be loaded and unloaded on the quays without the assistance of boats; and it has been observed, that in many places the largest vessels may rest their prows against the houses, while their sterns are floating in the water.\(^a\)

From the mouth of the Lykos to that of the harbour, this arm of the Bosphorus is more than seven miles in length. The distance is about five hundred yards broad, and a strong chain might be occasionally drawn across it, to guard the port and city from the attack of an hostile navy.\(^a\)

The Propontis. Between the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, the shores of Europe and Asia receding on either side, so as invincibly to encompass the strait, which was known to the ancients by the denomination of Propontis. The navigation from the island of the Bosphorus to the entrance of the Hellespont is about one hundred and twenty miles. Those who steer their westward course through the middle of the Propontis, may observe on their right, the strong town of Bithynia, and never lose sight of the lofty summit of Mount Olympus, covered with eternal snows.\(^b\) They leave on the left a deep gulf, at the bottom of which Nicomedia was seated, the imperial residence of Diocletian; and they pass the small islands of Cyzicus and Propontis before they cast anchor at Gallipoli; where the sea, which separates Asia from Europe, is again contracted into a narrow channel.

The Hellespont. The geographers who with the most skillful accuracy have surveyed the form and extent of the Hellespont, assign about sixty miles for the windings, and about thirty an ordinary breadth of those celebrated straits.\(^b\) But the narrowest part of the channel is found to the northward of the old Turkish castles between the cities of Cestus and Abydus. It was here that the adventurous Leander braved the passage of the flood for the sake of his mistress.\(^e\) It was here likewise, in a place where the distance between the opposite banks cannot exceed five hundred paces,\(^7\) that Xerxes imposed a stupendous bridge of boats, for the purpose of transporting into Europe an army of his hoplites.\(^4\) A sea contracted within such narrow limits, may seem but ill to deserve the singular epithet of broad, which Homer, as well as Orpheus, has frequently bestowed on the Hellespont. But our ideas of greatness are of a relative nature: the traveller, and especially the poet, who, with ready thoughts, can cover the windings of the Hellespont, and contemplate the rural scenery, which appeared on every side to terminate the prospect, insensibly lost the remembrance of the sea; and his fancy painted those celebrated straits with all the attributes of a mighty river flowing with a swift current, in the midst of which woods and groves are planted by the banks, and by a wide mouth, discharging itself into the Ægean or Archipelago.\(^1\) Ancient Troy,\(^2\) seated on an eminence at the foot of mount Ida, overlooked the mouth of the Hellespont, which scarcely received an accession of waters from the tribute of those immortal rivulets the Simois and Scamander. The Grecian camp had stretched twelve miles along the shore from the Sigean to the Thracian promontory; and the flanks of the army were guarded by the bravest chiefs who fought under the banners of Ajax. The first of those promontories was occupied by Achilles with a tower, and the other pitched his tents on the other. After Ajax had fallen a sacrifice to his disappointed pride, and to the ingratitude of the Greeks, his sepulchre was erected on the ground where he had defended the navy against the rage of Jove and of Hector; and the citizens of the Thracian Rhodius were afterwards invested with divine honours.\(^8\) Before Constantine gave a just precedence to the situation of Byzantium, he had conceived the design of erecting the seat of empire on this celebrated spot, from whence the Romans derived their fabulous origin. The extensive plain which lies below ancient Troy, towards the Thracian promontory and the tomb of Ajax, was first chosen for his new capital, and though the undertaking was soon relinquished, the stately remains of unfinished walls and towers attracted the notice of all who sailed through the straits of the Hellespont.*

Gibbon does not make the nearest shores of the Hellespont, more distant from one another than they are, and he states that in all the ancients speak of this last passage as being broader than the other. They agree in giving it 7 stadia, or 933 paces, in the narrowest part. (Herodotus, lib. xii. c. 101; Pliny, i. c. 18. 132.) It is singular that Gibbon, who, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, was considered as the most learned man of his time, should not have observed, that in every part of the strait the width was far too small for the purposes of navigation.\(^b\)

\(^b\) See the seventh book of Herodotus, wtu has erected an elegant trophy to his own name, and which is so placed that all the Ancients agree, that in the time of that Emperor, the Hellespont has been made with tolerable accuracy; but the vanity, first of the Persians, and afterwards of the Romans, to magnify the advantages of the navigation, and the victory, I should much doubt whether the invaders have ever understood the terms of any country which they attacked.

\(^e\) See Wood's Observations on Homer, p. 289. I have, with pleasure, selected this reflection from an author who generally speaks of the ancient annals of Greece with so much justice as to have disappointed the expectation of the public as a critic, and still more as a traveller. He had visited the banks of the Hellespont: he had been on board Strato; he ought to have consulted the Roman inscriptions; how was it possible for him to confound Ilium and Alexandria? (Observations on Homer, p. 352.) I can only see the two cities were separated sixty miles from each other, and the

We are at present qualified to view the advantageous position of Constantinople; which appears to have been formed by nature for the contemplation of a great empire. Situated on the forty-first degree of latitude, the imperial city commanded, from her seven hills, the opposite shores of Europe and Asia; the climate was healthy and temperate, the soil fertile, the harbour secure and capacious; and the approach on the side of the continent was made so easy by the natural and artificial aids of the Bosphorus and the Hellespont may be considered as the two gates of Constantinople; and the prince who possessed those important passages could always shut them against a naval enemy, and open them to the fleets of commerce. The preservation of the eastern provinces may, in some degree, be ascribed to the policy of Constantine, as the barbarians of the Euxine, who in the preceding age had poured their armies into the heart of the Mediterranean, soon desisted from the exercise of piracy, and despaired of forcing this insurmountable barrier. When the gates of the Hellespont and Bosphorus were shut, the capital still enjoyed within its spacious enclosure, every production which could supply the wants, or gratify the luxury, of its numerous inhabitants. The sea-coasts of Thrace and Bithynia, which languish under the weight of Turkish oppression, yield a rich produce of wineyards, fields of gardens, and of plentiful harvests; and the Propontis has ever been renowned for an inexhaustible store of the most exquisite fish, that are taken in their stated seasons, without skill, and almost without labour. But when the passages of the straits were thrown open for trade, they alternately admitted the natural and artificial riches of the north and south, of the Euxine, and of the Mediterranean. Whatever rude commodities were collected in the forests of Germany and Scythia, as far as the sources of the Tanais and the Borysthenes were manufactured by the skill of Europe or Asia; the gardens of Egypt, and the great artificial riches of the richest India, were brought by the varying winds into the port of Constantinople, which for many ages, attracted the commerce of the ancient world.

Foundation of the city.

The prospect of beauty, of safety, and of wealth, united in a single spot, was sufficient to justify the choice of Constantine. But as some decent mixture of prodigy and fable has, in every age, been supposed to reflect a becoming majesty on the origin of great cities, the emperor was desirous of acquiring a name, not to satisfy the uncertainty of counsels of human policy, as to the inaffilable and eternal decrees of divine wisdom. In one of his laws he has been careful to instruct posterity, that, in obedience to the commands of God, he laid the everlasting foundations of Constantinople: and though he has not condescended to relate in what manner the celestial inspiration was communicated to his mind, the defect of his modest silence has been liberally supplied by the ingenuity of succeeding writers; who describe the nocturnal vision which appeared to the fancy of Constantine, as he slept within the walls of Byzantium. Advantages of Constantinople. Before the foundation of Constantinople, Thessalonica is mentioned by Cedrenus, (p. 263) and Sardica by Zonaras, as the intended capital. They both suppose, with very little probability, that the emperor, if he had not been persuaded by a present vision, would have repeated the mistake of the Mind Chaldæenses.

of the glory of his reign, could employ in the prosecution of that great work the wealth, the labour, and all that yet remained of the genius of obedient millions. Some estimate may be formed of the expense bestowed with imperial liberality on the foundation of Constantinople, by the allowance of about two millions five hundred thousand pounds for the construction of the walls, the porticoes, and the aqueducts. The forests that overshadowed the shores of the Euxine, and the celebrated quarries of white marble in the loose heath of Attica, were supplied with fresh stock of materials, ready to be conveyed, by the convenience of a short water-carriage, to the harbour of Byzantium. A multitude of labourers and artificers urged the conclusion of the work with incessant toil; but the impatience of Constantinople soon discovered, that in the decline of arts, the skill as well as numbers of his architects became very unimportant in proportion to the greatness of his designs. The magistrates of the most distant provinces were therefore directed to institute schools, to appoint professors, and to bestow rewards and privileges, to engage in the study and practice of architecture a sufficient number of ingenuous artificers, who had received a liberal education. The buildings of the new city were executed by such artificers as the reign of Constantinople afforded: but they were decorated by the hands of the most celebrated masters of the age of Pericles and Alexander. To revive the genius of Phidias and Ly- sippus, surpassed indeed the power of the master; but the imperial prodigies which they had bequeathed to posterity were exposed without defence to the rapacious vanity of a despot. By his commands the cities of Greece and Asia were despoiled of their most valuable ornaments. The trophies of memorable wars, the objects of religious veneration, the most distinguished statues of the gods and heroes, of the sages and poets, of ancient times, contributed to the splendid triumph of Constantinople; and gave occasion to the remark of the historian Cedrenus, who observes, with some enthusiasm, that nothing seemed wanting except the souls of the illustrious men whom he had observed in their performances, who were absent. But it is not in the city of Constantinople, nor in the declining period of an empire, when the human mind was depressed by civil and religious slavery, that we should seek for the souls of Homer and Demosthenes.

During the siege of Byzantium, the emperor had pitched his tent on the commanding extremity of the second hill. To perpetuate the memory of his success, he chose the same advantageous position for the principal form; which appears to have been of a circular, or rather elliptical, form. To this object were contributed a new triumphal arch; the porticoes, which enclosed it on every side, were filled with statues; and the centre of the form was occupied by a lofty column, of which a mutilated fragment is now degraded by the appellation of the barnd pillar. This column was erected on a pedestal of marble, composed of ten pieces of porphyry, each of which measured about ten feet in height, and about thirty-three in circumference. On the summit of the pillar above one hundred and twenty feet from the ground, stood the colossal statue of Apollo. It was of bronze, had been transported either from Athens or from a town of Phrygia, and was supposed to be the work of Phidias. The artist had represented the god of day, or, as it was afterwards interpreted, the emperor Constantine himself, with a sceptre in his right hand, the globe of the world in his left, and a crown of rays glistening on his forehead. The circumference of this stately building about four hundred paces in length, and one hundred in breadth. The space between the two nuclei or goals, was filled with statues and obelisks; and we may still remark a very singular fragment of antiquity; the bodies of three serpents twisted into one another, which was brought from Athens; it once supported the golden tripod which, after the defeat of Xerxes, was consecrated in the temple of Delphi by the victors of Greeks. The beauty of the the court and of the state of the legions, &c. It resembled our office of postmaster general, and was filled by persons of Eminence; and the officers, named the eminence. The office first took its rise from the time of the emperor Theodosius. The postmaster of the fifth century was in command of the principal post roads in the eastern part of the empire, and in charge of the communication between the towns of the west and the east. There is evidence to prove that it was not then made for the purpose of correspondence, but of the kind expected of such a person.

1 The accurate Thvenot (i. 1. 13) walked in one thousand and thirty-two English miles, from the Kri- puk to the seraglio of the seven towers. D'Anville estimates with care, and receives with confidence, this decisive testimony, which gives the true distance, from one hundred and twelve miles. The extravagant computation of Tournefort (Lettre xii.) of thirty-four or thirty miles, without including Scutari, is a strange departure from his usual character.

3 The syræ, or itineraries, formed the thirteenth region, and were very much improved by Justinian. It has since borne the names of Peru and Galata. The stigmata of the former is obvious; that of the latter is unknown. See Durand Comit. l. i. c. 22. and Gyllius de Byzantium, l. v. c. 10.

1 One hundred and twelve miles, which may be translated into modern English miles, is the only continuous French toise. See D'Anville Meures Itinéraire, p. 53.

5 This was the first of the three columns, which stood in the Prætorian, at Constantinople, and which had been dedicated to the memory of the three emperors, Theodosius, the elder Constantine, and the younger Constantine. See D'Anville Mém de l'Acaémie, vol. iv. p. 233. with his Descript. Of the emperor, who had resided here, for a space of forty years, from the time of his baptism, to the year 337.

9 Six hundred centuries, or sixty thousand pounds weight of gold, is mentioned by Zosimus (c. x. 13.) in a note, unless that contemptible author had derived his information from some more ancient writer, whom he has probably been unacquainted with, to obviate a mode of reckoning.

Hippodrome has been long since defaced by the rude hands of the Turkish conquerors; but, under the similar appellation of Atmeddan, it still serves as a place of exercise for their horses. 1 From the throne, whence the emperor viewed the Circensian games, a winding staircase still retains its ancient form, and a magnificent colonnade, which scarcely yielded to Rome itself, and which, together with the dependent courts, gardens, and porticoes, covered a considerable extent of ground upon the banks of the Propontis between the Hippodrome and the church of St. Sophia. 2 We might likewise celebrate the baths, which still retained the name of Zephyrium, under which they had been enriched, by the munificence of Constantine, with lofty columns, various marbles, and above three-score statues of bronze. 3 But we should deviate from the design of this history, if we attempted minutely to describe the different buildings or quarters of the city. It may be sufficient to observe, that whatever could adorn the dignity of a great capital, or contribute to the benefit or pleasure of its numerous inhabitants, was contained within the walls of Constantinople. A particular description, composed about a century after its foundation, enumerates the school of law, schools of arts, public halls, theatres, small and large, and one hundred and fifty three private baths, fifty-two porticoes, five granaries, eight aqueducts or reservoirs of water, four spacious halls for the meetings of the senate or courts of justice, four taverns, fifteen churches, sixteen palaces, and nine hundred and eighty-eight temples, which, for their size or beauty, deserved to be distinguished from the multitude of plebeian habitations. 4

The populousness of this favoured city was the next most serious object of the attention of its founder. In the dark ages which succeeded the translation of the empire, the remote and the immediate consequences of that memorable event were strangely confounded by the vanity of the Greeks, and the credulity of the Latins. 5 It was asserted, and believed, that all the noble families of Rome, the senate, and the equestrian order, with their numerous attendants, had followed their emperor to the banks of the Propontis; that a spurious race of strangers and plebeians was left to possess the solitude of the ancient capital; and that the lands of Italy, long since converted into gardens, were at once turned into deserts by the removal of the imperial eagle. 6 Most modern writers and editors of the history of Rome, and of the eastern provinces, were probably invited by Constantine to adopt for their country the fortunate spot which he had chosen for his own residence. The invitations of a master are scarcely to be distinguished from commands; and the liberty of the emperor obtained a ready and cheerful obedience. He bestowed on his favourites the palaces which he had built in the several quarters of the city, assigned them lands and pensions for the support of their dignity; and alienated the demesnes of Pontus and Asia to grant hereditary estates by the easy tenure of maintenance and holding. A circumscribed number of, and engagements and obligations soon became superfluous, and were gradually abolished. Wherever the seat of government is fixed, a considerable part of the public revenue will be expended by the prince himself, by his ministers, by the officers of justice, and the officials of the provinces. The wealth of the provincials will be attracted by the powerful motives of interest and duty, of amusement and curiosity. A third and more numerous class of inhabitants will insensibly be formed, of servants, of artificers, and of merchants, who derive their subsistence from their own labour, and from the wants or luxury of the superior ranks. In less than a century, Constantinople disputed with Rome itself the pre-eminence of riches and numbers. New piles of buildings, crowded together with too little regard to health or convenience, scarcely allowed the intervals of narrow streets for the perpetual throng of men, of horses, and of carriages. The allotted space of ground was insufficient to contain the increasing people; and the additions foundations, which, on either side, were advanced into the sea, might as well have composed a very considerable city.

The frequency of the public festivals, the extreme profusion of wine and oil, corn or bread, of money or provisions, had almost exempted the poorest citizens of Rome from the necessity of labour. The magnificence of the first Caesars was in some measure imitated by that of the emperors of the east; and the empire, however liberal, however, it might excite the applause of the people, has incurred the censure of posterity. 7

If we could credit Codinus, (p. 10,) Constantin built houses for the senators on the exact model of their Roman palaces, and gratified them, as well as himself, with the pleasure of an agreeable surprise; but the whole story is full of fictions and inconsistencies. 3 Joinville, c. 10. 4 The Bibliothec Scystophoros. With a grant from the imperial munificence, the small proprietors could not only possess themselves justly have been deemed a hardship, if it had been imposed upon private property.

7 The passages of Zosimus, of Eunapius, of Sozomen, and of Agath- 8 us, which relate to the increase of buildings and inhabitants at the time of Constantine, and the mechanical improvements of the city, are found only reckoned by Codinus, a man of moderation, who says, that the word must have had a more dignified signification. No insula and no tribunal, as the锨 were called, were of sufficient importance to be considered as the new streets, of the new 202. 8 P. luricius Lactant. de Inf. Neeoponth. p. 112. The modern Greeks have strangely disregarded the antiquities of Constantinople. We might excuse the errors of the Turkish or Arabian writers; but it is certain, that the difference between the genuine and the false and adulterated authentic materials preserved in their own language should prefer fiction to truth, and biased translation to accurate information. In a work of Codinus we may detect twelve unaccountable mistakes; the reconciliation of Severus and Niger, the marriage of their son and daughter, the siege of Byzantium by the Macedonians, the invasion of the Gauls, which recalled Severus to Rome, the sixty years which elapsed from his death to the foundation of Constantinople, &c.
tion of legislators and conquerors might assert their claim to the harvests of Africa, which had been purchased with their blood; and it was artfully contrived by the Emperor Julian to excite the hatred of the Romans should lose the memory of freedom. But the prodigality of Constantine could not be excused by any consideration either of public or private interest; and the annual tribute of corn imposed upon Egypt for the benefit of his new capital, was applied to feed a vast multitude of togaed bodies. The cost of that immense service was partly defrayed by the slavemen of an industrious province. Some other regulations of this emperor are less liable to blame, but they are less deserving of notice. He divided Constantine into fourteen regions or quarters, dignified the public council with the appellation of senate, communicated the revenues of Italy and bestowed on the rising city the title of Colony, the first and most favoured daughter of ancient Rome. The venerable parent still maintained the legal and acknowledged supremacy, which was due to her age, to her dignity, and to the remembrance of her former greatness.

Dedication.

As Constantine urged the progress of the A.D. 339 or 334, the work with the impatience of a lover, the walls, the porticoes, and the principal edifices, were completed in a few years, or, according to another account, in a few months: but this extraordinary and opulent construction, so far as the want of written records will allow us to judge of the extent of the works, in which so many of the buildings were finished in so hasty and imperfect a manner, that, under the succeeding reigns, they were preserved with difficulty from impending ruin. But while they displayed the vigour and freshness of youth, the founder prepared to celebrate the dedication of his city. The games and largesses which crowned the pomp of this memorable festival may easily be supposed; but there is one circumstance of a more singular and permanent nature, which ought not entirely to be overlooked. As often as the birth-day of the city returned, the statue of Constantine, framed, by his order, of gilt wood, and bearing in its right hand a small image of the genius of the place, was erected on a triumphal car. The guards, who were carrying what the ancients termed the statue of parade, accompanied the solemn procession as it moved through the Hippodrome. When it was opposite to the throne of the reigning emperor, he rose from his seat, and with grateful reverence adored the memory of his predecessor. At the festival of the dedication, the Emperor Julian, in a eloquent speech before the multitude, allotted to the title of Second or New Rome on the city of Constantine. But the name of Constantinople has prevailed over that honourable epitaph; and after the revolution of fourteen centuries, still perpetuates the fame of its author.

The foundation of a new capital is form of government naturally connected with the establishment of a new form of civil and military administration. The distinct view of the complicated system of policy, introduced by Diocletian, improved by Constantine, and completed by his immediate successors, may not only amuse the fancy by the singular picture of a great empire, but will tend to illustrate the secret and internal causes of its rapid decay. In pursuit of any remarkable institution, we may be frequently led into the more early or the more recent times of the Roman history; but the proper limits of this inquiry must be defined at the expiration of one hundred and thirty years, from the accession of Constantine to the publication of the Theodosian code, from which, as well as from the Notitia of the east and west, we derive the most copious and authentic information of the state of the empire. This variety of objects will suspend, for some time, the course of the narrative; but the interruption will be censured only by those readers who are insensible to the importance of laws and manners, while they perceive, with eager curiosit,y, the transient intrigues of a court, or the accidental event of a battle.

The name of the Romans, Constantine, having a subjection to the entire power of Constantine, had left to the vanity the east the forms and ceremonies of ostentatious greatness. But when they lost even the semblance of those virtues which were derived from their ancient freedom, the simplicity of Roman manners was improved. The Alexandrian discipline of the courts of Asia. The distinctions of personal merit and influence, so conspicuous in a republic, so feeble and obscure under a monarchy, were abolished by the despotism of the emperors; who substituted in their room a severe subordination

The Notitia imperii usque ad Anonymum, p. 9, describes the emperor on the eleventh epistle of Julian, it should seem that the place of senate was occupied by a large number of citizens rather than by senators. Abs de la Betiere (Vie de Jovien, tom. ii. p. 271) has shown that this epistle could not relate to Constantineople. Might we not read, instead of the proper name of D. Constan- tin, the obscure, but more probable word despotis? 5 Bisenti or Rhodestus, now Rhodoslo, was a small maritime city of Thrace. See Stephani. Byz. de Urbibus, p. 325. and Cellar. e Julian (Orat. i. 8.) celebrates Constantine as not less superior to all other emperors than himself was inferior to Rome itself. His learned commentary on the Spartan, (p. 73, 75,) justifies this language by several parallel and contemporary instances. Zosimus, as well as Socrates, describes Tirteen, a flourishing place, situated on the sea between the two sons of Theodosius, which established a perfect equality between the old and the new capital. 5 Codinus (Antiquitatis, p. 8.) affirms, that the foundations of Constantine were laid in the year of the world 3937. (A.D. 339.) on the 26th of July, at the foot of the hill which is designated the 11th of May 5838. (A.D. 377.) He connects these events with several characteristic instances, but not without some exception; the authority of Codinus is of little weight, and the space which he assigns must appear insufficient. The term of ten years is given by Julian; (Orat. i. p. 8.) and Tacitus, (Annal. xiv. 35.) The emperor himself for the help of two passages from Theodronius, (Orat. f. p. 28.) and Phili- liades, (Hist. Rom., tom. i. p. 695-699.) and by the help of two passages from Theodros, (Orat. i. p. 24.) and Phili- liades, (Hist. Rom., tom. i. p. 695-699.) of the first and most favouring of the year 234. Modern critics are divided concerning this point of chronology, and their different sentiments are not sufficiently discussed by the author. 5 Theodronii, Tom. iii. p. 47. Zonnes, i. r. p. 165. Constantine himself places one of the triumphs at the gate of the city. (Cod. C. 8.) This may have his paternity.

f Ceddus and Zonnes are faithful to the mode of superstition which prevailed in their own times, assures us that Constantine was consecrated in the virgin Mother of God.

g The earliest and most complete account of this extraordinary event may be found in the Alexandrian chronicle, p. 523. Till, without the other friends of Constantine, who are offended with the air of suspicion which seems unworthy of a Christian prince, had a right to consider it as doubtful, but they were not authorized to omit the mention of it.

rank and office, from the titled slaves who were seated on the steps of the throne, to the meanest instruments of arbitrary power. This extended circle of object dependents was interested in the support of the actual government, from the dread of a revolution, which might at once confound their hopes, and intercept the reward of their services. In this divine hierarchy (for still it is frequently styled) every ramathers preceded with the most scrupulous exactness, and its dignity was displayed in a variety of tripping and solemn ceremonies, which it was a study to learn, and a sacrilege to neglect.* The purity of the Latin language was debased, by adopting, in the intercourse of pride and flattery, the style of epithets. Tully wishes, howscarcely have understood, and which Augustus would have rejected with indignation. The principal officers of the empire were saluted, even by the sovereign himself, with the deceitful titles of your Sincerity, your Graciousness, your Excellency, your Emacemore, your sublime and wonderful Magnitude, your illustrious and magnificent Highness.† The codies or patents of their office were curiously embazoned with such emblems as were best adapted to explain its nature and high dignity; the image or portrait of the reigning emperor adorned the frontispiece of many of those placed on a table, covered with a rich carpet, and illuminated by four tapers; the allegorical figures of the provinces which they governed; or the appellations and standards of the troops whom they commanded. Some of these official ensigns were really exhibited in their hall of audience, and others preceded their pompous march whenever they appeared in pub-lie; and every circumstance of their demeanour, their dress, their ornaments, and their train, was calculated to inspire a deep reverence for the representatives of supreme authority. By a philosophic observer, the system of the Roman government might have been mistaken for a splendid theatre, filled with players of every character and degree, who repeated the language, and imitated the passions, of their original model.‡

Three ranks of All the magistrates of sufficient importance to find a place in the general state of the empire, were accurately divided into three classes. I. The Illustrious. 2. The Spectacles, or Respectable: And, 3. The Clarissimi; whom we may translate by the word Honorable. In the times of Roman simplicity, the last-mentioned epithet was unfrequently expressive of a real difference, till it became at length the peculiar and appropriated title of all who were members of the senate, and conse-quentially of all who, from that venerable body, were selected to govern the provinces. The vanity of those will, however, of office and office, might be traced in a more or less distinct advantage above the rest of the senatorial order, was long afterwards indulged with the new appellation of Respectable; but the title of Illustrious was always reserved to some eminent personages who were obeyed or revered by the two subordinate classes. It was communicated only 1. To the consuls and patricians; II. To the praetorian prefects, with the praefects of Roman and Constantinople; III. To the masters-general of the cavalry and the infantry; and, IV. To the seven ministers of the palace, who exercised their sober functions about the person of the emperor. Among those illustrious magistrates who were esteemed co-ordinate with each other, the seniority of appointment gave place to the union of dignities.§ By the expediency of honorary codies, the emperors, who were fond of multiplying their favours, might sometimes gratify the vanity, though not the ambition, of impatient courtiers.¶

1. As long as the Roman consuls were the first magistrates, there was no derived the right to power from the choice of the people. As long as the emperors condescended to glise the servitude which they imposed, the consuls were still elected by the real or apparent suffrage of the senate. From the reign of Diocletian, even these vestiges of republican liberty and glory were derive-candidates who were invested with the annual honours of the consulship, affected to deplete the humiliating condition of their predecessors. The Seipios and the Catos had been reduced to solicit the votes of plebeians, to pass through the tedious and expensive forms of a popular election, and to expose their dignity to the shame of a public refusal; while their own happier fate had reserved them for an age and government in which the rewards of virtue were assigned by the emerging wisdom of a gracious sovereign. In the epistles of Cicero to Atticus, the writer testifies that when his consulship was at last declared, that they were created by his sole authority. Their names and portraits, engraved on gilt exercised an act of jurisdiction, by the manumission of a slave, who was brought before them for that purpose; and the ceremony was intended to represent the ceasing of many foreign wars, and the restoration of liberty and of the consulship, when he admitted among his fellow-citizens the faithful Vindex, who had revealed the conspiracy of the Tarquins. 1 The public festival was continued during several days in all the principal cities; in Rome, from custom; in Constantinople, from imitation; in Carthage, Antioch, and Alexandria, from the love of pleasure and the superfluity of wealth. 2 In the two capitals of the empire the annual games of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre, cost four thousand pounds of gold, (about) one hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling; and it so happened that the body of the senators, and the great number of strangers and the nobility, together with the senators and of the magistrates themselves, the sum was supplied from the imperial treasury. 3 As soon as the consuls had discharged these customary duties, they were at liberty to retire into the shade of private life, and to enjoy during the remainder of the year the unembarrassed contemplation of their own greatness. They no longer presided in the national councils; they no longer executed the resolutions of peace or war. Their abilities (unless they were employed in more effective offices) were of little moment; and their names served only as the legal date of the year in which the consulship had been conferred, as the record of Cicero. Yet it was still felt and acknowledged, in the last period of Roman servitude, that this empty name might be compared, and even preferred, to the possession of substantial power. The title of consul was still the most splendid object of ambition, the noblest reward of virtue and loyalty. The emperors them- selves, who disDained the slight shadow of the republic, were conscious that they acquired an additional splendour and majesty as often as they assumed the annual honours of the consular dignity.

The patricians. The proudest and most perfect separation which can be found in any age or country, between the nobles and the people, is perhaps that of the patricians and the plebeians, as it was established in the first age of the Roman republic. Wealth and honours, the offices of the state, and the chief concern of religion, were almost exclusively possessed by the former; who, preserving the purity of their blood with the most insulting jealousy, held their clients in a condition of specious vassalage. But these distinctions, so incompatible with the spirit of a free people, were removed, after a long struggle, by the parties who, acting on the most active and successful of the plebeians accumulated wealth, aspired to honours, desired triumphs, contracted alliances, and, after some generations, assumed the pride of ancient nobility. 4 The patrician families, on the other hand, whose original number was never recruited till the end of the commonwealth, either failed in the ordinary course of nature, or were extinguished in so many foreign wars, or their titles were taken away by the law of merit or fortune, insensibly mingled with the mass of the people. 5 Very few remained who could derive their pure and genuine origin from the infancy of the city, or even from that of the republic, when Caesar and Augustus, Claudius and Vespasian, brought upon the Senate a competent number of new patrician families, in the hope of perpetuating an order, which was still considered as honourable and sacred. 6 But these artificial supplies (in which the reigning house was always included) were rapidly swept away by the rage of tyrants, by frequent alterations of the constitution, by the intermixtures of nations. 7 Little more was left when Constantine ascended the throne, than a vague and imperfect tradition, that the patricians had once been the first of the Romans. To form a body of nobles, whose influence may restrain, while it secures, the authority of the monarch, would have been very inconsistent with the character and policy of Constantine; but he had seriously entertained such a design, it might have exceeded the measure of his power to ratify, by an arbitrary edict, an institution which must expect the sanction of time and of opinion. He revived, indeed, the title of patricians, a distinction that had expired, not as a mediating, but as a transient and last vestige of the ancient Roman servitude. They yielded only to the transient superiority of the annual consuls; but they enjoyed the pre-eminence over all the great officers of state, with the most familiar access to the person of the prince. This honourable rank was bestowed on them for life; and the consuls of Constantine were revered as the adopted fathers of the emperor and the republic. 8

II. The fortunes of the pretorian pre- fects were essentially different from those of the consuls and patricians. The last saw their ancient greatness evaporate in a vain title. The former, rising by degrees from the most humble condition, were invested with the civil and military administration of the Roman empire. From the reign of Severus to that of Diocletian, the guards and the palace, the laws and the finances, the armies and the provinces, were intrusted to their superintending care; and, like the vizes of the east, they held, with one hand the seal, and with the other the standard, of the empire. The ambition of the prefects was always ambitious, and sometimes fatal to the masters whom they served, was supported by the strength of the pretorian bands; but after those haughty troops had been weakened by Diocletian, and finally suppressed by Constantine, the prefects, who survived their fall, were reduced without difficulty to the station of useful and obedient ministers. When they were no longer responsible for the 11 See the animated pictures drawn by Sallust, in the Jugurthine war, of the pride of the nobles, and even of the Virtuous Metellus, who was unable to break the idea that the honour of the consuls would be bestowed on the obscure merit of his lieutenant Marius. In the year 86, before the establishment of the consular college was thus confined among the plebeians of Rome; and from the city, or the idea of their being protected by the city, it seems, he believes that those haughty nobles derived their origin from a similar status. In the same period of the republic, very few remained, not only of the old patrician families, but even of those which had been created by Caesar and Augustus. (Tacit. Annal. v. 25.) The family of Scarrus (a branch of the patrician C. Scarrus) was fixed in the patrician grade; and his father, who exercised the trade of a charcoal merchant, left him only ten slaves, and somewhat less than three hundred pounds sterling, of his property. (Valerius Maximus, p. 161, n. 11.) The family of Vespasian was saved from oblivion by the merit of the son. (Tacit. Annal. v. 30.) The fate of the patrician families, as well as the patrician college, is descried by Gildas in the first book of the Virtues of Agricola, who was created a patrician by the emperor Vespasian, restored honour on a former order; but his ancestors had not any claim beyond an equespous nobility.

12 This failure would have been almost impossible if it were true, as Casson conjectured, that the Virtues of Agricola, p. 42. See Hist. August. p. 291, and Casuarin Comment. p. 289, that this number was more than four thousand. In any case, however, this extravagant number is too much even for the scions of the emperor's family.

safety of the emperor's person, they resigned the jurisdiction which they had hitherto claimed and exercised over all the departments of the imperial army. They were deprived by Constantine of all military command, as soon as they had ceased to lead into the field, under their immediate orders, the flower of the Roman troops; and at length, by a singular revolution, the captains of the guards and their transformed into civil magistrates of the provinces. According to the plan of government instituted by Diocletian, the four præfets had each their prætorian præfect; and after the monarchy was once more united in the person of Constantine, he still continued to create the same number of four præfects, and intrusted to their management the departments which were already administered.

1. The præfect of the east stretched his ample jurisdiction into the three parts of the globe which were subject to the Romans, from the cataracts of the Nile to the banks of the Phasis, and from the mountains of Thrace to the frontiers of Persia.

2. The important provinces of Panonnia, Dacia, Macedonia, and Greece, once acknowledged the authority of the præfect of Illyricum.

3. The power of the præfect of Italy was not confined to the country from whence he derived his title; it extended over the additional territories as far as the Danube, and over the dependent islands of the Mediterranean, and over that part of the continent of Africa which lies between the confines of Cyrene and those of Tingitania.

4. The præfect of the Gauls comprehended under that plural denomination the kindred provinces of Britain and Spain, and his authority was extended to the walls of Antoninus to the foot of mount Atlas.

After the prætorian præfects had been dismissed from all military command, the civil functions which they were ordained to exercise over so many subject nations, with the resources and abilities of the most consummate ministers. To their vigilance was committed the supreme administration of justice and of the finances, the two objects which, in a state of peace, comprehend almost all the respective duties of the sovereign and of the people; of the former, to protect the citizens who are obedient to the laws; of the latter, to contribute the share of their property which is required for the expenses of the state. The coin, the highways, the posts, the granaries, the manufactories, whatever could interest the public prosperity, was moderated by the authority of the prætorian præfects. The lawlessness of the provinces, and the imbecility of the populace, they were empowered to explain, to enforce, and on some occasions to modify, the general edicts by their discretionary proclamations. They watched over the conduct of the provincial governors, removed the negligent, punished the impenitent, and if necessary, all the inferior jurisdictions, an appeal in every matter of importance, either civil or criminal, might be brought before the tribunal of the præfect; but his sentence was final and absolute; and the emperors themselves refused to admit any complaints against the judgment or the integrity of a præfect whom they honoured with such unbounded confidence. His appointments were suitable to his dignity; and if Arabia was his ruling passion, he enjoyed frequent opportunities of collecting a rich harvest of fees, of presents, and of perquisites. Though the emperors no longer dreaded the ambition of their præfects, they were at tentive to counterbalance this great office by the uncertainty and insecurity of its duration.

From their superior importance and the profusion of dignity, Rome and Constantinople were Rome and Constantinople excepted from the jurisdiction of the prætorian præfects. The immense size of the city, and the experience of the tardy, ineptual administration of the large province, was a specious pretence for introducing a new magistrate, who alone could restrain a servile and turbulent populace by the strong arm of arbitrary power. Valerius Messalla was appointed the first præfect of Rome, that his reputation might counterbalance so invidious a measure; but he renounced the situation, which was assumed by his citizen resigned his office, declaring with a spirit worthy of the friend of Brutus, that he found himself incapable of exercising a power incompatible with public freedom. As the sense of liberty became less exquisite, the advantages of order were more clearly understood; and the præfect, who seemed to have been designed as a terror only to slaves and vagrants, was permitted to extend his civil and criminal jurisdiction over the equestrian and noble families of Rome. The præfects, annually created as the judges of law and public order, were either granted the title of præfectus Rhaetiae, Forma with a vigorous and permanent magistrate, who was usually admitted into the confidence of the prince. Their courts were deserted, their number, which had once fluctuated between two and eighteen, was gradually reduced to two or three, and their important and constitutional jurisdiction was extended to the provinces of exhibiting games for the amusement of the people. After the office of the Roman consul had been changed into a vain pageant, which was rarely displayed in the capital, the præfects assumed their vacant place in the senate, and were soon acknowledged as the ordinary residents of that powerful assembly. They received appeals from the distance of one hundred miles; and it was allowed as a principle of jurisprudence, that all municipal authority was derived from them alone.

In the discharge of his laborious employment, the governor of Rome was assisted by fifteen officers, some of whom had been originally his equals, or even his superiors. The principal departments were relative to the command of a numerous watch, established as a safeguard against fires, robberies, and nocturnal disorders; the custody and distribution of the public arms; the protection of the temples; and the management of the aqueducts, of the common sewers, and of the navigation and bed of the Tyber; the inspection of the

But since the story of Caesars, who have diligently collected and accurately digested in their proper order the scattered historical materials. markets, the theatres, and of the private as well as public works. Their vigilance ensured the three principal objects of a regular police, safety, plenty, and cleanliness. The prefects, whose duty it was to superintend the government to preserve the splendour and ornament of the capital, a particular inspector was appointed for the statues; the guardian, as it were, of that inanimate people, which, according to the extravagant computation of an old writer, was scarcely inferior in number to the living inhabitants of Rome. About thirty years after the foundation of Constantinople, a similar magistracy was created in that rising metropolis, for the same uses and with the same powers. A perfect equality was established between the dignity of the two municipal, and that of the four praetorian prefects. The provinces, which were distinguished by the title of Illustri, spectable, formed an intermediate class between the Illustrious prefects and the honourable magistrates of the provinces. In this class the proconsuls of Asia, and Africa, claimed a pre-eminence, which was yielded to the remembrance of their ancient dignity; and the appeal from their tribunal to that of the prefects was almost the only mark of their dependence. But the civil government of the empire was distributed into thirteen great Dioceses, each of which equalled the just measure of a powerful kingdom. The first of these dioceses were subject to the management of a single praetorian prefect, but the next, that of the count of the east; and we may convey some idea of the importance and variety of his functions, by observing, that six hundred apparitors, who would be styled at present either secretaries, or clerks, or ushers, or messengers, were employed in this immediate office. The place of Augustal prefect of Egypt was no longer filled by a Roman knight; but the name was retained; and the extraordinary powers which the situation of the country and the temper of the inhabitants had once made indispensable, were still continued to the governor. The eleven remaining dioceses, of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace; of Macedonia, Dacia, and Pannonia, or western Illyricum; of Italy and Africa; of Gaul, Spain, and Britain; were governed by twelve vicars or vice-prefects, whose name sufficiently explains the nature and dependence of their office. It may be added, that the lieutenant-generals of the Roman army, commanding the military counts and dukes, who were hereafter mentioned, were allowed the rank and title of Respectable.

Of the provinces. — As the spirit of jealousy and ostentation prevailed in the councils of the emperors, they proceeded with anxious diligence to divide the empire into lesser kings and the whole was divided into two hundred and six provinces, each of which supported an expensive and splendid establishment. Of these, three were governed by proconsuls, thirty-seven by consuls, five by correctors, and seventy-one by presidents. The apppellations of these magistrates were different; they ranked in successive order, the ensigns of their dignity were curiously varied, and their situation, from accidental circumstances, might be more or less agreeable or advantageous. But they were all, excepting only the proconsuls) alike included in the class of honourable persons; and they were alike intrusted, during the pleasure of the prince, and under the authority of the laws, with the government and execution of justice and the finances in their respective districts. The ponderous volumes of the Codes and Pandects would furnish ample materials for a minute inquiry into the system of provincial government, as in the space of six centuries it was improved by the wisdom of the Roman statesmen and lawyers. It may be sufficient for the historian to select two singular and salutary provisions intended to restrain the abuse of authority. 1. For the preservation of peace and order, the governors of the provinces were armed with the sword of justice. They inflicted corporal punishments, and the death of insubordination, without the power of life and death. But they were not authorized to indulge the condemned criminal with the choice of his own execution, or to pronounce a sentence of the mildest and most honourable kind of exile. These prerogatives were reserved to the prefects, who alone could impose the heavy fine of fifty pounds of gold, their viceregents were confined to the trifling weight of a few ounces. This distinction, which seems to grant the larger, while it denies the smaller, degree of authority, was founded on a very rational motive. The smaller degree was infinitely more liable to abuse. The doubtful magistracy of an intrenched governor provoke him into acts of oppression, which allotted only the freedom or the fortunes of the subject; though, from a principle of prudence, perhaps of humanity, he might still be terrified by the guilt of innocent blood. It may likewise be considered, that exile, considerable fines, or the choice of an easy death, relate more particularly to the rich and the noble; and the persons the most exposed to the avarice or resentment of a provincial magistrate, were thus removed from his obscur persecution to the more august and impartial tribunal of the praetorian prefect. 2. As it was reasonable to apprehend that the position of the judge might be biased, if his interest was concerned, or his affections were engaged; the strictest regulations were established, to exclude any person, without the special dispensation of the emperor, from the government of the province where he was born; and to prohibit the governor or his deputy to receive the homage of a native, or an inhabitant; or from purchasing slaves, lands, or houses, within the extent of his jurisdiction. Notwithstanding these rigorous precautions, the emperor Constantine, after a reign of twenty-five years, still deploys the venal and oppressive administration over the provinces, in order to keep the audience of the judge, his despatch of business, his reasonable delays, and his final sentence, were publicly sold, either by himself or by the officers of his court. The continuance, and perhaps the impunity, of these crimes, is attested by the repetition of impotent laws, and ineffectual menaces.

5 In juridictione praefectorum, administrazionee consistit aequipara comparation. Cod. Theod. I. v. l. tit. xxv. leg. 1. This maxim of common law was enforced by a sense of rights (see the remainder of the clause) from Constantine, Justin. From this period, which is extended to the present officers of the governor, they except only the measures and provocations of a marcher for the public benefit; after which, on information, it devolves to the treasury.

In the liber vic, leg. 2. Zeno enacted, that all governors should remain in the province, to answer any accusations fifty days after the expiration of their power. Cod. Justinian. I. l. tit. xii. leg. 1.
The profession of the civil magistrates were developed from the professional class of the law. The celebrated Institutes of Justinian are addressed to the youth of his dominions, who had devoted themselves to the study of Roman jurisprudence; and the sovereign condescends to animate their diligence, by the assurance that their skill and ability would in time be recognised, and promoted by the munificence of the republic. The rudiments of this lucrative science were taught in all the considerable cities of the east and west; but the most famous school was that of Berytus, on the coast of Phenicia; which flourished above three centuries from the time of Alexander Se-vcer, the founder of an academy so advantageous to his native country. After a regular course of education, which lasted five years, the students dispersed themselves through the provinces, in search of fortune and honour; nor could they want an inexhaustible supply of business in a great empire, already jurisprudence, the ordinary promontory of lawyers was vices. The court of the prætorian prefect of the east could alone furnish employment for one hundred and fifty advocates, sixty-four of whom were distinguished by peculiar privileges, and two were annually chosen with a salary of sixty pounds of gold, to defend the causes of their clients. The system of law was made of their judicial talents, by appointing them to act occasionally as assessors to the magistrates; from thence they were often raised to preside in the tribunals before which they had pleaded. They obtained the most important provinces; and, by the aid of merit, of reputation, or of favour, they ascended by successive steps, to the illustrious dignities of the state. In the practice of the bar, these men had considered reason as the instrument of dispute; they interpreted the laws according to the dictates of private interest; and the same precepts which had made them useful to their states, made them formidable to the public administration of the state. The honour of a liberal profession has indeed been vindicted by ancient and modern advocates, who have filled the most important stations with pure integrity and consummate wisdom; but in the decline of Roman jurisprudence, and the profoundness of the profession, some of them procured admissitance into families for the purpose of fomenting differences, of encouraging suits, and of preparing a harvest of gain for themselves or their brethren. Others, recluse in their chambers, maintained the dignity of legal professors, by furnishing a rich client with subtilities to confound the plausile truths, and with arguments to colour the most unjustifable pretensions. The splendid and popular class was composed of the advocates, who filled the forum with the sound of their tirand and loquacious rhetoric. Careless of fame and of justice, they are described, for the most part, as ignorant and rapacious guides, who conducted their clients through the courts of law with great delay, and of disappointment; from whence, after a tedious series of years, they were at length dismissed, when their patience and fortune were almost ex-husted.

III. In the system of policy introduced by Augustus, the governors, those at least of the imperial provinces, were invested with the full powers of the sovereign himself. Ministers of peace and war, the distribution of rewards and punishments depended on them alone, and they successively appeared on their tribunal in the robes of civil magistracy, and in complete armour at the head of the Roman legions. The influence of the revenue, the authority of law, and the command of a military force, concur to render their power supreme and absolute; and whenever they were tempted to violate their allegiances, the loyalty of the province with which they were identified was scarcely sensible of any change in its political state. From the time of Commodus to the reign of Constantine, near one hundred governors might be enumerated, who, with various success, erected the standard of revolt; and though the innocent were too often accused, and the guilty sometimes acquitted, by the suspicious cruelty of their master. To secure his throne and the public tranquillity from these formidable servants, Constantine resolved to divide the military from the civil administration; and to es-stablish, as a permanent and professional distinction, a separate class of officers, with the rank and privileges of the same name. His number was thus doubled by the official division, and his authority redoubled. The discernals of the same rank and title were appointed on the four important frontiers of the Rhine, of the Upper and the Lower Danube, and of the Euphrates, the defence of the Roman empire was at length committed to eight masters-general of the cavalry and infantry, rank, privileges, &c. of the consuls in general, see Cod. 14 Although the military counts and dukes are frequently mentioned, they are unusual in his history, and are not always easy to place, for the exact knowledge of their number and stations. For the intonguished, have obtained in modern languages so very different a sense, that the use of them is at once surprising. But it should be recollected, that the second of those appellations is only a corruption of the Latin word, which was indiscriminately applied to any military chief. All these provincial generals were therefore dukes; but no more than ten among them were distinguished to the highest degree. They bad a sort of honour, or rather of favour, which had been recently invented in the court of Constantine. A gold belt was the ensign which distinguished the office of the count and dukes; and besides their pay, they received a liberal allowance sufficient to maintain one hundred and fifty-eight horses. They were strictly prohibited from interfering in any matter which related to the administration of justice or the revenue; but the command which they exercised over the troops of their department, was independent of the authority of the magistrates.

From about the same time that Constantine gave a sanction to the ecclesiastical order, he instituted in the Roman empire the nice balance of the civil and the military powers. The emulation, and sometimes the discord, which reigned between two professions of opposite interests and incompatible manners, was productive of beneficial and of pernicious consequences. It was seldom to be expected that the mutual envy of a service should either conspire for the disturbance, or should unite for the service, of their country. While the one delayed to offer the assistance which the other disdained to solicit, the troops very frequently remained without orders or without supplies; the public safety was betrayed, and the defenceless subjects were left exposed to the fury of the barbarians. The divided administration, which had been formed by Constantine, relaxed the vigour of the state, while it secured the tranquillity of the monarchy.

Distinction of the military and the civil power. The memory of Constantine has been preserved to posterity as the only example of a wise and impartial discrimination which corrupted military discipline, and prepared the ruin of the empire. The nineteen years which preceded his final victory over Licinius, had been a period of licence and intestine war. The rivals who contended for the possession of the Roman world, had withdrawn the greatest part of their forces from the guardian of the general frontier; and the principal cities which formed the boundary of their respective dominions were filled with soldiers, who considered their countrymen as their most implacable enemies. After the use of these internal garrisons had ceased with the civil war, the conqueror wanted either wisdom or firmness to suppress a fatal indulgence, which habit had endured and almost confirmed to the military order.

From the reign of Constantine a popular and even legal distinction was admitted between the Palatines and the Borderers, the troops of the court, as they were improperly styled, and the troops of the frontier. The former, elevated by the superiority of their pay and privileges, were permitted, except in the extraordinary emergencies of war, to occupy their tranquil stations in the heart of the provinces. The most flourishing cities were oppressed by the intolerable weight of which the soldiers insensibly forgot the virtues of their profession, and contracted the vices of civil life. They were either degraded by the industry of mechanic trades, or enervated by the luxury of baths and theatres. They soon became careless of their martial exercises, curious in their diet and apparel, and while they were employed in the superstition of a profane religion, they trembled at the hostile approach of the barbarians. The chain of fortifications which Diocletian and his colleagues had extended along the banks of the great rivers, was no longer maintained with the same care, or defended with the same vigilance. The numbers which still remained under the name of the troops of the frontier, might be sufficient for the ordinary defence. But their spirit was degraded by the humiliating reflection, that they were expected to be taxed as the lighter and daintier troops of the court, and that they were rewarded only with about two-thirds of the pay and emoluments which were lavished on the troops of the court. Even the bands or legions that were raised the nearest to the level of those unworthy favourites, were in some measure disgraced by the title of innobility; and it is vain to pretend that Constantine repeated the most dreadful menaces of fire and sword against the Borderers who should dare to desert their colours, to convoy the intrudors of the barbarians, or to participate in the spoils. The mischiefs which flow from injudicious counsels are seldom removed by the application of partial securities; and though succeeding princes laboured to restore the strength and numbers of the frontier garrisons, the empire, till the last moment of its dissolution, continued to languish under the mortal wound which had been so rashly or so weakly inflicted by the hand of Constantine.

The same policy of dividing the army was in all ages a tendency to decrease whatever is united, of reducing whatever is eminent, of dreading every active power, and of expecting that the most feeble will prove the most obedient, seems to pervade the institutions of several princes, and particularly those of Constantine. The martial pride of the legions, whose victorious camps had so often been the scene of rebellion, was nourished by the memory of their past exploits, and the consciousness of their actual strength. As long as they maintained their ancient establishment of six thousand men, they subsisted, under the reign of Diocletian, each of which was considered as an independent and important object in the military history of the Roman empire. A few years afterwards, these gigantic bodies were shrunk to a very diminutive size; and when seven legions, with some auxiliaries, defended the city of Amida against the Persians, the total garrison, with the inhabitants of both sexes, and the peasants of the deserted country, did not exceed the number of twenty thousand persons. From this fact, and from similar examples, there is reason to believe, that the constitution of the legions, to which they partly owed their value and discipline, was dissolved by Constantine; and that the bands of Roman infantry, which still assumed the same names, were composed of some hundreds of one thousand or fifteen hundred men. The conspiracy of so many separate detachments, each of which was awed by the sense of its own weakness, could easily be checked; and the successors of Constantine might indulge their love of ostentation, by causing their orders to one hundred and thirty-two legions, inscribed on the muster roll of their numerous armies. The remainder of their troopers was distributed into several hundred cohorts of infantry, and squadrons of cavalry. Their arms, and titles, and ensigns, were calculated to inspire terror, and to display the variety of nations who marched under the imperial standard. And not a vestige was left of that severe simplicity, which, in the ages of freedom and victory, had distinguished the line of battle of a Roman army from the confounded host of an Asiatic monarch. A more particu-cular enumeration, drawn from the Notitiae, might exercise the diligence of an antiquary; but the historian will content himself with observing, that the number of permanent stations or garrisons established on the frontiers of the empire, amounted to five hundred and eighty-three; and that, under the successors of Constantine, the Roman army of sufficient strength was computed at six hundred and forty-five thousand soldiers. An effort so prodigious surpassed the wants of a more ancient, and the faculties of a later, period.

DIFFICULTY OF RECRUITING.

In the various states of society, armies are recruited from very different motives. Barbarians are urged by the love of war; the citizens of a free republic may be prompted by a principle of duty; the subjects, or at least the nobles, of a monarchy, are animated by a sentiment of honour; but the timid and luxurious inhabitants of a declining empire must be induced by the hopes of profit, or compelled by the dread of punishment. The resources of the Roman treasury were exhausted by the increase of pay, by the repetition of donations, and by the invention of new emoluments and inducements, which, in the last instance, were not sufficient to compensate the hardships and dangers of a military life. Yet, although the structure was lowered, although slaves, at least by a tacit connivance, were indiscriminately received into the ranks, the insurmountable difficulty of procuring a regular and adequate supply of warriors was not yet surmounted. The emperor used more religious and temporal and coercive methods. The lands bestowed on the veterans, as the free reward of their valor, were henceforward granted under a condition, which contains the first rudiments of the feudal tenures; that their sons, who succeeded to the inheritance, should devote themselves to the profession of arms, as soon as they attained the age of manhood; and their cowardly refusal was punished by the loss of honour, of fortune, or even of life. But as the annual growth of the sons of the veterans bore a very small proportion to the demands of the service, levies of men were frequently required from the provinces, and every proprietor was obliged either to take up arms, or to procure a substitute, or to purchase his exemption by the payment of a heavy fine. The sum of forty-two pieces of gold, to which it was reduced, ascertain the exorbitant price of volunteers, and the reluctance with which the provinces furnished their quotas. The Philadelphia, or house of slaves, as it was called, was the horror of the profession of a soldier, which had affected the minds of the degenerate Romans, that many of the youth of Italy, and the provinces, chose to cut off the fingers of their right hand to escape from being enrolled in the service; and strange expiation was so commonly practised, as to denote a severe animadversion of the laws, and a peculiar name in the Latin language.

The introduction of barbarians into the Roman armies became every day more universal, more necessary, and more fatal. The most daring of the Scythians, of the Goths, and of the Germans, who delighted in war, and who found it most profitable to defend than to ravage the provinces of the empire, were allowed to form, and to establish, the dominion of their respective nations, but in the legislatures themselves, and among the most distinguished of the Palatine troops. As they freely mingled with the subjects of the empire, they gradually learned to despise their former manners; and to substitute an implicit reverence which the pride of Rome had excited from their ignorance, while they acquired the knowledge and possession of those advantages by which alone she supported her declining greatness. The barbarian soldiers, who displayed any military talents, were advanced, without exception, to the most important commands; and the names of the tribunes, of the counts and dukes, and of the generals themselves, betray a foreign origin, which they no longer condescended to disguise. They were often intrusted with the conduct of a war against their countrymen; and though most of them preferred the title of alien to that of a public enemy, the degraded condition of the Roman race, compared to those of blood, they did not always avoid the guilt, or at least the suspicion, of holding a treacherous correspondence with the enemy, of inviting his invasion, or of sparring his retreat. The camps and the palace of the son of Constantine were governed by the barbarians, as the legions of Carthage were by the strictest connexion with each other, and with their country, and who represented every personal affront as a national indignity. When the tyrant Caligula was suspected of an intention to invest a very extraordinary candidate with the consular robes, the sacrilegious preparations were interrupted by a sudden death; and, like a man of promise, who, instead of a horse, the noblest chieftain of Germany or Britain had been the object of his choice. The revolution of three centuries had produced so remarkable a change in the prejudices of the people, that, with the public approval, Constantine showed his successors the example of bestowing the honours of the consulship on the barbarians, who, by their merit and services, had deserved to be ranked among the first of the Romans. But as these hardy veterans, who had been educated in the ignorance or contempt of the laws, were incapable of exercising any civil rights or duties, they were distributed among the civil and military provinces, by the irreconcilable separation of talents as well as of professions. The accomplished citizens of the Greek and Roman republics, whose characters could adapt themselves to the bar, the senate, the camp, or the schools, had learned to write, to speak, and to act, with the same rapidity, and with the same abilities.

IV. Besides the magistrate and general ministerials, who at a distance from the court diffused their delegated authority over the provinces and armies, the emperor conferred the rank of Illustris on seven of his more immediate servants, to whom the fidelity he intrusted his safety, or his counsels, or his treasures.

The private apartments of the palace afterwards, Valentinian, in a law addressed to the prefect of Gaul, is violently exerted to oblige the public treasury to provide for the pay, of the officers, and even for the soldiers, who he thought it necessary to support, by the irreconcilable separation of talents as well as of professions. were governed by a favourite eunuch, who, in the language of that age, was styled the prepositus or praefectus the chamberlain. His duty was to preserve the sacred bed-chamber. His personal attendance on the emperor was an twice twenty-four hours of state, or in those of amusement, and to perform about his person all those menial services which can only derive their splendour from the influence of royalty. Under a prince who deserved to reign, the great chamberlain (besides being useful and bountiful to domestic; but an artful domestic, who improves every occasion of unguarded confidence, will insensibly acquire over a freeb mind that ascendant which harsh wisdom and uncomplying virtue can seldom obtain. The degenerate grandsons of Theodosius, who were instanced in this part of the preceding to the duties, excelled the prefects of their bed-chamber above the heads of all the ministers of the palace; 2 and even his deputy, the first of the splendid train of slaves who waited in the presence, was thought worthy to rank before the respectable proconsuls of Greece or Asia. He was to conduct the discipline of the civil and military schools, and received appeals from all parts of the empire; in the causes which related to that numerous army of privileged persons, who, as the servants of the court, had obtained, for themselves and families, a right to decline the authority of the ordinary judges. The correspondence between the prince and his subjects was managed by the four serima, or offices of this minister of state. The first was appropriated to the bishops, the second to episkoples, the third to petitions, and the fourth to papers and orders of a miscellaneous kind. Each of these was subdivided into a council which in former ages would have been esteemed unworthy of the Roman majesty, a particular secretary was allowed for the Greek language; and interpreters were appointed to receive the ambassadors of the barbarians: but the department of foreign affairs, which constitutes so essential a part of modern policy, seldom diverted the attention of the master of the offices. His mind was more seriously engaged by the general direction of the posts and arsenals of the empire. There were thirty-four cities, fifteen in the east, and nineteen in the west, in which regular companies of workmen were perpetually employed in fabricating defensive or offensive weapons of all sorts, and military engines, which were deposited in the arsenals, and occasionally delivered for the service of the troops. 3. In the course of nine centuries, the office of quasator had experienced a very singular revolution. In the infancy of Rome, two inferior magistrates were annually elected by the people, to relieve the consuls from the humdrum business of the public treasury; 4 the plebeians, borrowed from the military character of the first emperors, the steward of their household was styled the praefectus domesticorum, a name which very seriously represents to him, that his own fame, and that of the empire, must depend on the opinion which foreign ambassadors may entertain of the dignity and magnificence of the royal table. There are some passages which state only that under the government of the house of Severus, their provincial government, they had the administration of the treasury; and though they were restored by Diocletian, as they seem to have been finally disused by Nero. This supervision, who, deserting their honest labours, had pressed with too much eagerness into the lucrative profession of the finanes. Seventy-nine provincial receivers, of whom eighteen were honoured with the title of count, corresponded with the treasurers, and he exacted a revenue over the provinces from whence the precious metals were extracted, over the mines, in which they were converted into the current coin, and over the public treasuries of the most important cities, where they were deposited for the service of the state. The formidable power of the empire was regulated by the ministers, who directed likewise all the linen and woollen manufactures, in which the successive operations of spinning, weaving, and dyeing were executed, chiefly by women of a servile condition, for the use of the palace and army. Twenty-six of these institutions are enumerated in the west, where the arts had been more recently introduced, and a still larger proportion may be allowed for the industrious provinces of the east. The private treas. 5. Besides the public revenue, which was the absolute monarch might levy and expend according to his pleasure, the emperors, in the capacity of sovereigns, invested with very extensive property, which was administered by the count, or treasurer, of the private estate. Some part had perhaps been the ancient demesnes of kings and republics; some accessions might be derived from the families which were successively invested with the purple; but the most considerable portion flowed from the imperial source of confiscations and forfeitures. The imperial estates were scattered throughout the provinces, from Mauritania to Britain; but the rich and fertile soil of Cappadocia tempted the monarch to acquire in that country his fairest possessions, and either Constantine or his successors embraced the occasion of justifying his avowage by religious zeal. They suppressed the rich temple of Comana, where the high priest of the goddess of war supported the dignity of a sovereign prince; and they applied to their private use the consecrated lands, which were irrigated by the streams of the Sarus, bred a generous race of horses, renowned above all others in the ancient world for their majestic shape, and admirable swiftness. These sacred animals, destined for the service of the palace and the imperial games, were protected by the laws from the profanation of a vulgar master. The demesnes of Cappadocia were important enough to require the inspection of a count; officers of an inferior rank were stationed in the other parts of the empire; and the deputies of the private, as well as those of the public, treasurer, were maintained in the exercise of their independent functions, and encouraged to control the authority of the provincial magistrates. 6, 7. Use of torture. 3. The deceitful and dangerous experiment of the criminal question, as it is emphatically styled, was admitted, rather than approved, in the jurisprudence of the Romans. They applied this sanguinary mode of examination only to servile bodies, whose sufferings were seldom weighed by those haughty republicans in the scale of justice or public safety.

who formed the corporations of the cities, and whom the severity of the imperial laws had condemned to servitude. The free and civil society of the whole Idea of the empire (without excepting the patrimonial estates of the monarch) was the object of ordinary tax; and every new purchaser contracted the obligations of the former proprietor. An accurate census, or survey, was the only equitable mode of assessment. The land, on which every one should be obliged to contribute for the public service; and from the well-known period of the indictions, there is reason to believe that this difficult and expensive operation was repeated at the regular distance of fifteen years. The lands were marked respectively to the new proprietors, who, their nature, whether arable or pasture, or vineyards or woods, was distinctly reported; and an estimate was made of their common value from the average produce of five years. The numbers of slaves and of cattle constituted an essential part of the report; an oath was administered to the proprietors, which bound them to disclose the true state of their affairs; and their attempts to prevaricate, or elude the intention of the legislator, were severely watched, and punished as a capital crime, which included the double guilt of treason and sacrilege. A large part of the tribute paid in money of the current coin of the empire, gold alone could be legally accepted. The remainder of the taxes, according to the proportions determined by the annual indiction, was furnished in a manner still more direct, and still more oppressive. According to the different nature of the produce that was introduced in the produce of wine or oil, corn or barley, wood or iron, was transported by the labour of the citizens, or the expense of the provincials to the imperial magazines, from whence they were occasionally distributed, for the use of the court, of the army, and of the two capitals, Rome and Constantinople. The inhabitants of the provinces were frequently obliged to make considerable purchases, that they were strictly prohibited from allowing any compensation, or from receiving in money the value of those supplies which were exacted in kind. In the primitive simplicity of small communities, this might be well adapted to collect the almost voluntary offerings of the people; but it is at once susceptible of the utmost latitude, and of the utmost strictness, which, in a corrupt and absolute monarchy, must introduce a perpetual contest between the power of oppression and the arts of fraud. The agriculture of the Roman provinces was insensibly ruined, and, in the progress of despoliation, which tends to disjoint its own purpose, the emperors were obliged to derive some merit from the forgiveness of debts, or the remission of tributes, which their subjects were utterly incapable of paying. According to the new division of Italy, the Fertile provinces, comprising the plain of Tuscany, the valleys of the Tiber and the Liris, the plains of Umbria, and the Apennine range of the early victories and of the delicious retirement of the citizens of Rome, extended between the sea and the Apennine from the Tyber to the Silarus. Within sixty years after the death of Constantine, and on the evidence of an actual survey, an exemption was granted, in a large, flat valley, in favor of the wealthy proprietors, of the highly cultivated plains of Littoral. The inhabitants of the provinces of Italy and the Apennine range were exempted from three-fifths of the labours of the indictions, and the provision of grain, which was formerly required. The latter of these sums was divided by the former; and the estimate, that such a province contained so many capita, or heads of tribute; and that each head was rated at such a price, was universally received, not only in the popular, but even in the legal computation. The value of the land, and the duties of the propinquity to many accidental, or at least fluctuating circumstances; but some knowledge has been preserved of a very curious fact, the more important, since it relates to one of the richest provinces of the Roman empire, and which now flourishes as the most splendid of the agricultural districts of the modern kingdom. The Rhine valley, which Constantine had exhausted the wealth of Gaul, by exacting twenty-five pieces of gold for the annual tribute of every head. The humane policy of his successor reduced the capitation to seven pieces; a moderate proportion between these opposite extremes of extravagant oppression and of transient indulgence, may therefore be fixed at sixteen pieces of gold, or about nine pounds sterling, the common standard, perhaps, of the impositions of Gaul. But this calculation, or rather the facts from whence it is deduced, can be fixed, without the intervention of any third party, as the amount of a demand.

The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Volume 18 (2020) not full of suggesting two difficulties to a thinking mind, who will be at once surprised by the equality, and then by the poverty of the gifts. To explain them may perhaps reflect some light on the interesting subject of the finances of the declining empire.

1. It is obvious, that, as long as the immutable constitution of human nature produces and maintains so unequal an distribution of the personal property of the community would be deprived of their subsistence, by the equal assessment of a tax from which the sovereign would derive a very trifling revenue. Such indeed might be the theory of the Roman capitulation; but in the practice, this unjust equality was no longer felt. The tribute was four hundred times, and not a real, not of a personal, imposition. Several indigent citizens contributed to compose a single head, or share of taxation; while the wealthy provincial, in proportion to his fortune, alone represented several of those imaginary beings. In a poetical request, addressed to one of the last and most deserving of the Roman princes who reigned in Gaul, Sidonius Apollinaris personifies his tribute under the figure of a triple monster, the Geryon of the Grecian fables, and entreats the new Hercules that he would most graciously be pleased to save his life by cutting off three of his heads. The fortune of the tributary was a very different matter, being, as it were, a part of a poet; but if he had pursued the allusion, he must have painted many of the Gallic nobles with the hundred heads of the deadly hydra, spreading over the face of the country, and devouring the substance of an hundred families.

II. The difficulty of allowing an annual sum of about nine pounds sterling, even for the average of the capitulation of Gaul, may be rendered more evident by the comparison of the present state of the same country, as it is now governed by the absolute monarch of an indubitable, wealthy, and affectionate people. The taxes of France cannot be magnified, either by fear or by flattery, beyond the annual amount of eight millions of sterling, which quite perhaps is to be shared among four-and-twenty millions of inhabitants. Seven millions of these, in the capacity of fathers, or brothers, or husbands, may discharge the obligations of the remaining multitude of women and children; yet the equal proportion of each tributary aye was not to exceed above fifty shillings of our money, instead of a proportion almost four times as considerable, which was regularly imposed on their Gallic ancestors. The reason of this difference may be found, not so much in the relative scarcity or plenty of goods, and silver coin, as in the different state of society in ancient Gaul and in modern France. In a country where personal freedom is the privilege of every subject, the whole mass of taxes, whether they are levied on property or on consumption, may be fairly divided among the whole body of the nation. But the far greater part of the lands of ancient Gaul, as well as of the other provinces of the Roman world, were cultivated by slaves, or by peasants, whose dependent condition was a less rigid servitude. In such a state the poor were maintained at the expense of the spoil of their labour; and as the rolls of tribute were filled only with the names of those citizens who possessed the means of an honourable, or at least of a decent, subsistence, the comparative smallness of their numbers explains and justifies the high rate of their capitulation. The truth of this assertion may be illustrated by an example. The Allobroges, one of the most powerful and cultivated tribes of cities of Gaul, occupied an extent of territory, which now contains above five hundred thousand inhabitants, in the two ecclesiastical dioceses of Autun and Nevers; and with the probable accession of those of Chalonais and Meus, the population would be raised to eight hundred thousand. In the time of Constantine, the territory of the Allobroges afforded no more than twenty-five thousand heads of capitulation, of whom seven thousand were discharged by that prince from the intolerable weight of tribute. A just analogy would seem to countenance the opinion of an ingenious historian, that the free and tributary citizens did not surpass the number of half a million; and if, in the ordinary administration of government, their annual payments may be computed at about four millions and a half of our money, it would appear, that although the share of each individual was trifling, yet, distributed to eight hundred thousand, a Billon of the modern taxes of France was levied on the imperial province of Gaul. The exactions of Constantine may be calculated at seven millions sterling, which were reduced to two millions by the humanity or wisdom of Julian.

But this tax, or capitulation, on the proprietors of land, would have suffered a trade and industry to escape. With the view of sharing that species of wealth which is derived from art and labour, and which exists in money or in merchandise, the emperors imposed a distinct and personal tribute on the trading part of their subjects. So many free citizens, very strictly confined both in time and place, were allowed to the proprietors who disposed of the produce of their own estates. Some indulgence was granted to the profession of the liberal arts; but every other branch of commercial industry was affected by the severity of the law. The inhabitants of Byzantium were reduced to mere suppliants, and the Alexandrians were forced to submit to the measures of a despotic government. They imported the gems and spices of India for the use of the western world; the usurer, who derived from the interest of money a silent and ignominious profit; the ingenious manufacturer, the diligent mechanic, and even the most obscure retailer of a sequestered village, were obliged to yield up the fruits of their industry to the partnership of their gain; and the sovereignty of the Roman empire who tolerated the profession, consented

Hor. Sat. i. 503. edition of 1770. Sido. Apol. Cart. xi. 2. The reputation of Father Simon, and the opinion of Mr. Cotman, the translator of Sidonius Apollinaris, on this passage, are much above what I have found in his note (p. 144.) on this remarkable passage. The words, non ut vero assurse, betray the perplexity of the commentator.

This assertion, however formidable it may seem, is founded on the fiction of there never having been a separate public authority, and now deposited in the Contrôle Général at Paris. The number of heads of the people, taken in five years, from 1770 to 1774, both inclusive, is 79,649 boys, and 40,959 girls, in 119,292,993 children. The province of France Haute Loire, which is precisely of the same extent with the county of Artois, which, according to the last return of the population, annually repeated from the year 1773 to the year 1778, contains 237,087 inhabitants. By the rules of that inquiry, we may infer, that the ordinary proportion of annual births to the whole people is about one in every five. We may then divide the population of France into 17,538,000 persons of both sexes and of every age. If we content ourselves with the addition of 20 per cent. to this number, the whole population will amount to 21,322,930. From the diligent researches of the French government, which are not numerous of our own imitation, we may hope to obtain a still greater degree of certainty on this important subject.

8 The ancient jurisdiction of (Augustodunum) Autun in Burgundy, the capital of the Aedu, comprised the adjacent territory of (Noviodunum) Nevers. See d'Anville, A. de Ancanee, Grable. v. et vi. The two provinces of Autun and Nevers are afterwards united, the former of 616, and the latter of 160, parishes. The registers of births, taken during the year 1756, were estimated at 8,112, the province of Burgundy, and multiplied by the moderate proportion of 25, (see Messance Recherches sur la Population, p. 142.) may authorize us to assign an average number of 669 persons for each parish, who being again multiplied by the 750 parishes of the dioceses of Nevers and Chalonais, and Autun, which comprised the whole extent of a country which was once possessed by the Aedu.

9 We might derive an additional supply of 107,750 inhabitants from the dioceses of Chalonais, (Callionum) and of Magon (Maison); since they contain, the one 200, and the other 269, parishes. This number is drawn from d'Anville's map of France, which exhibits the dioceses of the Church of France under the title of Nevers, and Magon, which have been severally made into dioceses, of the extent of five and six parishes in the province of the Nevers, and 15 persons of both sexes and of every age, of the province of Magon. In the province of the Nevers, the clergy are not numerous. (Panégyri. Vet. vii. 3.) which very fully detracts from the value of the information of Constantine, on the internal banks of the navigable Seine.

The decline and fall

Chapter XVIII.

Character of Constantine.—Gothic war.—Death of Constantine.—Division of the empire among his three sons.—Persecution war.—Tragic deaths of Constantine the younger and Constantius.— usurpation of Magnentius.—Civil war.—Victory of Constantius.

The character of the prince who reigned during such important changes into the civil and religious constitution of his country, has fixed the attention, divided the opinion of mankind, and the warmth of disapprobation, of men who agreed in the useful zeal of the Christians, the deliverer of the church has been decorated with every attribute of a hero, and even of a saint; while the discontents of the vanquished party has compared Constantine to the most abhorred of those tyrants, who, by their vice and weakness, disdained the imperial purple. The same passions have in some degree been perpetuated to succeeding generations, and the character of Constantine is considered, even in the present age, as an object either of satire or of panegyric. By the impartial union of these defects which are confessed by his warmest admirers, and of those virtues which are acknowledged by his most implacable enemies, we might hope to delineate a just portrait of that extraordinary man, which the truth and candour of history should adopt without a blush. But it would soon appear that the vain attempt to blend such discordant colours, and to reconcile such inconsistencies, must produce a figure

2 The great concordats, in his judicious advice to his son, (Claudian in iv. Consulat. Honsir, 521. 44.) distinguishes the station of a Roman prince from that of a Persian monarch. Virtue was not required for his succession. But the life and manners of the latter were the greatest support for the other.

monstrous rather than human, unless it is viewed in its proper and distinct lights, by a careful separation of the different periods of the reign of Constantine.

His virtues. Constantine had been enriched by nature with her choicest endowments. His stature was lofty, his countenance majestic, his deportment graceful; his strength and activity were displayed in every manly exercise, and from his earliest youth, to a very advanced season of life, he preserved the vigour of his constitution by a strict adherence to the domestic virtues of chastity and temperance. He delighted in the social intercourse of familiar conversation; and though he might sometimes indulge his disposition to rafferty and idleness reserved than was required by the severe dignity of his character, which could never lose its value to public utility, he was continually sought after as a master, and all who approached him,

The sincerity of his friendship has been suspected; yet he showed, on some occasions, that he was not incapable of a warm and lasting attachment. The disadvantage of an illiterate education had not prevented him from forming a just estimate of the value of learning; and the arts and sciences derived some encouragement from the munificent protection of Constantine. In the despatch of business, his diligence was indefatigable; and the active powers of his mind were almost continually exercised in reading, writing, or meditating. In his administration, indeed, as in his private life, his masterly success gained the hearts of all who approached him. The warmth and sincerity of his justice, the justness of his indignation, and the inflexibility of his resolution, were the causes of his being esteemed the honours of his virtues.

The virtues of Constantine are collected for the most part from Eutropius, and the younger Victor, two sincere pagans, who wrote without the present of a respect, or a suspicion, of the emperor's personal character. Julian, acknowledge his personal courage and military achievements.

His enemy's. His enemies with terror, degenerating into a cruel and225 absolute monarch, corrupted by his fortune, or raised by conquest above the necessity of dissimulation. The reign of this monarch, being the last fourteen years of his reign, A. D. 323-337, was a period of apparent splendour rather than of real prosperity; and the old age of Constantine was disgraced by the opposite yet reconcileable vices of rapaciousness and prodigality. The accumulated treasures found in the palaces of Maxentius and Licinius, were lavishly consumed; the various innovations introduced by the conqueror, were attended with an increasing expense; the cost of his buildings, his court, and his festivals, required an immediate and plentiful supply; and the oppression of the people was the only fund. His unworthy favourites, enriched by the boundless liberality of their master, usurped with impunity the privilege of rapine and corruption. A secret but universal decay was felt in every part of the public administration, and the emperor himself, though he still retained the obedience, gradually lost the esteem, of his subjects. The dress and manners, which, towards the decline of life, he chose to affect, served only to degrade him in the eyes of mankind. The Asiatic pomp, which had been adopted by the pride of Diocletian, assumed an air of softness and effeminacy in the person of Constantine, in order to support the false hair of various colours, laboriously arranged by the skilful artists of the times; a diadem of a new and more expensive fashion; a profusion of gems and pearls, of collars and bracelets, and a variegated flowing robe of silk, most curiously embroidered with flowers of gold. In such apparel, scarcely to be excused by the youth and folly of Elagabalus, we are at a loss to discover the wisdom of an aged monarch, and the simplicity of a Roman veteran. A mind thus relaxed by prosperity and indulgence, was incapable of rising to that magnanimity which disdains suspicion, and dares to forgive. The deaths of Maximian and Licinius may perhaps be justified by the maxims of policy, as they are taught in the schools of tyrants; but an impartial narrative of the executions, or rather murders which sullied the declining age of Constantine, will suggest to our most candid thoughts, the idea that in the sacrifice of the lives of these men, the laws of justice, and the feelings of nature, to the dictates either of his passions or of his interest.

The same fortune which so invariably followed the standard of Constantine, his family, seemed to secure the hopes and comforts of his domestic life. Those who had been the longest and most prosperous reigns, Augustus, Trajan, and Diocletian, had been disappointed of posterity; and the frequent revolutions had never allowed sufficient time for any imperial family to grow up and multiply under the shade of the purple. But the royalty of the Flavian line, which had been first established by the Gothic Claudius, descended through several generations; and Constantine himself derived from his royal father the hereditary honours which he transmitted to his children. The emperor had been twice married. Minervina, the obscure but lawful object of his youthful attachment, had left him only one son, Julian, Orat. i. p. 6. In a flattering discourse pronounced before the emperor Conslantine, and Csesar, p. 293. Zonaras, p. 29. The stately buildings of Constantinople e., may be quoted as a lasting and unexceptionable proof of the profuseness of their founder.

The impartial Arianism deserves all our confidence. Proximorum forces into the lap of the emperor. Eusebius himself confesses the abuse; (Vit. Constantin. lib. iv. c. 29.) and some of the imperial laws feebly point out the remedy. See above, p. 343.

Julian, in the Csesars, attempts to ridicule his uncle. His authority, though not equalled, is compared to that of the best; and Suchanek, with the authority of medals, (see Commentaries, p. 156, 299, 349.) Eusebius (Orat. c. 5.) alleges, that Constantine was the first and the only one who extinguished the(value unknown), could never want an excuse.

Zonaras and Zonaras agree in representing Minervina as the concomite of Constantine; but Ducange has very gallantly rescued who was called Crispus. By Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, he had three daughters and three sons known by the bilined names of Constantine, Constantius, and Constans. The unambitious brothers of the great Constantine, Julius Constantius, Dalmatus, and Hannibalianus, were permitted to enjoy the most honourable rank, and the most alluring fortune, that could be consistent with their humble situation, by the youngest of the three lived without a name, and died without posterity. His two elder brothers obtained in marriage the daughters of wealthy senators, and propagated new branches of the imperial race. Gallus and Julian afterwards became the sons-in-law of Costantine the Patriarch. The two sons of Dalmatus, who had been decorated with the vain title of Caesar, were named Dalmatus and Hannibalianus. The two sisters of the great Constantine, Anastasia and Eutropia, were bestowed on Optatus and Nepotianus, two senators of noble birth, of consular dignity. His third sister, Constantia, was distinguished by her pre-eminence of greatness and of misery. She remained the widow of the vanquished Licinius; and it was by her entreaties, that an innocent boy, the offspring of their marriage, preserved for a time the title of Caesar, and excited a premature hope of the succession. Besides the females, and the allies of the Flavian house, ten or twelve males, to whom the language of modern courts would apply the title of prince of the blood, seemed, according to the order of their birth, to be destined either to inherit or to support the throne of Constantine. As it was in less than thirty years, this numerous and increasing family was reduced to the persons of Constantine and Julian, who alone had survived a series of crimes and calamities, such as the tragic poeties have deposed in the devoted lines of Pelops and of Cadmus.

Crispus, the eldest son of Constantine, and the presumptive heir of the empire, is represented by imperial historians as an amiable and accomplished youth. The care of his education, or at least of his studies, was intrusted to Lactantius, the most eloquent of the Christian; a prince admirably qualified to form the taste, and to excite the virtues, of his illustrious disciple. At the age of seventeen, Crispus was invested with the title of Caesar, and the administration of the Gallic province, where the inroads of the Germans gave him an early occasion of so far realizing his father's valour, that the civil war which broke out soon afterwards, the father and son divided their powers; and this history has already celebrated the valour as well as conduct displayed by the latter, in forcing the straits of the Hellespont, justly deserving of mention with the superior fleet of Licinius. This naval victory contributed to determine the event of the war; and the names of Constantine and of Crispus were united in the joyful acclamations of their eastern subjects: who loudly proclaimed, that the world had been subdued, and was now governed, by an emperor endowed with every virtue; and by his illustrious son, a prince beloved of heaven, and the lively image of his father's perfections. The public favour, which seldom accompanies old age, diffused its lustre over the youth of Crispus. He sustained the esteem, and he engaged the affections, of the court, the army, and the people; and he experienced the merit of a reigning monarch is acknowledged by his subjects with repletion, and frequently with partial and discontented murmurs; while, from the opening virtues of his successor, they fondly conceive the most unbounded hopes of private as well as public felicity.

This dangerous popularity soon ex-Jenner of Con- cited the attention of Constantine, who, naming A.D. 234. both as a father and as a king, was im- Oct. 30. patient of an equal. Instead of attempting to secure his family by the illegitimate enjoyment of con- fidence and gratitude, he resolved to prevent the mis-chiefs which might be apprehended from dissatisfied ambition. Crispus soon had reason to complain, that while his infant brother Constantius was sent, with the title of Caesar, to the department of the Gallic provinces, Joel, a prince of two years, who had performed such recent and signal services, instead of being raised to the superior rank of Augustus, was confined almost a prisoner to his father's court; and exposed, without power or defence, to every calamity which the malice of his enemies could suggest. Under such painful circumstances, the royal youth might not always be able to compose his behaviour, or suppress his discontent; and we may be as- sured, that he was encompassed by a train of indirect or pernicious followers, who assiduously studied to in- trigue his father's death; and who, perhaps, were instructed to betray, the unguarded watchfulness of his resentment. An edict of Constantine, published about this time, A.D. 235, Oct. I. manifestly indicates his real or affected suspicions, that a secret conspiracy had been formed against his person and government. By all the allure- ments of the court, and by every degree to accuse without exception his magis- trates or ministers, his friends or his most intimate favourites, protesting, with a solemn assecration, that he himself will listen to the charge, that he himself will render an account of his actions; and concluding with a prayer, which discovers some apprehension of danger, that the providence of the Supreme Being may still continue to protect the safety of the emperor and of the empire.

The informers, who complied so liberally an invitation, were sufficiently accustomed in the arts of courts to select the friends and adherents of Crispus as the guilty persons; nor is there any reason to distrust the veracity of the emperor, who had promised an ample measure of revenge and punishment. The policy of Constantine, who had himself preserved the provinces of Egypt by the indescribable advantages of regard and confidence towards a son, whom he began to consider as his most irreconcilable en- my. Medals were struck with the customary vows for the long and auspicious reign of the young Caesar; and as the people, who were not admitted into the secrets of the delusive plot, loved his virtues, and respected his dignity, a poet who solicits his recall from exile, adores with equal devotion the majesty of the father and that of the son. The time was now arrived for celebrating the august ceremony of the twentieth year of the reign of Constantine; and the emperor, for that purpose, removed his court from Nicomedea to Rome, where the most splendid preparations had been made for his reception. Every eye, and every tongue, affected to express their sense of the general happiness, and the veil of ceremony and dissimulation was drawn for a while over the darkest designs of revenge and murder. In the midst of the festival, the unfortunate Crispus was apprehended by order of the emperor, who laid aside the tenderness of a father without assuming the equity of a judge. The examination was short and private; but as it was thought decent to provide for the defense of the captive, the emperor, at the request of the Roman people, was sent to a strong guard to Pola, in Istria, where, soon afterwards, he was put to death, either by the hand of the executioner, or by the more gentle operation of poison. The Caesar Licius, a youth of amiable manners, was involved in the plot and perished on the same day. Formidable as the enterprise was, Constantine was unmoved by the prayers and tears of his favourite sister, pleading for the life of a son, whose rank was his only crime, and whose loss she did not long survive. The story of these unhappy princes, the nature and evidence of their guilt, the forms of their trial, and the circumstances of their death, were buried in the mists of suspicion; and the courtly bishop, who has celebrated in an elaborate work the virtues and piety of his hero, observes a prudent silence on the subject of these tragic events. Such haughty contempt for the opinion of mankind, whilst it imprints an indelible stain on the memory of Constantine, and prevents the shedding of tears on his name, has painted him one of the greatest monarchs of the present age. The Caesar Peter, in the full possession of despotic power, submitted to the judgment of Russia, of Europe, and of posterity, the reasons which had compelled him to subscribe the condemnation of a criminal, or at least of an outlaw.

The innocence of Crispus was so universally acknowledged, that the modern Greeks, who adore the memory of their founder, are reduced to palliate the guilt of a parricide, which the common feelings of human nature forbade them to justify. They pretend that as soon as the afflicter of the father of Constantine was unmoved by the prayers and tears of his favourite sister, pleading for the life of a son, whose rank was his only crime, and whose loss she did not long survive. The story of these unhappy princes, the nature and evidence of their guilt, the forms of their trial, and the circumstances of their death, were buried in the mists of suspicion; and the courtly bishop, who has celebrated in an elaborate work the virtues and piety of his hero, observes a prudent silence on the subject of these tragic events. Such haughty contempt for the opinion of mankind, whilst it imprints an indelible stain on the memory of Constantine, and prevents the shedding of tears on his name, has painted him one of the greatest monarchs of the present age. The Caesar Peter, in the full possession of despotic power, submitted to the judgment of Russia, of Europe, and of posterity, the reasons which had compelled him to subscribe the condemnation of a criminal, or at least of an outlaw.

By the death of Crispus, the inheritance of the empire seemed to devolve on the three sons of Fausta, who have been already mentioned under the names of Constantine, of Constantius, and of Constans. These young princes were successively invested with the title of Caesar. The last two of them may be referred to the tenth, the twentieth, and the thirteenth years of the reign of their father. This conduct, though it tended to multiply the future masters of the Roman world, might be excused, by the partiality of paternal affection; but it is not so easy to understand the motive with which the new emperors were furnished, when the safety both of his family and of his people, by the unnecessary elevation of his two nephews, Dalmatius and Hannibalianus. The former was raised, by the title of Caesar, to an equality with his cousins. In favour of the latter, Constantine invented the new and singular appellation of nobilitas: to which he annexed the flattering distinction of a robe of purple and gold. But of the whole series of Roman princes in any age of the empire, Hannibalianus alone was distinguished by the title of King; a name which the subjects of Tiberius who have derived him, the Britons and the existing nation of capacious tyranny. The use of such a title, even as it appears under the reign of Constantine, is a strange and unexpected fact, which can scarcely be admitted on the joint authority of imperial medals and contemporary writers.

The exercise of the body prepared them for the fatigues of war, and the duties of active life. Those who occasionally mention the education or talents of Constantine, allude to his skill in gymnastics, his industry in leaping and running; that he was a dexterous archer, a skilful horseman, and a master of all the different weapons used in the service either of the cavalry or of the infantry. The same assiduous cultivation was bestowed, though not perhaps with equal success, to improve the mind of the sons of the emperor; of Constans. The most celebrated professors of the Christian faith, of the Grecian philosophy, and of the Roman jurisprudence, were invited by the liberality of the emperor, who reserved for himself the important task of instructing the royal youths in the science of government, and the knowledge of mankind. But the genius of Constantine himself had been formed by adversity and experience. In the free intercourse of private life, and amidst the dangers of the court of Galerius, he had learned to command his own passions, to conquer those of his dependants, and to defend himself for his present safety and future greatness on the prudence and firmness of his personal conduct. His destined successors had the misfortune of being born and educated in the imperial purple. Incessantly surrounded with a train of flatterers, they passed their youth in the enjoyment of luxury, and the expectation of a throne; nor would the dignity of their rank permit them to descend from that elevated station from whence the various characters of human nature appear to wear a smooth and uniform aspect. The indulgence of Constantine admitted them, at a very tender age, to share the administration of the empire; and they studied the art of reigning, at the expense of the people intrusted to their care. The younger Constantine was appointed to hold his court in Gaul; and his brother Constantius exchanged that department, the ancient patrimony of their father, for the more opulent, more easy, and less dangerous of their brothers. The provinces of the eastern Illyricum, and Africa, were accustomed to revere Constans, the third of his sons, as the representative of the great Constantine. He fixed Dalmatius on the Gothic frontier, to which he annexed the government of Thrace, Macedonia, and Greece. The title of Caesar was conferred on his son, Constans, who was destined to succeed his father; and the provinces of Pontus, Cappadocia, and the Lesser Armenia, were destined to form the extent of his new kingdom. For each of these princes a suitable establishment was provided. A just proportion of guards, of legions, and of auxiliaries, was allotted for their respective dignity and defence. The ministers and generals, who were placed about their persons, were such as Constantine could trust to assist, and even to control, these youthful sovereigns in the exercise of their delegated power. As they advanced in years and in years, this authority were insensibly enlarged: but the emperor always retained for himself the title of Augustus: and while he showed the Caesars to the armies and provinces, he maintained every part of the empire in equal obedience to its supreme head. The tranquillity of the last fourteen years of the reign of Constantine was scarcely marred by a tempestuous insurrection of a camel-driver in the island of Cyprus, or by the active part which the policy of Constantine engaged him to assume in the wars of the Goths and Sarmanians.

Among the different branches of the Manners of the Roman empire, there is one which is very remarkable; and when they are driven to the verge of ruin, as they seem to unite the manners of the Asiatic barbarians with the figure and complexion of the ancient inhabitants of Europe. According to the various accidents of peace and war, of alliance or conquest, the Sarmanians were sometimes confined to the banks of the Danube; they sometimes spread themselves over the immense plains which lie between the Vistula and the Volga. The care of their numerous flocks and herds, the pursuit of game, and the exercise of war, or rather of rapine, directed the vagrant motions of the Sarmanians. The movable camps or cities, the ordinary residence of their wives and children, consisted only of large waggons drawn by oxen, and covered in the form of tents. The military strength of the nation was composed of cavalry; and the custom of their warriors, to lead in the way of their families, and to keep their horses, enabled them to advance and to retreat with a rapid diligence, which surprised the security, and eluded the pursuit, of a distant enemy. Their poverty of iron prompted their rude industry to invent a sort of cuirass, which was capable of resisting a sword or javelin, though it was formed only of horses' hoofs, cut in thin and polished slices, carefully laid over each other in the manner of scales or feathers, and strongly sewed upon an under garment of coarse linen. The offensive arms of the Sarmatians were short daggers, long lances, and a weighty bow with a quiver of arrows. These were reduced to the necessity of employing fish-bones for the points of their weapons; but the custom of dipping them in a venomous liquor, that poisoned the wounds which they inflicted, is alone sufficient to prove the most savage manners; since a people impressed with a theory for the sake of which they abjured their native arts, of which they were skilled in the arts of war, would have disdained so impotent a resource.4 Whenever these barbarians issued from their deserts in quest of prey, their shaggy beards, uncombed locks, the furs with which they were covered from head to foot, and the large size of their shields, which impressed the innate cruelty of their minds, inspired the more civilised provincials of Rome with horror and dismay.

Their settlement near the Danube. In the enjoyment of fame and luxury, it was condemned to an hopeless exile on the frozen banks of the Danube, where he was exposed, almost without defence, to the fury of these monsters of the desert, with whose stern spirits he feared that his gentle shade might hereafter be confounded. In his pathetic, but sometimes unmanly, lamentations, he describes in the most lively colours the dress and manner of these Sarmatians, who were associated for the purposes of destruction; and from the accounts of history, there is some reason to believe that these Sarmatians were the Jazyges, one of the most numerous and warlike tribes of the nation. The allurements of plenty engaged them to seek a permanent establishment on the frontiers of the empire. Soon after the reign of Augustus, they obliged the Dacians, who subsisted by fishing on the banks of the river Teys or Tibiscus, to retire into the hilly country, and to abandon to the victorious Sarmatians the fertile plains of the Upper Hungary, which are bounded by the course of the Danube and the semi-circular extension of the Transylvanian forests. In this advantageous position, they watched or suspended the moment of attack, as they were provoked by injuries or appeased by presents; they gradually acquired the skill of using more dangerous weapons; and although the Sarmatians did not illustrate their name by any memorable exploits, they occasionally assisted their eastern and western neighbours, the Goths and the Germans, with a formidable body of cavalry. They lived under the irregular aristocracy of their chieftains; but after they had received into their bosom the fugitive Vandals, who yielded to the pressure of the Gothic power, they were converted to the use of poison, and had spread over both worlds, never preserved a savage tribe from the inroads of a disciplining enemy.

The nine books of Poetical Epistles, which Ovid composed during the seven first years of his melancholy exile, possess, besides the merit of elegance, a double value. They exhibit a picture of the human mind under very singular circumstances; and they contain many passages which no Roman, no Ovid, can have an opportunity of making. Every circumstance which tends to illustrate the history of the barbarians, has been drawn together by his art in the substance of his poems. The name of the Danube, for example, is, I Eve, tom. iv. c. xvi. p. 596—317.

The Sarmatians were settled on the banks of the Puthius or Tisibus, when Pliny, in the year 79, published his Natural History. See l. i. c. 25. In the time of Strabo and Ovid, sixty or seventy years after the critical battles, they inhabited the coast of the Danube, along the coast of the Euxine.

This motive of enmity must have made the Gothic War inflamed the subjects of Contantine, which perpertually arise on the confines of warlike and independent nations. The Vandal princes were stimulated by fear and revenge; the Gothic kings aspired to extend their dominion from the Euxine to the frontiers of Germany; and the waters of the Maros, a small river which flows into the Danube, was fed with the blood of the contending barbarians. After some experience of the superior strength and numbers of their adversaries, the Sarmatians protected the position of the Roman monarch, who beheld with pleasure the discord of the nations, but who was justly alarmed by the progress of the Gothic arms. As soon as Constantine had declared himself in favour of the weaker party, the haughty Alaric, king of the Goths, instead of expecting the attack of the legions, boldly passed the Danube, and spread terror and devastation through the province of Mæsia. To oppose the in the destruction host, the aged emperor took the field in person; but on this occasion either his conduct or his fortune betrayed the glory which he had acquired in so many foreign and domestic wars. He had the mortification of seeing his troops fly before an inconsiderable detachment of the barbarians, who pursued them with the vigour of the Gothic arms. As soon as Constantine had obliged him to consult his safety by a precipitate and ignominious retreat. The event of a second and more successful action retrieved the honour of the Roman name; and the powers of art and discipline prevailed, after an obstinate contest, over the efforts of irregular valor. The broken army of the Goths abandoned the field of battle, the wasted province, and the passage of the Danube: and although the eldest of the sons of Constantine was permitted to supply the place of his father, the merit of the victory, which diffused universal joy, was ascribed to the auspicious counselors of the emperor against himself.

He contributed at least to improve this advantage, by his negotiations with the free and warlike people of Chersonesus,5 whose capital, situate on the western coast of the Tauric or Crimian peninsula, still retained some vestiges of a Grecian colony, and was governed by a perpetual magistrate, assisted by a council of senators, emphatically styled the Fathers of the City. The Chersonites were animated against the Goths, by the memory of the wars, which, in the preceding century, they had maintained with unequal forces against the invaders of their country. They gave them, in this event, the powerful assistance of their riches and commerce; as they were supplied from the provinces of Asia with corn and manufactures, which they purchased with their only productions, salt, wax, and hides. Obedient to the requisition of Constantine, they prepared, under the conduct of their magistrate Diogenes, a considerable army, of which the principal strength consisted in crossbows and military chariots. The speedy march and intrepid attack of the 5 In the Recreences sur les Amériques, tom. ii. p. 237—237, is a very curious dissertation on poisoned darts. The venom was commonly extracted from the vegetable rein: but that employed by the Sarmatians appears to have been drawn from the viper, and a mixture of human blood. The use of poison, which had spread over both nations, never preserved a savage tribe from the attacks of a disciplining enemy.

Chersonesites, by diverting the attention of the Goths, assisted the operations of the imperial generals. The Goths, vanquished on every side, were driven into the mountains, where, in the course of a severe campaign, above an hundred thousand were computed to have perished by cold and hunger. Peace was at length granted in 382, the condition of the inhabitants of Alaric was accepted as the most valuable hostage; and Constantine endeavored to convince their chiefs, by a liberal distribution of honours and rewards, how far the friendship of the Romans was preferable to their enmity. In the expressions of his gratitude toward them, the emperor was so liberal, that he was described as being more magnanimous. The pride of the nation was gratified by the splendid and almost royal decorations bestowed on their magistrates and his successors. A perpetual exemption from all duties was stipulated for their vessels which traded to the coasts of the Black Sea. A regular subsidy was promised, of iron, corn, oil, and every supply which could be useful either in peace or war. But it was thought that the Sarmatians were sufficiently rewarded by their deliverance from impending ruin; and the emperor, perhaps with too single a view of the expenses of the war, prevented the customary gratifications which were allowed to that turbulent nation.

Exasperated by this apparent neglect, the Sarmatians soon forgot, with the levity of barbarians, the services which they had so lately received of their benefactors which now still threatened their safety. Their inroads on the territory of the empire provoked the indignation of Constantine to leave them to their fate; and he no longer opposed the ambition of Geberic, a renowned warner, who had recently ascended the Gothic throne. Wisely, the emperor, whilst he permitted them to defend his dominions with undaunted courage, was vanquished and slain in a decisive battle, which swept away the flower of the Sarmatian youth. The remainder of the nation embraced the desolate expedition of arming their slaves, a hard race of hunters and herdsmen, to share the terrors which they reaped, and expelled the invader from their confines. But they soon discovered that they had exchanged a foreign for a domestic enemy, more dangerous and more implacable. Enraged by their former servitude, and desirous of their present glory, the slaves, under the name of Limigantes, claimed and usurped the possession of the country which they had saved. Their masters, unable to withstand the agitated fury of the populace, preferred the hardships of exile, to the tyranny of their servants. Some of the fugitive Sar- matians elected a less ignominious deposition, under the hostile standard of the Goths. A more numerous band retired beyond the Carpathian mountains among the Quadi, their German allies, and were easily admitted to share a superfluous waste of uncultivated land. But the far greater part of the distressed nation turned their eyes towards the fruitful provinces of Rome. Imploring the protection and forgiveness of the emperor, they solemnly promised, as subjects in peace, and as soldiers in war, the most inviolable fidelity to the empire which they so gratefully receive them into its bosom. According to the maxims adopted by Probus and his successors, the treatment of barbarous colonies were eagerly accepted; and a competent portion of lands in the provinces of Pannonia, Thrace, Macedonia, and Italy, were immediately assigned for the habitation and subsistence of three hundred thousand Sarmatians.1

By chastising the pride of the Goths, Death and funeral of Constantine and by accepting the homage of a super A.D.335, July 1. nation, Constantine asserted the majesty of the Roman empire; and the ambassadors, who followed him to the court of the king of India, congratulated the peace and prosperity of his government. If he reckoned, among the favours of fortune, the death of his eldest son, of his nephew, and perhaps of his wife, he enjoyed an uninterrupted flow of private as well as public felicity, till the third year of his reign, when the former was the cause of his predecessors, since Augustus, had been permitted to celebrate. Constantine survived that solemn festival about ten months; and, at the mature age of sixty-four, after a short illness, he ended his memorable life, at the palace of Partition, in the suburbs A.D. 337, May of Nicomedia, when he had retired for the benefit of the air, and with the hope of recruiting his exhausted strength by the use of the warm baths. The excessive demonstrations of grief, or at least of mourning, suppressed whatever had been practiced on the occasion. Notwithstanding the claims of the senate and people of ancient Rome, the corpse of the deceased emperor, according to his last request, was transported to the city, which was destined to preserve the name and memory of its founder. The body of Constantine, adorned with the vain symbols of friendship, was placed on a golden bed in one of the apartments of the palace, which for that purpose had been splendidly furnished and illuminated. The forms of the court were strictly maintained. Every day at the appointed hours, the principal officers of the state, the army, and the populace, would approach the tomb of the emperor, and, saluting him under the protection of his successors, with bended knees and a composed countenance, offered their respectful homage as seriously as if he had been still alive. From motives of policy, this theatrical representation was for some time continued; nor could flattery neglect the opportunity of remarking that Constantine alone, by the peculiar indulgence of heaven, had reigned after his death.2

But this reign could subsist only in Fractions of the empty pageantry; and it was soon dis- covered that the will of the most absolute monarch is seldom obeyed. when his subjects assert their freedom, his name is that of a mere title, or of a pretender to the hereditary re- sentment. The same ministers and generals, who bowed with such reverential awe before the inanimate corpse of their deceased sovereign, were engaged in secret consultations to exclude his two nephews, Dal- matius and Ambrianus, from the share which had assigned them in the succession of the empire. We are too imperfectly acquainted with the court of Constantine to form any judgment of the real motives which influenced the leaders of the conspiracy; unless we should suppose that they were actuated by a spirit of jealousy and revenge against the praiseworthy ambition of a great favourite, who had long directed the counsels and abused the confidence of the late emperor. The arguments, by which they solicited the concurrence of the soldiers and people, are of a more obvious nature; and they might with decency be stated on the subject that the children of Constantine, the danger of multiplying the number of sovereigns, and the impending mischief which threatened the republic, from the discord of so many rival princes, who were not connected by the tender sympathy of fraternal affection. The intrigue was conducted with zeal and secrecy, till a loud and unanimous declaration was procured from the troops, that they would suffer none, even the gayest, to derange their imminent monoply of the empire. The younger Dalmatius, who was united with his collateral relations by the ties of friendship and interest, is allowed to have inherited a considerable share of the abilities of the great Constantine: but, on this occasion, he does not appear to have exercised any measures for supporting the arms of his house, the just claims which himself and his royal brother derived from the liberality of their uncle. Astonished and overwhelmed by the tide of popular fury, they seem to have remained without the power of flight or of resistance, in the hands of their inevitable enemy. What reasons whatever might have been alleged by these unfortunate princes to defend their life and honour against so incredible an accusation, they were silenced by the furious clamours of the soldiers, who declared themselves, at once, their enemies, their judges, and their executioners. The spirit, and even the forms, of the imperial line were subjected to a most promiscuous massacre; which involved the two uncles of Constantius, seven of his cousins, of whom Dalmatius and Hannibalianus were the most illustrious, the patrician Optatus, who had married a sister of the late emperor, and the præfect Ablavius, whose power and riches had been obtained with some difficulty. If it were necessary to aggravate the horrors of this bloody scene, we might add, that Constantius himself had espoused the daughter of his uncle Julian, and that he had bestowed his sister in marriage on his cousin Hannibalianus. These alliances, which the policy of Constantius, regardless of the public good, had formed between the branches of the imperial house, served only to convince mankind, that these princes were as cold to the endearments of conjugal affection, as they were insensible to the ties of consanguinity, and the moving entreaties of youth and innocence. But one of the youngest descendants of Julian alone, the two youngest children of Julius Constantius, were saved from the hands of the assassins, till their rage, satiated with slaughter, had in some measure subsided. The emperor Constantius, who, in the absence of his brothers, was the most obnoxious object of the popular fury, discovered on several occasions, a faint and transient remorse for those cruelties which the perfidious cushions of his ministers, and the irresistible violence of the troops, had extorted from his unexperienced youth.4

The massacre of the Flavian race was succeeded by a period of intercourse and connection; the flavian princes; which was ratified in a personal interview of the three brothers. Constantius, the eldest of the Caesars, obtained, with a certain pre-eminence of rank, the possession of the new capital, which bore his own name and that of his house. Three and thirty years of the efflux of the provinces; and Constantius was acknowledged as the lawful sovereign of Italy, Africa, and the western Illyricum. The armies submitted to their hereditary right; and they condescended, after some delay, to accept from the Roman senate the title of caesar. Under the reign of Constantius, the eldest of these princes, was twenty-one, the second twenty, and the third only seventeen, years of age.5

While the martial nations of Europe, Sapor king of Persia, his warriors, and the Constantinian troops of Asia, was left to sustain the weight of the Persian war. At the decease of Constantius, the throne of the east was filled by Sapor, son of Hormoz, or Hormisdas, and grandson of Nares, who, after the victory of Galerius, had humbly confessed the superiority of the Roman power. Although Sapor was in the thirty year of his long reign, he was still in the vigour of youth, as the date of his accession, by a very strange fatality, had preceded that of his birth. The wife of Hormoz remained pregnant at the time of her husband's death; and the uncertainty of the sex, as well as of the date of her confinement, excited the jealousy of the great princes of the house of Sassan. The apprehensions of civil war were at length removed, by the positive assurance of the Magi, that the widow of Hormoz had conceived, and would safely produce a son. Obedient to the voice of superstition, the Persians preclude the prejudices of the Romans; who still considered the marriages of cousins germans as a species of imperfect incest; (Augustin de Civitate Dei, xx. 63) and Julian, whose mind was biased by surpared, without delay, the ceremony of his coronation. A royal bed, on which the queen lay in state, was exhibited in the midst of the palace; the dinem was prepared to receive the children whom the astrologers had foretold to be the future heir of Artaxerxes, and the prostrate satraps adored the majesty of their invisible and insensible sovereign. If any credit can be given to this marvellous tale, which seems however to be countenanced by the manners of the people, and by the extraordinary formation of his reign, the most admired was not only the fortune, but the genius, of Sapor. In the soft questered education of a Persian haram, the royal youth could discover the importance of exercising the vigour of his mind and body; and, by his personal merit, deserved a throne, on which he had been seated, without consulting the oracles, or embroiling the future of the dutes and temp-}

State of Mesopotamia and Armenia

The ambition of the Persian, to whom his enemies ascribe the virtues of a soldier and a statesman, was animated by the desire of revenging the disgrace of his fathers, and of wresting from the hands of the Romans the living princes beyond the Tigris. The military fame of Constantine, and the real or apparent strength of his government, suspended the attack; and while the hostile conduct of Sapor provoked the resentment, his artful negotiations amused the patience, of the imperial encampment, and the sacrifice of the rival firmness of the Persians, the title of Dourmanoff, or protector of the nation.1

The irregular incursions of the light troops alternately spread terror and devastation beyond the Tigris and beyond the Euphrates, from the gates of Ctesiphon to those of Antioch; and this active service was performed by the Arabs of the desert, who were divided in their interest and affection, some of their independent chiefs being enlisted in the party of Sapor, whilst others had engaged their doubtful fidelity to the emperor.2 The more grave and important operations of the war were conducted with equal vigour; and the armies of Rome and of Persia were sometimes driven to each other in bloody fields, in two of which Constantius himself commanded in person.3 The event of the day was commonly adverse to the Romans, but in the battle of Singara, their impudent valor4 Battle of Singara, had almost achieved a signal and decisive victory. The stationary troops of Singara retired on the approach of Sapor, who passed the Tigris over three bridges, and occupied near the village of Illeih an advantageous camp, which, by the labour of his

1 Apollinius, who lived in the sixth century, is the author of this statement. He quotes the speech of Tiridates, the son of Artaxerxes, and the historian of his reign, that the future successor would be a foreigner. The information from some extracts of the Persian Chronicles, obtained and translated by the late Mr. Tillet, is not less consistent with the tradition. The declaration of the mother of Sapor is likewise mentioned by Suidas, (Tar. p. 116.) and D'Herbelot, (Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 763.)

numerous pioneers, he surrounded in one day with a deep ditch, and a lofty rampart. His formidable host, when it was drawn out in order of battle, covered the banks of the river, the adjacent heights, and the whole extent of a plain of above twelve miles, which separated the two armies. Both were alike impatient to engage; but the barbarians, after a slight resistance, fled in disorder; unable to resist, or desirous to weary, the strength of the heavy legions, who, fasting with heat and thirst, pursued them across the plain, and cut in pieces a line of cavalry, clothed in complete armour, which had been posted behind the gates of the city, in order to protect their retreat. Constantius, who was hurried along in the pursuit, attempted, without effect, to restrain the ardour of his troops, by representing to them the dangers of the approaching night, and the certainty of completing their successes with the return of day. As they depended much more on their own valour than on the experience or the abilities of their chief, they silenced by their clamours his timid remonstrances; and rushing with fury to the charge, filled up the ditch, broke down the rampart, and dispersed themselves through the tents to recruit their exhausted strength, and to enjoy the rich harvest of their labours. But the prudent Sapor had watched the moment of victory. His army, of which the greater part, securely posted on the heights, had been spectators of the action, advanced in silence, and under the shadow of night; and the Persians, gladdened by the illumination of the camp, poured a shower of darts upon the combatants and licentious crowd. The sincerity of history declares, that the Romans were vanquished with a dreadful slaughter, and that the flying remnant of the legions was exposed to the most intolerable hardships. Even the tenderness of panegyric, confessing that the glory of the emperor was the admiration of the world, and the soldiers, chooses to draw a veil over the circumstances of this melancholy retreat. Yet one of those venal orators, so jealous of the fame of Constantius, relates with amazing coolness an act of such incredible cruelty, as to impair the judgment of posterity, must imprint a far dearer stain on the honour of the imperial name. The son of Sapor, the heir of his crown, had been made a captive in the Persian camp. The unhappy youth, who might have excited the compassion of the most savage enemy, was scourged, tortured, and publicly executed by an order of Sapor. 336.

Whatever advantages might attend the arms of Sapor in the field, though nine repeated victories diffused among the nations the fame of his valour and conduct, he could not hope to succeed in the execution of his designs, while the fortifications of the town and the ramparts, that enclosed the ancient city of Nisibis, remained in the possession of the Romans. In the space of twelve years, Nisibis, which, since the time of Lucullus, had been deservedly esteemed the bulwark of the east, sustained the mem- orable sieges against the power of Sapor; and the three disappointed monarchs, after urging his attacks above sixty, eighty, and an hun- dred days, was thrice repulsed with loss and igno- miny. This large and populous city was situated about two days journey from the Tigris, in the midst of a pleasant and fertile plain at the foot of Mount Musus. A triangle is inscribed between the sides of the town, and the enclosure of the tower walls was de- jected by a deep ditch; and the intrepid assistance of Count Lucilius, and his garrison, was seconded by the desperate courage of the people. The citizens of Nisibis were animated by the exhortations of their bishop, inured to arms by the presence of danger, and convinced of the intentions of Sapor to plant a Persian colony in the Illyrian provinces, to renounce their constant and barbarous captivity. The event of the two former sieges elicited their confidence, and exasperated the haughty spirit of the great king, who advanced a third time towards Nisibis, at the head of the united forces of Persia and India. The ordinary machines, which had been invented for the purpose of capturing the walls, were un- derstood ineffectual by the superior skill of the Romans; and many days had vainly elapsed, when Sapor embraced a resolution worthy of an eastern monarch, who believed that the elements themselves were subject to his power. At the stated season of the melting of the snows in Armenia, the river Mygdonis, which divides the plain and the city of Nisibis, forms, like the Nile, an inundation over the adjacent country. By the labour of the Persians, the river of the country was stopt below the town, and the waters were confined on every side by solid mounds of earth. On this artificial lake, a fleet of arched pontoon bridges, filled with engines which discharged stones of five hundred pounds' weight, advanced in order of battle, and en- gaged, almost upon a level, the troops which defended the ramparts. The irresistible force of the waters was alternately fatal to the contending parties, till at length the Persians, superior to the Romans in the rate of the proportion, were driven from the breaches, and drowned in the unseem holes which had been filled by the rushing waters. The elephants, made furious by their wounds, increased the disorder, and trampled down thousands of the Persian archers. The great king, who, from an exalted throne, beheld the misfortunes of his arms, sounded, with reluctant indignation, the signal of the retreat, and suspended for some hours the prosecution of the attack. But the vigilant citizens improved the opportunity of the night; and the retreat of day discovered a new wall of six feet in height, rising every thousand steps up the slopes. Notwithstanding the disappointment of his hopes, and the loss of more than twenty thousand men, Sapor still pressed the reduction of Nisibis, with an obstinate firmness, which could have yielded only to the necessity of defending the eastern provinces of Persia, and of opposing the invasion of the Persians. Alarmed by this intelligence, he hastily relinquished the siege, and marched with rapid diligence from the banks of the Tigris to those of the Oxus. The danger and difficulties of the Scythian war engaged him soon afterwards to conclude, or at least to observe, a truce with the Roman emperor, which was equally grateful to both princes, and Constantius himself, after the deaths of his two brothers, was involved, by the revolu- tions of the west, in a civil contest, which required and seemed to exceed the most vigorous exertion of his undivided strength.

See Niebuhr, Voyages, tom. i. p. 306—309.

The miracles which Theodoret (ii. ii. c. 30.) ascribes to St. James, Bishop of Edessa, were at least performed in a worthy cause, the defence of his country. He appeared on the walls under the figure of St. James. The emperor ordered an army of grunts to sing the songs of the elephants, and to disconnect the huge edifice which covered the city.

Julian. Orat. i. p. 27. Though Niebuhr (tom. i. p. 367.) allows a very considerable part of this account to Justinian, which he saw a bridge of twelve arches; it is difficult, however, to understand this passage without the assistance of a tedious violet with a mighty river. There are many circumstances obscure, and almost unintelligible, in the description of these stupendous water-works.

We are obliged to Niebuhr, (tom. i. xiii. p. 113.) for this inva- sion of the Mazageta, which is perfectly consistent with the gen- eral state of those memoirs, to which we are darkly led by the broken history of Ammianus.

Vol. I.—2 ▼
After the partition of the empire, three years had scarcely elapsed before the sons of Constantine seemed impatient to assert the rights of inheritance by the choice of an active and vigilant prince, to reward the same virtues which had raised the ancestors of the degenerate Constantians from a private condition to the throne of the world. As soon as the conspiracy was ripe for execution, Marcellinus, under the pretence of celebrating his son's birth-day, gave a splendid entertainment to the illustrious and honourable persons of the court of Gaul, which then resided in the city of Autun. The intemperance of the feast was artfully protracted till a very late hour of the night; and the unsuspecting guests were tempted to indulge themselves in dangerous and guilty freedom of conversation. On a sudden the doors were thrown open, and Magnentius, who had retired for a few moments, returned into the apartment, invested with the dædalian and purple. The conspirators instantly saluted him with the titles of Augustus and emperor. The surprise, the terror, the intoxication, the ambitious hopes, and the mutual ignorance of the rest of the assembly, prompted them to join their voices to the general acclamation. The guards hastened to take the oath of fidelity; the gates were opened; and before the dawn of day, Magnentius became master of the troops and treasure of the palace and city of Autun. By his secrecy and diligence he enticed some hopes of surprising the person of Constantius, who was pursuing in the adjacent forest his favourite amusement of hunting, or perhaps engaged in the furious exercise of a more private and criminal lust. The rapid progress of fame allowed him, however, an instant for flight, though the desertion of his soldiers and subjects deprived him of the power of resistance. Before he could reach a sea-port in Spain, where he had been trusted, by the royal liberality of his predecessor, to reside at the foot of the Pyrenees, by a party of light cavalry, whose chief, regardless of the sanctity of a temple, executed his commission by the murder of the son of Constantine.

As soon as the death of Constantias had removed the last obstacle to Magnentius and Vetranio assumption, the example of the court of Autun was imitated by the provinces of the west. The authority of Magnentius was acknowledged through the whole extent of the two great provinces of Gaul and Italy; and the usurper prepared, not for the defence, but to lay their territory open to the generous discharge of an immense donation, and supply the expenses of a civil war. The martial countries of Illyricum, from the Danube to the extremities of Greece, had long obeyed the government of Vetranio. The provinces of the west, from the Rhine to Mauretania, were governed by a court of manners, and who had acquired some reputation by his experience and services in war. Attached by habit, by duty, and by gratitude, to the house of Constantine, he immediately gave the strongest assurances to the only surviving son of his late master, that he would employ, with unshaken fidelity, his person and his troops, to inflict a just revenge on the traitors of Gaul. But the legions of Vetranio were seduced, rather than provoked, by the example of rebellion; their leader soon betrayed a want of firmness, or a mixture of his manners, and who had obtained some reputation by his experience and services in war. An ancient city had once flourished under the name of Heliopolis (Proponumus Mela, B. S.). The munificence of Constantine gave a new splendour to this city. The lady of his bloodline, and his mother's noble stock, the poet's muse, was the first of a bishop, who long afterwards transferred his residence to Dijon, and the capital of modern Rossillon. See D'Anville Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p. 356. Long description de la France, p. 223, and the Mapa Hispánica, L. i., c. 1. Vetranio assumed the name of Zosimius, or Zosimos (xlii. 10), and was the son of a family of the Montferrat, who could persuade the good people of England, that he, a Persian born by birth, had taken arms to deliver them from foreign favourites.

7 The causes and the events of this civil war are related with much perplexity and confusion. I have therefore followed Zonar's and the younger Victor. The monody (ad calicem Exon. edit. Ruyvenm.) pronounced on the death of Constantine, might have been very instructive; but prudence and false taste engagd the author to preserve himself from such declamation.

8 Quirinus (quiritium) abridges himself of the death of Helena, which might have been very instructive; but prudence and false taste engaged the author to preserve himself from such declamation.

9 Julian, Ora~, i. and ii. Zonar. i. ii. p. 151. Victor in Epitome there is reason to believe that Magnentius was born in one of those provinces which Constantine had established in Gaul. See this History, p. 152. His behaviour may remind us of that of the barbarian, the famer north of the Monfort, who could persuade the good people of England, that he, a Persian born by birth, had taken arms to deliver them from foreign favourites. of Augustus, placed the diadem with her own hands on the head of the Illyrian general; and seemed to expect, from his victory, the accomplishment of those unbounded hopes, of which she had been disappointed by the death of her husband Hannibal. Perhaps it was upon this account that the new emperor formed a necessary, though dishonourable, alliance, with the usurper of the west, whose purple was so recently stained with her brother's blood.

The intelligence of these important events, which so deeply affected the pride and interests of the imperial house, recalled the arms of Constantius from the inglorious prosecution of the Persian war. He recommended the care of the east to his lieutenant, and afterwards to his cousin Gallus, whom he raised from a prison to a throne, and, at the same time, acknowledged the imperial authority of his brother, by common consent the future operations of the civil war. In consequence of this agreement, Vetranio advanced to the city of Sardica, at the head of twenty thousand horse, and a more numerous body of infantry; and, with the powers of the forces of Constantius, that the Illyrian emperor appeared to command the life and fortunes of his rival, who, depending on the success of his private negociations, had seduced the troops, and undermined the throne, of Vetranio. The chiefs, who had secretly embraced the party of Constantius, were prepared in his behalf, and calculated to discover and inflame the passions of the multitude.

Constantius acknowledged him as a legitimate and equal colleague in the empire, on condition that he would renounce his disgraceful alliance with Magnentius, and appoint a place of interview on the frontiers of their respective provinces; where they might pledge themselves to the friendship of their subjects, by common consent the future operations of the civil war. The united armies were commanded to assemble in a large plain near the city. In the centre, according to the rules of ancient discipline, a military tribunal, or rather scaffold, was erected, from whence the emperors to whose sons such an enigma had given their allegiance, were to harangue the troops. The well-ordered ranks of Romans and barbarians, with drawn swords, or with erected spears, the squadrions of cavalry, and the cohorts of infantry, distinguished by the variety of their arms and ensigns, formed an immense circle round the tribunal; and the harangue of the emperor, which served was sometimes interrupted by loud bursts of clamour or of applause. In the presence of this formidable assembly, the two emperors were called upon to explain the situation of public affairs; the precedence of rank was yielded to the royal birth of Constantius; and he was received, as they had hoped, in the arts of rhetoric, he acquitted himself, under these difficult circumstances, with firmness, dexterity, and eloquence. The first part of his oration seemed to be pointed only against the tyrant of Gaul; but while he tragically lamented the cruel murder of Constans, he insinuated, that none, except a brother, could claim a right to the succession of his brother. He displayed, with some complacency, the glories of his imperial race; and recalled to the memory of the troops, the valour, the triumphs, the liberality of the great Constantine, to whose sons such a task had been intrusted by his beneficent laws; and he was sufficiently skilful, by an oath of fidelity, which the ingratitude of his most favoured servants had tempted them to violate. The officers, who surrounded the tribunal, and were instructed to act their parts in this extraordinary scene, confessed the irresistible power of reason and eloquence, and hailed the new man of universal sway.

The authority of such a vision, or rather of the prince who alleged it, silenced every doubt, and excluded all neglection. The ignominious terms of peace were rejected with disdain. One of the ambassage of the tyrant was dismissed with the haughty answer of Constantius; his colleagues, as unworthy of the privileges of the law of nations, were put in irons; and the contending powers prepared to wage an implacable war.

Decimus Vetranius was the conduct, and such per- haps was the duty of the troops who composed the forces of Vetranio. The situation and character of Vetranio admitted of milder measures; and the policy of the eastern emperor was directed to disunite his antagonists, and to separate the forces of Illyricum from the emperor of the west. It was an easy task to deceive the frankness and simplicity of Vetranio, who, fluctuating some time between the opposite views of honour and interest, displayed to the world the insincerity of his temper, and was insensibly engaged in the snare of an artful negotiation.

"The doubtful, fluctuating conduct of Vetranio is described by Ju- lian, Siscius, and especially by the historian Ammianus, who discussses the condition and behaviour of Constantius."

"See Peter the Patrician, in the Excerpta Legationum, p. 27."

The historian Siscius, in a work of minor importance, in which he discusses the situation and behaviour of Constantius, refers to the account of Peter the Patrician given in the Excerpta Legationum, p. 27. This work is a distinct narrative of the historical services of the emperor to illustrate the difference, but vague, descriptions of the orator. enjoyment of ease and affluence. He often expressed his grateful sense of the goodness of Constantius, and, with a very amiable simplicity, advised his benefactor to resign the sceptre of the world, and to seek for a tent (where alone it could be found) in the peacful obscurity of a private condition.¹

Makès war against Messentius. The behaviour of Constantius on this memorable occasion was celebrated with some appearance of justice; and his counsellors, among the others a Pericles or a Demosthenes addressed to the populace of Athens, with the victorious eloquence which had persuaded an armed multitude to desert and depose the object of their partial choice.² The approaching contest with Messentius was of a more serious and bloody kind. The tyrant advanced by rapid marches to encounter Constantius, at the head of a numerous army, composed of Gauls and Spaniards, of Franks and Saxons; of those provincials who supplied the strength of the legions, and of those barbarians who were dreaded as the most formidable enemies of the republic. The平原s of the lower Pannonis, between the Drave, the Save, and the Danube, presented a spacious theatre; and the operations of the civil war were protracted during the summer months by the skill or timidity of the combatants.³ Constantius proceeded with an intention of saving his name in the fields of Cibalis, a name that would animate his troops by the remembrance of the victory which, on the same auspicious ground, had been obtained by the arms of his father Constantine. Yet by the impregnable fortifications with which the emperor encompassed his camp, he appeared to decline, rather than to invite, a general engagement. It was the object of Messentius to tempt or to compel his adversary to relinquish this advantageous position; and he employed, with that view, the various marches, evolutions, and stratagems, which in the art of warfare are mere suggestions to the mind of an experienced officer. He carried by assault the important town of Siscia; made an attack on the city of Sirmium, which lay in the rear of the imperial camp; attempted to force a passage over the Save into the eastern provinces of Illyricum; and cut in pieces a numerous detachment, which he had eluded in the narrow passes of the Aecarn. During the greater part of the summer, the tyrant of Gaul showed himself master of the field. The troops of Constantius were harassed and dispirited; his reputation declined in the eyes of the world; and his pride compelled him to sign a treaty of peace which would have resigned to the assassins of Constantine the sovereignty of the provinces beyond the Alps. These offers were enforced by the eloquence of Philip the imperial ambassador; and the council as well as the army of Messentius were disposed to accept them. But the haughty usurer, careless of the remonstrances of his friends, gave orders that Philip should be detained as a captive, or at least as a hostage; while he despatched an officer to re-proach Constantius with the weakness of his reign, and to insult him by the promise of a pardon, if he would instantly abdicate the purple. "That he should confide in the justice of his cause, and the protection of an avenging Deity," was the only answer which honour permitted the emperor to return. But he was so sensible of the difficulties of his situation, that he no longer desired to retaliate, the indignities which had been offered to his representative. The negotiation of Philip was not, however, ineffectual, since he determined Sylvanus the Frank, a general of merit and reputation, to desert with a considerable body of cavalry, a few days before the battle of Mura.⁴

¹ This remarkable bridge, which is flanked by towers, and supported on large wooden piles, was constructed, A. D. 1566, by Sultan Soliman, to facilitate the march of his armies into Hungary. See Browne's Travels, and Buskley's System of Geography, vol. ii. p. 90.

² This position, and the subsequent evolutions, are clearly, though imperfectly, described by Julian, Orat. i. p. 36.

⁴ Julian, Orat. i. p. 36, 37; and Orat. i. p. 59, 60. Zonaras, tom. ii. xiii. p. 64, 65; and in his Historia in Gestis Theodosii, vol. ii. p. 173, 174. The emperor speaks of the desert of the archer Memelas, who could discharge three arrows in one second of time; an Instance of his appreciation of military affairs, materially contributed to the victory of Constantius.

⁵ According to Zonaras, Constantius, out of 60,000 men, lost 20,000.
which proves the obstinacy of the contest, and justifies the observation of an ancient writer, that the forces of the empire were consumed in the fatal battle of Mursa, by the loss of a veteran army, sufficient to defend the frontiers, and his camp in the possession of the enemy.\(^1\) Notwithstanding the invectives of a servile orator, there is not the least reason to believe that the tyrant deserted his own standard in the beginning of the engagement. He seems to have displayed the virtues of a general and of a soldier till the day was reversed in vain, and to have made the loss of his troops a sacrifice to the interest of the empire. Magnentius then consulted his safety, and throwing away the imperial ornaments, escaped with some difficulty from the pursuit of the light horse, who incessantly followed his rapid flight from the banks of the Dora to the foot of the Julian Alps.\(^1\)

Conquest of the Alps. The flight of Mursa supplied the indolence of Constantius with specious reasons for deferring the prosecution of the war till the ensuing spring. Magnentius had fixed his residence in the city of Aquileia, and showed a seeming resolution to dispute the passage of the mountains and to resist the imperial fleet at the head of the Venetian province. The surprisal of a castle in the Alps by the secret march of the imperialists, could scarce have determined him to relinquish the possession of Italy, if the inclinations of the people had supported the cause of their tyrant.\(^1\) But the memory of the Alaric and the rash designs of the unsuccessful revolt of Nepotian, had left a deep impression of horror and resentment on the minds of the Romans. That rash youth, the son of the princess Eutropia, and the nephew of Constantine, had seen with indignation the sanguinary west usurped by a perfidious barbarian. Armimg a desperate number of slaves and gladiators, he overpowered the feeble guard of the domestic tranquillity of Rome, received the homage of the senate, and assuming the title of Augustus, precariously reigned during a tumult of twenty-eight days. The march of some regular forces put an end to his ambitious hopes: the rebellion was extinguished in the blood of Nepotian, of his mother Eutropia, and of his adherents; and the proscription was extended to all who had contracted a fatal alliance with the name and family of Constantine.\(^1\) But as soon as Constantius, after the battle of Mursa, became master of the sea and the mountains, he overtook the enemy, who had ventured to equip a fleet in some harbour of the Adriatic, sought protection and revenge in his victorious camp. By their secret intelligence with their countrymen, Rome and the Italian cities were persuaded to display the banners of Constantius on their walls. The prophecies of the augurs, whose right authority was in the hands of Constantius, signalized their gratitude and loyalty to the son of the emperor. The cavalry, the legions, and the auxiliaries of Italy, renewed their oath of allegiance to Constantius; and the usurper, alarmed by the general desertion, was compelled, with the remains of his faithful troops, to retire beyond the Alps into the provinces of Gaul. The detachments, however, which were ordered either to press or to intercept the flight of Magnentius, continued to pursue the tyrant, and to watch the passage of the Rhone.\(^1\) They were, however, mistaken in their object, and allowed him, in the plains of Pavia, an opportunity of turning on his pursuers, and of gratifying his despair by the carnage of a useless victory.\(^1\)

The pride of Magnentius was reduced, by repeated misfortunes, to size, and to despair. He found the emperor, embossed in the person of a senator, in whose abilities he confided, and afterwards several bishops, whose holy character might obtain a more favourable audience, with the offer of resigning the purple, and of the promise of devoting the remainder of his life to the service of the emperor. But Constantius, though he granted fair terms of pardon and reconciliation to all who abandoned the standard of rebellion, avowed his inflexible resolution to inflict a just punishment on the crimes of an assassin, whom he prepared to overthwart on every side by the effort of his victorious arms. An imperial commission, composed of the emperor, the consuls, and Spain, confirmed the waving faith of the Moorish nations, and landed a considerable force, which passed the Pyrenees, and advanced towards Lyons, the last and fatal station of Magnentius.\(^1\) The temper of the tyrant which was never inclined to clemency, was provoked by the offer of a ruse which could extort an immediate supply from the cities of Gaul.\(^1\) Their patience was at length exhausted; and Treves, the seat of prætorian government, gave the signal of revolt, by shutting her gates against Decentius, who had been raised by his brother to the rank either of Caesar or of Augustus.\(^1\) From Treves Decentius was obliged to retire to Sens, where he was soon surrounded by an army of Germans, whom the peregriniae of Constantius had introduced into the civil dissensions of Rome.\(^1\) In the mean time, the imperial troops forced the passages of the Cottian Alps, and in the bloody combat of mount Sculeniunc irrevocably fixed the title of rebels on the party of Magnentius.\(^1\) He was unable to bring another army into the field; the fidelity of his guards was corrupted; and when he appeared in public to animate them by his exhortations, he was saluted with an unanimous shout of relief.\(^1\) Long life! Magnentius, the tyrant, who perceived that they were preparing to desert and rewards by the sacrifice of the most obnoxious criminal, prevented their design by falling on his sword: a death more easy and more honourable than he could hope to obtain from an enemy. The last and the greatest of the conspirators, who were proud of his abilities, and possessed of the spicetum of justice and fraternal pity. The example of suicide was imitated by Decennius, who strangled himself on the news of his brother’s death.
The author of the conspiracy, Marcellinus, had long since disappeared in the battle of Mursa, and the public tranquillity was confirmed by the execution of the surviving leaders of a guilty and unsuccessful faction.
A severe inquisition was extended over all who, either from choice or compulsion, had been involved in the cause of rebellion. Paul, summoned Catena, from his superior skill in the judicial exercise of tyranny, was sent to explore the latent remains of the conspiracy in the remote province of Brintia. The honest indignation expressed by Martin, vicar apostolic of the island, was interpreted as an admission of his own guilt, and the governor was urged to the necessity of turning against his breast the sword with which he had been provoked to wound the imperial minister. The most innocent subjects of the west were exposed to exile and execution; and the statesmen and the tyrants, who are ever cruel, the mind of Constantius was insen-sis to mercy.1

CHAPTER XIX.

Constantius sole emperor.—Education and death of Gallus.—Danger and elevation of Julian.—Normand and Persian wars.—Vitriolic account of Julian in Gaul.

Tari divided provinces of the empire, were again united by the victory of Constantius; but as that feeble prince was destitute of personal merit, either in peace or war; as he feared his generals and distrusted his ministers; the triumph of his arms served only to establish the reign of the eunuchs, over the Roman world. The unhappy beings, the nearest production of oriental jealousy and despotic ism,2 were introduced into Greece and Rome by the temptation of Asiatic luxury.3 Their progress was rapid; and the eunuchs, who, in the time of Augustus, had been abhorred, as the monstrous repute of an Egyptian queen, were gradually admitted into the families of matrons, of senators, and of the emperors themselves.4 Restained by the severe edict of Domitian and Nerva,5 cherished by the pride of Dioceleus, reduced to an humble station by the prudence of Constantine,6 they multiplied in the palaces of his degenerate sons, and insensibly acquired the knowledge, and at length the direction, of the imperial empire.

Constantius. The avarice and contempt which mankind has so uniformly entertained for that imperfect species, appears to have degraded their character, and to have rendered them almost as inappreciable as they were supposed to be, of conceiving any generous sentiment, any of the qualities in which they have been instructed; the eunuchs were skilled in the arts of flattery and intrigue; and they utterly governed the mind of Constantius by his fears, his indolence, and his vanity.6

Whilst he viewed in a deceitful mirror the fair appearance of public prosperity, he supinely permitted them to interpose in the commerce of the world. He accumulate immense treasures by the sale of justice and honours; to disgrace the most important digni-ties, by the promotion of those who had purchased at their hands the powers of oppression,7 and to gratify the amorous affections of their mistresses.8 By his artful suggestions, the emperor was persuaded to subscribe the condemnation of the unfortunate Gallus, and to add a new crime to the long list of unnatural murders which pollute the honour of the house of Constantine.

While the two nephews of Constantine—Education of Gal-tine, Gallus and Julian, were saved by Paul and Julian, from the fury of the soldiers, the former was about twelve, and the latter about six, years of age; and, as the eldest was thought to be of a sickly constitution, they obtained with the less difficulty a precarious and dependent existence. But Gallus, who was sensible that the execution of these helpless orphans would have been esteemed, by all mankind, an act of the most deliberate cruelty.9 Different cities of Ionia and Bithynia were assigned for the places of their exile and education; but, as soon as their growing years excited the jealousy of the emperor, he judged it more prudent to secure those unhappy youths in the strong castle of Macellum, near Caesarea. The treatment which they experienced during a six years’ confinement was partly such as they could hope from a careful guardian and partly such as they received from a suspicious tyrant.1 Their prison was an ancient palace, the residence of the kings of Cappadocia; the situation was pleasant, the building stately, the enclosure spacious. They pursued their studies, and pracexemplified the generous principles of Cyrus, to impose his hand to the guard of eunuchs. He had observed in animals, that although the practice of crime might tame the inveterate fierceness, it did not diminish their strength or spirit; and he persuaded himself, that those who were separated from the rest of human kind, would be more firmly attached to the person of their benefactor. But a long expentence had convinced the judgment of Cyrus. Some particular instances may occur where eunuchs distinguished by their fidelity, their value, and their abilities; but if we examine the general history of Persia, and China, we shall find that only power of the eunuchs has uniformly marked the decline and fall of every dynasty.

1 See Sat. iv. 8, 9, 11. 2 Marcellus, l. i. c. 11, 12. 3 He the whole term of his imperial history serves to justify the invectives of Marmontel, of La Harpe, and of Julian himself, who have insulted the views and abilities of his sovereign.

1 Aurelius Victor enumerates the negligence of his sovereign in choosing the governors of the provinces, and the generals of the army, and concludes his history with a very bold observation, as it is much more disastrous for a feeble reign, than for one which has been strong in itself. "Ut verum absolvam brevi, ut imperatore ipso claribus, ipsa apparitorium magnae magis atra natum."1

1 A very different description of the eunuchs is given by

Ammian (l. xvi. c. 4). 2 Gallus and Julian (Orat. iii. p. 92) reproaches the apostate with his ingratitude towards Mark, bishop of Antioch, who had been of the eunuchs to the side of the pages, and Socrates (f. iii. r. i.) on that of the Christians, have preserved several interesting circumstances.

tised their exercises, under the tuition of the most skilful masters; and the numerous household appointed to attend, or rather to guard, the nephews of Constantine, was not unworthy of the dignity of their birth. But they could not disguise to themselves that they were but brutes, and were suspended to assume that odious character. Every apartment of the palace was adorned with the instruments of death and torture, and a general consternation was diffused through the capital of Syria. The prince of the east, as if he had been conscious how much he had at stake, and how little he desired to reign, selected for the objects of his resentment, the provincials accused of some imaginary treason, and his own courtiers, whom with more reason he suspected of incensing, by their secret correspondence, the timid and suspicious mind of Constantius. But he forgot that he had set his long term to the affections of the people; whilst he furnished the malice of his enemies with the arms of truth, and afforded the emperor the fairest pretext of executing the forfeit of his purple, and of his life.\footnote{A D. 354.}

As long as the civil war suspended \textit{Maries} of the fate of the throne, and \textit{Empereurs} of the imperial thrones, Constantius dissembled his knowledge of the weak and cruel administration to which his choice had subjected the east; and the discovery of some assassins, secretly despatched to Antioch by the tyrant of Gaul, was employed to excite the public, that the measures were united for the same interest, and pursued by the same enemies.\footnote{A D. 354.} But when the victory was decided in favour of Constantius, his dependent colleague became less useful and less formidable. Every circumstance of his conduct was severely and suspiciously examined, as it was privately resolved, either to deprive Gallus of the purple, or at least to remove him from the indolent luxury of Asia to the hardships and dangers of a German war. The death of Theophilius, consular of the province of Syria, who in a time of scarcity had been massacred by the people of Antioch, with the connivance, and almost at the instigation, of Gallus, was justly resented, not only as an act of wanton cruelty, but as a dangerous insult on the supreme majesty of Constantius. Two ministers of illustrious rank, Dotician, the oriental prefect, and Montius, questor of the palace, were empowered by a special commission to visit and reform the state of the eastern empire. They attempted to torture Gallus with moderation and respect, and, by the gentlest arts of persuasion to engage him to comply with the invitation of his brother and colleague. The rashness of the prefect disappointed these prudent measures, and hastened his own ruin, as well as that of his benefactor. On the 11th of March, 349, Gallus, who could ill brook the insolence of a subject, expressed their resentment by instantly delivering Dotician to the custody of a guard. The quarrel still admitted of some terms of accommodation. They were rendered impracticable by the imprudent behaviour of Montius, a statesman, who \footnote{See in Ammianus (l. xiv. 1. 7.) a very ample detail of the cruelties of Gallus. His brother Julian (p. 272.) insinuates, that a se- cret conspiracy, concocted some years before by Cassianus, had already been formed in a certain place; and that Zonaras (l. i. p. 133.) the persons engaged in it: a minister of considerable rank, and two obscure agents, who were resolved to make their fortune by the means of the Alexandrians, were discovered, and revealed by an old woman in whose cottage they lodged.} whose art and experience were frequently betrayed by the levity of his disposition. The quaestor reproached Gallus in haughty language, that a prince, who was scarcely adorned to his dignified and martial appearance, should presume to imprison a praetorian prefect; convoked a meeting of the civil and military officers; and required them, in the name of their sovereign, to defend the person and dignity of his representatives. By this rush declared war, the impatient temper of Gallus was provoked to embrace dangerous and ecdulous counsels. He ordered his guards to stand to their arms, assembled the populace of Antioch, and recommended to their zeal the care of his safety and revenue. His commands were too fatally obeyed. They rudely seized the prefect and the praetorians, tore their garments, and hurried them with ropes, dragged them through the streets deeped, a thousand insults and a thousand wounds on these unhappy victims, and at last precipitated their mangled and lifeless bodies into the stream of the Orontes.1

Dangerous

Dangers.

After such a deed, whatever might be the designs of Gallus, it was only in a field of battle that he could assert his innocence with any hope of success. But the mind of that prince was formed of an equal mixture of violence and weakness. Instead of assuming the title of Augustus, inspired by those in the midst of the treasures of the east, he suffered himself to be deceived by the affected tranquillity of Constantius, who, leaving him the vain pageantry of a court, imperceptibly recalled the veteran legions from the provinces of Asia.

But the prince, inspired with dangerous to arrest Gallus in his capital, the slow and laborious arts of dissimulation were practised with success. The frequent and pressing epistles of Constantius were filled with professions of confidence and friendship; exhorting the Caesar to discharge the duties of his high station, to relieve his army, to recruit the public care, and to assist the west by his presence, his counsels, and his arms. After so many reciprocal injuries, Gallus had reason to fear and to distrust. But he had neglected the opportunities of flight and of resistance; he was seduced by the flattering assurance of the tribune Scudilius, who, under the semblance of a rough soldier, disguised the most artful insinuation; and he depended on the credit of his wife Constantia, till the unsean-sonable death of that princess completed the ruin in which he had been involved by her impetuous pas-

Death.

After a long delay, the reluctant Cesar set forwards on his journey to the imperial court. From Antioch to Hadrianople, he traversed the wide extent of his dominions with a numerous and stately train; and on his departure, he concealed his apprehensions from the world, and perhaps from himself, he entertained the people of Constantinople with an exhibition of the games of the circus. The progress of the journey might, however, have warned him of the impending danger.

In all the principal cities he was met by ministers of confidence, commissioned to seize the officers of government, to observe his motions, and to prevent the hasty sallies of his despair. The persons despatched to secure the provinces which he left behind, passed him with cold salutations, or affected disdain;
and the troops, whose station lay along the public road, were studiously removed on his approach, lest they might be tempted to offer their swords for the service of a civil war.2 After Gallus had been permitted to submit the refusal of Constantius, he had received a mandate, expressed in the most haughty and absolute style, that his splendid retinue should halt in that city, while the Caesar himself, with only ten post-carri-

riages, should hasten to the imperial residence at Milan. In this rapid journey, the profound sleep which was due to the fatigue and health of Constantius was insensibly changed into rude familiarity; and Gallus, who discovered in the countenances of the attendants that they already considered themselves as his guards, and might soon be employed as his executors, was accelerated to hasten to his destined destined to collect, with terror and remorse, the conduct by which he had provoked his fate. The dissimulation which had hitherto been preserved, was laid aside at Petovio in Pannonia. He was conducted to a palace in the suburbs, where the general Barbarito, with a select body of Constantius, who could neither be bribed, nor cursed by rewards, expected the arrival of his illustrious victim. In the close of the evening he was arrested, ignominiously stripped of the ensigns of Cesar, and hurried away to Pola in Istria, a sequesttered prison, which had been so recently polluted with avowed blood. A few days after, his fate was con-in the school of adversity, Julian insensibly acquired the virtues of firmness and discretion. He defended his honour, as well as his life, against the insinuating subtleties of the envoys, who endeavoured to extort some declaration of his sentiments; and whilst he cautiously put the import of his mission beyond all doubt, nobly disdained to flatter the tyrant, by any seeming approbation of his brother's murder. Julian most devoutly ascribed his marvellous deliverance to the providence of the gods, who had exempted his innocence from the sentence of destruction pronounced by their justice upon the house of Constantine. As the most effectual instrument of their providence, he gratefully acknowledges the steady and generous friendship of the empress Eusebia; a woman of beauty and merit, who, by the ascendancy which she had gained over the mind of her husband, counterbalanced, in some measure, the powerful conspiracy of the envoys. By the intercession of his patroness, Julian was admitted into the imperial presence; he pleaded his cause with a decent freedom; he was heard with favour; and, notwith­standing the efforts of his enemies, who urged the danger of sparing an avenger of the blood of Galrus, the most daring of his projects, failed him in the end.2

But the effects of a second interview were dreaded by the envoys; and Julian was advised to withdraw for a while into the neighbourhood of Milan, till the emperor thought proper to assign the city of Athens for the place of his ho­ oratory, and the treachery of courts, he spent six months, the groves of which he involved in a free intercourse with the philosophers of the age, who studied to cultivate the genius, to encourage the vanity, and to inflame the devotion of their royal pupil. Their labours were not un­successfull; and Julian inviolably preserved for Athens that tender regard, which seldom fails to arise in a liberal mind, from the recollection of the place where it has discovered and exercised its growing powers. The gentleness and affability of manners, which his temper suggested and his situation imposed, insensibly engaged the affections of the strangers, as well as that of his own generation. Some of his fellow-students might perhaps examine his behavour with an eye of prejudice and aversion; but Julian established, in the schools of Athens, a general pre­ sposition in favour of his virtues and talents, which was soon diffused over the Roman world.7

Recalled to Milan. The death of the last Caesar had left Constantius invested with the sole command, and oppressed by the accumulated weight, of a mighty empire. Before the wounds of civil discord could be healed, the provinces of Gaul were overwhelmed by a deluge of barbarians. The Sarmatians no longer respected the barrier of the Danube. The impetuosity of rapine had increased the boldness and numbers of the wild Saunians; those cruel neighbors, continually descending from the mountains, ravaged the adjacent country, and had even presumed, though without success, to besiege the important city of Seleucia, which was defended by a garrison of three Roman legions. Above all, the Persian monarch, elated by victory, again threatened the peace of Asia, and, not satisfied with the precipitancy of the emperor, was induced, by political exigencies, both in the west and in the east. For the first time, Constantius sincerely acknowledged, that his single strength was unequal to such an extent of care and of dominion.8 Insensible to the voice of flattery, which assured him that his all-powerful virtue, and celestial fortune, would still continue to triumph over every obstacle, he listened with complacency to the advice of Eusebia, which gratified his indulgence, without offending his suspicious pride. As she perceived that the remembrance of Galrus dwelt on the emperor's mind, she artfully turned his attention to the masses of his subjects, and shewed how their two infant years had been compared to those of Donatian and of Titus.9 She accustomed her husband to consider Julian as a youth of a mild unambitious dispo­sition, whose allegiance and gratitude might be secured by the gift of the purple, and who was qualified to fill, with honour and virtue, the office of a great statesman. She proposed to dispute the commands, or to shade the glories, of his sovereign and benefactor. After an obstinate though secret struggle, the opposition of the favourite envoys submitted to the ascendency of the empress; and it was resolved that Julian, after celebrating his nuptials with Helena, wife of Constantius, should be appointed, with the title of Caesar, to reign over the countries beyond the Alps.10

Although the order which recalled him to court was probably accompanied by some intimation of his approaching greatness, he appeals to the people of Athens to witness his tears of undistinguished sorrow, when he was reluctantly torn away from his beloved retired.2

He trembled for his life, for his fame, and even for his virtue; and his sole confidence was derived from the persuasion that Minerva inspired all his actions, and preserved him safe and unharmed. The sumptuous banquets of her benevolent angels, whom for that purpose she had borrowed from the sun and moon. He approached, with horror, the palace of Milan; nor could the ingenious youth conceal his indignation, when he found himself accosted with false and servile respect by the assassins of his family. The suspicions of her majesty, the schemes, that embroiled him with the tenderness of a sister; and endeavoured by the most sooth­ing caresses, to dispel his terrors, and reconcile him to his fortune. But the ceremony of shaving his beard, and his awkward demeanour, when he first exchanged the cloak of a Greek philosopher for the military habiliments of a Roman prince, amused, during a few days, the levity of the imperial court.11

The emperors of the age of Constantine no longer desired to consult with the senate in the choice of a colleague; but they were anxious that their nominapostle to the Athenians, draws a very lively and just picture of his own danger, and of his sentiments. He shows, however, a tendency to exaggerate his sufferings, by instilling, though in obscure terms, that he found them heavy: a period which he recast with the truth of chronology.

4 Julian was harassed by the vicissitudes of the family of Constantius into an allegorical facet, which is happily conceived and agreeably related. It forms the conclusion of the seventh Oration, from whence it has been detached and translated by the Abbe de la Biterie. Vie de Jovien, tom. ii. p. 285-289.

mily, and the daughter, as well as sister of consuls. Her marriage with the emperor may be placed in the year 392. In a divided age, the restoration of full liberty to the Church was a period when he recorded his acts with the truth of chronology.

6 Libanius and Gregory Nazianzen have exhausted the arts as well as the powers of their eloquence, to reproach and inflame the name of Jovien. It is Gregory, who was his fellow-student at Athens; and the symptoms, which he so tragically describes, of the future conqueror of the empire, may be gathered from his discourses, and to some peculiarities in his speech and manner. He protests, however, that he then foresees and foretold the calamities of church and state. (Greg. Nazianzen, Orat. iv. p. 121, 122.)

tion should be ratified by the consent of the army. On this solemn occasion, the guards, with the other troops whose stations were in the neighbourhood of Milan, appeared under arms; and Constantius ascended his lofty throne, and, by his own invention, if it was agreeable to their wishes, of rewarding with the honours of the purple, the promising virtues of the nephew of Constantine. The approbation of the soldiers was testified by a respectful murmur; they gazed on the manly countenance of Julian, and observed with pleasure, that the fire which sparkled in his eyes was tempered by a modest blush, on being thus exposed, for the first time, to the public view of mankind. As soon as the ceremony of his investiture had been performed, Constantius addressed him with the tone of authority, which his superior age and station were permitted to assume; and exhorting the new Caesar to deserve by heroic deeds, that sacred and immortal name, the emperor gave his colleague the strongest assurances of a friendship which should never be impaired by time, nor interrupted by their separation into the two most distant cliques. By the same token, he declared, the troops, as a token of applause, clashed their shields against their knaps; while the officers who surrounded the tribunal expressed, with decent reserve, their sense of the merits of the representative of Constantius.

The two princes returned to the palace in the same chariot; and during the slow procession, Julian repeated to himself a verse of his favourite Homer, which he might equally apply to his fortune and to his fears. The four-and-twenty days which the Caesar spent at Milan after his return, were the first months of his reign; and were devoted to a splendid but severe captivity; nor could the acquisition of honour compensate for the loss of freedom. His steps were watched, his correspondence was intercepted; and he was obliged, by prudence, to decline the visits of his most intimate friends. Of his former domestics, four only were permitted to attend him; two pages, his physician, and his librarian; the last of whom was employed in the care of a valuable collection of books, the gift of the empress, who studied the inclinations as well as the interest of her husband. The four of these domestics, whose household was formed, such indeed as became the dignity of a Caesar: but it was filled with a crowd of slaves, destitute, and perhaps incapable, of any attachment for their new master, to whom, for the most part, they were either unknown or suspected. His want of experience might require the assistance of a wise council; but the minute instructions which regulated the service of his table, and the distribution of his hours, were adapted to a youth still under the discipline of his preceptors, rather than to the situation of a prince in the conduct of an important war.

If he aspired to deserve the esteem of the public subjects, his care was checked by the fear of displeasing his sovereign; and even the fruits of his marriage-bed were blasted by the jealous arts of Eusebia's herself, who, on this occasion alone, seems to have been unmindful of the tenderness of her sex, and the generosity of her character. The memory of his father and ancestors, the remembrance of Julian's own danger, and his apprehensions were increased by the receivc and unworthy fate of Sylvanus. In the summer which preceded his own elevation, that general had been chosen to deliver Gaul from the threats of the Persians. Sylvanus soon discovered that he had left his most dangerous enemies in the imperial court. A dexterous informer, countenanced by several of the principal ministers, procured from him some recommendatory letters; and erasing the whole of the contents, except the signature, filled up the vacant paragraph with matters of high and reasonable import. By the industry and courage of his friends, the fraud was however detected, and in a great council of the civil and military officers, held in the presence of the emperor himself, the innocence of Sylvanus was publicly acknowledged. But the discovery came too late; the report of the calumny, and the hasty seizure of his estate, had already provoked the indignant chief to the rebellion of which he was so unjustly accused. He assumed the purple at his head-quarters of Cologne, and his name was interned by an invasion, and Milan with a storm. In this emergency, Ursicinus, a general of equal rank, regained, by an act of treachery, the favour which he had lost by his eminent services in the east. Exasperated, as he might spectaciously allege, by injuries of a similar nature, he hastened with a few followers to join the standard, and to betray the confidence, of his too erudite friend. After a reign of only twenty-eight days, Sylvanus was assassinated: the soldiers who, without any criminal intention, had blindly followed the example of their leader, immediately returned to their allegiance. The Gallic provinces, with the wisdom and felicity of the monarch, who had extinguished a civil war without the hazard of a battle.

The protection of the Rhetic frontier, and the persecution of the cathedral church, detained Constantius in Italy above eighteen days; but the discovery came too late; the death of the future of Julian. Before the emperor returned into the east, he indulged his pride and curiosity in a visit to the ancient capital. He proceeded from Milan to Rome along the Amilian and Flaminian ways; and as soon as he arrived, the usual ceremonies of his six and foreign enemies, assumed the appearances of a triumphal procession. His splendid train was composed of all the ministers of luxury; but in a time of profound peace, he was encompassed by the glittering arms of the numerous squadrons of his guards and equestrians. Their streaming hangers of silk, embroidered with gold, and shaped in the form of dragons, waved round the person of the emperor. Constantius sat alone in a lofty car resplendent with gold and precious gems; and, except when he bowed his head to pass under the gates of the cities, he affected a stately demeanour of inflexible and, as it might seem, of insensible gravity. The severe discipline of the Persian youth had been introduced by the Persia into the imperial palace; and such were the habits of piety which they had acquired. During a slow and sultry march, he was never seen to move his hand towards his face, or to turn his eyes either to the right or to the left. He was received by the magistrates and senate of Rome; and the emperor surveyed, with attention, the civil honours of the repose and the magnificence of the noble families. The streets were lined with an innumerable multitude. Their repeated acclamations expressed their joy at beholding, after an absence of thirty-two years, the sacred person of their sovereign; and Constantius has vowed that some particular action affecting the supposition that the human race should thus suddenly be collected on the same spot. The son of Constantine was lodged in the ancient palace of Augustus; he presided in the senate, harangued the people from the tribunal which Cicero had so often ascended, assisted with unusual courtesy at the games of the circus, and accepted the crowns of gold, as well as the panegyrics which had been prepared for the ceremony by the deputies of the principal cities. His short visit of thirty days was employed in viewing the monuments of art and power, which were scattered over the seven hills and in the spacious, free, and unconstrained precincts of majesty. The vast extent of the baths of Caracalla and Diocletian, the severe simplicity of the pantheon, the massy grandeur of the amphitheatre of Titus, the elegant architecture of the theatre of Pompey and the temple of Peace, and, above all, the stately structure of the forum and column of Trajan; acknowledged that the voice of fame, so prone to invent and to magnify, had made an inadequate report of the metropolis of the world. The traveller, who has contemplated the ruins of ancient Rome, may conceive some imperfect idea of the sentiments which they must have inspired when they reared their heads in the splendour of unsullied beauty.

A new obelisk.

The satisfaction which Constantius had received from this journey excited him to the generous emulation of bestowing on the Romans some memorial of his own gratitude and munificence. His first idea was to imitate the equestrian and colossal statue which he had seen in the forum of Trajan; but when he had maturely weighed the difficulties of the execution,1 he chose rather to embellish the capital by the gift of an Egyptian obelisk. In a remote but polished age, which seems to have preceded the degenerate and fallen condition of great nations, the manufacture of these obelisks had been erected in the cities of Thebes and Heliopolis, by the ancient sovereigns of Egypt, in a just confidence that the simplicity of their form, and the hardness of their substance, would resist the injuries of time and violence,2 Several of these extraordinary columns had been transported to Rome by Augustus and his successors, as the most durable monuments of their power and victory; but there remained one obelisk, which, from its size or sanctity, escaped for a long time the rapacious vanity of the conquerors. It was designed by Constantine to adorn his new city;3 and, after being removed by his order from the place where it stood before the temple of the Sun at Helionopolis, was dedicated to Alexandria. The death of Constantius suspended the execution of his purpose, and this obelisk was destined by his son to the ancient capital of the empire. A vessel of uncommon strength and capriciousness was provided to convey this enormous weight of granite, at a cost six times greater than that of the Nile, from the banks of the Nile to those of the Tyber. The obelisk of Constantius was landed about three miles from the city, and elevated, by the efforts of art and labour, in the great circus of Rome.4

The departure of Constantius from Theodorus and Constantine was hasted by another motive. The intelligence of the distress and danger of the Hyltorian provinces. The distractions of civil war, and the irreparable loss which the legions had sustained in the battle of Mursa, exposed those countries, almost without defence, to the light cavalry of the barbarians; and particularly to the invasions of the Quadri, a fierce and powerful nation, who seem to have exchanged the institutions of Germany for the arms and military arts of their Sarmatian allies.5 The garrisons of the frontier were insufficient to check their progress; and the indolent monarch was at length compelled to be present in person in his own camp, when the flower of the Palatine troops, to take the field in person, and to employ a whole campaign, with the preceding autumn and ensuing spring, in the serious prosecution of the war. The emperor passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, cut in pieces all that encountered his march, penetrated into the heart of the country of the Quadri, and severely retaliated the calamities which they had inflicted on the Roman province. The disarrayed barbarians were soon reduced to sue for peace; they offered the restitutum of his captive subjects as an atonement for the past, and the noblest hostages as a pledge for their future conduct. The generous courtesy which was shown to the first among their chiefs who implored the clemency of Constantius, encouraged the more timid, or the more obstinate, to imitate their example; and the imperial camp was crowded with the princes and ambassadors of the most distant tribes, who occupied the plains of the Lesser Poland, and who might have deemed themselves secure behind the lofty ridge of the Carpathian mountains. While Constantius gave laws to the barbarians beyond the Danube, he distinguished, with spacious compassion, the Sarmatian exiles, who had been expelled from their country by the rebellion of their slaves, and who formed a very powerful accession to the power of the Quadri. The emperor, embracing a generous but artful system of policy, released the Sarmatians from the bands of this humiliating dependence, and restored them, by a separate treaty, to the dignity of a united nation under the government of a king, the friend and ally of the republic. He declared his resolution of asserting the justice of their cause, and of securing the peace of the provinces by the extirpation, or at least the banishment, of the Limigates, whose manners were still infected with the taste of their barbarity. This design was attended with more difficulty than glory. The territory of the Limigates was protected against the Romans by the Danube, against the hostile barbarians by the Teyss. The marshy lands, which lay between those rivers, and were often covered by their inundations, formed a natural barrier, not only to the inhabitants, who were sequestered with its secret paths, and inaccessible fortresses. On the ap-

"If we adopt this reading of the text of Ammianus (digustiniani instead of pluribus), we may consider it as a reproof of Roman vanity. The contrary sense would have been the effect of a want of sagacity on the part of the emperor.

proach of Constantius, the Limigantes tried the efficacy of prayers, of fraud, and of force, but he sternly rebuked their effronteries, defeated their rude stratagems, and repelled with skill and firmness the efforts of their irregular valor. One of their most warlike tribes, established in a small island towards the confluence of the Tayss and the Danube, consented to pass to the side of their conqueror. In the judgment of Ammianus, it followed the example of the eastern ministers of Constantius, the prataetor prefect Musonian, whose abilities were disgraced by the want of truth and integrity, and Cassian, duke of Mesopotamia, a hardy and veteran soldier, opened a secret negotiation with the sarmatic Tamerlane. Their surrender of peace, transacted into the service of a flattering language of Asia, were transmitted to the camp of the great king; who resolved to signify, by an ambassador, the terms which he was inclined to grant to the suppliant Romans. Narses, whom he invested with that character, was honourably received in his passage through Antioch and Constantinople; he reached Sirmium after a long journey, and, at his first audience, respectfully unfolded the silken veil which covered the haughty epistle of his sovereign. Sapor, king of kings, and brother of the Sun and Moon, (such were the loftier titles which the Persians for distinction conferred.) In the extremity the bravest of the Limigantes were resolved to die in arms, rather than to yield: but the milder sentiment, enforced by the authority of their elders, at length prevailed; and the suppliant crowd, followed by their wives and children, repaired to the imperial city, and obtained their pardon from the conqueror. After celebrating his own clemency, which was still inclined to pardon their repeated crimes, and to spare the remnant of a guilty nation. Constantius assigned for the place of their exile a remote country, where they might enjoy a safe and honourable repose. The Limigantes, obeyed with reluctance; but hope that they could reach, at least before they could occupy, their destined habitations, they returned to the banks of the Danube, exaggerating the hardships of their situation, and requesting, with fervent professions of fidelity, that the emperor would grant them an undisturbed settlement within the limits of the Roman provinces. Instead of consulting his own experience of their incurable perfidy, Constantius listened to his flatterers, who were ready to represent the honour and advantage of accepting a colony of soldiers, at a time when the whole empire was necesary to obtain their contributions than the military service of the subjects of the empire. The Limigantes were permitted to pass the Danube; and the emperor gave audience to the multitude in a large plain near the modern city of Buda. They surrounded the tribunal, and seemed to hear with respect an oration full of mildness and dignity; when one of the barbarians, casting his shoe into the air, exclaimed with a loud voice, Marchat! Marchat! a word of defiance, which was received as the signal of the tumult. They rushed with fury to seize the person of the emperor; his royal throne and golden couch were pillaged by these rude hands; but the faithful defence of his guards, who died at his feet, allowed him a moment to mount a fleet horse, and to escape from the confusion. The disgrace which had been incurred by a treacherous surprise was soon repaired by the numbers and discipline of the Romans; and the combat was only terminated by the extinction of the name and nation of the Limigantes. The free Sarthians were reinstated in the possession of their ancient seats; and although Constantius distrusted the loyalty of their choice, he was moved by a sense of gratitude might influence their future conduct. He had remarked the lofty stature and obscure joan of Zizaius, one of the noblest of their chiefs. He conferred on him the title of king; and Zizaius proved that he was not unworthy to reign, by a sincere and lasting attachment to the interests of his benefactor, who, after this splendid success, received the name of Sarmanitus from the acclamations of his victorious army. While the Roman emperor and the Persian monarch, at the distance of three thousand miles, defended their extreme limits against the barbarians of the Danube and of the Oxus, their intermediate frontier experienced the visitations of a Tartar, who had already been attended by some of the eastern ministers of Constantius, the prataetor prefect Musonian, whose abilities were disgraced by the want of truth and integrity, and Cassian, duke of Mesopotamia, a hardy and veteran soldier, opened a secret negotiation with the sarmatic Tamerlane. Their surrender of peace, transacted into the service of a flattering language of Asia, were transmitted to the camp of the great king; who resolved to signify, by an ambassador, the terms which he was inclined to grant to the suppliant Romans. Narses, whom he invested with that character, was honourably received in his passage through Antioch and Constantinople; he reached Sirmium after a long journey, and, at his first audience, respectfully unfolded the silken veil which covered the haughty epistle of his sovereign. Sapor, king of kings, and brother of the Sun and Moon, (such were the loftier titles which the Persians for distinction conferred.) In the extremity the bravest of the Limigantes were resolved to die in arms, rather than to yield: but the milder sentiment, enforced by the authority of their elders, at length prevailed; and the suppliant crowd, followed by their wives and children, repaired to the imperial city, and obtained their pardon from the conqueror. After celebrating his own clemency, which was still inclined to pardon their repeated crimes, and to spare the remnant of a guilty nation. Constantius assigned for the place of their exile a remote country, where they might enjoy a safe and honourable repose. The Limigantes, obeyed with reluctance; but hope that they could reach, at least before they could occupy, their destined habitations, they returned to the banks of the Danube, exaggerating the hardships of their situation, and requesting, with fervent professions of fidelity, that the emperor would grant them an undisturbed settlement within the limits of the Roman provinces. Instead of consulting his own experience of their incurable perfidy, Constantius listened to his flatterers, who were ready to represent the honour and advantage of accepting a colony of soldiers, at a time when the whole empire was necessary to obtain their contributions than the military service of the subjects of the empire. The Limigantes were permitted to pass the Danube; and the emperor gave audience to the multitude in a large plain near the modern city of Buda. They surrounded the tribunal, and seemed to hear with respect an oration full of mildness and dignity; when one of the barbarians, casting his shoe into the air, exclaimed with a loud voice, Marchat! Marchat! a word of defiance, which was received as the signal of the tumult. They rushed with fury to seize the person of the emperor; his royal throne and golden couch were pillaged by these rude hands; but the faithful defence of his guards, who died at his feet, allowed him a moment to mount a fleet horse, and to escape from the confusion. The disgrace which had been incurred by a treacherous surprise was soon repaired by the numbers and discipline of the Romans; and the combat was only terminated by the extinction of the name and nation of the Limigantes. The free Sarthians were reinstated in the possession of their ancient seats; and although Constantius distrusted the loyalty of their choice, he was moved by a sense of gratitude might influence their future conduct. He had remarked the lofty stature and obscure demeanor of Zizaius, one of the noblest of their chiefs. He conferred on him the title of king; and Zizaius proved that he was not unworthy to reign, by a sincere and lasting attachment to the interests of his benefactor, who, after this splendid success, received the name of Sarmanitus from the acclamations of his victorious army.

13 The sophist, or philosopher. (in that age these words were almost synonymous.) was monarch to abate the rigour of his demands. But the progress of their negotiation was opposed and deefeated. The success of Sapor, 1 the object of Syrinx, who had died from oppression, and was admitted into the counsels of Sapor, and even to the royal table, where, according to the custom of the Persians, the most important business was frequently discussed. 2 The dexterous fugitive promoted his interest by the same conduct which gratified his revenge. He incidentally urged the ambition of his new master, to embrace the favourable opportunity when the bravest of the Palatine troops were employed with the emperor in a distant war on the Danube. He pressed Sapor to invade the exhausted and defenceless provinces of the east, with the numerical advantage which his army had over the alliance of the fiercest barbarians.
The ambassadors of Rome retired without success, and a second embassy, of a still more honourable rank, was detained in strict confinement, and threatened either with death or exile.

Invasion of Mesop-tamia by Sapor.

A.D. 359.

The Persians, as they were preparing to construct a bridge of boats over the Tigris, beheld from an eminence the plain of Assyr, as far as the edge of the horizon, covered with men, with horses, and with arms. Sapor appeared in the front, conspicuous by the splendour of his purple. On his left hand, the place of honour among the orientals, Grumbates, king of the Chionites, displayed the stern countenance of an aged and renowned warrior. The monarch had reserved a similar place on his right hand for the king of the Albanians, who led his independent tribes from the shores of the Caspian. The satraps and generals were distributed according to their several ranks, and the whole army, besides the numerous train of oriental luxury, consisted of more than one hundred thousand effective men, inured to fatigue, and selected from the bravest nations of Asia. The Roman despot, who in sickness resided in the palace of councils of Sapor, had profoundly advised, that, instead of wasting the summer in tedious and difficult sieges, he should march directly to the Euphrates, and press forwards without delay to seize the fertile and wealthy metropolis of Syria. But the Persians were not sooner advanced into the plains of Mesopotamia, than they had been banished from that province which had been used by their predecessors for the repair of their own armies. 3 The fresh swell of the waters of the Euphrates deterred the barbarians from attempting the ordinary passage of the bridge of Thapsacus. Their skilful guide, changing his plan of operations, then conducted the army by a longer circuit, but through a fertile territory, towards the head of the Euphrates, where the infant river is reduced to a shallow and accessible stream. Sapor overlooked, with prudent disdain, the strength of Nis-bis; but as he passed under the walls of Amida, he resolved to try whether the majesty of his presence would not awe the garrison into immediate submission.
The same celerity was displayed in a random dart, which flew against the royal tiara, convinced him of his error; and Eustathius the Cappadocian, the disciple of Isaiarchus, and the fraternal name of Euphronius (in Vit. Eustei., p. 41—47,) fondly attributes to this philosopher the mental and physical attributes of a barbarian king by the persuasive charms of reason and eloquence.

1 Ammian., xviii. 5. 6. 8. The deceit and respectful behaviour of the Euphrates must be noticed. It appears, according to Ammianus, seen in a very interesting light; and Ammianus himself speaks of the traitor with respect, compassion and esteem.
2 That the Euphrates is not noticed by Ammianus, servers to prove the veracity of Herodotus, (I. c. 133,) and the permanence of the Persian dominion over these provinces, which, from several reasons, continued, or at least interrupted, as late as the time of Justinian. In the description of this river, Ammianus, (I. c. 62—65,) gives the winds of Shiraz, and the Bavarus, as the limits of the Persian empire. Baron de Reguia Pers. l. ii. p. 642—672. and Chardin, the indigent monarch listened with impatience to the advice of his ministers, who conjured him not to sacrifice the success of his ambition to the gratification of his resentment. The following day Grumbates advanced towards the gates with a select body of troops, and required the instant surrender of the city, as the only atonement which could be accepted for such an act of rashness and insolence. His proposals were attacked and defied by the Assyrians, who, in the beauty and valiant youth, was pierced through the heart by a javelin, shot from one of the balistae.

The funeral of the prince of the Chionites was celebrated according to the rites of his country; and the grief of his aged father was alleviated by the solemn promise of Sapor, that the city of Amida should serve as a funeral pile to expiate the death, and to perpetuate the memory of, his son.

The ancient city of Amida or Amida, 1 which sometimes assumes the provincial appellation of Diarbekir, 2 is advantageouslysituated in a fertile plain, watered by the natural and artificial channels of the Tigris, of which the least considerable stream bounds a semicircular form round the eastern part of the city. The emperor Constantius had recently conferred on Amida the honour of his own name, and the additional fortifications of strong walls and lofty towers. It was provided with an arsenal of armaments, and other ordinary army stores. The situation, which had formerly been informed to the amount of sevenlegions, when the place was invested by the arms of Sapor, 3 his first and most sanguine hopes depended on the success of a general assault. To the several nations which followed his standard their respective posts were assigned; the south to the Verte; the north to the Albanians; the east to the Chionites, inflamed with grief and indignation;
the west to the Segestans, the bravest of his warriors, who covered their front with a formidable line of Indian elephants. 4 The Persians, on every side, supported their efforts, and animated their courage; and the monarch himself, careless of his rank and safety, disormed, in the prosecution of the siege, the ardour of a youthful soldier. After an obstinate combat, the barbarians were repulsed; they incessantly returned to the charge; they were again driven back with a dreadful slaughter, and two rebel legions of Gauls, who had been banished into the east, singularly disciplined and disciplined courage by a nocturnal sally into the heart of the Persian camp. In one of the fiercest of these repeated assaults, Amida was betrayed by the treachery of a deserter, who indicated to the barbarians a secret and neglected strait, scooped out of the rock by a stream of water. The chosen archers of the royal guard ascended in silence to the third story of a lofty tower, which commanded the precipice; they elevated on high the Persian ban-er, the signal of confidence to the assailants, and of dismay to the besieged; and if this devoted band could have maintained their post a few minutes longer, the necessitate any description. They were a far more ancient and powerful race, than the barbarians, and inhabited a large and level country, while is still preserves its name, to the south of Khorasan, Albanians is known to us. See the Voyages d’Ott, tom. ii. p. 273.

5 D’Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 597.) Notwithstanding the violent and unadvised victory which this event procured to Sapor, the Persians, after this day, had no other idea of going farther.

reduction of the place might have been purchased by the sacrifice of their lives. After Sapor had tried, without success, the cfficacy of force and of stratagem, he had recourse to the slower but more certain operations of a regular siege, in the conduct of which he was instructed by the skill of the Roman deserters. The trenches were opened at a convenient distance, and the troops destined for that service advanced under the portable cover of strong hurdles, to fill up the ditch, and undermine the foundations of the walls. Wooden towers were set up at the same time to connect, and moved forward on wheels, till the soldiers, who were provided with every species of missile weapons, could engage almost on level ground with the troops who defended the rampart. Every mode of resistance which art could suggest, or courage could encourage, was employed to the defence of Amida, and the works of Sapor were more than once destroyed by the fire of the Romans. But the resources of a besieged city may be exhausted. The Persians repaired their losses, and pushed their approaches; a large breach was made by the battering-rain, and the strength of the garrison, wasted by the siege, and by disease, yielded to the fury of the assault. The soldiers, the citizens, their wives, their children, all who had not time to escape through the opposite gate, were involved by the conquerors in a promiscuous massacre.

Of Sapor and Amida.

But the ruin of Amida was the safety of the Roman provinces. As soon as the first transports of victory had subsided, Sapor was at leisure to reflect, that to chastise a disobedient city, he had lost the flower of his troops, and the most favourable season for conquest. Thirty thousand of his veterans had fallen under the walls of Amida, during the continuance of a siege which lasted seventy-three days: and the disappointed monarch returned to his capital with affected triumph and secret mortification. It was more than probable, that the inconstancy of his barbarian allies was tempted to relinquish a war in which they had encountered such unexpected difficulties; and that the aged king of the Chionites, satiated with revenge, turned away with horror from a scene of action where he had been deprived of the hope of his family and nation. The strength as well as spirit of the army with which Sapor took the field in the ensuing year, was equal to that which bounded the province of his ambition. Instead of aspiring to the conquest of the east, he was obliged to content himself with the reduction of the two fortified cities of Mesopotamia, Singara and Bezabde;1 the one situate in the midst of a sandy desert, the other in a small peninsula, sur- rounding it, on every side, with deep and miry marshes; the stream of the Tigris. Five Roman legions, of the diminutive size to which they had been reduced in the age of Constantine, were made prisoners, and sent into remote captivity on the extreme confines of Persia. After dismantling the walls of Singara, the conqueror abandoned that solitary and sequestered place; but he carefully restored the fortifications of Bezabde, and fixed in that important post a garrison or colony of veterans, amply supplied with every means of defence, and animated by high sentiments of honour and fidelity. This reduction of the enemy, and the expulsion of Sapor, incurred some disgrace by an unsuccessful enterprise against Virtha, or Territ, a strong, or as it was uni-

1 Ammianus has marked the chronology of this year by three events of capital consequence with the three first books of the series of his history. 1. The corn was ripe when Sapor invaded Mesopotamia; 2. Cun jam stipula favemere turgescere; a circum- stance which probably determined the emperor to leave the province of Alaeus, where he was naturally refitted, at the month of April or May. See Hårner's Observations on Scrips. Ant. Hist., p. 177. 3. The progress of Sapor was checked by the overflowing of the Euphrates, which generally happens in July and August. Int. Nat., v. 21, Pagi. Introduct. delta Var., s. c. 669. 3. When Sapor was preparing to attack Amida, after a siege of seventy-three days, the autumn was far ad- vanced, and the emperor was not without some misgiving as to the success of his enterprise. To reconcile these apparent contradictions, we must allow for some degree of latitude in the chronology, some inaccuracy in the historian, and some disorder in the seasons.

2 The account of these sieges is given by Ammianus, xx. 6, 7.
swarm of Franks and Alemanni were invited to cross the Rhine by presents and promises, by the hopes of spoil, and by a perpetual grant of all the territories which they should be able to subdue. But the emperor, who for a temporary service had thus imprudently made himself the abject servant of barbarous ambition, did not discover and hasten the difficulty of dismissing these formidable allies, after they had tasted the richness of the Roman soil. Regardless of the nice distinction of royalty and rebellion, these undisciplined robbers treated as their natural enemies all the subjects of the empire, who refused and rejected what they were desirous of acquiring. Forty-five flourishing cities, Tongres, Cologne, Treves, Worms, Spire, Strasbourg, &c., besides a far greater number of towns and villages, were pillaged, and for the most part reduced to ashes. The barbarians of Germany, still faithful to the maxims of their ancestors, shunned the confinement of walls, to which they applied the odious names of prisons and sepulchres; and fixing their independent habitations on the banks of rivers, the Rhine, the Moselle, and the Meuse, they secured themselves against the danger of a surprise, by a rude and hasty fortification of large trees, which were felled and thrust up in a heap, and thus the stateliness of the gilded palaces, established in the modern countries of Alsace and Lorraine, the Franks occupied the island of the Batavians, together with an extensive district of Brabant, which was then known by the appellation of Toxandria, and may deserve to be considered as the original seat of the Faucini, a people, who, not differing from their neighbours in the mouth of the Rhine, the conquests of the Germans extended above forty miles to the west of that river, over a country peopled by colonies of their own name and nation; and the scenes of their devastations was three times more extensive than that of their conquests. At a greater distance the Roman army was deserted, and the inhabitants of the fortified cities, who trusted to their strength and vigilance, were obliged to content themselves with such supplies of corn as they could raise on the vacant land within the enclosure of their walls. The diminished legions, destitute of pay and provisions, of arms and discipline, trembled at the approach, and even at the name, of the barbarians.

Under these melancholy circumstances, an unexperienced youth was appointed to save and to govern the provinces of Gaul, or rather, as he expresses it himself, to exhibit the vain image of imperial greatness. The retired scholar-education of Julian, in which he had been more conversant with books than with arms, with the dead than with the living, left him in profound ignorance of the practical arts of war and government; and when he awkwardly repeated some military exercise which it was necessary for him to learn, he explained with a sigh, "O Plato, Plato, what a task for a philosopher!" Yet even this speculative philosophy, which men of business are too apt to despise, had filled the mind of Julian with the noblest precepts, and the most shining examples; had animated him with the love of virtue, the desire of fame, and the contempt of death. The habit of his mind, therefore, if it did not render him still more essential in the severe discipline of the Roman army.
ized to the knowledge of the country, secretly collected their scattered forces, and seizing the opportunity of a dark and rainy day, poured with unexpected fury on the rear-guard of the Romans. Before the inevitable disorder could be remedied, two legions were destroyed; and Julian was taught by experience the caution of the most important lessons of the art of war. In a second and more successful action, he recovered and established his military fame; but as the agility of the barbarians saved them from the pursuit, his victory was neither bloody nor decisive. He advanced to the banks of the Rhine, suffered the ruins of Cologne, convinced himself of the difficulties of the war, and retreated on the approach of winter, discontented with the court, with his army, and with his own success.

The power of the enemy was yet unbroken; and the Caesar had no sooner separated his troops and fixed his own quarters at Sens, in the centre of Gaul, than he was surrounded and besieged by a numerous host of Germans. Reduced in this extremity to the resources of his own mind, he displayed a prudent intrepidity which compensated for all the deficiencies of the place and garrison; and thus he kept to the end of thirty days, were obliged to retire with disappointed rage.

His second campaign was unlooked only to his sword for this signal deliverance, was imbittered by the reflection, that he was abandoned, betrayed, and perhaps deceived in his expectation. He determined to aid him by every tie of honour and fidelity. Marcellus, master-general of the cavalry in Gaul, interpreting too strictly the jealous orders of the court, beheld with supine indifference the distress of Julian, and had restrained the troops under his command from marching to the relief of Sens. If the Caesar had dissembled in silence so dangerous an insult, his person and authority would have been exposed to the contempt of the world; and if an action so criminal had been suffered to pass with impunity, the emperor would have confirmed the suspicions, which received a very considerable colour from his past conduct towards the princes of the Flavian family. Marcellus was recalled, and gently dismissed from his office. In his room Severus was appointed general of the cavalry; an experienced soldier, of approved courage and fidelity, who could advise with respect and zeal; and who submitted, without reluctance, to the supreme command which Julian, by the interest of his patroness Eusebia, at length obtained over the armies of Gaul.

A very judicious plan of operations was adopted for the approaching campaign. Julian himself, at the head of some of the three new levies which he had been permitted to form, boldly penetrated into the centre of the German cantonments, and carefully re-established the fortifications of Sens, in an advantageous post, which would either check the incursions, or intercept the retreat of the enemy. At the same time Babito, general of the infantry, advanced from Milan with an army of thirty thousand men, and passing the mountains, prepared to throw a bridge over the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of Basel. It was reasonable to expect that the Alemanni, pressed on either side by the Rhine and the Saane, would be soon forced to evacuate the provinces of Gaul, and to hasten to the defence of their native country. But the hopes of the campaign were defeated by the incapacity, or the envy, or the secret instructions of Barbatius; who acted as if he had been the enemy of the Caesar, and the secret ally of the barbarians. The negligence with which he permitted a troop of pillagers freely to pass, and to return almost before the gates of his camp, may be imputed to his want of abilities; but the treachery and weakness of Barbatius deprived Julian of the expected support; and left him to extricate himself from a hazardous situation, where he could neither remain with safety, nor retire with honour.

As soon as they were delivered from the fears of invasion, the Alemanni prepared to chastise the Roman youth, who presumed to dispute the possession of that country, which they claimed as their own by the right of conquest and of treaties. They employed three days, and as many nights, in transporting over the Rhine their military powers. The fierce Chnodomar, shaking the ground with a prodigious crash, hurled the javelin, which was wielded against the brother of Magnentius, led the van of the barbarians, and moderated by his experience the martial ardour which his example inspired. He was followed by six other kings, by ten princes of regal extraction, by a long train of high-spirited nobles, and by the chieftains of the chosen youth of their tribes of Germany. The confidence derived from the view of their own strength, was increased by the intelligence which they received from a deserter, that the Caesar, with a feeble army of thirteen thousand men, occupied a post about one-and-a-half miles from the camp of Strassburg. With this inadequate force, Julian resolved to seek and to encounter the barbarian host; and the chance of a general action was preferred to the tedious and uncertain operation of separately engaging the dispersed parties of the Alemanni. The Romans marched in close order, and in two columns, the cavalry on the right, the infantry on the left; and the day was so far spent when they appeared in sight of the enemy, that Julian was desirous of deferring the battle till the next morning, and of allowing his troops to recull their exhausted strength by the necessary refreshments. His commands went to and fro with zeal, but with some reluctance, to the clamours of the soldiers, and even to the opinion of his council, he exhorted them to justify by their valor the eager impatience, which, in case of a defeat, would be universally branded with the epithets of rashness and presumption. The trumpets sounded, the military shout was heard, and the vanguard entered the field, and the two armies rushed with equal fury to the charge. The Caesar, who conducted in person his right wing, depended on the dexterity of his archers, and the weight of his cuirassiers. But his ranks were instantly broken by an irregular mixture of light horse and of light infantry from another country, and he had the mortification of beholding the flight of six hundred of his most renowned cuirassiers. The fugitives were stopped and rallied by the presence and authority of Julian, who, careless of his own safety, threw himself before them, and urging every arm, went back against the victorious enemy. The conflict between the two lines of infantry was obstinate and bloody. The Germans possessed the superiority of strength and stature, the Romans that of discipline and 2 Ammianus xlvii. 4. Libanius speaks rather more advantageously of the military talents of Marcellus. Orat. i. p. 327. And Julian in his epitaph for the latter, speaks of the latter with a strange silence.

4 On the design and failure of the co-operation between Julian and Barbaro, see Ammianus, xlii. 11. and Libanius, Orat. i. p. 237. As appears from the latter, Magnentius would have put himself at the head of the German armies. See also the figure and character of Chnodomar. Audax et ingenio sibi gens, incertorum, ubi aderit, prorsim operatur immensia, equo spumante, et arduis victoriam compluvia, praebet, sed non iactat, sed, super omnem impetum, aliorum conspexit: astra streneus et nolue, et utiles prater caeterum, honos se expugnare doctore, atque alios tenere et supinum.

5 After the battle, Julian ventured to revive the rictus of ancient discipline, by expulsing these fugitives from the camp, as appeared to the defeated Romans as a signal of the whole camp. In the next campaign, these troops nobly received their honour. Zonaras, i. ii. 147. temper; and as the barbarians, who served under the standard of the empire, united the respective advantages of both parties, their strenuous efforts, guided by a skilful leader, at length determined the event of the day. The Romans lost four tribunes, and two hundred and forty-three soldiers, in this memorable battle of Strasburg, so glorious to the Cæsar, and so salutary to the provinces of Gaul, yet while the enemy was overthrown, the Alemanni were slain in the field, without including those who were drowned in the Rhine, or transfix-ated with darts whilst they attempted to swim across the river. Chnodomar himself was surrounded and taken prisoner, with three of his brave companions, who had determined not to impede the march of the army of the Alemanni on the Rhine, the death of their chief. Julian received him with military pomp in the council of his officers; and expressing a generous pity for the fallen state, dissembled his inward contempt for the abort humiliated, of his expectative. Instead of exhibiting the vanquished king of the Alemanni, as a grateful spectacle to the cities of Gaul, he respectfully laid at the feet of the emperor this splendid trophy of his victory. Chnodomar experienced an honourable treatment; but the impatient barbarian could not long survive his defeat, his confinement, and his captivity.

After Julian had repulsed the Alemanni from the provinces of the Upper Rhine, he turned his arms against the Franks, who were seated nearer to the ocean on the confines of Gaul and Germany; and who, from their numbers, and still more from their intractable valour, had ever been esteemed the most formidable of the barbarians. Although they were strongly actuated by the allurements of rapine, they professed a disinterested love of war, which they considered as the supreme honour and felicity of human nature; and their minds and bodies were so completely hardened by perpetual habit of fighting, that the army of Julian, when the warrior, the snows of winter were as pleasant to them as the flowers of spring. In the month of December, which followed the battle of Strasburg, Julian attackated a body of six hundred Franks, who had thrown themselves into two castles on the Meuse. In the midst of that severe season they sustained, with inflexible constancy, a siege of fifty-four days; till at length, exhausted by hunger, and satisfied that the vigilance of the enemy in breaking the ice of the river, left them no hopes of escape, the Franks consented, for the first time, to dispense with the ancient law which commanded the captives to be slain, if they refused to return. Julian immediately sent his captives to the court of Constatiunus, who, accepting them as a valuable present, rejoiced in the opportunity of adding so many heroes to the choicest troops of his domestic guards. The ob-

on either side of the Meyn, which were plentifully stored with corn and cattle, felt the ravages of an invading army. The principal houses, constructed with some imitation of Roman elegance, were consumed by the flames; and the Caesar boldly advanced about ten miles, till his progress was stopped by a dark and impenetrable forest, undershrubbed and wooded; whose mass was so great as to require a considerable time to pass through. There were no signs of habitation, or any vestige of human habitation, which threatened, with secret snares and ambush, every step of the assailant. The ground was already covered with snow; and Julian, after repairing an ancient castle which had been erected by Trajan, graced a trace of ten months to the submissive beauty. At the end of this period, Julian undertook a second expedition beyond the Rhine, to humble the pride of Sinar and Horta, the two of the kings of the Alemanni, who had been present at the battle of Strasburg. They promised to restore all the Roman captives who yet remained alive; and as the Caesar had procured an exact account from the cities and villages of Gaul, of the inhabitants whom they had lost, he detected every attempt to deceive him with a degree of readiness and accuracy, which almost established the belief of his supernatural knowledge. His third expedition was still more successful in impelling the two barbarians. The Germans had collected their military powers, and moved along the opposite banks of the river, with a design of destroying the bridge, and of preventing the passage of the Romans. But this judicious plan of defence was disconcerted by a skilful diversion. Three hundred and fifty light-armed troops, and active soldiers, were detached and posted in forty small boats to fall down the stream in silence, and to land at some distance from the posts of the enemy. They executed their orders with so much boldness and celerity, that they had almost surprised the barbarian chiefs, who returned in the earliest instance of intimidation from one of their nocturnal festivals. Without repeating the uniform and disgusting tale of slaughter and devastation, it is sufficient to observe, that Julian dictated his own conditions of peace to six of the most powerful kings of the Alemanni, three of whom were permitted to view the severe discipline and martial pomp of a Roman camp. Followed by twenty thousand captives, whom he had rescued from the chains of the barbarians, the Caesar repassed the Rhine, after terminating a war, the success of which has been compared to the ancient glories of the Punics and Etrurians.

Restores the cities of Gaul. Julian had secured an interval of peace; he applied himself to a work more congenial to his humane and philosophic temper. The cities of Gaul, which had suffered from the inroads of the barbarians, he diligently repaired; and several between Mentz and the mouth of the Rhine, are particularly mentioned; as having been rebuilt and fortified by the order of Julian. 3 The vanquished Germans had submitted to the just but humiliating condition of preparing and conveying the necessary materials. The active zeal of Julian urged the prosecution of the work; and such was the spirit which he had diffused among the troops, that the auxiliaries themselves, waiving their exemption from any duties of fatigue, contended for the most laborious and laborious; and with the diligence of the Roman soldiery. It was incumbent on the Caesar, as much as impossible for the subsistence, as well as for the safety, of the inhabitants and of the garrisons. The desertion of the former, and the mutiny of the latter, must have been the fatal and inevitable consequences of famine. The tributes paid in consequences of Gaul, or were by the calamities of war; but the security of harvests which the continent were supplied, by his paternal care, from

CHAPTER XX.

The notices, progress, and effects of the conversion of Constantine—Legal establishment and constitution of the catholic or christian church.

The public establishment of Christianity may be considered as one of those important and domestic revolutions which excite the most lively curiosity, and afford the most valuable instruction. The victories and the civil policy of Constantine no longer influence the state of Europe; but a considerable portion of the globe still retains the impression which it received from the conversion of that monarch; and the ecclesiastical institutions of his reign are still connected, in some degree, with all the revolutions, the arts, and the interests of the present generation.

In the consideration of a subject which may be examined with impartiality, and cannot be viewed with indifference, a difficulty immediately arises of a very unexpected nature; that of ascertaining the real and precise date of the conversion of Constantine. The eloquent Lactantius, in the midst of his court, seems impatient to proclaim to the world the glorious example of the sovereign of Gaul; who, in the first moments of his reign, acknowledged and adored the majesty of the true and only God. The learned Eusebius has ascribed the faith of Constantine to the miraculous sign which was displayed in the heavens whilst he meditated and prepared the Italian expedition. The historian Zosimus has related that the emperor, from the conviction which he had imbued his hands in the blood of his eldest son, before he publicly renounced the gods of Rome and of his ancestors. The perplexity produced by these discordant authorities, is derived from the behaviour of Constantine himself. According to the strictness of ecclesiastical language, the first of the christian emperors was unworthy of that name, till the moment of his death; since it was only during his last illness that he received, as a catechumen, the imposition of hands; and as was afterwards admitted, the fashion of the fourth century, assumed the territorial appellation of Pontifex.

A.D. 306.

The date of the Divine Institutions of Lactantius, has been accurately discussed. Difficulties have been started, solutions proposed, and an expedient imagined of two original editions; the former published during the persecution of Diocletian, the latter under that of Constantine. See Dufresnoy, Pref. p. Vilemont. Mem. Eccl. Hist. vi. p. 653-616. Lardner's Credibility, part ii. vol. vii. p. 78-86. For my own part, I am almost convinced that Lactantius dedicated his Institutions to the sovereign of Gaul, at a time when Gallic, Maximiian, and Licinius, persecuted the christians; that is, between the years 296 and 311.

Lactant. Divin. Inst. i. l. 27. The first and most important of these passages have been shrewdly and confidently woven into a fine web, and not without reason. If, however, it is found that there is a base of fact, and not in nineteen. If we weigh the comparatively greater value of the following passages, these may be admitted as arguments for the adoption of this view, if not as full confirmation. Lactant. Divin. Inst. i. 34. The history of the Latin church, must, for a time allude to another, in which the doctrine of three persons in one God is established. A.D. 361.

That, and that he founded the Bishopric of Juliaca, in a memorable period of the history of the church, which, according to theatre were unknown or despised. He indignantly contrasted the effeminate Syrians with the brave and honest simplicity of the Gauls, and almost forgave the intemperance, which was the only stain of the Celtic character. If Julian could now revisit the capital of France, he might converse with men of science and letters, capable of instructing a disciple of the Greeks; he might expect the grateful and graceful fictions of a nation, whose martial spirit has never been enervated by the indulgence of luxury; and he must applaud the perfection of that inestimable art, which softens and refines and embalms the intercourse of social life.

tated, by the initiatory rites of baptism, into the number of the faithful.1 The Christians, however, Constantine must have perceived as a religion no more vague and qualified sense; and the nicest accuracy is required in tracing the slow and almost imperceptible gradations by which the monarch declared himself the protector, and at length the proselyte, of the church. It was an arduous task to reconcile the tenets and prejudices of the faithful to the doctrine of Christ, to acknowledge the divine power of Christ, and to understand that the truth of his revelation was incompatible with the worship of the gods. The obstacles which he had probably experienced in his own mind, instructed him to proceed with caution in the transaction. The public religious services of Rome had insensibly discovered his new opinions, as far as he could enforce them with safety and with effect. During the whole course of his reign, the stream of Christianity flowed with a gentle, though accelerated, motion: but its general direction was sometimes checked, and some of its subjects, by publishing in the same year two edicts; the first of which enjoined the solemn observance of Sunday, and the second directed the regular consultation of Aruspices.1 While this important revolution yet remained in suspense, the Christians and the pagans watched the conduct of their monarch with the same anxiety, but with very opposite sentiments. The former were prompted by every motive of zeal, as well as vanity, to exaggerate the marks of his favour, and the evidences of his faith. Truth, indeed, was not yet consistent enough to inspire into despair and resentment, attempted to conceal from the world, and from themselves, that the gods of Rome could no longer reckon the emperor in the number of their votaries. The same passions and prejudices engaged the partial writers of the times to connect the public profession of Christianity with the most glorious or the most ignominious era of the reign of Constantine.

His pagan super-

ity might transpire in the discourses or actions of Constantine, he persevered till he was near fifty years old in the practice of the established religion;2 and the same conduct, which in the court of Nicomedia might be imputed to his fear, could be ascribed only to the inclination or policy of the sovereign of Gaul. His liberality restored and enriched the temples of the gods: the medals which issued from his imperial mint are impressed with the figures and attributes of Jupiter and Apollo, of Mars and Hercules; and his filial piety increased the council of Olympus by the solemn apotheosis of his father Constantius.1 But the devotion of Constantine was more peculiarly directed to the genius of the sun, the Apollo of Greek and Roman mythology; and he was pleased to be ranked among the votaries of the god of Light and Poetry. The unerring shafts of that deity, the brightness of his eyes, his laurel wreath, immortal beauty, and elegant accomplishments, seem to point him out as the patron of a young hero. The altars of Apollo with the votive offerings of Constantine; and the cedules multitude were taught to believe, that the emperor was permitted to behold with mortal eyes the visible majesty of their tutelar deity; and that, either waking or in a vision, he was blessed with the auspicious omens of a long and victorious reign. The sun was universally celebrated as the invincible guide and protector of Constantine; and the pagans might reasonably expect that the insulted god would pursue with unrelenting vengeance the impiety of his ungrateful favourite.2

As long as Constantine exercised authority limited to the provinces of Gaul and of his son, his Christian subjects were protected by the authority, and perhaps by the laws, of a prince, who wisely left to the gods the care of vindicating their own honour. If we may credit the assertion of Constantine himself, he had been an indifferent spectator of the contest between the Christian and the pagan faith, expected to be settled, by the hands of Roman soldiers, on those citizens whose religion was their only crime.3 In the east and in the west, he had seen the different effects of severity and indulgence; and as the former was rendered still more oppressive by the example of Galerius, the implacable enemy, the latter was recommended to his imitation by the authority and advice of a dying father. The son of Constantius immediately suspended or repealed the edicts of persecution, and granted the free exercise of their religious ceremonies to all those who had already professed themselves members of the church. They were soon encouraged to depend on the favour as well as on the justice of their sovereign, who had imbued a secret and sincere reverence for the name of Christ, and for the God of the Christians.4

About five months after the conquest A.D. 313, March, of Italy, Constantine, by the ascendant of genius and power, obtained the ready conenence of his colleague Licinius; the union of their names and authority disarmed the fury of Maximin; and, after the death of the tyrant of the east, the edict of Milan was received as a general and fundamental law of the Roman world.5 The wisdom of the emperors provided for the restitution of all the civil and religious rights which the Christians had been so unjustly deprived. It was enacted that the places of worship, and public lands, which had been confiscated, should be restored to the church, without dispute, without delay, and without expense: and this severe injunction was accompanied with a gracious promise, that if any of the purchasers had the least scruple to return them, they should be immediately restored. The pope, with these concessions, surrendered to the world, that they have granted a free and absolute power to the christians, and to all others, of following the religion which each individual thinks proper to prefer, to which he has addicted his mind, and which he may deem the best adapted to his own use. They carefully explain every ambiguous word, remove every exception, and exact from the governors of the provinces a strict obedience to the true and simple meaning of an edict, which was designed to establish and secure, without any limitation, the claims of religious liberty. They condone to assign two weighty reasons for the edict: one that they thought truth and universal toleration: the humane intention of consulting the peace and happiness of their people; and the pious hope, that, by such a conduct, they shall appease and propitiate the Deity, whose seat is in heaven. They gratefully acknowledge the many signal proofs which the Deity has given of his divine favour; and they trust that the same Providence will for ever continue to protect the prosperity of the prince and people. From these vague and indefinite expressions of piety, three apprehensions may be deduced, of a different, but not of an incompatible, nature. The mind of Constantine may be susceptible of every form of idolatry and religions. According to the loose and complying notions of polytheism, he might acknowledge the God of the christians as one of the many deities who composed the hierarchy of heaven. Or perhaps he might entertain the philosophical and pleasing idea, that, notwithstanding the variety of names, of rites, and of opinions, all the sects and all the nations of mankind are united in the worship of the common Father and Creator of the universe; 1

But the counsels of princes are more often influenced by views of temporary advantage, than by abstract and speculative truths. The partial and increasing favour of Constantine may naturally be referred to the esteem which he entertained for the moral character of the christians; and to a persuasion, that the propagation of the gospel would accelerate the practice of private and public virtue. Whatever latitude an absolute monarch may assume in his own conduct, whatever indulgence he may claim for his own passions, it is undoubtedly his interest that all his subjects should respect the natural and civil obligations of society. But the operation of the wisest laws is imperfect and precarious. They seldom inspire virtue, and cannot always restrain vice. Their power is insufficient to prohibit all that they condemn, nor can they always punish the actions which they prohibit. The legislators of antiquity had summoned to aid the power of education, the example and influence of Rome and Sparta, was long since extinguished in a declining and despotic empire. Philosophy still exercised her tender sway over the human mind, but the cause of virtue derived very feeble support from the influence of the pagan superstition. Under these discouraging circumstances, a prudent magistracy might observe with pleasure the progress of a religion which diffused among the people a pure, benevolent, and universal system of ethics, adapted to every duty and every condition of life; recommended as the will of God, and of Christ, and sanctioned by the sanction of eternal rewards or punishments. The experience of Greek and Roman history could not inform the world how far the system of national manners might be reformed and improved by the precepts of a divine revelation; and Constantine might listen with attention to the flattering, and indeed realible, assurances of Lactanius. The eloquent apostolus seemed firmly to expect, and almost ventured to promise, that the establishment of Christianity would restore the innocence and felicity of the primitive age: that the worship of the true God would extinguish war and dissension among those who mutually considered themselves as the children of a common parent; that every impure desire, every angry or selfish passion, would be restrained by the knowledge of the gospel; and that the magistrates might shew the sword of justice among a people who would be universally actuated by the sentiments of truth and purity and moderation, of harmony and universal love. 2

The passive and unresisting obedience, which bows under the yoke of authority, or even of oppression, must have appeared, in the eyes of an absolute monarch, as perhaps the most comfortable, and the most agreeable, of all the forms of religious observance. 3 The primitive christians derived the institution of civil government, not from the consent of the people, but from the decrees of heaven. The reigning emperor, though he had usurped the sceptre by treason and murder, immediately assumed the sacred character of the edict, and was himself entitled to be accounted for the abuse of his power; and his subjects were indissolubly bound, by their oath of fidelity, to a tyrant, who had violated every law of nature and society. The humble christians were sent into the world as sheep among wolves; and since they were not permitted to employ force, even in the defence of their religion, they should be still more criminal if they were tempted to shed the blood of their fellow creatures, in disputing the vain privileges, or the world possessions, of this transitory life. Faithful to the doctrine of the apostle, who in the reign of Nero had pronounced the duty of suffering for righteousness, the christians of the three first centuries preserved their conscience pure and innocent of the guilt of secret conspiracy, or open rebellion. While they experienced the rigour of persecution, they were never provoked either to meet their tyrants in the field, or in indignantly to withdraw themselves into some remote and sequestered corner of the globe. 4 The protestants of France, of Germany, and of Britain, who asserted with such intrepid courage their civil and religious freedom, have been insulted by the invidious comparison between the conduct of the primitive and the reformed christians. 5 Perhaps, instead of comparing, some apologue may be due to the superior sense and spirit of our ancestors, who had convinced themselves that religion cannot abolish the unalienable rights of human nature. Perhaps the patience of the primitive church may be ascribed to its weakness, as well as to the influence of the primitive Christians, who were born leaders, without arms, without fortifications, must have encountered inevitable destruction in a rash and fruitless resistance to the master of the Roman legions. But the Christians, when they deprecated the wrath of Diocletian, or solicited the favour of Constantine, conducted their business with the truth and consciousness that they held the principle of passive obedience, and that, in the space of three centuries, their conduct had always been conformable to their principles. They might add, that the throne of the emperors would be established on a fixed and permanent basis if all their subjects, even bringing the christian doctrine, should learn to suffer and to obey.

Divine right of Constantine.
In the general order of Providence, princes and tyrants are considered as the ministers of Heaven, appointed to rule or to chastise the nations of the earth. But sacred history affords many illustrous examples of the more immediate interposition of the Deity in the government of his chosen people. The sceptre and the sword were committed to the hands of Moses, of Joshua, of Gideon, of David, of the Maccabees; the virtues of those heroes were the seal of the effectual grace by which the triumph of the success of their arms was destined to achieve the deliverance or the triumph of the church. If the judges of Israel were occasionall and temporary magistrates, the kings of Judah derived from the royal anointing of their great ancestor, an hereditary and indefeasible connexion with the truths, which could not be altered or recalled by the caprice of their subjects. The same extraordinary providence, which was no longer confined to the Jewish people, might elect Constantine and his family as the protectors of the christian world; and the devout Laetareus announces, in a proper figure, the immediate grace of his long and universal reign. Galerius and Maximin, Maxentius and Licinius, were the rivals who shared with the favourite of Heaven the provinces of the empire. The tragic deaths of Galerius and Maximin soon gratified the resentment, and calculated the sanguine expectations of the christians. The success of Constantine against Maxentius and Licinius, removed the two formidable competitors who still opposed the triumph of the second David, and his cause might seem to claim the peculiar interposition of Providence. The character of the emperor, which disgraced the spirit of the times and nature; and though the christians might enjoy his precarious favour, they were exposed, with the rest of his subjects, to the effects of his wanton and capricious cruelty. The conduct of Licinius soon betrayed the reluctance with which he had consented to the wise and humane regulations of the Edict of Milan. The convocation of provincial synods was prohibited in his dominions; his christian officers were ignominiously dismissed; and if he avoided the guilt, or rather danger, of a general persecution, his partial oppressions were rendered still more odious, by the violation of a solemn and voluntary engagement. While the east, according to the lively expression of Eusebius, was involved in the shades of infernal darkness, the auspicious rays of celestial light warmed and illuminated the provinces of the west. The piety of Constantine admitted as unexceptionable proof the justice of his arms; and his use of victory confirmed the opinion of the christians, that their hero was inspired, and conducted, by the Lord ofhosts. The conquest of Italy produced a general edict of toleration; and as soon as the defeat of Licinius had instigated the Christian party to the elevation of the Roman world, he immediately, by circular letters, exhorted all his subjects to imitate, without delay, the example of their sovereign, and to embrace the divine truth of christianity.

The assumpion of Constantine was intimately connected with the designs of Providence, instilparty led into the minds of the christians two opinions, which, by a different means, assisted the accomplishment of the prophesy. Their warm and active loyalty was exhibited in the professed spirit of the empire; and they confidently expected that their strenuous efforts would be seconded by some divine and miraculous aid. The enemies of Constantine have imputed to interested motives the alliance which he insensibly contracted with the catholic church, and which apparently contributed to the success of his ambition. In the beginning of the fourth century, the christians still bore a very inadequate proportion to the inhabitants of the empire; but among a degenerate people, who viewed the change of masters with the indifference of slaves, the spirit and union of a re-who publicly declared that he had taken up arms for the deliverance of the church. The enthusiasm which inspired the belief of a vast crowd, and perhaps the emperor himself, was sharpened by a new stroke of fortune. It was known that the followings of Barabbas, with the full assurance, that the same God, who had formerly opened a passage to the Israelites through the waters of Jordan, and had thrown down the walls of Jericho at the sound of the trumpets of Joshua, would display a similar efficacy and open a passage to the Christians through the gates of Rome. The enthusiasm of ecclesiastical history is prepared to affirm, that their expectations were justified by the conspicuous miracle to which the conversion of the first christian emperor has been almost unanimously ascribed. The real or imaginary cause of so important an event, deserves and demands the attention of posterity; and I shall endeavour to form a just estimate of the famous vision of Constantine, by a distinct consideration of the standard, the dream, and the celestial sign; by separating the historical, the natural, and the marvellous parts of this extraordinary story, which, in the composition of a special work, might otherwise have been artfully confounded in one splendid and brittle mass.

I. An instrument of the tortures which were inflicted only on slaves and strangers, became an object of horror in the eyes of a Roman citizen; and the idea of guilt, of pain, and of ignominy, were united in the mind of the Roman emperor, by the simple idea of the cross. The piety, rather than the humanity, of Constantine, soon abolished in his dominions the punishment which the Saviour of mankind had consecrated to suffer; but the emperor had already learned to despise the prejudices of his education, and of his political considerations. They were at the battle of Rome his own statute, bearing a cross in its right hand; with an inscription, which referred the victory of his arms, and the deliverance of Rome, to the virtue of that symbol, the true sign of force and courage. The same symbol sanctified the arms of the soldiers of Constantine; the cross glittered on their helmets, was engraved on their shields, was interwoven into their banners; and the consecrated emblems which adorned the person of the emperor himself, were distinguished only by richer materials and more exquisite workmanship. But the principal standard which displayed itself at the battle of the Labarum, an obscure, though celebrated name, which has been vainly derived from almost all the languages of the world. It is described as a long pike intersected by a transversal beam. The silken veil which hung down from the beam, was curiously inwrought with the images of the reigning monarch and his children. The summit of the flag was decorated with a golden monogram, which enclosed the mysterious monogram, at once expressive of the figure of the cross, and the initial letters of the name of Christ. The safety of the labarum was intrusted to fifty guards, of approved valour and fidelity; their station was marked by honours and consorts of victory; and the emperor conceived an opinion, that as long as the guards of the labarum were engaged in the execution of their office, they were secure and invulnerable amidst the darts of the enemy. In the second civil war Licinius felt and dreaded the power of this consecrated banner, the sight of which, in the distress of battle, animated the soldiers of Constantine with an invincible enthusiasm, and scattered terror and dismay through the ranks of the adverse legions. The christian emperors, who respected the example of Constantine, displayed in all their military expeditions the standard of the cross; but when the emperor had degenerated into a tyrant, he chose to appear in person at the head of their armies, the labarum was deposited as a venerable but useless relic in the palace of Constantinople. Its honours are still preserved on the medals of the Flavian family. Their grateful devotion has placed the monogram of Christ within the limits of the pious emperors, as the sumptuous epithets of the republic, glory of the army, restoration of public happiness, are equally applied to the religious and military trophies; and there is still extant a medal of the emperor Constantinus, where the standard of the labarum is accompanied with these memorable words: BY THIS SIGN THOU SHALT CONQUER. II. In all occasions of danger or distress, the dream of Constantine was in the practice of the primitive Christians to fortify their minds and bodies by the sign of the cross, which they used, in all their ecclesiastical rites, in all the daily occurrences of life, as an infallible preservative against every species of spiritual or temporal evil. The authority of the church might alone have had sufficient weight to justify the devotion of Constantine, who, in the same prudent and gradual progress, acknowledged the truth, and assumed the symbol of Christianity. But the testimony of a contemporary writer, suffices to prove, that even at this early stage, the cause of religion, bestows on the piety of the emperor a more awful and sublime character. His formation, with the most perfect confidence, that in the night which preceded the last battle against Maxentius, (which is employed by Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Probaudent, &c. still remain totally unknown; in spite of the efforts of the critics, who have inconsiderately tortured the Latin, Greek, Spanish, Cotie, Teste. Constantine was enthroned in a dream to inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the celestial sign of God, the sacred monogram of the name of Christ; that he executed his victory by the power of his profession and obedience were rewarded by the decisive victory of the Milvian bridge. Some consideration might perhaps incline a sceptical mind to suspect the judgment or the veracity of the rhetorician, whose pen, either from fear or interest, was devoted to the cause of the prevailing faction. He appears to have published his deaths of the assassins at Nicomedia about three years after the Roman victory; but the interval of a thousand miles, and a thousand days, will allow an ample latitude for the invention of declaimers, the endeavours of men, that might have interested the imagination of the emperor himself; who might listen without indignation to a marvellous tale, which exalted his fame, and profaned his name. In favours of Licinius, who still dissembled his animosity to the Christians, the same author has provided a similar vision, of a form of prayer, which was communicated by an angel, and received by the whole army before they engaged the legions of the tyrant Maximin. The frequent repetition of miracles serves to provoke, where it does not subdue, the reason of mankin'd: but if the dream of Constantine is separately considered, it may be naturally accounted for by the poetical prophecies of the emperors. Whilst his anxiety for the approaching day, which must decide the fate of the empire, was suspended by a short and interrupted slumber, the venerable form of Christ, and the well-known symbol of his religion, might forcibly offer themselves to the active fancy of a prince who revered the name, and had perhaps secretly implored the power, of the God of the christians. As readily might a consummate statesman indulge himself in the use of one of those military stratagems, some of those pious frauds, which Philip and Secturias had employed with such art and effect, the preternatural origin of dreams was universally admitted by the nations of antiquity, and a considerable part of the Gallic army was already prepared to place their confidence in the salutary sign of the christian religion. The secret vision of Constantine could be disproved only by the event; and the inordinate jealousy of Licinius, whose name is now employed by the advocates for Fanaticism, might view with careless despair the consequences of a defeat under the walls of Rome. The senate and people, exulting in their own deliverance from an odious tyrant, acknowledged that the victory of Constantine was a pure mercy of man; without daring to ascribe it the hand of God.

The triumphal arch, which was erected about three years after the event, proclaims, in ambiguous language, that, by the greatness of his own mind, and by an instinct or impulse of the divinity, he had saved and avenged the Roman republic. The pagan orators, who had seized an earlier opportunity of celebrating the famous victory of the emperor, and of his virtues and his patience, and of his valour and obedience in that period of life; and had written the translation of the pseudo-Oraculum, or having enjoyed a secret and intimate commerce with the Supreme Being, who delegated the care of mortals to his subordinate deities; and thus assigns a very plausible reason why the subjects of Constantine should not presume to embrace the new religion of their sovereign.

III. The philosopher, who first wrote of the celestial objects, who first crossed the sky, the omens, the miracles and prodigies, of profane or even of ecclesiastical history, will probably conclude, that if the eyes of the spectators have sometimes been deceived by the appearance of the heavenly bodies, which have much more frequently been insulted by fiction. Every event, or appearance, or accident, which seems to deviate from the ordinary course of nature, has been rashly ascribed to the immediate action of the Deity; and the astonished fancy of the multitude has sometimes given shape and colour, and language, and a name, to the fleeting but uncommon meteors of the air. Nazarius and Eusebius are the two most celebrated orators, who in studied panegyrics have laboured to exalt the glory of Constantine. Nine years after the Roman victory, Nazarius has employed his powers with a vast success, to introduce the new miracles into the world of superstition, who seemed to fall from the sky: he marks their beauty, their spirit, their gigantic forms, the stream of light which beamed from their celestial armour, their patience in suffering themselves to be heard, as well as seen, by mortals; and their declaration that they were sent, that they declared, and that they do declare, that Christ alone is the mediator of heaven and earth. For the truth of this prodigy, the pagan orator appeals to the whole Gallic nation, in whose presence he was then speaking, and seems to hope that the ancient appurtenances would now obtain credit from this recent and public event.

The celestial raft of Eusebius, which, in the space of twenty-six years, might arise from the original dream, is cast in a much more correct and elegant mould. In one of the marches of Constantine, he is reported to have seen with his own eyes the luminous trophy of the cross, placed above the sun, by which he was enlightened, and inscribed with the following words: By this, conquer. This amazing object in the sky astonished the whole army, as well as the emperor himself, who was yet undetermined in the choice of a religion: but his astonishment was converted into joy by the grace of the seen, which appeared before his eyes, and displaying the same celestial sign of the cross, he directed Constantine to frame a similar standard, and to march, with an assurance of victory, against Maxentius and all his enemies. The learned bishop of Caesarea appears to be sensible, that the recent discovery of this marvellous anodice would excite some surprise and distrust among the most pious of his readers. Yet, instead of ascertaining the precise circumstances of time and place, which always serve to detect falsehood, or establish truth; instead

1 Caesar, de M. P. c. 64. It is certain, that this historical declaration was composed and published while Licinius, sovereign of the east, still preserved the friendship of Constantine, and of the christians. Every reader of taste must perceive that the style last a different and inferior character to that of Lactantius; and such indeed is the judgment of Le Clerc and Lardner. (Bibliothèque Ancienne, in 12. p. 132, Lib. 2. c. 4. De la Bible, part. 2. vol. vi. p. 94.) Three arguments from the title of the book, and the names of two pupils of the Theology of Constantine, produced by the editor Le Peletier, who assisted the author of this work and Lactantius and Florus. The preserved language of Constantine, was universally admitted by the nations of antiquity, and a considerable part of the Gallic army was already prepared to place their confidence in the salutary sign of the christian religion. The secret vision of Constantine could be disproved only by the event; and the inordinate jealousy of Licinius, whose name is now employed by the advocates for Fanaticism, might view with careless despair the consequences of a defeat under the walls of Rome. The senate and people, exulting in their own deliverance from an odious tyrant, acknowledged that the victory of Constantine was a pure mercy of man; without daring to ascribe it the hand of God.

2 The merit of this anodice must be ascribed to the profound and perspicuous researches of the learned, in the acknowledged and original text of the Harmony of the Gospels, and in the genuine panegyrics of Eusebius and the other great historians, who have preserved to us these important facts.

3 Eusebius, de Historia Ecclesiastica, c. 10. p. 18, 30. This anodice is celebrated by the most ancient and the most recent historians. In Le Clerc, Collect. de la Bibl., tom. ii. p. 46-50. The poem is not surpassed by the proem of the pseudo-Oraculum of the Gallic army were already prepared to place their confidence in the salutary sign of the christian religion. The secret vision of Constantine could be disproved only by the event: and the inordinate jealousy of Licinius, whose name is now employed by the advocates for Fanaticism, might view with careless despair the consequences of a defeat under the walls of Rome. The senate and people, exulting in their own deliverance from an odious tyrant, acknowledged that the victory of Constantine was a pure mercy of man; without daring to ascribe it the hand of God.

of collecting and recording the evidence of so many living witnesses, who must have been spectators of this stupendous miracle; 4 Eusebius contented himself with alleging a very singular testimony; that of the domestic slave of his who, many years since, was employed in the freedom of conversation with Eusebius, and attested to him this extraordinary incident of his own life, and had attested the truth of it by a solemn oath. The prudence and gratitude of the learned prelate forbade him to suspect the veracity of his victorious master; but he plainly intimates, that he cannot deprecated the motives which, however, have refused his ascent to any meaner authority. This motive of credibility could not survive the power of the Flavian family; and the celestial sign, which the infidels might afterwards deride, 5 was disregarded by the christians of the age which immediately followed this event, and the best churchmen, both of the east and of the west, has adopted a prodigy, which favours, or seems to favour, the pious worship of the cross. The vision of Constantine maintained an honourable place in the legend of superstition, till the bold and sagacious spirit of criticism presumed to deprave this holy tradition, and to array the truth, of the first christian emperor.

The Protestant and philosophical readers of Constantine's present age will incline to believe, that, in the account of his own conversion, Constantine attested a wilful falsehood by his own hands. The Chrisian may not hesitate to pronounce, that, in the choice of religion, his mind was determined only by a sense of interest; and that (according to the expression of a profound poet) 6 he used the altars of the church as a convenient footstool to the throne of the empire. A conclusion, which is consistent with the ignorance and the partiality which so successfully warranted our knowledge of human nature, of Constantine, or of Christianity. In an age of religious fervour, the most artful statesmen are observed to feel some part of the enthusiasm which they inspire; and the most orthodox saints assume the dangerous privilege of defending the cause of truth by the arms of deceit and falsehood. Personal interest is often the standard of our belief, as well as of our practice; and the same motives of temporal advantage which might influence the public conduct and professions of Constantine would insensibly dispose his mind to embrace a religion which promised so many worldly fortunes. His vanity was gratified by the flattering assurance, that he had been chosen by heaven to reign over the earth; success had justified his divine title to the throne, and that title was founded on the truth of the christian revelation. As real virtue is sometimes excited by undeserved applause, the scurrilous piety of Constantine, if at first it was doubtfully, might gradually, by the force of praise, of habit, and of custom, be changed into serious faith and fervent devotion. The bishops and teachers of the new sect, whose dress and manners had not qualified them for the residence of a court, were admitted to the imperial table; they acted as the monarch in his expeditions; and the ascendant which one of them, an Egyptian or a Spaniard, acquired over his mind was imputed by the pagans to the effect of magic. 8 Laetantius, who has adored the precepts of the gospel with the eloquence of Cicero; 7 and Eusebius, who has consecrated the learning and the piety of his age to the service of religion, 9 were both received into the friendship and familiarity of their sovereign; and those able masters of controversy could patiently watch the soft and yielding moments of persuasion, and dexterously apply the arguments which were the best adapted to his character and understanding. Whatever advantages might be derived from the acquisition of an imperial proscript, he was distinguished by the splendour of his purple, rather than by the superiority of wisdom or virtue, from the many thousands of his subjects who had embraced the doctrines of Christianity. Nor can it be supposed that the mind of a soldier should have yielded to the weight of evidence, which, in a more enlightened age, has satisfied or subdued the reason of a Grotius, a Pascal, or a Locke. In the midst of the incessant labours of his great office, this soldier employed, or affected to employ, the hours of the night in the diligent study of the Scriptures, and the composition of theological discourses; which he afterwards pronounced in the presence of a numerous and applauding audience. In a very long discourse, which is still extant, the royal preacher expatiates on the various proofs of religion; but he dwells with peculiar complacency on the Nibyline. The fourth verse, 2 and the fourth eclogue of Virgil, 3 have been so unworthily applied to the infant son of a consul or a triumvir: 7 but if a more splendid, and indeed sincere, interpretation of the fourth eclogue contributed to the conversion of the first christian emperor, 10 this favourite was probably the great Otus, bishop of Cordova, who preferred the pastoral care of the whole church to the government of a part of it. His character is so justly, and even concisely, expressed by Athanasmus, (tom. i. p. 707.) See Tillemon, l. i. p. 157. 8 See Lactantius, Enarr. Eccles. tom. iv. p. 261. 9 See Eusebius, (In Vit. Constant. passim,) and Zosimus, l. i. p. 194. 10 The charity of Laetantius was of a moral rather than of a mysterious cast: the Eros gene radus (says the orthodox bull) distinguishes christians, et in rhetoric si mecum quia in theologica versatus. 7 Depraver Fidelis Inocens, sect. ii. c. 8. 8 Fabricon, with equal dexterity and diligence, has collected a list of between three and four hundred authors quoted in the Evangelical Preparation of Eusebius, (l. i. c. 7.) 9 See Constantz, Orat. ad Sanctos, c. 19, 26. He chiefly depends on a mysterious acrostic; composed in the manner of the pagan magic system; to which he has added an oath taken by the Erythraean Sibyl, and translated by Cicero into Latin. The first letters of the thirty-four Greek vers are, form this prophetic sentence: Justus Caesar, Rex, et Velox operis. 10 In his paraphrase of Virgil, the emperor has frequently satirized and improved upon the moral sense of the Latin text. See Bonet, Dictionnaire des Sybilles, l. i. c. 14, 15, 16. 11 The different chains of an elder and younger son of Pollio, of Junius, of Drusus, of Marcellus, are found to be incompatible with chronology, history, and the good sense of Virgil. 12

The decline and fall.

Devotion and privileges of Constantine.

The awful mysteries of the Christian faith and worship were concealed from the eyes of strangers, and even of catechumens, with an affected secrecy, which served to excite their wonder and curiosity. But the severe rules of discipline which the prudence of the bishops had instituted, were relaxed by the same prudence in favour of an imperial proselyte, whom it was so important to allure, by every gentle concession, into the fold of the church; and Constantine was permitted, at least by a tacit dispensation, to enjoy most of the privileges, before he had contracted any of the obligations, of a Christian. Instead of retiring from the congregation, when the voice of the deacon dismissed the profane multitude, he prayed with the faithful, disputed with the bishops, preached on the most sublime and intricate subjects of theology, celebrated with sacred rites the vigil of Easter, and publicly declared himself, not only a partisan, but, in some measure, a priest and hierophant of the Christian mysteries.

The pride of Constantine might assume, and his services had deserved, some extraordinary distinction; an ill-timed rigour might have blotted the unripened fruits of his conversion; and if the doors of his church had been strictly closed against a prince who had deserted the altars of the gods, the master of the empire would have lost the sympathy, and influence, of religious worship.

In his last visit to Rome, he piously disclaimed and insulted the superstition of his ancestors, by refusing to lead the military procession of the equestrian order, and to offer the public vows to the Jupiter of the Capitoline hill.1 Many years before his baptism and death, Constantine had proclaimed to the world, that neither his person nor his image should ever more be seen within the walls of an idolatrous temple; while he distributed through the provinces a variety of medals and pictures, which represented the emperor in an humble and superior posture of Christian devotion.

The pride of Constantine, who refused the privileges of a catechumen, cannot easily be explained or excused; but the delay of his baptism may be justified by the maxims and the practice of ecclesiastical antity. The formal act of baptism was administered by the bishop himself, with his assistant clergy, in the cathedral church of the diocese, during the fifty days between the solemn festivals of Easter and pentecost, and this holy term admitted a numerous band of infants and adult persons into the bosom of the church.

The discretion of Constantine prescribed the baptism of their children till they could understand the obligations which they contracted: the severity of ancient bishops extended from the new converts a noviciate of two or three years; and the catechumens themselves, from different motives of a temporal or a spiritual nature, were seldom impatient to assume the character of perfect and initiated Christians. The sacrament of baptism was supposed to contain a full and absolute expiation of sin; and the soul was supposed to be instantly delivered from all the guilt of past passions in the enjoyments of this world, while they still retained in their own hands the means of a sure and absolute and easy absolution. The sublime theory of the gospel had made a much fitter impression on the heart than on the understanding of Constantine himself. The bishops could not transfigure him through the dark and bloody paths of war and policy; and, after the victory, he abandoned himself, without moderation, to the abuse of his fortune. Instead of asserting his just superiority above the imperfect heroism and profane philosophy of Trajan and the Antonines, the victorious son of Constantine lost the reputation which he had acquired in his youth. As he gradually advanced in the knowledge of truth, he proportionately declined in the practice of virtue; and the same year of his reign in which he convened the council of Nicaea, he receded from his treatises to indulgence, or rather, murder, of his eldest son. This date is an efficient refutation of the ignorant and malicious suggestions of Zosimus,2 who affirms that after the death of Crispus the remorse of his father accepted from the ministers of Christianity the expiation which he had vainly hesitated to bestow on his beloved son. After the death of Crispus, the emperor could no longer hesitate in the choice of a religion; he could no longer be ignorant that the church was possessed of an infallible remedy, though he chose to defer the application of it, till the approach of death had removed the temptation and danger of a religious profession. The bishop who had been summoned, in his last illness, to the palace of Nicomedia, were edified by the fervour with which he requested and received the sacrament of baptism, by the solemn protestation that the remainder of his life should be worthy of a disciple of Christ, and by his humble frame, the manner in which the approach of death could be observed. The emperor, clothed in the white garment of a neophite. The example and reputation of Constantine seemed to counterbalance the delay of baptism.3 Future tyrants were encouraged to believe, that the innocent blood which they might shed in a long reign would instantly be washed away in the waters of regeneration; and the abuse of religion dangerously undermined the foundations of moral virtue.

The gratitude of the church has exalted the virtues and excused the failings. Constantine, of a generous patron, who sent Christian clergy to the throne of the Roman world; and the Greeks, who celebrated the festivity of the imperial saint, seldom mention the name of Constantine without adding the title of equal to the apostles.4 Such a comparison, if it almost 3 In the examination of the fourth edition, the respectable bishop of London has displayed learning, taste, ingenuity, and a temperate exercise of his factual judgment, in defending his judgment.

4 The distinction between the public and the secret parts of divine service, the missa catechumenorum, and the missa fidelium, and the mysterious vest which party or policy had cast over the latter, are very judiciously explained by Thiria, Exposition du Saint sacrement, l. c. 682, p. 209-211: but as, on this subject, the papists may reasonably be suspected, a protestant reader will depend with more confidence on the learned Bingham, Antiquitatis, l. c. 35.

8 The theory and practice of antiquity, with regard to the sacra politicia, have been splendidly explained by Don Charbon, Hist. des Sacraments de l'ancien Empire, de l'Eglise Antiquit, tom. I.; and by Blignac, in the tenth and eleventh chapters of his Histoire de l'Eglise, tome IV. The sacraments are occasionally observed, in which the modern churches have materially departed from the primitive. The sacrament of baptism, even when it was administered to infants, was immediately followed by confirmation and the holy communion.

9 Zosimus, l. c. 164. For this diabolical falsehood he is very justly accused by Eusebius, l. c. 61, 62, 63. The bishop of Ctesaropa interprets the act of consecration with the most perfect simplicity.

10 See Tillotson, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. IV. p. 429. The Greeks,
The charactes of those divine missionaries, must be imputed to the extravagance of impius flattery. But if the parallel be confined to the extent and number of their evangelical victories, the success of Constantine might perhaps equal that of the apostles themselves. By the edicts of toleration, he removed the terrors of an militant ; and the piercing eye of ambition and avarice soon discovered, that the profession of Christianity might contribute to the interest of the present, as well as of a future, life. The hopes of wealth and honours, the example of an emperor, his exhortations, his irresistible smile, diffused conviction among the sensual and obsequious crowds which usually fill the apartments of a palace. The cities which signalized a forward zeal by the voluntary destruction of their temples, were distinguished by municipal privileges, and rewarded with popular donatives; and the new capital of the east gloried in the apostles of the faith. The prelates were never profaned by the worship of idols. As the lower ranks of society were governed by imitation, the conversion of those who possessed any eminence of birth, of power, or of riches, was soon followed by dependent multitudes. The salvation of the common people was thus far the danger of the one. The next year, twelve thousand men were baptized at Rome, besides a proportionable number of women and children, and that a white garment, with twenty pieces of gold, had been promised by the emperor to every convert. The powerful influence of Constantine was not checked, but swelled to a narrow limit of his life, or of his dominion. The emperor bestowed on his sons and nephews, secured to the empire a race of princes, whose faith was still more lively and sincere, as they imbued, in their earliest infancy, the spirit, or at least the doctrine, of Christianity. War and commerce had spread the knowledge of the gospel beyond the confines of the Roman provinces; and the barbarians, who had disdained an humble and proscribed sect, soon learned to esteem a religion which had been so lately embraced by the greatest monarch, and the most civilized nation, of the globe. The Goths and Germanic tribes poured over the frontiers of those nations. The Romans, through the ages, have preserved the cross which glittered at the head of the legions, and their fierce countryside received at the same time the lessons of faith and of humanity. The kings of Iberia and Armenia worshipped the God of their protector; and their subjects, who have invariably preserved the name of Christians, soon formed a sacred and perpetual connection with their Roman brethren. The Christians of Persia were suspected, in time of war, of preferring their religion to their country; but this suspicion lasted as long as pious Persians were the persecuted victims of the persecuting spirit of the magi was effectually restrained by the interposition of Constantine. The rays of the gospel illuminated the coast of India. The colonies of Jews, who had penetrated into Arabia and Ethiopia, opposed the progress of Christianity; but the obstacles were removed by the wise ministers facilitated by a previous knowledge of the Mosaic revelation; and Abyssinia still renews the memory of Frumentius, who, in the time of Constantine, devoted his life to the conversion of those scattered regions. Under the reign of his son Constantius, Theophilus, who was himself of Indian extraction, was invested with the double character of ambassador and bishop. He embarked on the Red sea with two hundred horses of the purest breed of Cappadoea, which were sent by the emperor to the prince of the Sabaeans, or Hormities. Theophilus was instructed with many other subalterns, who were to become his missionaries, to pacify and to conciliate the friendship of the barbarians; and he successfully employed several years in a pastoral visit to the churches of the torrid zone. The irresistible power of the Roman Change of the im- empors was displayed in the important empors of the nations of the Mediterranean. The terrors of a military force silenced the faint and unsupported murmurs of the pagans, and there was reason to expect, that the cheerful submission of the Christian clergy, as well as people, would be the result of conscience and gratitude. It was long since established, as a fundamental maxim of the Roman constitution, that every nation had a conscience which it was safe to respect, and laws, and that the care of religion was the right as well as duty of the civil magistrate. Constantine and his successors could not easily persuade themselves that they had forfeited, by their conversion, any branch of the Imperial prerogatives, or that they were incapable of granting laws to a religion which they had protected and embraced. The emperors still continued to exercise a supreme jurisdiction over the ecclesiastical order; and the sixteenth book of the Theodosian code represents, under the title of "The Christian empire," the laws they assumed in the government of the Catholic church.

But the distinction of the spiritual and temporal powers, which had never been imposed on the free spirit of Roman pontiffs, and had always been exercised by one of the most eminent of the senators, was at length united to the imperial dignity. The first magistracy of the state, as often as he was prompted by superstition or policy, performed with his own hands the sacred functions of the Rccaniis, and, in the darker ages, the Latinns themselves, have been deacons of placing Constantine in the catalogue of saints.

If you have a passage of the lives of the martyrs, or of the confessors, it would be fair to say, that the Latin translation of Eusebius, deserves to be considered as an original authority. His information was curiously collected from one of the companions of the Apostle of Ethiopia, and from Barbaris, an Iberian priest, who was cons of the dominions. Father Masanelli has given no ample compilation on the progress of Christianity, in the first and second volumes of his great but imperfect work.

Such terms are customary in contemptuous accounts; but these circumstances are in themselves so probable, that the learned Dr. Howell (History of the World, tom. ii. p. 257) is not of the same opinion.

If you have a passage of the lives of the martyrs, or of the confessors, it would be fair to say, that the Latin translation of Eusebius, deserves to be considered as an original authority. His information was curiously collected from one of the companions of the Apostle of Ethiopia, and from Barbaris, an Iberian priest, who was cons of the dominions. Father Masanelli has given no ample compilation on the progress of Christianity, in the first and second volumes of his great but imperfect work.

5 See the epistle of Osias, ap. Athanasivum, vol. i. p. 810. The public remonstrance which Osias was forced to address to the son, contained the same principles of ecclesiastical and civil government which he had secretly instilled into the mind of the father.
tions; 4 nor was there any order of priests, either at Rome or in the provinces, who claimed a more sacred character among men, or a more intimate communication with the gods. But in the christian church, which intrusts the service of the altar to a perpetual succession of consecrated ministers, the monarch, whose spiritual rank in the levitical order was higher than that of nations, was seated below the rails of the sanctuary, and confounded with the rest of the faithful multitude. 5 The emperor might be saluted as the father of his people, but he owed a filial duty and reverence to the fathers of the church; and the same marks of respect for the institution of the church on the part of saints and confessors, were soon exacted by the pride of the episcopal order. 6 A secret conflict between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions, embarrassed the operations of the Roman government; and a pious emperor was alarmed by the guilt and danger of touching with a profane hand the ark of the covenant. The separation of men into the two orders of the clergy and of the laity was, indeed, familiar to all nations of antiquity; and the priests of India, of Persia, of Assyria, of Judea, of Ethiopia, of Egypt, and of Gaul, derived from a celestial origin the temporal rights and distinctions which they exercised. These venerable institutions had gradually assimilated themselves to the manners and government of their respective countries; 7 but the opposition or contempt of the civil power served to cement the discipline of the primary church. The christian empire had been obliged to elevate their own ministers, to raise and distribute a peculiar revenue, and to regulate the internal policy of their republic by a code of laws, which were ratified by the consent of the people, and the practice of three hundred years. When Constantine embraced the faith of the church, he had the same advantage, and he established a perpetual alliance with a distinct and independent society; and the privileges granted or confirmed by that emperor, or by his successors, were accepted, not as the precautionary favours of the court, but as the just and inalienable rights of the ecclesiastical order. The catholic church was administered by the spiritual and legal jurisdiction of eighteen hundred bishops; 8 of whom one thousand were seated in the Greek, and eight hundred in the Latin, provinces of the empire. The extent and boundaries of their respective dioceses had been previously fixed by the zeal and success of the first missionaries, by the wishes of the people, and by the propagation of the gospel. Episcopal churches were closely planted along the banks of the Nile, on the sea-coast of Africa, in the provinces of Asia, and through the southern provinces of Italy. The respective bishoprics of Thrace and Pontus, reigned over an ample territory, and delegated their rural suffragans to execute the subordinate duties of the pastoral office. 9 A christian diocese might be spread over a province, or reduced to a village; but all the bishops possessed an equal and indissoluble character; they all derived the same powers and privileges from the apostles, from the people, and from the laws. While the civil and military professions were in confusion, and the respect of the religio of a new and perpetual order of ecclesiastical ministers, always respectable, sometimes dangerous, was established in the church and state. The important review of their station and attributes may be distributed under the following heads: I. Popular election. II. Ordination. III. Intrusts. IV. Apostacy. V. Spiritual censures. VI. Exercise of public oratory. VII. Privilege of legislative assemblies.

I. The freedom of election 1 subsisted 2 election of long after the legal establishment of bishops. 3 and the subjects of Rome enjoyed in the church the privilege which they had lost in the republic, of choosing the magistrates whom they were bound to obey. As soon as a bishop had closed his eyes, the metropolitan issued a commission to one of his suffragans to administer the vacant see, and prepare, within a limited time, the future election. The right of that commission was occasionally acquiesced; but those who were best qualified to judge of the merit of the candidates; in the senators or nobles of the city, all those who were distinguished by their rank or property; and finally in the whole body of the people, who, on the appointed day, were in multitudes from the most remote parts of the diocese, 4 Although they were not influenced by their tumultuous acclamations, the voice of reason and the laws of discipline. These acclamations might accidentally fix on the head of the most deserving competitor; of some ancient presbyter, some holy monk, or some well-meaning nobleman; but the bishop was chosen. But the episcopal chair was solicited, especially in the great and opulent cities of the empire, as a temporal rather than as a spiritual dignity. The interested views, the selfish and angry passions, the arts of perjury and dissimulation, the secret corruption, the open and even bloody privilege which they had formerly disgraced the freedom of election in the commonwealths of Greece and Rome, too often influenced the choice of the successors of the apostles. While one of the candidates boasted the honours of his family, a second allured his judges by the delicacies of a plentiful table, and a third paid them plentifully with rewards for the plunder of the church among the accomplices of his sacrilegious hopes. 5 The civil as well as ecclesiastical laws attempted to exclude the populace from this solemn and important transaction. The canons of ancient discipline, by requiring several episcopal qualifications of age, station, &c. restrained in some measure the indiscriminate caprice of the electors.

3 This liberty was very limited, and was soon annihilated; although the civil and military power, and the influence of the members of the community, but by the bishops, though it appears from the letters of St. Cyprian, that in his time no priest was elected without the consent of the community, (Ep. 65;) this was far from being a free election. The bishop proposed to his parishioners the candidate whom he had chosen, and they were permitted to mention any objections they might have in his character or his manners. (St. Cyp. Ep. 65.) They lost even this right, towards the end of the fourth century. — G. Dufour.

4 Thomasius (Discipulus de l'Eglise, tom. ii. 2. ii. c. 8. p. 677—721.) has given a particular account of the election of bishops during the five first centuries, both in the east and in the west; but he will be the best judge of the party which a greater number of the episcopal writers (Ep. 65. c. 2.) is moderate; and Charond (Hist. des Sacr., tom. v. p. 106—122.) says that nothing could be more conciliatory.

M. de la Bastie (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions. tom. xx. p. 38—61.) has evidently proved, that Augustus and his successors exercised in person all the sacred functions of pontifex maximus, and the prerogatives of the Roman emperor.

9 Something of a contrary practice had insensibly prevailed in the church of Constantinople; but the rigid Ambrose condemned Theodosius the great in this respect, and decided the question between a king and a priest. See Theodoret. l. v. c. 18.

12 The numbers are not ascertained by any ancient writer, or origin, without the aid of the partial lists of the churches of the comparatively modern. The patient diligence of Charles de Pue lo has enabled him to compile a list of Buecham, which contains an amazing number of all the episcopal sees of the catholic church, which was most common among the bishops in the Roman empire. The ninth book of the Christian Antiquities is a very exact map of ecclesiastical geography.
C H A P. XX.
OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

261

The authority of the provincial bishops, who were assembled in the vacant church to consecrate the choice of the people, was interposed to moderate their passion and to prevent their mistakes. The bishops could refuse to ordain an unworthy candidate, and the rage of contending factions sometimes accepted their impartial meddations. The submission, or the resistance, of the clergy and people, on various occasions, afforded different precedents, which were converted into positive laws, and provincial customs; but it was every where admitted, as a fundamental maxim of religious policy, that no bishop could be imposed on an orthodox church, without the consent of its members. The emperors, as the guardians of the public peace, were enriched by the donations of the state and their family, and their officers. These donations, however, did not diminish the independence of the church. Such a bishop, as deacon, sub-deacon, chanters, exorcists, readers, singers, and door keepers, contributed, in their respective stations, to swell the pomp and harmony of religious worship. The clerical name and privilege were extended to many pious fraternities, who devoutly performed the devotions of the pietas perambulatori, or adventurers, visited the sick at Alexandria; eleven hundred copeists, or grave-diggers, buried the dead at Constantinople; and the swarms of monks, who arose from the Nile, overspread and darkened the face of the christian world.

II. Ordinaries.

The bishops alone possessed the clergy. The faculty of spiritual generation: and this extraordinary privilege might compensate, in some degree, for the painful celibacy, which was imposed as a virtue, as a duty, and at length as a positive obligation. The religions of antiquity, which established a temporal order among the pope, vacancies, and their respective courts, were adopted in the primitive church. The imperial power, in order to protect the holy religion, obtained legal establishments among the clergy. These abuses excited complaints and popular popular risings. The vices of the clergy, and of the hierarchies, and the vast wealth which they were able to command, forbade the richest citizens (decumanus and curiales) to enter the ecclesiastical order; and the bishops to admit any new ecclesiastics, who were not able to bear the charge of their maintenance. As soon as clerics were excluded from the civil and the military, and even from the ecclesiastical order, the world, which was to be governed by religious principles, became more extensively either the bishop or the other party.

I. Institutions.

All the examples quoted by Thaumasius (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. ii. l. i. c. v. p. 704—714) appear to be extraordinary acts of power, and of even of oppression. The confirmation of the bishop at the moment of his consecration, is of the same origin in all cases. The practice, which has been so frequently examined. In particular, Thaumasius, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. i. l. ii. c. ix. 131, p. 586—592, and Bygham's Antiquities, l. iv. c. 5. By each of these learned and factitious critics, one half of the preceding order, dedicated a holy race, a tribe or family, to the perpetual service of the gods. Such institutions were founded for possession, rather than conquest. The children of the priests enjoyed, with proud and indolent security, their sacred inheritance; and the fiery spirit of enthusiasm was abated by the gentle sentiments of domestic life. But the christian sanctuary was open to every ambitious candidate, who aspired to its heavenly promises, or temporal possessions. The office of priests, like that of soldiers or magistrates, was strenuously exercised by those men, whose temper and abilities were not enlarged by an extended or frequent intercourse of the clergy, or who had been selected by a discerning bishop, as the best qualified to promote the glory and interest of the church. The bishops (till the abuse was restrained by the prudence of the laws) might constrain the reluctant, and protect the dissuasive. For ever and ever, a part of the most valuable privileges of civil society. The whole body of the catholic clergy, more numerous perhaps than the legionaries, was exempted by the emperors from all service, private or public, all municipal offices, and all personal taxes and contributions, which pressed on the freebooting and independent character of the clergy. The duties of their holy profession was accepted as a full discharge of their obligations to the republic. Each bishop acquired an absolute and indefeasible right to the perpetual obedience of the clerk whom he ordained: the clergy of each episcopal church, with its dependent clergy and parochial servitors, were the possessors of the cathedrals of Constantinople 4 and Carthage 5 maintained their peculiar establishment of five hundred ecclesiastical ministers. Their ranks 6 and numbers were insensibly multiplied by the superstition of the times, which introduced into the church the splendid ceremonies of a Jewish or pagan temple; and a long train of priests, deacons, sub-deacons, acolythes, exorcists, readers, singers, and door keepers, contributed, in their respective stations, to swell the pomp and harmony of religious worship. The clerical name and privilege were extended to many pious fraternities, who devoutly performed the devotions of the pietas perambulatori, or adventurers, visited the sick at Alexandria; eleven hundred copeists, or grave-diggers, buried the dead at Constantinople; and the swarms of monks, who arose from the Nile, overspread and darkened the face of the christian world.

III. The edict of Milan secured the III. Property, same as well as the peace of the A.D. 313.

The church.

The christians not only recovered the lands and houses of which they had been stripped by the persecuting laws of Diocletian, but they acquired a perfect title to all the possessions which they had hitherto enjoyed by the conversion of the people. As soon as Christianity became the religion of the emperor and the empire, the national clergy might claim a decent and honourable maintenance; and the payment of an annual tax might have delivered the people from the burden of that tax.

7 A compromise was sometimes introduced by law or by consent; either the bishop or the people chose one of the three candidates, who had been named by the other party.

8 These exemptions were very limited. Municipal offices were of course, in many cases, granted to the occupier, others to that of the owner. Constantine exempted the bishops and priests from the first class of taxes. (Cod. Theod. ii. 9. 1, 2. Evang. Hist. Eccl. x. c. 7.) They sought also to obtain exemption from the second, (secundum patrimonium.) They sought also to obtain exemption from the second, (secundum patrimonium.) The law, in order to protect the holy religion, obtained a right to a third, and to hold places among the clergy. These abuses excited complaints and popular risings. The vices of the clergy, and of the hierarchies, and the vast wealth which the clergy of the Christian emperors, was contained in the sixteenth book of the Theodosian Code, and is illustrated with tolerable confidence, by the learned Godfrey, whose mind was balanced by the opposite prejudices of a civilian and a protestant. 9 Justinian, Novellae, xiv. 6. Sixty prelats, or priests, one hundred deacons, forty deaconesses, ninety sub-deacons, one hundred and twenty chanters, forty and one subchanters, forty and one subchanters, fourteen and sixty and five chanters, in all, five hundred and twenty-five. This moderate number was fixed by the emperor, to relieve the distress of the church, which had been involved in debt and misery by the expense of a much higher establishment.

This compilation, which was supposed to be the metrical version of the octodecim, was read by a lecturer to the Vandals.

11 The number of these orders has been fixed in the Latin church, exclusive of the episcopal character. But the four inferior ranks, the minor orders, are now reduced to empty and useless titles.

12 See Cod. Thod. i. II. 6. 24. Commentaries, and the Ecclesiastical History of Alexander, show the danger arising from these plebe orders, which often disturbed the peace of that turbulent capital.

13 The edict of Julian (I. M. P. 42.) acknowledges, by ruling, that there existed a species of landed property, ad ius corporis formae, id est, ecclesiarium non hominum singularum pertinentia. As such, these real or personal possessions, which have been received in all the tribunals as a species of civil law. from the more oppressive tribute, which superstition imposes on her vassals. But as the wants and ex- penses of the Christian churches, and the state of ecclesiastical order was still supported and enriched by the voluntary oblations of the faithful. Eight years after the edict of Milan, Constantin

A.D. 321. was granted to all his subjects the free and universal permission of bequeathing their fortunes to the church and the clergy, and the liberty of religion, which during their lives was checked by luxury or avarice, flowed with a profuse stream at the hour of their death. The wealthy christians were encouraged by the example of their sovereign. An absolute monarch, who is rich without parsimony, may be charited liberality of Constantine increased in a just proportion to his faith and to his vices. He assigned in each city a regular allowance of corn, to supply the fund of ecclesiastical charity; and the persons of both sexes who embraced the monastic life, became the peculiar favourites of their sovereign. The Christian temples of Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Constantinople, &c. displayed the ostentatious piety of a prince, ambitious in a declining age to equal the perfect labours of antiquity. The form of these religious edifices was simple and oblong; though they might sometimes swell into the height of a dome, and sometimes bend into the figure of a cross. The timbers were framed for the most part of cedars of Libanus; the roof was covered with tiles, perhaps of gilt brass; and the walls, the columns, the pavement, were incrusted with variegated marbles. The most precious ornaments of gold and silver, of silk and gems, were profusely dedicated to the service of the altar; and this specious magnificence was supported on the solid and perpetual basis of landed property. In the space of two centuries, from the reign of Constantine to that of Justinian, the eighteen hundred churches were enriched by the frequent donations of princes and people. An annual income of six hundred pounds sterling may be reasonably assigned to the bishops, who were placed at an equal distance between riches and poverty, but the standard of their wealth insensibly rose with the dignity and opulence of the cities which they governed.

An authentic but imperfect rent-roll specifies some houses, shops, gardens, and farms, which belonged to the three Basilei of Rome, St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John Lateran, in the provinces of Italy, Africa, and the east. They produced, besides a reserved rent of oil, liquors, and wines, a profit of 100 per cent., on a clear annual revenue of twenty-two thousand pieces of gold, or twelve thousand pounds sterling.

In the age of Constantine and Justinian, the bishops no longer possessed, perhaps they no longer deserved, the unsuspecting confidence of their clergy and people. The ecclesiastical revenue of the church was now to be divided; for the respective uses, of the bishop himself, of his inferior clergy, of the poor, and of the public worship; and the abuse of this sacred trust was strictly and repeatedly checked. The patrimony of the church was as diffused among the clergy of Rome, Alexandria, Thessalonica, &c. might solicit and obtain some partial exemptions; but the premature attempt of the great council of Rimini, which aspired to universal freedom, was successfully resisted by the son of Constantine.

IV. The Latin clergy, who erected their tribunal on the ruins of the civil and common law, have modestly accepted, as the gift of Constantine, the independent jurisdiction, which was the fruit of time, of accident, and of their own industry. But the liberality of the christian emperors was the sole foundation of the clergy's wealth, and the clergy's wealth, which secured and dignified the sacerdotal character. 1. Under a despotic government, the bishops alone enjoyed and asserted the inestimable privilege of being tried only by their peers; and even in a capital accusation, a symon of their brethren were the sole judges of their guilt or innocence. Such a tribunal, unless it was inflamed by personal resentment or religious discord, might be favourable, or even partial, to the sacerdotal order; but Constantine was satisfied, that secret impunity would be less pernicious than public scandal; and the Nicene council was edified by the public declaration that if ecclesiastical tribunals here fore put the set of adversity, he should cast his imperial mantle over the episcopal sinner. 2. The domestic jurisdiction of the bishops was at once a privilege and a restraint of the ecclesiastical order, whose civil causes were decently withdrawn from the cognizance of a secular judge. Their venal offences were not exposed to the inspection of an able and judicious Latin clergy, men who pronounced with authority on the consecration of bishops, who were appointed to the episcopate; and many of their decisions were supported by an ancient, and a judicial authority. The bishop of Rome, by his authority, may nominate a fit person to fill the place of a clergyman, who shall be invested with the pastoral charge of a district. The pope is the earthly father of the church, a" philosophic bishop supported with dignity the character which he had assumed with reluctance. He vanquished the monster of Libya, the president Andronicus, who abused the authority of a venal office, invented new modes of rapine and torture, and aggravated the most odious vice of oppression as a suitable and beneficial profession, the Roman magistrate drew the sword of justice, without any regard to ecclesiastical immunities. Their arbitration of the bishops was ratified by a positive law; and the judges were instructed to execute, without appeal or delay, the severity of the laws which had been prescribed on the consent of the parties. The conversion of the magistrates themselves, and of the whole empire, might gradually remove the fears and scruples of the christians. But they still resorted to the tribunal of the bishops, whose abilities and integrity they apostolically enjoyed the satisfaction of complaining that his spiritual functions were perpetually interrupted by the invidious labour of deciding the claim or the possession of silver and gold, of lands and cattle. An ancient privilege of sanctuary was transferred to the christian temples, and extended, by the liberal piety of the young and zealous professors, to their shops and habitations. The fugitives and even guilty, suppliants were permitted to implore either the justice, or the mercy, of the Deity and his ministers. The rash violence of despotism was suspended by the mild interposition of the church; and the lives or fortunes of the most eminent subjects might be saved by its reconciliation. The ancient extemporal courts, which had prepared the triumph of the Roman pontiffs, who have trampled on the heads of kings.

VI. Every popular government has experienced the effects of rude or artificed public preaching eloquence. The coldest nature is animated, the strongest reason moved, by the rapid communication of the prevailing impulse; and each hearer is affected by his own passions, and by those of the surrounding multitude. The ruin of civil liberty had silenced the demagogues of Athens, and the tribunes of Rome: the custom of preaching, which seems to constitute a considerable part of christian devotion, had not been introduced into the temples of antiquity; and the ears of monarchs were never invaded by the harsh sound of popular eloquence, till the pulpits of the empire were filled with sacred orators, who possessed some advantages unknown to their profane predecessors. The ambitious and illiberal were instantly opposed, with equal arms, by skilful and resolute antagonists; and the cause of truth and reason might derive an accidental support from the conflict of hostile passions. The bishop, or some distinguished presbyter, to whom he cautiously delegated the powers

Syros was previously represented on his own disqualifications.

See Bashi, Epist. vii. in Barington, Annot. Eccles. A. D. 370, No. 91, who speaks of his being the bishop of the church of the aus. In the words of Fr. Paulo (tom. iv. p. 102, &c.) there is an excellent discussion on the origin, chiefs, abuses, and limits of sanctuaries. He judiciously observes, that ancient Greece might perhaps contain fifteen or twenty, or perhaps more, sanctuaries; a number which at present may be found in Italy within the walls of a single city.

The present bishop was then called the bishop of Chalcis, and sometimes appointed the bishop of Euboea. His rank was consecrated by a contest between the episcopus and the exarch of Rome. See Bacon, in Acer., xxxvii. 131, and translated by Whitaker, in Biblia, p. 59. See the learned Bashi, Epist. viii. in Barington, Annot. Eccles. A. D. 370, No. 91. We must avoid the excommunication, and the persecution of a general council. He falsely charged the council with being composed of the bishops of the eastern and western provinces, and not of the whole church. See the Synod, Epist. xxvii. 4. 29. 58. xxviii. 22. 23.

The sentence of excommunication was expressed in a rhetorical style, and not by the terms of an absolute interdict. The rest of the Synod of Chalcedon is not extant. See the Synod, Epist. xxxvii. 186, 187. Epist. lviii. 518, 519. —Epist. lviii. 238. 239. —Epist. lviii. 238. 239. —Epist. lviii. 238. 239.

Synod (of Regno, p. 2) partially calmed the troubles in the church of this province. (Synod. Loc. p. 201—203.) The assembly of the presbyters and teachers of the whole province, though somewhat unjust, was improved into a regular interdict of the see. of preaching, harangued, without the danger of interruption or reply, a subservient multitude, whose minds had been prepared and subdued by the awful ceremonies of religion. Such was the strict subordination of the catholic church, that the same concerted sounds might issue at once from an hundred pulpits of Italy or Egypt, if the emperors of the master-hand of the Roman or Alexandrian prince. The design of this institution was laudable, but the fruits were not always salutary. The preachers recommended the practice of the social duties; but they exalted the per- fection of monastic virtue, which is painful to the individual, and useless to mankind. The uphill degeneration of the human race was from the bottom of society. The emperors who patronized the clergy might be permitted to manage the wealth of the faithful, for the benefit of the poor. The most sublime representations of the attributes and laws of the Deity were sullied by an idle mixture of metaphysical subtleties, puerile rimes, and fictitious miracles; and they exalted, with the most fervent zeal, on the religious merit of hating the adversaries, and obeying the ministers, of the church. When the public peace was distracted by heresy and schism, the sacred orators sounded the discord, and used the plague, of sedition. The understandings of their congregations were perplexed by mystery, their passions were inflamed by invectives, and they rushed from the christian temples of Athioch or Alexandria, prepared either to suffer or to inflict martyrdom. The corruption of taste and language was so marked in the subsequent decla-ditions of the Latin bishops; but the compositions of Gregory and Chrysostom have been compared with the most splendid models of Attic, or at least of Asiaic, eloquence.7

VII. Privilege of the Riparian an-munher republic was regularly assembled in the spring and autumn of each year; and these synods diffused the spirit of ecclesiastical discipline and legislation through the hundred and twenty provinces of the Roman world.8 The archbishops, or metropolitan, was empowered, by the laws, to summon the suffragan bishops of his province; to revise their conduct, to vindicate their rights, to declare their fault, and to examine the merit of the candidates who were elected by the clergy and people to supply the vacancies of the episcopal college. The primates of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Carthage, and afterwards Constantinople, who enjoyed a more ample jurisdiction, convened the numerous assembly of their dependent bishops. But the convocation of great and extraordinary synods was the prerogative of the emperor alone. Whenever the emergencies of the church required a general measure, an empty summons to the bishops, or the deputies of each province, with an order for the use of post-horses, and a competent allowance for the expenses of their journey. At an early period, when Constantine was the protector, rather than the proselyte, of christianity, he referred the African controversy to the council of Arles; in which the bishops of York, of Treves, of Milan, and of Carthage, met as friends and brethren, to debate in their native tongue on the common interest of the Latin or western church.1 Eleven years afterwards, a more numerous and celebrated assembly was convened at Nice in Bithynia, to extinguish, by their final sentence, the subtle disputes which had arisen in Egypt on the subject of the Trinity. Three hundred and eighteen bishops obeyed the symcollected in the provinces of Asia, which was from the honour of the emperor. Leaving his guards at the door, he seated himself (with the permission of the council) on a low stool in the midst of the hall. Constantine listened with patience, and spoke with modesty; and while he influenced the debates, he humbly professed that he was the minister, not the judge, of the successors of the apostles, who had been established as priests and as gods upon earth.9 Such profound reverence of an absolute monarch towards a feeble and unarmed assembly of his own subjects, can only be compared to the respect with which the senate had been treated by the Roman princes who adopted the policy of Augustus. Within the space of fifty years, a philosophic spectator of the vicissitudes of human affairs might have contemplated Tacitus in the senate of Rome, and Constantine in the council of Nice. The fathers of the church congratulated the victory of the ancient defenders of the virtues of their founders; but as the bishops were more deeply rooted in the public opinion, they sustained their dignity with more decent pride, and sometimes opposed, with a manly spirit, the wishes of their sovereign. The progress of time and super-sition eroded the memory of the leaders of the pas-tion, the ignorance, which disgraced these ecclesiastical synods; and the catholic church has unanimously submitted6 to the infallible decrees of the general councils.7

CHAPTER XXI.

Persuasion of heresy. — The schism of the Donatists. — The Arian controversy. — Athanasius. — Distracted state of the church and empire under Constantine and his sons. — Toleration of paganism.

The grateful applause of the clergy has consecrated the memory of a prince who indulged their passions and promoted their interest. Constantine gave them a toleration which provided a support of the orthodox faith was considered as the most sacred and important duty of the civil magistrate. The edical of Milan, the great charter of toleration, had confirmed to each individual of the Roman world the privilege of choosing and professing his own religion. But this inestimable privilege was soon violated; with the knowledge of truth, the emperor imbibed the maxims of persecution; and the seeds which dissented

1 Queen Elizabeth used this expression, and practised this art, whenever she wished to persuade the minds of her people in favour of any extraordinary measure of government. The hostile effects of this music were apprehended by her subjects, as is clearly seen by her son, "When pulpitt, drum ecclesiastic." Rex. See Heylin's Life of Groton.

2 Those modest orators acknowledged, that as they were destined to the gift of miracles, they endeavoured to acquire the arts of elo-

from the catholic church, were afflicted and oppressed by the triumph of Christianity. Constantine easily believed that he the heretics, who presumed to dispute his opinions, or to oppose his commands, were guilty of the most absurd and criminal obstinacy; and that a seasonable application of moderate severity might save these unhappy men from the danger of the last and lasting condemnation. The worst which could happen to a man, was to lose in excluding the ministers and teachers of the separated congregations from any share of the rewards and immunities which the emperor had so liberally bestowed on the orthodox clergy. But as the sectaries might still exist under his cloud of royal disgrace, the conquest of the east was immediately followed by an edict which announced their total destruction. After a preambule filled with passion and reproach, Constantine absolutely prohibited the assemblies of the heretics, and confiscates their public property to the use either of the revenue or of the catholic church. The sects against whom the imperial severity was directed, appear to have been the adherents of Paul of Samosata; the Montanists of Phrygia, who maintained an enthusiastic succession of prophecy; the Novatians, who strenuously rejected the temporal efficacy of repentance; the Arians, whose false doctrine was degraded in the most odious manner by the veneration of the various Gnostics and Asia; and exercised on unsuspected; and perhaps the Manicheans, who had recently imported from Persia a more artful composition of oriental and Christian theology. The design of extirpating the name, or at least of restraining the influence of the heretics, was so closely connected with vigour and effect. Some of the penal regulations were copied from the edicts of Diocletian; and this method of conversion was applauded by the same bishops who had felt the hand of oppression, and had pleaded for the rights of humanity. Two immaterial circuses may serve, however, to prove the mind of Constantinople was not entirely animated by the spirit of zeal and bigotry. Before he condemned the Manicheans and their kindred sects, he resolved to make an accurate inquiry into the nature of their religious principles. As if he distrusted the impartiality of his ecclesiastical counsellors, this delicate commission was intrusted to a civil magistrate; whose learning and moderation he justly esteemed; and of whose verbal character he was probably ignorant. The emperor was soon convinced, that he had too hastily proscribed the orthodox faith and the exemplary morals of the Arians; who had so unexpectedly entered the church in some articles of discipline which were not absolutely essential to salvation. By a particular edict, he exempted them from the general penalties of the law: allowed them to build a church at Constantinople, respected the miracles of their saints, invited their bishop Acæius to the council of Nice; and gently ridiculed the narrow tenets of his sect by a familiar jest, which, from the mouth of a sovereign, must have been received with applause and gratitude.

African contrary. The complaints and mutual accusations which assailed the throne of Constantinople, as soon as the death of Maxentius had submitted Africa to his victorious arms, were ill adapted to edify an imperfect proselyte. He learned, with surprise, that the provinces of that great country, from the confines of Cyrene to the columns of Hercules, were distracted with religious discord. The source of the division was derived from a double apostasy which Cæsarian major, and the persecuting majority of his ordination, was destroyed by the illegal, or at least indecent, haste, with which it had been performed, without expecting the arrival of the bishops of Numidia. The authority of these bishops, who, to the number of seventy, condemned Cæcilian, and consecrated Majorinus, is again weakened by the infamy of some of their personal characters; and by the female intrigues, sacrilegious bargaining, and tumultuous proceedings, which are imputed to this Numidian council. The bishops of the contending factions maintained, with equal ardour and obstinacy, that their adversaries were least disposed to renounce the crime of delivering the Holy Scriptures to the officers of Diocletian. From their mutual reproaches, as well as from the story of this dark transaction, it may justly be inferred, that the late persecution had embittered the zeal, without reforming the manners, of the African church. The most esteemed ecclesiastical powers of the day were destroyed; and a second, royal, and sacred, and impartial judicature; the controversy was solemnly tried in five successive tribunals, which were appointed by the emperor; and the whole proceeding, from the first appeal to the final sentence, lasted above three years. A severe inquisition, which was taken by Diocletian from the report of two episcopal visitors who had been sent to Carthage, the degrees of the councils of Rome and of Arles, and the supreme judgment of Constantine himself in his sacred consistory, were all favourable to the cause of Cæcilian; and he was unanimously acknowledged, by the civil and ecclesiastical powers, as the true and lawful primate of Africa. The honours and estates of the church were attributed to his suffragan bishops, and it was not without difficulty, that Constantine was satisfied with inflicting the punishment of exile on the principal leaders of the Donatist faction. The sentence was confirmed by the edict, and the condemnation of their cause was considered with much attention, perhaps it was determined with justice. Perhaps their complaint was not without foundation, that the credulity of the emperor had been abused by the insidious arts of his favourite Osias. The influence of falsehood and corruption might procure the condemnation of the innocent, or aggravate the sentence of the guilty. Such an act, however, of injustice, if it concluded an important dispute, might be numbered among the transient evils of a despotic administration, which are neither felt nor remembered by posterity.

But this incident, so incomprehensible that it scarred a place, a place, a place, "Sic transit gloria mundi," was productive of a memorable schism, which afflicted the provinces of Africa above three hundred years, and was extinguished only with Christianity itself. The infallible zeal of freedom and fanaticism animated the Donatists to refuse obedience to the usurpers, whose election they disputed, and whose spiritual powers they denied. Excluded from the civil and religious communion of mankind, they boldly excommunicated the rest of mankind, who had connived at the usurpation of the sacred rights. Tradition, from whom he derived his pretended ordination. They asserted with confidence, and almost with exultation, that the apostolical succession was interrupted; that all the bishops of Europe and Asia were infected by the contagion of guilt and schism; and that the primitiveness of the cathechumenate was confined to the chosen portion of the African believers, who alone had preserved inviolate the integrity of their faith and discipline. This rigid theory was supported by the most uncharitable conduct. Whenever they acquired a prospect of winning from the distant provinces of the east, they carefully repeated the sacred rites of baptism and ordination; as they rejected the validity of those which he had already received from the hands of heretics or schismatics. Bishops, virgins, and even spotless infants, were subjected to the disgrace of a public trial, where they could not escape communion of the Donatists. If they obtained possession of a church which had been used by their Catholic adversaries, they purified the unhallowed building with the same jealous care which a temple of idols might have required. They washed the paves- ments, crucifixes, bells, bibles, which are commonly of wood, melted the consecrated plate, and cast the holy eucharist to the dogs, with every circumstance of ignomy which could provoke and perpetuate the animosity of religious factions. Notwithstanding this irreconcilable aversion, the two parties were for a period so mixed and separated in all the cities of Africa, had the same language and manners, the same zeal and learning, the same faith and worship. Prescribed by the civil and ecclesiastical powers of the empire, the Donatists still maintained in some provinces, particularly in Numidia, their superior numbers; and four hundred bishops acknowledged the jurisdiction of their primate. But the invincible spirit of the sect sometimes preyed on its own vitals; and the bosom of their schismatistical church was torn by intestine divisions. A fourth part of the Donatist bishops followed the independent standards of the Arians, of the Maurorum, and of the Locos, a sect which its first leaders had marked out, continued to deviate from the great society of mankind. Even the imperceptive sect of the Ragnoni could affirm, without a blush, that when Christ should descend to judge the earth, he would find his true religion preserved only in a few nameless villages of the Caseran Mauritanian.

The Trinitarian The schism of the Donatists was controversy. confined to Africa: the more diffusive mis- chief of the Trinitarian controversy successively penetrated into every part of the christian world. The former was an accidental quarrel, occasioned by the abuse of freedom; the latter was a high and mysterious argument, derived from the abuse of philosophy. From the age of Constantine to that of Clovis and Theodore, the first conquests both of the Romans and barbarians were deeply involved in the disputes of Arianism. The historian may therefore be permitted respectfully to withdraw the veil of the sanctuary; and to deduce the progress of reason and faith, of error and passion, from the school of Plato to the decline and fall of the empire.

The genius of Plato, informed by his own meditation, or by the traditional knowledge of the priests of Egypt, had ventured to explore the mysterious nature of the Deity. When he had elevated his mind to the sublime contemplation of the first self-existent, the transcendental idea of the Deity, he was incapable of conceiving how the simple unity of his essence could admit the infinite variety of distinct and successive ideas which compose the model of the intellectual world; how a being purely incorporeal could execute that perfect model, and mould with a word the universe of intelligences. He therefore hoped of extricating himself from these difficulties, which must ever oppress the feeble powers of the human mind, might induce Plato to consider the divine nature under the threefold modification; of the first cause, or Logos, the Word, of the Logos, or spirit of the universe. His poetical imagination sometimes fixed and animated these metaphysical abstractions; the three archetypal or original principles were represented in the Platonic system as three Gods, united with each other by a mysterious bond and indescribable unity which was peculiarly considered under the more accessible character of the Son of an Eternal Father, and the Creator and Governor of the world. Such appear to have been the secret doctrines which were cautiously whispered in the gardens of the Academy; and which, according to Plato. Egyttnus peragravit ut ascendentis barbaris numeros et ecclesia accipierit. Cerco de Iin. 5. The Egyptians, in the very state of their most remote existence, which is believed by some to have been under the government of the priests, have persuaded many of the Christian fathers, that Plato derived a part of his knowledge from the Jews; but this vain opinion cannot be reconciled with the pure state and simple manners of the Jewish people, whose scriptures were not accessible to Greek curiosity till the middle of the second century, and were not translated into the Latin tongue till the time of Cæsar, by Jerome, and Marcellus, Canon. chron. p. 114. Le Clerc, Epistol. crit. viii. p. 177—179.

This account of the doctrines of Plato, appears to me, opposed to the real meaning of the writings of this philosopher. The obscurity of his language, the complexity of his sects, and his highly allegorical and figurative style, have misled his interpreters at times; but, could we find, or did not seek, from his works viewed as a whole and beyond the images employed by the writer, the depth of the ideas of the philosopher. There is, in my opinion, nothing of the Trinity in the works of Plato. He has established no mysterious generation between the three principles which it has been imagined that he clearly recognises in his writings; and he never conceived of the ideas of which it is pretended he made substances, real existences, except as the attributes of divinity or of power.

According to Plato, God and matter have existed from all eternity. Before the existence of the world, matter existed in infinite motion, but without design or laws. It is this principle which Plato calls the irrational soul of the world (στοιχεῖα οὐρανοῦ) because in his metaphysics he gives to the rational soul, and not to the soul. God wished to bestow the impress of form upon this matter; but, as night and day, or the existent and non-existent, could not be brought together, he could not regulate its motion, and add to it design and laws. Deity could not act in this operation, except according to ideas existing in his in- telligence. Their union completed it, and formed the soul of the world. It is this ideal world, this divine intelligence existing with God from all eternity, and called by Plato νοῦς or λογος, the personification, the substantialization of which is attributed to him, while an attentive examination in sufficient to produce the concep- tion that he never gave it existence independent of Deity, and that he considered the logos only as the ensemble of the ideas of God, the order of ideas is independent of the relation to the Deity. Some of his systems are irreconcilable with all his philosophy. Thus he says (Timæus, p. 316, ed. Gomii), that the idea of divinity is really united that of an intelligence, a logos; he must then have admitted a double logos, one inerent in deity as an attribute, the other existing indepen- dently of Deity. It is a difficult question, or the origin of the most fundamental idea of the soul. The idea of motion, as a principle of motion and life, of the nature which is unknown to us.

How could he, after this, have regarded the logits as a substance endowed with an independent existence? Besides, he exhibits it by means of three different principles, viz. the science, and the idea, to denote attributes of deity, (Soph. vol. ii. p. 293). Finally, it re- sults from his own passages, among others that of Plato, vol. ii. p. 297, 298, that Plato never gave but one of these two meanings to the words nous and logos; namely, the result of the motion of the world (στοιχεῖα οὐρανοῦ) and the idea of the divine order, the laws of the generation or the universe, which is the first being a whole—and this is the natural soul of the world (στοιχεῖα οὐρανοῦ) or the natural soul of the universe, στοιχεῖα οὐρανοῦ. When he separates God, the ideal type, from the world and matter, he does it in order to explain how, according to his system, God has formed and generated this world, in which he has possessed himself in his own intelligence, the logos, to the principle of being, the nous, and the logos is the soul, logos, and soul, logos, to the principle of being, the nous, and the logos is the soul, logos, and soul. When he speaks of the place which the ideal world (στοιχεῖα οὐρανοῦ) occupies, it is to designate the divine intellect which is the cause of it. In no part of this writer are there four real personifications
The more recent disciples of Plato, could not be perfectly understood, till after an assiduous study of thirty years.

The arms of the Macedonians diffused over Asia and Egypt the language and learning of Greece; and the theological ideas of the Jews were received, in this receptacle, with less reserve, and perhaps with some improvements, in the celebrated school of Alexandria. A numerous colony of Jews had been invited, by the favour of the Ptolemies, to settle in their new capital. While the bulk of the nation practised the legal ceremonies, and participated the advantages of the Grecian, and, perhaps, of the Hebrews, of a more liberal spirit, devoted their lives to religious and philosophical contemplation. They cultivated with diligence, and embraced with ardour, the theological system of the Athenian sage. But their national pride would have been mortified by a fair confession of their former poverty; and they boldly marked, as the sacred inheritance of their ancestors, the gold and jewels which they had so lately stolen from their Egyptian ancestors. One hundred years before the birth of Christ, a philosophical treatise, which manifestly betrays the style and spirit of the amazing book, was produced by the Alexandrian Jews, and unanimously received as a genuine and valuable relic of the inspired wisdom of Solomon. A similar union of the Mosaic faith and the Greek philosophy, distinguishes the works of Philo, of the precedent occasion of which it is said he formed a Trinity, and if this periodical existence were continued, it would have been manifestly impossible to many other ideas of which many different Trinities might have been formed. Moreover, it would not be necessary, in order to consider Plato alone, to tell the inquirers of Plato have fallen, ancient as well as moderns, was sufficiently natural. Besides the liability to be led into error by his figurative style, besides the metaphysical character of his thought, there was that which he comprehended as a whole, and not explained by isolated panegyric upon the parts and portions of the universe. Plato appeared, the uncertainty of human knowledge, and the constant deceptions of the senses were acknowledged, and this gave rise to a general scepticism. Socrates wished to fester mori a from this scepticism; Plato endeavoured to keep metaphysics free from all such deceptions, of which he was convinced, that the senses could not furnish. He invented the system of innate ideas, the ensemble of which formed, according to him, the ideal world; and he affirmed, that these ideas were the veritable attributes, attached not only to our representations of objects, but also to the nature of the objects themselves. He gave to these ideas a positive existence as attributes; his commentators could easily give them this existence, by the assistance of the transcendental opinions of which, however, he would not allow to be used to designate them, as he has no existence apart from themselves; beauty itself, goodness itself, might be made use of in this substantiation (hypostasization) in spirit.

The modern guides who led me to the knowledge of the Platonic system, of the Platonic philosophy, and of the Platonic works, were the American philosophers, (hist. des Jufs, t. iv. p. 338—360.) Le Cleer, (Epist. Crit. vii. p. 134—295.) and Brucker, (Hist. Philosoph. tom. i. p. 472—700.) As the extracts from the works of Plato do not contain any impulsive observe may derive instruction from their disputes, and from their agreements.

Brucker, Hist. Philosoph. tom. i. p. 129—127. 357. The Alexandrian school is celebrated by Strabo, (l. xvii.) and Ammianus, (xxiv. 6.)

Josephus, Antiquities of the Hebrews, (l. iv. c. 2.) Excerpta, Hier. des Jufs, c. 7.

For the origin of the Jewish philosophy, see Eusebius, Prepar. Evang. xvi. 18. According to Ptolemy, the Therapeutes studied philosophy; and Brucker has proved, (Hist. Philosoph. tom. ii. p. 124—160,) that the Jews, of the preference of that to which the Alexandrians have given the name of philosophy, were influenced by the work of Moses and of the work of that monotheist; and although rejected by the protests for want of a Hebrew original, it has obtained, with the rest of the Vandalic translation, the auctoritas doctrinalis of the school.

The philosophy of Plato was not the only source of that of Moses. Origen, Irenaeus, Porphyry, and others, who have written on the Jewish, and the Egyptian literature existed, was the theatre of strange combinations of the systems of these three nations. According to one of the school of Alexandria, it has been observed, that the Jews have altered, and in this manner, undergone great changes; endeavoured to reconcile this Platonic with their new doctrines, and entirely disfigured it; and finally, by means of the exposition and interpretations, which the Greeks themselves respected, coloured on their part to such a degree, that it became and remained a part of their spiritual oriental philosophy, rather than of that of Platonism, appears in the works of the Alexandrian Jews. This has been often noted in those books and in those of the later prophets, as Ezekiel, ideas which the Jews did not have before the Babylonian captivity, and the germ of which was brought under the influence of the oriental system by that of the Alexandrian Jews, and was afterwards elaborated by the Alexandrian Jews, and was afterwards elaborated by the Alexandrian Jewish philosophy, which was composed for the most part under the reign of Augustus. The material soul of the universe might offend the piety of the Hebrews: but they applied the character of the Logos to the Jehovah of Moses and the patriarchs; and the Son of God was introduced upon earth under a visible and even human appearance, which was not incompatible with the nature and attributes of the universal cause.

The eloquence of Plato, the name of Solomon, the authority of the school of Alexandria, and the consent of the Jews, were sufficient to establish the truth of a mysterious doctrine, which might please, but could not satisfy, a rational mind. A prophet, or apostle, inspired by the Deity, can alone exercise a lawful dominion over the faith of mankind; and the theology of Plato might have been for ever confounded with the philosophical visions of the Academy, the Porch, and the Lyceum, if the name and divine attributes of the Logos had not been confirmed by the celestial pen of the last and most sublime of the evangelists. The christian revelation, which was consummated under the reign of Nerva, disclosed to the world a God, that the Logos was introduced from the beginning, and was God, who had made all things, and for whom all things had been made, was incarnate in the person of Jesus of Nazareth; who had been born of a virgin, and suffered death on the cross. Besides the general design of fixing on a perpetual basis the divine avouchments of Christ, the most and most respectable of the ecclesiastical writers have ascertained to the evangelical theologian, a particular intention to confute two opposite heresies, which disturbed the church of the Philosophers, and also the church of the Jews, which has been the main use of this word without my previous explanation, as a term which his contemporaries already

The Ebionites were of the primitive church. 1. The Ebionites, supposed to have been the sons of the Nazarines, 2 perhaps of the Nazarines, 3 was gross and imperfect. They revered Jesus as the greatest of the prophets, endowed with supernatural virtue and power. They ascribed to his person and to his future reign all the predictions of the Hebrew oracles which relate to the spiritual and everlasting state. They believed that he was the Messiah, and asserted the divine nature of Christ. 4 Educated in the school of Plato, accustomed to the sublime idea of the Logos, they readily conceived that the brightness of the Sophia, or emanation of the Deity, might assume the outward shape and visible appearances of a mortal; 5 but they finally, after long reflection, determined to reject an idea so incompatible with the purity of a celestial substance.

While the blood of Christ yet smoked on Mount Calvary, the Docetists invented the imposers and extravagant hypotheses, that, instead of issuing from the womb of the Virgin, Christ was born of a spirit; and that he was a kind of incorporeal principle, which assumed a visible body, as a kind of mask, in order to professor to Christ. 6

The divine sanction, which the sosp- Mysteries had bestowed on the fundamental of the Trinity, the dogma of the trinity of Plato, encouraged the

2 The principle of the divine eternity of the Logos of the Jews, as well as his human nature; they were of the number of the Gnostics, whose whole philosophy, among whom Chrestus himself, chose to derive their opinions from those of Plato. These philosophers did not consider that Platonism had been the subject of controversy, and that the person of Christ was not of the essence of God; the conformity of the Gnostics, posterior to that of the Docetists, with the interpretation of the Scriptures, and the solution of the mysteries of the Logos, and the entrance to the divine kingdom, are clearly proved (Inst. Hist. Ec. Maj. p. 136. 339.) that the oriental philosophy combined with the cabalistic philosophy of the Jews, gave birth to Gnosticism. (The agreement which exists between this doctrine and the monumental records which remain to us of the orientals, such as the Chaldæans and Persians, is evident; and was the source of the errors of the gnostic christians, who wished to reconcile their ancient opinions with their new belief. It is for this cause that they deny the human nature of Christ; they also deny his intimate union with God, and believe him to be only one of the substances (Aiones) created by God. As they believed in the eternity of God, they attributed the principle of evil; in opposition to the Deity, the first cause, and understood it in a spiritual sense. Thus the materials of Christian theology were the same, that which from the Aiones proceeding from God would have allied himself to the principle of evil, by assuming a material nature, and which was involved in the world, was a material body, which was the body of Christ. (See ch. G. F. Walch. Hist. of Heresies, in German, vol. I. p. 217. 218.)

3 The Arians reproached the orthodox party with borrowing their Trinity from the Valentimians and Marcionites. See Beauneau, tom. p. 593.

5 The Logos, as he was called by some, and as he is understood without difficulty, while the Greek and the Grecian Jewish philosophy were united, the principles of these philosophies, and the dogmas of the Ebionites, are the subject of common prejudices, opinions with the ideas of the Evangelist, who did not expressly contain that the Logos was co-existent with God, in the same sense as the Logos of Plato. But we may be led to think that according to the school of Alexandria, attached to the Logos of St. John a metaphysical, which is what St. John understands. Their doctrine approached very near to that of the Greeks. For he was not only called the Word, but the Logos in the person of Arna. G. B. in the habits of abstract reasoning; aspired to contemplate the economy of the Divine Nature: and it is the boast of Tertullian, that a Christian mechanic could readily answer such questions as had perplexed the wisest of the Grecian sages. Where the subject lies so far beyond our reach, the difference between the highest and the lowest of human understandings may be laid to the proper attribute of their opposites. The grace of weakness may perhaps be measured by the degree of obstinacy and dogmatic confidence. These speculations, instead of being treated as the amusement of a vacant hour, became the most serious business of the present, and a most useful preparation for the future. All this, Platonism, to believe, it was impious to doubt, and which it might be dangerous and even fatal to mistake, became the familiar topic of private meditation and popular discourse. The cold indifference of philosophy was inflamed by the fervent spirit of devotion; and with the metaphors of common language suggested the falshoods prejudices of sense and experience. The Christians, who abhorred the gross and impure generation of the Greek mythology, were tempted to argue from the familiar analogy of the filial and paternal relations. The character of Son seemed to imply a perpetual submission to the voluntarism of the act of generation, in the most spiritual and abstracted sense, must be supposed to transmit the properties of a common nature, they durst not presume to circumscribe the powers or the duration of the Son of an eternal and omnipotent Father. Fourscore years after the death of Christ, in the Council of Nicaea, held before the tribunal of Pliny, that they invoked him as a god: and his divine honours have been perpetuated in every age and country, by the various sects who assume the name of his disciples. Their tender reverence for the memory of Christ, and their horror for the scandal created by the profane worship of his name, engaged them to assert the equal and absolute divinity of the Logos, if their rapid ascent towards the throne of heaven had not been imperceptibly checked by the apprehension of violating the unity and sole supremacy of the great Father of Christ and of the universe. The suspension and dissolution produced in the minds of the Christians by these opposite tendencies, may be observed in the writings of the theologians who flourished after the fall of the apostolic age, and before the origin of the Arian controversy. Their sufferance is claimed, with equal confidence, by the orthodox and by the Arians, and no decided preference is made. It is fairly allowed, that if they had the good fortune of possessing the catholic verity, they have delivered their conceptions in loose, inaccurate, and sometimes contradictory language.

II. The devotion of individuals was authority of the first circumstance which distinguished the Christians from the Platonists: the second was the authority of the church. The disciples of philosophy... phy asserted the rights of intellectual freedom, and their respect for the sentiments of their teachers was a liberal and voluntary tribute, which they offered to support.

But the Christians formed a numerous and disciplined society; and the jurisdiction of their laws and magistrates was strictly exercised over the minds of the faithful. The loose wanderings of the imagination were gradually confined by creeds and confessions; the freedom of private judgment subsided into the wisdom of churches; the authority of a theologian was determined by his ecclesiastical rank; and the episcopal successors of the apostles inflicted the censures of the church on those who deviated from the orthodox belief. But in an age of religious controversy, equity and moderation adds not to the elastic vigour of the mind; and the zeal of obstinacy of a spiritual rebel was sometimes stimulated by secret motives of ambition or avarice.

A metaphysical argument became the cause or pretence of political contests; the subtleties of the Platonic school were used as the badges of popular factions, and the distance which separated their respective tenets was enlarged or magnified by the acrimony of dispute. As long as the dark heresies of Praxeus and Sabellius laboured to confound the Father with the Son, the orthodox party might be expected to advance with a greater boldness towards the contrary extreme; and the most orthodox doctors allowed themselves the use of the terms and definitions which had been censured in the mouth of the sectaries. After the edict of toleration had restored peace and leisure to the christians, the Trinitarian controversy was revived, and in the ancient seat of Platonism, the learned, the opulent, the tumultuous city of Alexandria; and the flame of religious discord was rapidly communicated from the schools to the clergy, the people, the province, and the east.

The abstruse question of the eternity of the Logos was agitated in ecclesiastical conferences, and popular sermons; and the heterodox opinions of Arius were soon made public by his own zeal, and by that of his adversaries. His most implacable adversaries have acknowledged the learning and blameless life of the eminent presbyter, who, in a former election, had deserted to the opposite party; and perhaps some of his pretensions to the episcopal throne. His competitor Alexander assumed the office of his judge. The important cause was argued before him; and if at first he seemed to hesitate, he at length pronounced his final sentence, as an absolute presbyter, of the church.

The undoubted presbyter, who presumed to resist the authority of his angry bishop, was separated from the communion of the church. But the pride of Arius was supported by the applause of a numerous party. He reckoned among his immediate followers two bishops of Egypt, seven presbyters, twelve deacons, and many other bishops and priests (by no means a small number) of the very numerous, and almost incredible, seven hundred virgins.

A large majority of the bishops of Asia appears to have supported or favour his cause; and their measures were conducted by Basilius of Cæsarea. The most learned of the christians, Sabellius, and Eusebius of Cæsarea, who had acquired the reputation of a statesman among them, by distinguishing that of a saint. Synods in Palestine and Bithynia were opposed to the synods of Egypt. The attention of the prince and people was attracted by this theological dispute; and the decision, at the very end of the year 320, was pronounced by the supreme authority of the general council of Nice.

When the mysteries of the christian

Three systems of faith were dangerously exposed to public debate, it might be observed, that the human understanding was capable of forming three distinct, though imperfect, systems, concerning the nature of the Divine Trinity; and it was pronounced, that none of these systems, in a pure and absolute sense, were exempt from heresy and error.

1. According to the first hypothesis, which was maintained by Arius and his disciples, the Logos was a dependant and spontaneous creature of the Father, begotten by the Father, and therefore inferior to the Father. The Son, by whom all things were made, had been begotten before all worlds, and the longest of the astronomical periods could be compared only as a fleeting moment to the extent of his duration; yet this duration was not infinite, and there had been a time when the indefinable procession of the Logos, on this only begotten Son the Almighty Father had transubstantiated his ample spirit, and impressed the effulgence of his glory. Visible image of invisible perfection, he saw, at an immeasurable distance beneath his feet, the thrones of the brightest archangels; yet he shone only with a reflected light, and, like the sons of the Roman emperors, who were invested with the titles of Caesar or Augustus, he governed the universe in obedience to the will of his Father and Monarch.

2. In the second hypothesis, the Logos possessed all the inherent, incommunicable perfections, which religion and philosophy appropriate to the Supreme God. Three distinct and infinite minds or substances, three co-equal and co-eternal beings, composed the Divine Essence; and it would have implied contradiction, that any of them should not have existed, or that they should ever cease to exist, without the concurrence of the others. The Logos proceeded from the Father; the Father from the Logos. Three persons in the Roman emperors, who were invested with the titles of Caesar or Augustus, he governed the universe in obedience to the will of his Father and Monarch.

3. But in the absolute creationism of the Logos, was gradually introduced the discourse of the creationists, (Basilii, contra. lib. ii. p. 623—745.) the dignity of the incarnation was so much reduced as to make the work of Christ appear a mere historical event; and the Logos, who was able to digest an eternal generation from an infinite cause, could be compared to the head of a line of contraries, who, at the appearance of the primitive fathers, particularly by Athanasius, in his apology to the emperor Marcus and his son; and it is added, without cause, by Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Irenæus, by his passion, his prejudices, and his ignorance.

4. The late Roman emperors presented the Logos as indifferently, and even ignorant, in the beginning of the controversy: while Socrates (lib. i. p. 333) says, that the doctrine of Arius is the most absurd that he has heard in his theological speculations. Dr. Serrin (Remarks on Eccelesiological History, vol. ii. p. 175) has examined, with his usual freedom, the conduct of Alexander; and Socrates, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, by Cyril of Alexandria, John of Damascus, etc. — See Cæsarea, Leclerc. Cité littéraire Universelle, tom. vi. p. 95—165.

their harmony proceed only from the imperfection and inequality of their faculties: but the omnipotence which is guided by infinite wisdom and goodness, can not fail of choosing the same means for the accomplishment of the same ends.

II. The Father and the Son.

One of their peculiar attributes is the perfect knowledge of their existence, possess all the divine attributes in the most perfect degree; who are eternal in duration, infinite in space, and intimately present to each other, and to the whole universe; irresistibly force themselves on the astonished mind, as one and the same Being whose operations are of infinite grace, as well as in that of nature, may manifest himself under different forms, and be considered under different aspects. By this hypothesis, a real substantial Trinity is refined into a trinity of persons, and abstract modifications, that subsist only in the mind which conceives them. The Logos is no longer a person, but an attribute; and it is only in a figurative sense, that the epiph of Son can be applied to the eternal reason which was with God from the beginning, and by which, not by whom, all things were made. The Incarnation of the Logos is reduced to a mere inspiration of the Divine Wisdom, which filled the mind, as their peculiar phenomenon to the man Jesus. Thus, after revolving round the theological circle, we are surprised to find that the Sabellian ends where the Ebionite had begun; and that the incomprehensible mystery which excites our adoration, eludes our inquiry.

But if the bishops of the council of Nice had been permitted to follow the unbiassed dictates of their conscience, Arius and his associates could scarcely have flattered themselves with the hopes of obtaining a majority of votes, in favour of an hypothesis so directly adverse to the two immense principles of the catholic faith. The Arians soon perceived the danger of their situation, and prudently assumed those modest virtues, which, in the fury of civil and religious dissensions, are seldom practised, or even praised, except by the weaker party. They recommended the exercise of christian charity and moderation; urged the incomprehensible nature of the controversy; disclaimed the use of any terms or definitions which could not be found in the scriptures; and offered, by very liberal concessions, to satisfy their adversaries, without renouncing the integrity of their own principles. The victorious faction rejected the proposals of the adversaries, and anxiously sought for some irreconcilable mark of distinction, the rejection of which might involve the Arians in the guilt and consequences of heresy. A letter was publicly read, and ignominiously torn, in which their patron, Eusebius of Nicomedia, ingenuously avowed the reasons of his former submission, and directly accused those who adhered to the Nicene faith, of being the advocates of the Arians, and of that infinite and irremediable misfortune which they had discovered to them, as a sword which they possessed, but never used. The council of Nicaea, in consequence of this letter, suspended the proceedings against the Arians, and sent to Constantinople to demand a reply from their leader, a letter which explains this extraordinary proceeding of the council. The answer was not yet arrived before the council was dissolved. The Nicene Creed, however, was immediately promulgated, and was thought to be the most suitable to prevent the folly and inconstancy of the Arians. This page is replete with ecclesiastical transactions, and is replete with disputes and controversies, which are so variously intermixed, that it is impossible to give an account of them all.

The authors of a general council, to Arius creeds, which the Arians themselves had been from the seashore, to cut off the head of the hated monster. The consubstantiality of the Father and the Son was established by the council of Nicaea, and has been unanimously received as a fundamental article of the christian faith, by the consent of the Greek, the Latin, and the German church; and if the same word had not served to dignify the heretics, and to unite the catholics, it would have been inadequate to the purpose of the majority, by whom it was introduced into the orthodox creed. This majority was divided into two parties, distinguished by a contrary tendency to the schismatical and the orthodox parties of the Sabellians. But as those opposite extremes seemed to overthrow the foundations either of natural or revealed religion, they mutually agreed to qualify the rigour of their principles; and to disavow the just but invincible consequences, which might be urged by their antagonists. The interest of the common cause inclined them to join their numbers, and to conceal their differences; their animosity was softened by the healing counsels of toleration, and their disputes were suspended by the use of the mysterious Homounston, which either party was free to interpret according to the dictates of their consciences. The Sabellian sense, which, about fifty years before, had obliged the council of Antioch to prohibit this celebrated term, had endeared it to those theologians who entertained a secret but partial affection for a nominal Trinity. But the more fashionable saints of the Arian times, the intrepid Anathemnus, and the meek Petavius, were the other pillars of the church, who supported with ability and success the Nicene doctrine, appeared to consider the expression of subsistence, as if it had been synonymous with that of nature; and they ventured to illustrate their meaning, by affirming that three men, as they belong to the same common species, are consubstantial, or homounstic to each other. This pure and distinct equality was tempered, on the one hand, by the internal connection, and spiritual penetration, which indissolubly unites the divine persons; and on the other, by the pre-eminence of the Father, which was acknowledged as far as it is compatible with the independence of the Son. Within these limits the almost invisible and tremulous ball of orthodoxy was allowed securely to vibrate. On either side, beyond this consecrated ground, the heretics and the demons lurked in ambush to surprise and devour the unhappy sheep of the orthodox. The orthodox themselves must depend on the spirit of the war, rather than on the importance of the controversy, the heretics, who degraded, were treated with more severity than those who annihilated, the person of the Son. The life of Athanasius was consumed in irreconcilable opposition to the impiest cabals of his adversaries. But he died a martyr, and after twenty years the Sabellianism of Marcellus of Anycrn; and when at last he was compelled to withdraw himself from his communion, he continued to mention, with an ambiguous smile, the venial errors of his respectable friend. The authors of a general council, to Arius creeds.

1 See Bull, Defens. Phil. Nica. sect. i. c. i. p. 25-26. He thinks it his duty to recommend the orthodox synod as the correct assembly, and the council of Nice as the most pernicious. He therefore endeavours to defend the Nicene creed by its adversaries. See the invective of Tertullian against Paeans, and Nicene creed by its adversaries. See the invective of Tertullian against Paeans, and the temperate animadversion of Modestus, (p. 423. 681.) and Bouanor, tom. i. i. 3. c. 6. p. 593. 2 The transactions of the council of Nicaea are related by the ancients, among whom we find the name of its attendants, and the names of their authors; but we find no thing that can be considered as the authentic history of the council. Many of the facts proved by the miracles of the Father, and that of nature, may be seen in Tilenium. (De eccles. institut. i. 13. c. 22.) And in Le Clerc (Bibliotheque Universelle, tom. ii. p. 423. 600-753.) and in Le Clerc (Bibliotheque Universelle, tom. ii. p. 423. 600-753.). 3 We are indebted to Ambrose (de Pala. I. iii. cap. ult.) for the knowledge of these various anecdotes. However, among the most probable, and the least suspectible of errors, we must place those that are mutual concessions from the ictus. In the expression of subsistence, the ancient fathers were of two different opinions. 4 Petavius, Carolenses, Codurth, Le Clerc, &c. maligny, or annemasteria, is perhaps the deepest and darkest wormer of the whole animal kingdom. 5 The third section of Bull's Defence of the Nicene faith, which was published in the year 1679, is this, against this opposition, which he considered as the prerogative of the whole church. compelled to submit, inscribed on the banners of the orthodox party, the mysterious characters of the word Homoeoteus, which essentially contributed to the standing some obscure disputes, some nocturnal combats, to maintain and perpetuate the uniformity of faith, or at least of language. The Constantinianists, who by their success have desired and obtained the title of catholics, gloried in the simplicity and steadiness of their creed, and, like the repetition of their adversaries, who were destitute of any certain rule of faith. The sincerity or the cunning of the Arian chiefs; the fear of the laws or of the people, their reverence for Christ, their hatred of Athanasius, all the causes, human and divinely inspired, that influence a sect, are elements of a metaphorical fiction, introduced among the sectaries a spirit of discord and inconstancy, which, in the course of a few years, erected eighteen different models of religion, and avenged the violated dignity of the church. The zealous Hilary, who, from the peculiar hardships of his situation, was inclined to extenuate rather than to aggravate the errors of the oriental clergy, declares, that in the wide extent of the ten provinces of Asia, to which he had been banished, there could be found very few priests who had preserved the knowledge of the true God. The bishops of Syria, of which he had fled, which he was the spectator and the victim, appealed, during a short interval, the angry passions of his soul; and in the following passage, of which I shall transcribe a few lines, the bishop of Potters unwarily deviates into the style of a christian philosopher. "It is a thing, says Hilary, "equally deplorable and dangerous, that there are as many creeds as opinions among men, as many doctrines as inclinations, and as many sources of blasphemy as there are faults among us; because we make creeds arbitrarily, and explain them as arbitrarily. The Hominousion is rejected, and received and explained away by successive synods. The partial or total resemblance of the Father and of the Son, is a subject of dispute for these unhappy times. Every year, nay every moon, we make new creeds to describe invisible mysteries. We repent of what we have done, we defend those who repent, we unchallenge those whom we defended. We condemn either the doctrine of others in ourselves, or our own in that of others; and reciprocally, tearing one another to pieces, we have been the cause of each other's truth."*

Arian sect.

It will not be expected, it would not perhaps be desirable, that shall smooth this theological digression, by a minute examination of the eighteen creeds, the authors of which, for the most part, disclaimed the odious name of their parent Arius. It is amusing enough to delineate the form, and to trace the vegetation, of a singular plant; but the tedious detail of leaves without flowers, and of branches without fruit, would soon exhaust the patience, and discontinue the curiosity, of a laborious student. One question which gradually arose from the Arian controversy, may however be noticed, as it served to produce and discriminate the three sects, which were its immediate corollaries to the Hominousion of the Nicene synod. 1. If they were asked, whether the Son was like unto the Father; the question was resolutely answered in the negative, by the historians of the church. It was a distinct and indubitable difference between the Creator and the most excellent of his creatures. This obvious consequence was maintained by Athanasius, on whom the zeal of his adversaries bestowed the surname of the Atheist. But Damasus, in his letter to Gratian, almost every profession of human life. He was successively a slave, or at least a husbandman, a travelling tinker, a goldsmith, a physician, a schoolmaster, a theologian, and at last the apostle of a new church, which was propagated by the abilities of his disciple Eunomius. The latter, armed with texts and capricious syllogisms from the logic of Aristotle, the subtle Athanasus had acquired the fame of an invincible disputant, whom it was impossible either to silence or to convince. Such talents engaged the friendship of the Arian bishops, till they were forced to remove, and even to persue, a dangerously, weak and inaccurate of his reasoning, had prejudiced their cause in the popular opinion, and offended the piety of their most devoted followers. 2. The omnipotence of the Creator suggested a specious and respectful solution of the question of the Son; but the enormous deviations of the Eunomian interest, and who occupied the principal thrones of the east. They detested, perhaps with some affection, the impiety of Athanasius; they professed to believe, either without reserve, or according to the scriptures, that the Son was different from all other creatures, and similar to the Father, at least in the second person, or in either of the same, or of a similar, substance; sometimes boldly justifying their dissent, and sometimes objecting to the use of the word substance, which seems to imply an adequate, or at least a distinct, notion of the nature of the Deity. 3. The sect which asserted the doctrine of a similar substance, was the most numerous, at least in the provinces of Asia; and when the leaders of both parties were assembled in the council of Seleucia, their opinion would have prevailed by a majority of one hundred and five, to forty-three bishops. The Greek word, which was chosen to express the same, was commonly understood with a affinity to the orthodox symbol, that the profile of every age have derided the furious contests which the difference of a single diphthong excited between the Homocussians and the Homoeans. As it frequently happens, that the sounds and characters which approach the nearest to each other accidentally represent the most opposite ideas, the observation would be itself ridiculous, if it were possible to mark any real and sensible distinction between the doctrine of the Semi-Arians, as they were improperly styled, and that of the catholics themselves. The bishop of Potters, in his Phrygian exile very wisely aimed at a coalition of parties, endeavours to prove that, by a pious and faithful interpretation, the Homooousion may be reduced to a consensual sense. Yet he confesses that the way is beset with the suspicious aspect; and, as if darkness were congenial to the mind of Eusebius, he led the Semi-Arians, who advanced to the doors of the church, assailed them with the most unrelenting fury.

The provinces of Egypt and Asia, cetera for Latin which cultivated the language and churchmanship of the Greeks, had deeply imbibed the venom of the Ariotelic sect. The familiar study of the Platonie system, a vain and argumentative disposition, copyious and delicate idiom, supplied the clergy and people of the east with an inexhaustible flow of words and distinctions; and, in the midst of their fiercely contentium, they had forgot the doubt which is recommended by philosophy, and the submission which is enjoined by religion. The inhabitants of the west were of a less inquisitive spirit; their passions were not so forcibly moved by invisible objects, their minds were less frequently exercised by the habits of dispute; and such was the happy ignorance of the Gallican church at the outset. Hilary himself, above thirty years after the first general council, was still a stranger to the Nicene creed. The Latins had received the rays of divine knowledge through the dark and doubtful medium of a translation. The primitive and stubbornness of their native tongue was not always capable of affording a convenient mode for the Greek terms, for the technical words of the Platonie philosophy, which had been consecrated, by the gospel or by the church, to express the mysteries of the christian faith; and a verbal defect might introduce into the Latin theology a long train of error or perplexity. But in the west the doctrine of the Church was the most fortunate of deriving their religion from an orthodox source, they preserved with steadfastness the doctrine which they had accepted with docility; and when the Arian pestilence approached their frontiers, they were supplied with the seasonable preservative of the Homoean doctrine; for the pastoral care of the Roman pontiff, the Council of Rimini. Their sentiments and their temper were displayed in the memorable synod of Rimini, which surpassed in numbers the council of Nice, since it was composed of above four hundred bishops of Italy, Africa, Spain, Gaul, Britain, and Illyricum, and two hundred prelates of the whole world; of whom fourscore prelates adhered to the party, though they affected to anathematize the name and memory of Arians. But this inferiority was compensated by the advantages of skill, of experience, and of discipline; and the minority was conducted by Valens and Ursinus, bishops of Illyricum, who exerted their influence in the lives of the prelates, and in the intrigues of courts and councils, and who had been trained, under the Eusebian banner, in the religious wars of the east. By their arguments and negociations, they embarrased, they confounded, they at last defeated, the hosts of the Semi-Arians; who suffered the palladium of the faith to be extorted from their hands by fraud and importunity, rather than by open violence. The council of Rimini was not allowed to separate, till the members had imperfectly subscribed a capitular creed, in which some expressions, susceptible of an heretical sense, were inserted in the room of the Homooousion. It was on this occasion, that, according to Jerome, the world was surprised to find the Church of Aria. But the bishops of the Latin province had no sooner received the news, than they discovered their mistake, and repented of their weakness. The ignominious capitulation was rejected with disdain and abhorrence; and the Homooousian standard, which had been shaken but not overthrown, was more firmly replanted in all the churches of the west.

Such was the rise and progress, and such were the natural revolutions, of those theological disputes, which disturbed the peace of Christianity under the reigns of Constantine and Eusebius. As those princes presumed to extend their despotism over the faith, as well as over the lives and fortunes, of their subjects; the weight of their suffrage sometimes inclined the ecclesiastical balance: and the prerogatives of the King of heaven were settled, or changed, or modified, in the cabinet of an earthly monarch.

The unhappy spirit of discord which prevailed the provinces of the east, in the reign of Constantine, A.D. 324, but the emperor continued for some time to view, with cool and careless indifference, the object of the dispute. As he was yet ignorant of the difficulty of appraising the question, and of understanding the parting of the contending parties, to Alexander and to Arians, a moderating epistle: which may be ascribed, with far greater reason, to the untainted sense of a soldier and statesman, than to the dictates of any of his episcopal counsellors. He attributes the origin of the whole controversy to the target of the boundless neglect, and to the insensibility of the emperor to the incomprehensible point of the law, which was foolishly asked by the bishop, and impropriely resolved by the presbyter. He laments that the christian people, who had the same God, the same religion, and the same worship, should be divided by such inconsiderable distinctions; and he recommends to the clergy of Alexandria the example of the Greek philosophers; who could maintain their arguments without losing their temper, and assert their freedom without violating their friendship. The indifference and contempt of the sovereign would have been, in this instance, perhaps, the most effectual cause of the dispute, if the popular current had been less rapid and impetuous, and if Constantine himself, in the midst of faction and fanaticism, could have preserved the calm possession of his own mind. But his ecclesiastical ministers, being the interpreters of the impiety of the magistrate, and to awaken the zeal of the proselyte. He was provoked by the insults which had been offered to his statues; he was alarmed by the real, as well as by the imaginary, magnitude of the spreading mischief; and he extinguished the hope of peace and toleration, from the moment that he assembled three hundred bishops within the walls of the same palace. The presence of the monarch swelled the importance of the debate; his attention multiplied the arguments; and he exposed his person with a patient intrepidity, which annulled the value of all the objections. But he was exasperated by the mere name of heresy; he rejected the applause which has been bestowed on the eloquence and sagacity of Constantine, a Roman general, whose religion might be still a subject of doubt, and whose mind had not been enlightened either by study or by inspiration, was indifferently qualified to discuss, in the Greek language, a metaphysical question, or an article of faith. But the credulity of his favourite Osius, who appears to have presided in the council of Nice, might dispose the emperor in favour of the orthodox party; and a well-timed instigation, that the sons of the republic were not protected by the sacred heretics, had lately assisted the tyrant,2 might exasperate him against their adversaries. The Nicene creed was ratified by Constantine; and his firm declaration, that those who resisted the divine judgment of the synod, must prepare themselves for an immediate contest, was an intimation that the persecution was determined against those in whose possession they should be found. The emperor had now imbibed the spirit of controversy, and the angry sarcastic style of his edicts was designed to inspire his subjects with the hatred which he had conceived against the enemies of Christ. 2 doctrine and the ortho-decree had been guided by passion instead of A. D. 324—337. principle, three years from the council of Nice were scarcely elapsed, before he discovered some symptoms of merriment, and even of indulgence, towards the proscribed sect, which was secretly protected by his favourite sister. The edicts which secreted his opinion over the mind of Constantine, was restored to the episcopal throne, from which he had been ignominiously degraded. Arius himself was treated by the whole court with the respect which would have been due to an innocent and oppressed man. His faith was approved by the synod of Jerusalem; and the emperor seemed impatient to repair his injustice, by issuing an absolute command, that he should be solemnly admitted to the communion in the cathedral of Constantinople. On a day on which he had been desirous of the triumphs of Arian, Eusebius, who gratuitously resumed his influence over the emperor, was restored to the episcopal throne, from which he had been ignominiously degraded. The emperor, who had been desirous of the triumphs of Arian, was restored to his former dignity; and the strange and horrid circumstances of his death might excite a suspicion, that the orthodox saints had contributed, more efficaciously than by their prayers, to deliver the church from the most formidable of her enemies. Arius was banished to the court, and the whole empire ascribed to his arrival in the court of Constantine, whose favor was, in his own, and the emperor's mind, that the glorious event had been revealed to him by an angel. The grateful emperor ascribed his success to the merits and intercession of the bishop of Marsa, whose faith had deserved the public and miraculous approbation of heaven. The Arians, who considered that the favor of Constantine was to be transferred to his glory to that of his father, Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, immediately composed the description of a celestial cross, encircled with a splendid rainbow, which, during the festival of Pentecost, about the third hour of the day, had appeared over the mount of Olives, to the edification of the devout pilgrims, and

1 Theodoret has preserved (L. i. c. 20) an epistle from Constantine to Arius, in which he defers himself to the public acumen of one of his subjects; he styles Eusebius, 'the apostate,' and imputes to him the blunders of his horrible behaviour during the civil war.

2 epistle of Eusebius of Cesarea, in which he attempts to justify his subscribing the Homilies. The character of Eusebius has always been a problem; but those who have read the second critical edition of Le Clerc, (Ars Critica, tom. iii. p. 59—69,) must entertain very favorable opinion of the orthodoxy and sincerity of Bp. of Constantinople.

5 We derive the original story from Athanasius, (tom. iii. p. 673,) who, in the account which he gives of the circumstances attending the death of Cyril, says that he might exasperate: but the perpetual comeliness of Alexandrium and Constantine was not sufficient to prevent the death of the latter. 6 The change in the sentiments, or at least in the conduct of Constantine, may be traced in Eusebius, (in Vit. Constantini, lib. ii. c. 23, l. i. c. 41.) Socrates, (I. i. c. 39—39.) Sociomene, (I. ii. v. 34.) Theodoret, (I. i. c. 32.) Hilarion, (I. ii. c. 24.) Theodorus, (I. c. 12.) and the description of some of these writers was too near the scene of action, and the others were too private a matter to be described by them. It is significant of the task of continuing the history of the church, should have been left for two baysmen and a heretic.

10 Cyril (pand Barou. A. D. 333, No. 25,) expressly observes, that in the reign of Constantine the cross had been found in the heavens; but that it had appeared, in the reign of Constantine, in the midst of the heavens. This opposition evidently proves, that no miraculous occurrence of this sort could be attributed to Constantine. The occurrence of Constantine is attributed; and this ignorance is the more surpris- ing, when we consider that the emperor was a priest. Tertullian himself, who press the literal narrative of the death of Arius, (his bowels sud-

the people of the holy city. The size of the meteor was gradually magnified; and the Arian historian has variously described it as inspiring the thoughts of the armies in the plains of Pannonia; and that the tyrant, who is purposely represented as an idolater, fled before the auspicious sign of orthodox Christianity.

The sentiments of a judicious stranger, who has impartially considered the progress of civil and ecclesiastical discord, are always entitled to our notice; and a short passage of Ammianus, who served in the armies, and studied the character, of Constantius, is perhaps of more value than many pages of theological invectives. "The Christian religion, which, in itself," says that moderate historian, "is an alteration in the unalterable principles of superstition. Instead of reconciling the parties by the weight of his authority, he cherished and propagated, by verbal disputes, the differences which his own curiosity had excited. The highways were covered with troops of bishops galloping from every side to the assemblies, which they called synods; and while they laboured to reduce the whole sect to their own particular opinions, the public establishment of the possis was almost ruined by their hasty and repeated journeys."

Our more intimate knowledge of the ecclesiastical transactions of the reign of Constantius, with his short presentation of the power of bishops, is a valuable passage; which justifies the rational apprehensions of Athanasius, that the restless activity of the clergy, who wandered round the empire in search of the true faith, would excite the contempt and laughter of the unbelieving world. As soon as the emperor was relieved from the torments of the civil war, he devoted the leisure of his winter quarters at Arles, Milan, Sirmium, and Constantinople, to the amusements or tolls of controversy: the sword of the magistrate, and even of the tyrant, was unsheathed, to enforce the reasons of the theologian; and as he opposed the orthodox, and fixed his principles in the division of the church, the capacity and ignorance were equal to his presumption.

The eunuchs, the women, and the bishops, who governed the vain and feeble mind of the emperor, had inspired him with an insuperable dislike to the Homonoious; but his timid conscience was alarmed by the impiety of heretics. The gates of that atheist were aggravated by the suspicious favour of the unfortunate Gallus; and even the deaths of the imperial ministers, who had been massacred at Antioch, were imputed to the suggestions of that dangerous sophist. The mind of Constantius, which could neither be moderated by persuasion nor restrained by threat, was extricated by a chance event; and the episcopal claims of the three most celebrated prelates were separated, to the solace of the great Athanasius. During the season of public business or festivity, he employed whole days, and even nights, in selecting the words, and weighing the syllables, which composed his fluctuating creeds. The subject of his meditations still pursued and occupied his slumbers; the incoherent dreams of the emperor were received as celestial visions; and the Arian court was considered as the seat of the holy title of bishop of bishops, from those ecclesiastics who forgot the interest of their order for the gratification of their passions. The design of establishing an uniformity of doctrine, which had engaged him to convene so many synods in Gaul, Italy, Illyricum, and Asia, was repeatedly baffled by his own passions. The bishops were directed to meet at Seleucia, in Isauria; while those of the west held their deliberations at Rimini, on the coast of the Adriatic; and instead of two or three deputations from each province, the whole episcopal body was ordered to march. The eastern council, after consuming four days in fierce and unwavailing debate, separated without any definite conclusion. The council of the west was protracted to the seventh month. Tau rus, the prætorian prefect, was instructed not to dismiss the prelates till they should all be united in the same opinion; and his efforts were supported by a letter from the court of the Agathian king. This promise of the consulsipal if he achieved so difficult an adventure. His prayers and threats, the authority of the sovereign, the spurious name of Valens and Ursacius, the distress of cold and hunger, and the tedious melanchoaly of a hopeless exile, at length extinguished the reluctant consent of the bishops of Rimini. The deputies of the east and of the west attended the emperor in the palace of Con stantine, and he enjoyed the satisfaction of imposing on the world a profession of faith which established the liceus, without expressing the constabulary. The Son of God, and the most sacred Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, to whose defence he consecrated every moment and every faculty of his being. Educated in the family of Alexander, he had vigorously opposed the early progress of the Arian heresy; he exercised the important functions of senator under the aged prelate; and the fathers of the Nicene council beheld, with surprise and respect, the rising virtues of the young deacon. In the time of public danger, the dull claims of age and of rank were sometimes superseded; and within five months after his return from Nice, the deacon Athanasius was seated on the archiepiscopal throne at Alexandria. It was a period that eminently station above forty-six years, and his long administration was spent in a perpetual combat against the powers of Arianism. Five times was Athanasius expelled from his throne; twenty years he passed as an exile or a fugitive; and almost g We may regret that Theodosius Nalogen composed a panegyric instead of a life of Athanasius, but we should enjoy and improve the advantage of detached notices from the most rich fund of his own epistles and apologises. (Tom. l. p. 670—853.) I shall divide the summary of the life, which he gives in the first edition of his history without giving himself the trouble to consult the writings of Athanasius. Yet even Socrates, the more car- asus Eozomen, and the learned Theodoret, connect the life of Atha- nasius with the series of ecclesiastical history. the several provinces of the Roman empire was successively witness to his merit, and his sufferings in the cause of the Homousion, which he considered as the sole principle of the orthodox faith, as the gospel of his life. Amidst the storms of persecution, the archbishop of Alexandria was patient of labour, jealous of fame, careless of safety; and although his mind was tainted by the contagion of fanaticism, Athanasius displayed a superiority of character and abilities, which would have qualiﬁed him, far better than the degenerate sons of Constantine, for the government of a great monarchy. His learning was much more pro-

In his capacity as the patriarch of Alexandria, the residence of the See of Egypt, he was the centre of the life of the church. an episcopal commission of six deiles to collect evidence on the spot; and this measure, which was vigorously opposed by the Egyptian bishops, opened new scenes of violence and purjorv. After the return of the bishops, and the΄majority of the council pronounced the final sentence of degradation and exile against the primate of Egypt. The doer, expressed in the fiercest language of malice and re\enge, was communicated to the emperor and the catholy church; and the bishops immediately resumed a mild, and devout conduct, and became their holy pilgrimage to the sepuhel of Athanasius.

His first exile, A.D. 336.

But the injustice of these ecclesiastic\ical judges had not been cont\onished by the submission, or even by the presence, of Athanasius. He resolved to make a bold and dangerous exodus. Confronted with the emperor, and the voice of truth; and before the final sentence could be pronounced at Tyre, the intrepid primate threw himself into a bark which was ready to hoist sail for the imperial city. The request of a formal audience might have been opposed or eluded; but Athanasius consented to this hege appeal as a means of Constantine’s return from an adjacent villa, and boldly encountered his angry sovereign as he passed on horseback through the principal street of Constantinople. So strange an apparition excited his surprise and indignation; and the guards were ordered to remove the impious fugitive, and deliver the orthodoxAthanasius to the tribunal of the Exubefian faction; but they had not aggravated the guilt of the primate, by the dexterous supposition of an unpardonable offence; a criminal design to intercept and detain the corn-boat of Alexandria, which supplied the subsistence of the new capital. The emperor was satisfied that the peace of Egypt would be secured by the absence of a popular leader; but he refused to fill the vacancy of the archiepiscopal see; and the sentence, which after hesitation, he pronounced, was that of a judicial ex\ile, rather than of an ignominious exile. In the royal capital, Athanasius was subjected to the censure of the court of Treves, Athanasius passed about twenty-eight months. The death of the emperor changed the face of public affairs; and, amidst the general indulgence and restoration of a young reign, the primate was restored to his country by an honourable edict of the young Constantine, in deep sense of the innocence and merit of his venerable guest.

His second exile. A.D. 336.

The death of that prince exposed Athanasius to a second persecution; and the feeble Constantius, the sovereign of the east, soon became the secret assassins of his two predecessors. Nineteen bishops of that sect or faction assembled at Antioch, under the specious pretence of dedicating the cathedral. They composed an ambiguous creed, which is faintly tinged with the colours of semi-arianism, and two or three famous, which are falsely compared with the discipline of the orthodox Greeks. It was decided, with some appearance of equity, that a bishop, deprived by a synod, should not resume his episcopal functions, till he had been absolved by the judgment of an equal synod; the law was immediately applied to the case of Athanasius; the case of Athanasius was pronounced, or rather confounded, a stranger, named Gregory, was seated on his throne; andPhilagrius, the prefect of Egypt, was instructed to support the new primate with the civil and military powers of the province. Oppressed by the conspiracy of the Asiatic prelates, Athanasius withdrew from Babylon, and took refuge in the Monastery of St. Nitocris, near Tceilium, and a preyant on the holy threshold of the Vatican. By the assiduous study of the Latin language, he soon qualified himself to negotiate with the western clergy; his decent countenance whetted interest in his cause; and his innocence was unanimously declared in a council of five bishops of Italy. At the end of three years, the primate was summoned to the court of Milan by the emperor Constans, who, in the indulge\nce of unlawful pleasures, still professed a haughty regard for the orthodoxy of his own church. The young Constantius was promoted by the influence of gold, and the ministers of Constans advised their sovereign to require the convocation of an ecclesiastical assembly, which might act as the representatives of the catholic church. Ninety-four bishops of the west, and one of the twenty-six of the east, met together at Sardica, on the verge of the two empires, and in the dominions of the protector of Athanasius. Their debates soon degenerated into hostil alterations; the Asiatics, apprehensive for their personal safety, retired to Philipopolis in Thrace; and the rival synods reciprocally hurled their spiritual thunders against their enemies, whom they proudly condemned as the enemies of the true God. Their decrees were published and nullified in their respective provinces: and Athanasius, who in the west was revered as a saint, was exposed as a criminal to the abhorrence of the east. The council of Sardica reveals at one stroke the growth of the theology of the Greek and Latin churches, which were separated by the accidental difference of faith, and the permanent distinction of language.

and restoration.

During his second exile in the west, Athanasius a second time admitted the imperial presence; at Capua, Lodii, Milan, Verona, Pavia, Aquileia, and Treves. The bishop of the diocese usually assisted at these interviews; the master of the offices stood before the veil or curtain of the sacred apartment; and the uniform moderation of the prince was marked by the least unworthy assistance, to whose evidence he solemnly appeals. Providence would undoubtedly suggest the mild and respectful tone that became a subject and a bishop. In these famous conferences with the sovereign of the west, Athanasius might lament the error of Constantine; but he had to be the instrument of his country and his Arian prelates; deposed the distress and danger of the catholic church; and excited Constantine to emulate the zeal and glory of his father. The emperor declared his resolution of employing the troops and treasures of Europe in the orthodox cause, and signified, by a concise and peremptory epistle to his brother Constantius, that unless he consented to the immediate restoration of Athanasius, he himself, with a fleet and army, would seal the archbishop on the throne of Alexandria. But this religious war, so horrible to masure, was prevented by the timely compliance of Constantius; and the emperor of the east, desirous of soliciting a reconciliation with a subject whom he had injured. Athanasius waited with decent pride, till he had received three successive epistles full of the strongest assurances of the protection, the favour, and the esteem of his sovereign; who invited him to retire to his spiritual seat, and to proceed with precaution of engaging his principal ministers to attest the sincerity of his intentions. They were manifested in a still more public manner, by the strict orders which were despatched to Egypt to recall the adherents of Athanasius, to restore their privileges, to prevent their flights, and to cease from the public registers the illegal proceedings which had been obtained during the prevalence of the Eusebian faction. After every satisfaction and security had been given, which justice or even delicacy could require, the prince proceeded, by slow journeys, through the provinces of Thrace, Asia, and Syria; and his progress was marked by the abrupt homage of the oriental bishops, who excused his contempt without deceiving his penetration. At Antioch he saw the emperor Constantius; sustained, with modest firmness, the embarrassments and jealousies of his master, and eluded the proposal of allowing the Arians of Alexandria, by claiming, in the other cities of the empire, a similar toleration for his own party; a reply which might have appeared just and moderate in the mouth of an independent prince. The entrance of the archbishop into his capital was a triumphal procession; absence and persecution had endeared him to the Alexandrians; his authority, which he exercised with rigour, was more firmly established; and his fame was diffused from Ethiopia to Britain, over the whole extent of the Christian world.

The treatment of Constantius, A.D. 341.

But the subject who has reduced his prince to the necessity of disseminating, 331 can never expect a sincere and lasting forgiveness; and the tragic fate of Constans soon declared it to be a generous offer to the saviour of the faith. The civil war between the assassin and the only surviving brother of Constantius, which afflicted the empire above three years, secured an interval of repose to the catholic church; and the two contending parties were desirous to conciliate the friendship of a prince, and a bishop, of the orthodox persuasion. The civil war might determine the fluctuating resolutions of an important province. He gave audience to the ambassadors of the tyrant, with whom he was afterwards accused of holding a secret correspondence; and the emperor Constantius repeatedly assured his dearest confidant, that he would, at all events, and in all his acts, provide for the safety of a credulous monarch. The monarch himself avowed the resolution, which he had so long suppressed, of avenging his private injuries, and the first winter after his victory, which he passed at Arles, was employed against an enemy more odious to him than the worse adherence of the Eusebians, and whom he had treated with the most unqualified considera- tion. If the emperor had capriciously determined to claim the death of the most eminent and Milan, A. D. 333-335, virtuous citizen of the republic, the cruel order would have been executed without hesitation, by the ministers of open violence or of secret inveterate jealousy. If the desperate attempt by which he proceeded in the condemnation and punishment of a popular bishop, discovered to the world that the privileges of the church had already revived a sense of order and freedom in the Roman government. The sentence which was pronounced in the synod of Tyre, and subscribed by a large majority of the eastern bishops, had never been expressly repealed; and as Athanasius had been once degraded from his episcopal dignity by the judgment of his brethren, every subsequent act might be considered as irregular, and even criminal. But the memory of the Arian party and the iconoclastic church of Egypt, had derived from the attachment of the western church, engaged Constantius to suspend the execution of the sentence, till he had obtained the concurrence of the Latin bishops. Two years were consumed in ecclesiastical negotiations; and the important cause between the emperor and one of his subjects was solemnly debated, first in the synod of Arles, and afterwards in the great council of Milan, which consisted of above three hundred bishops. Their integrity was gradually undermined by the arguments of the Arians, the dexterity of the synods, and the pressing solicitations of a prince, who gratified his revenge at the expense of his dignity; and exposed his own passions, whilst he influenced those of the clergy. Corruption, the most insalubrious symptom of constitutional liberty, was successfully practised; honours, gifts, and immu- nities were purchased with the utmost facility by the most contemptible of men; the only exception was the grace and respect which were shown to the venerable and virtuous monarch, who was not permitted to resort to that court which could yield him no satisfaction. The enmity of the emperor against his brother had been so easily preserved, that he appears to have been induced by the influence of the Arian party to employ Athanasius, than he had been to vanquish Magnentius or Sylvanus. The affairs of the court of Milan are so imperfectly and erroneously recorded, that it is difficult even to collect the supply of some letters of Eusebius, extracted by Baronius from the archives of the church of Verceil, and of an old life of Theodoret of Milan, published by Belianus. See Baronius, A. D. 555, and Tillemont, tom. vii. p. 1415.
nities, were offered and accepted as the price of an episcopal vote; and the condemnation of the Alexandrian primate was artfully represented as the only measure which could restore the peace and union of the church. The friends of Athanasius were not, however, wanting to their leader or to their cause. With a manly spirit, which the sanctity of their character and the weight of the ecclesiastical, public, and private controversy. They declared, that neither the hope of his favour, nor the fear of his displeasure, should prevail on them to join in the condemnation of an absent, an innocent, a respectable, and a revered emperor, who had been attacked by the enemies of truth, and justice, to the more interesting object of defending, or removing, the intrepid champion of the Nicene faith. The Arians still thought it prudent to disguise, in ambiguous language, their real sentiments and designs: but the orthodox bishops, armed with the favour of the people, and the decrees of a general council, insisted on every occasion, and particularly at Milan, that their adversaries should surcease themselves from the suspicion of heresy, before they presumed to arraign the conduct of the great Athanasius. But the voice of reason (if reason was indeed on the side of Athanasius) and the just demands of those bishops who still adhered, with unshaken fidelity, to the cause of Athanasius and religious truth, were at length heard. The ingenuous and straightforward men of the present age deprived them of the benefit of mutual comfort and advice, separated those illustrious exiles by distant provinces, and carefully selected the most inhospitable spots of a great empire. Yet they soon experienced that the deserts of Libya, and the most barbarous tracts of barbarian Europe, were the only places in which the Ambassadors, in an Arian bishop could satiate, without restraint, the exquisite rancour of theological hatred. Their consolation was derived from the consciousness of rectitude and independence, from the applause, the visits, the letters, and the liberal alms of the sons of the church of Rome. of their temper, might either pity or insult the blind enthusiasm of their antagonists, whose present sufferings would never be compensated by future happiness.

The disgrace and exile of the orthodox bishops of Alexandria, A. D. 306, so as many preparatory steps to the ruin of Athanasius himself. Six-and-twenty months had elapsed, during which the imperial court secretly laboured, by the most insidious arts, to remove him from Alexandria, and to withdrawing the arms of the church from his protection. But when the primate of Egypt, deserted and proscribed by the Latin church, was left destitute of any foreign support, Constantius despatched two of his secretaries with a verbal commission to announce and execute the order of his banishment. As the justice of the sentence, and the security of the clergy, for the protection of the empire, if the people should persist in the resolution of defending, by force of arms, the innocence of their spiritual father. Such extreme caution afforded Athanasius a specious pretence respectfully to dispute the truth of an order, which he could not reconcile, either with the equity, or with the former declarations, of his generous master. The civil power of Egypt permitted themselves insensible to the task of persuading or compelling the primate to abdicate his episcopal throne; and they were obliged to conclude a treaty with the popular leaders of Alexandria, by which it was stipulated, that all pontifical dignities and honours should be suspended till the emperor's pleasure had been more distinctly ascertained. By this seeming moderation, the catholics were deceived into a false and fatal security; while the legions of the Upper Egypt, and of Libya, advanced, by secret orders and hasty marches, to besiege, or rather to surprise, a capital habituated to sedition, and inflamed by religious zeal. The position of Alexandria, between the sea and the lake Marcomis, facilitated the approach and landing of the troops; who were introduced into the heart of the city, before any effectual measures could be taken, either to shut them out, or rather to surprise, a capital habituated to sedition, and inflamed by religious zeal. At the hour of midnight, twenty-three days after the signature of the treaty, Syrianus, duke of Egypt, at the head of five thousand soldiers, armed and prepared for an assault, unexpectedly invested the church of St. Theonas, where the archbishop, with a part of his clergy, had performed the ceremonial of defences. The doors of the sacred edifice yielded to the impetuosity of the attack, which was accompanied with every horrid circumstance of tumult and bloodshed; but, as the bodies of the slain, and the fragments of military weapons, remained the next day an unexceptionable evidence in the possession of the catholics, the enterprise of Syrianus may be considered as a successful irruption rather than as an absolute conquest. The other churches of the city were profaned by similar outrages; and, during at least four months, Alexandria was submitted to the vengeance of a licentious army, stimulated by the ecclesiastics of an hostile faction. Many of the faithful were killed, who may deserve the name of martyrs, if their deaths were neither provoked nor revenged; bishops and presbyters were treated with cruel ignominy; consecrated virgins were stripped naked, scourged, and violated; the houses of wealthy citizens were plundered; and, under the mask of religious zeal, lust, avarice, and private resentment, were gratified with impunity, and even with the consent of the emperor. A seditious and discontented party, were easily persuaded to desert a bishop whom they feared and esteemed. The hopes of some peculiar favours, and the apprehension of being involved in the general penalties of rebellion, engaged them to promise their support to the destitute and abandoned primate. Athanasius, the famous George of Cappadocia. The usurper, after receiving the consecration of an Arian synod, was placed on the episcopal throne by the arms of Sebastian, who had been appointed count of Egypt for the execution of that important design. In the use, as well as in the acquisition, of power, the tyrant George Syracuse confessed the laws of religion, of justice, and of humanity; and the same scenes of violence and scandal which had been exhibited in the capital, were repeated in more than ninety episcopal cities of Egypt. Encouraged by success, Constantius ventured to approve the conduct of his adherents. By a public and passionate epistle, the emperor congratulates the deliverance of Alexandria from a popular tyrant, who deluded his blind votaries by the magic of his eloquence; expatiates on the virtues and piety of the most reverend George, the elected bishop; and aspires, as the patron and defender of the church, to the censure of Alexander himself. But he solemnly declares his unalterable resolution to pursue with fire and sword the sedulous adherents of the wicked Athanasius, who, by flying from justice, has confessed his guilt, and escaped the ignominious death which he had so often deserved.

Athanasius had indeed escaped from his behaviour, the most imminent dangers; and the adventures of that extraordinary man deserve far from us. On the memorable night when the church of St. Theonas could not be invested by the troops of Syracuse the archbishop, seated on his throne, expected, with calm and intrepid dignity, the approach of death. While the public devotion was interrupted by shouts of rage and cries of terror, he animated his trembling congregations to express their religious confidence, by a conduct like his holiness. From a pulpit, which is free from any insult and any defamation of Egypt, and which burned round the altar, Athanasius still rejected the pious importunity of the monks and presbyters, who were addressed to his person; and nobly refused to desert his episcopal station, till he had dismissed in safety the last of the congregation. The darkness and tumult of the night favoured the retreat of the archbishop; and though he was oppressed by the waves of an agitated multitude, though he was thrown to the ground, and left without sense or motion, he still recovered his undaunted courage, and eluded the eager research of his oppressors. By the signals of his Arian guides, that the head of Athanasius would be the most acceptable present to the emperor. From that moment the primate of Egypt disappeared from the eyes of his enemies, and remained above six years concealed in impenetrable obscurity.
His retreat, A.D. 326—362, enemy filled the whole extent of the Roman world; and the exasperated monarch had endeavoured, by a very pressing epistle to the christian patriarch of Ethiopia, to exclude Athanasius from the most remoter provinces. The Councils, Counts, prefects, tribunes, whole armies, were successively employed to pursue a bishop and a fugitive; the vigilance of the civil and military powers was excited by the imperial edicts; liberal rewards were promised to the man who should produce Athanasius, even in the remote and most unvisited regions. Both were denounced against those who should dare to protect the public enemy. But the deserts of Thebaïs were now peopled by a race of wild, yet submissive, fanatics, who preferred the commands of their abbot to the yokes of their sovereign. The numerous disciples of Anthony and Pachomius frequented the solitary retreat as their father, admired the patience and humiliation with which he conformed to his strictest institutions, collected every word which dropped from his lips as the genuine effusions of inspired wisdom; and persuaded themselves, that their prayers, their fasts, and their vigils, were so many weapons in the service of the great character, which they expressed, and the dangers which they braved, in the defence of truth and innocence. The monasteries of Egypt were seated in lonely and desolate places, on the summit of mountains, or in the islands of the Nile; and the sacred horn or trumpet of Tabenwas was the well-known signal which collected several thousand roboust and determined monks, who, for the most part, had been the peasants of the adjacent country. When their dark retreats were invaded by a military force, which it was impossible to resist, they silently stretched out their necks to the executioner; and supported their national character with that courage which could never waver from an Egyptian the confession of a secret which he was resolved not to disclose.

2 The archbishop of Alexandria, for whose safety they eagerly devoted their lives, was lost among a uniform and well-disciplined multitude; and on the nearer approach of danger, he was swiftly removed, by their obstinate hands, from one place of concealment to another, till he reached the formidable deserts, which the gloomy and credulous temper of superstition had peopled with demons and savage monsters. The retreat of Athanasius, which ended only with the life of the person himself, was, in his family, the society of the monks, who faithfully served him as guards, as secretaries, and as messengers; but the importance of maintaining a more intimate connexion with the catholic party tempted him, whenever the diligence of the pursuit was abated, to emerge from these dark retreats. He was, however, successively, in still more extraordinary asylum, the house of a virgin, only twenty years of age, and who was celebrated in the whole city for her exquisite beauty. At the hour of midnight, as she related the story many years afterwards, she was surprised by the appearance of the archbishop in a loose hooded, who, advancing with hasty steps, conjured her to afford him the protection which he had been directed by a celestial vision to seek under her hospitable roof. The pious maid accepted and preserved the sacred pledge which was intrusted to her prudence and courage. Without imparting the secret to any one, she instantly conducted Athanasius into her most private retreat, where he was protected with the tenderness of a friend and the assiduity of a servant. As long as the danger continued, she regularly supplied him with hooks and provisions washed his feet, managed his correspondence, and dexterously concealed from the eye of suspicion, this person of so well-known character required the most unblemished chastity, and a female whose charms might excite the most dangerous emotions. During the six years of persecution and exile, Athanasius repeated his visits to his fair and faithful companion; and the formal declaration, that he saw the councils of Hiland and Seleucus, forces us to believe that he was secretly present at the time and place of their convocation. The advantage of personally associating with his friends, and of observing and improving the divisions of his enemies, might justly, in a prudent statesman, so bold and dangerous as Constantius, be more than repaid by trade and navigation with every sea-port of the Mediterranean. From the depth of his inaccessible retreat, the intrepid prince waged an incessant and offensive war against the protector of the Arians; and his seasonable writings, which were diligently circulated, and carefully perused, contributed to seduce the whole orthodox party. In his public apologies, which he addressed to the emperor himself, he sometimes affected the praise of moderation; whilst at the same time, in secret and venemous invectives, he exposed Constantius as a weak and wicked prince, the executioner of his family, the trampler on the rights of his church. In the height of his prosperity, the victorious monarch, who had chastised the rashness of Gallus, and suppressed the revolt of Sylvanus, who had taken the diadem from the head of Vetrano, and vanquished in the field the legions of Magnentius, received from an invisible hand a wound, which he could neither heal nor revenge; and the son of Constantine was the first of the christian princes who experienced the strength of those principles, which, in the cause of religion, could resist the most violent exertions of the civil power.

The persecution of Athanasius, and of so many respectable bishops, who suffered for the truth of their opinions, or at least for the integrity of their conscience, was a just subject of indignation and discontent to all christians, except those who were blindly devoted to the Arian faction. The lawless people regretted the banishment of the unhappy Athanasius, who, by his exclamation: 4 "By faith I live not," had declared to the whole world, that they were not involved in the guilt and heresy of their ecclesiastical governors, by publicly testifying

I cannot indulge the delicacy of Baronius, Valence, Tillemont, &c, who almost reject a story so unworthy, as the truth of which they deny it, of the gravity of ecclesiastical history.

6 The epistle of Athanasius to the monks is filled with reproaches, which is the passion of a man who, having both persecuted and been persecuted by the party of his unrequited love, can only reconcile to his readers, he has introduced the comparisons of the city of Babylon, with the city of Jericho, of Belshazzar, Abah, with Nicanor, and many others, in order to excite with less danger, if he published his invective in Gaul after the revolt of Johannesburg; &c. their dissent, or by totally separating themselves from his communion. The first of these methods was invented at Antioch, and practised with such success, that it was soon diffused over the christian world. The doxology, or sacred hymn, which celebrates the glory of the Trinity, is susceptible of various forms, and the respective inscriptions and the substance of an orthodox, or an heretical, creed, may be expressed by the difference of a disjunctive, or a copulative, particle. Alternate responses, and a more regular psalmody, were introduced into the public service by Flavianus and Diodorus, two dispute hymns, which were composed against those who confessed but the Nicene faith. Under their conduct, a swarm of monks issued from the adjacent desert, bands of well-disciplined singers were stationed in the cathedral of Antioch, the Glory to the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, was solemnly chanted by a full chorus of voices; and the catholics insulted, by the purity of their doctrine, the Arian prelate, who had usurped the throne of the venerable Eustathius. The same zeal which inspired their songs prompted the more scrupulous members of the orthodox party to form separate assemblies, which were governed by the prelates, till the death of their exiled bishop allowed the election and consecration of a new episcopal pastor. The revolutions of the court multiplied the number of pretenders; and the same city was often disputed, under the reign of Constantius, by two, or three, or even four persons. The clergy, the bishops, the monasteries, and the people, every one exercised their spiritual jurisdiction over their respective followers, and alternately lost and regained the temporal possessions of the church. The abuse of christianity introduced into the Roman government new causes of tyranny and sedition; the bands of civil society were torn asunder by the fury of religious factions; and the obstinate and valiant, who might easily have surveyed the elevation and fall of successive emperors, imagined and experienced, that his own life and fortune were connected with the interests of a popular ecclesiastics. The example of the two capitals, Rome and Constantinople, may serve to represent the state of the empire, and the state of mankind, under the reign of the sons of Constantine.

I. The Roman pontiff, as long as he maintained his station and his principles, was guarded by the warm attachment of a great party of vassals. He could scorn the prayers, the menaces, and the obstinate claims of these ecclesiastical princes. When the eunuchs had secretly pronounced the exile of Liberius, the well-grounded apprehension of a tumult engaged them to use the utmost precautions in the execution of the sentence. The capital was invested by the praetorian guards and the praefect of the oblationary chamber, to seize the person of the bishop, either by stratagem, or by open force. The order was obeyed, and Liberius, with the greatest difficulty, at the hour of midnight, was swiftly conveyed beyond the reach of the Roman people, before their consternation was turned into rage. As soon as they were informed of his banishment into Thrace, a general assembly was convened, and the clergy of Rome bound themselves, by a public and solemn oath, never to desert their bishop, never to acknowledge the usurper Felix; who, by the influence of the eunuchs, had been irregularly chosen and consecrated within the walls of a profane palace. At the end of two years their pious obstinacy subsisted entire and unshaken; and when Constantius visited Rome, he was assaulted by the importunate solicitations of a people, who had preserved, as the last remnant of their ancient freedom, the right of treating their sovereign with familiar insolence. The wives of many of the senators and most honourable citizens, after pressing their husbands, with threats and seductions, were advised to undertake a commission, which in their hands would be less dangerous, and might prove more successful. The emperor received with politeness these female deputies, whose wealth and dignity were displayed in the magnificence of their dress and ornaments; and conducted them through the city, in search of their beloved pastor to the most distant regions of the earth; and consented that the two bishops, Liberus and Felix, should govern in peace their respective congregations. But the ideas of toleration were so repugnant to the practice, and even to the sentiments of those times, that when the answer of Constantius was publicly read in the circus of Rome, so reasonable a project of accommodation was rejected with contempt and ridicule. The eager veneration which animated the spectators in the decisive moment of a horse-race, was now converted into an outburst of violence by the circus resounded with the shout of thousands, who repeatedly exclaimed, "One God, one Christ, one bishop." The zeal of the Roman people in the cause of Liberius, was not confined to words alone; and the dangerous and bloody sedition which they excited soon became the cause of the emperor to consent that the prince should accept the submission of the exiled prelate, and to restore him to the undivided dominion of the capital. After some ineffectual resistance, his rival was expelled from the city by the permission of the emperor, and the power of the opposite faction; the triumvirate of Felix was abolished; and the public streets, in the public places, in the baths, and even in the churches; and the face of Rome, upon the return of a christian bishop, renewed the horrid image of the massacres of Marcus, and the proscriptions of Sulla. The withstanding the rapid increase of Christians, under the reign of the Flavian family, Rome, Alexandria, and the other great cities of the empire, still contained a strong and powerful faction of infidels, who envied the prosperity, and who ridiculed, even on their theatres, the theological disputes of the churches. It was, however, to the advantage of being born and educated in the bosom of the faith. The capital of the east had never been polluted by the worship of idols; and the whole body of the people had deeply imbibed the opinions, the virtues, and the passions, which distinguished the orthodox inhabitants of the east from the rest of the empire. After the death of Alexander, the episcopal throne was disputed by Paul and Macedonius. By their zeal and abilities they both deserved the eminent station to which they aspired; and if the moral character of Macedonius was less exceptionable, his competitor had the advantage of a prior election and a more orthodox doctrine. His firm attachment to the Nicene creed, which has given Paul a place in the calendar among saints and martyrs, exposed him to the resentment of the Arians. In the space of fourteen years he was five times driven into exile, and in which he was much more frequently restored by the violence of the people than by the permission of the prince; and the power of Macedonius could be secured only by the death of his rival. The unfortunate Paul was dragged in chains from the sandy deserts of Mesopotamia to the most desolate places of Mount Taurus, confined in a dark and narrow dungeon, left six days without food, and at length strangled, by the order of Philip, one of the principal ministers of the emperor Constantius.\(^a\) The first blood which stained the new capital was spilt in this ecclesiastical contest; and many persons were slain on both sides, in the furious and obstinate sedi-tions of the people. The commission of enforcing a sentiment of uniformity in the baptism of the East, had been intrusted to Hermogenes, the master-general of the cavalry; but the execution of it was fatal to himself. The Catholics rose in the defence of their bishop; the palace of Hermogenes was consumed; the first military officer of the empire was dragged by the heels through the streets of Constantinople, and his lifeless corpse was exposed to their wanton in-fuls.\(^b\) The fate of Hermogenes instructed Philip, the pratorian prefect, to act with more precaution on a similar occasion. In the most gentle and honourable terms he required the attendance of Paul in the baths of Zeuxippus, which had a private communication with the palace and the sea. A vessel, which lay ready at the garden stairs, immediately hoisted sail; and, while the people were still ignorant of the meditated sacrilege, their bishop was already embarked on his voyage to Thessalonica. They soon beheld, with surprise and horror, the force of which parents and even children were the objects; and the usurper Macedonius seated by the side of the prefect on a lofty chariot, which was surrounded by troops of guards with drawn swords. The military procession advanced towards the cathedral; the Arians and the catholics eagerly rushed to employ that important instrument of social war, and one hundred and fifty persons lost their lives in the confusion of the tumult.

Macedonius, who was supported by a regular force, delivered a decisive victory; but his reign was disturbed by clamour and sedition; and the causes which appeared the least connected with the subject of dispute were the best fitted to excite this offspring of civil discord. As the chapel in which the body of the great Constantine had been deposited was in a ruinous condition, the bishops transported those vehement remains into the church of St. Acacius. This prudent and even pious measure was represented as a wicked profanation, by the whole party which adhered to the Homocousian doctrine. The factions immediately flew to arms, the consecrated ground was used as their field of battle; and one of the ecclesiastical historians has observed, as a real fact, not as a figure of rhetoric, that the well before the church overflowed with a stream of blood, which filled the porticoes and the adjoining courts. The writer who should impute these tumults solely to a religious principle, would betray a very imperfect knowledge of human nature; yet it must be confessed, that the motives which misled the sincerity of zeal, and the pretence which disguised the licentiousness of passion, suppressed the remorses which, in another cause, would have succeeded to the rage of the christians of Constantinople.\(^c\)

Crulity of the Arians.
The cruel and arbitrary disposition of Constantius, which did not always require the provocations of guilt and resistance, was justly dreaded by the Africans, as well as by the criminal behaviour of a faction, which opposed the authority and religion of their sovereign. The ordinary punishments of death, exile, and confiscation, were inflicted with partial rigour; and the Greeks still revered the holy memory of two clerks, a reader and a sub-deacon, who were accused of the murder of Her-rogenes, and beheaded at the gates of Constanti nople.

By an edict of Constantius against the catholics, which has not been thought worthy of a place in the Theological,\(^d\) it is observed, that those who ventured to communicate with the Arian bishops, and particularly with Macedonius, were deprived of the immunities of ecclesiastics, and of the rights of Christians; they were compelled to relinquish the possession of the churches; and were strictly prohibited from holding their assemblies within the walls of the city. A similar law was enacted in the province of Thrace and Asia Minor, was committed to the zeal of Macedonius; the civil and military powers were directed to obey his commands; and the cruelties exercised by this Semi-Arian tyrant in the support of the Homocousi, ceeded the commission, and disgraced the reign, of Constantius. The acme of the church were administered to the reluctant victims, who denied the vocation, and abhorred the principles, of Macedonius. The rites of baptism were conferred on women and children, who, for that purpose, had been torn from the arms of their friends and relations; and the roads of the city were held open, by a wooden engine, while the consecrated bread was forced down their throat; the breasts of tender virgins were either burnt with red-hot egg-shells, or inhumanly compressed between sharp and heavy boards.\(^e\) The Novatians of Constanti nople, and the Arians of the adjacent province, were deformed by the Macedonian standard, deserved to be confounded with the catholics themselves. Macedonius was informed, that a large district of Paphlagonia was almost entirely inhabited by these sectaries. He resolved either to convert or to extirpate them; and as he distrusted, on more than one occasion, the military execution of his measures, he commanded a body of four thousand legionaries to march against the rebels, and to reduce the territory of Mantinum under his spiritual dominion. The Novatian peasants, animated by despair and religious fury, boldly encountered the invaders of their country, and though many of the Paphlagonians were slain, the Roman legions were vanquished by an irregular mult itude, armed only with scythes and axes; and, except a few who escaped by an ignominious flight, four thousand soldiers were left dead on the field of battle.
The successor of Constantius has expressed, in a condemnatory sense, his regret at the detestable and awful executions which afflicted the empire, and more especially the east, in the reign of a prince who was the slave of his own passions, and of those of his eunuchs. \(^f\) Many were imprisoned, and persecuted, and driven into exile.
Whole troops of those who were styled heretics were massacred, particularly at Cyzicus, and at Samosata.
In Paphlagonia, Bithynia, Galatia, and in many other towns, provinces, towns and villages were laid waste, and utterly destroyed.\(^g\)

While the flames of the Arian controversy consumed the vitals of the empire, the Africans were infuriated, not only by the pecular criminal enemies of the savage families, who, under the name of Circumcellions, formed the strength and scanda of the Donatist party.\(^h\) The were execution of the laws of Constantine had excited a spirit of discontent and resistance: the strenuous efforts of his son Constans, to restore the unity of church and state, and sentiment of national hatred, which had first occasioned the separation; and the methods of force and corruption employed by the two imperial commissioners. Paul and Macarius, furnished the schismatics with a specious contrast between the maxims of the apostles and the conduct of their predecessors. The peasants who inhabited the villages of Numidia and Mauritania, were a ferocious race, who had been imperfectly reduced under the authority of the Roman laws; who were imperfectly converted to the christian faith; but who were actuated by a spirit of enthusiasm in their religious observances.

They indignantly supported the exile of their bishops, the demolition of their churches, and the interruption of their secret assemblies. The vio-lenee of the officers of justice, who were usually sustained by a military guard, was sometimes repelled with equal violence; and the blood of some popular ecclesiastics, which had been shed in the quarrel, inflamed their rude followers with an eager desire of revenging the death of these holy martyrs. By their own erocity and rashness, the ministers of persecution sometimes provoked their rite; and the guilt of an accidental tumult purged the animosity of those who took their side: Driven from their native villages, the Donatist peasants assembled in formidable gangs on the edge of the Getulian desert; and readily exchanged the habits of labour for a life of idleness and rapine, which was considered by the name of religion, and family condemned by the despots of state. The leaders of the Circumcellions assumed the title of captains of the saints; their principal weapon, as they were indifferently provided with swords and spears, was a huge and weighty club, which they termed an Jerusalem; and the well-known Song of Songs was sung with such ardour, that they used as their cry of war, diffusedconsternation over the unarmed provinces of Africa. At first their depredations were coloured by the plea of necessity; but they soon exceeded the measure of subsistence, indulged without control their intemperance and avarice, burnt the vil-LAGES which they had pillaged, and revoked the benec-tious tyrants of the christian country. The occupation of husbandry, and the administrations of justice, were interrupted; and as the Circumcellions pretended to restore the primitive equality of mankind, and to reform the abuses of civil society, they opened a secure asylum to runaway debtors, who fled from the feudal state, to their holy standard. When they were not resisted, they usually contented themselves with plunder, but the slightest opposition provoked them to acts of vioence and murder; and some catholic priests, who had intrudently signalized their zeal, were tortured by the fanatics with the most refined and wanton barbarity.
The spirit of the Circumcellions was not always extorted against their defenceless enemies; they engaged, and sometimes defeated, the troops of the province; and in the bloody action of Bagai, they attacked in the open field, but with useless. The occupation of an advanced guard of the imperial cavalry. The Donatists who were taken in arms received, and they soon deserved, the same treatment which might have been shown to the wild beasts of the desert. The captives *died, without a murmur, either by the sword, the axe, or the fire; and the measures of retaliation were multiplied in their proportion, and the horrors of rebellion, and excluded the hope of mutual forgiveness.

In the beginning of the present century, the example of the Circumcellions has been renewed in the persecution, the boldness, the crimes, and the enthusiastic of the Camisards; and if the fanatics of Languedoc, under Maupeou, and the military, achievements, the Africans maintained their fierce independence with more resolution and perseverance.

Such disorders are the natural effects of religious tyranny; but the rage of the Donatists. Donatists was inflamed by a frenzy of a very extravagent nature. It is a temporary knot, which is pulled, when drawing them in so extravagant a degree, cannot surely be parallelled in any country or in any age. Many of these fanatics were possessed with the horror of life, and the desire of martyrdom; and they deemed it of little moment by what means, or by what hands, they perished that their spirit, which was originally derived from the character and principles of the Jewish nation.

ers of the times, ascribing all virtue to themselves, and imputing all guilt to their adversaries, have painted the battle of the angels and demons. Our calmer reason will reject such pure and perfect monsters of vice or sanctity, and will impute an equal, or at least an indiscriminate, measure of good and evil to the host-tile sectaries, who assumed and bestowed the appellations of orthodox and heretics. They had been educ-ed in the same religion, and the same civil society. Their renown and power in the present or a future life, were balanced in the same proportion. On either side, the error might be innocent, the faith sincere, the practice meritorious or corrupt. Their passions were excited by similar objects; and they might alternately abuse the favour of the court, or of the people. The metaphysical opinions of the Athenians and the Ari-ans, could not have occasioned such tumults; for, in those days, they were alike actuated by the inertial spirit, which has been extracted from the pure and simple maxims of the gospel.

Toleration of paganism.

A modern writer, who, with a just confidence, has prefixed to his own history, the most honourable epitaphs of political and philosophical authors, accused the timid prudence of Montesquieu, for neglecting to enumerate, among the cases of the decline of the empire, a law of Constantine, by which the exercise of the pagan worship was absolutely suppressed, and a considerable part of his subjects was left destitute of priests, of temples, and of any public religion. The zeal of the philosophic historian for the rights of mankind, has induced him to acquiesce in the ambiguous testimony of those ecclesiastics, who have too lightly ascribed to their favourite hero the merit of a general persecution.2 Instead of alleging this imaginary law, which would have blazed in the front of the face of Constantine, the devoted author of the original epistle, which Constantine addressed to the followers of the ancient religion; at a time when he no longer disguised his conversion, nor dreaded the rivals of his throne. He invites and exhorts, in the most pressing terms, the subjects of the Roman empire to imitate the example of their master; but he declares, that those who still refuse to open their eyes to the celestial light, may freely enjoy their temples, and their fancied gods. A report, that the ceremonies of paganism were suppressed, is formally contradicted by the emperor himself, who wisely assures, as the principle of his operation, the invincible force of habit, of prejudice, and of superstition.3 Without violating the sanctity of his promise, without alarming the fears of the pagans, the artful monarch advanced, by slow and cautious steps, to undermine the irregular and decayed fabric of polytheism. The partial acts of severity which he occasionally exercised, though they were secretly prompted by a christian zeal, were coloured by the fairest pretexts of justice and the public good; and while Constantine designed to ruin the foundations, he seemed to reform the abuses, of the ancient religion. And when, after the massacre of 311, he pronounced he condemned, under the most rigorous penalties, the occult and impious arts of divination; which excited the vain hopes, and sometimes the criminal attempts, of those who were discontented with their present condition. An ignominious silence was imposed on the objects of superstition; in VI, he has been publicly convicted of fraud and falsehood; the effeminate priests of the Nile were abolished; and Constantine discharges the duties of a Roman censor, when he gave orders for the demolition of several temples of Phœnia; in which every mode of prostitution was devoutly practised in the face of day, and to the honour of Venus.4 The imperial city of Constantinople was, in some measure, raised at the expense, and was adorned with the spoils, of the expensive, and the temple of Pallas and Asia; the sacred property was confiscated; the statues of gods and heroes were transported, with rude familiarity, among a people who considered them as objects, not of adoration, but of the gold and silver were restored to circulation; and the magistrates, the bishops, and the eunuchs, improved the fortunate occasion of gratifying, at once, their zeal, their avails, and their resentment. But these depredations were confined to a small part of the Roman world; and the provinces had been long formerly reduced to the same state of distraction, from the tyranny of princes and proconsuls, who could not be suspected of any design to subvert the established religion.

The sons of Constantine trod in the footsteps of their father, with more zeal, and with less discretion. The pretences of nations and opinions were invisibly multiplied; every indulgence was shown to the illegal behaviour of the christians; every doubt was explained to the disadvantage of paganism; and the demolition of the temples was celebrated as one of the auspicious events of the reign of Constanis and Constantius. The name of Constantine is thus referred to a new period of the empire. We might have superseded the necessity of any future prohibitions. "It is our pleasure, that in all places, and in all cities, the temples he immediately shut, and carefully guarded, that none may have the power of offering. It is likewise our pleasure, that all our subjects should be convinced, that this edict should be guilty of such an act, let him feel the sword of vengeance, and after his execution, let his property be confiscated to the public use. We denounce the same penalties against the governors of the provinces, if they neglect to punish the criminals." But there is no reason to believe, that this formidable edict was either composed without being published, or was published without being executed. The evidence of facts, and the monuments which are still extant of brass and marble, continue to prove the public exercise of the pagan worship during the whole reign of the sons of Constantine. In the last, as well as in the west, in cities, as well as in the country, a great number of temples were respected, or at least spared; and the devout multitude still enjoyed the luxury of sacrifices, of festivals, and of processions, by the permission, or by the connivance, of the civil governors for four years. And when the last date of his bloody edict, Constantine visited the temples of Rome; and the decency of his behaviour is recommended by a pagan orator as an example worthy of the imitation of succeeding princes. "That emperor," says Symmachus, "suffered the privileges of the ancient and venerable temples to remain inviolate, and the sacred relics of the nobles of Rome, granted the customary allowance to defray the expenses of the public rites and sacrifices; and, though he had en-

The latter expressly declares, that "he made use of the sacred money, but made allowance in the legal worship; the temples indeed were unappropriated by him, the sacred rites were performed there in the emperor's Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol. iv. p. 130.

2 A Ammonius has observed, that in the days of Constantine, of whom he speaks, there were spolia temporum post. Lahanius says (Orat. pro Temp. p. 57) that the emperor often gave away a temple, like a dog, or a horse, of a slave, or a good cup, but the devout philosopher takes care to observe, that these sacrilegious favours were seldom received.

Senate still presumed to consecrate, by solemn decrees, the several emperors; and the powers of Con-estantine himself was associated, after his death, to those gods whom he had renounced and insulted during his life. The title, the ensigns, the prerogacepted, and confirmed, by some of the Christian em-perors; who were invested with a more absolute authority over the religion which they had deserted, than over that which they professed. 1

1 Summarch, Epist. x. 31.
2 The fourth Dissertation of M. de la Bastie sur le Souverain Pon-tiff des Empereurs Romains, (in the Mem. de l'Acad. tom. xvi. p. 73 et 74,) is a very learned and judicious performance, which explains the state, and proves the tottering, of paganism from Constantine to Gratian. The assertion of Zosimus, that Gratian was the first which revised the Roman church, is contradicted by a doubt; the murderous licentiousness, on that subject, is almost silenced.
3 I have anticipated the use of the word paganism, and shall now trace the singular revolutions of those celebrated words. 1.
I. Pagan, in the Latin, so familiar to the Italians, signifies a fountain; and the rural neighbourhood which divinity, or baptism, might be supposed to adorn; the murmurs of legiti, on that subject, are almost silenced. 2. Pagan in the modern, is understood to signify the ancient appellation of pagus and pagana, (Fagius, Specimina pa- gum et paganarum, ad Virgil. ebook. 4. 3.) 2 By an easy extension of the word, pagus and rural became almost synonymous: most of Pius the Vth. (ann. 5.2) and the ancient poets acquiesced in that name, which has been corrupted into presents in the modern languages of Europe. 3. The amazing increase of the military order introduced the necessity of a correlative term. (Hume's Hist. vol. i. p. 555.) and all the people who were not enlisted in the service of the prince, were branded with the contemptuous epithets of pagani.
(Tacit. Hist. iii. 21. 77. Julianus. Satir. xvi. Tertullian de Pal-io, c. 4.) 4. The christians were the soldiers of Christ; their adversaries who reduced the empire, or military order, might deserve the metaphorical name of pagan; and this popular reproach was introduced as early as the reign of Valenian (A. D. 251.) into imperial laws (Cod. Theodos. i. xvi. tit. 11. leg. 15.) and theological writings.
5. Christianity gradually filled the cities of the empire; the old religion, in the time of Vindelicia (Summa sacri, i. 11. 1d., 1d. 1d. 1d.) and Orontus, (in Panet. Hist. retired and languished in ob-esse villages; and the word pagan, with its new signification, reverted to its primitive origin. 6. Since the worship of Jupiter and his family had expired, the vetric title of pagan has been successively applied to all the idolaters and polytheists of the old and new world. 7. The Latin christians bestrood it, without scruple, on them of their emperor, or Mahometan; and under the greatness of the pagan Emperor, they were branded with the unjust reproach of idolatry and paganism.

he subscribed his own destruction, and that of a people who deserved his affection. But a positive refusal was an act of rebellion, and a declaration of war.

The inexorable jealousy of the emperor, the peremptory, and perhaps insidious, nature of his commands, left not any room for a fair apology, or candid interpretation; and the Senate, at first startled and surprised, allowed him to pause or to deliberate. Solitude increased the perplexity of Julian; he could no longer apply to the faithful counsels of Sallust, who had been removed from his office by the judicious malice of the empress: he could not even enforce his representations by the concurrence of the ministers, who would have been too much afraid of the consequence. The moment had been chosen, when Lupicinus, the general of the cavalry, was despatched into Britain, to repulse the inroads of the Scots and Picts; and Florianus was occupied at Vienna by the assessment of the tribute. The latter, a crafty and corrupt statesman, declining to assume a responsible part on this dangerous occasion, eluded the pressing and repeated invitations of Julian, who represented to him, that in every important measure, the presence of the prefect was indispensable in the council of the prince. In the meanwhile the Caesar was oppressed by the rude and illiterate soldiers of the Roman army, a portion of the Cassar's forces, who presumed to suggest, that if he expected the return of his ministers, he would charge himself with the guilt of the delay, and reserve for them the merit of the execution. Unable to resist, unwilling to comply, Julian expressed, in the most serious terms, his wish, and even his intention, of assigning the purple, which he could not preserve with honour, but which he could not abdicate with safety.

After a painful conflict, Julian was compelled to acknowledge, that obedience was the virtue of the most eminent subjects, and that the sovereign alone was entitled to judge of the public welfare. The public confusion was brought to an end; the army, for carrying into execution the commands of Constantius; a part of the troops began their march for the Alps; and the detachments from the several garrisons moved towards their respective places of assembly. They advanced with difficulty through the trembling and affrighted crowds of provincials; who attempted either to excite their pity by silent despair, or loud lamentations; while the wives of the soldiers holding their infants in their arms, accused the desertion of their husbands, in the mixed language of grief, of tenderness, and of indignation. This scene of general distress afflicted the emperor; he gave a guard to a number of post-wagons to transport the wives and families of the soldiers, endeavoured to alleviate the hardships which he was constrained to inflict, and increased, by the most laudable acts, his own popularity, and the discontent of the exiled troops. The grief of an armed multitude is soon converted into rage; their licentious tumults, which every hour were communicated from tent to tent with more boldness and effect, prepared their minds for the most daring acts of sedition; and by the connivance of their tribunes, a seasonable libel was secretly dispersed, which painted, in cold and harsh terms, the decay and decline of the Roman empire, the incalculable damage to the glory of the Gallic army, and the feeble vices of the tyrants of Asia. The servants of Constantius were astonished and alarmed by the progress of this dangerous spirit. They pressed the Caesar to hasten the departure of the troops; but they imprudently rejected the honest and judicious advice of Julian; who proposed 4 The minute interval, which may be interpolated, between the linea adventus and the præmia annuae of Ammianus, (xx. 1. 3.) instead of allowing a sufficient space for a march of three thousand miles, would render the orders of Constantius as extravagant as they were unjust. The troops of Gaul could not have reached Syria till the end of autumn. The memory of Ammianus must have been accurate, and his language incorrect.

that they should not march through Paris, and suggested the danger and temptation of a last interview.

They proclaim Julian emperor.

As soon as the approach of the troops was announced, the Caesar went out to meet them, and ascended his tribunal, which had been erected before the gate of the palace, and distinguished the officers and soldiers, who by their rank or merit deserved a peculiar attention, Julian addressed himself in a studied oration to the surrounding multitude: he celebrated their exploits with grateful applause; encouraged them to accept, with alacrity, the honour of serving under the eyes of a powerful and liberal monarch; and admonished them, that the commands of Augustus required an instant and cheerful obedience. The soldiers, who were apprehensive of offending their general by an indecent clamour, or of belying their sentinels by false and venal acclamations, maintained an obstinate silence; and after a short pause, were dismissed to their quarters.

The principal officers were entertained by the Caesar, who professed, in the warmest language of friendship, his desire and his inability to reward, according to their deserts, the brave companions of his victories. They requested, however, full of gratitude and perplexity, and lamented the hardship of their fate, which tore them from their beloved general and their native country. The only expedient which could prevent their separation was boldly agitated and approved; the popular ressentiment was insensibly moulded into a regular consent, and the transactions of conquered nations were hurried on by passion, and their passions were inflamed by wine; as, on the eve of their departure, the troops were indulged in licentious festivity. At the hour of midnight, the impetuous multitude, with swords, horses, and torches, in their hands rushed into the suburbs; encompassed the palace; and when they perceived the future dangers, pronounced the fatal and irrevocable words, Julian Augustus! The prince, whose anxious suspense was interrupted by their disorderly acclamations, secured the doors against their intrusion; and, as long as it was in his power, secluded his person and dignity from the accidents of a nocturnal tumult. At the dawn of day, the soldiers, whose zeal was irritated by opposition, forcibly entered the palace, seized, with respectful violence, the object of their choice, guarded Julian with drawn swords through the streets of Paris, from whom the palace was entered, and respectfully saluted him as their emperor. Prudence as well as loyalty inclined the propriety of resisting their treasonable designs; and of preparing, for his oppressed virtue, the excuse of violence. Addressing himself by turns to the multitude and to individuals, he inculcated the religious duties of the present moment, and sometimes expressed his indignation; conjured them not to sully the fame of their immortal victories; and ventured to promise, that if they would immediately return to their allegiance, he would undertake to obtain from the emperor not only a free and gracious pardon, but even the reparation of the orders which had excited their resentment. But the soldiers, who were conscious of their guilt, chose rather to depend on the gratitude of Julian, than on the clemency of the emperor.

Their zeal was insensibly turned into impatience, and their impatience into rage. The inflexible Caesar sustained till the third hour of the day, their prayers, their reproaches, and their menaces; nor did he yield, till he had been repeatedly assured, that if he wished to live, he must consent to reign. He was exalted on a shield to the view of the troops, and the vulgar, who understood the gestures, the mimick operations, of the troops; a rich military collar, which was offered by chance, supplied the want of a diadem; the ceremony was concluded by the promise of a moderate donative; and the new emperor, overwhelmed with real or affected grief, retired into the most secret recesses of his apartments, and obstinately refused to be moved.

The grief of Julian could proceed only from his innocence; but his innocence must appear extremely doubtful in the eyes of those who have learned to suspect the motives and the professions of princes. His lively and active mind was susceptible of the various impressions of hope and fear, of gratitude and revenge, of duty and of ambition, of the love of fame and of the fear of reproach. But it is impossible for us to calculate the respective weight and operation of these sentiments; or to ascer- tain the principles of action which might escape the scrutiny of the historian. These principles must certainly be known only absolutely without success. He solemnly declares, in the presence of Jupiter, of the Sun, of Mars, of Minerva, and of all the other deities, that till the close of the evening which preceded his elevation, he was utterly ignorant of the designs of the soldiers; and it may even seem unphilosophical to retract the truth of a philosopher. Yet the supersitious confidence that Constantius was the enemy, and that he himself was the favourite, of the gods, might prompt him to desire, to solicit, and even to hasten the auspicious moment of his reign, which was predisposed to restore the ancient religion of mankind. When Julian had received the intelligence of the conspiracy, he resigned himself to a short slumber; and afterwards related to his friends that he had seen the genius of the empire waiting with some impatience at his door, and with a sort of mystical and profound affection, had suggested to him the spirit and ambition. Astonished and perplexed, he addressed his prayers to the great Jupiter; who immediately signified, by a clear and manifest omen, that he should submit to the will of heaven and of the army. * Even in this tumultuous moment, Julian attended to the forms of superstitions ceremonies: and obstinately refused the乏useus of a female heather, or a bone collar, which the impatient soldiers would have employed in the room of a diadem.

noble mind, it insensibly corrodifies the vital principles of virtue and veracity.

To moderate the zeal of his party, to protect the persons of his enemies, to defeat and to despire the secret enterprises which were formed against his life and dignity, were the objects which he chiefly addressed himself to. Adorned with the insignia of military and imperial pomp, Julian showed himself in the field of Mars to the soldiers, who glowed with ardent enthusiasm in the cause of their pupil, their leader, and their friend. He recapitulated their victories, launted their sufferings, and the people rejoiced in a revolution, and checked their impetuosity; nor did he dismiss the assembly, till he had obtained a solemn promise from the troops, that if the emperor of the east would subscribe an equitable treaty, they would renounce any views of conquest, and satisfy themselves with the tranquil possession of the Gallic provinces. On this foundation he composed, in his own name, and in that of the army, a specious and moderate epistle, which was delivered to Peutanus, his master of the offices, and to his chamberlain Euthenius; two ambassadors, whom he appointed to receive the answer, and observe the dispositions of Constantius. This epistle is inscribed with the modest appellation of Caesar; but Julian solicits, in a peremptory though respectful manner, the confirmation of the title of Augustus. He acknowledges the irregularity of his own election, while he justifies, in some measure, the resentment and violence of the troops which had extorted his reluctant condescension, to which the history of his last letter to Constantius; and engages to send him an annual present of Spanish horses, to recruit his army with a select number of barbarian youths, and to accept from his choice a praetorian prefect of approved discretion and fidelity. But he reserves for himself the nomination of his other civil and military officers, with the troops, the revenue, and the sovereignty of the provinces beyond the Alps. He admires the emperor to consult the dictates of justice; to distrust the arts of those venal flatterers, who subsist only by the discord of princes; and to embrace the offer of a fair and honourable treaty, which will confine him unshackled to the house of Constantine. In this negotiation Julian claimed no more than he already possessed. The delegated authority which he had long exercised over the provinces of Gaul, Spain, and Britain, was still obeyed under a name more independent and august. The soldiers and the people rejoiced in a revolution, which was not stained even with the blood of the guilty. Florentius was a fugitive; Lupicinus a prisoner. The persons who were disaffected to the new government were disarmed and secured; and the vacant offices were distributed, according to the recent distribution of merit, to men who were the friends of the intrigues of the palace, and the auxiliaries of the soldiery.

The negotiations of peace were accompanied and supported by the most vigorous preparations for war. The foundations of the Rhine and the Danube, for instance, were not neglected; and augmented by the disorders of the times. The cruel persecution of the faction of Magnentius had filled Gaul with numbers of outlaws and robbers. They cheerfully accepted the offer of a general pardon from a prince whom they could trust, submitted to the restraints of military discipline, and retained only their implacable hatred to the person and government of the emperor Constantius. At the same time, the emperor had con dicted Julian to take the field, he appeared at the head of his legions; threw a bridge over the Rhine in the neighbourhood of Cleves; and prepared to chastise the perfidy of the Atturii, a tribe of Franks, who presumed that they might ravage, with impunity, the frontier provinces of a divided empire. The difficulties of the enterprise, consisted in a laborious march; and Julian had conquered, as soon as he could penetrate into a country, which former princes had considered as inaccessible. After he had given peace to the barbarians, the emperor carefully visited the fortifications along the Rhine from Cleves to Basil; surveyed, with peculiar attention, the territories which he had recovered from the hands of the Alemanni, passed through Besancon, which had severely suffered from their fury, and fixed his head-quarters at Vienna for the ensuing winter. The barrier of Gaul was improved and strengthened with additional fortifications; and Julian entertained some doubt whether the mighty empire which he had so often vanquished, might, in his absence, be restrained by the terror of his name. Vadomair was the only prince of the Alemanni, whom he esteemed or feared; and while the subtle barbarian affected to observe the faith of treaties, the progress of his arms threatened that of the imperial army. The policy of Julian condescended to surprise the prince of the Alemanni by his own arts; and Vadomair, who, in the character of a friend, had incautiously accepted an invitation from the Roman governors, was seized in the midst of the entertainment, and sent away in chains. They learned, before the barbarians were recovered from their amaze

The ambassadors of Julian had been instructed to execute, with the utmost and diligence, their important commission. But, in their passage through Italy and Illyricum, they were detained by the tedious and affected delays of the provincial governors; they were conducted by slow journeys from Constantinople to Csesarca in Cappadocia; and when at length they were admitted to the presence of Constantius, they found that he had already conceived, from the despatches of his own officers, the most unfavourable opinion of the conduct of the Gallic army. The letters were heard with impatience; the trembling messengers were dismissed with indignation and contempt; and the looks, the gestures, the furious language of the monarch, expressed the dis order of his soul. The domestic connexion, which might have inspired the brother of the great Philip, Helena, was recently dissolved by the death of that princess, whose pregnancy had been several times fruitless, and was at last fatal to herself. The em press Eusebia had preserved, to the last moment of her life, the warm and ever jealous affection which she had once for Julian; and, from this solid influence, she might have moderated the resentment of a prince, who, since her death, was abandoned to his own passions, and to the arts of his counsellors. But the terror of a foreign invasion obliged him to suspend the punishment of a private enemy; he continued his march towards the confines of Persia, and thought it sufficient to signify the conditions which might entitle Julian and his guilty followers to the clemency of their offended sovereign. He required, that the presumptuous Caesar should expressly renounce the appellation and arms of a republic, which he had usurped from the rebels; that he should descend to his former station of a limited and dependent minister; that he should vest the powers of the state and army in the hands of those officers who were appointed by the imperial court; and that he should trust his safety to the assurances of pardon, which were announced by Epiphatus, a Gallic bishop, and one of the Arian favourites of Constantius. Several months were ineffectually consumed in a treaty which was negotiated at the distance of three thousand miles between Paris and Antioch; and soon as Julian perceived that his moderate and conciliatory remonstrances were received with contempt, he declared that he was about to renounce the pride of an implacable adversary, he boldly resolved to commit his life and fortune to the chance of a civil war. He gave a public and military audience to the quaeestor Leona; the haughty epistle of Constantius was read, and now he had to moderate his hatred, and to test, with the most flattering deference, that he was ready to resign the title of Augustus, if he could obtain the consent of those whom he acknowledged as the authors of his elevation. The faint proposal was immediately silenced; and the acclamations of "Julian Augustus, continue to reign, by the authority of the army, of the people, of the republic which you have saved," thundered at once from every part of the field, and terrified the pale ambassador of Constantius. A part of the letter was afterwards read, in which the emperor armoured the ingratitude of Julian, whom he had invested with the honours of the purple; whom he had educated with so much care and tenderness; whom he had preserved in his infancy, when he was left a helpless orphan. "An orphan!" interrupted Julian, who justified his cause by indulging his passions; "Does the assassin of my family reproach me as I was left an orphan? He urges me to revenge those injuries which I have long studied to forget!" The assembly was dismissed; and Leona, who, with some difficulty, had been protected from the popular fury, was sent back to his master with an epistle, in which Julian expressed, in a strain of the most exquisite eloquence, the sentiments of contempt, of hatred, and of resentment, which had been suppressed and imprecated by the dissimulation of twenty years. After this message, which might be considered as a signal of irreconcilable war, Julian, who, some weeks before, had celebrated the Christian festival of the Epiphany,1 made a public declaration that he committed the care of his safety to the Immortal gods; and thus publicly renounced the religion, as well as the friendship, of Constantius.2

Chap. xxii.

The situation of Julian requires a vigorous and immediate resolution. He had to attack Constantius, who discovered from intercepted letters, that his adversary, sacrificing the interest of the state to that of the monarch, had again excited the barbarians to invade the provinces of the west. The position of two magazines, one of which they collected on the banks of the Lake of Constance, the other formed at the foot of the Cottian Alps, seemed to indicate the march of two armies; and the size of those magazines, each of which consisted of six hundred thousand quarts of wheat, or some other grain of their own produce, was sufficient to augment the numbers of the enemy, who prepared to surround him. But the imperial legions were still in their distant quarters of Asia; the Danube was feebly guarded; and if Julian could occupy, by a sudden incursion, the important provinces of Illyricum, he might expect that a people of soldiers would resort to his standard, and that the rich mines of gold and silver would contribute to the expenses of the civil war. He proposed this bold enterprise to the assembly of the soldiers; inspired them with a just confidence in their general, and in themselves; and exhorted them to maintain their own independence, and, in the name of the emperor, to protect their fellow-citizens, and obedient to their officers. His spirited discourse was received with the loudest acclamations, and the same troops which had taken up arms against Constantius, when he summoned them to leave the plains of Persia, had now loudly hailed Julian to the farthest extremities of Europe or Asia. The oath of fidelity was administered; and the soldiers, clashing their shields, and pointing their drawn swords to their threats, devoted themselves, with horrid imprecations, to the service of a leader whom they celebrated as the deliverer of Gaul, and the conqueror of the Germans.3 This solemn engagement, which seemed to be dictated by affection rather than by duty, was singly opposed by Nebridius, who had been admitted to the office of premier prefect. That faithful minister, alone and unassisted, asserted the rights of Constantius in the midst of an armed and angry multitude, to whose fury he had almost fallen an honorable but useless sacrifice. After losing one of his hands by the stroke of a sword, he embraced the knees of the prince whom he had offended. Julian covered the proceedings with his imperial mantle, and protected him from the zeal of his followers, dismissed him to his own house, with less respect than was perhaps due to the virtue of an enemy.4 The high office of Nebridius was bestowed on Salvius; and the provinces of Gaul, which were now delivered from the intolerable yoke of Julian, were assigned to a nobleman, who had been out of the administration of the friend of Julian, who was permitted to practise those virtues which he had insulter into the mind of his pupil.5

The hopes of Julian depended much less on the number of his troops, than on the celerity of his motions. In the

1 The public and secret negotiations between Constantius and Julian, must be extracted, with some caution, from Julian himself. (Oread. ad F. G. Allen, p. 214.) Libanius, Orat. Parent., c. 51, p. 251. Ammianus, (xx. 9.) Zosimus, (ii. 10.) and even Zonaras, (tom. i., l. xiii. p. 20, 21, 22,) who on this occasion, appears to have passed his master. (See the general history of Ammianus, from a 382. Mark's Library, p. 117—127.) Eusebius, the pontiff præfect of the equestrian order, is mentioned as living under Julian, in a letter of Eusebius, to his friend Vettius, 2 Three hundred myrta, or three millions of mediamina, a corn measure familiar to the Athenians, and which contained six Roman modii. (Juvenal, Sat. iv. 47.) Julian placed 8.500 men in one army in the mountainous province of Gaul, and 15,000 in another. (Ammianus, 27.) 3 See his oration, and the behaviour of the troops, in Ammianus, c. 33. 4 He sternly refused his hand to the suppliant prefect, whom he sent into Tuscany. (Ammianus, xx. 2. Libanius, with savage fury, insults Nersius, in the name of Julian, to the assembly of the magnates of Julian. (Orat. Parent. c. 53, p. 274.) 5 In this promotion, Julian obeyed the law which he publicly imposed on himself. Heeque civilest quisquam judex, nec militari sacer, aut quodam praetori meritum subvenit. (Ammianus, xx. 2.) Absence did not weaken his regard for Salvius, with whose name (A.D. 363) he bore the consulship.
execution of a daring enterprise, he availed himself of every precaution, as far as prudence could suggest; and where prudence could no longer accompany his steps, he trusted the event to valour and to fortune. In the neighbourhood of Bassil he assembled and divided his troops, and distributed the money and the ten thousand men, was directed, under the command of Nevitta, general of the cavalry, to advance through the midland parts of Rhaetia and Noricum. A similar division of troops, under the orders of Jovius and Jovinus, prepared to follow the oblique course of the highways, through the most open and least frequented part of Italy. The instructions to the generals were conceived with energy and precision: to hasten their march in close and compact columns, which, according to the disposition of the ground, might readily be changed into any order of battle; to secure themselves against the surprises of the night by strong posts and vigilant guards; to prevent resistance by their unexpected arrival; to elude examination by their sudden departure; to spread the opinion of their strength, and the terror of his name; and to join their sovereign under the walls of Sirmium. For himself, Julian had reserved a number of troops and a considerable part of the Guards to reflect his three thousand brave and active volunteers, resolved, like their leader, to cast behind them every hope of a retreat; at the head of this faithful band, he fearlessly plunged into the recesses of the Marcinian, or black forest, which conceals the sources of the Danube; and in those eventful days, the fate of Julian was unknown to the world. The first eight miles of his journey, his destination, and vigour, surmounted every obstacle; he forced his way over mountains and morasses, occupied the bridges and swam the rivers, pursued his direct course, without reflecting whether he traversed the territory of the Romans or that of the barbarians, and at length emerged between Ratisbon and Vienna, at the place where he had designed to embark his troops on the Danube. By a well-concerted stratagem, he seized a fleet of light brigantines, as it lay at anchor; secured a supply of coarse provisions, sufficient to satisfy the indolent but voracious appetite of a Gallic army; and boldly committed himself to the stream of the Danube. The labours of his mariners, who plied their oars with incessant diligence, and the steady continuance of a favourable wind, carried his fleet above seven hundred miles in eleven days; and he had already disembarked his soldiers on the opposite bank, only nineteen miles from Sirmium, before his ensigns, hours before his submission, he passed before the hostile stations, which were placed along the river, without indulging the temptation ofsignaling an useless and ill-timed valour.

The banks of the Danube were crowded on either side with spectators, who gazed on the military pomp, and anticipated the importance of the event, and diffused through the adjacent country the fame of a young hero, who advanced with more than mortal speed at the head of the innumerable forces of the west. Lucillian, who, with the rank of general of the cavalry, commanded the rear of the army, was confounded and perplexed by the doubtful reports, which he could neither reject nor believe. He had taken some slow and irresolute measures for the purpose of collecting his troops; when he was surprised by Dagalaiphus, an active officer, whom Julian, as soon as he was landed at Bononia, had advanced as his second in command, with some light infantry. The captive general, uncertain of his life or death, was hastily thrown upon a horse, and conducted to the presence of Julian; who kindly raised him from the ground, and dispelled the terror and amazement which seemed to stultify his faculties. But Lucillian had no sooner recovered his spirits, than he betrayed his want of discretion, by presuming to admonish his conqueror, that he had rashly ventured, with a handful of men, to expose his person in the midst of his enemies. "Reserve for your master Constantius these timid remonstrances," replied Julian, with a smile, disposing of the prudence of his rival, which he knew you may surmise I received you not as a counsellor, but as a suppliant." Conscious that success alone could justify his attempt, and that boldness only could command success, he instantly advanced, at the head of three thousand soldiers, to attack the strongest and most popular city of the Illyrian provinces. In the morning of the third day, Julian marched to occupy the narrow pass of Succi, in the defiles of mount Hemus; which, almost in the midway between Sirmium and Constantine骅, separates the provinces of Thrace and Dacia, by an abrupt descent towards the former, and a gentle declivity on the side of the latter. The defence of this important post was intrusted to the brave Nevitta; who, as well as the generals of the Italian division, successfully executed the plan of the march and junction which their master had so ably conceived. The homage which Julian obtained, he justified his conduct from the fear of the brave and popular people, extended far beyond the immediate effect of his arms. The prefectures of Italy and Illyricum were administered by Taurus and Florentius, who united that important office with the vain honours of the consulship; and the series of victories which were celebrated with precipitation to the court of Asia, Julian, who could not always restrain the levity of his temper, stigmatized their flight by adding, in all the acts of the year, the epitaph of fugitive to the names of the two consuls. The provinces which had been deserted by their former governor, acknowledged the authority of an emperor, who, concluding the qualities of a soldier with those of a philosopher, was equally admired in the camps of the Danube, and in the cities of Greece. From his palace, or, more properly, from his headquarters of Sirmium and Naisus, he distributed to the principal towns and cities of his empire contributions for his own conduct; published the secret despatches of Constantius; and solicited the judgment of mankind between two competitors, the one of whom had ex-

THE DECLINE AND FALL

...Julian, whose mind was deeply wounded by the reproach of ingratitude, aspired to maintain, by argument as well as by arms, the superior merits of his cause; and to excel, not only in the arts of war, but in those of composition. His epistle to the senate and people of Athens seems to have been dictated by a liberal and humane spirit; and his answer to a wish of his actions and his motives to the degenerate Athenians of his own times, with the same humble deference, as if he had been pleading, in the days of Aristides, before the tribunal of the Areopagus. His application to the generous Barbarians was still more remarkable; for the titles of imperial power, was agreeable to the forms of the expiring republic. An assembly was summoned by Tertullus, prefect of the city; the epistle of Julian was read; and as he appeared to be master of it, his claims were admitted without a dissenting voice. His oblique censure of the innovations of Constantine, and his passionate invective against the vices of Constantius, were heard with less satisfaction; and the senate, as if Julian had been present, unanimously exclaimed, "Respect, we beseech you, the author of your own fortune." An awful expression, which, according to the character of the emperor, might have been differently explained; as a manly reproof of the ingratitude of the usurper, or as a flattering confession, that a single act of such benefit to the state ought to alone for all the failings of Constantius.

Handsome powers ... than those of Julian, who was speedily transmitted to his rival, who, by the retreat of Sapor, had obtained some respite from the Persian war. Disguising the anguish of his soul under the semblance of contempt, Constantius professed his intention of returning into Europe, and of giving a respite to Julia, because he never spoke of this military expedition in any other light than that of a hunting party. In the camp of Hierapolis, in Syria, he communicated this design to his army; slightly mentioned the guilt and rashness of the Caesar; and ventured to assure them, that if the mad emperor of Persia, made war, they would be unable to sustain the fire of their eyes, and the irresistible weight of their shout of onset. The speech of the emperor was received with military applause, and Theodotus, the president of the council of Hierapolis, requested, with tears of adulation, that this article be written, and sent, by the emperor; and that the immediate policy of Constantius be contrived. It is a rash detachment was despatched away with a post-waggon, to secure, if it were yet possible, the pass of Suce; the recuits, the horses, the arms, and the baggage, which had been prepared against Sapor, were over the plains of the Sarmatian war; and the domestic victories of Constantius inspired his partisans with the most sanguine assurances of success. The notary Gaudentius had occupied in his name the provinces of Africa; the subsistence of Rome was interdicted; and the distress of Julian was increased by an unexpected event, which might have been productive of fatal consequences. Julian had received the submission of two legions and a cohort of archers, who were stationed at Sirmium; but he suspected, with reason, the fidelity of those troops, which had been distinguished by the emperor; and it was thought expedient, under the pretence of the exposed state of the Gallic frontier, to dismiss them from the most important seat of his government. They adhered with reluctance, as far as the confines of Italy; but as they proceeded to the length of the way, and the savage fierceness of the Germans, they resolved, by the instigation of one of their tribunes, to halt at Aquincum, and to erect the banners of Constantius on the walls of that impregnable city. The emperor, resuming the course of his march, at the extent of the mischief, and the necessity of applying an immediate remedy. By his order, Jovinus led back a part of the army into Italy; and the siege of Aquilea was formed with diligence, and prosecuted with vigour. But the legionaries, who seemed to have rejected the yoke of discipline, conducted the defence of the place with skill and perseverance; invited the rest of Italy to imitate the example of their courage and loyalty; and threatened the retreat of Julian, if he should be forced to yield to the superior numbers of the armies of the east.

But the reign of Julian was preserved from the cruel alternative, which he pathetically laments, of destroying, or being himself destroyed; and the sensitive death of Constantius delivered the Roman empire from the calamities of civil war. The approach of winter could not detain the monarch; and many of his favourites durst not oppose his impestious desire of revenge. A slight fever, which was perhaps occasioned by the agitation of his spirits, was increased by the fatigues of the journey; and Constantius was obliged to halt at the little town of Myopaeum, twelve miles beyond Tarsus, where he expired, after a short illness, in the forty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-fourth of his reign.

His genuine character, which was composed of pride and weakness, of superstition and cruelty, has been fully displayed in the preceding narrative of civil and ecclesiastical events. The abuse of power rendered him a considerable object in the eyes of his contemporaries; but as personal merit can alone deserve the notice of posterity, the last of the sons of Constantine may be dismissed from the world, with the remark, that he inherited the defects, without the ability of the imperial Constantius. But, if he is said to have named Julian for his successor; nor does it seem improbable, that his anxious concern for the fate of a young and tender wife, whom he left with child, may have prevailed, in his last moments, over the influence of his maternal relations, and the edict of the emperor, and the desire of peace. He has left the court of the palace. His yoke, however, with the emperor; and his guilty associates, made a faint attempt to prolong the reign of the empress, by the election of another emperor; but their intrigues were rejected, with disdain, by an army which now ascribed the thought of civil discord; and two officers of rank were instantly despatched, to assure Julian, that every sword in the empire would be drawn for his service. The military designs of that prince, who had formed three different attacks against Thrace, were prevented by this fortunate event. Without shedding the blood of his fellow-citizens, he escaped the dangers of a doubtful conflict, and acquired the advantages of a complete victory. Impatient to visit the place of his birth, and the new capital of the empire, he advanced from Naissus through the mountains of Hæmus, and the cities of Thrace. When he reached Heraclea, at the distance of sixty miles, all Constantine was poured forth to receive him; and he made his triumphal entry amidst the dutiful acclamations of the soldiers, the people, and the senate. An innumerable multitude accompanied the empress and her son, hastened to greet the would-be monarch, and who, with eager looks, fixed on an independent basis, was the seat of reason, of virtue, and perhaps of vanity. He despised the honours, renounced the pleasures, and discharged with incessant diligence the duties, of his exalted station; and there were few among his subjects who would have consented to relieve him from the weight of the diadem, had they been obliged to submit their time and liberty to the laws of a despotic monarch.

spect; and were perhaps disappointed when they observed the small stature and simple garb of a hero, whose unexperienced youth had vanquished the barbarians of Germany, and who had now traversed, in a successful career, the whole continent of Europe, from the shores of the northern seas to the Alps, and from Asia Minor to the banks of the Rhine. A few days afterwards, when the remains of the deceased emperor were landed in the harbour, the subjects of Julian applauded the real or affected humanity of their sovereign. On foot, without his diadem, and clothed in a mourning habit, he accompanied the funeral as far as the church of the Holy Apostles, where the body was deposited: and if these marks of respect may be interpreted as a selfish tribute to the birth and dignity of his imperial kinsman, the tears of Julian professed to the world, that he had forgot the injuries, and remembered only the obligations, with which he was under the habit of listening, and in which the legions of Aquileia were assured of the death of the emperor, they opened the gates of the city, and, by the sacrifice of their guilty leaders, obtained an easy pardon from the prudence or lenity of Julian; who, in the thirty-second year of his reign, undaunted the undisputed possession of the Roman empire.

His civil government, retirement, and private life; but the elevation of his birth, and the accidents of his life, never allowed him the leisure and the means he desired his countrymen to have preferred the groves of the academv, and the society of Athens; but he was constrained, at first by the will, and afterwards by the injustice, of Constantius, to expose his person and fame to the dangers of imperial greatness; and to make himself accountable to the world, and to posterity, for the happiness of millions. Julian recollected with terror the observations of his master Plato, that the government of our fleets and herds is always committed to beings of a superior species; and that the conduct of nations requires and deserves the celestial powers of the gods or of the great powers. He resolved, like the man who presumes to reign, should aspire to the perfection of the divine nature; that he should purify his soul from her mortal and terrestrial part; that he should extinguish his appetites, enlighten his understanding, regulate his passions, and subdue the wild beast, which, according to the lively metaphor of Aristotel, seldom fails to ascend the throne of a despot. The throne of Julian, which the death of Constantius

1 In describing the triumph of Julian, Ammianus (xxii. 1. 2) assumes the lofty tone of an orator or poet; while Libanius (Orat. Parent. p. 287, s.1.) sinks to the grave simplicity of an historian.

2 The fame of Julian is elaborately treated of in Migne, Pontif., vol. i. pp. 117-126; in Gregory Nazianzen, (Orat. iv. p. 192.) Maurus, in (Panegy. Vet. xxvii.) and (Phil. ii. 39.) and Photius, (Hist. iv. 6, with Golfody's Dissertations, p. 382.) These writers, and their followers, pagan, catholic, Arias, beheld with very different eyes, a portion of history, or rather part of the world.

3 The day and year of the birth of Julian, are not perfectly ascertained. He was born in the year 331, according to the Chron. Varron, on the 23d, and he was 37 years old in 368. But he was 37 years old in 370. (For the Born of Julian, see Ducange, (Hist. p. 110—116), with caution and judgment. The date of his death is also discussed, and all the dates of his acts are not ascertained.

4 The Annals of Sueton, in Claud. c. 21. A twenty-sixth rate, or mixer, was added, to complete the number of one hundred clavus, four of which constituted a quartum. The number of quaternias of a quartum was 364. (Sueton. in Domit. c. 4.) and (from the measure of the Cyrus Maximi at Rome, the Hippodrome at Comagene, &c.) it might be about a four-mile course.

5 Julian, in (Moseon, p. 246. Julian Caesar had offended the Roman people by reading his despatches during the actual war. Augustus indulged their taste, or his own, by his constant attention to this averseness of time, he seemed to protract the short duration of his reign; and if the dates were less securely ascertained, we should refuse to believe, that only sixteen months elapsed between the death of Constantius and the departure of his successor for the Persian war. The actions of Julian can only be preserved by the account of his discourses, in the form of his voluminous writings, which is still extant, remains a monument of the application, as well as of the genius, of the empire. The Missopogon, the Caesars, several of his orations, and his elaborate work against the clerics and heretics, composed in a long period of the two winters, the former of which he passed at Constantinople, and the latter at Antioch.

The reform of the imperial court was one of the first and most necessary acts of the government of Julian. Soon after his entrance into the palace of Constantinople, he had occasion for the service of a barber. An officer magnificently dressed, immediately presented himself. "It is a barber," exclaimed the prince, with affected surprise, "that I want, and not a receiver-general of the finances." He questioned the man concerning the price of his employment, and besides a large salary and some valuable perquisites, he enjoyed a daily allowance for twenty servants, and as many horses. A thousand barbers, a thousand cup-bearers, a thousand cooks, were distributed in the several offices of luxury; and the number of eunuchs could be reckoned only with the figures of the day. The monarch who resigned to his subjects the superiority of merit and virtue, was distinguished by the oppressive magnificence of his dress, his table, his buildings, and his train. The stately palaces erected by his hands, and adorned, by many coloured marbles, and ornamented of masses gold and silver. The most exquisite dainties were procured, to gratify their pride, rather than their taste; birds of the most distant climates, fish from the most remote seas, fruits out of their natural season, winter roses, and summer snows, and the exercises of the gods were passed the expense of the legions; yet the smallest part of this costly multitude was subservient to the use, or even to the splendour, of the throne. The monarch was disgraced, and the people was injured, by the creation and sale of an infinite number of obscure, and even vulgar employments; and the moral worthlessness of mankind might purchase the privilege of being maintained, without the necessity of labour, from the public revenue. The waste of an enormous household, the increase of fees and perquisites, which were soon claimed as a lawful debt, and the bribe which they extorted from those who favoured them in novelty, or solicited their favour, suddenly enriched these haughty menials. They abused their fortune, without considering their past or their future condition; and their rapine and venality could be equalled only by the extravagance of their dissipation. Their silken robes were embroidered with gold, their tables served with delicacy and profusion; the houses which they built for their own use, would have covered the form of an ancient consul; and the most honourable citi-execute their final sentence, without delay, and without appeal. The office of president was exercised by the two senators, the head of the equestrian order, whose virtues conciliated the esteem of Greek sophists, and of Christian bishops. He was assisted by the eloquent Mamertinus,^{p} one of the consuls elect, whose merit is loudly celebrated by the doubtful evidence of his own applause. But the civil wisdom of the second Constantine, and the personal valor of his brother, were equal to the occasion. The violence of four generals, Nevitta, Agilo, Jovinus, and Arbacio. Arbacio, whom the public would have seen with less surprise at the bar than on the bench, was supposed to possess the secret of the commission; the armed and the angry leaders of the Jovian and Herculean faction were, as it were, alternately swayed by the laws of justice, and by the clamours of faction.\textsuperscript{3}

\textbf{Punishment of the innocent and the guilty.}\textsuperscript{4}

The chamberlain Eusebius, who had perished the previous year, was the abuser of Constantius, expiated, by an ignominious death, the insolvency, the corruption, and cruelty, of his servile ruler. The executors of Paulus and Apodemon, (former of whom was burnt alive) were accepted as an inadequate atonement by the widows and orphans of so many hundred Romans, whom those legal tyrants had betrayed and murdered. But justice herself (if we may use the pathetic expression of Ammianus\textsuperscript{5}) appeared to have been deceived in her choice of the suitor of the empire; and his blood accused the ingratitude of Julian, whose distress had been seasonably relieved by the intrepid liberality of that honest minister. The rage of the soldiers, whom he had provoked by his indiscretion, was the cause and the execuse of a death; and the emperor, deeply wounded by his own reproaches, and those of the public, offered some consolation to the family of Ursulus, by the restitution of his confiscated fortunes. Before the end of the year in which they had been adored with the ensigns of the prefecture and consularship, Taurus and Florentius were reduced to implore the clemency of the inexorable tribunal of Chalcedon. The former was banished to Verceilia in Italy, and a sentence of death was pronounced against the latter. A wise prince should have rewarded the crime of Taurus: the faithful minister, when he was no longer able to oppose the progress of a policy, like himself, under the reign of the emperor and his lawful sovereign. But the guilt of Florentius justified the severity of the judges; and his escape served to display the magnanimity of Julian, who nobly checked the interested diligence of an informer, and refused even to learn what place concealed the wretched fugitive from his own apprehensions. The decision of the tribunal of Chalcedon had been dissolved, the praetorian vicegerent of Africa, the notary Gaudentius, and Artemius \textsuperscript{6} (a prince of Egypt, were executed at Antioch. Artemius had reigned the cruel and corrupt tyrant of a great province. Gaudentius had long practised the arts of calumny against the innocent, the virtuous, and with a feeble hand, of the faction of Julian. But the circumstances of their trial and condemnation were so unskilfully managed, that these wicked men obtained, in the public opinion, the glory of suffering for the obdurate loyalty with which they had supported the cause of Constantius. The rest of his servants were treated by similar marks of clemency; and the opportunities of a multitude, particularly of Egyptians, who loudly demanded the gifts which they had impudently or illegally bestowed; he foresaw the endless procession of vexatious suits; and he engaged a promise, which ought always to have been sacred, that if they would repair to Chalcedon, he would meet them in person, to hear and determine their complaints. But as soon as they were landed, he issued an absolute order, which prohibited the watermen from transporting any Egyptian to Constantinople; and thus detained his disappointed clients on the Asiatic shore, till their patience and money being utterly exhausted, they were induced to return, with indignant murmurs to their native country.\textsuperscript{7}

The numerous army of spies, of agents, \textbf{Chremny of Julian.}\textsuperscript{8} to secure the repose of one man, and to interrupt that of millions, was immediately disbanded by his generous master, who, after the accession of Valens, had been appointed to the princes of the old Roman family. This generous merit was not less esteemed, and gentle in his punishments; and his contempt of reason was the result of judgment, of vanity, and of courage. Conscious of superior merit, he was persuaded that few among his subjects would dare to meet him in the field, to attempt his life, or even to sent themselves on his vacant throne. The philosopher could excuse the hasty sallies of discontent; and the hero could despise the ambitious projects which surpassed the fortune or the abilities of the rash conspirators. A citizen of Anyara had prepared for his own use a purple garment; and this indiscreet action, which, in another moment, might have been considered as a capital offence,\textsuperscript{9} was reported to Julian by the officious importunity of a private enemy. The monarch, after making some inquiry into the rank and character of his rival, despatched the informer with a present of a pair of purple slippers, to complete the strong magnificence of his suit. A man of so great a fortune in the empire, that his death, instead of a death of torture, which they deserved and expected, pronounced a sentence of exile against the two principal offenders. The only instance in which Julian seemed to depart from his accustomed clemency, was the execution of a rash youth, who, with a feeble hand, had attempted to assault the camp of the empress. But that youth was the son of Marcellus, the general of cavalry, who, in the first campaign of the Gallic war, had deserted the standard of the Caesar, and the republic. Without appearing to indulge his personal resentment, Julian might easily confound the crime of the son and of the father; but he was recon-

Julian was not insensible of the advantages of freedom. From his studies of public life, he had imbibed the spirit of ancient sages and heroes: his life and fortunes had depended on the good will of the people; and for ascended the throne, his pride was sometimes mortified by the reflection, that the slaves who would not dare to censure his defects were not worthy to applaud his virtues. He sincerely abhorred the system of oriental despotism, which DIOCLETIAN, Constantine, and the patient habits of freedom which he had acquired, and established the empire. A motive of superstition prevented the execution of the design which Julian had frequently meditated, of relieving his head from the weight of a costly diadem; but he absolutely refused the title of dominus, or lord, a word which was inscribed on all the acts of his reign. The colleague of Julian, and his own choice Julian himself, in the Senate of Constantinople the same honours, privileges, and authority, which were still enjoyed by the senator of ancient Rome. A legal fiction was introduced, and gradually established, that one half of the national council had migrated into the east; and the despotic successors of Julian, accepting the title of senators, acknowledged themselves the members of a respectable body, which was to represent the majesty of the Roman name. From Constantinople, the attention of the monarch was extended to the municipal senates of the provinces. He abolished, by repeated edicts, the unjust and pernicious exactions which had withdrawn so many able citizens from the service of his empire. He restored the equal distribution of public duties, he restored the strength, the splendour, or, according to the glowing expression of Libanius, the soul of the expiring cities of his empire. The venerable age of his reign excited the most tender emotion in the mind of Julian; which kindled into rapture when he re-collected the gods, the heroes, and the men superior to heroes and to gods, who had bequeathed to the last posterity the monuments of their genius, or the example of their virtues. He relieved the distress, and restored the beauty, of the cities of Epirus and Peloponnesus. Athens acknowledged him for her benefactor; Argos, for her deliverer. The pride of Corinth, again rising from its ruins with the honours of a Roman colony, exacted a tribute from the adjacent republics, for the purpose of destroying the games of the Isis, which the Persians had restored to their empire with the hunting of bears and panthers. From this tribute the cities of Elis, of Delphi, and of Argos, which had inherited from their remote ancestors the sacred office of perpetuating the Olympic, the Pythian, and the Nemean games, claimed a just exemption. The impositions of Julian were, however, more approved by the Christian than by the heathen; and, as the public opinion of the Christians was directed more by the sectarians than the Greeks, the heathen suffering from them were able to pursue their projects. But the behavior of Julian was uniformly supported. During the games of the Circus, he had, imprudently or designately, performed the munificence of a slave in the presence of the council. The moment he was reminded that he had wounded the dignity of another magistrate, he condemned himself to pay a fine of ten pounds of gold; and embraced this public occasion of declaring to the world, that he was subject, like the rest of his fellow-citizens, to the laws, and even to the forms, of the republic. The spirit of his administration, and the regard for the honor of his national religion, induced Julian to confer on the Senate of Constantinople the same honours, privileges, and authority, which were still enjoyed by the Senate of ancient Rome. A legal fiction was introduced, and gradually established, that one half of the national council had migrated into the east; and the despotic successors of Julian, accepting the almost unknown to the modern sovereigns of Europe. The arts of persuasion, so diligently cultivated by the first Caesars, were neglected by the military ignorance and Asiatic pride of their successors; and if they concealed their purpose to harangue the soldiers whom they feared, they treated them with silent disdain the senators whom they despised. The spirit of magnificence and arrogance which Constantius had avoided, were considered by Julian as the place where he could exhibit, with the most propriety, the maxims of a republican, and the talents of a rhetorician. He alternately practised, as in a school of declamation, the several modes of praise, of censure, of exhortation, and of incitement. He once remarked, that the study of Homer taught him to imitate the simple, concise style of Menelaurus, the copiousness of Nestor, whose words descended like the flakes of a winter's snow, or the pathetic and forcible eloquence of Ulysses. The functions of a judge, which are sometimes incompatible with those of a prince, were exercised by Julian, not only as a duty, but as an amusement; and although he might have trusted the integrity and discernment of his prætorian prefects, he often placed himself by their side on the seat of judgment. The acute penetration of his mind was agreeably occupied by the writing and dictating of the addresses of the advocates, who laboured to disguise the truth of facts, and to pervert the sense of the laws. He sometimes forgot the gravity of his station, asked indiscreet or unseasonable questions, and betrayed, by the loudness of his voice, and the agitation of his body, the earnest vehemence with which he maintained his opinion against the judges, the advocates, and their clients. But his knowledge of his own temper prompted him to encourage, and even to solicit, the reproof of his friends and ministers; and whenever they ventured to oppose the irregular sallies of his passions, the spectacles were agreeable to the jealous people, from as well as through the monarch. The decrees of Julian were almost always founded on the principles of justice; and he had the firmness to resist the two most dangerous temptations which assault the tribunal of a sovereign, under the specious forms of compassion and equity. He decided the merits of the cause without weighing the circumstances of the parties; and the poor, whom he wished to relieve, were condemned to satisfy the just demands of a noble and wealthy adversary. He carefully distinguished the judge from the legislator; and though he meditated a necessary reformation of the Roman jurisprudence, he pronounced sentence according to the strict and literal interpretation of those laws, which the magistrates were bound to execute, and the subjects to obey.

10 According to some, says Aristotle, (as he is quoted by Julian ad Theod. p. 516,) "the form of absolute government, the prince, is contrary to nature. Both the prince and the philosopher choose, however, to invoke the eternal truth in artful and laboured obscurity."

His character. The generality of princes, if they were stripped of their purple, and cast naked into the world, would immediately sink to the lowest rank of society, without a hope of emerging from their obscurity. But the personal merit of Julian was, in some measure, independent of his fortune. Whatever had been his choice of life, by the force of intrepid courage, lively wit, and intense application, he would have obtained him an immortality in the annals of the next highest honours of his profession; and Julian might have raised himself to the rank of minister, or general, of the state in which he was born a private citizen. If the jealous caprice of power had disappointed his expectations; if he had providently declined the paths of greatness, the employment of some of the most illustrious solitude would have placed, beyond the reach of kings, his present happiness and his immortal fame. When we inspect, with minute or perhaps malevolent attention, the portrait of Julian, something seems wanting to the grace and perfection of the whole figure. His genius was less powerful and sublime than that of Caesar; nor did he possess the consummate prudence of Augustus. The virtues of Trajan appear more steady and natural, and the philosophy of Marcus is more simple and consistent. Yet Julian sustained adversity with firmness, and prosperity with moderation. After an interval of one hundred and twenty years from the death of Alexander Severus, the Romans beheld an emperor who made no distinction between his duties and his pleasures; who laboured to relieve the distress and to revive the spirit of his subjects; and who endeavoured always with authority with merit, and happiness with virtue. Even faction, and religious faction, was constrained to acknowledge the superiority of his genius, in peace as well as in war, and to confess, with a sigh, that the apostate Julian was a lover of his country, and that he deserved the empire of the world.

Religion of Julian. The character of Apostle has injured the reputation of Julian; and the enthusiasm which clouded his virtues, has exaggerated the real and apparent magnitude of his faults. Our partial ignorance may represent him as a philosophic monarch, who studied to protect, with an equal hand, the religious factions of the empire; and to allay the theological fever which had inflamed the minds of the sectaries. The edicts of Diocletian to the exile of Athanasius. A more accurate view of the character and conduct of Julian will remove this favourable prepossession for a prince who did not escape the general contagion of the times. We enjoy the singular advantage of comparing the pictures which have been delineated by his most admiring friends, and his implacable enemies. The actions of Julian are faithfully related by a judicious and candid historian, the impartial spectator of his life and death. The unanimous evidence of his contemporaries is confirmed by the public and private declarations of the emperor himself; and his various writings express the uniform tenor of his religious sentiments, which policy would have prompted him to dissemble rather than to affect. A devout and sincere attachment for the gods of Athens and Rome constituted the ruling passion of Julian; the powers of an enlightened understanding were betrayed and corrupted by the principles of superstition, which were resented with the utmost censure, and soe by the senate, and by the people, who were in a state of perpetual suspense; and the phantoms which existed only in the mind of the emperor, had a real and pernicious effect on the government of the empire. The vehement zeal of the Christians, who despised the worship, and overturned the altars, of those fabulous deities, engaged their votes as much for the purification of the city with a very numerous party of superstition's professed; and the phantoms which existed only in the mind of the emperor, had a real and pernicious effect on the government of the empire. Julian; and the unsuccessful apostate has been overwhelmed with a torrent of pious invective, of which the signal was given by the sonorous trumpet of Gregory and Niconian.* The interesting moments of the empire which were crowded into the short reign of this active emperor, deserve a just and circumstantial narrative.
His motives, his counsels, and his actions, as far as they are connected with the history of religion, will be the subject of the present chapter.
His character was strange and fatal apostasy,* apostasy, may be derived from the early period of his life, when he was left an orphan in the hands of the murderers of his family. The names of Christ and of Constantius, the ideas of slavery and of religion, were soon associated in a youthful imagination, with the repugnances of the early Christian reasons. The care of his infancy was intrusted to Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, who was related to him on the side of his mother; and till Julian reached the twentieth year of his age he received from his christian preceptors the education not of a hero, but of a saint.
The emperor, less jealous of a heavenly than an earthly crown, contented himself with the imperfect character of a catechumen, while he bestowed the advantages of baptism on the nephews of Constantine.† They were even admitted to the inferior offices of the eclecticism. But Julian preserved the popular character of Scriptorius in the church of Nicomedia. The study of religion, which they assiduously cultivated, appeared able to produce the fairest fruits of faith and devotion.
They prayed, they fasted, they distributed alms to the poor, gifts to the clergy, and oblations to the tombs of the martyrs. The splendid monument of St. Herman, at Caesarea, was erected, or at least was undertaken, by the joint labour of Gallus and Julian.‡ They respectfully conversed with the bishops, who were eminent for superior sanctity, and solicited the benediction of the monks and hermits, who had introduced into the Christian religion the voluntary labor of the man. As the two princes advanced towards the years of manhood they discovered, in their religious sentiments, the difference of their characters. The dull and obstinate understanding of Gallus embraced, with impartial zeal, the doctrines of christianity; which never influenced his conduct, or moderated his passions. The mild disposition of the younger brother was less repugnant to the precepts of the gospel; and his active curiosity might have been gratified by a theological

* The orator, with some eloquence, much enthusiasm, and more vanity, addresses his discourse to heaven and earth, to men and angels; to God and to the great Constantius. (Ioannis or. iv. 160, an old pagan expression.) He concludes with a bold assurance, that he has erected a monument not less durable, and more venerable, than the columns of the ancients. See Socrates, Nazianzen, Orat. iii. 59, p. 134.

§ Julian himself (Epist. ii. 154,) assures the Alexandrians that he had

* See his chrism, and even his ecclesiastical education, in Grigory, (80. p. 56.) Socrates, (i. iii. 1.) and Sozomen, (iv. v. 2.) He escaped very narrowly from being a bishop, and perhaps a saint.
† This bishop, who had been intrusted to Gallus, was prosecuted with vigour and success; but the earth obstinately rejected and clung to the saint. The saint was repelled by the menace of Darius. See Julian, iii. p. 59—61. Such a partial earthquake, attested by many living spectators, would form one of the clearest miisters of the Flavian era.

system, which explains the mysterious essence of the Deity, and opens the boundless prospect of invisible and future worlds. But the independent spirit of Julian refused to yield the passive tables, which was the audience which was required, in the name of religion, by the haughty ministers of the church. Their speculative opinions were imposed as positive laws, and Guarded by the terrors of eternal punishments; but while they prescribed the rigid formulary of the Arian creed, he presented the principles of which the parties were entitled to the respect of his ecclesiastical guides. He was educated in the Lower Asia, in the school of Mardonius. The fierce contests of the early bishops, the incessant alterations of their creeds, and the profane motives which appeared to actuate their conduct, insensibly strengthened the prejudices of Julian, that they neither understood nor believed the religion for which they so fiercely contended. Instead of listening to the proofs of christianity with that favour-mable attention which adds weight to the most respectable evidence, he heard with suspicion, and disputed with obstancy and acuteness, the doctrines for which he had already experienced an invincible aversion. Whenever his youth was occupied by the study of Homer, he was forced to turn his thoughts to the examination of the speculations on the prevailing controversies, Julian always declared himself the advocate of paganism; under the specious excuse that in the defence of the weaker cause, his learning and ingenuity might be more advantageously exercised and displayed.
As soon as Julian ascended to the throne, he abruptly refused the honours of the purple. Julian was said to be the only man who had ever been permitted to breathe the air of freedom, of literature, and of paganism.* The crowd of sophists, who were attracted by the taste and liberality of their royal pupil, had formed a strict alliance between the pagan philosophy and the public office. Homer, instead of being admired as the original productions of human genius, were seriously ascribed to the heavenly inspiration of Apollo and the muses. The deities of Olympus, as they are painted by the immortal bard, impart themselves on the minds which are the least addicted to superstitious credulity. Our familiar knowledge of their names and characters, their forms and attributes, seems to bestow on those airy beings a real and substantial existence; and the pleasing enchantment produces an imperfect and momentary assent of the imagination to those objects which are our reason and experience. In the age of Julian, every circumstance contributed to prolong and fortify the illusion; the magnificent temples of Greece and Asia; the works of those artists who had expressed, in painting or in sculpture, the divine conceptions of the poet; the pomp of festivals and sacrifices; the successful arts of divination; the popular traditions of oracles and prodigies; and the ancient practice of two thousand years. The weakness of polytheism was, in some measure, excused by the moderation of its claims; and the devotion of the pagans was not only as despicable as their creeds, but rather a tolerable theology: but he maintains that the christian Trinity is not derived from the doctrine of Paul, of Jesus, or of Moses.
* A modern philosopher has ingeniously compared the different operation of thiasism and polytheism, with regard to the doubt or conversion which they produce in the human mind. See Hume's Ev-
The philosophers of the Platonic school, Plotinus, Porphyry, and the divine Iamblichus, were admitted as the most skilful masters of this allegorical science, which laboured to soften and harmonize the deformed features of paganism. Julian himself, who was directed in the mysterious pursuit by Iamblichus, the venerable successor of Iamblichus, aspired to the possession of a treasure, which he esteemed, if we may credit his solemn asseverations, the most agreeable discovery the world had been expounded and unfolded by Porphyry; but his labours served only to animate the pious industry of Julian, who invented and published his own allegory of that ancient and mystic tale. This freedom of interpretation, which might gratify the pride of the Platonists, exposed the vanity of their art. In their opinion, a system formed by the gods is not a formal idea of the universe, the world; it is a grand precept, an inexhaustible source of knowledge, an inexhaustible fountain of instruction. The number of its features is unlimited, and the mind of the prudent and pious might derive from it a knowledge of God the perfect, and that of human nature, the perfection of the soul; and, in short, the number of its precepts is in proportion to the number of the good and virtuous. The speculative system of the Platonic philosophy is a fount of instruction and of salvation. The sage, who should derive information from it on all the subjects of mystery, would be enabled to follow the will of God and to attain to that perfection which he desires. This is the whole of the system of the Platonic philosophy, which is the subject of this book. The nature and number of this system are of such a kind that they cannot be comprehended by the human mind. The system is as vast as the universe, and the mind of the sage is as vast as the universe. The system is a fount of instruction, and the mind of the sage is a fount of instruction. The system is an inexhaustible source of knowledge, and the mind of the sage is an inexhaustible source of knowledge. The system is a fount of instruction and of salvation, and the mind of the sage is a fount of instruction and of salvation. The system is a fount of instruction and of salvation, and the mind of the sage is a fount of instruction and of salvation. The system is a fount of instruction and of salvation, and the mind of the sage is a fount of instruction and of salvation.
In every age, the absence of genuine inspiration is supplied by the strong illusions of enthusiasm, and the mimic arts of imposture. If, in the time of Julian, these arts had been practised only by the pagan priests, for the support of an expiring cause, some indulgence might perhaps be allowed to the interest and habits of the surrounding population. But it must be kept in mind that their object was not to produce surprise and scandal, that the philosophers themselves should have contributed to abuse the superstitious credulity of mankind, and that the Grecian mysteries should have been supported by the magic or theurgy of the Roman Platonists. They had as much pretension to control the order of nature, to explore the secrets of futurity, to command the service of the inferior demons, to enjoy the view and conversation of the superior gods, and, by disinquai the soul from her material bands, to re-unite that imm mortal particle with the infinite and Divine Spirit.

The devout and fearless curiosity of Julian. Julian tempted the philosophers with the hopes of an easy conquest; which, from the situation of their young prospelyte, might be productive of the most important consequences. Julian imbibed the fatal doctrines of the Platonian library, and from the mouth of ̄Edesius, who had fixed at Pergamus his wandering and persecuted school. But as the declining strength of that venerable sage was unequal to the ardour, the diligence, the rapid conception of his pupil, two of his most learned disciples, Chrysantas and Eleutherus, at his request, undertook the plan of their aged master. These philosophers seem to have prepared and distributed their respective parts and the artfully contrived, by dark hints, and affected disputes, to excite the impatient hopes of the aspirants, till they delivered him into the hands of their associates, Maximus, the boldest and most skilful master of the Theurgic science. By his hands, Julian was secretly initiated at Ephesus, in the twentieth year of his age. His residence at Athens confirmed this unnatural alliance of philosophy and superstition. He obtained the privilege of a solemn initiation into the mysteries of Eleusis, which, amidst the general decay of the Grecian worship, still retained some vestiges of their primavai sanctity; and such was the zeal of Julian, that he afterwards invited the Eleusinian pontiff to the court of Gaul, for the sole purpose of confounding the ancient rites with the new; of making the adorable name of Jesus bear down on the imaginations of the faithful, or the imagination of the credulous aspirants, till the visions of comfort and knowledge broke upon him in a blaze of celestial light. In the caverns of Ephesus and Eleusis, the mind of Julian was penetrated with sincere, deep, and unalterable enthusiasm; though he might sometimes exhibit the vicissitudes of pious fraud and hypocrisy, which may be observed, or at least suspected, in the characters of the most conscientious fanatics.

From that moment he consecrated his life to the service of the gods; and while the occupations of war, of government, and of study, seemed to claim the whole measure of his life, a stated portion of the hours of the night was invariably reserved for the exercise of private devotion. The temperance which adorned the severe manners of the soldier and the philosopher, was connected with some strict and arduoususter of every hour, the presence of some charitable and edifying pain, the hour of the Communion of Saints, the hour in honour of Pan or Mercury, of Hecate or Jais, that Julian, on particular days, denied himself the use of some particular food, which might have been offensive to his tutelar deities. By these voluntary fasts, he prepared his senses and his understanding for the frequent and familiar visits with which he was honoured by the celestial powers. Notwithstanding the modest silence of Julian himself, we may learn from his faithful friend, the orator Libanius, that he lived in a perpetual intercourse with the gods and goddesses; that they descended upon earth to enjoy the conversation of his inviolate residence, of his family, to listen to a slumber touching his hand or his hair; that they warned him of every impending danger, and conducted him, by their infallible wisdom, in every action of his life; and that he had acqui ested such an intimate knowledge of his heavenly guests, as readily to distinguish the voice of the Olympian Jove from that of the Thracian Apollo from the figure of Hercules. These sleeping or waking visions, the ordinary effects of abstinence and fanaticism, would almost degrade the emperor to the level of an Egyptian monk. But the useless lives of Antony and Julian, were the consequence of his superstitions and occupations. Julian could break from the dream of superition to arm himself for battle; and after vanishing in the field the enemies of Rome, he calmly retired into his tent, to dictate the wise and salutary laws of an empire, or to indulge his genius in the elegant pursuits of literature and philosophy.
